I.L.R. 21 BOMBAY.

21 B. 1.

ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Honourable Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Strachey.

DAMODARDAS TAPIDAS (Original Defendant), Appellant v. DAYABHAI TAPIDAS (Original Plaintiff) AND ANOTHER (Original Defendant No. 2), Respondents.* [20th December, 1895 and 27th March, 1896.]

Will—Construction—Gift to sons—Life estate—Intestacy.

Tapidas Varajdas, a Hindu, died leaving a widow (Navivahu) and two sons (Damodar and Dayabhai), and a grandson Karsandas, the son of Dayabhai. Damodar had had two sons born to him in Tapidas' life-time, but both had died in infancy and before the date of Tapidas' will. This fact was not known at the hearing of the suit or of the appeal to any of the counsel appearing in the case, and was only disclosed after the first judgment of the Appeal Court had been delivered. By his will dated 1895, Tapidas disposed of certain dwelling-houses which belonged to him and of the residue of his estate as follows:—

8. "I have given the houses to my wife Navivahu for her to enjoy the income thereof. . . . . . . .

In the event of the decease of my wife Navivahu, my sons Bhai Damodar and Bhai Dayabhai may take in equal shares, half and half, the income that may be received, and may enjoy and may expend and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes, and the heirs also of both these my sons may always take the income from time to time, and may divide and take the income. To the same no one has any claim or title."

13. "Afterwards giving to all what is written in this will, all the residue of the estate (iskamal) the whole of it should be divided and taken in equal shares by my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai . . . . . . . And on the death of the two sons (kasa rasas) he who may have issue sons that issue is in every way the heir of his father's property, and if in the life-time of the two above-mentioned sons one should not have issue sons, then on his death, if my other son should be alive, he should get all the estate, cash and whatever else there may be, in that no son can raise a dispute . . . . . . . As to the rest, whichever son of mine may survive (hayatimo hoes) should get all that is given by me, and should there be no survivorship of that child, [2] and should he have a son or sons, then he (or they) should get all, according to what is written above; in that no one can raise an objection."

"Held, (confirming Cundy, J.) that under cl. 8 Damodar and Dayabhah took only a life interest in the house as tenants-in-common, and that the ultimate interest therein not being validly disposed of fell into the residue.

"Held, also, (varying the decree of Cundy, J.) that Damodar and Dayabhah each took a life-estate in a moiety of the residuary estate, and that if Damodar died without leaving a son, his moiety should devolve upon Dayabhah, or, if he were dead, upon his son Karsandas (if then living), and if Dayabhah should die without leaving a son, his moiety should devolve upon Damodar if then living."

[Rev., 22 B. 883 (P.C.)]

SUIT for the construction of a will.

The plaintiff (respondent No. 1) and the first defendant (appellant) were the sons of one Tapidas Varajdas and the second defendant (respondent No. 2) was the plaintiff's son.

Tapidas Varajdas died on the 31st May, 1886, leaving him surviving his widow Navivahu, his two sons Dayabhah and Damodar (plaintiff and first defendant), and his grandson Karsandas (defendant No. 2), the son of the plaintiff Dayabhah. Damodar had had two sons born to him in Tapidas' life-time; but they both had died in infancy, and before the date of Tapidas' will. This fact was not known to the counsel of the parties at the time of the hearing either in the Division Court or in the appellate Court.

By his will dated the 26th May, 1885, he appointed his said two sons his executors, and they proved the will on the 27th November, 1886.

The testator's widow Navivahu died on the 12th August, 1887.

The plaintiff in this suit prayed to have the said will construed and for a declaration of his rights and those of his son (Defendant No. 2) and his brother (Defendant No. 1).

The material clauses of the will were the eighth, thirteenth and eighteenth, which were as follows:

Eighth as follows:—We (i. e.) my said wife Navivahu and I and (my) family are now residing in the old house. That house was purchased in the name of my respected mother Jivkor from Shah Jambadas Ramchordas. As to the house near that house, I purchased it in S. (Sarvat) 1919-1920 (A. D. 1862 63) from Bai Daykor Shah Lalubhoy Ramchordas. In that house I and my son Bhai Dayabhah now sleep. That house (with) all the boundaries on the four sides:—and now in the front part Shah Jambabhoy Vijnanandas and Vaid Chandra Shankar reside as tenants; and in the rear there is a compound and there are privies. Along with [3] the same there is the boundary of the chawl as far as the rear wall. And close to this house in the front part there is a gateway within, which is in the occupation of Shah Vizbhancandas Paniyandas and other tenants. Along with all these (appurtenances) I have given (the houses) to my wife Navivahu (for her) to enjoy the income thereof. Whatever rent may be received for those houses, my wife Navivahu herself may take, maybe, may spend and (she) may make donations for religious and charitable purposes (dharam). She cannot be questioned by my "executors" and "trustees" and heirs. A "trust deed" for these houses shall be made and delivered by my "executors" and "trustees" and heirs to my wife Navivahu. In the same the authority to take the whole of the income during her life-time is (hers) and these houses cannot be sold or cannot be mortgaged by any one. In the event of the decease of my wife Navivahu, my sons Bhai Damodardas and Bhai Dayabhai, both (these) persons, deducting the expenses may take in equal shares half and half the income thereof that may be received and may enjoy and may expend and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes (dharam), and the heirs also of both these my sons may always take the income from time to time and may divide and take the income. To the same no one has any claim or title. As to the old house in which I now reside, in that house where my place of business (dukan) is there a door (through which) to go from it out of the place of business to the abovementioned house, and there is another door in my sleeping room; and there is a door (through which to go) from the third storey. All those doors when it may be the pleasure of my wife Navivahu shall be closed. None of my “executors” and “trustees” and heirs and no one else can raise any objection or dispute in any respect in regard to that. They shall always assist my wife Navivahu. This will be creditable to all.

Thirteenth as follows:—The management (of the business) is being carried on in the name of Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co. from S. (Sunvat) 1928 (A. D. 1871-72). In the same during the life-time of my brother Tulsidas, (his) share and my (share) and my son Damodardas, (shares, i.e.), the shares of us three persons were equal. Since the decease of Tulsidas, his share has been discontinued and the money and such other (property) appertaining to brother Tulsidas’ share that may come out of this company and what may come out of the household accounts in respect of his share, both those (amounts) being added together on payments being made out of the same, in accordance with what is written in brother Tulsidas’ “will” what may remain over should be received by me according to what is written in the “will.” Thereafter in Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co’s business there are my two shares, and there is my son Damodardas’ one share. I shall make Bhai Dayabhai a partner in Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co in my lifetime. Dayabhai will get a small share therein, but in the event of my decease my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai both persons remaining joint shall carry on the management of the aforesaid Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co. In the same the shares of these two persons are half and half. Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co., are the secretaries and treasurers of the Alliance Cotton Manufacturing Company, Limited. There is received their commission money which after my decease shall be received by my sons Bhai Damodardas and Bhai Dayabhai, both persons, in equal shares by both brothers half and half. But if my son Bhai Damodardas should not make Dayabhai a partner in accordance with what is written above, and should not annually give him an equal moiety out of the commission money of the Alliance Cotton Manufacturing Company, Limited, that may be received annually, then out of my property of all descriptions and moneys he shall first give Bhai Dayabhai Rs. 2,00,001, namely, two lakhs and one. For this money a legal “trust deed,” shall be made and with the same money “estates” or Government loan “notes” bearing interest shall be purchased and given. Whatever income the same may yield, Bhai Dayabhai shall take; and in the event of his decease, Bhai Dayabhai’s heir or heirs shall get (the same). Afterwards on what is mentioned in this “will” being given to all, as to the whole of the property which may remain over, my sons Bhai Damodardas and Bhai Dayabhai may divide and take the whole in equal shares, and if God should bring it to pass and a son should be born to my wife Navivahu, then (the property) shall be divided and taken in three shares. None of such sons as may be born to both (these) my sons can ask for (or demand anything) during the life-time of both these.
(my) sons. In the event of their (my sons') decease, they (their sons) or their heirs. With regard to what I have mentioned in this "will" and have given to my sons, two persons, and all that I have particularly specified in this "will," in accordance therewith, my sons Bhai Damodadas and Bhai Dayabhai, both brothers shall divide and take (their) shares; and in the event of the decease of both (my) sons, the sons of him who may have (left sons) are the heirs in every respect of his father's property and if either of (my) above-mentioned two sons should not have sons in his life-time, then in the event of his decease my other son who may be living shall get all estate and ready money and whatever else there may be. In regard to the same, no son can raise a dispute, and if one of my two sons should have daughters, then should there be one or more daughters, Rs. 25,000—namely, rupees twenty-five thousand—shall be given to her (or to them) and to my sons' wife Rs. 15,000—namely, rupees fifteen thousand—shall be paid. As to the residue, such son of mine as may be living shall get all that is given by me, and in case that son should not be living and should he have a son or sons, he (or they) shall get all in accordance with what is mentioned above. No one can raise a dispute or an objection in regard to the same.

Eighteenth as follows:—On the "legacies" and "estates" and other (property) mentioned in this "will" to be given being given according to what is written in this "will" and on the religious and charitable donations (dharmada) being set apart, I of (my) free will and pleasure give the immovable and moveable property, the (personal) ornaments and jewellery of all kinds and the ready-money to my two sons Damodadas and Dayabhai. They may divide and take all that property in equal shares. But if God should bring it to pass, and a son should be born to my wife, then (the property) shall be divided and taken in three shares; or if a daughter should be born, then (a legacy) shall be given to her in the same way as I have written in this will (directing legacies), to be given to my daughters Divali and Kiki. In regard to that no one shall raise any kind of objection or dispute.

The first defendant, Damodadas (the appellant) contended that the widow Navivahu being dead, he and the plaintiff Dayabhai took an absolute estate under the will as tenants-in-common in the house mentioned in cl. 8 and in the residue under clauses 13 and 18.

[5] The second defendant, the plaintiff's son, in his written statement submitted that after the death of the plaintiff and the first defendant he was absolutely entitled to the house and the residue, and that the plaintiff and the first defendant had no power to alienate any of the property beyond the term of their natural lives.

At the hearing the following issues were raised:—
1. Whether the plaintiff and first defendant take an absolute estate as tenants-in-common in the house property recited in clause 8 of the will after the death of Navivahu.
2. Whether on the death of Navivahu the interest of the testator in the said house was undisposed of by the said will.
3. Whether under clauses 13 and 18 of the said will, the plaintiff and first defendant took an absolute estate as tenants-in-common in the residue of the testator's estate.
4. Whether on the death of Navivahu the interest of the testator in the house recited in clause 8 of the said will fell into the residue of the testator's estate.
5. Whether the second defendant is not absolutely entitled to the house and property referred to in clauses 8, 13 and 18 of the will after the death of the plaintiff and the first defendant.

6. Whether the plaintiff and the first defendant have any power and right to alienate the said house and property beyond the term of their natural lives.

Macpherson and Inverarity appeared for the plaintiff and Starling and Lowdies for the defendant No. 2 (the plaintiff’s son).

Lang (Advocate General) and B. Tyabji for defendant No. 1.

Macpherson.—We contend that under the 8th clause there is a gift to the testator’s sons of the income only for their joint lives. The provision in favour of their heirs must be rejected, as the heirs were not ascertainable at the death of the testator and, therefore, after the life interests are expired the property falls into the residue.

As to the residue, we say that by cl. 13 it is given to the testator’s two sons as tenants-in-common for their lives with remainder over of the share of each to his son or sons capable of taking, and in case either of the testator’s sons should die without leaving a son, then his share is to go to the surviving brother. The second defendant (the plaintiff’s son) now has the whole remainder in expectancy vested in him—Theobald on Wills (3rd [6] Ed.), p. 342; Jarman on Wills (5th Ed.) p. 1896; Cooper v. Cooper (1).

As to cl. 18, we say that this clause merely provides for an after-born daughter. The rest of it is merely an imperfect repetition of cl. 13.

Lang for defendant No. 1:—We contend that the words “in the event of the death” in cl. 13 refer to the death of either of the testator’s sons in the testator’s life. The whole of the residue is given to the two sons absolutely, but if one of them should die without issue, then his share goes to the other. He cited s. 111 of the Indian Succession Act (X of 1865). Cl. 18 refers only to what is to be done on his death.

Candy, J.—The decision on the questions which arise in this case depends upon the construction of the will executed by the late Taptidas Vairidas on 26th May, 1885, by which his sons the present plaintiff Dayabhai and the first defendant Damodardas were made his trustees and executors. Taptidas died on 31st May, 1886, leaving him surviving his two sons above mentioned, his widow Navivahu, who subsequently died on 12th August, 1887, and Karsandas, present second defendant, son of the plaintiff, who was admittedly the only issue of a son of the testator born in the life-time of the testator.

Briefly, the first defendant Damodardas contends that under the will of his father he and his brother the plaintiff take an absolute estate as tenants-in-common in the house mentioned in cl. 8 of the will and in the residue of the testator’s estate under cl. 13 and 18 of the said will, while on the other hand the plaintiff and his son (the second defendant) contend that he (the plaintiff) and the first defendant are entitled to a life-interest only in the houses and the residue of the property referred to in cl. 8, 13 and 18 of the said will, and that after the death of the plaintiff and of the first defendant the second defendant will be absolutely entitled to the houses and the said property.

The provisions of the will which require notice are as follows:—

[7] After providing for certain pecuniary legacies the will in cl. 8 proceeds to deal with certain house property which testator gives “to my wife Navivahu to enjoy the income thereof; whatever rent may be received from those houses my wife Navivahu herself may take, may enjoy, may spend, and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes. She cannot be questioned by my executors and trustees and heirs. A trusteed for those houses shall be made and delivered by my executors and trustees and heirs to my wife Navivahu. In the same, the authority to take the whole of the income during her life-time is (hers), and these houses cannot be sold or cannot be mortgaged by any one. On the death of my wife Navivahu my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai, both persons, deducting the expenses, may take in equal shares half and half the income that may be received, and may enjoy and may spend and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes, and the heirs also of both these my sons may always take the income from time to time and may divide and take the income."

The words which I have italicised above have been rendered by the official translator as "in the event of the decease of my wife Navivahu," but there is no contingency in the vernacular words used,—they are simply "on the death" ("kaza razae").

To proceed with the will. In col. 10 it provides: "Of the parties to whom I have directed legacies to be given according to what is written above, if any one should die, which God forbid, then the owner of that legacy shall be the son or sons, or if there should be no sons or daughters of the deceased, then the amount of that legacy shall be received by my heirs who may be living." I call attention to this clause solely with regard to the words italicised above which are in the vernacular "kaine kaza thay," clearly indicating a contingency, and meaning that if one of the legateses named in the will should die before the testator, then the legacy should be taken, &c.

The next clause requiring notice is the thirteenth. It begins by dealing with the business of Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co., in which testator had two shares and his son Damodardas had one share. It proceeds: "I shall make Dayabhai a partner in Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co. in my life-time. Dayabhai will get a small share therein. But on my death my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai both persons remaining joint shall carry on the management of the aforesaid Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co. In the same the shares of these two persons are half and half." The words italicised above are as before simply "mari kaza razae" [3]—i.e., on my death. Then the will after dealing with the commission money received by Shah Tapidas Varajdas and Co. as secretaries and treasurers of the Alliance Cotton Manufacturing Company Limited, proceeds (to give the closest literal, though somewhat uncouth, translation of the Gujarati).

"Afterwards giving to all what is written in this will, all the residue of the estate (iskamat) the whole of it should be divided and taken in equal shares by my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai, and if God should bring it to pass and a son should be born to my wife Navivahu, then the property shall be divided and taken in three shares. Such sons as there shall be to those two sons shall not have the power to claim during the life-time of my above-mentioned two sons. On their death are his heirs (there is an ellipsis here—the Gujarati is simply, 'teon kaza razae tena varavo che'); what I having written in this will have given to two persons my sons and what is written in this will with full detail according to that my sons Damodardas and Dayabhai two brothers should divide and take; and on the death of the two sons (kasa razae) he who may have issue sons that issue is in every way the heir of his father’s property, and if in the life-time of the two above-mentioned sons one should not have issue sons, then on his death, if my other son should be alive, he should get all the estate cash and whatever else there may be, in that no son can raise a dispute. And if of my two sons one should have a daughter, then the one daughter or if there be more to her should give (the testator meant ‘should be given’). Rs. 25,000 and to my son’s wife should give Rs. 15,000. As to the rest, whichever son of mine may survive (hayatimo hoe) should get all that is given by me, and should there be no survivorship of that child and should he have a son or sons, then he or they should get all according to what is written above; in that no one can raise an objection."

After some further provisions which it is not necessary to recapitulate, the will proceeds in the 18th clause—

"On the legacies and ‘estato’ and other property mentioned in this will to be given being given according to what is written in this will and on setting a part ‘dharmada’ and the immoveable and moveable property of every kind, ornaments, jewellery and cash to my two sons Damodardas and Dayabhai I of my free will and pleasure give all that property, they should divide and take in equal shares. But should God bring it to pass, and my wife Navivahu should have a son, then they should divide in three shares, or should a daughter come, then according to what I have written to be given in this will to my daughters Davali and Kiki there should be given to her. In that no one can raise any objection."

After some other miscellaneous provisions, the will ends by a recital that "the whole of whatever kind of property I possess I myself have acquired by the grace of God." This is not denied.

Now first to deal with the residue which was apparently the bulk of the property left by the testator. What were his intentions? [9] At first sight the answer is clear:—to give a moiety to each of his two sons Damodardas and Dayabhai. Both in the thirteenth and eighteenth clauses he contemplates a third son being born to him, and in that event the three sons were to take each one-third of the estate, but there is not a single word limiting the estate to be taken by each of these three sons; therefore each would have taken his share absolutely. Possibly the testator did not think it probable that another son would be born to his wife Navivahu but the fact that he made no further directions which can be taken as limiting the estate given to each of his three sons should he die leaving three, indicates his intention that in any case his sons who should survive him should take an absolute estate in their shares. Do the further directions cut down the devise as regards the estate of the two sons named in the will? In the thirteenth clause the testator passes from the possibility of there being a third son born to him, and directs that the sons of his two sons Damodardas and Dayabhai should not have the power to claim during the life-time of their fathers. The testator apparently meant that his grandsons could not insist on a partition during their father’s life-time. That is a truism. The property being self-acquired and devised to Damodardas and Dayabhai their sons would have no right to insist on partition. There was no provision, it may be remarked, directing that Damodardas and Dayabhai should not, if they chose, partition with their own sons.

Then we come to the words "on their death (i.e., on the death of the two sons) are his heirs." This can only mean that the sons of Damodardas are the heirs of Damodardas and the sons of Dayabhai are the heirs of Dayabhais. Then the will repeats that his two sons should take all the estate in equal shares, and provides that on their deaths the male offspring should be in every way the heir of his father's property. There is no attempt to give the male offspring of Damodardas and Dayabhais anything less than an absolute estate of inheritance.

Then the will provides that if either of his sons Damodardas and Dayabhais should not have, in the life-time of both, male offspring, then on the death of the sonless son the surviving son should take all. This is like the well-known case of Sreemuty [10] Soorjeemoney Dossed v. Denobundoo Mullick (1), in which there was a gift of one-fifth of the testator's property to each of his five sons, with a gift over in the event of any of the five sons dying without a son or son's son to the surviving sons. As all the five sons were alive at the testator's death, the gift over on the subsequent death of one of the sons was held to be good. So here; it is true that the contingency is not that either Damodardas or Dayabhais should die without leaving a son or son's son living at his death, but that either should die without having had a son in the life-time of both. But that does not make the gift over the less good in law. It is to take effect upon an event which is to happen, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being, and the gift over is to a person in existence at the time of testator's death. As when the will was executed one of the testator's sons had already had a son born to him, one would have expected that the will would simply have provided that should Damodar not have a son born to him, his estate should go over. But we must take the words as we find them. They are literally as shown above. The official translation is not quite accurate, but the sense of this passage is fairly given.

Next we come to the provision that should either of the two sons have a daughter or daughters, then to her or them Rs. 25,000 are to be given and to the son's widow Rs. 15,000; the rest should be taken by the surviving son or his son or sons if he has not survived. The only reasonable interpretation to be put upon this passage is that the testator meant that if either Damodardas or Dayabhais died having had no son born to him in the life-time of himself and his brother, but leaving a daughter or daughters and widow, then the daughter or daughters and widow should not succeed to the share of the deceased, but should get specified legacies, and that the residue of the property of the deceased should go over to the surviving son, or should he not be alive, to his son or sons.
In short, the will in this respect was almost identical with the will in the case just quoted. It is unnecessary to discuss the validity of the gift over to the son or sons of the other brother. At present Damodardas has not had a son at all, and Dayabhais has had one son only, the second defendant, born in [11] testator's life-time. But it is clear, if the above interpretation of the will is correct, that Damodardas and Dayabhais have an absolute estate in their shares of the residue of the testator's property, that Dayabhais's absolute estate can never be divested, because he has had a son born in the life-time of both Damodardas and Dayabhais, and that the absolute estate of Damodardas may be divested, because he has not had a son born to him. I am asked by the sixth issue to declare that neither Damodardas nor Dayabhais has any right to alienate his share of the residue beyond the term of his natural life. But it is clear that Dayabhais is absolute master of his share, and as to Damodardas, the only limitation of his absolute estate is the contingency that he should not have a son born

(1) 9 M. I. A. 123.
to him in the lifetime of himself and Dayabhai; it has not been contended that it is impossible for him to have a son.

In the Mullick's case quoted above the Privy Council held (1) that it was safe to conclude that the intention of the testator was that his sons should in any event enjoy during their lives the income of their shares of his property. That was as far as it was necessary to go for the determination of the question before the Court. The Supreme Court of Calcutta held (1) that the will gave to the deceased son an absolute interest subject to be divested in the event which happened, and see Sir B. Peacock's remarks on this case in his judgment in the Tagore case (2). So here if there was no intention of the testator to give his residuary estate to his two sons for their lives only, with remainder to their sons and the gift over in the event described above, then the Court cannot declare that Damodardas has only a life-estate in his share, because no son has up till now been born to him. Can it be said that it appears from the will that only a restricted interest was intended for Damodardas and Dayabhai? The testator never once said directly in the will that he gave the residue in equal shares to his two sons for their lives. He knew well enough what a life-estate was. In the eighth clause he directed that his wife should enjoy the income of certain house property during her lifetime, and be distinctly prohibited alienation of the said [12] property. With regard to the residue, he made no such provision. This shows the difference between this case and the Tagore case (3), and the case of Kumar Tarakeswar Roy v. Kumar Shoshi Shikhareswar (4). Here there was no gift of the residue to Damodardas and Dayabhai for the defrayment of certain pious acts, providing that they, their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line, should enjoy the same, and that if either of them died without leaving a male child, then his share should devolve on the survivor and his descendants, and not on the other heirs of the deceased. Here there was simply a gift to A. and B. with a direction that the sons of each should be the heirs of their father, not that the moiety of the residue devised to A. should on A.'s death go to A.'s son or sons, but that A.'s son or sons should be in every respect the heir or heirs of A.'s estate. Of course, the testator could not validly direct who should take any subsequently self-acquired property of his two sons. But if we reject as void all reference to anything but the testator's estate still the language is important as showing that the testator's intention was not to devise and bequeath certain properties to A. for life with remainder to A.'s sons, but rather an absolute estate to A. and his sons, defeasible should A. die without ever having a son. That is more like the case of Bhobun Mohini v. Hurrish Chunder (5) than it is like Tarakeswar Roy's case quoted above (4).

Taking the will as a whole, it appears that the testator intended to convey more than a life-estate to each of his two sons. He intended to convey an absolute estate to each son defeasible on no son being born to either devisee during the lifetime of both. That is an estate which the Hindu law does not prohibit. No doubt the testator did (if my interpretation is correct) contemplate the daughters (if any) of Damodardas and Dayabhai being shut out should those daughters not have a brother or brothers born in the lifetime of their father and uncle. But that was all.

Thus no inference arises that the testator had really an estate tail in contemplation. The only argument which occurs to me (it was not put forward in such argument as there was at the bar) as [13] showing that the testator may have intended to give only life-estates to his two sons is that he made them trustees as well as executors. But that may have been (as the testator thought) for the purposes of the will other than the devise of the residuary estate. For all these reasons, I cannot say that the spirit of the will is strong enough to overcome the letter and that the absolute estates apparently conferred on Damodaras and Dayabhai in their shares in the residuary estate must now be declared to be life-estates only.

It only remains to deal with the provisions of the eighth clause. Two interpretations are open. Either it provides that Damodaras and Dayabhai and their heirs should on Navivahu’s death enjoy the income of the property, in which case Damodaras and Dayabhai would be entitled to the property itself (Act X of 1865, s. 159, illustration C), or else it is a gift to Damodaras and Dayabhai for their joint lives and remainder to their heirs, which would be void for uncertainty and then it would fall into the residue. I accept the latter interpretation, because though there is no direction that the sons should enjoy the income during their lives, as was the case with Navivahu’s enjoyment, still the enjoyment is apparently burdened with the defrayment of certain religious and charitable expenses, and thus the intention of the testator was, it seems, that his sons should have a life-estate in the income. They are also entitled to it as part of the residue—and their interest in the residue is as shown above absolute.

My findings, therefore, on the issues will be—

1. In the affirmative—the first defendant’s interest being defeasible in a certain event.
2. In the negative.
3. In the affirmative—the first defendant’s interest being defeasible in a certain event.
4. In the negative—not on the death of the testator.
5. In the negative—the Court cannot say what will be the interest of the second defendant in the properties in question after the death of the plaintiff and the first defendant.

[14] 6. In the affirmative—subject to the fact that first defendant’s interest is defeasible in a certain event.

All costs to come out of the estate.

The first defendant Damodar appealed and contended—

1. That his share in the estate was not defeasible in any event.
2. That the house mentioned in cl. 8 was on the death of Navivahu undisposed of by the will, and that he and the plaintiff then took it as co-partner.
3. That if the house fell into the residue on the death of Navivahu, then that he and the plaintiff took moieties absolutely.
4. That he and the plaintiff each took a moiety of the residue absolutely and not subject to defeasance in any event.
5. That at all events he and the plaintiff took identical interests in the residue, whether absolute or otherwise.

FARRAN, C.J.—Upon this appeal we have to determine whether the construction put by the Division Court upon the eighth clause of the will of the testator Tapidas Varajdas and upon the thirteenth [15] and eighteenth clauses of the same will read together is correct; and (if not) what construction should be placed upon them.

Before reading the clauses, we mention the few facts which it is necessary to bear in mind when considering their meaning. Tapidas, the testator, was a Hindu inhabitant of Bombay possessed of considerable self-acquired property. The will in question was made by him in Bombay. It bears date the 26th May, 1885. His family then consisted of his wife Navivahu, his two sons Damar and Dayabhai, who were both married, and of whom one, Dayabhai, had a son Karsandas, and two daughters Bai Divali and Bai Kiki. He apparently contemplated the possibility of having further children born to him. No change, however, took place in his family before his death. He died on the 31st May, 1886. His widow Navivahu has since died. Her death took place on the 12th of August, 1887. It is only necessary to add that Dayabhai (the plaintiff) has still only one son, the second defendant Karsandas, while Damar, the first defendant, has never had a son. The testator appointed his sons Damar and Dayabhai executors and trustees of his will. They duly proved it on the 12th November, 1837. The rules laid down in the Indian Succession Act are applicable to the construction of its clauses.

By the eighth clause the testator after an elaborate description of his two contiguous dwelling-houses provides that his wife Navivahu shall have a life-interest in them, with absolute powers of disposition over their rents and profits. He then proceeds to deal with them after her death as follows:—

"In the event of the decease of my wife Navivahu, my sons Bhai Damar and Bhai Dayabhai may take in equal shares half and half the income that may be received, and may enjoy and may expend and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes, and the heirs also of both these my sons may always take the income from time to time, and may divide and take the income. To the same no one has any claim or title."

We think that Mr. Justice Candy is correct in holding that under this clause Damar and Dayabhai take only a life-interest in the houses as tenants-in-common, and that the ulterior interests therein not being validly disposed of, fall into the residue. Though the gift of the income of the property in general terms carries with it a gift of the property itself, yet that is only where [16] the will affords no indication of an intention that the enjoyment of the bequest should be of limited duration (Indian Succession Act, s. 159). Here the power of disposition over the income given to Damar and Dayabhai is in identically the same terms with the power of disposition over it given to the widow, who clearly had only a life-estate.

given to her, and the testator manifests his wish that the heirs of each son should enjoy the income in the same way as the sons. The use of the word "also" in connection with the heirs seems to us to indicate an intention on the part of the testator that their enjoyment should be something distinct and separate from that of the sons. On the whole, we think that the testator when he gave the income of the houses to his sons equally did not intend to give to them the houses themselves, but desired that their enjoyment of the houses should be in point of time co-extensive with their respective lives.

The bequest of the residue gives rise to more difficult questions. Though the official translation of the cls. 13 and 18 does not materially differ from the translation adopted by Mr. Justice Candy, we refer mainly to the latter as it is more literally accurate than the translation made in the Translator's Department. The translation which we allude to is at p. 88 of the Paper Book. It runs thus:—(His Lordship read the thirteenth clause as given in the judgment of Candy, J., supra p. 8, and continued).

Upon the terms of that clause it is contended for the appellant that Damodar and Dayabhai take absolute estates in the residue as tenants-in-common, and that the defeasance does not operate. The death of one brother issueless in the lifetime of the other refers, it is argued, to the period anterior to the death of the testator, and as both survived him, the defeasance does not in any event take place. It is also contended for the appellant that, even if this be not so, the provisions of cl. 18 override those of cl. 13, and confer an absolute indefeasible estate upon each of the brothers.

For the respondent Karsandas, on the other hand, it is contended that Damodar and Dayabhai take only estates for their [17] respective lives in the residue. Counsel for the respondent Dayabhai, who had in the Division Court contended that the brothers only took life-estates in the residue, and who had obtained a decree more favourable to his client than he had contended for, supported the judgment of the Division Court, which decided that Dayabhai and Damodar took respectively estates absolutely in a moiety of the residue, but liable to be defeated and to pass over to the surviving brother in the event of either of the brothers dying without leaving a son. Three alternative constructions have thus to be considered.

There is also a minor question as to whether the defeasance clause or the gift over comes into operation in the event of a brother dying without leaving issue or without having had issue.

The appellant's contention based upon s. 111 of the Succession Act illustrated in the English cases cited by Mr. Starling (Rogers v. Rogers (1), Wright v. Stephens (2), Howard v. Howard (3), Edwards v. Edwards (4)) hardly arises when we refer to the translation of the will which we have read. In the official translation, the death of one brother in the lifetime of the other appears as a contingency "in the event of his decease," but that is a form which for some ineradicable reason is almost always adopted by our translators. It is a sort of traditional form of translation. In the original, no contingency is contemplated. The correct translation as given in Mr. Justice Candy's version is "on the death." Accordingly we are of opinion that upon the proper construction of cl. 13

(1) 7 W. R. Eng. 541.
(2) 4 B. and Ald. 574.

(4) 16 Beav. 357 (361).
of the will on the death of one brother before the other "without having had issue sons" or "without having issue sons," whichever be the correct construction of the passage, the gift over to the surviving brother would take effect, although both brothers survived the testator.

With regard to the eighteenth clause of the will, we do not regard it as being substitutionary for the thirteenth clause or as overriding the latter. It appears to us rather to be a comprehensive summing up or recapitulation of the contents of the whole will and an emphatic declaration by the testator of his former [18]disposition in favour of his sons, with the addition of a provision for a future daughter should one be born to him—a provision which he had forgotten to make when penning cl. 13, than to indicate any change of purpose on his part or wish to vary or control what he had previously directed. The two clauses must, we think, be read together and reconciled, and cannot be treated as antagonistic, but as mutually explanatory of each other. The general expression contained in cl. 18 does not, we think, defeat or affect the gift over between the brothers which is set out in cl. 13.

We have next to consider the extent of the estate which Damodar and Dayabbai take in the residue. The ellipsis in cl. 13 as translated by the learned Judge does not occur in the official translation. The translator introduces the pronoun "they" as the predicate to the verb "are," but whether the genius of the language admits of this, or whether there is really an ellipsis, the repetition of the same phrase later on in the clause shows that the sense is correctly rendered by our Court translator. We have then twice repeated in the same clause this limitation, "on their death their sons are their heirs" or, as it is put later on, "on the death of both of my sons, the sons of him who may have sons are the heirs in every respect of his father's property." The "both" in this sentence should evidently, as in the eighth clause, be read distributively, and the grammatical meaning of the limitation is "on the death of each of my sons, his sons, or issue sons, are the heirs of his father's property," meaning the property which has come to his father under the will.

It is now contended for the second respondent, as in the lower Court it was contended for both the respondents, that full effect should be given to this direction, which can only be done by treating it as limiting the half shares of each of the testator's sons to their sons respectively on their father's death; and that it should be read as amounting to a gift of a moiety of the residue to the sons of each of his sons on the death of their respective fathers. The result, of course, of giving this effect to the testator's directions would be to reduce the absolute estate which, subject [19] to defeasance, the lower Court has held that each of the sons of the testator is entitled to, to a life-estate. There is, we think, much force in this contention. It is common knowledge that Gujarati testators seldom use direct words of gift when disposing of the bulk of their estate; a common form used by them is "As long as I live I am the owner and on my death my son or my wife, &c., is (sometimes) "the owner" or (sometimes) "the heir." Such expressions are usually construed by the Court as gifts. It would not, therefore, we think, be opposed to the genius of the language to interpret the expression in the present will "that the sons are the heirs of their father's property" as a limitation in favour of or as a gift to the sons. And, if possible, we ought to adopt that construction of the words assuming them to be susceptible of two meanings which will give some effect to them rather than that which will give none—Indian Succession Act, s. 71. The provision in favour of the daughters of the sons of the testator affords a further clue to the intention of the testator. If a son has daughters only, they are to have a pecuniary legacy of Rs. 25,000, while if there are sons, they are to be the heirs of their father’s property. The gift over of each brother’s estate in the event of his being sonless, or dying without leaving sons, points also in the same direction, as also does the appointment of the sons as "trustees" as well as executors. On the whole we think that to hold that the testator’s sons take only life-estates in the property which they are to divide and take under cl. 13, and which he of his free will gives them by cl. 18, and which under the same clause they are to divide and take, gives effect better to the intention of the testator as he has declared it, than to hold that Damodar and Dayabhāi take absolute estates which will enable them to will away the whole property to strangers or to favour their daughters at the expense of the sons.

We have next to consider the effect of the gift over and under what circumstances it takes place. It only, we think, comes into effect if either of the brothers dies without having or having had sons. The words are “and on the death of the two sons, he who may have issue sons that issue is in every way the heir of bis [20] father’s property, and if in the lifetime of the two above mentioned sons, one should not have issue sons, then on his death, if my other son should be alive, he shall get the estate.” The most natural meaning to attach to this limitation and its plain grammatical one is that on one brother, not having male issue in the lifetime of the other, dying, the estate of the brother so dying, subject to the provision for his daughter and widow, passes to the surviving brother. There is no rule of law which prevents this gift over from taking effect. The birth of a son, however, to either of the sons make such son the inheritor of his father’s estate and the gift over does not come into operation. So far no difficulty arises. The last sentence of the clause apparently puts the son of a son in the place of his father for the purpose of receiving the gift over.

The result, then, is this—Damodar and Dayabhāi each takes a life estate in a moiety or half share of the residue. The reversion of Dayabhāi’s share is now vested in his son Karsandas, and as to that share no further question arises. If Damodar die without having a son, his moiety will devolve upon his brother Dayabhāi, or, if Dayabhāi be then dead, on Karsandas.

It would be premature for us to determine what will be the result if Damodar shall have a son. We can make no direction as to the rights (if any) of such son which would be binding on him, or as to the rights (if any) or any further sons of Dayabhāi if he should have other sons.

The decree will be amended accordingly. The parties respectively to have their costs out of the estate.

On the 20th March, 1896, the appeal was called on to speak to the minutes of the decree, when the fact that the appellant Damodardas had had two sons, both of whom were born and died before the date of the said will, was brought to the notice of the Court. This fact was not known at the hearing either of the suit or of the appeal to any of the counsel instructed in the case, and was only disclosed after the above judgment of the Appeal Court was delivered.

[21] By consent of counsel for all parties it was arranged that the Court should give its decision on the new facts as if the case had been argued in review upon such facts.
After consideration the Court delivered the following judgment:—

JUDGMENT.

27th March, FARRAN, C.J.—When minutes of the decree were spoken to on Friday last, it was pointed out that there was an inconsistency in the judgment as to the circumstances under which the gift over in the event of either of the brothers dying without "issue sons" took effect. We have struck out of the words from the judgment which occasioned the inconsistency. It was at the same time brought to our notice that Damodar had had two infant sons, who were born and died before the date of the will, one having been born on the 1st July, 1873, and having died on the 22nd July, 1873; the other having been born on the 23rd November, 1880, and having died on the 12th February, 1891. This circumstance was unknown to the Court and to counsel when the appeal was argued. The importance of this change of circumstances upon the construction of the substitutionary clause was obvious. To avoid the necessity of an application for a review, counsel agreed that the matter should be considered by the Court in the same way as if a review had been granted on this ground.

We have now to construe the substitutionary clause having regard to this circumstance. At the time when the testator made the provision that "on the death of the two sons he who may have 'issue sons' that issue is in every way the heir of his father's property, and if in the lifetime of the two abovementioned sons one should not have 'issue sons,' then on his death, if my other son should be alive, he shall get all the estate," each of his sons had had "issue sons." If the expression "have issue sons" is read as "have issue sons at the time of death" or as equivalent to "leave issue sons," a sensible interpretation according with the actual circumstances is given to the provision. If, on the other hand, "have issue sons" is read without reference to the time of death, or as equivalent to "have had issue sons," the provision, having regard to the actual circumstances, becomes meaningless. As both the sons had had "issue sons" at the date [22] of the will, there could not be (if the expression is taken in this latter sense) any contingency at all. But it is plain that the testator contemplated a contingency. We think the expression ought to be read so as to give it some effect, and not in such a way as to render the whole provision inoperative. Here there is a reason derivable from the will for reading "have issue" as meaning "leave issue," which was wanting in the case of Gurusami v. Sivakami.(1). There their Lordships say: "There is absolutely nothing on the face of the will to suggest a secondary meaning. The words 'have issue' are often read as meaning 'leave issue,' but not without some reason derivable from the will." Reading, then, the expression "have issue" in the sense which we have indicated, the result expressed at the end of our judgment as to the reversion of Dayabhau's share being now vested in his son Karsandas and the succeeding paragraph must be struck out. Minutes of the decree will be settled accordingly.

The following were the minutes of decree as finally settled:—

This appellate Court doth vary the said decree dated the 28th day of March, 1895, and in place and lieu thereof doth pass the following decree: and doth declare that the appellant Damodardas Tapidas and the first respondent Dayabhai Tapidas take a life-interest only as tenants-in-common in the two contiguous dwelling houses (other than the old house dealt with by the will of Tulsiadas Varajdas) at Kalbadevi Road mentioned in cl. 8 of the said will, and that the ultimate interest therein not having been validly disposed of fall into the residue; and this appellate Court doth further declare that the said appellant Damodardas Tapidas and the first respondent Dayabhai Tapidas each takes a life-estate in a moiety or half share of the residuary estate of their deceased father Tapidas Varajdas; and this appellate Court doth further declare that if the said appellant Damodardas Tapidas die without leaving a son, his moiety in the said residuary estate will devolve upon his brother the said Dayabhai Tapidas if then alive, or, if the said Dayabhai Tapidas be then dead, then upon his son the said respondent Karsandas Dayabhai (if then alive), and that if the said Dayabhai Tapidas die without leaving a son, his moiety in the said residuary estate will devolve upon his brother the said Damodardas Tapidas if then alive; and this appellate Court doth lastly order that the costs of all the parties to the suit and this appeal, including the costs of the said review of judgment and speaking to the minutes of the decree when taxed as between attorney and client and noted in the margin hereof, be paid out of the property of the deceased.

[33] ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Candy.

PURSHOTAMDAS TRIBHOVANDAS (Plaintiff) v. PURSHOTAMDAS MANGALDAS NATHUBHAI (Defendant).* [19th March, 1896.]

Marriage—Betrothal Contract of marriage—Suit against father of betrothed girl to have betrothal declared void and for damages for breach of contract—Kapole Bania caste.

The plaintiff, who had been betrothed to the defendant's daughter Kamalavanti, sued for a declaration that unless the defendant was willing that the marriage should be performed before the expiration of the month of Vaishakh 1895 (May-June, 1896) the contract for the marriage should no longer be binding on the plaintiff and that the betrothal was void, and for Rs. 25,000 damages for breach of the contract of betrothal and marriage.

The defendant pleaded that his daughter Kamalavanti was not willing to marry the plaintiff within the period mentioned, and that he had no right to force his daughter against her will. At the trial Kamalavanti stated that she was unwilling to be married for three or four years. The Court found that in the Kapole Bania caste, to which the parties belonged, marriages ordinarily take place when the bride is between twelve and fifteen years of age. Kamalavanti was born on the 2nd May, 1891, so that she was nearly fifteen at the date of suit (16th January, 1896). Before filing the suit the plaintiff had called upon her and the defendant her father to fix a date for the marriage, but the defendant had declined to do so on the ground that his daughter did not wish to marry at that time, and that he would not force her to marry against her will.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration prayed for. The marriage of Hindu children is a contract made by the parents, and the children themselves exercise no volition. This is equally true of betrothal, and there is no implied condition that fulfilment of the contract depends on the willingness of the girl at the time of marriage.

It was contended that plaintiff could not obtain damages; that defendant had not broken the contract, the plaintiff assuming that the contract of betrothal was still in force, and the defendant having a locus praevaricator to the end of Vaishakh 1906 (May-June, 1896).

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages. There was practically a repudiation of the betrothal. The plaintiff's willingness to marry Kamlaavanti at any time before the end of Vaishakh (May-June, 1896) did not dissent him to damages, seeing that Kamlaavanti had declared her unwillingness to be married to plaintiff then, and the defendant had declared that he could not compel her to change her mind.

THE plaintiff had been for eight years betrothed to the defendant's daughter. He complained that the defendant now refused to fix a date for the marriage, alleging that the girl did not wish as yet to become the plaintiff's wife. In January, 1896, the plaintiff brought this suit, praying that unless the defendant was willing to have the marriage performed before the expiration of Vaishakh, Samvat 1952 (May, June, 1896), the contract for the same might be declared not binding on the plaintiff, and the betrothal void. It was alleged in the plaint (and not denied in the written statement) that after Samvat 1952 there was no day on which the marriage of a Hindu could be lawfully performed until the end of Samvat 1953, i.e., for a period of eighteen months. The plaintiff also claimed Rs. 25,000 as damages for the loss of reputation in the caste, which, he alleged, he would sustain if the contract were not carried out.

[From the evidence given at the hearing, it appeared that the plaintiff was, betrothed to the defendant's daughter (Kamlaavanti) on the 15th January, 1888, the intention of the parties being (as the Court found) that the marriage should be solemnized when the girl attained the age at which according to the custom of their caste (the Kapole Bania caste) betrothed girls were ordinarily married, viz., between the age of twelve and fifteen. Kamlaavanti was born on the 2nd May, 1881. At the date of betrothal she was over six and a half years of age, and the plaintiff was still at school. At the time of suit, Kamlaavanti was fourteen years and six months old and the plaintiff was twenty-four years of age.

The betrothal was arranged between the plaintiff's mother Ramkorbai and uncle Keshavadas (who acted for him) and the defendant, who acted on behalf of his daughter Kamlaavanti. Early in the year 1895 the defendant was called upon to fix a date for the marriage, but he declined to do so on the ground that Kamlaavanti did not wish to marry at that time, and that he would not force her to marry against her will. On the 18th December, 1895, the plaintiff wrote to Kamlaavanti, requesting her to name an early day for the marriage, and on the same day Ramkorbai's solicitor wrote to the defendant on her behalf and on that of the plaintiff requesting him to "fix some day in the month of Maha Pagan or Vaishakh (February to June) after which no marriage could be performed for eighteen months) for the celebration of such marriage." No reply was given to [26] that letter, and this suit was filed on the 16th January, 1896, praying for the relief above stated.

The suit was heard by Candy, J.
Lang (Advocate-General), Macpherson and Lowndes with him, for plaintiff.—Defendant is liable to carry out his engagement. Is he ready and willing to carry it out? There is an implied condition always in such a contract that it should be carried out in reasonable time—Leake on Contracts (3rd Ed.), p. 723. In cases under Hindu law, the Court will consider what is the usual age of marriage for females in the particular caste. Why should plaintiff have to wait when the girl is admittedly fully grown?

If the contract is broken, the plaintiff is entitled to damages and is entitled to sue for them now as the defendant’s admission of his inability to carry out the contract gives a right of action—Frost v. Knight (1); Cherry v. Thompson (2).

The defendant is not freed from liability by the refusal of the girl. The consent of the minor is not necessary—Mayne’s Hindu Law (5th Ed.), para. 86.

As to the amount of damages, Umed Kika v. Nagindas (3); Smith v. Woodfine (4); Mulji Thackersey v. Gomti (5). We say we are entitled to substantial, if not exemplary, damages.

Inverarity (Scott with him) for defendant.—This is a suit of an unprecedented character. The plaint is based on the assumption that the contract of marriage is still in force. No damage has as yet been sustained. And a suit does not lie for threatened damages—Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. (6). There is no injury here alleged at date of suit, and no proof of loss of reputation prior to suit; on the contrary one witness said that a lower opinion of the plaintiff prevailed since he has filed the suit. All the cases cited are cases where the contract is repudiated before the time for performance arrives. Hore defendant has until next May to get Kamalavanti’s consent to the performance of the marriage. We do not wish to hold the plaintiff to his contract if he is unwilling to wait, and will restore him his “palla” and [26] presents. But we deny that there has been or is any breach of contract on our part. All contracts for marriage among Hindus are subject to the condition that the girl is willing to be married. The only contract in such cases is to give the girl in marriage. Shri Dayal v. Hiralal (7) shows that you cannot compel a girl to marry. Our main contention is that a father, who will not force his daughter to marry, is under no liability for breach of contract of betrothal, even if she declines to marry at all. A bachelor can adopt a son.

JUDGMENT.

CANDY, J.—The facts of this case are simple, but the question at issue is of an admittedly unprecedented character. The parties belong to the Kapole Bania caste, of which the well-known citizen of Bombay, the late Sir Mangaldas Nathuboy, was the head. Defendant is the second son of the late Sir Mangaldas. On 15th January, 1888, his daughter Kamalavanti was betrothed to the present plaintiff. The evidence of Dr. Blaney, which is accepted by both sides, shows that that gentleman at the earnest request of defendant and of defendant’s wife induced the plaintiff’s mother Ramkorbai and her brother Kesavdas to agree to the contract of betrothal. Plaintiff’s father was then dead. It is said that Sir Mangaldas, and not defendant, was really the contracting party. But this is not proved. No doubt Sir Mangaldas as head of the undivided family did take some part in the proceedings, which resulted in the contract of betrothal; and the "Pulla" money (Rs. 401) was paid over to him. But it is clear that defendant, who as the father of the girl is according to Hindu law the person who has the right to dispose of her in marriage, was the person who actually betrothed Kamalavanti to plaintiff; and he has in effect admitted himself to have been the contracting party, or at least has accepted and approved of the contract. Kamalavanti was born on the 2nd May, 1881; so at the time of her betrothal she was a little more than six and a half years old. Plaintiff is now twenty-four years old.

At the time of his betrothal he was still at school.

At first things apparently went smoothly. There were the usual visits paid by the girl to the house of plaintiff's family, [27] and by plaintiff to the house of defendant. But about three years ago their visits ceased. The exact cause of this has not been satisfactorily established. No doubt the ostensible reason may have been that defendant and his wife refused to let their daughter visit at plaintiff's house unless plaintiff paid as many visits to their house; and Keshavdas says this is not according to the custom of the caste, and he and Ramkor did not send plaintiff. But I think that most probably there was some cause of tension between the families which has not been disclosed. Defendant says that plaintiff's family wanted money from him. I doubt whether any such demand was really made, or if made whether it resulted in friction. It is useless to speculate as to what was the true cause of dispute. Parties sometimes litigate in this Court without disclosing even to their own legal advisers the full facts of their case. This much seems clear that the two families were not on good terms before any question arose as to fixing the date of plaintiff's marriage with Kamalavanti.

It is alleged on plaintiff's behalf that at the time of the contract of betrothal it was agreed that the marriage should take place when Kamalavanti attained the age of twelve years. The evidence of Keshavdas on this point is far too vague to establish such a term in the contract. Defendant denies it; and I have no doubt that the intention of the parties was simply that the marriage should be solemnized when the girl attained the age at which, according to the custom of the caste, betrothed girls are ordinarily married. As to what that age is, there is practically no dispute. Defendant's witnesses Kaliandas and Devidas admitted that the majority of girls are married after they reach the age of twelve and before they are fifteen. There is no rule in the caste by which a girl must be married before she reaches a certain age. There is often a difficulty in obtaining suitable husbands, and parents who are particular in this respect may see a daughter reach the age of fifteen or become older still before a suitable husband has been found for betrothal and marriage. But as regards a girl who has been betrothed (as Kamalavanti was) when she was of a very tender age, and thus has a husband ready at hand, there can be no doubt that ordinarily the marriage is solemnized when the bride is between twelve and fifteen. [28] Exception to this rule may have occurred when the girl is of a delicate constitution or not fully developed in proportion to her years, or when the relatives of both bride and bridegroom are willing that the marriage should be postponed for a time. There is no hard and fast rule; but the ordinary custom of the caste has been clearly established by the evidence in this case.

These being the facts, it remains to consider the conduct of the parties which resulted in the present suit being filed. It appears that about a year ago plaintiff’s relatives approached defendant and his wife with a view to the marriage day being fixed; but defendant and his wife replied that they did not intend to give Kamlavanti in marriage just then. Messages on the plaintiff’s part having proved fruitless, Messrs. Brown and Moir, solicitors of Ramkorbai, wrote on the 26th April, 1895, to defendant giving him notice that, unless he on or before the 29th instant signified his consent in writing to solemnize the marriage during the current month of Vaishakh, and fix a day for that purpose, and otherwise carried out the previously agreed on conditions and arrangements in their entirety, Ramkorbai would treat the betrothal as at an end and would seek to recover from defendant the "palla" money and the other moneys from time to time given to Kamlavanti, as well as the damage sustained by Ramkorbai in consequence of the breach of contract, and would have her son betrothed to some other girl. Messrs. Nanu and Hormusji replied for defendant on the 2nd May that Kamlavanti "does not wish to be married at present, and nothing will induce her to alter her mind. Our client (defendant) therefore cannot accede to your client’s wishes... If your client should break off the alliance, she will so do at her risk, although according to the custom of the caste he cannot prevent her from doing so." Messrs. Brown and Moir replied to this on the 7th May, 1895, that "our client (Ramkorbai) is entitled to know now when she (Kamlavanti) proposes that the marriage should be solemnized, she (Kamlavanti) bearing in mind that "our client and her son have already offered to perform their part of the contract, and that they are not bound to wait for this more than a reasonable time, such as is the current month of Vaishakh..."

In default of hearing from your client on or before the 9th instant, the contract will be deemed to have broken, which circumstance will entitle our client and her son to recover damages." Messrs. Nanu and Hormusji replied on the 13th May, 1895, "that it is not the case that the objection to the marriage comes from our client and his wife. The objection is on the part of our client’s daughter, who, moreover, declines at present to name any particular time for the solemnization of the marriage. Our client cannot be reasonably called upon to force his daughter to declare her wishes on the point, at least till she attains the age of discretion. Under these circumstances... if your client and her son break the contract they will do so at their own risk, and our client cannot be held responsible in damages." There the matter ended for a time.

On 18th December, 1895, plaintiff addressed a formal letter to Kamlavanti requesting her to name some early day for their marriage, and on the same day Messrs. Brown and Moir wrote to defendant on behalf of Ramkor and her son, the plaintiff: "With a view of giving you a final opportunity of giving your daughter Kamlavanti in marriage to the latter, and celebrating such marriage, we require you to fix some day in the months of Maha Pagan or Vaishakh (after which no marriage can be performed for eighteen months) for the celebration of such marriage, and to give you notice that in default of our hearing from you in the course of the next fourteen days naming such a date, our client and her son will take such steps in the matter as they may be advised." No reply was given to that letter.

The plaint in the present suit was filed on 16th January, 1896; the plaintiff (Ramkor’s son) praying—(a) that unless the defendant is willing to perform the marriage between his daughter and the plaintiff upon some day before the expiration of Vaishakh, 1952, the contract for the said marriage may be declared to be no longer binding upon the plaintif and the betrothal void and of no effect; (b) that unless the said marriage shall be performed as aforesaid, the defendant may be ordered to pay Rs. 25,000 as damages. Defendant replied that it is Kamlavanti who is not willing to marry plaintiff before the expiration of next Vaishakh, and he has no right to force his daughter against her will; and if under [30] those circumstances plaintiff wishes to be relieved from the contract, the (defendant) has no objection to a decree being made declaring the contract no longer binding and the betrothal void; but he (defendant) denies that plaintiff is entitled to damages, and he is willing that the "palla" and presents made to Kamlavanti should be returned to the plaintiff. The plaintiff and Kamlavanti have both been examined in open Court. Plaintiff states his unwillingness to wait till after next Vaishakh; while Kamlavanti states that she is unwilling to be married for three or four years.

It is now possible to consider the various arguments which have been ably urged by the learned counsel on both sides. The first and main point on which Mr. Inverarity for defendant took his stand is that a Hindu father who has betrothed his daughter in marriage, but declines to force her to marry against her will, is not liable for any breach of contract, even though the daughter declares that she will not marry at all. This argument is based on the proposition that all contracts of betrothal in Hindu families are subject to the implied condition that when the time for the marriage has arrived, the girl is willing to be married. The contract is to give the girl in marriage: that involves the willingness of the girl to be given. But to ask the Court to accept this proposition is virtually to ask the Court to disregard the precepts of Hindu law, which treat the marriage of daughters as a religious duty imposed on parents or guardians, and to look at the matter from the purely English point of view, which sees in marriage nothing but a contract to which the husband and wife must be consenting parties. (See the remarks of Sir C. Sargent, C. J., in Dadajee v. Rakhmabai (1) The marriage of Hindu children is a contract made by their parents, and the children themselves exercise no volition. (West and Buhler, p. 908. See also Mayne, s. 88). If this is true of the marriage, it is equally true of betrothal, and there can be no implied condition that fulfilment of the contract must depend upon the willingness of the girl at the time of marriage. There is no trace of such a proposition to be found in the Hindu law books. In Umed Kiba v. Nagindas (2), Green, J., pointed out (p. 134) that according to the Mitakshara (Chap. II, s. 11, v. 27), a retraction or repudiation [31] of a betrothal is authorized if there be good cause for it, and the only good cause there specifically mentioned is "if a preferable suitor present himself." Glover, J., also in the matter of Gunpat Narain Singh (3) remarked on the same passage that one, if not the only, good cause for retraction of betrothal is said to be the coming of a "preferable suitor." There is no mention of unwillingness of the girl to be married. The idea, however consonant with European ideas, is foreign to the policy of the Hindu law, which vests the girl absolutely in her parents and guardians, and her consent or non-consent cannot be considered by a Court. (Grady’s Hindu Law, 7).

Then there is another aspect in which the case may be regarded. Mr. Inverarity did not specifically quote s. 56 of the Contract Act IX of 1872; but doubtless he relied on it when urging that his client could not be liable in damages for declining to force his daughter to marry the plaintiff. Section 56 provides that a contract to do any act, which after the contract is made becomes impossible, becomes void when the act becomes impossible. Messrs. Cunningham and Shepherd in their commentaries on the Contract Act have pointed out that in these words a rule is laid down in general terms and for all cases, which is declared in the English authorities as exceptional and applicable to particular cases only.

They observe that the term here used is simply "impossible," and, therefore, it may be supposed that, when the act stipulated for becomes impracticable in the ordinary sense of the word, the contract becomes void. Now applying that principle to the present case, it is not open to defendant to say that it is impossible for him to carry out his contract of giving his daughter in marriage to plaintiff within a reasonable time, i.e., before the end of next Vaishakh. The act is neither impossible in itself, nor impracticable in the ordinary sense of the term. No doubt the defendant says that it is impossible, because the girl declares that she will not marry for three or four years, and defendant declares that she will not listen to his persuasion, and he will never consent to force her, his counsel quoting the remark of West, J., in Shridhar v. Hiralal (1) that a girl should not be forced into a marriage that would be odious to her. But here apparently the plaintiff is not (32) odious either to Kamalavanti or to her parents. Though physical force cannot for one moment be thought of, it is no doubt the duty of defendant, according to the terms of his contract, to use to the utmost his persuasive powers, and his position as parent, in order to induce his daughter to be married. He, like many others, may entirely sympathise with her desire to go on with her education, and her unwillingness, therefore, to be hampered by the ties of marriage, and possibly the cares of maternity. But he, like the Court, must also regard the matter from the strictly legal point of view. The contract to give his daughter in marriage has not become "impossible," and, therefore, it has not become void.

There can be no doubt that, if the case be treated according to the English law, the result would be the same. The general rule of law is clear, that a man may by an absolute contract bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, and in default he will have to pay damages for the non-performance of his agreement.
The exceptions to this general rule will all be found to be contracts in which the law implies exceptions and conditions which are not expressed. The whole question is what the original contract was, and whether it was a contract with or without a condition. (See Bramwell, B., in Robinson v.
Davison (2).) Where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words, which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens. It is on this principle that the act of God is in some cases said to excuse the breach of a contract. This is in fact an inaccurate expression, because when it is an answer to a complaint of an alleged breach of contract, what is meant is that it was not within the contract.
(See per Hannen, J., in Baily v. DeCrespingny (3)). An apt illustration of this principle, and one peculiarly applicable to the present case, is to be found in In re Arthur; Arthur v. Wynne (4). There by a marriage settlement (33) a husband covenanted on or before a certain date to insure his life. He took no steps till just before that date, when his health had become so bad that he was unable to effect an insurance. The question was whether he was relieved from the obligation to insure, or pay damages. The Master of the Rolls, Sir G. Jessel, said (p. 609) : “It is said that the man’s health may fail to such an extent, as it did here, that no insurance office will take the risk. Can I say that such an event was excluded from the contract? Can I say that it cannot be reasonably supposed to have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties? It does appear to me, looking at the whole settlement, though the parties may not have actually had in contemplation the very event which has happened, you cannot say that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in their contemplation.” The same remarks apply here. Though the parties may not have actually had in contemplation the possibility of Kamalavanti declining to marry when she reached the marriageable age (such possibility as a young lady in that position ever asserting any wishes of her own has apparently never been contemplated), we cannot say that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation. The fact is that such an idea would have been dismissed at once with the thought that a father could of course induce his daughter to be married at the proper time. A contract of a father to give his daughter in marriage is analogous to the contract of a father apprenticing his son and binding himself for the performance by his son of all and every covenant on his part. “It is undeniable” (said Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court in Taylor v. Caldwell (1), at p. 836) “that if the apprentice dies within the seven years, the covenant of the father that he shall perform his covenant to serve for seven years is not fulfilled, yet surely it cannot be that an action would lie against the father...Yet the only reason why it would not is that he is excused because of the apprentice’s death.” In Boast v. Firth (2) this principle was further illustrated. There to an action for breach of an apprenticeship’s deed the father pleaded that his son was by permanent illness, happening after the making of the indenture, [34] prevented from serving the plaintiff during all the term. It was held that this was a good defence, and that both parties must have known and contemplated at the time of entering into the contract that the performance of the services was dependent on the son’s continuing in a condition of health to make it possible for him to render them. But I cannot find any apprenticeship case in which a father or guardian was relieved from his obligation on the ground that his son or ward was unwilling to serve as contracted. In Khooshal v. Bhuwan (3) plaintiff sued his betrothed Krishni and her uncles to recover from the uncles damages for loss of character in the caste by their breaking off a marriage contracted between him and Krishni. The Judge of the Surat Adalat passed a decree declaring the contract good and valid, and demanded security of the uncles that they would not marry Krishni, who was then under their guardianship, to any other person. This was affirmed by the Sadar Court. The decree was resisted by the uncles, Krishni positively refusing to marry plaintiff, and her uncles preferring the sacrifice of the penalty entered into in the Zilla Court. The Sadar Adalat consulted its law officer, who replied that a betrothal pronounced valid by the caste cannot be set aside, and the woman on refusal to celebrate the marriage should be compelled by the caste, in whatever manner they think proper, to consummate it, and orders should be given to the caste.

for the purpose. Before this vyavastha was given, Krishni was clandestinely married to some one else, and the caste having been examined declared this last marriage legal. So the Sadar Adalat left the plaintiff to seek redress if he choose, letting him find out the proper course of himself; he had already received the damages sued for, Rs. 1,183, and all costs, and the amount of the penalty bonds was carried as a fine to account of Government. This is the only case which I can find in which the bride's unwillingness to marry the plaintiff is recited. Whether the decision would in all its details be now considered an authority, may be questionable; but there is no trace of a suggestion that the bride's unwillingness to marry the plaintiff could ever deprive the plaintiff of his right to recover damages from the lady's guardians, who were responsible for the contract of betrothal. It may be in the course of time that in some castes a father when contracting to give his daughter in marriage will insert a condition that at the time of the marriage his daughter shall be willing to solemnize the same. In the present state of things such a condition cannot be implied, and thus on the main point my decision must be against the contention raised for the defendant.

The other points can be disposed of briefly. It is contended that defendant has not broken the contract; the plaint assumes that the contract of betrothal is still in force according to the plaintiff's evidence. Defendant has still a locus parramitatis till May next. How, then, can plaintiff sue for damages? The answer to that is that plaintiff's willingness to be married to Kamlavanti at any time before the end of next Vaishakh does not disentitle him to damages, seeing that Kamlavanti has declared her unwillingness to be married to plaintiff then, and defendant has declared that he cannot compel her to change her mind. This is practically a repudiation of the betrothal; and as pointed out by Green, J., in Umed Kika's case (supra) in such cases as shown by the instances quoted from Borrodalle's reports, the Sadar Adalat directed the betrothal or promise of marriage to be carried into effect, and decreed that, if it was not carried into effect within a certain limited period, the defendant should pay a certain sum by way of damage. Since the decree in Umed Kika's case the Court has refused to decree specific performance in cases of betrothal, and that doubtless is the reason why there is no prayer for specific performance in the present plaint.

Then it was contended that the plaint did not disclose any breach of contract except as to the marriage of Kamlavanti when she attained the age of twelve. But the plaint discloses the correspondence between the parties long after Kamlavanti reached that age, and the learned Advocate General when opening his case stated that he relied also on the custom of the caste that betrothed girls were married between the age of twelve and fifteen.

It was also argued that the plaintiff's suit was unnecessary, for it was open to plaintiff to put an end to the contract, and defendant had always expressed his willingness that this should be done and [36] so the plaintiff was not obliged to come to the Court for relief. Indeed, according to the correspondence between the parties, plaintiff had himself put an end to the contract. On the other hand, it must be remarked that defendant always contended before suit that if the plaintiff put an end to the contract he would do so "at his own risk." Defendant "now" expresses his willingness that plaintiff should take back the "palla" and presents; but he did not say so before. It was always open to the plaintiff before suit to give-defendant the opportunity of performing the contract. Even now he only prays that the contract may be declared to be no longer binding, provided that defendant is not willing to perform his agreement before the end of next Vaishakh.

To the argument that there has been no repudiation before the time for performance has arrived, and that damages cannot be awarded for a future wrong (Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. (1)), the answer is no doubt that in the case just quoted it was ruled that, where there has been no wrong done, Lord Cairns’ Act confers no power to give damages. Lord Justice Bowen said that “the only weapon with which the Court is armed by virtue of the section (s. 2 of Lord Cairns’ Act) is to award damages to a party injured, which must, I think, mean damages where damages have arisen, and in a case where no damages have arisen in the ordinary sense of the term as known to lawyers, I am of opinion that the Court has no power to give damages.” Here there is no question of Lord Cairns’ Act. This Court, as pointed out before, has decided that if a betrothal or promise of marriage is not carried into effect within a certain limited period, the defendant should pay a certain sum by way of damages. Here the position of the parties is this. Plaintiff says “I am twenty-four years old, and anxious to be married; it is no answer to say that I, even as a bachelor, can adopt a son: I am entitled to perform the duty which is imposed on every Hindu grihastha of being married. If I am not married before the end of next Vaishakh, I shall (owing to the Sinhast year) have to wait for eighteen months more. Kamalavanti before the end of next Vaishakh will admittedly have passed [37] her fifteenth year; unless defendant within a reasonable time fixes a day for my marriage with Kamalavanti before the end of next Vaishakh, he in effect repudiates the contract.” In my opinion this position is unassailable; and the principle on which Frost v. Knight (2) was decided applies. Defendant’s attitude towards the plaintiff does constitute a wrong “in praesenti,” not merely “in futuro,” and if defendant will not within a reasonable time fix a day for Kamalavanti’s marriage with plaintiff, the latter is entitled to damages.

What those damages should be, is a difficult question. The plaint states that, if the contract is not carried out, the plaintiff will suffer greatly in reputation in his caste. As Mr. Justice Green said in Umed Kika’s case (3), he must necessarily have sustained some damage to his credit and reputation. Having regard to the position of the parties, and to the notorious disinclination which exists to the assertion of such rights in a Court of law, something more than a nominal sum must be awarded, though there is no call for anything exemplary. I fix the sum of one thousand rupees, which will include anything given by way of presents; and plaintiff will also be entitled to receive from the Official Trustee the “palla” with the interest which may have accrued.

The decree will run that unless defendant do within a fortnight from this date fix a day for the solemnization of the marriage of Kamalavanti with the plaintiff before the end of next Vaishakh, the contract for the said marriage be declared to be no longer binding upon the plaintiff, and in that case that plaintiff do recover from defendant one thousand rupees as damages (the said sum to include all presents given by plaintiff or his

HARILAL GIRDHARLAL (Original Defendant No. 2), Appellant v.
NAGAR JETRAM (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

Damdupat—Mortgage—Mortgage by Mahomedan to Hindu—Assignment of mortgaged land by mortgagor to Hindu assignee—Subsequent suit by mortgagee against assignee—Amount of interest allowed—Liability of land.

A, a Mahomedan, having in 1869 mortgaged certain land for Rs. 61 to B., a Hindu, afterwards assigned it to C., who was also a Hindu. At the date of this assignment the interest due on the mortgage (Rs. 122-15-10) was much more than the principal debt. B. (the mortgagee) subsequently sued A. and C. for Rs. 270, being Rs. 61 for principal and Rs. 209 for interest. A did not appear. C. contended that the plaintiff and himself being Hindus the law of damdupat applied and that only as much interest as principal could be recovered. The lower Courts passed a decree for the principal (Rs. 61) together with all interest due at the date of C.'s assignment. They disallowed subsequent interest, as the amount then due was already more than damdupat. On appeal to the High Court, Held, (confirming the decree) that C. was not personally liable to pay anything at all, but that the land which he had purchased was charged with the amount due at the date of his purchase. Unless, therefore, he wished the land to be sold, he should pay that amount.

The rule of damdupat did not apply in this case to the original mortgagor, who was a Mahomedan. He charged the land with a debt which included principal and interest, and he and his land were liable for both. He could not by any assignment prejudice his creditor or reduce the amount due to him, nor could he by assigning his land to a Hindu free it from any charge that existed on it at the date of the assignment.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur Lalshankar Umiyashankar, First Class Subordinate Judge of Surat, confirming the decree of Rao Sahib L. P. Parekh, Subordinate Judge of Dholka.

The plaintiff (mortgagee) sued to recover Rs. 270 due on a san mortgage bond passed to him on the 16th May, 1869, by Hasan Beg (defendant No. 1). Of the sum claimed, Rs. 61 was for principal and Rs. 209 for interest. Subsequently to the above mortgage Hasan Beg on the 30th April, 1888, had again mortgaged the property in question by a registered deed of mortgage to Shah Harilal Girdharlal (defendant No. 2) to whom on the 16th May he also sold the equity of redemption.

Defendant No. 2 pleaded that his mortgage had priority to the plaintiff's mortgage, and that in any case the plaintiff could not under the rule of damdupat recover more than double the amount of the principal debt (Rs. 61).

The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree, but only allowed the amount of interest which had accrued due up to the date (30th April, 1888) at which the second defendant had become mortgagee, viz., Rs. 123-15-10. As the amount of interest then due was more than the principal sum (Rs. 61) he disallowed all subsequent interest. He, therefore, passed a decree for the plaintiff for Rs. 183-15-10. On appeal by defendant No. 2, the Judge confirmed the decree.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi, for the appellant (defendant No. 2):—The question relates to damdupat interest. The transaction in dispute was a san mortgage, which is a mortgage without possession. The original debtor and mortgagee was a Mahomedan. He assigned the mortgaged property subject to the mortgage to defendant No. 2, who is a Hindu. The plaintiff is also a Hindu. Therefore the dispute now lies between Hindus, and the rule of damdupat applies. The Judge has awarded interest, which is more than damdupat, on the ground that up to the time that we obtained the mortgaged property the debtor was a Mahomedan to whom the rule of damdupat did not apply. But the claim now is by a Hindu against a Hindu, and the rule is that a Hindu creditor cannot be allowed more than damdupat against a Hindu debtor. The fact that originally the debtor was a Mahomedan cannot affect the present claim or the application of the rule—Dhondu Jagannath v. Narayan Ramchandra (1); Khushlachand v. Ibrahim (2).

Gokuldas K. Parekh, for the respondent (plaintiff).—We originally dealt with a Mahomedan debtor, and the right which we acquired against him cannot subsequently be diminished by his making an alienation in favour of a Hindu. So far as we are concerned, defendant No. 2 stands in the shoes of our Mahomedan [40] debtor, and is subject to all his liabilities. Further, what is primarily liable under the transaction is the property and not the person of the debtor, and that being so, it is not open to defendant No. 2 to say that he is not liable to pay more than damdupat because he happens to be a Hindu.

It does. But in the present case that right is time-barred. The personal right is in addition to the right against property. Under s. 26 of Reg. IV of 1827, the law to be applied is the law which governs the defendant. The real defendant in the present case is defendant No. 1, and he being a Mahomedan, the rule of damdupat, which is a rule of Hindu law, is not applicable. The decision in Dawood Durvesh v. Vullubhdas (3) is in point. We are clearly entitled to recover more than damdupat on account of interest.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—In this case the plaintiff sued to recover Rs. 270 as due on a san-mortgage-bond passed to him by the first defendant. He joined the second defendant as the purchaser of the equity of redemption. The first defendant is a Mahomedan, the second defendant is a Hindu.

The plaintiff claimed Rs. 61 for principal and Rs. 209 for interest from the date of the mortgage. The defendant No. 2 contended that under the rule of damdupat he was not liable to pay more than double the amount of the principal. The Judge of the lower Court awarded Rs. 183-15-10, viz., Rs. 61 for principal and Rs. 122-15-10 for interest down to the date of defendant No. 2’s mortgage. He disallowed interest after that date, as the debt had been more than damdupat on that date. The plaintiff has not objected to the amount so awarded to him, and we, therefore, express no opinion as to whether that amount is all that he can legally claim.

The defendant No. 2 only has appealed, urging the same contention as in the lower Court. We are of opinion that the decree must be confirmed. The case of Gopal v. Gangaram (1) shows that the rule of damdupat as acted upon in this Court (41) does not in all cases prevent land in the hands of a Hindu being subject to a claim for interest in excess of the amount of principal. In the present case, however, the mortgage was by a Mahomedan, to whom the rule of damdupat did not apply. See Dawood Durvesh v. Vullubbdas (2). He had charged his land with a certain debt, and that debt included both principal and interest. The mortgagor, therefore, and his land were liable both for the principal and for the interest. The mortgagor could not by any assignment prejudice his creditor or reduce the amount due to him, nor could he by assigning his land to a Hindu free it from any charge that existed on it at the date of the assignment. The defendant No. 2 is not personally liable to pay anything at all, but the land that he has purchased is charged, and is liable to be sold if the charge is not paid. Unless, therefore, defendant No. 2 wishes the land to be sold, he must pay the amount that was charged upon it when he purchased.

We confirm the decree with costs. In default of payment of the decreetal amount and the costs within six months from this date, plaintiff can apply for the sale of the land.

Decree confirmed.

II. First. Each pleader employed in prosecuting or defending an original suit shall be entitled to a percentage on the amount sued for, according to the rates specified in Appendix L, as a remuneration for his trouble in acting in behalf of his client, until the decree in the suit is passed, and thereafter until such decree is fulfilled:

Second. The remuneration to a pleader employed in prosecuting or defending an appeal, regular or special, shall be the same as is above prescribed in the case of an original suit:

Third. The above rules shall not prevent an express agreement being entered into between pleader and client, for either a larger or smaller sum than the established fee:

Fourth. But, if a larger sum than was agreed for between a pleader and client is awarded in costs against the other party, the pleader, notwithstanding his agreement with his own client, shall be entitled to the excess when recovered.

§ Section 7 of Act I of 1846—

VII. Parties employing authorized pleaders in the said Courts shall be at liberty to settle with them by private agreement the remuneration to be paid for their professional services, and that it shall not be necessary to specify such agreement in the vakalatnama; provided that when costs are awarded to a party in any regular suit, original or appeal, decided on the merits, against another party, the amount to be paid on account of fees of pleaders shall be calculated according to the rules contained in the sections of Regulations specified in s. VI of this Act; and that when costs are awarded in other cases the amount to be paid on account of such fees shall be one fourth of what it would have been in a regular suit decided on its merits.
Appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur Chunilal Maneklal, First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia.

Plaintiff sued for partition of ancestral family property and for recovery of his share therein. The claim was valued at Rs. 5,87,586-2-0. The defendants were plaintiff's co-sharers and two widows (defendants Nos. 3 and 4) of two deceased co-sharers, who had a claim for maintenance on the property. After the written statements were filed, the plaintiff and the male defendants compromised the suit. As to the costs of the suit, it was agreed that costs of certain defendants should be borne by defendant No. 1 and the remainder by the estate. The compromise was silent as to the widows' claim for maintenance. The Judge passed a decree in the terms of the compromise, and in estimating the costs incurred by the widows, he allowed them each a separate set of costs and awarded to each of them Rs. 3,158 for pleaders' fees according to the usual rate on the sum of Rs. 5,87,586-2-0.

The plaintiff and defendant No. 2 appealed.

Inverarity (with Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan) for the appellants (plaintiff and defendant No. 2) :- The two widows were joined as co-defendants, because they were entitled to maintenance from the family property. In the plaint we admitted that they were entitled to maintenance, and notwithstanding this admission we have been directed to pay each of them a separate set of costs. Their pleaders' fees have been calculated on the amount of the claim according to s. 52 of Reg. II of 1827, Appendix L, and Rs. 3,158 have been awarded to each of them. They are not entitled to that amount. The most that they are entitled to is a fee calculated on the amount of maintenance awarded to them. Even under s. 7 of Act I of 1846 they [44] would be entitled to recover only a fourth of Rs. 3,158 and nothing more.

Daji A. Khare, for the respondents (defendants Nos. 3 and 4).—We engaged pleaders before the compromise was arrived at. Maintenance was a charge on the whole estate and, therefore, we were interested in the entire subject-matter of the suit. The costs are, therefore, properly calculated.

Judgment.

Parsons, J.—This was a suit for partition brought by the plaintiff against his co-sharers, the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, in which the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 were made co-defendants as widows having a right to maintenance. The suit was compromised by the plaintiff and the defendant No. 2 agreeing to buy the share of the defendant No. 1 for 1½ lakhs.

The Subordinate Judge ordered the costs of the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 to come out of the estate. He gave each a separate set of costs and calculated the amount to be paid on account of fees of pleaders in each set at the full rate on the value placed on his claim by the plaintiff, and thus made those fees alone come to Rs. 6,316.

Against this order the present appeal has been brought, and it is contended before us that the fees ought not to have been calculated on the value of the plaintiff's claim, or that, if that calculation is right, yet, as the suit was not decided on the merits, one-fourth only of the ordinary fees should have been allowed. It is clear, we think, that the order is bad.
The pleaders of the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 were not employed in prosecuting or defending an original suit of the value of the plaintiff's claim, so that they would be entitled under s. 52 of Reg. II of 1827 to a percentage on the amount that the plaintiff sued for according to the rates specified in Appendix L. Their clients were not, strictly speaking, defending the suit at all, for their right to maintenance was admitted. Even if it had been denied, however, their position would not have been very different. They were in the suit as claimants of a right to maintenance, which right they asked to have determined and awarded to them by the Court. They were, therefore, in reality prosecuting a suit for their maintenance, and their pleaders ought to be entitled to [46] a percentage only on the amount claimed by them for maintenance. If this claim were decided on the merits, the full percentage would be paid: in other cases one-fourth only would be paid under s. 7 of Act I of 1846. In the present case, there has been no decision passed on their claim either on the merits or in any other way. The lower Court decided the case on the compromise, which is silent as to the amount of maintenance to which the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 are entitled. It does not appear that they asked the Court below when it decided the case on the compromise to proceed on their claim and to define and award them their maintenance, and they have not here objected to the decision of the suit on the compromise alone. Had they done so, we should have been bound to have allowed the objection.

We, therefore, only reverse the order of costs, and remand the case for the amount of pleaders' fees to be correctly calculated. This will involve a determination of the amount of maintenance to which the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 are respectively entitled. If there is a dispute necessitating a decision on the merits as to the amount of maintenance to which either defendant is entitled, the pleader of that defendant will be entitled to the full percentage on the amount, if any, claimed, or if no amount is claimed on the amount awarded. In other cases he will be entitled to one-fourth only. We make no order as to the costs of this appeal.

Order reversed and case remanded.

SHANKAR RAGHUNATH (Original Opponent No. 1), Applicant v.
VITHAL BARAJI RAGHU BADVE AND ANOTHER (Original Applicant and Opponent No. 2), Opponents.* [17th September, 1895.]

Insolvency—Jurisdiction—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 344—360—Second Class Subordinate Judge's Court invested by the Local Government with insolvency jurisdiction—A debt of a scheduled creditor exceeding Rs. 5,000.

Where a person arrested in execution of a decree for money by the Court of a Second Class Subordinate Judge invested under s. 360 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) with the powers conferred on District Courts by ss. 344—360,[46] to 359, makes an application to the Subordinate Judge's Court under s. 544, that Court has power to entertain it and to make the declarations referred to in ss. 344 to 359, and the fact that a debt due to a scheduled creditor exceeds Rs. 5,000 does not deprive it of jurisdiction.

* Application No. 41 of 1895 under the extraordinary jurisdiction.
APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Bahadur N. G. Phadke, First Class Subordinate Judge of Sholapur, reversing the order of Rao Saheb V. V. Phadke, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Pandharpar.

The opponent Vithal Babaji having been arrested in execution of a money decree applied to the Second Class Subordinate Judge of Pandharpar to be declared an insolvent under s. 344 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). The application being rejected he applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction, and that Court reversed the order and remanded the case for fuller inquiry. (See Printed Judgments for 1889, p. 337)

On the remand the Subordinate Judge found the opponent’s insolvency proved and declared him to be an insolvent on the 31st March, 1890, and prepared a schedule of his creditors, to two of whom, namely, Balvant Vyankaji and Shankar Raghunath, the Subordinate Judge found Rs. 5,120 and Rs. 10,488.6-2 respectively to be due.

Balvant Vyankaji and the opponent Vithal appealed, the former urging that a smaller sum than was really due had been awarded him, and the latter that larger amounts were found due to Balvant and Shankar than were really due to them. The appeal Court, however, found that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction under s. 24 of the Bombay Civil Courts Act (XIV of 1869) in the matter of the claims of Balvant and Shankar, they being over Rs. 5,000 in amount. It, therefore, set aside that part of the order which was appealed from, and directed that the proceedings be transferred to the proper Court.

Shankar Raghunath thereupon applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi calling on the opponent to show cause why the order of the lower appeal Court should not be set aside.

Balaji A. Bhagavat appeared for the applicant in support of the rule.—The lower appellate Court was wrong. The Subordinate Judge had full jurisdiction to deal with the claims of these two creditors. No doubt s. 344 of the Civil Procedure Code provides that an application for declaration of insolvency must be made to the District Court, but under s. 360 the Local Government is authorized to institute by notification in the Government Gazette any other Court with powers in insolvency proceedings. The Subordinate Judge of Pandharpar had been duly invested with such powers. See Bombay Government Gazette, 1887, part I, p. 198, 15th November, 1887. The Judge was, therefore, wrong in holding that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction.

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni appeared for the opponents to show cause.—Under s. 24 of the Civil Courts’ Jurisdiction Act a Subordinate Judge of Second Class is empowered to take cognizance of claims which are less than Rs. 5,000. Even in insolvency proceedings the order which the Judge passes has the force of a decree; consequently such a decree passed by a Second Class Subordinate Judge would be without jurisdiction.

ORDER.

Per Curiam.—As the Court of the Second Class Subordinate Judge of Pandharpar has been invested under s. 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) by the Local Government with the powers conferred on District Courts by sss. 344 to 359, and as the applicant in this case was arrested in execution of a decree for money passed by that Court, his application under s. 344 was rightly made to that Court, and that Court had power to entertain it and make the declarations and orders referred to in ss. 344 to 359. It had jurisdiction to make the order that it did in the present case under s. 352, and the lower appellate Court was wrong in setting it aside on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction.

We make the rule absolute, and return the appeals to the appellate Court for disposal on the merits. Costs of this application to be costs in the appeals.

Rule made absolute.

APPEALS from the decision of Dayaram Gidumal, Joint Judge of Ahmedabad, in suit No. 19 of 1891.

This was a suit filed by the Collector of Kaira under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882).

The suit was instituted with the sanction of the local Government, which by a resolution of the Judicial Department, No. 1522, dated 13th March, 1891, directed the Collector "to move the District Court to appoint new trustees for the administration of the trust funds and to settle a scheme for their management."

The plaint stated that a Jain widow Maneckbai, of Kapadvanj, died in 1876 possessed of considerable moveable and immoveable property; that she left a will by which she created several public religious and charitable trusts; that in 1886, defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were appointed administrators of her estate under Reg. VIII of 1827; that some of the trusts were such as could not be satisfactorily carried out by defendant No. 1, who was a Mahomedan, and that, in view of s. 22 of Act XX of 1863, the appointment of the defendant No. 2, who was Nazir of the Subordinate Judge's Court at Kapadvanj, was objectionable. The plaintiff, therefore, prayed that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 should be removed and new trustees appointed; that a scheme of administration should be settled by and under the directions of the Court; and such other relief granted as the Court might deem fit.

Defendant No. 1 did not contest the suit; he expressed his willingness to abide by the Court's orders.

Defendant No. 2 asked to be made a plaintiff and made serious allegations of misappropriation not only against defendant No. 1 but against the former administrators of the estate, Nihalchand (since deceased) and Chhotalal, and also against Amratbai, the mother and legal representative of Nihalchand. He asked that these persons should be added as defendants and made to account for the trust funds in their hands.

The Court accordingly added Amratbai and Chhotalal as defendants Nos. 3 and 4, respectively.

The Joint Judge found that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were unfit to administer the religious and charitable trusts created by Maneckbai's will; that the former trustees Nihalchand and Chhotalal had been guilty of gross negligence and had committed several breaches of trust, for which they were responsible to the trust estate. He, therefore, passed a decree directing defendants Nos. 1 and 2 to be removed, and new trustees appointed in their stead. He framed a scheme for the future administration of the trust, and ordered defendants Nos. 3 and 4 to render an account of the trust funds in their hands and make good the losses sustained by the charity in consequence of their default.

Against this decree defendants Nos. 1 and 3 made a joint appeal (No. 68 of 1894) to the High Court.

Defendant No. 4 preferred a separate appeal (No. 103 of 1894) to the High Court.

Scott (with him Govardhan M. Tripati), for appellants in appeal No. 68 of 1894.

Gokaldas K. Parekh, for appellant in appeal No. 103 of 1894.

Rao Sahib Vasudev J. Kirtikar, Government Pleader, for the respondent in both appeals.

At the hearing of the appeals a preliminary objection was raised by appellants' counsel in appeal No. 63 of 1894, that the District Court had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit, like the present, for the removal of the trustees of a public charity, and for requiring them to account for the moneys expended by them, and make good the losses caused by their default, as these reliefs were outside the scope of s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The arguments of counsel and the authorities cited at the hearing are set forth in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The appellants' counsel in appeal No. 68 of 1894, before discussing the grounds of appeal which relate to the findings of fact, sought judgment on the preliminary question of jurisdiction, his contention being that, as the relief sought for and granted involved the removal of the trustees, and required them not only to account for the moneys disbursed by them, but to make good the losses sustained by the charities in consequence of their default, the suit was not maintainable in the District Court, as these reliefs did not fall within the provisions of s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code. It was urged that s. 539 was based upon Sir S. Romilly's Act, and only contemplated suits seeking the particular forms of relief described in cls. (a) to (e), which do not include the prayer for the removal of trustees hostilely disposed, and for compelling them to account and refund.

There seems to be some ground for holding that at one time this view found favour with the High Court of Madras—Narasimha v. Ayyan (1)—and the Calcutta High Court—Jan Ali v. Ram Nath (2). But these Courts, however, have since then decided that (to quote the words of Weir, J.) "s. 539 was intended by the Legislature not to serve the limited purposes provided for by the English statute, but to consolidate and embody in one definite provision the procedure to be followed in British India in suits relating to public charitable endowments, other than those provided for by Act XX of 1863." This latter Act relates to temple or religious endowments, and is not in force in this Presidency except in North Kanara.

The leading case on the subject is Subbayya v. Krishna (3), where Mr. Justice Muttuswami Ayyar and Mr. Justice Best differed in [51] their views about the scope of this section, and the point was referred to a third Judge, who heard it in company with the referring Judges, and the whole case was argued over again. Mr. Justice Ayyar dissented from the views of Weir and Best, JJ., and the well-considered judgments then recorded exhaust both sides of the question in all its details. The point more immediately decided in that case was whether the section conferred power on the District Court to remove the defaulting trustees, and it was held that this power was conferred; as, though not mentioned expressly, it was implied in the general words which empowered that Court to grant further and other relief. The principle of this ruling will equally cover the relief in the matter of account-taking which is ancillary to the particular relief specified in cls. (c) and (d). This decision of the Madras High Court was approved by the Calcutta High Court and followed in Mohiuddin v. Sayiduddin (4). The prayer in that case, being for the removal of trustees, was disallowed, not on the ground of want of jurisdiction, but on the ground of fact that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the trustees had committed breaches of trust. In Sajedur Raja v. Baidyanath (5) a suit brought in the Subordinate Judge's Court for the removal of trustees, and for cancelling certain alienations made by them, was held to have been not properly instituted in that Court, as, under s. 539, it should have been filed in the District Court.

In this Presidency, the Madras ruling was expressly followed by Mr. Justice Parsons in Tricumdass v. Khimji (6). In his judgment he observed that a suit brought by two trustees requiring their co-trustees to be removed, and to give an account of their management of the trust, fell within the purview of s. 539, this relief being included in the further and other relief mentioned in the section. This was also the principle of the decision in the Chinchwad Devasthan case (Chintaman v. Dhondo (7)), where, in a suit brought under s. 539, hereditary trustees of a devasthan were removed for gross mismanagement and breaches of trust in respect of devasthan property. The decree of this Court confirmed the order of the District Judge [82] directing the removal of the old trustees, and further ordered the lower Court to take an account of the property mismanaged by one of the old trustees since he entered upon the management of the same. In In re Khandas Narrandas (8) it was decided that the principles of English equity jurisprudence governed the form of relief to be granted by the Courts in respect of Hindu charitable trusts; and in an earlier case it was held that if a trustee remained passive, and took no steps to see the trust carried into execution, he was liable for losses caused by the breach of trust on the part of his co-trustee—_Bai Jadav v. Tribhuvandas_ (1).

It will be thus seen that there is now no room for the contention that, because to all appearances the wording of s. 539 seems to have been modelled upon Sir S. Romilly’s Act, therefore the relief that could be granted under s. 539 must be confined to the forms of relief which fall within the scope of that statute. The section may have been at first suggested by that statute, but there are important variations in the Indian enactment, both in the form of procedure and the scope of the relief intended. Under the authority of the cases cited above, we feel satisfied that the contention in regard to the want of jurisdiction, raised by the appellant’s counsel, must be overruled. The prayers for the removal of the trustees, and for requiring them to give an account, fall within the scope of s. 539 as distinctly as the appointment of new trustees and the settling a scheme for the management of the charities. The suit could not have been instituted in its present form in the Subordinate Judge’s Court.

We accordingly overrule this preliminary objection.

DHARMAYA SANGAPP A (Original Petitioner), Appellant v. SAYANA MALAPA AND OTHERS (Original Opponents), Respondents.*[

_Succession Certificate Act (VII of 1889), s. 7, cl. 1—Certificate—Court bound to decide the right to the certificate—Practice—Procedure._

Under cl. 3, s. 7, of the Succession Certificate Act VII of 1889, the District Court must decide in a summary way an application for a succession certificate even if the question at issue between applicant and opponent be as to the status of the family to which deceased belonged.

APPEAL from the decision of W. H. Crowe, District Judge of Poona, in Miscellaneous Application No. 56 of 1893, under Act VII of 1889.

One Narsingaya Sangapa died at Pachora, in the Khandesh District, leaving a fixed deposit amounting to Rs. 1,768 in the Bank of Bombay at Poona within the jurisdiction of the District Court of Poona, and leaving a widow Savitribai, a daughter-in-law Lakshmibai, a nephew named Sayana Malapa and a brother named Dharmaya Sangappa.

Dharmaya Sangappa applied to the District Court of Poona under the Succession Certificate Act (VII of 1889), praying for a certificate to enable him to recover the sum of Rs. 1,768 from the Bank of Bombay, alleging that he and the deceased were members of an undivided family.

Savitribai, Lakshmibai and Sayana opposed this application, contending that the applicant and the deceased Narsingaya were not joint but separate and that the applicant had no claim whatever to the money deposited in the Bank.

The District Judge of Poona refused the application, recording the following judgment:—

"The question at issue is as to the status of the family. The evidence points to some sort of division, but without expressing any opinion on that point, and as the debt to be collected is merely a fixed deposit in the Bank of Bombay amounting to Rs. 1,768, I think it may safely be left there until one party or other proves their title to it in the ordinary way by suit in the Civil Court. I refuse the application."

[55] From this decision the applicant preferred an appeal to the High Court.

Shivram Vithal Bhandarkar, for the appellant.

Mahadeo B. Chaubal, for Lakshmibai alices Achama, respondent No. 3.

The following authorities were cited during argument:—Act VII of 1889, s. 7, cl. 3, s. 20; Bai Mahali v. Kalidas Fakirchand (1); Kalidas Fakirchand v. Bai Mahali (2); Dave Liladhar Kashiram v. Bai Parvati (3); Jamsedji Kavasji v. Motibai (4); Umed Dullichand v. Bai Ujali (5); Rupchand v. Jasoda (6); Sivamma v. Subbamma (7); Jagmohandas v. Allu Maria (8).

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—Act XXVII of 1860, s. 3, has been interpreted in Jamsedji Kavasji v. Motibai (4) and Umed Dullichand v. Bai Ujali (5). As interpretations of Act VII of 1889, s. 7, we may refer to Rupchand v. Jasoda (6) and Sivamma v. Subbamma (7). Although cl. 3 of that section appears as a new enactment, and in cases of difficulty and intricacy enables the Court to grant a certificate to the person having prima facie the best title thereto, cl. 1 says "the Court shall proceed to decide in a summary manner the right to the certificate." We think, therefore, that the District Judge erred in refusing the jurisdiction on the reasons he gives.

It has been urged that the order is justified under s. 20 by the opponent Lakshmibai's statement that her husband, now deceased, once got an order for a certificate under this Act and that he never applied for the certificate. We do not think s. 20 applies here. Whether Jagmohandas v. Allu Maria (8) applies to the case is, in our opinion, a matter for the District Court to decide.

The Court sets aside the order and remands the cause to the District Court for a new order to be made. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Order reversed and case remanded.

VENKATESH NARASINHA NARAYANPETHKAR (Original Defendant No. 4), Appellant v. GOVINDRAO BIN SHEKOJI AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents.* [19th September, 1895.]

Vatan Act (Bom. Act III of 1874), s. 10†—Redemption suit—Decree for possession—Possession obtained by plaintiff under decree—Decree reversed in appeal—Collector’s certificate under the Vatan Act (Bom. Act III of 1874).

Where an erroneous decree of the District Court is reversed by the High Court and the decree of the original Court restored, the successful party has a right to be placed in the same position as if the District Court had not made an erroneous decree. If in obtaining this right he is restored to possession of vatan land, such a restoration does not fall within the scope of s. 10, Bombay Act III of 1874. —Rachapa v. Ambeguda (1).

REFERENCE by L. G. Deshmukh, Acting Collector of Sholapur, in the matter of a certificate issued by him under s. 10 of the Vatan Act (Bom. Act III of 1874).

In a redemption suit, the Subordinate Judge passed a decree directing the plaintiff to redeem the mortgaged property on payment of Rs. 992-3-9 to the defendant. On appeal by plaintiff the Judge reversed the decree and ordered that plaintiff should be put in possession without any such payment, but simply on payment of costs. In execution of that decree, the plaintiff recovered possession.

[56] On second appeal by the defendant, the High Court reversed the decree of the District Judge and restoring that of the Subordinate Judge awarded to the defendant absolute possession on failure of plaintiff to pay Rs. 992-3-9 within six months from the 1st May, 1894.

The plaintiff having failed to pay the amount within the specified time, the defendant applied to the Subordinate Judge to be restored to possession in execution of the High Court’s decree. The property in dispute being patili vatan, the plaintiff applied to the Collector for a certificate under s. 10 of the Vatan Act (Bombay Act III of 1874). The Collector issued the certificate and forwarded it to the High Court.

† Section 10 of the Vatan Act (Bom. Act III of 1874):—

10.—When it shall appear to the Collector that by virtue of, or in execution of, a decree or order of any British Court any vatan or any part thereof, or any of the profits thereof recorded as such in the revenue records or registered under this Act and assigned under s. 23, as remuneration of an officiator, has or have after the date of this Act coming into force, passed or may pass without the sanction of Government into the ownership or beneficial possession of any person other than the officiator for the time being; or that any such vatan or any part thereof, or any of the profits thereof, not so assigned has or have so passed or may pass into the ownership or beneficial possession of any person not a vandar of the same vatan, the Court shall, on receipt of a certificate under the hand and seal of the Collector, stating that the property to which the decree or order relates is a vatan or part of a vatan, or that such property constitutes the profits or part of the profits of a vatan, or is assigned as the remuneration of an officiator, and is therefore inalienable, remove any attachment or other process then pending against the said vatan, or any part thereof, or any of the profits thereof, and set aside any sale or order of sale or transfer thereof, and shall cancel the decree or order complained of, so far as it concerns the said vatan, or any part thereof, or any of the profits thereof.

(1) 5 B. 283.
Narayan Ganesh Chandavarkar, for the appellant (original defendant No. 4) :- The defendant (mortgagee) is entitled to get back possession in spite of the Collector's certificate, he having been deprived of the possession in pursuance of the District Judge's decree which was reversed by the High Court. The High Court restored the decree of the first Court, and the defendant has now a right to restitution—Rachappa v. Aminovdha (1); Mookoond Lal Pal Chowdhry v. Mahomed Sami Meah (2); Rohni Singh v. J. Hodding (3); Viraraghava v. Venkata (4).

Section 10 of the Vatan Act (Bombay Act III of 1874) does not apply to transfers or alienations made before the Act came into force. In the present case, the mortgage with the possession was made in the year 1871.

Mahadeo B. Chaubal, for respondent (plaintiff) :- It seems that possession of defendant's assignor Krishna commenced under a previous decree (No. 1169 of 1875) on the 16th November, 1875. Therefore this was an alienation after the Vatan Act (Bombay Act III of 1874) came into force, and the Collector's certificate is legal and binding.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The Collector is under a misapprehension as to the facts of this case. The plaintiff sued for redemption. The District Judge reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge (57) (which ordered the plaintiff to recover possession of the property mortgaged upon payment of Rs. 992-3-9 and costs) directed the plaintiff to be put in possession without such payment, simply on payment of costs. In execution of that decree, the plaintiff, on payment of costs, was put in possession of the land.

The High Court reversed the decree of the District Court and restored that of the Subordinate Judge. This carried with it the right of the defendant to be replaced in the same position as if the District Court had not passed an erroneous decree, and such is the position to which he now asks to be restored quantum valeat. The Full Bench ruling in Rachappa v. Aminovdha (1) shows that such a restoration does not fall within the scope of s. 10 of Bombay Act III of 1874, and that the defendant notwithstanding the Collector's certificate is entitled to be restored to possession.

It would seem that the defendant No. 4's predecessor in title (Krishnappa, deceased defendant No. 1) obtained possession of the property in question under the decree in Suit No. 1169 of 1875. If that be so, the Collector may be able to get that decree set aside by the Court which passed it and to have the plaintiff restored to possession; but the facts are not fully before us. So we give no opinion on that part of the case.

We accordingly return the certificate to the Collector with a copy of this judgment. The plaintiff to pay the costs of this reference.

Order accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 283—Decree for the recovery of a share in a vatan—Execution—Attachment—Order releasing a portion from attachment—Suit filed to set aside the order—Temporary cessation of the execution proceedings.

Where a decree has not been adjusted or otherwise satisfied and is still operative, a temporary cessation of the execution proceedings under it does not deprive the execution creditor of his rights to sue to set aside an order made under s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), releasing part of the property from attachment, and to have it declared that such part or some fraction of such part is liable to attachment.

Appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur V. V. Vagle, First Class Subordinate Judge of Ratnagiri.

The plaintiff alleged that they and the defendants were the joint owners of a moiety of a sardesai vatan allowance derived from villages in certain talukas in the Ratnagiri District; that they had sued the defendants for their share (suit No. 260 of 1888) and obtained a decree, and in execution had caused the moiety of the allowance to be attached in order to recover their share. The defendant No. 1, however, had applied (Miscellaneous Application No. 95 of 1891) for the removal of the attachment from his share which he falsely stated to be a four-annas share, and the Court had granted his application.

The plaintiff, therefore, now brought this suit to set aside the order removing the attachment from a four-annas share of the vatan and praying for a declaration that the share of the first defendant was only two annas and four pies therein.

Defendant No. 1 contended that the plaintiff’s remedy (if any) was in the execution proceedings in the former suit (No. 260 of 1888); that they had allowed those proceedings to drop, and that they had no cause of action for this new suit.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit. The following is an extract from his judgment:

[68] "It is, I think, immaterial for the purposes of this suit to see whether the decree in question has been fully satisfied or not. The plaintiffs’ vakil’s admission that he has allowed the execution proceedings which occasioned the miscellaneous order complained of and this suit to set it aside, to drop, and that with these proceedings the attachment laid by his clients on the allowance in suit was also allowed to fall to the ground, is enough for the disposal of this case. It is well settled by the decisions of the Calcutta and Bombay High Courts (see Umesh Chunder Roy v. Raj Bullabh Sen, I. L. R., 8 Cal., 279; Kashi Nath v. Ramchandra, I. L. R., 7 Bom., 403; Ebrahimkhan v. Kabulkhan, I. L. R., 13 Bom., 72) that when the attachment, on which the summary order complained of is to operate, fails, the person against whom that order was passed, has no cause of action left."

* Appeal No. 177 of 1894.
Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar appeared for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The decisions relied on by the Judge are not applicable to the facts of the present case. This suit was instituted while the proceedings in execution of our decree in the former suit were subsisting. Therefore, the Judge was wrong in holding that this suit was not maintainable, because we allowed the execution proceedings to be dropped. Though we have allowed the proceedings in execution to drop, we may apply again for execution, as the decree has not yet been satisfied. Under s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and art. 11, sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877), we have a right to bring a suit within a year from the date of the order in the miscellaneous proceedings to set aside that order, but if we allow the order to stand, we shall be debarred from again attaching the allowance.

There was no appearance for the respondents (defendants).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The cases relied on by the Subordinate Judge and those noted below (1) do not govern the present case. The Subordinate Judge has not found that the decree of the 31st [60] March, 1890 (No. 260 of 1889) has been adjusted or otherwise satisfied. Assuming it to be still operative, we think that the decree dismissing this suit cannot be supported on the ground that the plaintiffs have withdrawn their execution darkhaat for the present.

The defendant No. 1 has obtained an order releasing the four-annas share in the vatan from attachment. That order operates as a decree in favour of the defendants unless set aside by suit. The plaintiffs are permitted by s. 283 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) to file a suit within a year to set that order aside and to have it declared that the four-annas share or some part of it is liable to attachment. A temporary cessation of the execution proceedings by the plaintiffs does not deprive them of the right to continue their suit. If they continue and succeed in it, they can then renew the execution proceedings and re-attach the interest (if any) which they shall have been declared in the suit entitled to attach. If they are not allowed to maintain this suit, the order removing the attachment will be an absolute bar to their ever again attaching the property—Sardhari Lal v. Ambika Pershad (2).

Decree reversed and suit remanded for disposal on the merits. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Decree reversed.

RAGHO BIN BHAVANA NHAVI BY HIS ASSIGNEE SHITARAM BHUKAJI BARVE (Plaintiff) v. NARAYAN (Defendant).*

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 132—36 and 37 Vict., c. 66, s. 25—Assignment of debt—Notice to debtor—Suit by assignee—Service of the writ.

Under s. 132 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) the assignee of a debt is under no obligation to give notice of the assignment to the debtor. All that is required is that the debtor shall become aware of it, and it is sufficient if he becomes aware of it on being served with a writ in a suit by the assignee.

The reference was as follows:—

"The defendant on the 22nd of April, 1893, passed a money-bond for Rs. 24-4-0 to one Ragho bin Bhavana Nhavi, the debt with interest at four pies per rupee per month being made payable one year after.

"The obligee of the bond, Ragho bin Bhavana Nhavi, thereupon on the 22nd of June, 1895, assigned to the plaintiff by a verbal agreement his right to recover the said debt of Rs. 24-4-0 and interest Rs. 13-6-2 from the defendant.

"The plaintiff therefore, has brought the present suit as assignee of the debt to recover the principal Rs. 24-4-0 and interest Rs. 13-6-2 from the defendant."

The suit being a Small Cause suit, in which any order passed by the Subordinate Judge would be final, he referred the following question on which he entertained doubt:—

"Whether a notice to the debtor of such transfer is necessary as contemplated by ss. 131 and 132 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) before the debt can be enforced by a suit, it having been proved that the debtor is not a party to or otherwise aware of such transfer?"

The opinion of the Subordinate Judge was in the affirmative.

Sitanath G. Ajinkya (amicus curiae) appeared for the plaintiff.—We submit that a separate notice is not necessary. The mere filing of the suit is a sufficient notice of the assignment. Section 131 of the Transfer of Property Act provides that the debtor should be made aware of the assignment. It does not lay down that a notice should be given in any particular form or at any particular time. Further, under s. 132 it was not necessary for us to give notice, our assignor ought to have given it, and if [62] he failed to do so, his failure should not operate to our prejudice—Walker v. Bradford Old Bank (4); Lala Jugdeo Sahai v. Brij Behari Lal (1); Subbammal v. Venkatarama (2); Kalka Prasad v. Chandan Singh (3).

* Civil Reference No. 16 of 1895.

(1) 12 C. 505. (2) 10 M. 299. (3) 10 A. 20. (4) 12 Q.B. D. 511.
Vishnu K. Bhatavdekar (amicus curiae) appeared for the defendant.—The cases relied on show that no previous notice of the transfer is necessary, but the language of s. 131 of the Act is quite explicit. It requires that express notice of the transfer should be given. The mere filing of the suit or the service of summons is not such a notice. In cases of ejectment express notice is required to be given to the tenant by the landlord. In such cases express notice has been held to mean notice before suit. Therefore by analogy we submit that when a debt is transferred, express notice—that is, notice before suit—of the transfer should be given to the debtor.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—It is clear that the assignment when executed creates a right in the assignee which the assignor is not entitled to defeat. Such assignment has, however, no operation against the debtor until he has become aware of it or has had express notice of it given to him in the manner required by the Act. Until then he can deal safely with the original creditor. The assignment which he does not know of, cannot affect him. Before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, it was the assignee upon whom it was incumbent for his own protection to give notice of his assignment to the debtor. There was no particular reason why the assignor should give it. We cannot help thinking that there has been a slip made in s. 132 in throwing upon the person making the transfer the obligation of giving express notice to the debtor. The English Act 36 and 37 Vict., c. 66, s. 25, only requires that express notice in writing shall be given. It does not enact who is to give it. It may be given either by assignee or assignor. It may even be given after the death of the assignor—Walker v. Bradford Old Bank (1). But however this may be (and the attention of the Legislature may well be directed to the point), we must construe the Act as it stands. No provision is made in it for the assignee giving notice in any particular way. All that is required is that the debtor shall become aware of the transfer. When he becomes aware of it, it is binding upon him. Accordingly, if the assignee the moment before suit makes the debtor aware of the transfer, the latter must give effect to it. It follows that when the debtor is by the writ made aware of the transfer, it becomes binding on him. There is doubtless this difficulty that at the moment when the suit is brought, the cause of action of the assignee against the debtor may be said not to be actually complete; that it is the service of the writ itself which completes it. It would, however, we think, be taking too technical a view of the position of the parties to give effect to this objection. The plaintiff’s right to the debt is complete at the date of suit. We think that we ought to follow the rulings of Lala Jagdeo Shahai v. Brij Behari Lal (2) which has itself been followed by the other High Courts—Subbammal v. Venkatarama (3) and Kalka Prasad v. Chandan Singh (4).

Order accordingly.

Mohan (Plaintiff) v. Tukaram and Another (Defendants).

Dekkhari Agriculturists’ Relief Act (Act XVII of 1879), ss. 3, 12, 47 and 74—Arbitration Award—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 518—521, 532—A private award to which agriculturist debtors are parties—Filing of the award in Court.

A Civil Court can file a private award to which agriculturist debtors are parties without adjusting the accounts under the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act (Bombay Act XVII of 1879).

Gangadhur v. Mahadu (1), followed.

Reference by Khan Saheb Ezra Reuben, Subordinate Judge of Kopargaon in the Ahmednagar District, under s. 617 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

[64] The reference was made in the following terms:

"One Mohan valad Girdhari Marwadi, of Kopargaon, advanced a loan of Rs. 70 to one Tukaram valad Ladkui and Lingiuj valad Ladkui, both agriculturists of Kopargaon, on the 15th August, 1894, the latter agreeing to give him in exchange one khandy of wheat. Default having been made, the parties of their own accord referred the matter to arbitrators, who were, however, not conciliators appointed under the Dekkhari Agriculturists’ Relief Act.

"They framed an award on the 13th June, 1895, to the effect that the debtor should pay Rs. 95 to Mohan, and future interest on Rs. 95 at 18 per cent. per annum from the date of the award until payment.

"Mohan having applied to the Court to have the award filed under
s. 525 of the Civil Procedure Code, the other parties to the award appeared, and stated before the Court that they had no objection to urge against the filing of the award.

"It will be seen that the application for filing the award is not accompanied by a conciliator’s certificate. But this point is settled by the ruling in Gangadhur Sakkram v. Mahadu Santsi (1). This case would appear to show, by analogy, that awards of svakars and agriculturists should be filed as they are without going into the history of the accounts.
But this question is not directly decided in the case quoted, and as I entertain doubts on the point, the question that I have to refer for an authoritative decision is:

"Whether a private award to which agriculturist debtors are parties, can be filed by Civil Courts without adjusting the accounts under the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act?"

The opinion of the Subordinate Judge on the question was in the negative on the following grounds:

The object of the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act is the protection of the interest of agriculturists, and this would be completely defeated if an opportunity to escape the risk attendant upon entering into the history of the accounts were given to svakars by filing awards as they are.

* Civil Reference No. 17 of 1895.

(1) 8 B. 20.
I submit that such a result could never have been contemplated by the Legislature and ought not to be allowed.

Even in the case of arbitrators or conciliators appointed by Government, the kabalayats or agreements, which they bring about between parties, cannot be filed without carefully scrutinizing them, and unless the agreements are found to be not only legal but equitable. Vide s. 44 of the Dekkhk Agravulturists’ Relief Act.

While, then, the Legislature has placed so much control over the proceedings of the conciliators, it cannot be supposed that the awards framed by private arbitrators were intended to be differently treated. This would open a wide door for fraud and for escaping the responsibilities enjoined on saukars by the Relief Act.

In support of my views I take the liberty to quote below from the remarks of the Honourable Mr. Justice Ranade (at the time Special Subordinate Judge under the Dekkhk Agravulturists’ Relief Act) in reference to the case reported in Indian Law Reports, 8 Bom., 20. * * * If such applications to file private award were entertained by the Civil Courts, they would pro tanto defeat the main purpose of this protective legislation. * * * Besides, though the application to file an award is not a suit, the award when filed has the force of a decree. The precautions deemed necessary to secure responsible work and prevent fraud presuppose that the general law is controlled by the special law. * * *

Before concluding I may add that under the present award in question for the advance of Rs. 70, the debtors are made liable to pay Rs. 95, which includes interest at the (in my opinion) ‘unreasonable’ rate of 43 per cent. per annum. Besides the amount of interest is converted by the award into principal, and future interest at 18 per cent. per annum is allowed on the aggregate amount.

This, I submit, is not in accord with the provisions of s. 13 (d) and s. 71-A of the Dekkhk Agravulturists’ Relief Act.

I have further to state that the order filing the award is final and unappealable. Hence this reference

Shivram V. Bhandarkar (amicus curiae), for the plaintiff.—There is nothing in the Dekkhk Agravulturists’ Relief Act to prevent an award made on a reference by parties outside the Court being filed in Court and a decree framed in the terms of the award. Section 45 of the Act authorizes the Court to file such an award, and it is not necessary to enter into the previous history of the transaction. Section 15 of the Relief Act, which allowed the Court to refer a dispute to arbitration, has been repealed by Act VI of 1893. Section 12 of the Act requires the Court to file an award and to pass a decree in its terms. The award is not a suit in which the Court can inquire into the previous history of the transaction. Section 47 of the Act lays down that no suit will lie without a certificate from a conciliator. But this provision would not apply to awards to be filed in Court. Even the Civil Procedure Code does not contemplate that filing an award is filing a suit. It only says that the application for filing an award should be treated as a suit. The words as a suit are important; the application is not a suit when it is filed. It is not necessary to produce a conciliator’s certificate in connection with a reference and an award made outside the Court—Gangadhar Sakharam v. Mahadu Santaji (1).
Vishnu K. Bhatavdekar (amicus curiae), for the defendant.—The award should not be filed, because even in the view of the Judge it is iniquitous. There being no provision in the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act in connection with the filing of an award made out of Court, ss. 525 and 526 of the Civil Procedure Code apply. Section 12 of the Relief Act relates to arbitration after suit. Section 526 of the Civil Procedure Code lays down that the award should be filed, provided it does not militate against certain conditions. Section 44 of the Relief Act would apply by analogy to a matter of this sort.

We contend that s. 12 of the Act would apply if it is a suit. If it be not a suit, then s. 44 of the Act would apply by analogy.

[67] [FARRAN, C. J.—An express provision of law cannot be applied by analogy.]

The ruling in Vasudev v. Narayan Jagannath (1) shows that the proceedings in filing an award are of the nature of a suit. Thus the proceedings being of the nature of the suit, all incidents of a suit are applicable to the proceedings. Formal adjudication on an award is spoken of as a decree, and decree as defined in the Civil Procedure Code is the adjudication of a suit or appeal. The policy of the Act also should be taken into consideration—Maxwell on Statutes, p. 333.

Shivram V. Bhandarkar, in reply.—A decree passed in terms of an award is not a decree passed after adjudication. The Court-fee paid on an application to file an award is not the Court-fee of a suit. A decree passed on an award being not a decree passed after adjudication, is not a decree within the definition given in the Civil Procedure Code.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—Our acknowledgments are due to the pleaders who as amici curiae have afforded us their assistance upon this reference.

The question upon which our opinion is requested is whether a private award to which agriculturist debtors are parties can be filed by Civil Courts without adjusting the account under the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act?

The answer to it depends upon whether an application to file an award under s. 525 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a suit within the meaning of ss. 3, 12 or 47 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief Act. If it is not, s. 74 of the Act entails upon the Court the duty of dealing with the application in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. If it is a suit, the provisions of s. 12 of the Act come into play, and the Court must follow the directions contained in that section when the award is submitted to it.

Now it is only by an extension of the usual meaning of the term that an application to file an award can be regarded as a suit. The Code of Civil Procedure does not treat it as a suit, though it directs it to be numbered and registered as one. It [68] does not make the provisions of the Code which are applicable to suits apply to it, but treats it in the same manner as an award on an order of reference made by the Court itself. Upon such an application no summons is issued, no hearing takes place, but if the special provisions contained in s. 518—521 are inapplicable to it, judgment is passed in accordance with its terms (s. 522). It is in truth an application to have legal operation given to a legal decision already arrived at by a judge chosen by the parties. If from the express wording of the Act or by necessary or reasonable implication from its provisions it appeared to be the intention of the Legislature to treat an application to file an award as a suit, we should be bound to give the necessary extension to the latter term and to treat an application to file an award as falling within its extended meaning.

That is clear law—Maxwell, p. 84. Now it is admitted that there are no express words in the Act to show that a "suit" is used throughout it in other than its ordinary sense. It is, however, contended that it is apparent from the general scope of its provisions that it must have been the intention of the Legislature to bring awards, like all monetary engagements which agriculturists enter into, under the scrutiny of, and to render them subject to correction by, the Court. That does not appear to us to be so. We rather infer from the provisions of the Act that it was not so intended. When the parties go before a conciliator, and in pursuance of his advice a reference to arbitration takes place, and an award is made, effect is given to the award without scrutiny (s. 47). Where the parties are before the Court and agree to refer the dispute to arbitrators, effect must be given to their agreement (s. 12) upon which the usual results are evidently, we think, intended to follow if an award is made. It must be filed under s. 522 of the Civil Procedure Code. This right of the parties to refer to arbitration is still preserved, though the power of compulsory reference by the Court is now taken away (Act VI of 1895, s. 3). If the Legislature has thus thought fit to preserve the full effects of an award in the case of a reference to arbitrators made after proceedings begun, there is, we think, no reason for presuming that it had a contrary intention in the case of a reference and award prior to such proceedings. [69] We think that we ought to follow the ruling in Gangadhar v. Mahadu (1), and hold that the award should be filed without inquiry under s. 12. It must be remembered that the Judge before filing such an award can upon objection by the debtor inquire into the matters specified in s. 521 of the Code, and if he is in doubt as to its bona fides or freedom from fraud, can refer the parties to a regular suit, where the whole matter can be re-opened under s. 12.

Order accordingly.

Gokulbhoy Mulchand (Plaintiff) v. Tullockchand Haranath and another (Defendants).* [23rd June, 1896].

Registration—Suit to compel registration—Discretion of registrar in acceptance of document for registration under s. 24 of the Registration Act—Registrable document with another document annexed, the latter if presented by itself being beyond time—Registration Act (III of 1877), ss. 24, 73, 75 and 77.

A registrable document, which had been executed by the plaintiff on the one part and by the defendant Tullockchand and one Motiobhoy on the other part, was accepted for registration by the sub-registrar of Bombay after four months from the date of execution under s. 24 of the Registration Act (III of 1877). Motiobhoy subsequently admitted execution, and the document was registered as against him; but the defendant Tullockchand objected to its registration and the registrar refused to register it. The plaintiff then brought this suit under s. 77 of the Registration Act praying for an order directing the registration of the document. The defendant contended that the document ought not to have been accepted for registration without inquiry as to whether the failure to present it within four months had been caused by urgent necessity or unavoidable accident, and that the hearing of the case counsel for the defendants proposed to ask the registrar’s clerk in his examination whether any such inquiry was made.

Held, following Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (1), that the question should be disallowed, the Court having no jurisdiction to enquire into the exercise of the registrar’s discretion under s. 24 of the Registration Act.

The defendants executed and delivered two documents A and B to the plaintiff, A being an agreement of equitable mortgage and B an agreement that they would [70] register A and do all things necessary therefor, and in case they failed to do so to pay whatever the plaintiff could claim under A if it had been registered. The plaintiff obtained an order for the registration of A, but failed to present it for registration within thirty days after such order as required by s. 75 of the Registration Act, and when he did present it, registration was consequently refused. He subsequently lodged document B for registration with A as an annexure to it, and it was accepted on payment of a penalty under s. 24 of the Registration Act. The registrar, however, refused to register B on the grounds (1) that without A there would be nothing to show to what property B referred, and (2) to register A as an annexure to B would be contrary to the provisions of s. 75, which limited the time for registration to thirty days. The plaintiff then brought this suit under s. 77 praying for an order for the registration of B with its accompaniment A within thirty days from the date of decree.

Held, that B being a registrable document of which execution had been admitted, and it having been presented within time and accepted and under s. 24 of the Registration Act ought to be registered, the document A being copied out as an annexure. Decree accordingly.

Quaere as to the effect such registration might have on A and whether it would render it efficacious as a registered document.

SUIT under s. 77 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) to compel registration. The plaintiff prayed for a direction that a certain document (Ex. B) with its accompaniment (Ex. A), both of which were annexed to the plaint, should be registered in the office of the sub-registrar within thirty days of the passing of the decree.

Exhibit A was dated the 11th January, 1895, and was an agreement of equitable mortgage of certain lands for Rs. 50,000 to the plaintiff signed by the first defendant for himself and as attorney for his father (defendant No. 2), and by one Motichand Harnath.

* Suit No. 251 of 1896.
(1) 6 A. 460.

Exhibit B, which was also signed by the first defendant for himself and as attorney for his father (defendant No. 2) and by the said Motichand Harnathji, was in the following form:

"We, Harnathji Rupaji of Marwar and Tullockchand Harnathji and Motichand Harnathji of Bombay, agree with you Gokulbhooy Mulchand of Bombay that we will register the accompanying document as required by the Indian Registration Act, 1877, and shall do all acts and things necessary or expedient therefor, and, in case we fail to do so, we shall pay whatever you can claim under the accompanying document if the same had been registered. —Dated 11th January, 1895."

Subsequently to the execution of these documents the plaintiff lodged Ex. A alone for registration, and after some difficulty [71] in obtaining the necessary admission of execution from the defendants and Motichand he obtained an order from the registrar for its registration. He, however, failed to present it again to the sub-registrar for registration within thirty days after that order (see s. 75 of the Registration Act), and the sub-registrar accordingly refused to register it when it was presented.

On the 9th September, 1895, plaintiff lodged document B with A as an annexure to it in the office of the sub-registrar to be registered, and the sub-registrar, being authorised to exercise the powers of the registrar in that behalf (Government Gazette, 1887, Part I, p. 980) accepted B for registration on payment of a penalty under s. 24 of the Registration Act III of 1877. After several attempts to procure the attendance of the executing parties before the sub-registrar the plaintiff finally got Motichand Harnath to admit execution of document B before the sub-registrar, and it was registered as against him on 5th January, 1896. The first defendant Tullockchand appeared on the 7th January, 1896, before the sub-registrar, but declined to admit execution, and registration was, therefore, refused as against him on the 5th January, 1896.

The plaintiff appealed on 25th January, 1896, to the registrar under s. 73 of the Registration Act III of 1877 against this refusal. The first defendant in answer to a summons issued by the registrar appeared with his solicitor before the registrar on 25th February, 1896, and admitted execution of document B, but raised objections to its registration, and on the 9th April, 1896, the registrar refused to register it.

The following were the reasons entered by the registrar for his refusal to register document B:

"The agreement is of the same date and refers to the same property as the mortgage. Under these circumstances is the agreement sufficiently distinct from the mortgage to constitute a separate document? I find the following objections to consider the agreement a separate document:

1. If the mortgage is treated a separate document there is in the agreement no evidence to show to what property the agreement refers.

2. If the mortgage is recorded in the registration book as an annexure to the agreement, such record will constitute a registration of the mortgage.

3. If by this means the mortgage is registered, it will make of no force the stipulation contained in s. 75 of the Registration Act that the period of presentation for registration shall be limited to 30 days."

The suit was heard as a short cause.

Macpherson, for plaintiff.—The registrar was wrong in his refusal. He was afraid that we should by registering B evade the consequences of the non-registration of A. It was not his business to consider the consequences of his order or what the effect of the registration of B might be on A. His duty was only to consider whether we were entitled to have B registered. Further, the object of the Registration Act is to prevent fraud. As it is admitted here that the parties not only intended but agreed to register A, there can be nothing contrary to the spirit of the Act in allowing A to be registered through B, if that is the consequence of the registration of B. As to the object of the Registration Act, see Alexander Mitchell v. Mathura Das (1).

Starting, for defendants.—Neither document can be registered. Tullockchand, by admitting execution of A before the registrar, has done all that he was bound to do by document B. The plaintiff has only himself to blame that owing to his not presenting A within thirty days of the registrar's order he cannot now get it registered. B cannot be registered because it was not presented for registration within four months of its execution. The sub-registrar never considered whether its non-presentation was due to urgent necessity or unavoidable accident when he accepted it. He did not even pass any order accepting it for registration. We say he was bound to pass a definite order. But even if he had passed such an order, he had no jurisdiction to admit the document after the four months without proof of urgent necessity or unavoidable accident.

During the examination for the defendants of a witness who had been head clerk to the sub-registrar in September, 1895, Starling proposed to ask him "whether any inquiry was made as to urgent necessity or unavoidable accident which caused the document not to be presented within four months?" but on the objection of Macperson, who cited Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (2), the Court disallowed the question.

JUDGMENT.

[73] FULTON, J.—On the 11th January, 1895, the defendant Tullockchand Harnath executed two documents, one marked A, to secure repayment of Rs. 50,000 charged by mortgage on certain immovable property, and the other marked B, being an agreement to register the accompanying document A, and in case of failure to do so, to pay the amount secured by A.

For certain reasons, A was never registered as against the defendant Tullockchand Harnath. Document B was presented for registration after the expiry of four months from the date of execution, but within the period of eight months, and I was accepted for registration under s. 24 of the Act by the sub-registrar of Bombay, who, under s. 7 of the Registration Act, has been authorised to perform all the duties of the registrar except that of hearing appeals. On the admission of execution by Motichand Harnath, B was registered as against him, but registration was refused against Tullockchand Harnath, as though he did appear before the sub-registrar be refused to admit execution. Application was then made in due time to the registrar under s. 73 to have the document registered; but on the 9th April, the application was rejected for the reasons stated in the registrar's order.

This suit has now been filed under s. 77 of the Registration Act and a decree is sought, directing the document to be registered.

The defendants in their reply allege that the first defendant was induced by fraud to execute the documents; (2) that the sub-registrar acted

(1) 8 A. 6 = 12 I A. 150.
(2) 6 A. 460.
without authority of the law in accepting, under s. 24, the documents for registration, without making any enquiry as to whether the failure to present them within four months was an account of urgent necessity or unavoidable accident; and (3) that, for the reasons stated in the registrar's order, he was right in refusing registration. The first of these objections was not argued by Mr. Starling and was clearly irrelevant in the present suit. On the second point, Mr. Starling proposed to ask a witness whether, before accepting B for registration, the sub-registrar had made any enquiry as to the cause of the non-presentation of the document within four months being unavoidable accident or urgent necessity. But on Mr. Macpherson's objecting to the question, and referring to Durga Singh v. Mathura Das I disallowed it. I think I may safely follow the Allahabad High Court in holding that I have no jurisdiction to enquire into the exercise of the registrar's discretion under s. 24. The section does not prescribe any enquiry. The registrar must doubtless be informed of the fact of unavoidable accident or urgent necessity to enable him to exercise the discretion vested in him by law; but it is for him to decide whether he will accept the mere statement of the applicant as sufficient or make enquiry with a view to verifying that statement. In the present case, the written statement shows that the plaintiff, when applying to the registrar to accept the document for registration, did allege that he had failed to present it within time on account of urgent necessity or unavoidable accident; and supposing that the registrar thought proper to accept this statement as sufficient, it is not, I think, open to the Court to say that he acted without authority. He may have acted hastily or injudiciously, or perhaps he may have known enough about the plaintiff and the circumstances which had caused the delay entirely to justify him in accepting the plaintiff's statement without demur, supposing that he did so accept it; but in either case, I do not see how it can be said that he acted ultra vires. The case might possibly be otherwise if it were shown that a fraud had been committed, but this is not alleged. As he was both registrar and sub-registrar, he has not thought it necessary to record any direction to himself to accept the document for registration; but his acceptance of the fine, and the fact of his registering it as against the second defendant, show that he had accepted it.

On the third issue, I find that B being a registrable document, of which execution has been admitted, and having been presented within time and accepted under s. 24, ought to be registered, A, which is annexed to it by the use of the word "accompanying" in the agreement, being copied out as an annexure. What effect this may have on A, and whether it will render it infrangible as a registrable document, are not points which I am now called upon to consider. I direct that B, with A as an annexure to it, be registered if duly presented for registration within thirty days after this date. The defendant Tullockchand will pay the plaintiff's cost.

TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION.

DAYABHAI TAPIDAS (Original Applicant), Appellant v. DAMODARDAS TAPIDAS (Original Opponent), Respondent.* [10th July, 1896.]

Probate—Costs of obtaining probate—Fund liable.

The appellant cited the respondent, who was the executor of one Tulsidas Varajdas, to bring in and prove his testator’s will. The Division Court (Starling, J.) ordered the respondent to lodge the will in Court and to take out probate, but directed that the appellant should pay half the costs of obtaining probate. On appeal, Held (varying the order of Starling, J., as to costs) that the fund primarily liable to the costs of probate was the residuary estate; and part of the residuary estate being as yet undistributed, it should in the first instance be applied to this purpose, and after that the appellant and respondent should contribute in equal shares.

APPEAL from the order of Starling, J. (1).

In this case the appellant (applicant) had cited the respondent who was the executor of one Tulsidas Varajdas, deceased, to bring in and prove his testator’s will.

The case was heard before Starling, J. (1), who directed the respondent Damodar to lodge the said will in Court and to take out probate. In giving judgment his Lordship said:

“Dayabhai having quarrelled with Damodar wants to make Damodar pay out of his own pocket all the costs of obtaining probate, and then to have the gratification of bringing the estate into Court. I do not think he should have this double gratification, as I am doubtful whether there is any necessity for probate except for the purpose of enabling one brother to compel the other to render an account of the estate and his application thereof to the Court. If he wants probate taken out, he must pay one-half the costs, including probate duty.

[76] "The order I shall, therefore, make is that on Dayabhai paying to Damodar or his attorneys half the estimated costs of applying for and obtaining probate (including probate duty), such estimate to be settled, if necessary, by the Taxing Master, but without prejudice to Dayabhai’s right to have the same debited against the estate, Damodar do, as soon as practicable thereafter, apply for and take out probate of the will of Tulsidas Varajdas, deceased. Each party to bear his own costs of this citation and order."

The applicant Dayabhai appealed on the following grounds (inter alia):

(1) That the learned Judge was wrong in not ordering the respondent to take out probate without making any condition that the appellant should pay to the respondent one-half of the estimated costs of applying for and obtaining probate, including probate duty.

(2) That the learned Judge ought, in any event, notwithstanding the appellant having already paid anything more than half the costs that remained to be provided for after taking into account the moneys forming portion of the residue of the said estate of Tulsidas Varajdas in the hands of the respondent, of which estate it was admitted that one lakh of rupees and the accumulations and accretions of the income and profits of the said one lakh of rupees for several years remained in the respondent’s hands.

(3) That the costs of taking out probate should be ordered to be borne by the respondent as executor out of the moneys in his hands of the said estate, and if the said estate should prove insufficient, that then only should the appellant be required to contribute to the costs in a proper proceeding for the purpose.

Macpherson appeared for the appellant.
Scott, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—Neither of the parties has appealed from the first part of the order made by the Division Court. So we have not to consider that matter. The only point, before us, is as to the source from which the costs of obtaining probate are to be provided.

The fund primarily liable is ordinarily the residuary estate. Part of the residuary estate in this case, viz., the interest on a lakh of rupees, appears to be as yet undivided between the brothers. This sum, we think, should in the first instance be applied to the costs and expenses of obtaining probate. After that each brother must contribute in equal shares. The order of the Division Court will be varied accordingly.

The following order was made:—

This appellate Court doth vary the said order dated the fourteenth day of September, 1895, and in lieu thereof doth order that the said respondent do forthwith get [77] the said will transmitted from the office of the Testamentary Registrar of this Honourable Court, where it has been lodged pursuant to the said order, to the office of the Chief Translator for translation, and that he do apply for probate thereof within two days after obtaining the translation of the said will from the Translator’s office. And this appellate Court doth further order that the residue undistributed in the hands of the said respondent as executor of the said will (the accumulations of interest on the sum of rupees one lakh set apart to meet the bequest mentioned in clause sixteen of the said will appearing for the purposes of this order to be the only undistributed residue) be, without prejudice to the rights of any son who may be hereafter adopted under the said cl. 16 of the said will, applied in the first instance in and towards payment of the costs and expenses of applying for and obtaining the probate of the said will including the probate duty, and that in the event of such undistributed residue being insufficient the appellant and respondent do pay such deficiency in equal shares after the probate duty is ascertained and at the time it is payable by the respondent.

Matrimonial Court.

Before Mr. Justice Strachey and Mr. Justice Tyabji.

Husband and wife—Divorce—Suit for nullity of marriage—Suit by wife against husband—Costs of wife—Alimony—Maintenance—Suit between Mahomedans—Mahomedan law.

The English law which makes the husband in divorce proceedings liable prima facie to the wife's costs, except when she is possessed of sufficient separate property, does not apply to divorce proceedings between Mahomedans.

A wife sued her husband for dissolution of marriage (both parties being Mahomedans) on the ground of his impotency and malformation. An interlocutory order was made by the Court adjourning the further hearing of the suit for one year, in order that the parties might resume cohabitation for that period. The husband desired to carry out the order of the Court and was anxious that his wife should live with him; she, however, refused to do so and only paid occasional visits to his house. The suit was subsequently dismissed with costs. The wife appealed and subsequently applied for alimony until the disposal of the appeal.

 Held, that having regard to the conduct of the wife she was not entitled to alimony. By Mahomedan law a husband's duty to maintain his wife is conditional upon her obedience, and he is not bound to maintain her if she disobeys him by refusing to live with him or otherwise.

Rule to show cause against order for costs and alimony.

This was a rule taken out by the plaintiff, a Mahomedan lady, in a suit brought by her for dissolution of her marriage with the defendant on account of his impotency and malformation. The suit was heard by Farran, J., and dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff filed an appeal against the decision, and on the 2nd July, 1896, she obtained a rule calling upon the respondent (defendant) to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay her (the appellant's) costs of the said suit and appeal already incurred, and why he should not pay or give security for her costs of the appeal to be subsequently incurred, and why he should not be ordered to pay alimony until the disposal of the appeal or the further order of the Court.

Affidavits were filed by the parties; the allegations in them material to this report appear from the judgment.

Macpherson, for the respondent (defendant) showed cause against the rule.—At Mahomedan law a woman living apart from her husband in disobedience is a rebellious wife or "Naschizah" and is not entitled to any maintenance—Baillie's Digest, p. 458. If the plaintiff in this case were a European, she would not be entitled either to alimony or maintenance. This is a suit which is not provided for in any statute, and it is, therefore, governed by the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 220. The costs are thus in the discretion of the Court, as is the case in England—Brown on Divorce, p. 341. The rule as to wife's costs is given at p. 345 of Brown on Divorce, Rules 158, 159. The same rule obtains in suits for nullity—Ibid. p. 353; M——v. C——(1). The application must be before the hearing or trial.

* Suit No. 86 of 1893; Appeal No. 895.

As to alimony, Browne on Divorce, p. 228; Madan v. Madan (1). We say the absolute discretion possessed by the Courts in [79] England is possessed by this Court, and that the Court will not exercise that discretion in favour of the plaintiff in this case.

Lang (Advocate-General), for the appellant (plaintiff) in support of the rule.—The English rule as to costs applies to the case. It is clear that if plaintiff were a European, she would be entitled to what she asks. There is no reason why she should not have the benefit of the rule because she is a Mahomedan. The rule in England does not now depend on husband and wife being one person in law, or on the interest the husband acquires by marriage in his wife’s property—Mayhew v. Mayhew (2). It depends on public policy and is as applicable to a Mahomedan as to an English woman.

The reason of the rule is that the Court will not allow any risk of a wife suffering injustice. Rule No. 159 only relates to the order for paying costs and has nothing to do with giving security for them. In this case the affidavits show the plaintiff has spent all her money on costs—Allen v. Allen (3).

As to alimony, the assertion that she is a rebellious wife is answered by the assertion that he is an impotent husband. A wife is entitled to alimony during a suit for nullity—Browne on Divorce, p. 217.

JUDGMENT.

Strachey, J.—This is a rule obtained by a Mahomedan wife, who is an appellant in an appeal now pending from a decree dismissing her suit for the dissolution of her marriage, calling upon the respondent to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay the appellant’s costs of the suit and appeal already incurred, and why he should not pay or give security for the appellant’s costs of the appeal to be hereafter incurred, and why he should not be ordered to pay to the appellant alimony until the disposal of the appeal or the further order of the Court.

The respondent has shown cause on several grounds, such as that the appellant has independent means of her own, and that the application is made too late and is not bona fide. In the view which I take of the case, I need not consider these matters, because there is one short ground on which I think the rule must be discharged, and that is that the principle upon [80] which it is supported has, in my opinion, no application to cases of this kind. I shall deal separately with the question of costs and that of alimony.

As to the former question, there is no doubt that s. 220 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) gives the Court the fullest discretion. The question is whether in the exercise of that discretion we ought to order the respondent to pay or secure the appellant’s costs of the suit and the pending appeal. The general rule is no doubt that a litigant must provide for his or her own costs, and the mere inability of the appellant to do this can be no reason for ordering the respondent to provide for them. That being the general rule, what is the ground on which we are asked to make an exception in favour of this particular appellant and to order the respondent to provide for her costs? We are asked to do so solely on the ground of a rule which is applied by the Divorce Court in England in dealing with matrimonial causes between English people. That rule is speaking generally, that subject to the discretion of the Court, the husband in divorce proceedings is prima facie liable to provide for the wife's costs, except where she is possessed of sufficient separate property—Jones v. Jones (1); Robertson v. Robertson (2); Butler v. Butler (3); Allen v. Allen (4).

The question is whether we ought to apply that rule to divorce proceedings between Mahomedans in this Court. The rule may be considered in two aspects: first with reference to its origin; and secondly with reference to the grounds upon which it is now maintained. As to its origin, there can be no doubt that it was founded, as stated in Proby v. Proby (5), upon the right which by the Common Law the husband acquired upon marriage to the whole of his wife's personal property and the income of her real property—Robertson v. Robertson (at p. 122). It was thought unjust that the wife, who by her marriage gave up all her property to her husband, should be destitute of the means of conducting her case against him. But that doctrine of the Common Law is totally different from the Mahomedan law, according to which the wife does not upon marriage lose any of her rights [81] of property; so that, so far as the origin and foundation of the rule in England are concerned, it has obviously no application to suits for divorce between Mahomedans.

Next as to the grounds on which the rule in England is now based. Although it originated, as I have said, in the old doctrine of the Common Law, there is authority for the view that it has survived that doctrine which, since the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has virtually ceased to exist. In Mayhew v. Mayhew (6), Farran, J., differing from the judgment in Proby v. Proby, held that whatever may have been the origin of the rule, it was now a rule of public policy, the reason for its continuance being that it is not just that a wife should be without the means of putting her case fairly before the Court. He further observed that the passing of the Act of 1882 had not produced any alteration of rule 158 of the rules and regulations of the Divorce Court, which still continued to govern the practice of the Court in England—Allen v. Allen (4). Without disputing the correctness of this view, I observe that it does not appear, from the report of the case just mentioned, whether the parties were married before or after the Act of 1882, and that in Oway v. Oway (7) Cotton, L.J., with the concurrence of his colleagues said that if a case came before the Court where a married woman had been married after the Act of 1882, it would be a very serious question for consideration how far they ought to follow the old rule, or what decision they ought to give. Such a case does not appear to have since arisen. I will assume, however, that the rule would even in cases of marriage since the Act of 1882 be maintained in England as a rule of public policy. The Advocate-General for the appellant contends that this principle of public policy is equally applicable to matrimonial causes in India between Mahomedans, in which the wife is without sufficient property of her own. There is no precedent for the introduction of such a principle into cases between Mahomedans. It appears to me that if we were now, for reasons of supposed public policy, to apply that rule to Mahomedans, we should [82] virtually be legislating, and legislating on extremely doubtful grounds. It is by no means obvious to my mind that it would be right, or in accordance with public policy, to impose this obligation on Mahomedan husbands. The decision in Mayhew

(7) 13 P.D. 141 (155, 166).
Mayhew is fully consistent with this view. That case differs essentially from the present in being a suit for divorce between Europeans or Eurasians, governed by the Indian Divorce Act, IV of 1869; and in applying rule 158 of the English Divorce Court, the Chief Justice expressly acted under s. 7 of that Act, which provides that, subject to the provisions of the Act, the Court shall, in all suits and proceedings thereunder, act and give relief on principles and rules as may be conformable to those on which the Divorce Court in England for the time being acts and gives relief. He did not apply rule 158, because as a matter of discretion and on grounds of public policy he thought that it ought to govern the practice of Indian Courts, but because by legislative enactment he was bound to apply that rule to cases under the Indian Divorce Act. The cases of Fowle v. Fowle (1), Nattal v. Nattal (2) and Thomson v. Thomson (3) are distinguishable on the same ground. The present is not a case to which the Indian Divorce Act applies, and rule 158 could only be extended to it by what, in my opinion, would be virtually a piece of legislation on our part.

For these reasons I think that no sufficient ground has been shown for departing from the usual practice that a litigant has to provide for his own costs, and that the rule so far as it relates to the question of costs must be discharged.

Next as regards the question of alimony, that must, in my opinion, be dealt with exclusively in accordance with the Mahomedan law relating to the maintenance of a wife by her husband. According to that law, the husband's duty to maintain his wife is conditional upon her obedience, and he is not bound to maintain her if she disobeys him by refusing to live with him or otherwise—Bailie, p. 438. In this case an interlocutory order was made by the Chief Justice, by which in accordance with the Mahomedan law governing suits of this description brought by the wife, he adjourned the further hearing of the suit for one year in order that the parties might resume cohabitation for that period. That order was made on the 26th July, 1894. I am satisfied by the affidavit that while the respondent did all in his power to carry out that order, and was anxious that the appellant should live with him, she on the contrary refused to do so and only paid occasional visits to his house, staying for a night or so at a time from the 6th March to 23rd June, 1895, returning on each occasion to her mother's house. Upon the authorities I am clearly of opinion that in such circumstances a Mahomedan husband is not bound to give his wife separate maintenance and that the appellant is, therefore, not entitled to alimony. The result is that the rule must be discharged with costs, to be enforced only against the separate property of the appellant.

B. Tyabji, J.—I am also of the same opinion and think that the rule must be discharged. There is no precedent, so far as I am aware, of any Mahomedan lady having obtained funds from her husband for her costs of litigation against him or security for such costs, and I am not disposed to create any precedent of that sort. The rule which obtains in the Divorce Courts in England is founded upon the doctrine of the English Common Law that all the personal property of a married woman becomes vested in her husband, and that the husband is even entitled to take the income of the immovable property of his wife. The wife being thus under English law deprived of all means of providing funds for litigation against her husband, it was only equitable that the Courts should compel the husband to furnish her with those means when necessary. But this rule was not of universal application even in England. An exception was made when the wife was shown to be possessed of separate property of her own which owing to the interposition of the Courts of Equity she was allowed to enjoy through the medium of trustees. This being the foundation of the rule obtaining in the English Courts of Divorce, it is at once apparent that it is entirely inapplicable to the case of a Mahomedan lady in India. Under the law of Islam, a woman occupies a very much [84] higher position than an English woman, so far as her rights of property and inheritance are concerned. She is entitled to inherit and to acquire property exactly in the same way as her husband. Her legal status or position as regards her property is in no way changed by her marriage; she has the same power and dominion over her own property after and during her marriage as before her marriage. By marriage her husband acquires no interest whatever in his wife's property. In short, the husband and wife are in the eyes of the Mussulman law perfectly distinct and independent—each being entitled to the protection of the law against the other—so far as his or her rights of property are concerned, as if they were perfect strangers.

This brings up what possible ground could there be for compelling a Mussulman husband to provide funds or to give security for costs of his wife? It seems to me that there would be just as much reason for doing this as for compelling a Mussulman wife to provide funds for the costs of her husband.

As to the question of policy, while I perfectly admit that the interests of public policy demand, where the rule of the English Common Law prevails, that the husband should furnish security for the costs of his wife, I am absolutely unable to see how that principle can be extended to a Mussulman wife, unless indeed we are to hold that it is in the interests of the public to encourage wives to start or to continue litigation against their husbands, that would be the only result of compelling husbands to provide security for the costs of their wives in cases where the wives are entitled to enjoy their property quite independently of their husbands. I am of opinion that public policy requires us rather to discourage litigation of this kind than to encourage it and thus to add injury to insult which the unfortunate husband may have to suffer. Even if the English rule was more binding upon us than it really is, I should be prepared to say, cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex.

As regards alimony also I am of opinion that, having regard to the conduct of the plaintiff, she is not entitled to the order asked for. She has proved herself to be a disobedient and rebellious wife. The Court of first instance has already decided that [85] she had no just cause of complaint against her husband; and unless and until that decision is reversed, it is impossible to hold that a Mussulman wife defying her husband, refusing to live with him and bringing scandalous charges against him, can yet claim to be maintained separately at the expense of her husband. I think the rule must be discharged with costs as against the plaintiff's property.

21 B. 85.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

ALI SAHEB (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. SHABJI AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [23rd September, 1895.]

Damdupat—Mortgage—Original mortgage a Hindu—Mortgages to a Mahomedan—Hindu mortgagee's interest subs quently purchased by a Mahomedan—Suit by Mahomedan purchaser for redemption—Rule of damdupat how far applicable.

A Hindu mortgaged his property in 1843 to a Mahomedan for Rs. 150 with interest at 12 per cent. per annum. On 5th April, 1880, the Hindu mortgagor's interest was sold to the plaintiff, who was a Mahomedan. In March, 1893, the plainti ff sued for redemption, both parties to the suit being Mahomedans.

Held, that as long as the mortgagor was a Hindu (i.e., until 1880) the rule of damdupat applied, and that as soon as the interest doubled the principal, further interest stopped. The sum of Rs. 150 was, therefore, the full amount of debt for which the land could be charged and liable in the hands of a Hindu debtor. But on the 5th April, 1880, the plaintiff (a Mahomedan) became the debtor. The rule of damdupat then no longer applied; the stop was removed and interest again began to run. The decree, therefore, ordered the plaintiff to redeem on payment of Rs. 500 (i.e., double the principal Rs. 150) with further interest at Rs. 12 per annum from the date of his purchase (5th April, 1880) until payment.

SECOND appeal from the decision of C. E. G. Crawford, District Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Rao Sahib Parasbram B. Joshi, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Rajapur.

Suit for redemption. The property originally belonged to one Bhagvantrao Bajirao Surtin, a Hindu, who in 1843 mortgaged it with possession to the first defendant, who was a Mahomedan, for Rs. 150. Bhagvantrao, the mortgagor, died, and on the 5th April, 1880, the plaintiff purchased it at a Court sale his interest in the property. On the 1st March, 1893, he brought this suit for redemption.

The second defendant, who was also a Mahomedan, alleged that the first defendant had assigned his interest in the property to him in 1843 for Rs. 150, and that this sum and a further sum of Rs. 588 for interest were now due to him in respect of the mortgage. He contended that the rule of damdupat did not apply, and that the plaintiff could not redeem without paying off the principal and the whole sum claimed as interest.

The Subordinate Judge held that both plaintiff and defendant being Mahomedans the rule of damdupat did not apply, and directed the plaintiff to redeem the property on payment of Rs. 748 to the defendants. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"The plaintiff is bound to give amount according to the terms of the original mortgage of 1843. Consideration amount is Rs. 150 and the rate of interest fixed is 12 per cent. per annum. From the amount of interest Rs. 6 are to be deducted every year on account of swamitva, so that the amount of interest of 49 years and 10 months comes to Rs. 998. This amount plus the principal Rs. 150 the defendants should get, that is, defendants should get Rs. 748 plus interest at 12 per cent. per annum on Rs. 150 from the 1st March, 1893, until satisfaction or payment."

On appeal by plaintiff the Judge confirmed the decree.

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

* Second Appeal No. 315 of 1894.
Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The original debtor (the mortgagor) being a Hindu, the rule of damdapat applies—Ganpat v. Adarji (1). It was wrong to hold that the rule of damdapat was not applicable at all to the present case. It ought to have been held applicable at least so long as the plaintiff’s predecessor (the original mortgagor), who was a Hindu, continued to be the debtor. Interest in excess of damdapat would begin to run on 5th April, 1880, when we purchased the interest of the Hindu mortgagor and not before—Stokes’ Hindu Law Books, p. 115.

[87] Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar, for the respondents (defendants).—The rule of damdapat is a rule of Hindu law, and it applies to those cases only in which the parties are Hindus, and especially when the debtor is a Hindu—Dawood Durvesh v. Vullubhash Purshotam (2). In the present case the original debtor was no doubt a Hindu, but at the date of suit a Mahomedan stood in his place. The rule of damdapat is a special privilege and cannot be transferred—Narayan v. Satva(lji (3); Stokes’ Hindu Law Books, p. 112.

JUDGMENT.

Parsons, J.—Plaintiff, a Mahomedan, bought in 1880 at a Court sale the right, title and interest of a judgment-debtor, who was a Hindu, and who had mortgaged the property to the defendant No. 1, a Mahomedan, in 1843 for Rs. 150. The mortgage was one with possession; the profits were to be taken in lieu of a part of the interest, and the remainder, Rs. 12 a year, was to be paid by the mortgagor. In point of fact nothing was ever paid.

Defendant contends that as plaintiff, the present owner of the equity of redemption, is a Mahomedan, the rule of damdapat does not apply, and he is bound to pay the whole amount of interest that is due from 1843 to the date of redemption. Plaintiff contends that as the original debtor, the mortgagee, was a Hindu, the rule of damdapat applies throughout.

The Courts below have adopted the defendant’s contention. We think this is not quite right. As long as the mortgagor is a Hindu the rule of damdapat applies, so that as soon as the interest equalled the principal, further interest would stop, and no more than double the principal could ever be recovered; double the principal, therefore, is the full amount of debt for which the land could be charged and liable in the hands of a Hindu debtor. A purchase by a Mahomedan would not, in our opinion, affect the past relationship or increase the amount with which the land was charged at the time of the purchase. Neither would the Mahomedan become personally liable.

When, however, a Mahomedan becomes the debtor, the rule of damdapat no longer applies, and there is no limit to the amount of interest recoverable; the stop, therefore, would be [83] removed, interest would at once begin to run, the debt would increase, and the land in his hands would be liable for the increased debt.

We must, therefore, vary the decree by ordering that on payment of Rs. 300, with Rs. 12 a year for interest from the 5th April, 1880, to date of payment, and costs throughout within six months of this date, plaintiff recover possession of the land mortgaged; and that, in default of such payment, he be foreclosed.

Decree varied.

DATTATRAYA KESHAV AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants Nos. 1 and 2), Applicants v. VAMAN GOVIND (Original Plaintiff), Opponent.*
[24th September, 1895.]

Minor—Suit by minor in Mamladatr’s Court for possession—Mamladars’ Act (Bom. Act III of 1876)—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

A minor may sue for possession in the Mamladatr’s Court by his next friend, although the Mamladars’ Act (Bom. Act III of 1876) makes no provision for such a suit.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Saheb S. A. Latkar, Mamlatdar of Wai, in a possessory suit.

Plaintiff Vaman Govind, a minor, brought the present suit by his next friend Ramchandra Ganesh to recover possession of a certain house at Wai, alleging that one Gangabai had left it to him by her will with the rest of her estate; that on her death in 1894 it came into his possession, and that on the 12th July, 1894, the defendants took forcible possession of it by breaking open the locks on its doors.

The defendants denied that Gangabai had made any will, and contended that she had adopted defendant No. 1, who was the son of defendant No. 2, and that defendant No. 1 was in possession of the house and the whole estate of Gangabai as her sole heir.

The Mamladatr allowed the claim, holding that Gangabai’s will was proved and that the plaintiff had been in possession of the house until he was forcibly dispossessed by the defendants.

The defendants applied under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court, urging (inter alia) that the Mamladatr had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, as it involved complicated questions of title, and that no suit by a next friend could be maintained in the Mamladatr’s Court on behalf of a minor, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) being inapplicable to the Mamladars’ Act (Bom. Act III of 1876).

A rule nisi was granted calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decision of the Mamladatr should not be set aside.

Branson (with Balaji A. Bhagavat), appeared for the applicants (defendants) in support of the rule:—A Mamladatr can only entertain a possessory suit when it is brought by a person who was actually in possession of the property. A minor cannot be said to be in possession of the property on account of his legal incapacity. Even a mortgagor who is not in possession or a landlord whose property is in the possession of his tenant cannot maintain a possessory suit—Khanderao v. Narsingrao (1); Goma alias Govinda v. Narsingrao (2). Unless a person is in juridical possession he cannot institute a summary suit either under the Mamladars’ Act Bom. Act III of 1876 or under the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877)—Niritto Lall Mitter v. Rajendra Narain Deb (1); Amirudin v. Mahamad Jamal (2).

The Mamladhar has in fact gone into the question of title and has come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is in possession through his next friend. The Mamladhar had no jurisdiction to do so. Further, the Mamladhrs’ Act has not made any provision for the institution of a suit by the next friend of a minor. That provision is made in the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), but it has been held that the provisions of the Code are not applicable to suits under the Mamladhrs’ Act—Kasam Sakeb v. Maruti (3).

[90] Inverarity (with Narayan G. Chaudhurkar), appeared for the opponent to show cause. — There is no error in the Mamladhar’s judgment. In order to determine whether the defendants were in possession, the Mamladhar incidentally went into the question of title; but he has not decided the suit on that question of title. A minor can sue in the Mamladhar’s Court by his manager or next friend. The Mamladhrs’ Act does not say that a suit shall be only instituted by a person who has attained majority. The Calcutta case relied on is not applicable, because the plaintiff there said that he was the representative of his uncle and father, who were alive. The cases of a mortgagor out of possession and of a landlord are also not applicable because they cannot be said to be in actual physical possession of the property. In the case of a minor he is in actual possession, but he cannot do certain acts, because the law incapacitates him from doing so.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C.J.—The Mamladhrs’ Act, it is true, makes no provision for infants suing in the Mamladhar’s Court. But we see no reason why they should not. An infant is as much entitled to have his possession protected as an adult. The Code of Civil Procedure of 1859 made no provision for infants suing, and yet suits were often brought by infants suing by their next friend when that Code was in force. It is an axiom of English law that an infant can sue by his next friend, and we think that we ought not to restrict a Mamladhar’s jurisdiction by holding that an infant cannot sue in his Court in the usual way in which infants sue. Simson on Infants, p. 469, shows that miscellaneous applications made by an infant are always made through their next friend. We discharge the rule with costs.

Rule discharged.
RAJARAM (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. GANESH HARI KARKHANIS (Original Defendant), Respondent. * [30th September, 1895.]

Ejectment—Proof of title—Inference of title from acts of ownership—Finding of lower Court on such question—Mixed question of law and fact—Second appeal—High Court's power to interfere—Mamlatdar's Act (Bom. Act III of 1876), s. 18—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 28, sch. II, art. 47—Dismissal of suit by Mamlatdar—Ejectment suit—Title.

In an ejectment suit the evidence of the plaintiff's title to the property consisted of evidence of acts of user, from which the Court was asked to infer ownership in the absence of proof of a better title by the defendant. Upon review of the evidence the District Judge held that the plaintiff's title was not proved.

Held that this finding, which was a mixed one of law and fact, was a finding with which the High Court could not interfere on second appeal.

When from the facts found by the lower Court the legal inference to be drawn is certain, the High Court in second appeal may correct erroneous conclusions drawn by the lower appellate Court. Where, however, the legal inference to be deduced from facts is doubtful, it is not open to the High Court in second appeal to interfere with the findings of the lower Court. A test which often presents itself to an English lawyer is this: Would a Judge withdraw the case from a jury on the ground that there was no evidence of the question to be found upon, such as adverse possession or title, to go to them; or would he, on the other hand, on certain facts being established, direct them to find in a particular manner? In either of these cases it would be open to the High Court in second appeal to come to a different conclusion from the lower appellate Court. But where the question upon the facts and law is one on which the Judge would lay before the jury to decide, there it is not open to the High Court to consider the propriety of the findings of the lower appellate Court.

Lachmusvar Singh v. Manewar (1) and Ramgopal v. Shamshkhaton (2) referred to.

In 1891 the plaintiff brought this suit to eject the defendant from certain land. In 1883 the defendant's predecessor and vendor (Sakharam Potnis) had sued the plaintiff's tenant Amrit Parasnis in the Mamlatdar's Court, alleging that Amrit had disturbed his possession by putting sweepings upon the land and asking to be protected in his enjoyment. He did not appear on the day fixed for hearing, and his suit was dismissed under s. 13 of Act III of 1876. He did not file a suit to set aside this order of dismissal. It was contended in the present suit now brought by the plaintiff that after three years by the combined operation of art. 47 and s. 28 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) the defendant's vendor Sakharam Potnis had lost his title to the land which thus became vested in the plaintiff.

Held that except as evidence of the plaintiff's title to the land, the proceedings in the Mamlatdar's Court in 1883 and the decree did not affect the present suit in ejectment. As such evidence they were before the lower Court.

[92] Second appeal from the decision of E. M. H. Fulton, District Judge of Satara, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb A. G. Bhave, Joint Subordinate Judge.

Suit in ejectment. The land in question was formerly unenclosed, but at the date of suit formed part of the defendant's compound. The plaintiff claimed to recover it, alleging that until December, 1890, it had been in the possession of his tenant Amrit Parasnis on his behalf, but that the defendant had then wrongfully dispossessed him.

(1) 19 I.A. 48.  (2) 19 I.A. 228.
The defendant denied that the land was the plaintiff’s, and alleged that he had purchased it from one Saktharam Potnis in 1889, to whom it then belonged.

The evidence given by the plaintiff to prove his ownership was evidence of acts of user of the land not by himself but by other persons as his licensees or as licensees of his predecessor in title.

Evidence was also given that in 1883 the defendant’s predecessor and vendor Saktharam Potnis had sued the plaintiff’s tenant Amrit Parasnis in the Mamlatdar’s Court, alleging that Amrit had disturbed his possession by putting sweepings upon the land and asking to be protected in his enjoyment. He did not, however, appear on the day fixed for hearing and his suit was dismissed under s. 13 of Act III of 1876. He did not file a suit to set aside this order of dismissal. It was contended in the present suit brought by the plaintiff that after three years by the combined operation of art. 47 and s. 28 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) Saktharam Potnis (the defendant’s vendor) had lost his title (if any) to the land which thus became vested in the plaintiff.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff’s title to a portion of the ground was proved, and he awarded the claim to that extent.

On appeal by the defendant the Judge reversed the decree and rejected the claim in toto.

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

[93] Branson, with Mahadeo B. Chavval, for the appellant (plaintiff)—
The appellate Court has found that the plaintiff has not proved his title to the land. We contend that that finding does not bind this Court in second appeal; the question is a mixed question of law and fact. The evidence with respect to title is wholly oral, and the Judge has not drawn a correct conclusion from it. The various acts of our ownership deposed to by witnesses and Naro Amrit’s continued possession on our behalf were sufficient in law to entitle us to a decree, unless the defendant proved a better title. The defendant admitted our original title. Further, the Judge has not considered the evidence of the witness (No. 43) who was examined on commission. Under these circumstances this Court has authority to review the finding—Lachmeswar Singh v. Manowar (1); Ramgopal v. Shamskhaton (2).

Next we contend that the defendant is now estopped from asserting his title to the property. In 1883 Saktharam Lakhman Potnis, the defendant’s vendor, sued Amrit Parasnis, who was in possession on our behalf, in the Mamlatdar’s Court to recover possession of the land, alleging that his possession was disturbed by Parasnis, who put rubbish on the land. On the day of hearing, Potnis did not appear and the suit was dismissed for his default. It has been held that when a suit is dismissed by a Mamlatdar for non-appearance of the plaintiff, his order operates as a refusal to grant relief—Ramchandra v. Bhikias (3); Chintu v. Vishnu (4). These rulings have been subsequently followed. Potnis ought to have brought a suit to set aside the Mamlatdar’s order within three years from its date—art. 47, seh. II, of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). He did not do so and, therefore, the defendant’s right to the property is extinguished under s. 28 of the Act.

Mahadeo V. Bhat, for the respondent (defendant).

JUDGMENT.

FARQUHAR, C. J.—This is an appeal from the appellate decree of the District Court of Satara dismissing the plaintiff's suit. It was an ejectment suit, in which the plaintiff sought to recover possession of a piece of land formerly unclosed, but now enclosed so as to form part of the defendant's compound. The District Judge has found that the plaintiff has not proved his title to the land in dispute.

Counsel for the appellant has pressed us to review that finding, contending, upon the authority of Lachman Singh v. Manuwar (1) and Ramgopal v. Shamshukatun (2), that we have jurisdiction to do so, as it is a mixed question of law and fact, and as the District Judge has not, he contends, drawn the correct conclusions from the simple facts found.

It has also been argued before us that certain proceedings before the Mamlstadar taken by Potnis, the predecessor-in-title of the defendant in 1833, which were not followed up effectually, debar the defendant from defending this suit with success.

The application of the rule deducible from the above and other decisions of the Privy Council is not usually attended with much difficulty. From facts found it is often easy to rule with certainty that a certain legal inference ought or ought not to be drawn. When such a state of facts occurs, the Court in second appeal can and often does correct erroneous conclusions drawn by the lower appellate Court. Where, however, the legal inference to be deduced from facts is doubtful, it is not open to this Court in second appeal to interfere with the findings of the lower Court. A test which often presents itself to an English lawyer is this: Would a Judge withdraw the case from a jury on the ground that there was no evidence of the question to be found upon, such as adverse possession or title, to go to them, or would be, on the other hand, on certain facts being established, direct them to find in a particular manner. In either of these cases it would be open to this Court in second appeal to come to a different conclusion from the lower appellate Court. But where the question upon the facts and law is one which the Judge would lay before the jury to decide, there it is not open to this Court to consider the propriety of the finding of the lower appellate Court.

In some cases doubtless it is difficult to draw the boundary line. In the present the lower appellate Court has found that the plaintiff has not established title to the land. The proof of ownership put forward on behalf of the plaintiff was altogether oral and consisted of acts of user over the land on the part of licensees of the plaintiff or of his predecessors in title. From these acts, even if unquestioned, the District Judge felt himself unable to draw the inference that the land in dispute belonged to the plaintiff. The argument of Mr. Branson before us was mainly based upon the assumption that the original title of the plaintiff's ancestors, the Rajas of Satara, to the land in suit was a fact upon which there could be no question, a fact admitted in the case. There is, however, we think, no admission to that effect on the part of the defendant. In cross-examination by the plaintiff he, after stating that the land was the ancestral property of his vendors, said: “It is said that it was acquired by their ancestors about 100 or 200 years ago from the Maharaja of Satara. It was given, I hear, for building a house and living there, as similar sites given to other people by the Maharaja for the same purpose.”
The defendant was here no doubt stating the popular tradition as to the original ownership of building land in Satara; but we cannot regard that as an admission by him of the plaintiff's original title to the land in dispute. The District Judge deals with the point thus: "During the sovereignty of the late Raja he could doubtless dispose as he thought proper of all vacant ground not belonging to any private individual. But the plaintiff cannot claim rights of a similar nature." The District Judge considers that this does not prove the plaintiff's original title to the land. We do not think that he has fallen into an error of law in this respect.

The evidence of user adduced for the plaintiff is to the effect that the Parasnis family who owned a house on the opposite side of the road used the land in question by placing cowdung and grain upon it and fodder and fuel and tethering cattle there. This, it is said, was done by the permission of the Maharani. The District Judge says that it is unnecessary to question the accuracy of the evidence that Parasnis received permission from the plaintiff's mother to use the ground and did use it. We do not by that expression understand that he found the user and permission as a fact, but he considered that as the ground was uninclosed, such casual acts of ownership, if they occurred, would not prove title. The presumption which they might give rise to, he considers to be rebutted by the fact that Potnis used a privy on the same land which the defendant now uses, and by other acts of ownership which Potnis and his mortgagees exercised over it.

The issue of ownership arising from acts of possession was, therefore, a doubtful one. There was evidence both ways. The District Judge has found upon it after a careful review of the evidence in a sense unfavourable to the plaintiff. We consider that this finding (a mixed one of law and fact) is a finding with which upon the principles to which we have adverted we cannot interfere. The District Judge has not in his judgment directly alluded to the evidence of the old man, Ex. 43. That witness proves what is not questioned, that the land to the east of the land in dispute, upon which stands the house of Bapu Sutar, belonged to the plaintiff's predecessor, but he also adds that he lived in a wara on that land and exercised a right of way over the land in dispute and therefore he says that it belonged to the same owner. This evidence is of the same class as that considered by the District Judge, and adds but little to it. Even if we assume that the District Judge has not taken it into consideration, we think that it is not of sufficient importance to have altered his views; but we do not feel justified in saying that it was not present to his mind though he has not set it out or directly alluded to it.

As to the second point taken before us, no issue was raised with reference to it in the lower appellate Court. If we thought that upon the facts found it would be conclusive in favour of the plaintiff we might, however, give effect to it in second appeal; but we do not think that it is so. In or about 1883 the defendant's predecessor Potnis sued Amrit Parasnis in the Mamlatdar's Court, alleging that the latter had disturbed his possession by piling sweepings upon the land in dispute and asked to be protected in his enjoyment of it. He did not appear on the day fixed for the hearing, and the suit was dismissed under s. 13 of Act III of 1876 (Bombay). Potnis did not file a suit to set aside this order, and it is contended that after three years he by the combined operation of art. 47 and s. 26 of Act XV of 1877 lost his title to the land which then became vested in Amrit Parasnis. The cases of Ramchandra v. Bhikibia (1) and Chinto v. Vishnu (2) followed in certain unreported cases (second appeal No. 889 of 1889 and second appeal No. 951 of 1889) are relied on in support of that contention. They show that an order made under s. 13 of the Mamlatdar's Act dismissing a suit on the non-appearance of the plaintiff operates as a decision refusing relief to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff, if he does not sue within three years to set aside such an order, is absolutely bound by it and cannot subsequently obtain redress in respect of the wrong complained of by ordinary suit. There is no finding here as to what occurred after the order of the Mamlatdar dismissing the suit in 1883; but it would appear from the evidence of Potnis before the Bench of Magistrates contradicting his evidence in this suit and of the defendant given in this suit that Amrit Parasnis did not remove the heap of rubbish.

The defendant purchased the house of Potnis including the land in dispute in 1889. In 1890 he sued Amrit Parasnis and a servant of the plaintiff in the Mamlatdar's Court in respect of a further placing of rubbish on the land by Amrit Parasnis and obtained an order, after which Amrit removed not only the further deposit of rubbish but also the original heap. Now, it may be that on the expiration of three years from the order of the Mamlatdar in 1883 Potnis could not have compelled Amrit to remove the heap. Probably he could not have done so. It may also be that he could not then lawfully by proceedings in the Mamlatdar's Court or in a Civil Court have prevented Amrit from placing further rubbish on the land. We give no opinion as to that. But we fail to see how this suit, which is not to have it declared that Amrit Parasnis or the plaintiff is entitled to deposit rubbish on the land, but is a suit on title by the plaintiff to eject the defendant, is affected by the decision of the Mamlatdar in 1883, except in so far as the proceedings and decree in his Court in 1883 can be relied on as proof of title in Amrit Parasnis and the plaintiff. For that purpose they were relied on by the Subordinate Judge and were before the District Judge, (98) who no doubt took them into consideration in coming to the decision he has arrived at.

This ground of appeal also fails. We must confirm the decree of the District Court with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

PANDHARINATH AND ANOTHER, SONS OF PRALHAD, DECEASED
(Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. MAHABUBKHAH AND OTHERS
(Original Defendants).* [20th September, 1895.]

Ejectment—Possession—Mahomedan family—Sons living with father—Decree and execution against father—Subsequent possession by sons—Adverse possession—Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877), s. 268—Limitation.

One Ajamkhan formerly owned the house and land in dispute. He sold it to Gopal, who sold it to the plaintiff. Ajamkhan, however, continued in occupation of the property. In 1879 the plaintiff sued Ajamkhan and Gopal for possession and obtained a decree. On 6th April, 1890, in execution of the decree he was put in formal possession by the Court under s. 263 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877) in the presence of Ajamkhan, who made no objection. At the time of these proceedings, Ajamkhan’s sons (the present defendants) were living with him in the house and they continued to do so subsequently. Ajamkhan died in 1885 and his sons continued in possession of the property and cultivated it. On the 4th April, 1892, the plaintiff brought this suit to eject them. They pleaded that the suit was barred by limitation, contending that the execution proceedings in 1880 did not bind them, as they were not parties to that suit.

 Held, that as the present suit would not have been barred against Ajamkhan had he survived, it was not barred against the defendants whose rights were derived from him. The defendants living with their father had no independent juridical possession of the premises. The father Ajamkhan was the only person in possession. The possession which the plaintiff Pralahad obtained through the Court from Ajamkhan in 1880 operated as well against the defendants (his sons) as against himself.

SECOND APPEAL from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Sholapur, reversing the decree of Khan Saheb Ruttonji Muncherji, Subordinate Judge of Barsi.

Suit in ejectment. The original plaintiff Pralahad bought the house and land in question from one Gopal on the 16th October, [99] 1875. It originally belonged to one Ajamkhan, who sold it to Gopal, the plaintiff’s vendor.

The plaintiff was unable to obtain possession and accordingly sued Ajamkhan and Gopal for the property in 1879, and on 16th October of that year obtained a decree for possession. On 6th April, 1880, he was put in formal possession by the Court under s. 263 of the then Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877) in the presence of Ajamkhan, who made no objection. At the time of these execution proceedings, Ajamkhan’s three sons (the present defendants) were living with him in the house, two of them being minors and one of them about twenty-three years of age, and they and the rest of his family continued subsequently to reside in the house with him as they had done previously and to cultivate the land.

Ajamkhan died in 1885. His sons the defendants continued in possession of the property in question and cultivated it.

On the 4th April, 1892, the plaintiff brought this suit to eject them. They pleaded that the suit was barred by limitation, contending that the execution proceedings in 1880 did not bind them, as they were not parties to them.

The Subordinate Judge allowed the claim, holding that it was not barred by defendants’ adverse possession.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge reversed the decree on the strength of the decision in Lakshman v. Moru (1).

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for the appellant (plaintiff).—We took actual possession through the Court and allowed Ajamkhan to remain in possession as our tenant. In any case the suit is not time-barred by defendants’ adverse possession, because the period of twelve years had not elapsed from the time we got possession through Court till we filed the present suit. Ajamkhan’s sons cannot say that they were in possession of the house in their own right. They were in possession through their father. If Ajamkhan had been alive he would have been bound to give us possession. His sons are also bound to do so. The ruling in Lakshman v. Moru (1) is not applicable, because the parties to that suit.

were Hindus, while the law to be considered in the present case is the Mahomedan law.

Gangaram B. Rele, for the respondents (defendants).—Under the Mahomedan law the sons get an interest in the property from the time of their birth. Their right to recover a share in the property does not accrue to them by survivorship. The law allows them a specific share in the property as soon as they are born. Therefore we submit that we were in possession of the property, or at least some portions of it, in our own independent right. If our contention is correct, then the plaintiff’s claim either wholly or partially is barred by our adverse possession. We were not parties to the decree passed against our father; therefore the delivery of possession to the plaintiff in execution of that decree cannot affect us.

JUDGMENT.

Farhan, C. J.—It is not disputed that Ajamkhan was the absolute owner of the house and land in dispute. He sold the property to one Gopal, who, in turn, sold it to the plaintiff Pralhad. The conveyance to Pralhad is dated 16th October, 1875.

The plaintiff Pralhad being unable to obtain possession under his purchase sued both Ajamkhan and Gopal for the property (suit No. 457 of 1879), and on the 15th October, 1879, obtained a decree ordering him to be put in possession of it. On the 6th April, 1880, he was accordingly placed in formal possession by the Court’s officer under s. 263 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act X of 1877) in the presence of Ajamkhan, who made no objection. Ajamkhan was, however, after this, allowed to live in the house with his family as he had been previously doing.

At the time of these execution proceedings Ajamkhan had living with him in the house his three sons, the present defendants, two of whom were then minors. The third, the defendant Mahabubkhan, was a major, being about twenty-three years of age. In July of the same year the plaintiff Pralhad sent his men to plough the land. They were prevented from doing so by the defendant Mahabubkhan. The plaintiff Pralhad then took proceedings against Mahabubkhan before the Magistrate, but ultimately withdrew his complaint. The District Judge has not found as a fact why it was withdrawn.

Ajamkhan continued to occupy the premises until his death in 1885. His sons, the defendants, are his heirs. They continued to live in the house and cultivate the land after their father’s death. The present suit to eject them was begun on the 4th April, 1892. The only question is, whether it is barred by limitation.

There can be no doubt that as against Ajamkhan the plaintiff Pralhad obtained possession on the 6th April, 1880, though Ajamkhan and his family may not have been actually turned out of the house—Runjit Singh v. Bunwar (1); Jogobundhu v. Purnanund (2) (a Full Bench ruling); Venkatramanna v. Viramma (3). These were cases of symbolical possession. The present is a stronger case, as the plaintiff was put in actual possession—Ramchandra v. Runji (4). The District Judge has, however, held that these proceedings did not affect the defendants, the sons of Ajamkhan, who were then living in the house as they were not parties to the suit, which resulted in the execution proceedings of the 6th April, 1880. We are unable to agree with that ruling. The defendants living with their father had no independent juridical possession of the premises. The father was in the eye of the law the only person in possession. His wife, his sons and his servants would, as to possession, stand in the same category. None of them though occupying the premises can be said to have been in juridical possession of them or indeed in possession of them in any sense of the term. If dispossessed otherwise than by due course of law they could not have been replaced in their occupation by proceedings before the Mamlatdar or under the Specific Relief Act, s. 9—Nirmal Lall v. Rajendra (1). The possession which the plaintiff Pralhad obtained through the Court from Ajamkhan operated as well against his descendants as against himself. The case would be different if the sons had been in independent possession of any part of the premises. They in that case would have been in the position of third parties who would not have been affected by the decree and the formal possession given under it—Ranjit Singh v. Bunvari (2). That is the distinction between the present case and the case of [102]Lakshman v. Moru (3) relied on by the District Judge. The son in that case, who was a Hindu, was in actual and apparently in juridical possession of the land of which he took the crop. The judgment-debtor, the father, was not in possession. It was, therefore, held that the symbolical possession taken by the plaintiff did not affect the son, who was not a party to the proceedings. The facts, though they have an apparent resemblance to, are really different from those in the present case.

As the suit would not have been barred against Ajamkhan had he survived, it is not barred against his sons and heirs whose rights are derived from him. We reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Subordinate Judge with costs on the defendant No. 1 in this and the lower appellate Court.

Decree reversed.

MALAPA SIDAPA DESAI (Original Defendant No. 1), Appellant,
v. DEVINAIK (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

Practice—Procedure—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 865 and 366—Regulation VIII of 1827, ss. 7, 9 and 10—Act XIX of 1841, s. 9—Act VII of 1874, s. 18—Death of appellant—Administrator of the property of the deceased placed on the record—Abatement of appeal.

An administrator appointed under s. 10 of Reg. VIII of 1827 does not by such appointment become the legal representative of the deceased, or entitled to continue an appeal filed by him.

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur G. V. Bhanap, First Class Subordinate Judge of Belgaum.

* Appeal, No. 64 of 1893.

(1) 22 C. 862.
(2) 10 C. 993.
(3) 16 B. 728.
In this case the plaintiff obtained a decree in the lower Court. The first defendant (appellant) who was a minor and was represented by his guardian ad litem A. P. Vardraj, the Nazir of the District Court of Belgaum, appealed against the decree. On the 7th March, 1894, while the appeal was pending the appellant (defendant No. 1) died.

[103] On the 4th September, 1894, A. P. Vardraj, the Nazir of the District Court, applied to be placed on the record as the legal representative of the deceased, as he had been appointed administrator of his property under s. 10 of Reg. VIII of 1837. The Court passed an ex parte order on the 14th September, 1894, granting the application.

The appeal now came on for hearing in the High Court.

A preliminary objection was taken for the respondent (plaintiff) that the Nazir had been improperly placed on the record as the legal representative of the deceased appellant; that there was no proper representative on the record, and that the appeal must, therefore, abate under s. 366 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

P. M. Mehta with Vasudev G. Bhandarkar, for the respondent (plaintiff) :- The question is whether an administrator appointed under s. 10 of Reg. VIII of 1837 is the legal representative of the deceased appellant and entitled as such to be placed on the record and continue the appeal under s. 365 and 583 of the Civil Procedure Code. Section 10 of the Regulation has made provision for the appointment of a person to take possession of the property of the deceased until the proper heir comes forward. But that person cannot sue or defend a suit for the deceased. The explanation to s. 366 of the Civil Procedure Code shows that the mere appointment of an administrator cannot make him the legal representative of the deceased, but when he gets possession of the property of the deceased, he can be treated as his legal representative liable in respect of such property.

Inscriv-bility, with Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for the appellant (defendant) :- The administrator is responsible for the property of the deceased until the heirs appear. It is his duty to recover property in the hands of other persons. He could have filed a suit, and if so, he can conduct an appeal. The order allowing the administrator to be made a party is equivalent to his being appointed to conduct a suit as provided by s. 367 of the Civil Procedure Code. Mr. Ibrahim v. Ziaulnissa (2) shows that the administrator represents the estate and he is the proper person to sue. The ruling indicates that an administrator is supposed to be given the same powers which he could get under s. 7 of the Regulation, which provides that a person holding a certificate of heirship can sue and obtain judgment. The analogous cases of curators and receivers should be followed.

P. M. Mehta, in reply.—Section 7 of the Regulation provides for a certificate of heirship and empowers the holder of the certificate to sue. But s. 10 relates to the appointment of an administrator, and does not authorize him to sue. The analogy of receivers and curators does not hold, because they are expressly authorized to bring and defend suits. The appeal must, therefore, abate under s. 366 of the Civil Procedure Code.

(1) 4 B. H. C. R. A. C. J. 178.
(2) 12 B. 160.
JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The appellant died on the 7th March, 1894. On the 4th September, 1894, A. P. Vardraj, the Nazir of the District Court of Belgaum, asked to be placed on the record as the legal representative of the deceased, as he had been appointed administrator of his property under s. 10 of Reg. VII of 1827. An ex parte order was made on the 14th September, 1894, granting the application.

It is now objected that as under s. 365 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1852) no application has been made by any person who was the real legal representative of the deceased to have his name entered on the record in place of the deceased appellant, the appeal must abate under s. 366. It seems to us that the objection must prevail. Section 10 of Reg. VIII of 1827 appears to contemplate the appointment of a person to take charge of property of which the Judge is actually in possession by means of his officers, so that it can at once be delivered over to the administrator and afterwards to successful claimants. It does not contemplate the necessity of any suit being brought either to obtain or to maintain possession, and it gives no power to sue to the administrator. The grant of such a power seems necessary. Accordingly where [105] suits have to be brought we find that express power to sue is given as in s. 7 of this Regulation and in s. 9 of Act XIX of 1841 and in s. 18 of Act VII of 1874. By appointment the administrator does not become in any way the representative of the deceased person. He is merely the custodian of the property in existence and in hand for a time until the rightful owner appears or the property is sold under cl. 4 of the section. The decision in Mir Ibrahim v. Ziaulnissa (1) is only a ruling that as long as an administrator appointed under s. 9 is in existence, alleged heirs cannot sue. The opinion expressed that the authority given to the administrator under s. 9 must be understood to be the same as under s. 7 is an obiter dictum, and we do not consider it applicable to the case of an administrator appointed under s. 10.

Under the provisions of s. 366 of the Code of Civil Procedure we must, therefore, pass an order that the appeal abate and award the respondents the costs incurred in defending this appeal to be recovered from the estate of the deceased appellant.

Order that the appeal abate.

CHRNAVA (Original Defendant No. 2), Appellant v. BASANGAYDA (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [2nd October, 1895.]

Hindu law — Adoption — Lingayats — Adoption in dwyamushyayana form — Divided brothers.

Amongst Lingayats the dwyamushyayana form of adoption is not obsolete. The adoption can take place in cases in which brothers are divided as well as where they are joint.

* Second Appeal, No. 397 of 1894.

(1) 12 B. 150.
SECOND appeal from the decision of J. L. Johnston, District Judge of Dharwar, confirming the decree of Rao Saheb M. N. Nadgir, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Hubli.

The plaintiff and defendants were Lingayats. The plaintiff sued to recover possession of certain lands and houses, alleging that [106] his uncle Gulangavda, the divided brother of his father, had been the owner of the property. Gulangavda had adopted the plaintiff as his son and passed a waraspatra in his favour, giving up to him all his property, including the right to serve as pateal. The plaintiff stated that he had thus become owner of the property which was during his minority managed on his behalf by defendant No. 1, Gulangavda's widow, and that on attaining majority he had requested her to make it over to him, but she in collusion with the other defendants refused to do so.

Defendant No. 1 denied the plaintiff's adoption by Gulangavda and contended that she had no knowledge of the execution of the waraspatra by her husband, that the waraspatra could not be acted on for want of consideration, and that the plaintiff had not acquired any title under it.

Defendant No. 2, Chenava, the daughter of defendant No. 1, put in no written statement.

At the trial plaintiff's pleader stated that the plaintiff had been adopted as dwyamushyayana son, and that he based his claim on the waraspatra also.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff's adoption by deceased Gulangavda as dwyamushyayana son was proved, that the waraspatra sued on was proved, and that the plaintiff had acquired ownership of the property in suit. He, therefore, allowed the claim.

On appeal by defendant No. 2 the Judge confirmed the decree. Defendant No. 2 preferred a second appeal.

Shivram V. Bhandarkar, for the appellant (defendant No. 2):—Three points arise in the present case: First, whether the adoption was made in the dwyamushyayana form as such.

[FARRAN, C. J.—Both the lower Courts have found as a fact that the adoption was made in that form. The question, therefore, cannot be reopened in second appeal.] Secondly, whether the adoption is valid, the plaintiff being the only son of a divided brother; and, thirdly, whether such form of adoption is valid in this age.

[107] There is also a waraspatra executed in plaintiff's favour; but if the plaintiff's status as the adopted son fails, then he would not get anything under the waraspatra, because it was executed in his favour in his capacity as adopted son.

[FARRAN, C. J., referred to Basava v. Lingangauda (1).]

In that case a custom as to this kind of adoption was set up, while in the present case the plaintiff does not rely on custom. Dwyamushyayana adoption can take place only when the brothers are united, and there must be an express stipulation at the time of the adoption that the adopted boy is to be the son of the two brothers—West and Bühler, p. 1134. But when the brothers are divided, then, we submit, that even with such express stipulation no dwyamushyayana adoption can take place. If two brothers are undivided, and one of them has got a son, then that son has the chance of succeeding to the estate of his sonless uncle; but if the brothers be divided, the chance is very remote. The son of the other

(1) 19 B. 426.
brother may subsequently come in as a reversioner, but not directly as an heir. We submit that this is the principle on which dwyamushayayana adoption is allowed.

Next we contend that this kind of adoption has become obsolete, and is not now recognized—Srimati Uma Deyi v. Gokoolanund (1); Nilmadhav v. Bishumbar (2); Mandlik's Vyavahara Mayukha, p. 506.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar, for respondent (plaintiff)—Nilmadhav
v. Bishumbar (2) supports our case. See also West and Bühler, p. 898.

FARRAN, C. J., referred to Vasudevan v. The Secretary of State (3).
The adoption in the dwyamushyayana form would be good even in the case of divided brothers, because they can re-unite.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The plaintiff as the adopted son of Gulangavda, deceased, brought this suit to recover certain lands and houses at Hubli from Marilingava, the widow, and Chenava, the daughter of Gulangavda.
The parties are Lingayats.

Gulangavda, who was married and had a daughter, was divided from his brother Kunchangavda. The plaintiff was the only son of the latter.
His allegation was that he had been adopted as dwyamushyayana son by his deceased uncle Gulangavda, and that he was, therefore, entitled to the property left by Gulangavda. Both the lower Courts have found the adoption of the plaintiff in this form to be proved. Such a finding of fact is binding in second appeal, and there is, besides, no reason for questioning its correctness.

Before us it is contended that the plaintiff’s adoption made in the dwyamushyayana form is ineffectual on the grounds (1) that such adoptions are now obsolete and consequently invalid; (2) that they cannot take place between divided brothers, i.e., that a sonless Hindu cannot adopt the only son of his divided brother by the dwyamushyayana form.

It was also urged that the adoption was not at the time of the ceremony pronounced to be in this form; but the evidence does not support the latter contention.

We feel unable to hold as a proposition of law that the dwyamushyayana form of adoption of a son is invalid on the ground that it is obsolete.
We are not, of course, referring to the dwyamushyayana son described in the Mitakshara, Chap, I, s. X, who is not recognised in Kaliyuga agya (West and Bühler, 3rd edition, p. 873), but to the son adopted to fill a position analogous to that which such a son occupied at the time when he was recognised as one of the twelve classes of sons. The argument of the appellant’s pleader is based chiefly on a passage in Mr. Mandlik’s Translation of the Vyavahara Mayukha in which, commenting on the passages in that work (Chap IV, s. 5, pl. 21-25) relating to the dwyamu-shyayana form of adoption he says (p. 506): “The result is that the conclusion arrived at by the Madras Sadar Court appears to me to be correct, namely, that the dwyamushyayana form of adoption is not recognised in this age. At any rate, whatever may be the theory, it is so in practice.”

Adoptions in this form are doubtless rare, probably because, as pointed out by Ranade, J., in Basava v. Lingangavda (4), this form [109] of adoption has not as great religious efficacy as the dattaka form. That learned Judge, however, recognises the form as still existing “though generally, if not altogether, obsolete in this Presidency.” Jardine, J., in

(1) 5 I. A. 40.
(2) 19 M. I. A. 85 (101).
(3) 19 B. 428 (455).
the same case, after referring to the principal text-books and decisions upon the subject, says (p. 467): "On consideration of these authorities I am not inclined to hold that the dwyamushyayana son is obsolete in this age in the southern parts of the Bombay Presidency." Mr. Justice Ranade refers to one instance (p. 453) as clearly proved by the evidence which he was considering of an adoption in this form; and that evidence was consistent with there having been others (p. 454). There is a considerable body of authority in favour of its present existence. Steel's Law and Custom points to it as not unknown—47, 384, 45, 183. In West and (Buhler p. 898) the learned authors say that "from personal inquiries it appears that he (the dwyamushyayana son) is not at all unusual in the southern districts of Bombay." On the Malsbar Coast it was proved in Vasudevan v. The Secretary of State (1) to be the ordinary form recognised there. Mr. Mayne (s. 160) says that the weight of authority in opposition to the statement (that it is obsolete) seems to be overwhelming. The authorities which he refers to, bear out his view. The slokas cited by him from the Dattaka, Mimansa and the Dattaka Chandrika are recognised by the Privy Council in Srimati Uma v. Gokulanund (2) as declaring the law upon this subject (p. 50). That, however, was a Bengal case, but these treatises are current in Bombay. As, therefore, this form of adoption is permitted by the shastras and is recognised by current Hindu treatises, there is, we think, no reason why it should not be recognised by the Courts of law in this Presidency. There is, in our opinion, no legal impediment to its taking place where in places in which it is not unknown parties resort to it.

As to the second ground urged by the appellant, we have not been able to find any authority in support of it. This kind of adoption appears to be allowed as well in the case of a divided as of an undivided brother. The reason why it is more common in the former case, we have already referred to.

[110] To assure the effect of the adoption in this case the deceased executed a wapraputra in the plaintiff's favour. We do not regard that as indicating on his part a belief in the inadequacy of the former rite.

We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

DESAI RANCHODDAS VITHALDAS AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Appellants v. RAWAL NATHUBHAI KESABHAI AND OTHERS
(Original Plaintiffs), Respondents. [8th October, 1895.]

Hindu law—Widow—Daughter—Custom, proof of—Exclusion of women from succession—Gohel Girassas—High Court—Second appeal—Interference in second appeal with findings of fact based on wrong views of law—Limitation.

Hathibhai, a Gohel Girassas, died in or about 1866, leaving a widow Motiba and a daughter Baina, and possessors of certain lands. Motiba died in 1857. In 1890, the plaintiffs, who were divided collateral of Hathibhai, sued to recover the lands, alleging that they succeeded thereto on the death of Hathibhai, widows and daughters being excluded from inheritance according to the custom among the Gohel Girassas. The lower Courts found that the lands were never in plaintiffs' possession; that Motiba held them till December, 1882, since which time defendants Nos. 1—3 had them in their enjoyment as purchasers from her; that the custom proved excluded daughters, but not widows, from inheritance; and that the claim was within time, having been made within twelve years of the death of Motiba. On second appeal to the High Court, Held (1) that the alleged custom excluding daughters was not proved;

(2) that the plaintiffs' should not have been allowed to shift the basis of their claim from an alleged custom which excluded both widows and daughters to one which only excluded daughters.

(3) that since limitation must be applied to the plaintiffs' claim as they made it, and tried to prove it, Motiba's possession was adverse to them and, being for more than twelve years, barred the suit.

If the decree appealed against is based on wrong views of the law of evidence, or on a misconception of the cases which the Privy Council and the High Court have defined as to how a special custom should be proved, the High Court will interfere in second appeal.

[(111) Basava v. Lingayantu (1), Bhagvandas v. Rajmal (2), Shishkhirv v. Nairirav (3) and Neelkisa v. Beerchunder (4) referred to.]

SECOND appeal from the decision of Dayaram Gidumal, Acting Joint Judge of Ahmedabad.

One Hathibhai, a Gobel Girassia, died intestate in or about 1866 at Chitra, leaving a widow named Motiba and a daughter Baiba him surviving. At the time of his death he was possessed of a certain garden and a field which were the subject-matter of this suit.

In 1882 the widow Motiba sold this garden and field to the defendants Nos. 1—5. In 1887 she died.

The plaintiffs were descendants in the third and fourth degree from the brother of Hathibhai's paternal grandfather and were divided in interest from Hathibhai. In 1890 they brought this suit to set aside the sale to the defendants, alleging that by custom they were entitled to Hathibhai's property at his death to the exclusion of his widow and daughter; that they had obtained possession of the property after Hathibhai's death, and that the sale by Motiba was void.

The defendants denied the alleged custom and alleged that after Hathibhai's death Motiba had rightful possession of the property and that she had sold it in order to pay her husband's debts.

The Subordinate Judge held that on the death of Motiba the plaintiffs by the custom of the Gobel Girassias were entitled to succeed as heirs of Hathibhai to the exclusion of his daughter Baiba. He, therefore, allowed the plaintiffs' claim.

On appeal the Acting Joint Judge of Ahmedabad confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge. He observed:

"The plaint set up a custom among the Gobel Girassias excluding females from succession, and the plaintiffs' witnesses gave instances in which widows and daughters had not succeeded. It was admitted here before me by Mr. Varajrai, who appeared for the plaintiffs, that the evidence regarding the exclusion of widows was conflicting. Even those witnesses who asserted their exclusion had to admit that they were entitled to maintenance and to the marriage expenses of their daughters; whilst others admitted that the widows of certain separated Girassias had enjoyed their property. All the witnesses, however, agreed that there was no case in which a daughter had [112] inherited her father’s property. The evidence on this point is consistent, and has not been rebutted, and I agree with the Subordinate Judge that this custom is proved. * * Coming to the third point (of limitation), it was argued here that as the plaintiff set up a right to succeed to Hathibhai, the possession of Hathibhai’s widow was adverse for more than twelve years, and the suit was, therefore, barred. In the lower Court, however, there was an express issue framed as to whether the plaintiffs were Hathibhai’s heirs after the death of Motiba, and this issue was decided in their favour. It is admitted that the suit is within time if the period of limitation is calculated from the date of Motiba’s death. It is true that the plaintiffs set up a custom excluding even Motiba from the succession. But looking to the fact that an express issue was framed, by which practically this contention was waived, and the fact that the custom actually found proved gave a right to the plaintiffs to succeed only on Motiba’s death, I cannot hold that the suit is time-barred."

Against this decision defendants preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Branson (with him Govardhanram M. Tripathi), for appellants (defendants) — Plaintiffs set up a custom excluding women generally as heirs. They were not able to prove this broad allegation. They ought not to have been allowed by the lower Courts to shift the basis of their claim from the alleged custom, which excluded both widows and daughters, to one which only excludes daughters—Leathes v. Newitt[(1)]. A part only of a custom cannot be proved. The allegation as to a custom must succeed as a whole or fail entirely. A family custom to be held binding must be distinctly proved—Patel Vandravan Jekisan v. Patel Manilal Chumilal (2); Ravi Vinayakram Jgannath Shankarseett v. Lakshmibai (3). The plaintiffs here have not proved any single instance in which the daughter of a deceased Gohel Girassia claimed against his separated kinsmen, and her claim was disallowed. In the absence of such evidence the lower Courts were bound to presume that the rules of Hindu law applied, and that Baiba, the daughter of Hathibhai, was his heiress at Motiba’s death.

Plaintiffs cannot, then, succeed in this suit as reversioners, because at the death of the daughter they may not be alive. The defendants were entitled to plead a just tertius—Chandrabhat v. Sangapa[(4)]. The lower Courts have accepted as proof of custom what is no proof according to law. The High Court is [113] not bound by findings based on such insufficient evidence. It can interfere in second appeal: see Luchmeshwar v. Manowar (5) and Ramgopal v. Shamshukalan (6). As regards limitation, the case put forward by the plaintiffs is that they were in possession, and not the widow. As a matter of fact it has been found by both the lower Courts that it was the widow who was in possession and not the plaintiffs; that is, her possession according to the plaintiffs’ own case, was adverse to them.

P. M. Mehta (with him Sitanath Gopinath Ajinkya), for respondents (plaintiffs): — A distinct issue as to the custom was raised and decided at the trial, and it was not alleged by the defendants in the lower Court of appeal that they were prejudiced by the form of the issue. The fact that the daughter has not come forward to claim the property after Motiba’s death, shows beyond the possibility of doubt that she knew the custom was against her. Otherwise she would have claimed.

As to limitation, the District Judge holds, and with good reasons, that the claim is not time-barred.

JUDGMENT.

Jardine, J.—The lands in suit belonged to a Gohel Girassia named Hathibhai who died on some date unascertain'd by either of the Courts below, but which was before the execution of the deed of sale on the 20th December, 1882, by Motiba, his widow, to the defendants Nos. 1 to 5. The plaint says he died in Samvat 1919; the Subordinate Judge writing on April 30th, 1891, says he died twenty-five years before.

The plaintiffs are descendants in the third and fourth degree from the brothers of Hathibhai's paternal grandfather. They were divided in interest from Hathibhai. It is admitted that Hathibhai left a widow, Motiba, him surviving. The plaintiffs denied or ignored the fact that he also left a daughter named Baiba: but on issue raised, the fact was proved and she appeared as a witness. By the Hindu law, the plaintiffs are not entitled to succeed as heirs to the exclusion of the widow and the daughter. They say that the widow died on the 26th November, 1887. Their claim alleges what was found to be unproved, that they took possession in Samvat 1919 on Hathibhai's death and that [114] they supplied Motiba with food and raiment. This was part of their case, as they pleaded a custom which excluded the widow of a divided brother as well as daughter. As to this part of the plea, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, Rao Sahib Wadial T. Parikh, is halting. He observes that proof of possession by the plaintiffs upon Hathibhai's death to the exclusion of Motiba would go a long way to prove this part of the custom. Then he finds against them, as to the alleged possession, a matter of fact not so perplexing as one of special custom. Then he observes: "It may be said that even if Motiba was excluded by the custom, her possession was not disturbed till her death, and the custom was not exercised against her. Her enjoyment of the property was, of course, like that of an ordinary Hindu widow and she could not be empowered to a greater extent." It is not easy to form an opinion whether the Subordinate Judge believed there was a custom to exclude widows or not. All that he has to say about limitation and adverse possession is contained in the following sentence:—"Motiba died in Samvat 1944, and, therefore, the claim is certainly not time-barred."

The Subordinate Judge found distinctly on the evidence that there is a custom which excludes a daughter from inheriting her father's property. This is on an issue of a vague and dangerous kind which widens the area and favours shifting of ground, viz.:

"Is it proved that according to Hindu law and custom, the plaintiffs were the heirs of the deceased Hathibhai at the time of the death of his widow Motiba?"

The plaintiffs were nevertheless allowed to support the case stated in their plaint that the custom excluded all women and widows as well as daughters.

In appeal the Joint Judge, Mr. Dayaram Gidumal, raised the issue of custom and found as follows:

"The plaint set up a custom among the Gohel Girassias excluding females from succession, and the plaintiffs' witnesses gave instances in which widows and daughters had not succeeded. It was admitted here before me by Mr. Varajrai, who appeared for the plaintiffs, that the evidence regarding the exclusion of widows was conflicting. Even those witnesses who asserted their exclusion had to admit that they were entitled to maintenance and to the marriage expenses of their daughters; while others admitted that the widows of certain separated Girassias had enjoyed their property. All the [116] witnesses, however, agreed that there was no ease in which a daughter had inherited her father's property. The evidence on this point is consistent, and has not been rebutted, and I agree with the Subordinate Judge that this custom is proved."

He deals as follows upon the issue of limitation:

"It was argued here that as the plaintiffs set up a right to succeed to Hathibhai, the possession of Hathibhai's widow was adverse for more than twelve years, and the suit was, therefore, barred. In the lower Court, however, there was an express issue framed as to whether the plaintiffs were Hathibhai's heirs after the death of Motiba, and this issue was decided in their favour. It is admitted that the suit is within time if the period of limitation is calculated from the date of Motiba's death. It is true that the plaintiffs set up a custom excluding even Motiba from the succession. But looking to the fact that an express issue was framed by which practically this contention was waived, and the fact that the custom actually found proved gave a right to the plaintiffs to succeed only on Motiba's death, I cannot hold that the suit is time-barred."

The Joint Judge errs, in our opinion, in presuming that the plaintiffs waived their claim, viz., that, 1st, they were entitled to succeed as owners, and, 2nd, actually did so succeed, to the exclusion of Motiba, on the death of Hathibhai. Most of the Subordinate Judge’s judgment consists of a discussion of the evidence they insisted on bringing to prove these two points.

Mr. Branson for the appellants-defendants argues that the Courts below have erred in letting the plaintiffs shift the basis of their claim from an alleged custom which excludes both widows and daughters to one which does not exclude any woman relative, but daughters—Lethes v. Newitt(1). As the plaintiffs can succeed only on the strength of their own title, he urges that the Courts below should have recognized the title to be in Baiba at Hindu law, Chandrabhat v. Sangapa (2), a jus tertius; and that this error has resulted from their accepting as proof of custom what is not proof thereof, in the eye of the law, which mistakes are such as this Court in second appeal can correct—Lachmeswar v. Manowar (3) and Ramgopal v. Shamskhaton (4). We are of opinion that, if the decree appealed against is based on wrong views of the law of evidence or on misconception of the canons which the Privy Council and the High Court have defined as to how a special custom should be proved, this Court ought to interfere in second appeal.

[116] The Joint Judge does not examine any single instance of the alleged custom. We must, therefore, inquire what the evidence is. The Subordinate Judge finds the custom proved by witnesses 35, 38, 51, 52, 66, 67, 83 and 84, who, he says, are in favour of it. He notes that the defendants tendered no rebutting evidence. That makes no matter, says Mr. Branson; there was nothing for them to rebut. Neither Court has tested what the witnesses say as this Court did in each instance in Basava v. Lingangapada (5), nor applied the canons. See pp. 458 and 473. Witness 35 like most of them excludes widows. He swore Baiba was dead and that Motiba was only found in maintenance. His meagre remarks about daughters are not worth consideration. The same remarks apply to witness 38, who was not asked about daughters. Neither was witness 51. Witness 52 deposed to the death of Baiba and the maintenance of Motiba. He spoke as to what happened if a Girassia died childless. Witness 66 stated in the abstract the proposition of the plaint, and named three instances in his family. But in none of these was there a farikhat. The same remarks apply to witness 67. Witness 83 sneaks to the customs in the neighbouring State of Bhavnagar. Witness 84 speaks to two instances affecting daughters: they are not in point unless the brethren were divided: the witness in cross examination admitted he knew little about that essential fact: the parties who are alive have not been called. The only evidence thus appears to be that of witnesses 66 and 84. There is no documentary evidence whatever nor anything to show that the exclusion of daughters in favour of divided brethren has ever received recognition from the revenue officers or the Courts of justice. No person who has excluded the daughter when she happened to be the heiress at Hindu law has been called. The case, therefore, resembles Bhagwaras v. Rajmal (1). See for the canons p. 260 and for the authorities p. 261, where it is held that proof of only three instances could not be regarded as proof of an ancient, still less of an immemorial custom.

"The course of practice, upon which the custom rests, must not be left in doubt, but must be proved with certainty"—Shidhojirav v. Naikojirav (2). The argument, that no instance of a daughter succeeding has been proved, is under the circumstances of no great weight. The issue ought to have been whether the plaintiffs can prove the existence of a special custom among Gobal Girassias that a collateral male relation of the father deceased succeeds to his property, they being separated in interests at Hindu law, where the heiress at Hindu law entitled to the possession is a daughter. The onus is on the plaintiff; for "where a custom is proved to exist, it supersedes the general law, which, however, still regulates all beyond the custom"—Neelkisto v. Beerchunder (3). Non-usage though relevant to matters of procedure—1 Coke on Litt. 81 b.—is not valid argument here. The defendants might have difficulty in getting any relevant instances; they are only concerned with the case of a divided brother dying with no nearer heir than a daughter. In like manner no general statement nor cases among undivided brethren avail the plaintiffs: neither do those where the evidence is not clear, 1st, that there had been a separation in interest between the succeeding male collateral and the deceased; 2nd that there was no heir nearer than the daughter; 3rd that the family was one of Gobal Girassias. This very case ought to have made the Courts below extremely careful to test the evidence by the usual canons: as the attempt of the plaintiffs to convince those Courts of the custom by bringing witnesses to prove not only that widows are always excluded but that this widow Motiba had actually been excluded failed so completely. Those Courts should further have noticed the endeavour to avoid all proof of the custom about daughters by raising doubts about Baiba being alive. For these reasons we find that the custom to exclude daughters was not proved.

We must also hold that the adverse possession of the widow Motiba bars this suit. The plaintiffs, as we have seen, struggled by every means in their power to make the Subordinate Judge believe that Motiba was, in pursuance of the alleged custom, excluded from the property and found in maintenance. The possession found to exist in her case as a fact must, therefore, have been adverse to the plaintiffs. The limitation must be [118] applied to their claim as they made it and tried to prove it; not to a different set of pretensions which they would not have raised if the evidence they brought had not been disbelieved by the Subordinate Judge.

The Court, therefore, reverse the decrees of the Courts below and dismisses the suit; costs throughout on the plaintiffs.

RAHIMKHAN AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. FATU BIBI BINTESAHEB KHAN (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

Bombay Act V of 1886, s. 2†—Retrospective effect—Vatan—Vatan becoming the property of widow and daughter—Heirs.

Section 2 of Bombay Act V of 1886 is not retrospective.

A vatan having devolved on the widow and daughter of a deceased Mahomedan as his heirs, and each having become owner of her share in it, in so far as a vatan can be held in ownership.

Held, that on the death of the widow in 1890, leaving no qualified male heirs, the daughter was entitled to succeed as her heir.

SECOND appeal from the decision of L. G. Fernandez, First Class Subordinate Judge of Thana with appellate powers, modifying the decree of Rao Saheb Maneklal G. Ganderia, Subordinate Judge of Panvel.

The plaintiff sued as the heires of her father Saheb Khan and mother Aishhabibi to establish her right to a moiety of a vatan, alleging that the entire vatan had belonged to her father Saheb Khan and the first defendant in equal shares; that Saheb Khan received Rs. 233-5-6 a year, on account of his share, from Government till his death in 1851; that in July, 1853, plaintiff and [119] her mother Aishhabibi obtained a certificate of heirship to Saheb Khan; that the vatan was entered in the names of Aishhabibi and defendant No. 1; that the plaintiff and Aishhabibi lived together and enjoyed the vatan till November, 1890, when Aishhabibi died, and that subsequently disputes having arisen as to the entry of the plaintiff’s name in lieu of her mother’s in the Government record, the Revenue Commissioner directed in the year 1891 that the name of the first defendant should be put in the place of Aishhabibi.

The defendants contended that Aishhabibi’s right to the vatan ceased with her death, and the defendants then became the owners; that both by law and custom a daughter does not acquire a right to the vatan; that the plaintiff never succeeded as the heires of her father; that the claim was barred by the law of limitation; and that Saheb Khan had other heirs, and the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to a moiety of the vatan.

The Subordinate Judge held that a part of the vatan which had already vested in the plaintiff as Saheb Khan's heir in 1851 under the Mahomedan law was enjoyed by her and her mother as tenants-in-common, and that, therefore, the disability imposed by s. 2 of Bombay Act V of 1886 on a female's right to inherit a vatan did not affect her with respect to that part, and that she was not entitled to inherit Aishabibi's share in the vatan by reason of the above-mentioned section. He, therefore, allowed the claim to the extent of $\frac{11}{2}$th share in Saheb Khan's moiety.

On cross appeals by the parties the Judge modified the decree and allowed the claim in full, holding that the plaintiff had proved her right to the moiety of the vatan; that on her father's death she, as his heir, enjoyed her share of the vatan; and that Aishabibi enjoyed the rest of it in her own right and adversely to the other heirs of Saheb Khan; that s. 2 of Act V of 1886 did not disqualify the plaintiff from inheriting Aishabibi's share in the vatan; and that the defendants were not the qualified male heirs of Aishabibi.

The defendants preferred a second appeal.

P. M. Mehta with Gangaram B. Rele, for the appellants (defendants):
—The Judge has taken a wrong view of the law. In [120] the first place, we contend that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed to the vatan at all, because after her father Saheb Khan's death, Aishabibi as his widow was the proper and sole person to succeed to the vatan as the representative (vatanar service then not being commuted), and after her death, which took place in 1890, we were entitled to succeed as members of the vatanar family according to the existing state of law. The plaintiff has left the vatanar family by her marriage, and, if she succeeds in this suit, the object of the Legislatura in not allowing a vatan to pass out of the vatanar family will be defeated.

Even supposing that the plaintiff has got an indefeasible right to that portion of the vatan which she acquired as the heir of her father, still she cannot contend that she is entitled to succeed to Aishabibi's share. At the time of Aishabibi's death, Bombay Act V of 1886 was in force, and
s. 2 of that Act debarred any female from succeeding to the vatan except the widow of the last male holder.

Inverarity (with Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan), for the respondent (plaintiff).—The older Vatan Acts did not absolutely prohibit a female from succeeding to the vatan. When the plaintiff's father Saheb Khan died, the plaintiff succeeded to a portion of the vatan in her right as heir. She having acquired a share as heir to her father so far back as 1851 has now become the absolute owner of that share. The same remarks apply to Aishabibi's share. She had become absolute owner of her share in 1890 when she died, and s. 2 of Act V of 1886 could not have deprieved her of property of which she had become owner before the Act came into force. Further, the section is not retrospective.—Bai Hariganga v. Tulsidas (1). Aishabibi having become absolute owner, her qualified heirs will be entitled to succeed to the property. The defendants are not Aishabibi's heirs. They are the descendants of Saheb Khan's paternal cousins. They may be the qualified heirs of Saheb Khan, but certainly not of Aishabibi, who has left no other heir except the plaintiff.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—Section 2 of Act V of 1886 (Bombay) is in terms made not retrospective, and the Act has been so construed [121] in Bai Hariganga v. Tulidas(1). On the death of Sabab Khan in 1851 the vatan under the old law devolved on Aisha and the plaintiff, his heirs according to Mahomedan law, and each became the owner of her share of the property in so far as a vatan can be held in ownership. When the Act came into force it found Aisha the owner of her share of the vatan, and s. 2 did not operate to cut down her ownership.

On her death her heirs were entitled to succeed, males probably in preference to females, but we need not consider that. The defendants are not the qualified heirs of Aisha, and, therefore, cannot succeed. It is argued that they are qualified heirs in the original vatan family, but that does not constitute them qualified heirs to succeed to Aisha. We confirm the decree, with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farring and Mr. Justice Parsons.

PARSHOTAM LAKHMIRAM (Plaintiff) v. PEMI HARIJ AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [10th October, 1895.]

Small Cause Court—Suit not cognizable against some of the defendants—Jurisdiction.

A suit is not cognizable by a Small Cause Court unless it is cognizable by it as against all the defendants.

The plaintiff, who was a Brahmin and who belonged to a class of a hereditary priests of the Varhaha caste at Anklesvar, brought a suit against the defendants to recover from them Rs. 23-9-6 on account of his fees, &c., as hereditary priest, alleging that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, uncle and nephews, were members of the Varhaha caste; that defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were rival priests; that defendant No. 3 was an agent of defendants Nos. 4 and 5; and that on the death of the mother of defendant No. 1 in 1891, the [122] death-bed offerings, fees and presents of subsequent days, amounting to the above-mentioned sum, were given to defendant No. 3.

A question having arisen as to whether the Subordinate Judge could take cognizance of the suit against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in his small cause jurisdiction, though there was no doubt that he could do so against defendants Nos. 3, 4 and 5, the suit as against them being one for money had and received by them for plaintiff’s use, he submitted the following questions:

"1. Whether a suit by a Hindu hereditary office-holder against an intruder for disturbance of office, or else for money had and received, can lie in the Small Cause Court?"

* Civil Reference No. 18 of 1895.

2. If yes, what should be done about the defendants in this suit who are sued for not giving those fees?"

The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that if he could not try the suit against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 in his small cause jurisdiction, he could entertain it as against all the defendants in his ordinary jurisdiction.

N. M. Samarth (amicus curiae), for the plaintiff.

Vasudeo R. Joglekar (amicus curiae), for the defendants.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—As the suit against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 is not cognizable by a Small Cause Court, the whole suit is not cognizable by a Small Cause Court, and the Subordinate Judge must try it in his original jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to answer the first question.

Order accordingly.

TUKARAM (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. BABAJI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [11th October, 1895.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 258, as amended by Act VII of 1888—Payment out of Court—Payment not certified to Court—Proof of such payment for the purpose of determining the question of limitation.

Under s. 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure (as amended by Act VII of 1889) as there is no time fixed within which the decree-holder is bound to certify a payment [123] made out of Court. Such payment may be certified at any time. And although such payment, until certified, cannot be recognized by a Court executing a decree as a payment or adjustment of the decree, it is still open to the Court to take evidence about the payment in order to determine whether an application for execution is barred by limitation.

SECOND appeal from the decision of S. Tagore, District Judge of Satara, in appeal No. 147 of 1894.

By a consent decree dated 29th July, 1884, it was provided that in consideration of the defendants paying into Court Rs. 600 by yearly instalments of Rs. 50 each, plaintiff should give up his right to the land in dispute which he had agreed to purchase from the defendants, and that if the defendants failed to pay any one of the instalments, the plaintiffs should be entitled to take possession of the land after the expiration of four months from the date of the default.

In 1892 the plaintiff made an application for execution of the decree, alleging that he had been paid out of Court the instalments due up to 1891, that the instalment due in 1892 had not been paid and that as four months had elapsed since the date of the default he was entitled to recover possession of the property in dispute.

* Second Appeal No. 362 of 1895.
(1) 21 C. 542.

The defendants pleaded that the application was time-barred, that they had not paid the instalments as they fell due, but had paid a lump sum of Rs. 350 in Shaka 1807 (1885 A. D.), and that they were willing to pay the balance of Rs. 250 which was due.

The Court of first instance dismissed the application as time-barred, holding that the alleged payments not having been certified to the Court, could not be recognized as payments under the decree, and that, consequently, evidence to prove those payments could not be received.

The District Court in appeal upheld this decision. The following is an extract from the judgment:

"The point for decision is whether evidence is admissible to prove the alleged payments out of Court?

"My finding is in the negative.

[124] "Mr. Karandikar (plaintiff-appellant’s pleader) refers to Haji Abdul v. Khoja Khaki (1) and Hurri Pershad v. Nasib (2) and other cases, as showing that although under the provisions of s. 258, Civil Procedure Code, an uncertificated payment made to a decree-holder could not be recognized as a payment or adjustment of the decree, yet it was competent to the decree-holder to prove such payment for the purpose of showing that the execution of the decree was not barred by limitation. It is also urged that the decree-holder is not subject to any limitation, and may certify after any lapse of time, and that the statement in the darkhast itself should be taken as a certificate of the payment.

"I am, however, of opinion that the cases cited are distinguishable from the present, inasmuch as there is an express provision in the decree in the present case that the payments in question should be made into Court. It is not open to the judgment-creditor applying for execution to extend the terms of the decree or to consent to take satisfaction otherwise than as provided therein. I think, therefore, that the lower Court rightly held that no evidence could be admitted to prove the alleged payment made out of Court. No effect could be given to any such payment under the terms of the decree."

Against this decision the plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Inverarity (with him Balaji A. Bhagvat), for appellant.
Branson (with him Ganpat Sadashiv Rao), for respondent.

JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

FARRAN, C. J.—Under s. 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure no time is fixed within which the decree-holder is bound to certify a payment made out of Court, and it has been held that it may be certified at any time (Haji Abdul Rahman v. Khoja Khaki Aruth (1)). Nor is any particular form prescribed for the certificate. When, therefore, the decree-holder in the present case mentioned in his application for execution that he had been paid the instalments due in 1891, and that default had occurred in making payment of the instalments due in 1892, and asked for relief on that ground only, we fail to see why the Court did not treat the payments as certified. (Cf. Bksika Devji Patil v. Mahadu velad Satwaji Patil (3).) If it thought it necessary for its own satisfaction, it might have called on the decree-holder to formally certify the payments by a separate application before it proceeded further. The judgment-debtors, however, in the present case did not admit having made the payments certified by plaintiff; they stated that they had paid Rs. 550 in Shaka 1807, and pleaded that execution was time-barred. At the same time they expressed their willingness to pay the plaintiff Rs. 250, which sum only they admitted to be due. It was open, we think, on the plea of limitation for the Court to have taken evidence about the payments mentioned by the plaintiff in his darkness, and to have determined whether the application for execution was time-barred or not. Section 288 provides that such payment shall not be recognised as a payment or adjustment of the decree by any Court executing the decree. The italicised words added to the section by Act VII of 1888, s. 27, do not appear to us to affect the question. They were added alio intuito and have the effect of removing the doubts caused by the conflict of decisions pointed out in and emphasised by Haji Abdul Rahiman v. Khoja Khaki Aruth (1) as to the Courts which could recognise uncertified payments, but do not alter the meaning of the expression "shall not be recognized as a payment or adjustment of the decree." We concur in the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Hurri Pershad v. Nasib Singh (2), which dissents from the ruling of Tyrrell, J., in Miththu Lal v. Khairati Lal (3).

The decision in Purmanandas Jivandas v. Vallabdas Wallow (4) is, therefore, in our judgment still binding as an authority. It is in accordance with the rulings in the other High Courts. We do not think that there is any weight in the opinion of the District Judge that because the decree ordered payment to be made into Court the decree-holder was prohibited from taking payment out of Court. We notice that this provision is made in only one place in the decree, viz., where it provides for the manner in which payment is to be made by the several judgment-debtors. Elsewhere the decree speaks of payment only, and where it gives the decree-holder relief in the case of payment not being made, no restriction is placed on the mode of payment. We must, therefore, reverse the order in execution of the lower appellate Court, and remand the application for disposal with reference to the above remarks. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Order reversed and case sent back.

[126] ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Fulton.

DOBSON AND BARLOW, LIMITED (Plaintiffs) v. THE BENGAL SPINNING AND WEAVING COMPANY (Defendants).*

[18th June, 1896.]

Contract—Jurisdiction—Cause of action—Counter-claim—Set-off—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1892), s. 111—Practice—Procedure—Costs of preparing a deed—Stamp duty.

In December, 1893, the plaintiffs agreed to supply the defendants with machinery for their mill near Calcutta. The defendants being unable to pay for it in accordance with that agreement entered into a supplementary agreement with the plaintiffs on the 10th August, 1894, whereby it was arranged that the plaintiffs should accept shares in the defendants' company and debentures charged on the property in satisfaction of their claim. The agreement provided that the defendant company should forthwith execute an indenture of trust in favour of trustees to be named by the plaintiffs for the purpose of securing the said debentures, such indenture to be prepared by the plaintiffs' solicitors together with the debentures at the expense of the company and should be approved by the company's solicitors. It was lastly provided that this agreement should be treated as forming part of and supplemental to the agreement of December, 1892. This agreement was signed in Bombay by J. Marshall on behalf of the plaintiffs. The indenture and debentures were duly prepared by the plaintiffs and approved by the defendants' solicitors in Bombay. The plaintiffs having paid in Bombay the solicitors' bill of costs in respect of the preparation of the indenture and debentures now sued to recover the amount from the defendants under the terms of the above agreement of 1894.

The defendants contended that the Court had no jurisdiction, on the ground that they did not reside or carry on business in Bombay, and that no part of the cause of action arose in Bombay. They also alleged that the plaintiffs had failed to carry out their part of the agreement of 1892, and contended that they were entitled in this suit to claim damages against the plaintiffs and to set them off against the plaintiffs' claim.

_Held_, that the Court had jurisdiction. The agreement of August, 1894, was signed in Bombay by the plaintiffs' agent on their behalf, and, therefore, part of the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction. Further, it appeared that it was intended that the payment to be made by the plaintiffs should be made in Bombay, where both the plaintiffs' agent and solicitors resided.

_Held_, also, that the defendants should not be permitted in this suit to claim damages against the plaintiffs for their alleged failure to carry out their part of the contract of 1892. Their counter claim or set-off did not fall under s. 111 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), as it was not a claim for an ascertained sum of money, and that being so they could not claim as of right to have it investigated in this suit. Nor was there any equitable ground for admitting the [127] counter claim, as it could not be doubted that there would be considerable delay in investigating it, and there was no reason why the plaintiffs should have to wait so long for the money to which they were now legally entitled.

_Held_, also, that the plaintiffs were entitled to include in their claim the stamp duty paid on the trust-deed. The agreement contemplated that the defendant should pay all the costs incidental to the execution of the deed.

The plaintiffs sued to recover Rs. 3,073-8-0 with interest from the defendants, being the amount due for the preparation of a certain trust-deed and debentures.

The plaint alleged that by an agreement dated the 10th August, 1894, the defendants had (by their agent) agreed to execute an indenture of trust and to issue debentures in payment to the plaintiffs of the amount due to them for machinery to be supplied by them to the defendants. The said indenture and the debentures were to be prepared by the plaintiffs' solicitor at the expense of the defendants, and to be approved by the defendants' solicitors. The plaint further stated that the said indenture and debentures were duly prepared and approved and were executed by the defendants on the 7th December, 1895, and the plaintiffs paid the bill, viz., Rs. 1,573-8-0, for the preparation of the said documents and Rs. 1,500 for stamp duty. They now sued the defendants to recover this amount.

It appeared that by a previous agreement of the 28th December 1892, the plaintiffs had agreed to supply the defendants with machinery for their mill near Calcutta. Under this agreement certain machinery had been supplied and partly paid for, but the defendants being unable to continue to pay for it in accordance with the agreement of December, 1892, entered into the above agreement of 10th August, 1894, which substituted certain new terms with regard to the payment of the balance of the money due. Under this agreement the plaintiffs were to take shares in the defendant company as payment. The agreement contained the following clauses:

"3rd. In respect of the balance of the purchase-money of £38,500, referred to in the hereinbefore recited agreement, namely, the sum of £30,000, the company shall issue and hand over to the contractors three hundred debentures of pounds one hundred each, bearing interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, and chargeable upon the lands, hereditaments and premises of the company, [128] and also on all and singular the boilers, engines, machinery, tools, fixtures, implements, utensils and plant belonging to or which may hereafter become the property of the said company.

"4th. The said debentures shall be payable at the expiration of three years from 1st day of September, 1894, and shall be issued to the contractors on or before such last mentioned date.

"5th. The company shall forthwith execute an indenture of trust in favour of two trustees to be named by the said contractors for the purpose of securing the said debentures, such indenture to be prepared by the solicitors for the contractors, together with the debentures before referred to at the expense of the company, and shall be approved by the company's solicitors. The said indentures shall contain all usual conditions and stipulations for the better securing the repayment of the said debentures."

The agreement of 10th August, 1894, was signed in Bombay by Mr. John Marshall on behalf of the plaintiffs.

In the first instance there were two plaintiffs to the suit, viz., (1) Dobson and Barlow by their agent Clarence St. Paul, and (2) John Marshall. A new power of attorney was subsequently sent to Marshall, and St. Paul's name was struck out under a Judge's order, and Marshall was substituted as duly constituted agent of the plaintiffs. The plaint was then verified by Mr. Marshall.

The defendants in their written statement stated that the suit was defective; that it was filed and the plaint affirmed by St. Paul, who had no authority to act for the plaintiffs; and that Mr. John Marshall, who was originally a plaintiff, had not affirmed the plaint on his own behalf, and was not duly authorized to act for the plaintiffs.

The defendants also submitted that the Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit, as they did not carry on business in Bombay, and the agreements were executed in Calcutta. They also pleaded that the agreement of the 10th August, 1894, was part of and supplemental to the agreement of the 28th December, 1892, that with reference to these agreements there were many unsettled questions between them and the plaintiffs, that they had a claim for damages against the plaintiffs under the agreement of December, 1892, for non-delivery of certain machinery within a fixed time, and that their claim in respect thereof far exceeded the plaintiffs' claim in this suit, and they craved leave to formulate [129] their claim by way of set-off. The written statement also contained the following clauses:

"The defendants further say that under the said agreement of the 10th of August, 1894, the costs of the preparation of the indenture securing debentures and the debentures themselves was the only expense agreed to be paid by the defendants. The defendants say that the sum of Rs. 1,573-8-0, claimed by the plaintiffs in this suit, is made up of various legal charges besides the costs aforesaid which the defendants are not bound to pay
The defendants are and always have been willing that the bill of costs, if any, for the preparation of the said indenture and debentures should be taxed and that the amount found due on such taxation should be set-off against the moneys claimable by the defendants from the plaintiffs as aforesaid.

"5. The defendants also say that the sum of Rs. 1,500 for stamp is not payable by them under the said agreement, and the plaintiffs are not entitled by virtue of the said agreement to demand it of them."

The suit came on as a short cause, and the following issues were raised:

1. Whether the suit as originally filed was defective by reason of the terms of Mr. St. Paul's power of attorney.
2. Whether their power of attorney to Mr. Marshall is sufficient to entitle him to maintain this suit.
3. If the second issue is found in the affirmative and the first in the negative, whether the substitution of Mr. Marshall for Mr. St. Paul covers the original defect in the suit.
4. Whether the Court has jurisdiction to try this suit.
5. Whether the defendants are not entitled in this suit to claim damages against the plaintiffs for their failure to carry out their part of the agreement of 1892.
6. Whether under cl. 5 of the agreement of 1894 the defendants are liable to pay Rs. 1,500 claimed for stamp.
7. Whether under the said cl. 5 the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sum claimed, or any, and what part thereof.

Russell, for plaintiffs.—The plaint was originally filed by St. Paul on behalf of Dobson and Barlow (Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 37), with Marshall as second plaintiff (Contract Act, s. 230). He held a power of attorney to act for them in Bombay during Marshall's absence. But a new power of attorney was on the 26th March, 1896, sent to Marshall. We then struck out his name as second plaintiff and substituted him for St. Paul as plaintiffs' agent. This was done under a Judge's order. If not rightly done already, it can be done now—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 53.

As to jurisdiction we have got leave to sue under cl. 12 of the Letters Patent, 1865. Under the agreement the payment of the costs under cl. 5 was to be made in Bombay where the solicitors reside. The defendants' agents are in Bombay.

As to the third issue, the defendants are not entitled to raise it. Their claim under the deed of 1892 is quite independent of our claim under the deed of 1894. They cannot raise the question by way of set-off. They must file a separate suit. Besides, they have not yet formulated their claim; so we do not know what it is.

Macpherson, for defendants.—We say the suit as originally constituted was not maintainable and the power of attorney held by Marshall is not sufficient. This Court has no jurisdiction. The defendants do not reside or carry on business in Bombay, and no part of the cause of action arose here. The plaintiffs' claim is founded on cl. 5 of the agreement of 1894 which was executed at Calcutta. It does not mention any particular firm of solicitors. The fact that the solicitors who have done the work live in Bombay is accidental and quite immaterial. The defendants were not to pay the money directly to the solicitors. They were only bound to recoup the plaintiffs what they might pay, and that is to be done at Calcutta, where the agreement was made.
As to our counter-claim we have a right to make it in this suit. The plaintiffs' claim against us and our claim against them are merely parts of one transaction, the whole of which is provided for by the agreement. The plaintiffs cannot single out one item in that transaction and sue in respect of it alone. We claim that the whole matter shall be dealt with.

We have prepared a written statement setting forth our claim.

The claim of the plaintiffs in respect of the stamp is bad. It does not come under cl. 5 of the agreement. The stamping of the documents is no part of the preparation. We say the whole claim of the plaintiffs is an over-charge, and the bill in respect of this must be taxed.

Russel, in reply.—We are quite willing that the bill should be taxed. This has never before been suggested.

JUDGMENT.

[131] FULTON, J.—This is a suit brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the costs of the preparation of a certain indenture and certain debentures referred to in the fifth clause of an agreement between the parties, dated the 10th August, 1894.

The defendants in their written statement made various objections to the suit which sufficiently appear in the following issues raised by Mr. Macpherson. (His Lordship read the issues as above set forth and continued).

By an agreement dated the 28th December, 1892, the plaintiffs, Messrs. Dobson and Barlow, entered into a contract with the Bengal Spinning and Weaving Company for the supply of machinery, which was to be delivered subject to certain conditions, and to be paid for in the manner agreed on. Owing to difficulties arising about payment, a supplementary agreement was entered into between the parties on the 10th August, 1894, by which it was arranged that the plaintiffs should accept shares in the company and debentures charged on its property in satisfaction of their claim. The fifth clause then provided as follows:

"The company shall forthwith execute an indenture of trust in favour of the trustees to be named by the said contractors for the purpose of securing the said debentures, such indenture to be prepared by the solicitors for the contractors together with the debentures before referred to at the expense of the company, and shall be approved by the company's solicitors. The said indenture shall contain all usual conditions and stipulations for the better securing the repayment of the said debentures."

The last clause provided that this agreement should be forming part of, and supplemental to, the agreement of 28th December, 1892.

In due course the indenture and debentures were prepared by the plaintiffs' solicitors and approved by the defendants' solicitors in Bombay. The plaintiffs' agent, Mr. Marshall, then wrote to the company's agent asking for the payment of the bill of costs. On the 10th February the company's agent wrote to point out that the bill had not been sent, and to say that if it were in order the plaintiffs might treat the same as a set-off to the defendants' claim against them. On the same day Mr. Marshall wrote back to say [132] that the bill had been sent, and that he could not allow it to be set-off against any claim the company might have against his principals, who had much larger claims against the company.

Mr. Marshall on the 15th April paid the solicitors' bill of costs, the suit having been previously instituted.
In the first instance, the suit was instituted in the name of Messrs. Dobson and Barlow by their agent Mr. Clarence St. Paul and also in the name of Mr. Marshall. Subsequently doubts having arisen as to the validity of Mr. St. Paul's power of attorney, a Judge's order was obtained to strike out the name of Mr. St. Paul and to substitute that of Mr. Marshall as duly constituted attorney of Messrs. Dobson and Barlow, and to make the necessary amendment consequent thereupon in the body of the plaint. The plaint was then re-verifed by Mr. Marshall, and his name substituted for that of Mr. St. Paul as attorney for Messrs. Dobson and Barlow, and also erased from its position as second plaintiff.

On the first issue as to the sufficiency of Mr. St. Paul's power of attorney, I do not think it necessary to express any opinion, because in argument it was conceded by Mr. Macpherson that if Mr. Marshall's power of attorney was sufficient, the substitution was authorized by s. 53 of the Civil Procedure Code, and I entirely concur in this view. The object of s. 53 is clearly to prevent suits being defeated on a merely technical ground.

As to the sufficiency of Mr. Marshall's power of attorney, I cannot see in what way it is defective. There is no prescribed form. The power authorizes him to act for his principals in all matters legal or otherwise, and, therefore, appears to entitle him to sue for them under s. 37 (a). Accordingly I find on the 2nd and 3rd issues in the affirmative.

A subsidiary question arose in argument whether the Judge's order justified the removal of Mr. Marshall's name as second plaintiff. Doubtless in one way that amendment seemed to be a natural consequence of the insertion of his name as attorney for Messrs. Dobson and Barlow; but I do not think it was a necessary consequence, for it is conceivable that an agent, doubtful, whether the right of suit belonged to himself or to his principal, might think proper to sue in the alternative in both names. [133] However, as Mr. Russell, at the first hearing on the 9th June, while contending that the withdrawal of Mr. Marshall's name was in accordance with the order also applied alternatively for its removal under s. 32, I direct that it be struck out as on that date, the previous erasure being treated as invalid. I do not understand how the addition of Mr. Marshall's name as co-plaintiff can have increased the defendants' costs or affected them in any way whatever, but as the point was pressed in argument I direct that if on taxation it be found that the addition of his name as co-plaintiff really and properly caused any increase in the defendants' costs (over and above those incurred by them in defending the suit of Dobson and Barlow), the same be paid by him.

Turning now to the more material issues, I find on the 4th issue that this Court has jurisdiction, leave having been given under cl. 12 of the Letters Patent. The agreement of August, 1894, was signed in Bombay by Mr. Marshall on behalf of Messrs. Dobson and Barlow.

In Read v. Brown (1), a case under the Mayor's Court Procedure Act (20 and 21 Vict., c. 157) the matter is very succinctly dealt with by Lord Justice Fry as follows:—"Everything which, if not proved, gives the defendant an immediate right to judgment, must be part of the cause of action." Similarly when discussing the jurisdiction of the same Court apart from the Act, Mr. Justice Brett in Cooke v. Gill (2) said: "Cause of action has been held from the earliest time to mean every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed—every fact which the defendant would have a right to traverse." Now, if the definition contained in these decisions can properly be applied to the term "cause of action" in cl. 12 of the Letters Patent, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that where one of the parties assents to the contract in Bombay, part of the cause of action arises in Bombay; for, if his assent to the contract can be disproved, the whole contract falls to the ground, and with it the right of suit. In Mr. Justice Green's learned judgment in Mulchand v. Suganchand (1), confirmed on appeal by Sir M. Westropp, C.J., [134] and Sargent, J., the weight to be attached to the English interpretation of the term "cause of action" in determining the meaning of the same phrase in cl. 12 of the Letters Patent is very fully considered, and there seems to be no reason for holding that in the Letters Patent the term has a different meaning from that put on it in the two cases above referred to. In Dkunjishah v. A.B. Fforde (2) Mr. Justice Farran pointed out that it was now settled that in the case of an action on a contract, the cause of action within the meaning of cl. 12 of the Letters Patent meant the whole cause of action and consisted of the making of the contract and of its breach in the place where it ought to be performed. But if the making of the contract be part of the cause of action, it appears to follow that the act of concurrence of either party which is essential to the contract is itself a part of the cause of action, for without such act of concurrence the contract cannot come into existence. See the extract from the judgment in Sichil v. Borch (3) referred to by Mr. Justice Bittleston in De Sousa v. Coles (4) and Mr. Justice Telang in Rampurtab v. Premshukh (5).

(1) 29 Q. B. D. 128 (133).
(2) L. R. 8 C. P. 107.

The above remarks, if correct, are sufficient to show that part of the cause of action arose in Bombay; but the same conclusion may be arrived at on another ground. For under the circumstances of this case I think it must have been intended that the documents should be prepared in Bombay and paid for there. It has not been suggested that the plaintiffs had any other Indian solicitors than the Bombay solicitors, and the preparation of the documents in Bombay and their approval by the defendants' Bombay solicitors seem to have been accepted as matters of course. The fair inference, then, appears to be that payment was intended to be made in Bombay, where both the plaintiffs' agent and the solicitors resided. Consequently, part of the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction.

On the 5th issue whether the defendants are not entitled in this suit to claim damages against the plaintiffs for their failure to carry out their part of the contract of 1892, I am of opinion [135] that the answer must be in the negative. The defendants' claim, so far as I understand, is not one arising under s. 111 of the Civil Procedure Code, for it does not seem to be one for an ascertained sum of money legally recoverable from the plaintiffs. Whether a claim for an ascertained sum could, notwithstanding the provisions of s. 74 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872) have been made under cl. 14 of the agreement of 1892, is a matter on which I need express no opinion; but if it could have been made, there could, I think, be no valid reason for not formulating at the first hearing such a simple claim, considering that the defendants' agents were warned of the probability of this action as long ago as the 10th February.

But what I understand is that the defendants asked for time to formulate a counter claim for damages of which their bill sent to Mr. Marshall on the 18th January was a part. Now I do not doubt that the Court would have jurisdiction to entertain the counter claim. Though not expressly provided for in the Civil Procedure Code it has frequently been held that the Courts can entertain counter claims where it would be inequitable to compel the defendant to have recourse to a separate suit (Clark v. Ruthnavale (1); Kishorachand v. Madhowji (2); Bhagat v. Bamdeb (3); Chisholm v. Gopal Chunder (4). So long, however, as the counter claim or set off does not fall under s. 111, the defendant cannot claim as of right to have it investigated in the same suit. The question whether it is inequitable to compel him to resort to a separate suit, cannot be determined by any general rule, but depends on the facts of each case. In England the discretionary power is recognized by orders XIX and XXII. In this country, though not conferred by Act, the discretion is exercised on general principles of equity. Bhagat v. Bamdeb (3) may be referred to as a case where the Calcutta High Court refused to entertain part of a counter claim which it considered too remote to be mixed up with the original claim. Gray v. Webb (5) is an instance where the Court in England, exercising its discretion under the orders, rejected a counter claim. The discretion, it is true, is not an arbitrary power, but must be judicially exercised—Huggins v. Tweed (6).

The question, then, comes to this. Is it inequitable in the present case to refer the defendants to a separate suit? Mr. Macpherson contended that the claim for the costs of the deed was part of the whole contract, and must be treated as one transaction with the rest of the contract. But I think the substance of the arrangement must be looked to rather than the form; for the preparation of the documents was a matter quite distinct from the supply of machinery. The agreement about them was a subsidiary one embodied merely for convenience in the same deed. It was clearly intended that the costs should be provided forthwith, and the plaintiffs, who are entitled to recover them, should be repaid without delay. For convenience they advanced the money, and there seems no reason of expediency or equity which makes it desirable to keep them waiting for repayment until the whole accounts of the contract have been settled. The settlement of these accounts depends on evidence unconnected with the evidence in this case, the collection of which must necessarily be a work of time, as part of it, I presume, will come from Calcutta. If a claim by the defendants is made, it will, according to Mr. Russell's contention, be met by a counter claim of the plaintiffs, and the possibility of their putting in such a replication in the present suit is open to argument. At any rate it cannot be doubted that there will be considerable delay in settling the claims for damages, and in the absence of any suggestion that the plaintiffs will not be in a position to pay any damages awarded against them, I do not see why they should have to wait for the money to which they are now legally entitled.

On the 6th issue I find that the defendants must pay the item of Rs. 1,500 for stamp duty. The term "prepared" must have been intended to include the stamping of the document without which it could not be executed. I think the only reasonable construction to put on the agreement is that the company were liable to pay all the costs incidental to the execution of the trust-deed; and this must certainly have been the intention, as the supplementary agreement was made for their relief on account of their inability to carry out the terms of the agreement of 1892.

On the 7th issue I find that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover Rs. 1,500 plus the solicitors' costs for preparing the trust deed and debentures to be ascertained on taxation, and costs and interest at 6 per cent. per annum on the judgment from the date of final order which will be made as soon as the costs are duly reported.

The defendants must pay their own costs, except in so far as they may be entitled to recover any from Mr. Marshall.

ORIGINAL CIVIL.

In re the Estate of H. G. Meakin, deceased.

Alice Meakin (Petitioner). [25th July, 1896.]

Minor—Guardian—Minor residing in England—Jurisdiction of High Court.

Where a mother residing at Poona, the widow of a deceased European inhabitant of Poona, applied to be appointed guardian of her three minor children (two of whom were residing with her and the third, a girl of the age of sixteen years, was residing in England) and to have certain payments made to her out of the estate of their deceased father on their account, and to have certain powers over their persons given to her and to have the costs of the application paid out of the shares of the said three minor children in the hands of the Administrator-General of Bombay, the Court made the order applied for.

In chambers. This was a petition by Alice Meakin, residing at Poona, the widow of Henry George Meakin, European inhabitant of Poona, who died intestate (see I. L. R. 20 Bom., 370) at Carlsbad on 1st June, 1895. Letters of administration to his estate were, by the consent of all parties interested, granted to the Administrator General of Bombay.

The petitioner now applied to be appointed guardian of her three minor children and to have certain payments made to her out of the estate on their account, and to have certain powers over their persons given to her, and to have the costs of the application paid out of the shares of the said three minor children in the hands of the Administrator General.

The Administrator General, on whom notice of the petition was served, did not oppose the order prayed for; but as one of the three minor children, a girl of the age of sixteen years, was described in the petition as residing at Ealing, near London, while the other two minor children were stated to be residing with the petitioner at Poona, the question arose whether the Court had jurisdiction to make the order prayed for.

Russell, for the petitioner:—This petition is not headed "In the matter of the Guardian and Wards Act, 1890" on the authority of the case of Jai Ram Luxunmon and others (1). The jurisdiction of the High Court, as to infants, is not limited by the Guardian and Wards Act (see s. 3 of that Act), and, consequently, depends still on the Supreme Court Charter, ss. 41 and 42, as the powers given by those sections are continued to the High Court by Stat. 24 and 25 Vict., c. 124, s. 9. The High Court accordingly has the same powers with regard to infants that the Court of Chancery in England had over the whole Presidency of Bombay. The petitioner in this case resides in Poona, and Letters of Administration to the estate have been granted in Bombay. Among those powers of the Court of Chancery is one to appoint a guardian for an infant residing abroad. Vide Seton on Decrees (5th Ed.), p. 845, and cases there cited.

ORDER.

His Lordship made the order as prayed. Attorneys for the petitioner:—Messrs. Crawford, Burder and Co.

[139] TESTAMENTARY AND INTESTATE JURISDICTION.

Before Mr. Justice Strachey.

IN THE MATTER OF PETITION FOR PROBATE OF WILL OF EZEKIEL JOSHUA ABRAHAM.

ABRAHAM EZEKIEL ABRAHAM AND ANOTHER (Petitioners).

Probate—Probate duty—Duty payable only on assets in British India at date of death—Court Fees Act (VII of 1870). sch. I, No. 11—Succession Act (X of 1865), ss. 242, 244.

Probate duty is payable only on assets which at the date of the testator's death are in British India.

REFERENCE under the Court Fees Act (VII of 1870).

The petitioners stated that the deceased left assets of the estimated value of Rs. 10,06,892-5-8. Of this amount it appeared from the schedule that Rs. 4,29,415-5-8 was the estimated value of the property left by the deceased in Bombay, Rs. 5,16,477 was the estimated amount of remittances expected from Shanghai in respect of proceeds of opium and twist consigned to the agent at Shanghai, while the balance of Rs. 61,000 was money remitted from Shanghai, by telegraphic transfer after the death of the deceased to certain banks in Bombay and detained by them until production of probate.

The petitioners contended that probate duty could not be charged on either of the two last mentioned sums, as being outside the jurisdiction of the Court at the time of the deceased's death.

The Registrar of the High Court, in its Testamentary and Intestate Jurisdiction, was of opinion, on the other hand, that, having regard to s. 244 of the Succession Act (X of 1865) and the Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), sch. I, No. 11, probate duty was payable on the whole amount of Rs. 10,06,892-5-8.

The question was referred to the Taxing Master under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), who gave his certificate under the section referring the matter to the Chief Justice, by whose orders it was set down for hearing before Strachey, J.
Macpherson, for the petitioners:—Probate duty is payable only on the assets in British India at the time of the testator's death. [140] We set out the whole estate in our petition for probate in consequence of s. 244 of the Succession Act (X of 1865) (as amended by Act VI of 1889), which enacts that a petition for probate shall set out "the amount of assets likely to come to the petitioner's hands." Assuming that we were right in so reading the words of s. 244, and that they oblige us to set out assets likely to come to our hands, but which were at the time of the testator's death in foreign countries, the question is, whether duty is leviable on these assets under Act VII of 1870, No. 11, sch. I.

In England, when the jurisdiction of the Probate Court now exercised by the Probate Division of the High Court was transferred to it from the Ecclesiastical Courts, the first provision on the subject was in Stat. 55 Geo. III. c. 184. That statute made duty payable on property "in respect of which probate was granted." These words were always read as including only property which was within the jurisdiction at the time of the testator's death. This statute was modified by Stat. 22 and 23 Vict., c. 36, and Stat. 27 and 28 Vict., c. 56, but the material words in it were not affected by the modifications. Under those words Attorney General v. Dimond (1) and Attorney General v. Hope (2) were decided which support our contention. Those cases and others are collected in Williams on Executors, p. 542, and treated as settling the law. See also In the goods of Murray (3); and see Attorney General v. Pratt (4); Laidlay v. Lord Advocate (5) and Stern v. The Queen (6); Attorney General v. Lord Sudeley (7).

Is the law different in India? We say not. In this case the testator was a Jew, and so, but for the passing of the Succession Act (X of 1865) would have been subject to English law under the Supreme Court Charter. See Henderson on Wills, p. 312.

The principle is that Government levies probate duty on all property which cannot be obtained without probate. Probate in s. 3 of the Succession Act (X of 1865) means the grant of the whole estate in and out of jurisdiction. This is illustrated [141] by s. 179 under which all the property vests in the executors—Spratt v. Harris (8) and Williams on Executors, p. 300. But we say there is a distinction between the liability of the estate to probate and the power to administer; they are not co-extensive—Williams on Executors, p. 301.

Section 242 of the Succession Act (X of 1865) shows the extent of the operation of probate, and we say that the words in s. 244 of that Act added by Act VI of 1889 cannot have been intended to alter the English law. Under the analogous words of the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts in England, which are as wide as the words in s. 244 of the Succession Act, it has been held that duty is not payable on the assets in England of a foreign testator dying abroad—Wallace v. Attorney General (9); Thompson v. Attorney General (10); and see the discussion of the subject in Williams on Executors, Vol. 2, p. 1503. If the Registrar's contention is right, we should have to pay duty both here and at Shanghai.

(7) Ibid, 354, affirmed by the House of Lords, Lord Sudley v. Attorney General, 1 A C. 11.
Lang, Advocate General, contra.—A code is not to be construed by ascertaining what was the previous law: see Bank of England v. Vagiano (1). The doctrine laid down in that case has been adopted by the Privy Council and applied to a case under the Succession Act—Norendra Nath v. Kanaibasini (2). We say that the English law, whatever it may be, is not material to this case. We also think that the English cases are distinguishable, as the words under which they were decided are different from the words to be construed in this case. What they decide is that probate was only granted in respect of property within the jurisdiction of the Ordinary or afterwards of the Probate Court.

The question in this country is what is the property in respect of which the grant is made; not what is the property over which the probate has effect. We base our argument on ss. 243, 244 of the Succession Act and ask that full meaning should be given to those sections. Here the property “remittances expected from Shanghai” is likely to come to the petitioners’ hands and must be accounted for. Section 277 does not affect the case and must be read into s. 242A. Though the [142] words we rely on are new in s. 244, yet the original section as to letters of administration (s. 246) had the same words.

JUDGMENT.

Strachey, J.—In this case a difference which has arisen between the Registrar and the petitioners for probate of the will of Ezekiel Joshua Abraham, as to the amount of the court-fee payable on the probate, has been referred to me for decision under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act VII of 1870. The question in difference is whether the court fee is payable upon the total amount of the assets which are stated in the petition to be likely to come to the petitioners’ hands, or upon such portion only of those assets as at the time of the testator’s death was in British India. The total assets are of the estimated value of Rs. 10,06,892-5-8. Of these, property valued at Rs. 4,29,415-5-8 was within British India and within the jurisdiction of this Court at the time of the testator’s death. The residue, valued at Rs. 5,77,477, described in the schedule to the petition as “remittances expected from Shanghai,” and consisting of the proceeds of opium and twist consigned by the deceased to Shanghai, was at the date of his death at Shanghai, and is still there, except Rs. 61,000, which, some time after that date, was remitted to Bombay by telegraphic transfers, and is now lying in certain Bombay banks. The Registrar’s order is as follows:—“Having regard to s. 244 of the Succession Act, requiring that the petition should state the amount of assets which are likely to come to the petitioners’ hands, and the Court Fees Act, sch. I, No. 11, requiring duty at 2 per cent, on the amount of estate in respect of which the probate, &c., is granted, the Registrar cannot exempt any portion of the value of the estate, viz., Rs. 10,06,892-5-8, from payment of probate duty.” I have to decide whether this view is correct.

The question is whether the total assets, or those assets only which at the date of the testator’s death were in British India, are “the property in respect of which the grant of probate is made” within the meaning of sch. I, No. 11 of the Court Fees Act. To see in respect of what property the grant of probate is made we must look first to the Indian Succession Act (X of 1865), which governs this case. Under that Act, while on the one hand, s. 3 read with s. 179 shows that a probate granted by [143]
this Court gives the executor a right of administration to all the property of the testator which vests in him, wherever situate, on the other hand s. 242 shows that it has effect over such property only throughout the whole of British India. Where assets of the testator are at the time of his death in another country, the Indian probate will not enable the executor to recover them, although when in any way he does so they fall within his general right to administer, and although the Court of the foreign country in granting probate or administration for the purpose of their recovery may, as a matter of comity, follow the decision of this Court. What then (to return to the Court Fees Act) is "the property in respect of which the grant of probate is made?" Is it all the property of the testator, wherever situate at the time of his death, which the executor is likely to recover, and which, if and when recovered, he will be entitled to administer by virtue of the probate? Or is it only the property situate in British India at the time of the death which the probate not only entitles the executor to administer if and when recovered, but itself enables him to recover? There is no Indian case in point. In England, however, a closely similar question has often been considered and is now finally settled. The words in the Court Fees Act "property in respect of which the grant of probate is made," or as they stood before the passing of s. 13 of Act VII of 1889, "the property in respect of which the probate shall be granted," were substituted for the schedule of the Succession Act, which imposed a fixed stamp duty of Rs. 8 on 'probate or letters of administration.' They were in all probability taken from the English Stamp Act, 1815, Stat. 55 Geo. III, c. 184. Part III of the schedule of that statute contains, among other things, the duties on probates of wills, and make such duty payable on "the estate and effects for or in respect of which such probate shall be granted." The same words are repeated in the schedule of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1880, and in s. 27 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, Stat. 44 and 45 Vict., c. 12, which regulated the payment of probate duty in England up to the passing of the Finance Act, 1894 (Stat. 57 and 58 Vict., c. 30). In Williams on Executors (9th Ed.), p. 542, the result of the authorities upon the [143] construction of these words is thus stated:—"The law appears to be now settled that by the terms of the Act of Parliament, the amount of the probate duty is to be regulated, not by the value of all the assets which an executor or administrator may ultimately administer by virtue of the will or letters of administration, but by the value of such part as is at the death of the deceased within the jurisdiction of the Court by which the probate or letters of administration are granted. Whatever may have been the origin of this jurisdiction, it is clear that it is a limited one, and can be exercised in respect of those effects only which the Ordinary would have had himself to administer in case of intestacy, and which must, therefore, be so situated as that he could have disposed of them in pios usus." The author proceeds to show how these principles have been adopted in several important decisions respecting the liability to probate duty of the personal property of the testator, which at the time of his death is in a foreign country, but which after his death is brought into England by his executor. The leading cases are the Attorney General v. Dimond (1) and the Attorney General v. Hope (2), the latter a decision of the House of Lords. These decisions were based upon the limited extent of the powers of the Ordinary, who never granted

(1) 1 Cr. and J. 356.
(2) 1 Cr. M. and B. 550.
probate except for goods which were within his jurisdiction at the time of the testator's death. In cases of intestacy the Ordinary had originally the right to dispose in pios usus of goods left by the deceased within the diocese; in cases of wills, the Ordinary could only grant probate in respect of such goods, and when the deceased left bona notabilia within some other diocese than that in which he died, the will must have been proved, not before the Ordinary, but before the Metropolitan of the province—Williams, pp. 237, 340. This limited jurisdiction of the Spiritual Courts was transferred to the Court of Probate by the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and to the Probate Division of the High Court by the Judicature Act.

In another part of Williams on Executors the author says: "All personal property follows the person, and the rights of a person instituted in England representative of a party deceased, domiciled in England, are not limited to the personal property in England, but extend to such property wherever locally situate"—Spratt v. Harris (1). Again, "for the purpose of suing in an English Court, a probate obtained in the proper Court here extends to all the personal property of the deceased wherever situate at the time of his death, whether in Great Britain or the colonies, or in any country abroad"—Whyte v. Rose (2). "It must not be understood, however, that where a testator dies domiciled in England, leaving assets abroad, the grant of probate here can extend to them. For the probate was never granted, except for goods which at the time of the death were within the jurisdiction of the Ordinary who made the grant. Though if it should become necessary that the Courts of the foreign country where the assets were situate should grant probate or administration for the purpose of giving a legal right to recover and deal with them, such Courts, by the comity of nations, would probably follow the decision of the Court of Probate in this country, as being the country of the domicile." Again, "the Courts of the country where the deceased was domiciled will administer the property wherever situate; but if, in the course of the administration, it becomes necessary to take legal proceedings to reduce the estate into possession, the representative constituted by the Court of the domicile will have to clothe himself with a title from the Court where the property is locally situate; by the comity of nations, however, the foreign Court will, as a matter of course, grant probate ancillary to that granted by the Courts of the domicile"—Williams, pp. 300, 302. Mr. Macpherson also cited the Attorney General v. Pratt (3); Laidlay v. The Lord Advocate (4), In the goods of Murray (5) and Stern v. The Queen (6) as showing that the principle of the Attorney General v. Dimond and the Attorney General v. Hope is still recognised as law in England.

The latest case on the subject is Attorney General v. Lord Sudeley (7) in which the majority of the Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, but in which all the Judges in both Courts agreed that no property was liable to probate duty which at the time of the death of the owner was not situate in England. In the Attorney General v. Pratt the question was whether probate duty was payable upon the amount of bills of exchange payable six months after sight drawn by a bank in India upon a bank in London.

in favour of the testator's English bankers, and which, at the time of the testator's death, were on the high seas on their way to England. It was held by all the Court that the bills represented, but did not constitute, the assets, which were the funds in the hands of the drawees in London, and that these, being at the time of the decease within the jurisdiction, were liable to probate duty. It was further held by Kelly, C. B., that if the bills themselves constituted the assets, they, not being at the time of the decease within any other jurisdiction, and being on their way to England, must be regarded as forming part of the assets in England subject to probate duty. It is to be observed that the funds in that case, like the Rs. 61,000 received in Bombay after the testator's death in this case, were in the hands of bankers, who presumably would not have given them up to the executor, except on production of the probate. It was not suggested, however, that this was a material circumstance. It was assumed that the time to be looked to was the date of the testator's death, and that if at that time the funds had been outside the jurisdiction they would not have become liable to probate duty merely because, when subsequently within the jurisdiction, the English probate was made available for their recovery.

In Laidlay v. The Lord Advocate, as pointed out in Williams on Executors (p. 542, note), it seems to have been implied, especially by Lord Macnaghten, that "the question in each case would seem to be whether an English or a foreign probate is necessary to enable the personal representatives to recover the property on which the duty is claimed." Lord Herschell said (p. 489): "The character of the asset and its local situation cannot be affected by circumstances arising out of a transaction subsequent to the death. The question is, where was the asset situate at the time of the death?" In Attorney General v. Lord Sudeley, the Master of the Rolls said (p. 360): "It is not every asset [147] of the estate that is to be valued for duty, but only such of the assets of the estate as were at the date of the death of the testator locally within the jurisdiction of the authority which grants the probate. This authority was formerly the Ordinary, and is now the Court of Probate. The distinction between assets of the estate which are liable to probate duty, and assets of the estate which are not liable to probate duty, though both are assets of the estate, is laid down, and the reasons are given for it in 1831 by Lord Lyndhurst, C. B. in Attorney General v. Dimond. The distinction depends upon the locality of the asset at the time of the testator's death. If the locality is outside the jurisdiction, the asset is called a foreign asset and is not liable." Mr. Macpherson also referred by way of analogy to ss. 1, 2 (2), and 20 of the Finance Act, 1894, by which probate duty was superseded by estate duty, but under which, as recently pointed out in the Law Quarterly Review (April, 1896, p. 106) the liability of property to estate duty will often depend upon the principles established by the Attorney General v. Dimond and the cases following it: see in particular s. 8 of the Act.

There are two recent colonial cases decided by the Privy Council which are important as showing that these principles are not peculiar to the English Court of Probate, but are of general application. In Blackwood v. The Queen (1) the question was whether under a Victorian Act providing in very general terms for the payment of probate duty on "the personal estate of or to which the deceased was at the time of his death possessed or entitled," personal estate which at that time was outside the colony was liable. It was held by the Privy Council that it was not. Lord Hobhouse said that "the reasons which led English Courts to confine probate duty to the property directly affected by the probate, notwithstanding the sweeping general words of the statutes which imposed it, apply in full force to this case." The Courts placed a limitation on these general expressions "because they thought that the Legislature could not intend to levy a tax on the grant of an instrument in respect of property which that instrument did not affect. Their Lordships think that in imposing a duty of this nature, the Victorian Legislature also was [148] contemplating the property which was under its own hand, and did not intend to levy a tax in respect of property beyond its jurisdiction" (pp. 97 and 98). Again, "the grant of probate does not of its own force carry the power of dealing with goods beyond the jurisdiction of the Court which grants it, though that may be the Court of the testator's domicile. At most, it gives to the executor a generally recognised claim to be appointed by the foreign country or jurisdiction" (p. 92). That decision was followed in Commissioner of Stamps v. Hope (1), a case from New South Wales, where the Supreme Court by its charter was authorised to grant probates limited to property within the colony, and where the Stamp Duty Acts authorised duties to be charged "upon all estates, whether real or personal, which belonged to any testator." It was held, following Blackwood v. The Queen, that the general words "personal estate" must be read as limited to such estate as the grant of probate conferred jurisdiction to administer, and that probate duty was, therefore, not payable on a specialty debt due to the testator, the specialty being at the time of his death outside New South Wales.

This being the principle on which the Courts in England have construed the words "estate and effects for or in respect of which probate shall be granted," in the statutes imposing probate duty, and the principle being, as just shown, of general application, is there any reason why I should not similarly construe the practically identical words of the Court Fees Act? In the first place, if, as is probable, the words of Sch. 1, No. 11, of the Court Fees Act were taken from Stat. 55 Geo. III, c. 164, it seems reasonable to presume that the Legislature when enacting them for India knew and approved of the construction which they had received judicially in England. Is probate granted in India in respect of other property than that in respect of which it is granted in England? The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, limited in the manner I have shown, which in England was transferred first to the Court of Probate and afterwards to the Probate Division of the High Court, was in India conferred upon the Supreme Courts, which, by their charters, were made Courts of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, empowered to administer and execute, [149] within certain limits, and in regard to certain persons, the ecclesiastical law as used and exercised in the diocese of London, so far as local circumstances should admit. See the Charter of the Supreme Court of Bombay, s. 47. By the same provision the power of the Supreme Court to grant probates was expressly confined to the wills of persons leaving effects within the limits of the Court's jurisdiction. The like power and authority as that exercised by the Supreme Court in relation to the granting of probates was given to the High Court by its original and amended Letters Patent. Subject to a few modifications not material to the present case, the probate of the Indian Succession Act is substantially a reproduction of that which the Commissioners who framed the Act found in the English law. The rights and functions of an executor, the limitation of the effect of the probate within a particular local area, the necessity of a foreign probate or grant of administration for recovering assets situate within a foreign jurisdiction, the comity which would generally lead the foreign Court to follow the grant of the Court of domicile,—all this is for the most part the same in India as in England. The inference which I draw is that the "sweeping general words" of Sch. I, No. 11 of the Court Fees Act must be limited in the same manner and for the same reasons as the similar words of the English statutes and the equally general words of the Australian statutes, and that, in India also, "the Legislature was contemplating the property which was under its own hand, and did not intend to levy a tax in respect of property beyond its jurisdiction."

In In the goods of Murch (1) decided by Garth, C. J., in 1879, the circumstances were peculiar. The executrix of a testator dying in England proved his will first there and afterwards in the Calcutta High Court, paying duty in each country on the assets there. Some of the goods obtained in England under the English probate were sent to India. The executrix having died, the Administrator General obtained from the Calcutta Court administration de bonis non of the testator's unadministered effects. The question arose whether the assets in the hands of the Administrator General were liable to duty. Those in respect of which [150] the deceased executrix had already paid Indian probate duty were clearly exempted by s. 19c of the Court Fees Act. That section, however, did not apply to the assets obtained from England, as no Indian probate duty had been paid in respect of them; and the taxing officer referred the question to the Court under s. 5 of the Act. It was held by Garth, C. J., that "as the assets in question were within the jurisdiction of this Court at the time of the grant of administration, and the Administrator General could not have obtained possession of them otherwise than by virtue of the grant, they are clearly liable to the ad valorem duty." Upon this several observations arise. In the first place, it was apparently admitted that the Indian probate duty paid by the deceased executrix was rightly limited to the assets in India at the time of the testator's death. It was expressly admitted by the taxing officer, and apparently not doubted by the Court, that the assets subsequently brought from England to India would not have been liable to Indian probate duty in the hands of the executrix, as they were obtained by her, not under the Indian, but under the English probate. If without obtaining probate in England she had contrived to obtain the English assets and send them to India, I suppose that the same conclusion would still hold good, and that the Indian probate would not be considered as granted in respect of them. All this is fully in keeping with the authorities. I must say, however, with the greatest deference to Garth, C. J., that his decision as to the grant of administration de bonis non to the Administrator General appears to me extremely doubtful. That was a grant to a new representative of the testator, and was governed by the same rules as if it had been an original grant—Succession Act, ss. 229, 230; Coote's Probate Practice, p. 173. I should have thought that if there was one thing established by the authorities, it was that the test of liability to duty is the locality of the assets not at the time of the grant but at the time of the testator's death, and that no change of locality subsequent to that can affect their liability. The second reason on which Garth, C. J.'s judgment is based seems to me equally at variance with the authorities for they establish that the question is not whether the executor or administrator can obtain possession of [151] the assets when brought within the jurisdiction otherwise than by virtue of the grant, but whether, at the time of the testator's death, the grant would itself have affected the assets so as to make the assistance of any foreign authority unnecessary for their recovery.

In the present case I do not think there is any substantial distinction between the Rs. 61,000 which, as the Registrar says, are now lying in Bombay banks awaiting the production of the probate, and the remaining remittances which I understand are expected to be sent from Shanghai to the petitioners direct. In neither case would the Indian probate of its own force have enabled the petitioners, at the time of the testator's death, to obtain the assets, if those in possession had withheld them. The Registrar's opinion that the court fee is payable upon the total assets including those which at the date of the testator's death were at Shanghai, is based upon the words added to s. 244 of the Succession Act by s. 3 of Act VI of 1889. By the latter section an application for probate must state, in addition to other particulars theretofore required, the amount of assets which are likely to come to the petitioners' hands. Mr. Macpherson did not deny, and I do not doubt, that these words include assets likely to come to the petitioners' hands from any quarter, and that in like manner s. 277 requires an executor to exhibit an inventory and account including all assets whatever which have come to his hands. The Advocate General, who, on behalf of Government, supported the Registrar's opinion, relied almost entirely on the words added by Act VI of 1889, and did not contend that, prior to that Act, probate duty was payable upon assets which, at the time of the testator's death, were within a foreign jurisdiction.

Indeed, I understand that the practice in cases where a testator leaves property both in British India and in England has always been to levy probate duty here only upon the Indian assets, and this can only be on the principle established by the English decisions. The Registrar's doubt is whether that principle is applicable where foreign assets, having been brought after the testator's death into British India, are so placed as to be only obtainable by the executor on [152] production of the Indian probate, or where the executor states under s. 244 of the Succession Act that the foreign assets are likely to come to his hands.

With the first point I have already dealt. As to the second, the question is whether this amendment of s. 244 effected and was intended to affect so radical a change in the nature of a grant of probate; whether the probate, which until 1889 was granted in respect of a portion only of the property, was thenceforth granted in respect of all the property stated to be likely to come to the petitioner's hands, notwithstanding s. 242 and the considerations and authorities to which I have referred. I do not think so. I think that s. 3 of Act VI of 1889 was enacted for a very different and much more limited purpose. Section 244 as amended must be read in such a way as to make it consistent with s. 242 and the other sections of the Act. It does not, like s. 38 of Stat. 55 Geo. III, c. 151, say that the statement is required "in order that the proper and full stamp duty may be paid on such probate." If Act VI of 1889 is considered, it will be seen that almost all the fifteen sections amending the Succession Act and the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, to the inventory and accounts which executors and administrators are required to exhibit under Part XXXIV and Chap. VII of these Acts respectively. Under the former law experience showed that, in the absence of any penalties, executors were apt to be careless and inaccurate in furnishing these statements, and hence these provisions were enacted to compel closer attention to their duties in this respect. The object of s. 3 in particular, in requiring the executor to state in his application for probate the amount of assets which were likely to come to his hands, was to furnish a basis for testing the accuracy of the subsequent inventory and accounts. Most of the other sections had a similar object. It follows that the intention of the Legislature in requiring the amount of the assets likely to come to the executor’s hands to be stated was not to make the property in respect of which the probate is granted any thing different from what it had been before the passing of Act VI of 1889. It should be observed that s. 62 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, corresponding with s. 244 of the Succession Act, [153] and s. 246 of the latter Act and s. 64 of the Act of 1881 relating to applications for letters of administration, had always required the amount of assets likely to come to the petitioner’s hands to be stated. If the Registrar’s opinion were correct, the anomalous result would follow that before the passing of Act VI of 1889, the words in sch. I, No. 11 of the Court Fees Act, “the property in respect of which the grant of probate or letters is made,” meant one thing in the case of probates granted under the Succession Act, and another thing in the case of letters of administration granted under that Act and both probates and letters of administration granted under Act V of 1881. I infer that the check upon the accuracy of the subsequent inventory and accounts which the words introduced by s. 3 of Act VI of 1889 provided, was probably omitted from s. 244 of the Succession Act as originally framed through an oversight. I think that the subsequent provision of that check does not affect the applicability to No. 11 of sch. I of the Court Fees Act of the English decisions upon practically identical words in English statutes in pari materia; and that those decisions should, therefore, be applied now as they would have been before 1889.

For these reasons my answer to the reference is that in this case the Court fee is payable not upon the whole Rs. 10,06,892-5-8 which are stated in the petition as likely to come to the petitioners’ hands, but only upon the property valued at Rs. 4,29,415-5-8, which, at the date of the testator’s death, was in British India.

BALKRISHNA SAKHARAM (Original Defendant), Appellant v. MORO KRISHNA DABHOLKAR (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

Landlord and tenant—Co-sharers—Jaghir—Notice to tenant to pay full assessment—Manager acting with the consent of co-sharers—Parties—Suit against tenant by manager alone in his own name—Joinder of all co-sharers necessary—Practice—Procedure.

A co-sharer who is manager cannot, even with the consent of his co-sharers, maintain a suit by himself and in his own name to eject a tenant who has failed to comply with a notice calling on him to pay enhanced rent.

APPEAL from the decision of S. Hammick, District Judge of Ahmednagar, in suit No. 5 of 1898.

The plaintiff, who was the jagirdar of the village of Akolner, and to whom a commission had been issued by Government under s. 88, cl. (a) and (b) (1), of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879), instituted the present suit in the District Court to recover from the defendant Rs. 99, being the balance due to him on account of kamal akar (highest rate of assessment) for the three years preceding the suit.

The defendant disputed the plaintiff's right to demand the highest rate of assessment, and contended (inter alia) that the plaintiff had no right to sue alone, as he had other co-sharers in the jaghir village.

The Judge allowed the claim, holding (inter alia) that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the highest rate of assessment, and [155] that though the plaintiff had other co-owners in the jaghir, he was entitled to sue alone. The following is an extract from the judgment:

"The plaintiff admits that there are other sharers in the jaghir: but he is the holder of a commission issued by Government under s. 88 of Bombay Act V of 1879, and I consider that that commission renders the plaintiff competent to bring the suit to establish the jagirdar's claim to re-settle the revenue of an inferior holder. The same question was similarly decided by Sir W. Wedderburn in suit No. 4 of 1878."

The defendant appealed.

Branson (with Ghanasham N. Nadkarni), for the appellant (defendant).

The plaintiff is not the sole proprietor of the jaghir. There are other co-sharers, and the plaintiff cannot sue alone without their consent or without joining them in the suit—Balaji Bhikaji v. Gopal bin Raghu (2). There is no evidence in the case to show that the plaintiff was manager,

* Appeal No. 40 of 1894.

(1) Section 88, cl. (a) and (b), of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879)—Section 88. It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council at any time to issue a commission to any holder of alienated lands, conferring upon him all or any of the following powers in respect of the lands specified in such commission (namely):

(a) to demand security for the payment of the land revenue or rent due to him, and if the same be not furnished, to take such precautions as the Collector is authorized to take under ss. 141 to 143.

(b) to attach the property of persons making default in the payment of such land revenue or rent as aforesaid.

(2) 2 B. 29.
or that he brought the suit with the consent of the other co-sharers. The mere fact that the powers mentioned in s. 88, cls. (a) and (b), were conferred on the plaintiff would not authorize him to sue alone. The suit must, therefore, fail.

Incarcerity (with Purshotam P. Khare), for the respondent (plaintiff).
— The plaintiff holds a commission issued to him under s. 88 of the Land Revenue Code and the powers mentioned in cls. (a) and (b) of that section have been conferred on him. He is, therefore, entitled under s. 94 (1) of the Code to bring a suit to re-assess the land or re-settle the revenue to be received from any inferior holder. The decision in Balaji Bhikaji v. Gopal bin Raghu (2) is not applicable to the present case.

7th August 1895. Parsons, J.— The District Judge finds that there are sharers in the Jaghir, and that the plaintiff is not the sole owner, but he thinks that plaintiff can bring this suit to [156] recover the highest rate of assessment (kamal akar) because he is the holder of a commission issued by Government under s. 88 of Bombay Act V of 1879. It appears that the plaintiff has had conferred on him the powers specified in cls. (a) and (b) of that section, but we do not see how the conferring of these powers could possibly give him a right to sue alone if otherwise he would have no such right. We think the case must be determined on the principles of law applicable to co-sharers generally and that the plaintiff would have no right to sue alone, unless, perhaps, to use the words of the decision in Balaji Bhikaji Pinge v. Gopal bin Raghu (2), he was acting by consent of all the co-sharers as the manager of the village. The lower Court has omitted to determine this question of fact.

We, therefore, under s. 566 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), refer this issue to the lower Court for it to try and find upon.— “Was the plaintiff acting by consent of all the co-sharers as the manager of the village for the years in suit?”

The Judge should take the evidence offered by the parties, if he considers it necessary to enable him to try the issue properly, and certify his finding to this Court within a month of date of receipt.

The case was accordingly sent back for a finding on the above issue, and upon it the Judge found that the plaintiff was acting by consent of all the co-sharers as the manager of the village for the years in suit.

The appellant (defendant) took the following objections to the finding:

(1) The Judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was the manager for the other co-sharers.

(2) The finding was contrary to the weight of the evidence.

The case then came again before the High Court.

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni, for the appellant (defendant):—We submit that the finding of the Judge does not conclude us at all. We contend that one co-sharer cannot sue even with the consent of the other co-sharers. They must all be made [157] parties. We rely on Balkrishna v. The

(1) Section 94 of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879):

94. Nothing in the last section shall be deemed to prevent a holder of alienated land from instituting a suit in a Court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of establishing his claim to re-assess the lands or settle the revenue of any inferior holder paying less than the full sum to payment of which he deems him to be justly liable, or from levying the sum ascertained to be due in accordance with the decree in any such suit in the manner hereinbefore mentioned.

Municipality of Mahad (1); Kalidas v. Nathu (2); Gan Savant v. Narayan (3); Ramsebuk v. Ramlall (4); Balaji v. Gopal (5); Mayne's Hindu Law, s. 274.

Mahadeo V. Bhat for Purshotam P. Khare, for the respondent (plaintiff):—As the tenants have separately paid rent to each co-sharer, or agreed to do so, they cannot now raise any objection to the suit. As to the rights of co-sharers, if their interests are endangered they can object, but in the present case they have all consented. The Judge has clearly found, on the issue sent down, that the plaintiff was acting as manager with the consent of all the co-sharers. It is not now open to the defendant to raise any objection. The cases relied on simply lay down that one co-sharer cannot sue for his undivided share, but in this case the plaintiff has, as manager, impliedly sued for the shares of all the co-sharers—Arunachala v. Vythialinga (6); Hari v. Mahadu (7); Mayne's Hindu Law, s. 274.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—By the return of the finding of the District Judge on the issue remanded by us on the 7th August, 1895, we are in possession of the facts of the case.

The plaintiff and his co-sharers own the village of Akolner as their jaghir. The defendant cultivates land in that village. Prior to the years in suit he has always paid the jaghirdars something less than the full (kamal) assessment. The plaintiff, however, gave him notice that for the years in suit he would have to pay the full assessment, and has brought the present suit to enforce his demand. The point of law argued before us relates to the power of the plaintiff alone to bring this suit. It is found that he was acting by consent of all the co-sharers as manager of the village for the years in suit.

In the case of Balaji v. Gopal (5) the following remark is made by Westropp, C.J.:—"If any one of several tenants-in-common, joint tenants, or co-parceners, who is not acting by consent of the others as manager of an estate, is to be at liberty to enhance rent or eject tenants at his own peculiar pleasure, there [158] manifestly would be no safety for tenants, and it would be impossible for them to know how to regulate their conduct, or whom to regard as their landlord." In Arunachala v. Vythialinga (6) a somewhat similar remark is made as to a suit by the managing member of a family.

On these remarks it has been argued that the learned Judges thought that a co-sharer who was acting by consent of the others as manager might enhance rent and sue to eject a tenant. The remarks, however, are very guardedly worded, and it is clear that the Judges did not mean to lay down any such rule. In Kattusheki Kanna v. Vallotil Narayan (8) it is held that "unless where, by a special provision of law, co-owners are permitted to sue through some or one of their members, all co-owners must join in a suit to recover their property. Co-owners may agree that their property shall be managed and legal proceedings conducted by some or one of their number, but they cannot invest such person or persons with a competency to sue in his own name on their behalf, or, if sued, to represent them." This decision was followed by this Court in Balkrishna v. The Municipality of Mahad (1). In Hari v. Gokaldas (9) it is said that "it is plain that the right of a plaintiff to assume the character of manager, and to sue in that character, raises a question of fact and law which varies as the other members of the family are minors or adults, whose assent is usually required in important matters, and we think, therefore, that the defendant is always entitled, when the objection is taken at an early stage, to have the other members of the family, when they are known, placed on the record to ensure him against the possibility of the plaintiff’s acting without authority.” To the same effect are the decisions of the Calcutta and Allahabad High Courts. (See Ramdoyal v. Jumunjoy (1), Dwarka Nath Mitter v. Tara Prosunna Roy (2), Kanahiya Lal v. Chandar (3), and Imannuddin v. Liladhar (4).)

We must, therefore, treat it as settled law that a co-sharer who is manager even with the consent of his co-sharers cannot [159] maintain a suit by himself and in his own name to eject a tenant who has failed to comply with a notice calling on him to pay enhanced rent. We must, therefore, reverse the decree of the lower Court and order plaintiff’s suit to be dismissed with costs on him throughout.

FANNYAMMA AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants Nos. 1 and 3), Appellants v. MANJAYA HEERAR AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs Nos. 2, 3 and 4), Respondents.* [14th October, 1895.]

Limitation Act (XV of 1877), sch. II, arts. 118 and 140—Limitation Act (IX of 1871), sch. II, art. 129—Suit by devisees to recover possession of property devised by will—Prayer to declare alleged adoption invalid.

A suit by a devisee to recover possession of immovable property and for a declaration that an alleged adoption (on the strength of which the defendant was in possession) was invalid or never took place not being one merely to obtain a declaration, is governed by art. 140 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). To such a suit art. 118 does not apply, as the prayer for declaration is subservient or auxiliary only to the prayer for possession.

APPEAL from a remand order passed by E. H. Mosseardi, District Judge of Kanara.

The plaintiffs alleged that under the will of one Nagabhata, who died on the 28th July, 1880, they were entitled to his immovable property, all of which was in the possession of the defendants; that on the will being presented for registration in 1880, the first defendant (the widow of Nagabhata) had declared it to be a forgery, and alleged that in 1879 Nagabhata had adopted the third defendant.

The 28th July, 1892, was a Court holiday.

On the 29th July, 1892, the plaintiffs brought this suit to recover possession of the property, and praying for a declaration that the alleged adoption was invalid or never in fact took place.

* Appeal No. 27 of 1895 from order.

(1) 14 C. 791 (794). (2) 17 C. 160 (162). (3) 7 A. 313. (4) 14 A. 524 (527).
Defendants Nos. 1 and 3 pleaded that defendant No. 3 was the adopted son of Nagabhata, having been duly adopted by him in June, 1879, and that the suit was now barred by limitation, Nagabhata having died on the 27th July, 1880.

The Subordinate Judge held the suit barred by limitation, holding that the suit should have been brought within six years under art. 118, sub. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

On appeal by the plaintiffs, the Judge reversed the decree and remanded the case for retrial, holding that the suit was one for possession of immovable property and not simply for a declaration as to the validity of the adoption, and was, therefore, governed by twelve years’ limitation.

Defendants Nos. 1 and 3 appealed.

Shamrous Vivhal, for the appellants (defendants Nos. 1 and 3) :—The suit is clearly barred. Article 118 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) applies. The adoption of defendant No. 3 was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiffs in the year 1880, when the alleged will of Nagabhata was presented for registration. The present suit was brought in 1892. He cited Jagadambo v. Dakhina (1); Mohesh v. Taruck (2); Lachman Lal Chowdhuri v. Kanhaya Lal Mowar (3); Sheikh Sultan v. Sheikh Ajmodin (4).

Narayan G. Chandawarkar, for the respondents (original plaintiffs) :—This is a suit for possession. The prayer for a declaration as to the adoption is merely auxiliary. A series of decisions of the High Courts in India has held that arts. 118 and 119 of the Limitation Act are to be applied where suits are merely for a declaration. Where the relief by declaration is merely ancillary and subservient to the main relief sought, these articles have no application—Padajirav v. Hamrau (5); Kalgavda v. Lingavda (6); Basdeo v. Gopal (7) Revubai v. Nagapa (8).

Judgment.

Parsons, J.—Plaintiffs bring this suit as devisees under the will of one Nagabhata to obtain possession of certain immovable property. They ask also that the adoption and all other conditions (161) of title relied on by the defendants may be set aside and their sole right to the property declared.

For all practical purposes, and apart from any technicalities of pleading, this latter prayer is superfluous. It is enough that plaintiffs suing for possession should sue on their own title, leaving the defendants to establish their counter title if they can. It is not necessary to their suit for possession that they should obtain a declaration that the adoption alleged by the defendants did not take place or is invalid. As observed in Abdul v. Kirparan (9), the declaration is subservient or auxiliary only. We must, therefore, treat the suit as one brought to obtain possession of immovable property.

The defendants plead that the will relied on by plaintiffs is a forgery, that the defendant No. 3 is the owner of the property, having been adopted by Nagabhata, and that the suit is time barred.

The following facts only need be stated:—The will under which plaintiffs claim, is said to have been executed on the 24th July, 1880.

Nagabbatta died on the 27th or 28th July, 1880. The present suit was brought on the 29th July, 1892. Defendant No. 3 alleges that he was adopted by Nagabbatta in June, 1879. The parties respectively knew of their rival claims in 1880.

On these facts it is argued that the suit is time-barred under art. 118 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877), because, although it asks for a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid or never in fact took place, it has not been brought within six years from the date when the alleged adoption became known to the plaintiffs. It is, however, a complete answer to this argument to say that the suit is not one merely to obtain a declaration, but that it is one to obtain possession of immovable property by a devisee for which art. 140 allows twelve years' time. To such a suit art. 118 would not apply. That article applies only to declaratory suits, the sole object of which is to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid or never in fact took place. Suits for possession of property to which another limitation law is applicable are governed by that law even though [162] the validity of an adoption may arise and may have to be determined.

No doubt this was not so under the Act of 1871 as interpreted by the Privy Council in the case of Jagadamba v. Dakhina (1), but the wording of art. 118 in the Act of 1877 is different, and we must construe that article according to the express rulings of the Courts here—Basdeo v. Gopal (2); Nathu Singh v. Gulab Singh (3); Lala Parbhoo Lal v. J. Myln (4); Paddajirav v. Ramraj (5); Kalgojinda v. Lingavida (6); Revubai v. Nagapa (7).

It is idle now to speculate whether from certain expressions used in the cases of Moshok v. Taruck (8) and Shekh Sultan v. Shekh Ajmodin (9) the Privy Council will not decide that the Act of 1877 is to be constructed in the same way as they constructed the Act of 1871. It is sufficient to say that they have not as yet so decided. In the present case either party within six years from 1880 could have sued for a declaration that the claim set up by the other party was bad and his own title good. Neither did so. Both waited on, and now at the very verge of the twelve years the plaintiffs have brought their suit. The principle, therefore, in Jagadambas' case hardly applies, for it was open to the defendants to have forced on the settlement of the dispute within a moderate period.

For the reason that this suit is not one for a declaration to which art. 118 applies, but one for possession to which the twelve years' rule applies, we confirm the order with costs.

CANDY, J.—Plaintiffs say that Nagabbatta died on 28th July, 1880, having by his will, dated 24th July, 1880, devised his property to plaintiffs. When the will was presented for registration shortly after Nagabbatta's death, plaintiffs were opposed by defendants, who contended that defendant No. 3 had been adopted by Nagabbatta in 1879.

Since then the parties have been at arm's length. Defendants have been in possession on the strength of the alleged adoption [163]. On 29th July, 1892, (the 28th July being a Court holiday), the plaintiffs brought this suit, praying that the alleged adoption be set aside and for possession of the immovable property devised to them by the will.

It is clear that they cannot succeed in their suit unless they succeed in proving that the alleged adoption is invalid, or never in fact took place.

But they claim, as devisees suing for possession of immovable property, to be allowed twelve years' limitation under art. 140 of Act XV of 1877, from the time when their estate fell into possession, i.e., the death of the testator Nagabhata.

The Subordinate Judge, relying on certain remarks of the Privy Council in Mohesh v. Taruck (1), held that plaintiffs were bound to have sued within six years from 1880 under art. 118 of Act XV of 1877.

On appeal the District Judge set aside this decision, holding that until there is a formal decision of the Bombay High Court or the Privy Council to the contrary, the case of Basdeo v. Gopal (2) must be held to be the best authority regarding the interpretation of the present law, and that claims which involve the determination of the validity or fact of an adoption are not barred by arts. 118, 119 of the schedule of Act XV of 1877, unless they are simply suits for a declaration of the validity or existence or otherwise of a former adoption.

The decision of the Privy Council in the leading case of Jagadamba v. Dakhina (3) was given in April, 1886, with reference to art. 129 of Act IX of 1871. After showing that the expression in that article 'set aside an adoption' is and had been for many years applied, in the ordinary language of Indian lawyers, to proceedings which bring the validity of an alleged adoption under question, and applied quite indiscriminately to suits for possession of land and to suits of a declaratory nature, their Lordships proceeded, p. 94: "It is worth observing that in the Limitation Act of 1877, which superseded the Act now [184] under discussion, the language is changed. Article 128 (sic mistake for 118) of the Act of 1877, which corresponds to art. 129 of the Act of 1871, so far as regards setting aside adoptions, speaks of a suit 'to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid or never in fact took place,' and assigns a different starting point to the time that is to run against it. Whether the alteration of language denotes a change of policy, or how much change of law it effects, are questions not now before their Lordships. Nor do they think that any guidance in the construction of the earlier Act is to be gained from the later one, except that we may fairly infer that the Legislature considered the expression 'suit to set aside an adoption' to be one of a loose kind, and that more precision was desirable."

"If, then, the expression is not such as to denote solely, or even to denote accurately, a suit confined to a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid in law or never took place in fact, is there anything in the scope or structure of the Act to prevent us from giving to it the ordinary sense in which it is used, though it may be loosely, by professional men? The plaintiffs' counsel were asked, but were not able to suggest any principle on which suits involving the issue of adoption or no adoption must, if of a merely declaratory nature, be brought within twelve years from the adoption, while yet the very same issue is left open for twelve years after the death of the adopting widow, it may be fifty years more, if only it is mixed up with a suit for the possession of the same property. It seems to their Lordships that the more rational and probable principle to ascribe to an Act whose language admits of it, is the principle of allowing only a moderate time within which such delicate and intricate questions as those involved in adoptions shall be brought into dispute, so that it shall strike alike at all suits in which the plaintiff cannot possibly succeed without displacing an apparent adoption by virtue of which the defendant is in possession.”

In August, 1886, in Ganga Sahai v. Lekhraj Singh (1) Mr. Justice Mahmood (at p. 257) referred to the very recent ruling of the Privy Council in Jagadamba v. Dakhina (2), holding that the ruling was wholly inapplicable to the case before him, both on account of the facts, and also because their Lordships had themselves pointed out the change of law effected by art. 118 of the Limitation Act of 1877. (Their Lordships said: “Whether the alteration of language denotes a change of policy, or how much change of law it effects, are questions not now before their Lordships”.

In August, 1888, in Padajirav v. Ramrav (3) Sir Charles Sargent, C.J., and Mr. Justice Nanabhai Haridas remarked at p. 165: “Before leaving this part of the case we think it will be useful to notice the view pressed upon us in argument by defendant’s counsel, that art. 119 of the Act of 1877 was the article applicable to the case, and that taken in connection with the ruling in Jagadamba Chowdhriani v. Dakhina Mohun (2) the plaintiff’s suit, although one to recover the land, was barred six years after plaintiff came of age. That case, however, was decided under art. 129 of the Act of 1871, and was held by the Allahabad High Court, and we think rightly, to have no application to ss. 118 and 119 of the Act of 1877, which are confined in terms to suits for a declaration—Ganga Sahai v. Lekhraj Singh (1).”

In 1889 in Kalgava v. Lingava (4) Sargent, C. J., and myself held that art. 144 of Act XV of 1877 applied to the case before us, which was a suit brought by an alleged adopted son to recover the property of his deceased adoptive father. We relied on the cases of Padajirav v. Ramrav (3) above noted and Basdeo v. Gopal (5). This last was a case in August, 1886, in which Oldfield and Tyrrell, J.J., went fully into the question. They said (p. 645): “The Privy Council decision in Jagadamba Chowdhriani v. Dakhina Mohun (2) has no application. That decision dealt with the limitation in art. 129 of the old Act, IX of 1871, which referred to suits to set aside an adoption, and their Lordships held that the terms ‘to set aside an adoption’ referred to and included suits which bring the validity of an adoption into question, and applied indiscriminately to suits to have an adoption declared invalid and for possession of land, when the validity of an alleged adoption is brought into question.

[166] “But that decision had peculiar reference to the terms in which art. 129 was framed. The present law of limitation has made an alteration. It contains no such article as 129. On the other hand, we have arts. 118 and 119, the former for suits to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid or never took place, and the latter to obtain a declaration that an adoption is valid; and the period of limitation is reduced to six years, and the time from which it will run is altered, and the Act provides separately for suits for possession of property by art. 141.

“TThere is no ambiguity about art. 118 as there was about art. 129 of the old law, and it can be held only to refer to suits purely for a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid, or never, in fact, took place; and where the suit is for possession of property, to which another limitation law is applicable, it will be governed by it, although the question of validity of adoption may arise. As already observed, it is discretionary in a Court to grant relief by declaration of a right, and consequently the fact that a person has not sued for a declaration should not be a bar to a suit for possession of property on any ground of limitation prescribed for the former.

"It is observable that, in the case we have referred to, their Lordships of the Privy Council remarked upon the difference between the language of art. 129 of Act IX of 1871, which they designate as being of a loose kind, and the precise terms of arts. 118 and 119 of Act XV of 1877, which we have described above."

In February, 1892, in Revubai v. Nagapa (1), Sargent, C.J., and Birdwood, J., said: "We think it right to remark that both Courts were wrong in regarding the suit as one only for a declaration of the validity of the plaintiff's adoption. The plaint sought further relief by the plaintiff being put into possession of the property, and such a declaration would be merely ancillary to that relief. The question for determination would, therefore, be—whether defendant No. 1 has been in adverse possession for twelve years before the suit was brought."

[167] In December, 1892, Lord Shand delivered the judgment of the Privy Council in Mohesh Narain v. Tarack Nath Moitra (2). It was held that the suit, having been brought to recover possession on the ground that the defendant’s adoption was invalid, was a suit to "set aside an adoption" within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1871, and the suit being thus barred long before the Act of 1877 came into force, the plaintiff must fail. At p. 37 Lord Shand said:

"It was suggested that the Act of 1871 having been superseded by the Act of 1877, the question of limitation should be determined with reference to the provisions of the later statute, in which the language used is somewhat different, the suit there referred to, as necessary to save the limitation, being described as one "to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid, or never, in fact, took place." It seems to be more than doubtful whether, if these were the words of the statute applicable to the case, the plaintiff would thereby take any advantage."

It is on these last words that the argument for the present appellants is founded. In the case just quoted, their Lordships were satisfied that the defence of limitation had been clearly established on the ground of the long unchallenged adoption of the principal defendant, notwithstanding his assertion of the status and right of an adopted son, and his enjoyment, with the complete knowledge of the plaintiff, of the advantages which that status gave him. Plaintiff's allegation was that the adoptive mother of the principal defendant had been in possession of the property till her death in 1884, and that consequently until that event occurred no cause of action for possession arose. But their Lordships held that as the plaintiff's claim (for a declaration of his right, and that possession might be given to him of the properties in dispute) obviously involved the setting aside of the defendant's adoption, the suit was barred under art. 129 of Act IX of 1871, which provided the limitation of twelve years for suits "to set aside or establish an adoption" from "the date of the adoption or (at the option of the plaintiff) the date of the death of the adoptive father, and their Lordships thought it [168] more than doubtful whether plaintiff would have taken any advantage, even if the words of the statute of 1871 had been (as in the Act of 1877) "to obtain a declaration that an alleged adoption is invalid, or never, in fact, took place." And such indeed must have been the case, when the fact is regarded that defendant was adopted in 1851 by his adoptive mother on the alleged authority of an annumati patra given by her husband, who died in 1850. What advantage could plaintiff have gained by the change in language? He said that the annumati patra gave a life-estate to the widow: but the High Court found as a fact that the defendant and his adoptive mother had been in actual possession, and the Privy Council held that defendant had enjoyed, with the complete knowledge of the plaintiff, the advantages which the status of adopted son gave him.

(2) 20 I.A. 30.

An examination of the case thus shows that the remark of their Lordships is no foundation for upsetting the current of decisions which are founded on the difference of languages in art. 129 of the Limitation Act, 1871, and in art. 118 of the Limitation Act, 1877. This Court has, after due deliberation, adopted the reasoning of Oldfield and Tyrrell, JJ., in Basdeo v. Gopal (1); and we should not now be justified in departing from that reasoning without the distinct authority of the Privy Council.

Mr. Shamraw, for appellants, referred to the judgment of the Privy Council in Lachman Lal v. Kanhaia Lal (2), but there is nothing in that judgment which really bears on the point at issue.

It appears that recently (February, 1895) in the Allahabad High Court, Edge, C. J., and Banerji, J., reiterated the conclusions arrived at in Basdeo v. Gopal (1), pointing out that the same conclusions were to be found in another Allahabad case—Ghandharop Singh v. Lachman Singh (3), in a Bombay case (the one quoted above), and also in a Calcutta case, Lala Parbhoo Lal v. J. Mylne (4).

It may further be remarked that Edge, C. J., and Banerji, J., in February, 1895, did not consider it necessary to refer to the remark in the Privy Council judgment in Mohesh Narain v. Taruck Nath Moitra (5).

[169] No doubt there is one passage in the earlier judgment of the Privy Council (Jagadamba Chowdhrani v. Dakhina Mohun (6) which must raise some doubts as to whether the present law works equitably. I refer especially to the passage:—"The plaintiffs' counsel were asked, but were not able, to suggest any principle on which suits involving the issue of adoption or no adoption must, if of a merely declaratory nature, be brought within twelve years from the adoption, while yet the very same issue is left open for twelve years after the death of the adopting widow, it may be fifty years more, if only it is mixed up with a suit for the possession of the same property. It seems to their Lordships that the more rational and probable principle to ascribe to an Act whose language admits of it, is the principle of allowing only a moderate time within which such delicate and intricate questions as those involved in adoptions shall be brought into dispute, so that it shall strike alike at all suits in which the plaintiff cannot possibly succeed without displacing an apparent adoption by virtue of which the defendant is in possession."

In the present case the parties were at arm's length in 1880. Then was the time for the delicate and intricate question involved in defendant's adoption to be brought into dispute. It may be said that it was always open to defendant—the alleged adopted son— to file a suit to obtain a declaration that his adoption was valid any time within six years from the date when plaintiffs put forward the alleged will of Nagabhatas and denied defendant's alleged adoption. But for defendant it may fairly be asked, why should he have been driven into the Court as plaintiff? He was in possession; what need was there for him to take action? As the law is at present interpreted, if the declaration as to the validity or invalidity of an alleged adoption is only ancillary to the claim for possession, the suit may possibly be brought more than sixty years after the alleged adoption. Take the present case: suppose that Nagabhata had devised the estates to A., for life, and then to the plaintiffs. That would have been a legal devise, A., and the plaintiffs being alive at testator's death. The plaintiffs' estate would not fall into possession till A.'s death. That might take place fifty years after Nagabhata's death, and thus plaintiffs after more than sixty years might maintain that the alleged adoption was invalid or never took place.

But we have to administer the law as it is. We have held that in such a case as the present, art. 118 of the Limitation Act does not apply. Under these circumstances I agree that we must confirm the order of the District Judge with costs.

MOTILAL LALUBHAI (Original Defendant), Appellant v. RATILAL MAHIPUTRAM (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [14th October, 1895.]

Hindu Law—Mayukha—Widow—Widow's power to dispose of moveables bequeathed to her by her husband.

Held, that a widow in Gujarat under the law of Mayukha had power to bequeath moveable property taken by her under the will of her husband which gave her express power of free disposition.

Gadadhar v. Chandraharyabai (1), distinguished.

Per RANADE, J.—There is a threefold distinction between the moveable and immovable property, between title by bequest and a title by inheritance, and a distinction between the Mayukha and Mitakshara, which must be borne in mind before the rights of a widow in Gujarat, claiming under a will which gave her express powers of free disposition over the residue of moveable property, are negatived solely on the authority of the Full Bench decision quoted above. If Rewa Bai had made no disposition herself, the moveable property, in respect of which freedom of disposition had been allowed her, would have gone to the reversioner as her husband's heir.

CROSS appeals from the decision of Rao Bashadur Lalshankar Umiasbshankar, First Class Subordinate Judge of Ahmedabad, in suit No. 82 of 1893.

The plaintiff sued as the reversionary heir of one Girjashankar Govindram in the hands of the defendant. Girjashankar died in 1880, leaving three houses and considerable moveable property. His wife Bai Rewa and two daughters Muli and Pasi survived him.

By his will he gave house No. 3 to his daughters who were to be the owners thereof, and to take possession after his death.

[171] As to houses Nos. 1 and 2, the will directed them “to be given to my daughters Muli and Pasi, now alive, and to any third daughter I may hereafter have—to all these daughters or to such of them as may then (te vela) be alive. My wife Rewa shall herself live in these buildings during her lifetime and take care of them, and after her death my said daughters are to take the said buildings. After the death of my wife my daughters are my heirs. I give these houses to them by way of inheritance.”

The residue of his moveable property the testator gave to his wife with full discretion to deal with it in any way she might think proper.

The daughters Muli and Pasi predeceased Rewa, leaving no issue.
Rewa died on 25th January, 1893, leaving a will, dated December, 1892, whereby she bequeathed the whole of the property in her possession to the defendant, who was the husband of her predeceased daughter Muli.

On Rewa’s death the present suit was filed by the plaintiff, who was the nearest kinsman and reversionary heir of Girjashankar to recover his property from the defendant.

Defendant pleaded that he was entitled to the property both under the will of Rewa and of Girjashankar.

The Subordinate Judge held that Rewa had no power to dispose of the property by will, and passed a decree for the plaintiff, awarding him possession of the property with the exception of a house which he found to be part of the stridhan of Bai Muli.

Both parties appealed to the High Court.

Ganpat Sadashiv Rao appeared for the defendant (appellant).

Branson (with him Chitnis, Motilal and Malvi), for plaintiff (respondent).

JUDGMENT.

Their Lordships (JARDINE and RANADE, JJ.) held, on the terms of the will,

(1) That Muli and Pasi became the owners of house No. 3 on Girjashankar’s death.

(2) That Girjashankar’s will omitted to provide for the devolution of houses Nos. 1 and 2 in the event of all the daughters dying before Rewa, who had only a life-estate in them, and that on Rewa’s death there was an intestacy as to these houses, and they passed to the plaintiff as reversionary heir.

[172] (3) As to the moveables, the Court held that Rewa took an absolute estate in the residue, and that she could dispose of it by will.

The following is an extract from Ranade, J.’s judgment with reference to Rewa’s power to dispose of the moveable estate.

RANADE, J.—* * * The next point relates to the moveable property.
The lower Court has held that Bai Rewa’s power to dispose by will of the moveable property given to her by her husband’s will was as restricted as her power to dispose of immoveable property, and it has accordingly awarded plaintiff’s claim in regard to the whole of this large property, excepting a kandi of Rs. 500, some small silver ornaments, and old clothes, grain and sundry articles of small value. I am disposed to think that the decision of the lower Court on this point is not correct. It did not apparently consider the very detailed provisions of Girjashankar's will, more especially paras. 10, 11 and 12 of cl. 11. These paragraphs permit full discretion to Bai Rewa after carrying out the testator's wishes to make use of the residue in such manner as she might think proper for religious and charitable purposes, to make donations, and provide for the maintenance of her daughters and for other purposes. I do not attach much importance to the word \textit{vagaire} in this place. There is similar freedom allowed to her about the ornaments valued at Rs. 500, and pots, &c., to give away such of them as she might think proper. The moveable property is stated to be worth Rs. 14,000 in all, out of which the testator directed Rs. 800 to be spent on his funeral, Rs. 500 on Pasti's marriage, Rs. 1,200 for gifts to the daughters, Rs. 4,200 in charities, and Rs. 425 with ring and \textit{kandi} in gifts to other relations. This leaves property worth Rs. 7,000 at the complete disposal of Bai Rewa.

It appears to me that the testator intended to place no restrictions upon the disposal of the moveable property that might remain with Bai Rewa, after she had carried out the dispositions in his will, which, as stated above, exhausted only half the moveable estate. This express power in Girjashankar's will would validate Rewa's will so far as it related to the residue of moveable property. When such power of alienation is given, the widow can bequeath even immovable property [173]—Seth Mulchand v. Bai Mancha (1); Koonjbehari Dhir v. Premchand Dutt (2).

The Courts have all along recognised a clear distinction between moveable and immovable property to which a widow succeeds as heir to her separated husband. The authority of Damodar v. Purmanandas (3), which decided that a widow takes absolutely property bequeathed to her by her husband, and may dispose of it by will, has no doubt been shaken by the Full Bench decision in Gadadhar Bhat v. Chandrabhagabai (4), but this last decision referred expressly to the case of property inherited by a widow from her husband, and cannot obviously have been intended to provide for the case of a testamentary bequest with such express powers as those noticed above in the will of Girjashankar. The decision of the Judicial Committee, on which the ruling in Gadadhar Bhat v. Chandrabhagabai (4) was chiefly based, contains words of express reservation. In Mussummat Thakoor Deeyhee v. Rai Baluk Ram (5) it is stated that although a widow, according to the Western schools, might have a power of disposing of moveable property inherited from her husband, all schools are agreed that she has no such power in regard to immovable property, and that immovable, as well as moveable, property, if she has not otherwise disposed of it, passes to the heirs of her husband. The words underlined mark the distinction which takes away the present ease from the operation of the rule laid down in Gadadhar Bhat v. Chandrabhagabai (4).

Moreover, the case of Gadadhar Bhat v. Chandrabhagabai (4) deals with parties subject to the Mitakshara law, while the parties to the present suit are admittedly subject to the authority of Mayukha, which is more favourable to the removal of all restrictions on woman's property. In Damodar v. Purmanandas'(3) the parties were Gujarati traders, residents of Bombay, and that ruling only gave effect to a long course of decisions commencing with Vinayak Anandrao v. Lakshmibai (6), and coming down to very recent times, Bechar Bhagvan v. Bai Lakshmi (1), Mayaram v. Motiram (2), Chandrabhagabai v. Kashinath (3), Lakshmibai v. Ganpat (4), Balvantrai v. Purshotam (5), Tuljaram Morarji v. Bhaisishankar (11), Harital v. Prawaladvad (12). There is thus a threefold distinction, first, between moveable and immovable property, secondly, between title by bequest and a title by inheritance, and thirdly, the distinction between the Mayukha and Mitakshara, which must be borne in mind before the rights of a widow in Gujarat, claiming under a will which gives her express powers of free disposition over the residue of moveable property, are negatived solely on the authority of the Full Bench decision quoted above. If Rewa Bai had made no disposition herself, the moveable property, in respect of which freedom of disposition had been allowed to her, would have gone to the reversioner as her husband's heir under the authority of the rulings noticed above. But as she has disposed of it by her will, the reservation expressly recognised by the Privy Council decisions comes into play, and to that extent the Full Bench decision does not govern the present case.

The Court amends the decree of the Subordinate Judge of the First Class by confirming so much of the decree as awards to the plaintiff as residuary heir of Girjashankar the houses specified in Girjashankar's will, Ex. 91, as houses Nos. 1 and 2, and by reversing so much of the decree as awards to the plaintiff any other of the property claimed. The Court now dismisses the suit except as to the above houses Nos. 1 and 2. As to the suit and Appeal No. 80 of 1894, the plaintiff to get costs throughout on the amount of the claim awarded, and to pay the costs of the defendant throughout on the amount of the claim rejected. Costs of Appeal No. 166 of 1894 on the plaintiff.

Decree amended.

Though in ordinary cases a mortgagee when deprived of his security can only recover his mortgage-money as the damages for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, yet where the mortgage-deed contains a covenant on the part of the mortgagor not to pay off the mortgage for a term of years, the mortgagee is entitled to damages for being deprived of a favourable and long-enduring investment.

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur Gangadhar V. Limaye, First Class Subordinate Judge of Thana.

The defendant's grandfather Davudkhan owned certain khars, viz., Mhaiisbad, Ghat and Chole.

In the year 1833 he mortgaged khar Mhaiisbad with possession to plaintiff's grandfather for Rs. 701.

In the years 1834 and 1839 he mortgaged khars Ghat and Chole to the plaintiff's grandfather for Rs. 500 and Rs. 201 respectively with possession.

After these transactions Davudkhan died, leaving him surviving his widow Mamabibi, his son Ismailkhan and his daughter Khatijabibi (defendant's mother).

On the 15th October, 1844, Ismailkhan sold the equity of redemption in khar Mhaiisbad to the plaintiff's grandfather (the mortgagee) for Rs. 1,601-8-0, which included the amount of the mortgage of 1833. The sale-deed contained the following covenant:

"If with regard to the above share, any of my kinsmen or anybody else raise a quarrel, I will answer for the same and pay whatever loss you may sustain in any manner on account thereof."

[176] Ismailkhan died in the year 1863, leaving his mother Mamabibi, his sister Khatijabibi, and his widow Fattebibi as his heirs.

On the 25th February, 1864, Mamabibi purporting to be the owner executed a further charge on khars Ghat and Chole to the plaintiff's grandfather in consideration of a further sum of Rs. 900 for a period of ninety-nine years. The mortgage-deed provided as follows:—

"I will pay the whole amount, that is, whatever sum may be found due under the terms of the former deed mentioned above, and the khata-baki (balance of account) and Rs. 900 in respect of this deed in the month of Vaishakh after a period of 99, in letters ninety-nine, years from this date, and when I will redeem my property. You are not to ask for the amount, nor am I to pay the same, before the fixed period is over. After the fixed period is over, in the year in which I will pay the amount, I will pay the same at the end of the month of Vaishakh, and then I will redeem my property. If any of my kinsmen, &c., or anybody else puts forth his right or claim in the aforesaid property, I will answer for the same by spending my own money; if you sustain loss in any manner, I will make good the same."

Khatijabibi survived Mamabibi. The present defendant was the son of Khatijabibi, and after the death of his mother and grandmother he brought a suit against the present plaintiff in the year 1887 to recover possession of the three khars on proportionate payment of the original advances made on them. The Court allowed him to redeem and recover possession of $\frac{5}{13}$th share of khar Mhaiisbad and $\frac{175}{312}$th share of khars Ghat and Chole.

The plaintiff thereupon in the year 1891 brought the present suit against him as the representative of his uncle Ismailkhan in respect of Mhaiisbad khar, and as representative of his grandmother Mamabibi in respect of Ghat and Chole khars, to recover Rs. 8,736-4-8 as compensation for loss sustained by him by reason of his being dispossessed of the khars under the decree for redemption obtained by the defendant.
The defendant pleaded that under the decree obtained by him he recovered possession as heir of Mamabibi and Khatijabibi of the portions of the three khrs specified in the decree, and the question of mesne profits was still under investigation; that the claim for damages in respect of khar Mhaibad was not maintainable, because (1) the plaintiff's grandfather had knowledge when he bought the khar from Ismailkhan in 1844 (177) that there were other heirs of Davudkhan in existence, or at any rate it was incumbent on him to make inquiry and ascertain whether or not his vendor Ismailkhan was the sole owner; (2) because Ismailkhan had no authority to alienate the shares of other heirs; and (3) because the transaction was fraudulently effected with the object of defrauding them of their shares. He further contended that the covenant sued on was only personal and was not binding on Ismailkhan's heirs or his co-sharers, and that he was, therefore, not liable to the damages claimed; that the said covenant, assuming it to be a covenant of title, was enforceable only to the extent of Ismailkhan's own share and not as regards the entire khar; that if the Court upheld the plaintiff's right to compensation, then the claims in respect thereof was barred by limitation; that the amount claimed was excessive; that the plaintiff could not recover more than a proportionate share of the purchase-money.

As to khrs Chole and Ghat, the defendant pleaded that plaintiff's ancestor knew at the time of the further charge by Mamabibi that Khatijabibi owned a share in these khrs as heiress to the estates of her father and brother, and he (the plaintiff) could not be allowed to take advantage of the fraudulent act of his ancestor; that the defendant was not liable in damages in respect of the alleged breach of the covenant contained in the mortgage by Mamabibi, because the objections raised to the claim in regard to Mhaibad were also applicable to the claim based on the aforesaid covenant; that the defendant was entitled to a proportionate deduction in respect of compensation received by plaintiff for the portion of land of Mhaibad taken for a public road in or about 1869, &c.

The Subordinate Judge found (inter alia) that the claim was within time; that the plaintiff was aware of all the facts the knowledge of which the defence alleged debarrd him from claiming compensation; that those facts did not stop the plaintiff from enforcing the covenants; that the breach of the covenants sued on being admitted, the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the loss caused to him by reason thereof; that the measure of damages in regard to the sale of Mhaibad khar was a [178] proportionate share of the purchase-money with interest, but in regard to the mortgage-transaction in respect of the other two khrs the plaintiff was not entitled to anything, as he had already recovered an amount in proportion to the area of land lost which yielded him interest in lieu of the profits of that area; and that the damages claimed by the plaintiff with respect to both the transactions were too remote and could not be awarded.

He, therefore, awarded the claim to the extent of Rs. 375-3-4 to be recovered from the estate of Ismailkhan and Mamabibi in the hands of defendant plus interest Rs. 23 7-4, in all Rs. 398-10-8 with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of decree to date of payment or recovery, and rejected the rest of the claim.

The plaintiff appealed.

Incurvariety, with Manekeghag, J. Talevarkhan, for appellant (plaintiff). —In the suit brought by the present defendant, the Court allowed him to redeem and recover possession from us of 5/12th share of khar.
Mhaisbad; we are, therefore, entitled to recover damages on account of the loss of that share. The defendant has been allowed \( \frac{175}{315} \)th share in the other properties; he must, therefore, pay damages on account of that share also.

The question is what is the measure of damages for breaches of the kind in suit. We contend that the measure is what is stated in the covenants, namely, the loss we have sustained. Out of the Mhaisbad khar we have been deprived of 36 acres and some gunthas. There is evidence in the case to show that lands corresponding in quality to the land of the khar fetched in Rs. 100 to Rs. 150 per acre. Some time ago the Collector purchased from us land from Mhaisbad khar for a public road, and he paid us at the rate of Rs. 100 per acre. Calculating the loss that we have sustained at the above rate, the amount of damages would exceed Rs. 4,000.

With respect to the second breach, we claimed Rs. 4,000 in lump. The annual profits of these properties come to Rs. 215, which we used to receive. We have thus lost an annuity of Rs. 215 for seventy-two years. Mamabibi had agreed to pay us the loss that we might suffer at the instance of her kinsmen. Even according [179] to English law we would be entitled to the value of the property at the time of the breach—Rolph v. Crouch (1); Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 894.

Macpherson (Acting Advocate General) with Narayan G. Chandawarkar, for respondent (defendant).—The two transactions must be dealt with separately. The first transaction is the sale of Mhaisbad khar by Ismailkhan. In ascertaining the measure of damages the value of the property at the date of the transaction must be taken into consideration and not that at the date of dispossesssion. The sale was effected in 1844 and the dispossesssion was in November, 1891. Between the two dates there was an enormous increase in the value of the land. With respect to the fixing of the dates to ascertain damages there is a great dearth of English authorities, but the American authorities are numerous. They show that the measure of damages must be taken on the date of the transaction—Mayne on Damages, edition of 1894, p. 312; Jenkins v. Jones (2).

On the date of the mortgage by Mamabibi in 1864 there was a previous charge of Rs. 901. Out of this sum the Court in the previous suit held that Rs. 200 were not a valid charge, and we were directed to redeem Khatija's share in Davudkhan's and Ismailkhan's estate. In Davudkhan's estate her share was \( \frac{7}{22} \), and in that of Ismailkhan's \( \frac{7}{21} \), that is, both shares together come to \( \frac{175}{312} \). We were directed to redeem the two fractions on payment of Rs. 393-3-0. As to the measure of damages with respect to Mamabibi's covenant of ninety-nine years, we contend that the measure of damages is the value of the property on the date of the mortgage—Mayne on Damages, p. 209; Parbuttee v. Misser Chimmun (3); Pitambhar v. Ram Surun (4); Flureau v. Thornhill (5); Lock v. Furze (6); Bain v. Fothergill (7).

Inverarity, in reply.—The cases cited are not applicable. The rule they lay down is applicable to cases of contracts for sale of land. It is an exceptional rule with a limited application—Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, pp. 1077, 1083. There was a [180] covenant in the present

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Thana. The defendant does not dispute his liability to pay damages. The only question is upon what basis the damages are to be estimated.

The question is of interest. The facts are these. The defendant’s grandfather Davudkhana owned a one-fourth share in certain kharas, named Mhaisbad, Ghat and Chole. As nothing turns on his interest in the kharas being fractional, we shall, for the sake of convenience, speak of “the kharas of Davudkhan,” indicating thereby his interest in them.

In 1833, Davudkhan mortgaged khar Mhaisbad to the plaintiff’s ancestor for Rs. 701 with possession.

In 1834 and 1839 he mortgaged kharas Ghat and Chole also to the plaintiff’s ancestor for Rs. 500 and 201 respectively with possession.

Davudkhan died prior to 1844, leaving as his heirs his widow Mamabibi, his daughter Khatijabibi, and his son Ismailkhan, without having redeemed any of the above mortgages.

In 1844, Ismailkhan, purporting to be the owner by a deed of sale bearing date the 15th October in that year, sold Davudkhan’s Mhaisbad khar to the plaintiff’s ancestor for Rs. 1,601.3.0 which included the Rs. 701 secured by mortgage upon it. The deed after reciting the purchase and sale contained the following covenant by Ismailkhan:—“If with regard to the above share any of my kinsmen or any body else raise a quarrel I will answer for the same and pay whatever lose you may sustain in any manner on account thereof.”

Ismailkhan died without issue before 1863, leaving his mother Mamabibi and his sister Khatijabibi as his heirs.

On the 25th February, 1864, Mamabibi purporting to be the owner executed a further charge on Davudkhan’s Ghat and Chole kharas in favour of the plaintiff’s ancestor. The deed (Ex. 43) provides that the mortgagee shall continue in possession of the mortgaged premises and carry on the vakwat of the same, paying the outgoings and receiving the income in lieu of interest for ninety-nine years from the date of the deed, at the expiration of which time Mamabibi was to redeem the mortgage and take back the land. The deed provides that the mortgagee is not to ask for the mortgage money, nor is the mortgagor to pay the same until the period fixed by the deed is over, and contains the following covenant:—“If any of my kinsmen, &c., or any body else puts forth his right or claim to the aforesaid property, I (Mamabibi) will answer for the same by spending my own money, and if you sustain loss in any manner, I will make good the same.”

Khatijabibi survived Mamabibi. The defendant Ahmedkhan is the son and heir of Khatijabibi.

In 1887 the defendant Ahmedkhan filed a suit (No. 487 of 1887), to redeem and recover possession from the plaintiff of his share in Davudkhan’s three kharas on payment of a proportionate amount of the original advances. He was allowed to redeem and was awarded possession of 125th of the Mhaisbad khar and 125th of the Ghat and Chole kharas.

(1) D. G. & E. 702
The present suit was then filed by the plaintiff upon the covenants which we have referred to, to recover damages from the defendant Ahmedkhan as the representative of Ismailkhan in respect of the 5th of Mhaibsd khar and as representative of Mamabibi in respect of the 19th of Ghat and Chole khars of which respectively he had been dispossessed. The Subordinate Judge has awarded the plaintiff 35th of the purchase-money (Rs. 900-8-0) which Ismailkhan received for the equity of redemption of Mhaibsd, amounting to Rs. 375-8-0, and interest.

The Subordinate Judge has not awarded to the plaintiff any sum in respect of the 19th of Ghat and Chole khars, as the plaintiff had received in the former suit a proportionate share of the mortgage money originally advanced on those khars. The further damages claimed in each case he has considered to be too remote and has not allowed.

[18] It has been admitted in argument before us that the loss which the plaintiff has sustained in being deprived of 5th of Mhaibsd khar from which he has been ejected is the value of that fraction of the khar. This is so—Jenkins v. Jones (1). The respondent contends that the value of this fractional part is to be estimated as of the date of the purchase from Ismailkhan (15th October, 1844), of which the purchase-money or price paid for it is the prima facie and only test. The appellant, on the other hand, contends that the loss which he has sustained is, and the damages which he is entitled to recover are, the value of that fractional part of the khar at the date of eviction, which he estimates at Rs. 5,421. Whatever that value is, the khar had unquestionably largely increased in value since the date of the sale by Ismailkhan in 1844.

It is stated by Blackburn, J., in Lock v. Furze (2) that the doctrine laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill (3) does not apply to the case of an executed contract, and that is stated in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers to be the law (p. 1083, 6th Ed.). A careful perusal of the judgments in the case of Bain v. Fothergill (4), in which the House of Lords recognised the doctrine of Flureau v. Thornhill and established it on the broadest basis, satisfies us that it was not intended by their Lordships to extend the doctrine to cases of executed contracts to which it had not been previously applied.

In the present case, there is, moreover, an express covenant on the part of the vendor to pay whatever loss the vendee may sustain in any manner on account of a successful claim to the land.

Now in Rolph v. Crouch (5), which was the case of a tenant who was evicted from his holding, the Court gave the tenant compensation against his landlord (in addition to the costs of unsuccessfully defending an action by the evictor) for the value of the lease to the tenant (£10 per annum) and also for the value of a conservatory which he had erected on the land.

So in Bunny v. Hopkinson (6) it was laid down that the measure of damages in the event of eviction includes the amount expended in converting the land to the purpose for which it was sold, and that the purchaser may recover not merely the value of the land, but also the amount spent in the erection of houses subsequent to his conveyance; and in Lock v. Furze the Exchequer Chamber were unanimous in holding that the general rule of law laid down in Robinson v. Harman (7) "so that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the contract had been performed," was applicable to the case of a tenant who is evicted seeking compensation from his landlord. There the Court, adopting the argument of Mellish, Q. C., gave the plaintiff the value of the lease which he had lost, calculated at the date of eviction.

This was also the course taken in Wace v. Bickerton(1). It is, therefore, we think, correct to say that, according to the cases decided under English law, a purchaser or tenant evicted from his holding is entitled to recover the value of the land from which he has been evicted, calculated at the date of eviction, from a vendor or landlord who has guaranteed his title. In Dart (Vendors and Purchasers, p. 894) it is said: "In the latter case" (that of a covenant for quiet enjoyment)" it seems difficult to understand why the full value of the property as existing at the time of the breach of covenant should not be recoverable, especially when the property has been professedly bought for the purpose of being improved by building or otherwise."

A different rule has, however, been laid down in America in several States. In Kent's Commentaries (2) it is thus stated: "The measure of damages in actions in these personal covenants is regulated in some degree by the rule on the ancient warranty. At common law upon voucher or upon the writ of Warrantia Chartee the demandant recovered of the warrantor or heir other lands of equal value with the lands from which the feoffee was evicted. The value was computed as it existed when the warranty was made, so that though the land had afterwards become of increased value by the discovery of a mine or by buildings or otherwise yet the warrantor was not to render value according to the then state of things but as the land was when he made the warranty. And when personal covenants were introduced as a substitute for the remedy on the voucher and warranty the established measure of compensation was not varied or affected. The buyer on the covenant of seisin recovers back the consideration-money and interest and no more. The interest is to countervail the claim for mesne profits to which the grantee is liable and is and ought to be commensurate in point of time with the legal claim to mesne profits. The grantor has no concern with the subsequent rise or fall of the land by accidental circumstances or with the beneficial improvements made by the purchaser who cannot recover any damages either for the improvements or the increased value. This appears to be the general rule in this country."

The Indian cases to which we have been referred—Parbuttee v. Misser Chinnum (3) and Pitamber v. Ram Surun (4)—do not touch the point which we are now considering. In the former, however, the English rule which establishes that it is the value of the thing of which the covenantee has been deprived and not the price which he has paid which affords the measure of damages, is adopted.

Mr. Mayne in his Work on Damages, after referring to the law in New York and several other American States as laid down in the passage from Kent above cited and to the rule in Massachusetts and Connecticut which gives to the evicted owner the value of the land at the time of eviction, states his views of the law thus: "I conceive that the doctrine laid down by Kent, C.J., is clearly the equitable rule where the improvements arise from causes of an entirely collateral nature, such as the growth of a town, the formation of a railway, or the like. The occupier has had all the benefit of this increased value, so long as it lasted, without paying anything for it. Even supposing that he had sold again after the land had risen in value, and been forced to pay back to his purchaser according to that additional value, still be would be only repaying money which he had actually received and no more." "But," he adds, "the same obvious equity seems by no means to exist when the additional value arises from the outlay of the plaintiff's own capital upon the land."

From the above resume of decided cases and opinions of text writers upon this subject it appears that the strictly logical rule, which has been adopted by the English Courts, is to measure the damages by the value of the land at the date of eviction, while the majority of the American Courts, partially by an extended application of the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill (supra), and partially on the grounds of expediency and of a supposed equity, have limited the damages to the price paid or the value of the land at the date of purchase. Kent, C. J., in Staats v. Ten Eyck's Executors(1) says: "Upon the sale of lands the purchaser usually examines the title for himself, and in cases of good faith between the parties (and of such cases only I now speak) the seller discloses his proofs and knowledge of the title. The want of title is, therefore, usually a case of mutual error, and it would be ruinous and oppressive to make the seller respond for any accidental or extraordinary rise in the value of the land. Still more burdensome would the rule seem to be if that rise was owing to the taste, fortune or luxury of the purchaser. No man could venture to sell an acre of ground to a wealthy purchaser without the hazard of absolute ruin."

We think that it is not open to us to reduce the real damages arising from the breach of contract on the part of the defendant by the introduction of considerations of expediency, or by an extension of the principle laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill (supra) to a case not within its purview. The Legislature has not prescribed a different measure of damages in the case of contracts dealing with land from that laid down in the case of contracts relating to commodities. In this case the vendor knew of his defective title (as apparently did also the vendee) and yet chose to enter into an absolute covenant. It is well known that land fluctuates in value. This may well be presumed to have been known to the vendee. In many cases the supposed rule of expediency would operate with hardship upon the vendee who, relying on the covenant of his vendor, has laid out money in improving the land. We do not speak of buildings erected on the land. They may give rise to different considerations. The equitable principle enacted in [186] s. 61 of the Transfer of Property Act will probably prevent the question from arising. The media via suggested by Mr. Mayne has no authority to support it. It is better for us to tread the beaten path than to search out devious and unexplored ways for relieving vendors from the natural effect of covenants which they are not bound to enter into. We must, therefore, decide that the measure of damages is the value of the land at the date of eviction.

The land of which the plaintiff has been deprived consists of 36 acres and a fraction. There is no reliable evidence of its market value. Witnesses Nos. 20, 21, 23, 24, 37, 38, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 56, 57, 58 and 59 value the land at from Rs. 80 to 125 an acre: Rs. 100 is about the mean of the values given. The Collector awarded Rs. 100 to Rs. 150 for corresponding lands.

(1) 3 Caines, 111 (f).
This is supposed to be Rs. 15 above market value. The estimate of the produce is a fallacious test of the market value, though in many cases it is the only one available. We, therefore, take the value to be Rs. 100 per acre, or Rs. 3,600 in all. Of this sum the plaintiff has received Rs. 292, which leaves Rs. 3,308 still payable.

As to the mortgaged land, it is difficult to arrive at the true damages. In ordinary cases a mortgagee, when deprived of his security, can only recover his mortgage money as the damages for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. That is the true measure of damages, as he is liable to be paid off by his mortgagor at any time. Here the mortgage-deed contains a covenant on the part of the mortgagor not to pay off the mortgage for ninety-nine years.

The proportionate share of principal due under the original mortgage in respect of the \( \frac{175}{312} \)th part of the Ghat and Chole kharas was paid to the plaintiff at the time of the decree in the suit of 1887. In addition the plaintiff is entitled, we think, to damages for being deprived of a favourable and, for many years, permanent investment. Mr. Inverarity calculates that the annual sum which in lieu of interest his client was receiving on that amount was Rs. 215, and he asks us to calculate his damage on the footing of his client being deprived of that annual sum for seventy-two years. In making an estimate of the loss of future profits all circumstances must be taken into account. The profits may diminish. There is no certainty as to price. Though there is a covenant not to redeem for ninety-nine years, it is not certain that the Court would give full effect to it if a redemption suit were brought to test its validity. An extension of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act to the district would at once wipe it out. The Court, in estimating the value of the prospective profits of this mortgage to the plaintiff must value them as a jury would. There is no fixed rule. We fix them at Rs. 1,000.

The Court amends the decree of the lower Court by awarding to the plaintiff Rs. 4,308 instead of Rs. 375-3-4 with interest at 6 per cent. from date of the suit to the date of the payment and costs in proportion throughout.

Decree amended.

* Second Appeal, No. 499 of 1894.
† Section 33 of the District Municipal Act (Bombay Act VI of 1873):—

33. Clause 1.—Before beginning to erect any building, or to alter externally or add to any existing building, the person intending so to build, alter or add, shall give to the position without having obtained fresh permission; if such part of his building as is outside the limits for which permission has been granted is built without notice, the Municipality can in their discretion order it to be demolished.

[R., 27 B. 231; 2 Bom. L.R. 573.]

[188] SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Surat, in appeal No. 75 of 1892.

Plaintiff gave notice to the Municipality of Surat that he intended to erect a new building on certain land belonging to him in the city of Surat.

On receipt of the notice the Municipality sent their officer to inspect the land. The plaintiff pointed out to him the ground on which he wished to build, and produced his sanad, which specified the limits of his holding. The officer measured the area indicated, and finding that it 4alled with that shown in the sketch plan at the foot of the sanad, reported to the Municipality accordingly.

The Municipality, upon this report, issued the necessary permission, authorizing the plaintiff to build on the ground for which he held the sanad.

Plaintiff then built, not only on the land so specified, but also on two plots north and south of that land, outside the area for which the Municipality had given permission. The Municipality thereupon gave him a notice under s. 33, cl. (3) of the District Municipal Act (Bombay Act VI of 1873) ordering him, within fifteen days, to remove the building from the land on which he had encroached.

Plaintiff then filed this suit against the Municipality to have it declared that the notice was illegal, and for an injunction restraining the Municipality from demolishing his building.

The Municipality pleaded that the land in suit was not comprised in the area on which plaintiff had obtained permission to build, that he had exceeded the limits given in the said permission, and that they were justified in ordering the removal of the building erected by the plaintiff in excess of the permission.

[189] The First Class Subordinate Judge at Surat found that the plaintiff had exceeded the limits of his permission, and that the order of the Municipality was legal. He, therefore, dismissed the suit with costs.

On appeal the District Judge of Surat confirmed the decree of the lower Court with costs.

Plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Kalabhai Lalubhai (with him C. H. Setalvad) for appellants:

The notice issued by the Municipality under s. 33 of the District Municipality notice thereof in writing, and shall furnish to them, if required to do so, a plan showing the levels at which the foundation and lowest floor of such building are proposed to be laid by reference to some level known to the Municipality, and all information they may require regarding the limits, design, and materials of the proposed building and the intended situation and construction of the drains, sewers, privies, and cesspools (if any) to be used in connection therewith.

Clause 2.—Within one month after receiving such notice the Municipality may, writing, issue such orders not inconsistent with this Act as they think proper with reference to such building. If the Municipality fail to issue written orders, whether of approval or otherwise, with reference to such building within the said period, the person originally giving notice may proceed to erect the building in question in the manner proposed by him to the Municipality, provided that such building be in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

Clause 3.—If such building be begun or made without the notice or without affording the information above prescribed, or in any manner contrary to the legal orders of the Municipality issued within the period aforesaid, or in any other respect contrary to the provisions of this Act, the person so building shall be liable to the penalty hereinafter provided, and the Municipality may, by written notice, require such building to be altered or demolished, as they may deem necessary.
Municipal Act not only speaks of building without permission, or in excess of the permission granted, but also speaks of encroachment. Treating the notice as one relating to an encroachment, the Municipality has not complied with the requirements of the Act. Treating it as one under the latter part of s. 33, the Municipality had nothing whatever to do with the sanad, or the title to the property. If we produced the sanad, that ought not to make our position worse than it would have been if we had not produced the sanad at all. A sanad is no evidence of the actual area of land; even if it were, the Municipality had no power to define the limits within which the building was to be erected on our own land. The main question is, whether the Municipality can order a building to be demolished so far as it exceeds the permission granted. The words in s. 33 of the Act are: "alter or demolish as the Municipality shall deem necessary." The word 'necessary' in this clause means necessary for the purposes of the Act—Lewis v. Weston-super-mare Local Board (1). The mere fact that a building is erected without the permission of the Municipality does not render it liable to demolition. It only renders the owner liable to a fine or to a criminal prosecution. If a building is objectionable on grounds of sanitation, or for other valid reasons, and if it is built without permission, I admit that it would be liable to demolition. No such valid reason is shown in the present case. I, therefore, submit that the order for the demolition of the building is illegal.

Rao Saheb Vasudev J. Kirtikar, Government Pleader, for the Municipality:—The question is whether plaintiff could build [190] without a previous notice to the Municipality. Section 33 makes such notice imperative. Here the permission given to the plaintiff to build was on the land specified in his notice; while it is admitted that he subsequently built beyond that area. This he had no right to do. The superstructure on the excess land having been unauthorized, the Municipality had a right to compel its removal or demolish it themselves. See Dave Harishankar v. The Town Municipality of Umreth (2).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—This case raises an important question of municipal law. The appellant under s. 33 of the Bombay District Municipal Act gave notice to the defendants that he intended to build on his land, and stated that he had a sanad (Ex. No. 51) under the City Survey Act for that land. In this sanad the limits and tenure of the appellant's holding were specified by plan and description (s. 10 of Bombay Act IV of 1868). The defendants sent their daroga to inspect the premises, and the appellant pointed out to him the land on which he intended to build, and showed him his sanad. The daroga measured the land so pointed out, and found that it agreed in area with that specified in the sanad, and reported so to the defendants. The defendants then gave the appellant permission to build on the land specified in his sanad.

The appellant, however, built, not only on the land so specified, but also on land outside it on the northern and southern sides. The defendants thereupon, under cl. 3 of s. 33 of the Act, gave him a notice to demolish so much of the building as was erected on land beyond the limits specified in his sanad. Hence the cause of action arose.

It has been argued before us by Mr. Kalabhai for the appellant that the issuing of this notice is illegal, because (1) the defendants had no right

(1) 40 Ch. D. 55.
(2) 19 B. 27.
to define the limits within which the appellant should build on his own land; (2) building in excess of the permission granted will not justify the issue of a notice to demolish the excess; (3) a notice of demolition is only justified where the building violates some rule of sanitation and cannot be altered so as to be made to conform to that rule; (4) the notice of demolition in this case was not necessary and is purely a work of destruction. It seems to me that most of the argument is beyond the scope of the present case.

It may be that so long as an applicant conformed to the orders of a Municipality passed with reference to an intended building, the latter could not prevent his building on the whole of his land, but as to this see some remarks in Nagar Valab Narsi v. The Municipality of Dandhuka (1). At the same time it is, I think, clear that an applicant having asked for and obtained permission to build on a specified portion of his land would not be justified to use that permission to erect a building on another portion of his land. That is the case here. Appellant asked for permission to build on the land specified in his sanad. That was the information he gave to the defendants regarding the limits of the proposed building. The defendants accepted that information and gave him permission to build within those limits. If the appellant wished to build outside those limits, a fresh notice would be required to be given. By not giving this notice, and by building without notice on the land outside the limits for which notice had been given, the appellant built without notice, and he became, therefore, liable to the consequences prescribed in cl. 3 of s. 33.

In this view of the case it is immaterial to inquire whether the land so built on was the appellant's own land or not, or whether the defendants could have prevented the plaintiff building on it after he had given notice. Building in excess of the permission granted, that is to say, on land other than that for which notice has been given, seems to me to be simply building without notice so far as the excess land is concerned.

I cannot accept the argument that a notice of demolition is not justified where a building, erected without notice, otherwise conforms to the orders of the Municipality as to materials, drains, sewers, &c., or can be altered so as to be made to conform to them. It may be that where a building is otherwise unobjectionable the Municipality might allow it to remain even if built without notice, but the power of deciding this question is in the first instance at any rate given to the Municipality, and a Civil Court would not interfere with their rightful exercise of this power. In the present case the defendants have deemed the demolition necessary, and have taken action accordingly. I cannot hold that they are not perfectly within their legal rights in so doing. I may point out to the appellant that he has been throughout in the wrong. Having given definite information as to the limits of his intended building he had no right to overstep those limits. When he purposed to extend those limits he should have done what he can still do, namely, give a fresh notice specifying the limits he wishes to build upon.

With regard to the further point taken that no notice at all was necessary since the appellant merely built on his old foundations, both the lower Courts have found that this is not the case, and no point of law is involved in it. We confirm the decree with costs.

(1) 12 B. 490.
CANDY, J.—Plaintiff gave notice to the Municipality of his intention to erect a new building, and he volunteered the information regarding the limits of this new building by stating that it would be constructed on the land covered by his CitySurvey sanad, which specifies the limits of his holding. On the Municipal officer taking measurements in the presence of the plaintiff and finding that the limits pointed out by plaintiff corresponded with the limits specified in the sanad, the Municipality did not think it necessary to require any further information, and accordingly issued the necessary permission.

Plaintiff then built on the land above described. He also built on two plots north and south of that land, outside the area for which the Municipality had given permission.

The Municipality then gave him a notice under s. 33, cl. (3), of the District Municipal Act, ordering him, within fifteen days, to remove the building from the land on which he had encroached. This is the notice of which plaintiff complains, and he brought this suit to have it declared illegal.

It is evident that the notice is inaccurate so far as it speaks of encroachment on public land. But this may be taken as surplusage. The plan annexed to the notice, and the clear allegation in the face of the notice that it purported to be issued under s. 33, cl. (3), of the Act, are sufficient indications that plaintiff was required to alter his building, by demolishing so much as had been erected on the plots A and B, which were outside the area for which the Municipality had given permission to build, because he had offended against the provisions of s. 33 of the Act.

There is no doubt that so much of the building had been erected without notice. Whether it was erected on plaintiff's own land or not, it was erected without notice. It is no answer to say that no notice was necessary, because during the hearing of the case some old foundations were found on digging the land adjacent to the house in dispute and under the land of the street. That was not the reason on which plaintiff based his claim when he filed his suit. Mr. Kalabhai argued that building without permission and building in excess of permission are quite distinct. But it is evident that so much of the building as is in excess of the limits for which the permission was given is really a building constructed without permission, that is, it was made without the notice prescribed. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the plaintiff was liable to the penalty provided in s. 74 (1) of the Act.

But then comes the important question: Can the Municipality also in such a case call upon the person so building to pull down the portion built without notice, without in any way establishing the necessity for such an order? Here it is not contended for the Municipality that the situation of the drains, sewers, privies and cesspools (if any) of the excess building is such that they (the Municipality) would have forbidden the erection of the excess building as it now stands, had due notice thereof been given in accordance with cl. (1) of s. 33. The contention of the Municipality apparently is that the mere fact that the plaintiff built a portion of his building without notice is in itself sufficient justification for the Municipality ordering the excess portion to be demolished. It is notorious that in Surat City there is considerable hostility on the part of many of the citizens against the Municipality. If a man can obtain permission to build on land A, and can then proceed to build on land A and B (B being possibly ten times as large as A), and (subject to the penalty of a fine not exceeding Rs. 25 (s. 74, cl. (1)), can defy the Municipality to touch the excess building, until they have discharged the onus of proving that such excess building is contrary to the requirements indicated in cl. 1 of s. 33 of the Act, then in many cases the notice in writing required by cl. 1 of s. 33 will be a farce. The words at the end of cl. 3 of s. 33 are very wide. In addition to the penalty which may be exacted from the person building without notice, "the Municipality may require such building to be altered or demolished as they may deem necessary." The Municipality are to be the judges as to which is necessary. But there is nothing to connect the necessity with the sanitary requirements indicated in cl. 1 of the section.

Mr. Kalabhai referred to the case of Queen-Empress v. Veeramma (1) which was decided with regard to ss. 180, 263 of the District Municipalities Act, 1884, (Madras) corresponding with the sections of the Bombay Act now under consideration. In that case the person intending to build (a lady) made the necessary application for a license, which the Municipality granted, as regards a portion only of the applicant's land, as they required the rest for widening a lane. The building was erected on the whole land, and the builder was convicted of building contrary to the terms of the license. The High Court held that the Magistrate ought to have considered the legality of the order of the Municipality by which they declined to grant the applicant a license to build on her own land, simply because they intended to acquire it for public purposes. Mr. Justice Best said:

"It is clear on a perusal of s. 180 that no power is thereby conferred on the Municipal Council of depriving owners of the legitimate use of their land. The object of the section is no other than to ensure the safety and sanitation of buildings to be newly erected. What the Council has to consider under the section is the plan of the proposed building; and the grounds on which the same can be disapproved are such as are stated in cl. (4)."

The High Court, therefore, held that the original order of the Municipality being bad, no penalty could be enforced on the builder, and no notice could be given to her requiring her to pull down the building. Here the license given by the Municipality was good. Whatever may be the object of s. 33 in requiring written notice of intention to build, with such further information as may be deemed necessary so as to ensure the safety and sanitation of the building to be erected, there is nothing in our Act limiting the power of the Municipality to alter or demolish a building which has been erected without any notice at all. It is not the practice of the Court to interfere with corporate bodies "unless they are manifestly abusing their powers" (Duke of Bedford v. Dawson (2)). The Municipality are not bound to order the alteration or demolition of the building erected without notice. It is a matter entirely for their own discretion: and, unless it is shown that they have been manifestly abusing their powers, the Court cannot interfere. It is possible to conceive a case in which the removal of an infinitesimally small excess building would involve the demolition of a large and expensive structure. I am not prepared to say that there may not be cases in which on the facts it would be clear that the Municipality had acted mala fide and without the exercise of due discretion. But the present suit has not been brought on such allegations; and I think, therefore, that it was rightly dismissed.

MADAR SAHEB AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Appellants v.
SANNABAWA GUJRANSHAH (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*
[16th October, 1895.]

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Lessee’s covenant not to alienate—Alienation contrary to terms of lease—Absence of any clause as to re-entry—Ejection—Forfeiture.

A clause in a lease whereby the lessee covenanted not to alienate, unaccompanied by any clause for re-entry upon breach of the covenant, held to be a covenant merely and not a condition, and a suit for ejection brought by the lessor was dismissed.

One Madar Saheb (defendant No. 1) obtained from the plaintiff a certain piece of land on lease for building purposes and passed to him a rent-note agreeing not to sell or mortgage to any person the building to be erected thereon, and that such sale or mortgage, if made, should be invalid; the document, however, contained no clause giving the plaintiff the right of re-entry upon such alienation being made.

Madar Saheb built a house on the land and sold it to three persons (defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4) in violation of his agreement.

Plaintiff brought this suit against Madar Saheb and his alienees to recover possession of the land, alleging that the terms of the lease had been violated.

The defendants denied that the lease contained any such agreement as was relied on by the plaintiff; they also pleaded that Madar Saheb (defendant No. 1) was a perpetual tenant, paying an annual rent of Rs. 2 to the plaintiff; that defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 were willing to pay that rent; and that the condition, if it did exist, was of a penal character, and as such should be relieved against.

The Assistant Judge of Dharwar dismissed the suit, holding on the issues as follows:—(1) that the defendant No. 1 took the ground as a permanent tenant; (2) that the condition relied upon by the plaintiff was not a penal one, but it was inoperative and, therefore, not binding on the defendant and, therefore, he should be relieved from it; (3) that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover possession of the land. He, therefore, dismissed the suit.

* Second Appeal No. 666 of 1894.
(1) 18 B. 603.
In appeal the District Judge of Dharwar reversed the decision of the Assistant Judge, holding (1) that the defendant No. 1 took the land under the agreement relied on by the plaintiff, and his tenancy was liable to determine on his breach of that agreement; (2) that the condition was not of a penal nature and should not be relieved from; (3) plaintiff was entitled to possession of the site and to the house also on valuation, if not removed by the defendants within three months' time.

[197] Defendants preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Narayan Ganesh Chandavarkar, for the appellants.

The following authorities were cited during the argument.—Narayan
v. Ali Saiba (1); Shaw v. Coffin (2); Crawley v. Price (3); Doe v. Watt (4); Mohana v. Shekh Sadodin (5); Transfer of Property Act, 1882, s. 111;
Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 325; Narayana Sanabhoga v. Narayana Nayak (6); Vyankataya v. Shivrambhat (7); Tamaya v. Timapa Ganpaya (8).

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The question to be decided is whether the promise made by the lessee not to alienate is a covenant merely to which the principle on which Narayan v. Ali Saiba (1) was decided applies, or whether it is a condition which dispenses with express right of re-entry in the event of breach. We treat the clause as a covenant only, following Shaw v.
Coffin (2), which was approved in Crawley v. Price (3) and distinguished from Doe v. Watt (4), where well known words of condition are used. See Coke on Littleton, s. 325.

We must, therefore, hold that a suit for ejectment does not lie, whatever other remedy there may be—Mohana v. Shekh Sadodin (5). We, therefore, reverse the decree of the District Judge and restore the original decree; but order each party to pay his own costs in the appeal.

SECOND APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur N. G. Phadke, Joint First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., of Sholapur.

On 10th June, 1885, two brothers, Bandu and Bapu and their mother, Bhagubai, as guardian of a third brother, Devman, who was a minor, executed a registered deed of sale of certain family property to one Kushaba, the third defendant. There was no question as to Bandu having at that time attained majority. As to Bapu, however, the sale-deed recited that he was twenty-two years of age. Bhagubai had on 30th November, 1877, obtained a certificate of guardianship and administration to the estate of all three sons who were then stated to be fifteen, nine and five.

Kushaba (defendant No. 3) duly obtained possession of the property he had purchased, and he subsequently sold it to Ganesh Lala Pardeshi (defendant No. 4), who purchased it in good faith and for valuable consideration.

In 1891 a suit was brought by Bapu for himself, and as guardian of his brother Devman, to have the sale-deed cancelled and to recover possession of the property. Bhagubai and Bandu were joined as defendants to the suit. The main grounds upon which plaintiffs based their claim were that (1) they were minors at the time of the sale and (2) that the sanction of the District Court had not been obtained to the sale. Bhagubai (defendant No. 1) denied knowledge of the sale. Bandu (defendant No. 2) and Kushaba (defendant No. 3) did not appear.

[199] Defendant No. 4 (Ganesh) contended that Bandu and Bapu had ceased to be minors at the date of the sale, and that they were living together with Devman (plaintiff No. 2) and their mother; and that the sanction of the District Court was not necessary.

The Subordinate Judge of Barsi found that the sale-deed was proved; that when the sale-deed was passed in 1885, Bapu was a minor, seventeen or eighteen years of age, but that as he had fraudulently induced defendant No. 3 to believe him to be twenty-two years old and to act on that belief, he was estopped from avoiding the sale.

As to the second plaintiff Devman, who was admittedly a minor, the Subordinate Judge held that Bhagubai's certificate of guardianship being still in force, Bapu could not sue as guardian of the minor. The Subordinate Judge, therefore, dismissed the suit, but without prejudice to the rights of the minor Devman, plaintiff No. 2.

In appeal by the plaintiffs the Joint First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., of Sholapur awarded plaintiff No. 1's claim. He observed:—

"According to the Indian Majority Act, plaintiff No. 1 was a minor at the time and was under a legal disability rendering him incompetent to enter into a transaction like the sale in dispute, notwithstanding the fact that he had good intelligence and had attained understanding powers. The certificate of administration issued to the defendant No. 1 being still in force, at least as regards plaintiff No. 2, who is still a minor, the plaintiff No. 1 cannot properly and legally represent him. See Atmaram Hari v. Anundibai kom Ganesh (1)."

(1) P. J. (1885), p. 199.
"In this state of things, permission of the District Court was a condition precedent to the validity of the sale to defendant No. 3 according to the Minors Act of 1864."

Against this decision defendant No. 4 preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Mahadev Bhaskar Chauhbal, for the appellant (defendant No. 4).—There is no doubt that plaintiff No. 2 cannot sue by any other person except his certified guardian.

But as regards plaintiff No. 1, he joined in the sale to Kushaba (defendant No. 3) though a minor, representing himself to be twenty-two years old. As a matter of fact it has been found by the District Judge that he was eighteen years of age at the time; but the District Judge holds him to be a minor, because the certificate of his guardianship under Act XX of 1864 had not been cancelled. He relies for this decision on the Indian Majority Act (IX of 1875), s. 3, whereby the age of majority is fixed at twenty-one years. But it is doubtful whether the fact of a guardian having been once appointed is sufficient to bring the case within the first clause of s. 3 of that Act. See Yeknath v. Warubai (1).

Under the Hindu law, Bandu, the eldest son, became the manager of the family on his attaining majority, and ousted the mother, who was a guardian under the certificate, and became thenceforth the guardian of the person and property of plaintiff No. 1. See Act XX of 1864, s. 30; Savage v. Foster (2). The doctrine of estoppel applies to a minor—Wright v. Snowe (3); Kerr on Fraud, 122. Fraud binds infants—Evroy v. Nicholas (4).

Manekshah Jehangirshah, for the respondent (plaintiff No. 1).—The doctrine of estoppel does not apply to a minor; if it did, a minor would be able to enter into a valid contract of sale. Simpson on Infants, p. 42, shows that a minor is not bound by recitals in deeds which he has joined in executing. Section 18 of Act XX of 1864 gives the rule of law on the subject.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The plaintiff No. 1 (Bapu) being at the time seventeen or eighteen years of age, and a ward under Act XX of 1864, and, therefore, a minor by operation of the Indian Majority Act, IX of 1875, s. 3, joined actively in the contract of sale, dated the 10th June, 1885, which contained a statement that his age was twenty-two years. We infer, as did the Subordinate Judge, that this statement induced the defendant No. 3 (Kushaba) to purchase the property. Bapu seeks to have the sale set aside in his favour on the ground of his minority. The Subordinate Judge applied the doctrine of estoppel by fraud, and rejected the claim of Bapu against defendant No. 3 and his vendee (defendant No. 4), as neither of them were put on inquiry as to the age of Bapu. The lower Court of appeal ignored this doctrine, and held that the defendant No. 4 must have been put on inquiry at the time he bought from defendant No. 3.

It has been contended by Mr. Manekshah that the rule of estoppel cannot be applied to a plaintiff asking to rescind a transaction knowingly entered into by him when an infant, even though he may have made statements untrue in fact. The exception of an infant is not made in s. 115 of the Evidence Act, nor suggested in the authoritative decision on the meaning of that section by the Privy Council in Sarat Chunder v. Gopal Chunder (1), nor in Mills v. Fox (2), where the difference between cases depending on estoppel and contract is explained. Proof of fraud on the part of the infant is not essential. Wright v. Snowe (3) shows these propositions, and that the infant could not afterwards, as plaintiff, get the aid of a Court to treat his deed as a nullity when the other party had acted upon it. The cases we have cited govern the present and justify the original decree. The Court reverses the decree of the lower Court of appeal and restores that of the Subordinate Judge. Costs of both appeals on the plaintiff Bapu.

Decree reversed.

MULJI LALA AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. LINGU MAKAJI AND ANOTHER (Defendants).* [14th February, 1896.]

Limitation—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 19.—Acknowledgment—Stamp Act (I of 1879), sch. I, art. 1, and s. 34—Evidence.

An acknowledgment of a debt coming under art. 1, sch. I, of the Stamp Act 1 of 1879 cannot, if unstamped, be given in evidence for any purpose including the purpose of saving limitation.

REFERENCE by C. M. Cursetji, Third Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, under the provisions of s. 617 of the Civil [202] Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) for the opinion of the High Court. The reference was as follows:—

"This suit was filed on the 18th September, 1895, and is for Rs. 102, balance of an account for price of grain sold. The balance is adjusted, written out, and signed in plaintiffs' book by the defendants on the 21st October, 1892. The defendant No. 1 alone appeared. He denied the adjustment and the signing of the account balance acknowledgment. He also pleaded limitation. I have found that the account was adjusted; and the acknowledgment of the balance was signed by the defendants; and on the point of limitation I have found that the claim is barred, as the said acknowledgment on which this suit is brought is not stamped in accordance with law, and is, therefore, inadmissible in evidence.

3. The accounts between the parties stood as follows:—At the beginning of Samvat 1947 (1890-1), the opening balance brought over from the preceding year was Rs. 105. Further supplies debited up to Kartik Sudh 11th, Rs. 7-2-0, whilst the credit side shows payments Rs. 9-2-0. Since Kartik Sudh 11th, Samvat 1947 (November, 1890), the dealings have ceased entirely. On Kartik Sudh 1st, Samvat 1949 (21st October, 1892), balance Rs. 102 is brought forward, the account is adjusted, and the defendants acknowledge the same by signing the balance entry.

4. A true copy of the acknowledgment is annexed and is marked A. The following is a correct translation of the same.

Rs. 102. Kartik Sudh 1st, day of the week Friday. The old account being made up, and all the accounts being considered, Rs. 102 (in letters rupees one hundred and two) in full up to the 21st day of October, 1892. After making up all accounts, this writing is made and given.

The signature of VITHOBA LINGU Rs. 102 (also in letters), all account being made up, dated 21st October 1892, his own hand."

5. This acknowledgment not being stamped, I have held, is not admissible in evidence, and thus this suit must fail, as but for such acknowledgment the claim on the grain account would clearly be time-barred.

6. The plaintiff's vakil, however, contends that this acknowledgment could be received in evidence under s. 19 of the Indian Limitation Act to keep such claim alive, and relies on a recent decision of the Bombay High Court—Fatechand v. Kisan (1).

7. But for this ruling I should have had no hesitation in holding the present claim to be barred. A consideration of this decision, however, has left my mind in considerable doubt, and it is, therefore, with the very utmost diffidence I make this reference, and most respectfully submit that the point decided there deserves to be reconsidered.”

"With these remarks I beg to submit the following question for the opinion of the Honourable the High Court:

"Whether an acknowledgment of a debt requiring to be stamped under the Indian Stamp Act I of 1879, and not duly stamped, is admissible in evidence to save the debt from being barred under the provision of s. 19 of the present Indian Limitation Act?"

C. H. Sethav (amicus curia) for plaintiff argued that the acknowledgment was admissible. He cited Fatechand v. Kisan (1); Venkaji v. Shidramapa (2); Doshambhar v. Nand Kishore (3); Morris v. Dixon (4); Mitra on Limitation, p. 239.

Kazi Kaboruddin (amicus curia) for the defendant. He cited Ranchoddas v. Jeychand (5); Chowksi Himlat V. Chowksi Achuttal (6); Fatechand v. Kisan (1).

JUDGMENT.

[FARRELL, C. J.—We consider that the question submitted to us by this reference is in too general terms. Such questions should be confined to the point of law arising in the particular case before the Court;]

(1) 18 B. 614.  (2) 19 B. 663.  (3) 15 A. 50.
(4) 4 Ad. and B. 845.  (5) 8 B. 405.  (6) 8 B. 194.
but as the form of the entry is given in the reference, and it was not disputed in the Small Causes Court that it was "an acknowledgment" within the meaning of art. 1, sch. I, of the Indian Stamp Act I of 1879, we can, we think, treat the question as confined to acknowledgments falling within the scope of that article. As, however, in the arguments addressed to us by the learned counsel who as amici curiae appeared for the plaintiffs and defendants, respectively, to whom our acknowledgments are due, it was contended for the plaintiffs that the acknowledgment which was sought to be put in evidence in the Small Cause Court might be read as not fulfilling the conditions of the article, we should add that the acknowledgment, in our opinion, fulfils all the requirements of an "acknowledgment of a debt" given in the article.

That being so, we are clearly of opinion that an acknowledgment fulfilling the conditions of art. 1 of the schedule cannot, if unstamped, be given in evidence "for any purpose." The words of s. 34 of Act I of 1879 appear to us to be free from ambiguity, and to prevent an instrument which is chargeable with a one-anna stamp, and which cannot be admitted on payment of a penalty, from being admitted in evidence "for any purpose," including the purpose of saving limitation. The insertion of the italicised words in the later Act after it had been held under the former Act XVIII of 1869, s. 18 (which did not contain them), that the unstamped documents could be admitted in evidence "for a collateral purpose," renders this, we think, free from doubt; and if the decision in Fatechand v. Kisan (1) was intended to decide the contrary, we feel unable to agree with it. We are not, however, satisfied that such is the necessary meaning of that decision. It will be seen from a reference to the facts that the Subordinate Judge who heard the case was of opinion that the acknowledgment there in question was not intended to supply evidence of the debt, while it does not appear what view the District Judge took of the document. The decision of the High Court will, in our view, be in accordance with the provisions of the Stamp Act, if it took the same view of the instrument as the Subordinate Judge. There are doubtless expressions in the judgment which tend to show that the Court went further, but the omission of all reference to s. 34 of the Stamp Act—"no instrument shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose"—leads to the inference that the judgment does not convey the exact meaning of the learned Chief Justice. In each case, the instrument of acknowledgment must be carefully examined in connection with the surrounding circumstances to ascertain whether it has been signed to supply evidence of a debt—Binjaram v. Raj Mohan Roy (2); Bishamber v. Nand Kishore (3). Upon the result the decision as to the admissibility or non-admissibility of the unstamped acknowledgment will depend.

We answer the question proposed to us in the negative.

SARDARMAL JAGONATH (Plaintiff) v. RAO BHADUR ARANVAYAL SABHAPATHY MOODLIAR (Defendant).

C. AGNEW TURNER, OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE, Claimant.
[2nd July, 1896.]

Partnership—Insolvency—Insolvency of one partner—Vesting order—Subsequent decree against insolvent, and attachment of the firm's property in execution—Claim by Official Assignee to set aside attachment—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 278, et seq.—Summons taken out in wrong name—Amendment of summons at hearing—Practice—Procedure—Act of insolvency—Jurisdiction of Insolvent Court—Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 44.

The defendant was the manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of himself and two nephews carrying on a family business in Bombay, Madras and other places. In a suit brought in the High Court of Bombay against him as manager of the said joint family a decree was passed on the 11th April, 1896, which was in terms against the defendant alone. On the same day certain property in Bombay, in which (as found by the Judge) the nephews and the defendant were jointly interested, was attached in execution of the decree. Two days previously, however, viz., on the 9th April, 1896, the defendant had been adjudged an insolvent by the Insolvent Court at [206] Madras under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvency Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21). On the 6th May, 1896, the official assignee took out a summons to have the attachment removed.

Held, that the claim of the official assignee must prevail and the property be released from attachment. As at the time of the claim of the official assignee the defendant's schedule had not been filed, the claim was, therefore, governed by s. 278 and the following sections of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). As at the time of the attachment the defendant's interest in the property had by the vesting order been completely divested from him and vested in the official assignee, the property was in his possession partly on account of the official assignee and partly on account of the solvent partners of his firm; that is, wholly on account of other persons. All his property and all he could honestly dispose of, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of the joint family, had prior to the attachment passed to the official assignee, and, consequently, there was nothing which the decree-holder could attach and sell.

Where subsequently to the insolvency of one of several partners in a firm, a decree is obtained against the firm and property of the firm is attached in execution, such attachment should be removed. By allowing the execution, the solvent partners abandon their right of administrating the joint estate, and in the interest of the joint creditors the decree-holder must be restrained from going on with the execution, and the partnership assets will be applied by the Insolvent Court in paying the joint creditors ratably, the official assignee receiving the insolvent's share of the surplus and the rest being handed over to the solvent partners.

By mistake the summons in this case purported to be taken out by the official assignee of Bombay, omitting to describe him as constituted attorney of the official assignee of Madras.

Held, that the summons might be amended at the hearing by substituting the name of the official assignee of Madras and disposed of on that basis.

It was contended that the creditor's petition in the Madras Insolvent Court disclosed no act of insolvency which could legally justify an adjudication under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvency Act (11 and 12 Vict., c 21), and that the adjudication order was, therefore, made by a Court not competent to make it within the meaning of s. 44 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), and that, consequently, both it and the vesting order were nullities, and the official assignee of Madras had no title to the attached property.

* Suit No. 181 of 1896.
Held, that the order, although it might be erroneous and subject to reversal on appeal, was within the competency of the Madras Insolvent Court.

Held, also, on the evidence, that there was no proof of such collusion between the creditor and the insolvent in obtaining the order of adjudication as would bring that order within s. 44 of the Indian Evidence Act (I. of 1872).

In chambers. Summons obtained by the official assignee calling on the plaintiff to show cause why an attachment levied by him on property of the defendant should not be removed.

[207] The plaintiff filed this suit on the 31st March, 1896, to recover Rs. 7,482 6-2 from the defendant. This suit was a summary suit, and on the 11th April, 1896, the plaintiff obtained a decree for the full amount claimed. On the same day (11th April), the sheriff in execution of the decree attached certain property of the defendant.

In the meantime, however, viz., on the 9th April, 1896, the defendant had been adjudicated insolvent by the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Madras under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvent Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21), and on the 6th May, 1896, the official assignee of Bombay as the agent of the official assignee of Madras took out this summons to have the attachment removed. By mistake the summons omitted to describe the claimant as the constituted attorney of the official assignee of Madras.

Scott (for the plaintiff) showed cause. The plaintiff is entitled to attach the property. He cited Kettillamma v. Kelappan (1); Ex parte Coates; In re Skelton (2); Hari v. Jairam (3); Yate Lee on Bankruptcy, p. 484; Morgan v. Marquis (4); Harvey v. Crickett (5); Kalyanbhai v. Motiram (6).

JUDGMENT.

Strachey, J.—This is a Judge’s summons taken out by Mr. C. A. Turner, the official assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Bombay, and the constituted attorney of the official assignee of the corresponding Court at Madras, calling upon the plaintiffs in suit No. 181 of 1896 to show cause why an attachment levied by them on certain property in execution of their decree in the suit should not be removed. It is in substance a claim under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) to property attached in execution of a decree, on the ground that the property is not liable to such attachment.

The decree was passed on the 11th April, 1896, in favour of the plaintiffs in a summary suit upon hundis, under Chap. XXXIX [208] of the Code. On the same date the plaintiffs applied for execution of the decree by attachment of various properties under ss. 268, 269 and 270, and the properties were accordingly attached by the sheriff. On the 9th April, that is, two days before the decree and attachment, the judgment-debtor was, on the petition of another creditor, adjudged to have committed an act of insolvency, by an order of the Insolvent Court at Madras, and on the same day the usual vesting order was made, vesting all his estate and effects in the official assignee of that Court. On the 15th April, Mr. Turner, acting on behalf of the official assignee of Madras, wrote to the sheriff informing him of the adjudication and vesting order, and requesting him to remove the attachment; and, the request not having been complied with, took out the present summons. The plaintiffs have appeared and shown cause against the summons upon various grounds which I have now to consider.

The first objection raised by Mr. Scott, who appears for them, is that the summons has been taken out by and in the name of a claimant who, as shown by his own affidavit, neither has nor alleges any interest in the property attached and that it should be dismissed on that preliminary ground. In the summons the claimant is described as "Charles Agnew Turner, the Official Assignee of Bombay, residing at Malabar Hill outside the Fort of Bombay." In Mr. Turner's affidavit of the 1st May, 1896, in support of the summons, he states that he is the constituted attorney of John George Kernan, the Official Assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Madras and assignee of the estate and effects of the insolvent defendant. The affidavit further sets forth the adjudication and vesting order of the 9th April, the attachment of the 11th April, the contention that the attachment is void and inoperative as against the said John George Kernan, and the correspondence with the sheriff, and concludes with a prayer for the removal of the attachment. It is thus obvious that the description, in the summons, of Mr. Turner as the claimant is incorrect, the real claimant being Mr. Kernan, for whom Mr. Turner only acts as a constituted attorney, and that Mr. Turner cannot claim the attached property in his own name, as he alleges no interest in it on his own account.

[209] It was suggested that under s. 2 of the Powers of Attorney Act VII of 1882, Mr. Turner, as the attorney of Mr. Kernan, could make this claim on Mr. Kernan's behalf in his own name. That provision is a reproduction of s. 46 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. Even if it could be held to enable the donee of a power of attorney not only to execute instruments in pursuance of the power, but to institute and carry on legal proceedings in his own name, I am disposed to think that it would only apply where the donor authorized the donee to act in his own name, and this has not been shown to be the case here.

The question is whether the summons should be dismissed as taken out by a claimant having no interest in the property attached, or whether the insertion of Mr. Turner's name should be regarded as a misdescription, and the summons amended by substituting the name of Mr. Kernan as the real claimant. Having regard to all the circumstances, I think that the latter course should be adopted. In the first place, the summons itself refers to Mr. Turner's affidavit, which shows that the real claimant of the property is Mr. Kernan, and that Mr. Turner claims only as his attorney. The summons, which is dated the 6th May, was served next day on the plaintiffs' attorneys; on the 8th May a copy of the affidavit was sent to them, and on the 10th June an affidavit in reply was made by one Hajari- mal Chotmal on the plaintiffs' behalf. That affidavit contests the validity of the Madras Court's order of adjudication, and annexed to it is a certified copy of the creditor's petition on which the order was made, and copies of a correspondence between the plaintiffs' attorneys and the Clerk of the Madras Court. This is not, therefore, a case in which there has been or could be any mistake on the part of the plaintiffs or their advisers as to the claim being made by Mr. Turner not in his own right but on behalf of Mr. Kernan. That does not alter the fact that Mr. Turner could not properly make the claim under s. 278 in his own name, but it is a reason for treating the matter as a misdescription which may, without impropriety or risk of injustice, be set right by amendment. In Carter v. Misres Lal (1), a suit to establish the right [210] of a claimant to attached property was brought by Mr. Carter, agent and general attorney of the official assignee of the Calcutta Insolvent Court, in his own name; and, on appeal, the Allahabad High Court, instead of dismissing the suit, remanded it to the Court of first instance with a direction to return the plaint for amendment, and retry all the questions in dispute between the parties. If, as contended by Mr. Scott, the analogy of a suit should be followed, s. 27 of the Civil Procedure Code allows the substitution of the right plaintiff for one in whose name the suit has been wrongly instituted through a bona fide mistake. In the case of a claim under s. 278 there is no provision which prevents me from looking to the substance of the thing and allowing the application or summons to be amended by substituting the name of the real claimant, where I am satisfied that the wrong name has been used through a bona fide mistake, that the other parties have been in no way misled or prejudiced, and that the only result of dismissing the summons would be that a new summons could be taken out in the proper name. I shall, therefore, allow the summons to be amended by substituting the name of John George Kernan, the official assignee of Madras, for that of Charles Agnew Turner, and shall proceed to dispose of the summons on that basis.

The next objection raised by Mr. Scott is more serious. It is that the order of adjudication of the Madras Insolvent Court upon which the vesting order is based was delivered by a Court not competent to deliver it within the meaning of s. 44 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872); that consequently both it and the vesting order are nullities; and that the official assignee of Madras has, therefore, no title to the property of the judgment-debtor which has been attached. This objection is based on the contention that the creditor’s petition in the Madras Court discloses no act of insolvency which could legally justify an adjudication under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvent Act, Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21. The petition purports to be made by a creditor of the judgment-debtor residing in the town of Madras; it alleges a petitioning creditor’s debt and states that the debtor, up to the 31st March 1896, had carried on the business of a cotton merchant in Madras and at Bellary. It also states that, on or about [211] the 31st March, the debtor in consequence of being in pecuniary difficulties, and not being able to meet his debts in the usual course of business, closed his places of business at Bellary and Madras. It further states that, on or about the 1st April, the debtor, with intent to defeat and delay his creditors, left his usual place of abode in Bruspetlah, Bellary. It adds that, in consequence of the debtor having failed in business, the present plaintiffs have filed suit No. 181 of 1896 in this Court, and are about to obtain a decree and issue execution. It does not specify which of the acts of the debtor which it mentions are acts of insolvency, but it prays that he may be adjudged to have committed an act of insolvency, and that the proper order may thereupon be made. The order of adjudication of the 9th April refers to the petition, declares and adjudges that the debtor has committed an act of insolvency, and directs a vesting order to be issued and a schedule to be filed. In pursuance of this order the usual vesting order was issued on the same date. Mr. Scott contends that no act of insolvency within the meaning of s. 9 of the statute is shown upon the face of the petition. He argues that neither the closing of the debtor's places of business at Bellary and Madras in consequence of pecuniary difficulties, nor his departure, with intent to defeat or delay creditors, from Bellary—a place outside the limits of the jurisdiction of the Madras High Court—was an act of insolvency, and that the Madras Insolvent Court was, therefore, not competent under s. 9 of the Insolvent Act to adjudge the judgment-debtor to have committed an act of insolvency.

It appears to me that this argument ignores the distinction between an order which a Court is not competent to pass and an order which, even if erroneous in law or in fact, is within the Court's competency. To sustain an objection that the Madras Insolvent Court's order is a nullity conferring no title to the debtor's estate on the official assignee, it is obviously not sufficient to prove that the order was wrong. To hold otherwise would virtually erect into a Court of appeal from the Insolvent Court, not only this Court, but every Court in which the official assignee might sue or be sued, and would be inconsistent with s. 41 as well as s. 44 of the Evidence Act. What, then, [212] is the test of whether the order of adjudication in this case was not merely wrong, but an order which the Insolvent Court was not competent to make? In Kettilamma _v._ Kelappan (1) it was held that the words "not competent" in s. 44 refer to a Court acting without jurisdiction, and that the decree of a Court in a suit which should have been dismissed as barred by s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure, though wrong, could not be treated as passed by a Court not competent to pass it. In art. 46 of Sir James Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence, the rule of English law corresponding with s. 44 of the Indian Evidence Act is stated to be that whenever a judgment is offered as evidence, the party against whom it is so offered may prove that the Court which gave it had no jurisdiction. The "competency" of a Court and its "jurisdiction" are thus synonymous terms. They mean the right of a Court to adjudicate in a given matter. They do not mean, in a case where that right exists, the coming to a correct conclusion upon any question of law or fact arising in that matter. To determine whether the Madras Insolvent Court was competent in this sense to pass its order of adjudication it is only necessary to ask what was its duty upon receiving the creditor's petition. The Court was the right Court; the petition was presented by a person alleging himself to be a creditor for an amount specified: it stated that the debtor had committed an act of insolvency: and it prayed for an order of adjudication. Upon receiving the petition it was the duty of the Court to decide whether the debtor had committed an act of insolvency within the meaning of the statute, and, if he had, to adjudicate accordingly. This duty included the determination of the question, not only whether the acts alleged had been committed in fact, but also whether they constituted acts of insolvency in law. By its order adjudging the debtor to have committed an act of insolvency, the Madras Insolvent Court decided both questions in the affirmative. If it decided either of them wrongly, how does that affect its right to decide them, in other words, its jurisdiction or competency to pass the order? It cannot have been

incompetent to decide the very questions which s. 9 of the statute required it to decide or competent to decide them only in the negative. [213] Suppose the petition had alleged a departure by the debtor from his usual place of business in the town of Madras with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. That would undoubtedly be an act of insolvency within s. 9. Could the plaintiffs have sought to nullify the order by giving evidence to show that there had been no departure in fact? Could they have given evidence to show that although the debtor had departed from his usual place of business, he had not done so with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, but as Bacon, C. J., put it in Ex parte Coates(1) "to bury his wife or his mother, or to a meet of foxhounds?" To treat competency or jurisdiction as depending upon such questions as these would be to fall into the fallacy pointed out by Richardson, J., in Britain v. Kinnaird(2) of assuming that the fact which the Court had to decide was that which constituted its jurisdiction. In this respect I can see no difference in principle between questions of fact and questions of law. The order of adjudication is a decision that one or more of the acts set forth in the petition, not only were committed, but constituted acts of insolvency. It is not for me to speculate as to what may have been the Insolvent Court's reasons for this decision, or to criticise those reasons. For all I know the petition may have been supplemented by statements, verbal or otherwise, which are not before me, but which satisfied the Insolvent Court that the facts came within the section. Either with or without any supplementary matter, the Court may have construed the statements in the petition as substantially alleging a departure by the debtor from his place of business in Madras as well as Ballary with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. To say that such a construction would be erroneous is altogether irrelevant: the point is that the Court was fully as competent to adopt it as I am to hold that it is wrong. To say that the Court was incompetent to pass its order because the allegations of the petition do not in law justify an adjudication, is like saying that any decree of a Court otherwise competent may be collaterally impeached for want of jurisdiction by showing that the plaint disclosed no cause of action. If such a doctrine were accepted, no judgment would be final, and no title based upon a judgment would be safe. The legal sufficiency of a petition or plaint has never been held to be a test of jurisdiction. The real test is whether the petition raises a question, whether of its own legal sufficiency or otherwise, which the Court has authority to decide. Here the petition raised the question whether the debtor had committed an act of insolvency for which he was liable to be adjudged an insolvent, and the Insolvent Court had authority to decide that question and did decide it. Once recognise that a Court is competent to decide a suit or a petition in insolvency or any other matter, and it follows that it is competent to decide all questions which arise in that matter, whether they are questions of fact or of law, and whether they appear on the face of the plaint or petition or arise subsequently. If it decides them wrongly, its decision may be subject to reversal on appeal or otherwise, but cannot be treated as a nullity. In England an order of adjudication by a Court of Bankruptcy has been held to be conclusive as against third persons of an act of bankruptcy having been committed, and of the jurisdiction of the Court—Revell v. Blake (3); Ex parte Learroyd (4). For these reasons I am of opinion that the Madras Insolvent Court was competent to pass the order of adjudication and the vesting order of the 9th April, and that this objection fails.

Another objection raised by Mr. Scott, and also based on s. 44 of the Evidence Act, is that the order of adjudication was obtained by collusion. This objection is founded on the following facts. By a circular dated the 21st March, 1896, the debtor convened a meeting of his Bombay creditors to induce them to give him time and to consent to a composition. In this circular he stated that most of his Madras creditors had agreed to give him time, that if the Bombay creditors also would agree to do so he would be saved from his difficulties, but that if they refused, the only alternative was a voluntary liquidation. On the 28th and again on the 30th March a meeting was held, but it broke up without result, as the debtor would only consent to an inspection of his books upon conditions which the creditors present rejected. At the first meeting he stated that he had arranged with his Madras and Bellary creditors that they should not "molest" him. The meeting was adjourned from the 30th March to the 8th April. On the 31st March, however, the plaintiff filed the present suit, and the debtor, without waiting for the meeting, left Bombay for Bellary. On the 8th April the adjourned meeting was held, but again no agreement was arrived at, and after the meeting, and on the same day, the debtor's Bombay agent, Narayan Dhondiba, sent the following telegram to the agent at Madras:—"Meeting held. Nothing settled. Inspection books demanded. Delay filing petition dangerous." On the next day, the 9th April, the petitioning creditor filed his petition in the Madras Insolvency Court, and the order of adjudication and the vesting order were made. Upon these facts the question is whether it is proved that the order was obtained by collusion within the meaning of s. 44 of the Evidence Act. I am of opinion that it is not. Whatever may be the fact, it is not proved that the creditor in presenting his petition acted in concert with the debtor or the debtor's agent. There is no evidence whatever of any communication between the creditor and the debtor, or the debtor's agent. Although it may hereafter turn out that Narayan Dhondiba's telegram of the 8th April and the creditor's petition of the 9th April were cause and effect, the more sequence of dates does not prove it. The creditor may have had ample reasons of his own for presenting the petition at that time. According to the petition, the debtor owed him over Rs. 17,000 for money lent in July, 1895. The debtor had, to the knowledge of his Madras creditors, been for some time in difficulties. Upon the materials before me how can I say that between the 31st March and the 9th April the petitioning creditor could not have learned, and did not learn, from sources wholly independent of the debtor, of the filing of the suit, the imminence of a decree and execution, and the commission of an act of insolvency, and that these facts did not induce him to petition on his own account? Even if the petitioning creditor did not act of his own motion, but presented the petition at the instance of the debtor or the debtor's agent, I doubt whether that would constitute collusion, unless there was some arrangement to mislead the Insolvent Court, to induce it by false representations to adjudicate the debtor an insolvent. I am also disposed to think that collusion implies what Latham, J., in [216] Ahmedbboy Hubibboy v. Vullibboy Cusumbboy (1) called "no battle but a sham fight": "an agreement or arrangement that the position of the parties to the action apparently hostile shall be friendly, that the action and judgment which purport to be an attack on, shall in fact be a protection to the defendant, an agreement that the reality shall be different from what is represented"—Girdlestone v. The Brighton Aquarium Company (1). There is no evidence of any such arrangement. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether, if concert between the petitioning creditor and the insolvent had been proved, that concert would have amounted to collusion. I am of opinion that the objections to the order of adjudication and to the official assignee's title fail. I may add that although the order was made on the 9th April, and it is clear from Ex. A to Mr. Turner's affidavit of the 19th June and para. 4 of Gopal Malhar's affidavit of the 24th June, that the plaintiffs' attorneys were informed of it on the 10th April, the plaintiffs have as yet taken no steps, either to move the Insolvency Court to annul it, or to appeal to the Madras High Court as persons aggrieved by it within s. 73 of the statute.

The vesting order having been passed on the 9th April, two days before the plaintiffs' decree, the title of the official assignee took effect, and no property remained in the insolvent which was liable to attachment. It is, however, contended by Mr. Scott that the decree and attachment are binding, not only upon the insolvent, but upon others who are equally interested with him in the attached property, and whose interests in it are not affected by the vesting order. It is said that the suit was brought against the insolvent in a representative capacity as the manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of himself and his two nephews, that it was brought in respect of a family debt, that the attached property forms part of the joint family estate, and that the decree and attachment must, therefore, be held to affect, not only the insolvent's share in the property, but also the shares of the solvent partners—Hari Vithal v. Jairam Vithal (2). It is argued that the effect of the adjudication and vesting order passed against one partner only in the family business was to make the official assignee a tenant in common with the solvent partners, and that all he is entitled to is to sue to have the partnership accounts taken and the share of the insolvent ascertained, while the solvent partners, and not the official assignee, are entitled to wind up the partnership. Mr. Scott contends that, this being so, the official assignee is not entitled to take the partnership property, or to have it released from the attachment.

The plaint shows that, although the insolvent alone was made a defendant to the suit, he was expressly stated to be the manager of a joint Hindu family consisting of himself and his two nephews, and carrying on a family business in Bombay, Ahmednagar, Madras and other places. The relief was claimed against the defendant "who is the manager of the joint family aforesaid." The suit was upon six hundis drawn in favour of the first plaintiff by the defendant's firm in Ahmednagar upon the Bombay firm and dishonoured by non-payment. The decree is in terms passed against the insolvent alone. The application for execution states that enforcement of the decree is sought against the defendant "as manager of the joint family mentioned in the plaint, and his two nephews mentioned in the plaint." In the warrants of attachment issued to the sheriff, the insolvent alone is mentioned. The property attached consists of debts due to the defendant, a promissory note executed in his favour, and a safe, a cupboard, and other office furniture. In his affidavit of the 10th June 1896, the plaintiffs' munim Hajarimal Chotmal states that "the business of A. Sabhapathy Moodliar and Co. was carried on by the defendant on behalf of the joint family consisting of himself and his two nephews, who are joint in food, worship and estate, as declared by the defendant at the first meeting of creditors in answer to certain questions put by Mr. Hiralal, and thus the two nephews, one of whom has attained his majority long ago, are partners and interested in the business. The kundis sued upon were given in respect of the said business. The two nephews have not been adjudicated or sought the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, and are otherwise fit and competent to manage and wind up the affairs of the firm of A. Sabhapathy Moodliar and Co." The only other evidence on the point is in para. 9 of the affidavit of the insolvent's munim Narayan Dhondiba, affirmed on the 19th June, 1896, in which he says: "I know that the defendant lives with his nephews in the same house, but I do not know whether the defendant is joint with them in food or worship or estate. It is untrue, so far as my knowledge goes, that the defendant has or ever had any partners with him in the business he carried on. I say that at Bombay and at every other place where the defendant carried on business, so far as my knowledge goes, he carried it on solely on his own account, and he had no partners anywhere." Thus the munim admits that the insolvent lives with his nephews; he is not in a position to deny that the uncle and nephews are joint as alleged; he cannot positively deny the positive statement of Hajarimal Chotmal that the nephews are partners in the business; and he is wholly silent as to the alleged declaration by the insolvent in answer to Mr. Hiralal's questions at the meeting of creditors. The second paragraph of Narayan Dhondiba's affidavit of the 26th June, 1896, shows that he was or shortly before had been in communication with the insolvent; but no further contradiction of Hajarimal Chotmal's statements, by the insolvent or any one else, is forthcoming. Upon the materials before me, therefore, the probabilities are that the insolvent's nephews are jointly interested with him in the property under attachment.

(1) 4 Ex. D. 112.
(2) 14 B. 597.

Assuming this to be so, does it afford an answer to the claim of the official assignee to have the property released from attachment? As, at the time of the claim, the insolvent's schedule had not been filed, the claim is governed not by s. 49 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, but by s. 278 and the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure—Kashi Prosad v. Miller (1). By the vesting order the official assignee had, at the date of the attachment, the interest in the attached property required by s. 279. However the decree might be enforced, it was passed against the insolvent alone. By s. 280, if the property when attached was not in the possession of the judgment-debtor, or was in his possession not on his own account or as his own property, but on account of or in trust for some other person, or partly on his own account and partly on account of some other person, the Court must release the property from [219] attachment either wholly or in part. As at the time of the attachment the judgment-debtor's interest in the property had, by the vesting order, been completely divested from him and vested in the official assignee, the property was not in his possession either wholly or partly on his own account. It was in his possession partly on account of the official assignee and partly on account of the solvent partners, that is, wholly on account of other persons. If it had not been for the vesting order, the plaintiffs could have attached and sold on account of the family debt for which the suit was brought, not only the interest of the judgment-debtor

(1) 7 A. 752.
but also the interests of the whole joint family of which he was the manager—Hari Vithal v. Jairam Vithal (1); Jankibai v. Mahadev (2); Sheo Pershad Singh v. Sahib Lal (3). I do not see, however, how they can attach and sell those interests in execution of a decree passed against the manager alone at a time when not only his personal interest, but, if the decision in Rangayya Chetti v. Thanikachalla Madati (4) is right, his power as manager to convey the family property in payment of family debts had vested in the official assignee. A judgment-creditor can only attach and sell in execution property which the judgment-debtor could honestly sell—Meghji Hansraj v. Romji Joita (5); Sobhagchand Gulabchand
v. Bhaichand (6); Sorabji v. Govind Ramji (7). Here all the property of the judgment-debtor, and all that he could honestly dispose of, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of the joint family, had, prior to the attachment, passed to the official assignee, and consequently there was nothing which the plaintiffs could attach and sell. It follows that the claim of the official assignee must prevail, and the property must be released from the attachment.

Even if the decree could be regarded as passed against all the partners, and if the attachment had been levied against partnership property in the hands of the solvent partners as well as of the insolvent, I should still come to the same conclusion. The question would then be whether, after a separate adjudication of [220] insolvency against one partner, a joint creditor can attach and sell the firm’s property, or even the shares in it of the solvent partners, as he could no doubt have done before the adjudication.
That question does not appear to have been considered in any Indian case.
In England it has frequently been discussed. By s. 11, sub-s. 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, (Stat. 53 and 54 Vict., c. 71) where the goods of a debtor are taken in execution, and before the sale or completion of the execution, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall on request deliver the goods and any money seized or received in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver, the costs of the execution being, however, a first charge on the goods or money. By sub-s. 2, where the debtor’s goods are sold under an execution in respect of a sum exceeding £ 20, if, within fourteen days from the sale, notice is served on the sheriff of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made against him, the sheriff shall pay the net procceeds of the sale to the official receiver or trustee, who is entitled to retain them as against the execution creditor. In his book on Partnership
(p. 692), Lord Justice Lindley expresses the opinion that these clauses apply as well to cases where one partner is bankrupt, and the same partner is the execution debtor, as to those where all the partners are bankrupt and all are execution debtors, and that they "will also be probably held to apply where one partner only is bankrupt, and the execution is against the firm for a partnership debt, (v) provided that the Court is in a position to ensure a proper distribution of the assets of the firm among the creditors thereof." In a foot-note (v) the Lord Justice adds: "Following the analogy of the old law—see Barker v. Goodair (8) and Dutton v. Morson (9); see, too, Re Wait (10); Anon (11)." The "old law" as stated in those cases and explained in the 1863 edition of Lindley on Partnership (Vol. II, pp. 354-356) is that after a separate adjudication against one partner only, a judgment-creditor of the firm could not have execution against the partnership effects [221] even to the extent of the shares of the solvent partners, and that any property taken in such execution must be given up for rateable distribution among all the creditors of the firm, the joint estate as well as the separate estate being administered, just as if the whole firm had been bankrupt. In the latest case on the subject, Dibb v. Brooke & Sons (1), there had been an execution sale of the partnership goods for a partnership debt, completed before the petition in bankruptcy of one of the partners; and the County Court Judge, considering himself bound by the passage in Lindley on Partnership just quoted, held, on an interpleader issue between the official receiver and the execution creditor, that the former was entitled as against the latter to the net proceeds of the sale in the hands of the sheriff. On appeal this decision was reversed, the Queen’s Bench Division holding that the official receiver had failed to make out his title to the proceeds of the sale. Vaughan Williams, J., dissented from Lord Justice Lindley’s view that s. 11 of the Act of 1890 applied where one partner was bankrupt and the execution was against the firm for a partnership debt, and held that sub-s. 2 applied only where the dep’t or whose goods were seized and the debtor who was bankrupt were the same person, and that the Act could not be so construed that, upon the bankruptcy of one partner, the proceeds of the partnership goods would become vested in the trustee merely because an execution had been put in upon the partnership goods and carried out to the point of sale. It is, however, clear from the judgment that the difference between Lord Justice Lindley and Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams is only a difference as to the construction of s. 11 of the Act of 1890 and as to the application to it of the analogy of the old law: it is not a difference as to the meaning and effect of the old law itself. Speaking of the cases referred to by the Lord Justice, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams says: “All they really decide is this: if before the execution is completed, something happens which makes the property cease to be the property of all the partners, and vests an interest in somebody else—that somebody else being the trustee in the bankruptcy of one of those partners—then the Court of Bankruptcy [222] exercising in this respect the jurisdiction of a Court of equity, will, in the interest of the joint creditors, restrain the execution creditor from going on with his execution, and will take upon itself to order an account to be taken of the joint estate, and then will distribute the proceeds among the joint creditors rateably, and hand over the surplus, if any, to the solvent partner. The decisions in those cases were undoubtedly an interference with the right of a solvent partner; but, as I understand them, an interference which is justified by the facts that an execution has been put in, and that the solvent partner, by allowing that to be done, has abandoned his right of administering the joint estate. There is, however, nothing in those cases to suggest that the Judges who decided them thought that the joint assets vested in the assignee in bankruptcy. There is, therefore, nothing in them to show that the trustee in bankruptcy gets a title to the joint estate in such a case as the present, and there is nothing whatever to show that the 11th section of the Act is, by some analogy to those decisions, to be construed as applying to such a case. You are not entitled to

(1) (1924) 2 Q. B. 395.

construe an Act of Parliament by any analogy of that sort; and if you were entitled so to construe the Act, the analogy would not help you here.

In the present case the adjudication and the vesting order preceded the decree and attachment; in other words, before the execution was completed, or indeed begun, "something happened which made the property cease to be the property of all the partners" and vested the interest of one of them in the official assignee. By allowing the execution to be put in, the solvent partners abandoned their right to administering the joint estate; and in the interest of the joint creditors, the plaintiffs must be restrained from going on with their execution, and the partnership assets applied by the Insolvent Court in paying the joint creditors ratably, the official assignee receiving the insolvent's share of the surplus, and the rest being handed over to the solvent partners. The insolvency is in effect an action and execution for all the creditors—Jokura Bibee v. Sreegopal Misser (1), including not only the separate creditors of the insolvent, but also the joint creditors of the firm—In re Wait. It is, therefore, an execution for the [223] plaintiffs among the rest, and it would be inconsistent with the policy of the insolvency law that they should obtain a further remedy by an independent execution of their own, an advantage not shared by the other creditors. So completely does the bankruptcy of one partner sever the joint rights and interests of the partnership, that even an execution issued against the partnership effects subsequently to the act of bankruptcy, will be invalid and inoperative upon these effects; for the act of bankruptcy overreaches the execution; and it is not competent for the execution creditors to disappoint the arrangements made in bankruptcy for the equal distribution of the effects of the partnership among all the creditors; since it would defeat the just policy of the bankrupt laws."—Story on Partnership (5th Ed.), p. 537. Substituting "the adjudication" for "the act of bankruptcy," these principles appear to me to be equally applicable to this country.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction (s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act IX of 1887) against an order passed by Rao Bahadur Jayasatya Bodhrav Tirmalrao, First Class Subordinate Judge of Belgaum.

Application by the defendant to have the decree passed against him on the 13th April, 1894, set aside on the ground that the summons had not been duly served upon him.

It appeared that on the 3rd April, 1894, the bailiff went to the house of the defendant, but could not find either the defendant or any male upon whom service could be effected; that he was told by the defendant's wife that the defendant had gone to Gokak and would return in two or four days; that thereupon the bailiff had posted "copy of the summons on the outer door of the defendant's house."

The Subordinate Judge held that this was sufficient service, and passed a decree against the defendant ex parte on the 13th April, 1894.

In the following May the defendant having heard of the decree applied to the Subordinate Judge to set it aside under s. 103 of the Civil Procedure Code, but the Subordinate Judge rejected the application.

The defendant applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi, calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the order of the Subordinate Judge should not be set aside.

 Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar appeared for the applicant (defendant) in support of the rule:—The summons was not properly served. The record, if correct, shows that the plaintiff was informed of the place where defendant had gone. There was no report by the bailiff that defendant could not be found, or that attempts had been made to effect service on defendant and that he had evaded it. Under ss. 80 and 82 of the Civil Procedure Code, the Court must be satisfied that the defendant is evading service of [225] the summons—Ruma Ray v. Shridhar Pershad (1); Cohen v. Nursing Dass (2). The fact that the defendant's wife knew that the bailiff came to the house to serve the summons on her husband does not show that the defendant came to know of the suit. A wife cannot be said to be an agent under the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, nor does it contemplate that females should be treated as agents.

There was no appearance for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—We think that in this case the order of the Subordinate Judge exercising Small Cause Court jurisdiction refusing to set aside the decree, was not according to law.

The defendant applied to set aside an ex-parte decree passed against him on the 13th April, 1894, on the ground that the summons had not been duly served. From the affidavit of the serving officer it appeared that he went to the house of the defendant at Hassur on the 3rd April, 1894, and not finding the defendant there, nor any male upon whom service could be made, was told by the defendant’s wife that the defendant had gone to Gokak, a neighbouring village, and would return in a period, according to the bailiff’s statement, of four, and according to that of the plaintiff’s servant, of two days. Thereupon the serving officer posted a copy of the summons on the outer door of the house. The Subordinate Judge treated this as due service. We are of opinion that he was in error in doing so.

The object of the service of a summons in whatever way it may be effected (other than substituted service to which other considerations apply) is that the defendant may be informed of the institution of the suit in due time before the day fixed for the hearing, and when from the return of the serving officer it appears that there is no likelihood that the summons will come to the defendant’s knowledge, in due time, or a probability that it will not so come to his knowledge, it cannot be said that there has been due service. When a defendant is temporarily absent from home and is not represented at his house by an agent or male member of his family, we think that a Judge is not justified in treating a summons affixed to his door as due service. The summons should be again sent to the defendant’s house to be served upon him when the inquiries made show that he is likely to be at home and to be found there. The Civil Procedure Code in the matter of the service of a summons does not take into account the female members of a defendant’s family, and does not rely upon the presumption that they will take steps to inform the defendant of what takes place in his absence.

In the present case it appears from the petition of the defendant that he did not hear of the institution of the suit until after the decree had been passed. That fact was not, however, before the Subordinate Judge. The defendant there relied upon the technical insufficiency of the service of the summons, as we think he was justified in doing. Section 108 provides that if the defendant satisfies the Court that the summons was not duly served, it shall pass an order to set aside the decree. There was no evidence before the Subordinate Judge that the defendant knew of the service of the summons before hearing.

We make the rule absolute, and setting aside the decree, direct the Subordinate Judge to restore the suit to his file and dispose of it on the merits. Costs of this application to be costs in the ease.

Rule made absolute and decree set aside.

PARASHRAM HARLAL (Original Plaintiff), Applicant v. GOVIND GANESH PORGAMUKAR (Original Applicant and Original Defendant), Opponent. [14th November, 1895.]

Mortgage—Equity of redemption—Execution—Attachment of equity of redemption—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 266 and 274—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 60.

The equity of redemption of the mortgagee is immoveable property, and is, as such, liable to be attached and sold in execution of a decree under s. 266 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). Its attachment can be effected under s. 274 of the Code by an order prohibiting the judgment-debtor from dealing with it [227] in any way and all persons from receiving it, such order being proclaimed and notified as therein directed.

Application under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the order of Rao Saheb D. V. Bhat, Subordinate Judge of Sangamner in the Ahmednagar District, in an execution proceeding.

In execution of a money decree against one Balvant Trimbak the plaintiff attached his shop. Thereupon one Govind Ganesh Porgamukar applied for the removal of the attachment on the ground that he was in possession of the shop as mortgagee of Balvant. The Subordinate Judge ordered the attachment to be raised, holding that the shop being in Govind's possession as mortgagee, the equity of redemption could not be sold in execution. In his order the Subordinate Judge observed that though it was the practice of his and other Courts to attach and sell an equity of redemption even when the property mortgaged was in the possession of the mortgagees, the practice was wrong according to s. 280 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The plaintiff applied under the extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi calling on Govind (the mortgagee) to show cause why the order of the Judge should not be set aside.

Daji Abaji Khare appeared for plaintiff in support of the rule.
Ghanasham N. Nadkarmi appeared for the mortgagee to show cause.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an application to set aside an order of the Subordinate Judge raising the attachment on certain immoveable property and (inter alia) upon a shop of the judgment-debtor which was in the possession of Govind Ganesh and another as his mortgagees. The Subordinate Judge raised the attachment upon the ground that an equity of redemption in immoveable property in the possession of a mortgagee is not liable to be attached and sold in execution of a decree. For that proposition he relies upon Kassirav v. Vithaldas (1), though he admits that it has been long the practice of his and other Courts to attach [228] and sell the equity of redemption in mortgaged premises under such circumstances.

* Application No. 146 of 1895 under extraordinary jurisdiction.
(1) 10 B. H. C. R. 100.
The equity of redemption in mortgaged premises is immoveable property. "An equity of redemption has always been considered as an estate in the land, for it may be devised, granted or entailed with remainders, and such entail and remainders may be barred by fine and recovery and, therefore, cannot be considered as a mere right only; but such an estate whereof there may be a seisin. The person, therefore, entitled to the equity of redemption is considered as the owner of the land, and a mortgage in fee is considered as personal assets." Per Hardwicke, L. C., in Casborne v. Scarfe (1) cited in Heath v. Pugh (2); Mahalavu v. Rusaifi (3).

As such it is liable to be attached and sold, falling within the scope of s. 266 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The attachment of such property is effected under s. 274 of the Code by an order prohibiting the judgment-debtor from transferring or charging the attached property in any way and all other persons from receiving the same from him by purchase, gift, or otherwise, such order being proclaimed and notified as there directed. The property to be attached should, however, be not the mortgaged property itself, but the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, or as it is called in s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act the right of the mortgagor to redeem the mortgaged premises. This is not vested in the mortgagee, nor does he hold it in trust for the mortgagor. When the right to redeem only is attached, the mortgagee cannot come in and ask to have attachment raised under s. 280 of the Code. It is otherwise when the property itself is attached, as it was in the case of Kassirav v. Vithaldas (4) referred to by the Subordinate Judge.

In the present case it was clearly the intention of the attaching creditor to attach, not the property itself, but the equity of redemption of the judgment-debtor therein, though that intention has not been expressed in the most apt way.

[229] We make the rule absolute, and set aside the order raising the attachment of the shop, and direct that it continue upon the equity of redemption of the judgment-debtor, or the right of the judgment-debtor to redeem the mortgaged premises. The application being in part only successful, the parties will bear their own costs in it.

Rule made absolute and order set aside.

KASHI AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. SADASHIV SAKHARAM SHET AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.*

Ejection—Parties to suit—Right of action—Defendant.

If the plaintiff, in an ejection suit, can make out a legal title to the land, he is entitled to maintain a suit against the person in actual juridical possession of such land for its recovery without making the person under whom the latter claims to hold a party to the suit.

* Second Appeal No. 89 of 1893.

(2) 6 Q. B. D. 339 (1889).
(3) 18 B. 739 (745).
(4) 10 B. H. C. R. 100.
So where plaintiffs based their title to the land in dispute on a lease granted by Government giving occupancy right to their predecessor in title, and sued the defendants in ejectment, and the defendants claimed to hold the land under an occupancy title conferred on them by Government subsequent to the plaintiffs' lease, it was held that though Government might have properly been made a party so as to bind it by the decree and prevent future litigation, it was not a necessary party to the suit.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Babadur Kashinath B. Marathe, First Class Subordinate Judge of Ratnagiri with appellate powers, reversing the decree of Rao Sabeb N. B. Bramhe, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Malvan.

Suit in ejectment. The plaintiffs sued to recover possession of certain sheri or Crown land, alleging that their predecessor had obtained it from Government in 1845, and that from him it had devolved on them.

The defendants claimed to hold the land under an order made in 1885 by the Revenue Commissioner, who had given them possession. They contended that the plaintiffs' cause of action, if any, lay against Government, and not against them.

The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the land, that they had a right to sue the defendants, and that neither Government nor the Revenue Commissioner was a necessary party to the suit. He, therefore, allowed the claim.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge held that the suit was defective owing to the plaintiffs' omission to join Government as a party, and he passed the following order:

"If the plaintiffs elect, within three months from this date, to withdraw the present suit and present it to the proper Court after joining the Government or the Commissioner or the Secretary of State as a party, they have this Court's permission to do so. The suit will otherwise stand rejected."

The following is an extract from his judgment:

"Now, the most important question is who is the principal offender in the matter, the Government or the defendants? The defendants might have earnestly pressed their request to be put into possession of the land; but they are not guilty of any direct trespass on the land. They have come in as tenants of Government (see Ex. 82) rather than as trespassers. I think the Government are principally responsible for the trespass, if any, as much as they, by their officers, drove out their previous tenant and put in a new one. The Government, as landlord, have broken their agreement, express or implied, with their former tenant, and have entered into a new agreement with the defendants as new tenants. The new tenants occupy the land under the title of Government as landlord and under no independent title as against the former tenant (plaintiff). The defendants have incurred no independent responsibility towards the plaintiffs. Even if the Government officers' orders should be illegal, the responsibility of Government towards their former tenant cannot disappear, and Government are a necessary party to the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs' pleader argues that the Government have, by their Resolution (Ex. 117), declared their inability to restore the land to the plaintiffs and admit a claim for compensation. The plaintiffs do not wish to trouble the Government with a suit for recovery of possession of the land. When they deem it fit, they would sue the Government in damages only. Their present claim for recovery of possession should be allowed as against the defendants only, who are in possession, but if the defendants have not come into possession by any independent act of theirs, there is no cause of action as against them alone. At best, the defendants and Government have jointly entered on the land, and they must be ousted by a decree of the Civil Court. The Government, as superior holders and recipients of rent from the defendants, are in direct possession of the land, and the plaintiffs can never completely succeed in getting back their possession, unless and until the plaintiffs obtain a decree against Government declaring the latter incompetent to lease the land to any person other than the plaintiffs during the fresh lease for thirty years. For as soon as the defendants are ejected by a decree of Court against them only, the Government might put in a third person and disappoint the plaintiffs. The Civil Court should, therefore, never give an inadequate and infructuous relief to the plaintiff. The Civil Court is [231] bound to join all persons interested in the subject matter of a suit. The plaintiffs’ suit is, of course, defective for want of parties, and it cannot proceed.”

Inverarity with Manekshah J. Taleyar, for the appellants (plaintiffs):—The Government was not a necessary party. We have a legal title to the land and have a right to establish it against the defendants who are in possession. The defendants who have been put in possession by Government may call on the Court to make Government a party, or Government may apply to be made a party, but so far as we are concerned, we have got nothing to do with Government. We want to establish our title against the defendants. If the Court had joined Government as a party at the instance of the defendants, future litigation, if any, might have been prevented, but the non-joinder of Government cannot affect us—Dicey on Parties to Actions, pp. 430, 494.

Branson with Narayan G. Chandavarkar, for respondents (defendants):—We claim under Government, and until Government is brought on the record, the question as to title cannot be fully determined. Government is, therefore, a necessary party, and as the plaintiffs omitted to join them, the suit was properly dismissed—Mahomed Israil v. Wise (1); Krishno Lall v. Bhurub Chunder (2); H. H. Canon v. Bissonath (3). Government is considered to be a necessary party to such suits in Bengal.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The order made by the First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., in this case cannot, in our opinion, be supported.

The plaintiffs, alleging that the land in suit was their land by right of ownership, brought the present action to eject the defendants from, and to recover possession of it. They base their title to the land on what they allege to be a lease granted by Government, giving occupancy rights to one Ramji, from whom they claim that it has devolved upon them.

The suit in its frame is a simple action of ejectment to recover the land from the defendants, who are admittedly in possession of it, and, if the plaintiffs’ case is correct, wrongfully in such possession. [232] That being the nature of the plaintiffs’ claim, prima facie, the defendants are the proper defendants to the suit.

The defendants on their part also claim to hold the land under an occupancy title conferred on them by Government subsequent to the plaintiffs' lease; but, if the plaintiffs' case is correct, Government having already alienated the land to the plaintiffs' predecessor-in-title by granting him an occupancy lease, could not (unless Government had the right to, and did, resume it, which is one of the questions in the case) afterwards grant it to the defendants.

The Court of first instance deeming that the plaintiffs had made out a good title as occupants of the land, passed a decree in the plaintiffs' favour. The appellate Court, without adjudicating upon the merits of the appeal, passed the following order:—"If the plaintiffs elect, within three months from this date, to withdraw the present suit and present it to the proper Court after joining the Government, or the Commissioner, or the Secretary of State as a party, they have this Court's permission to do so. The suit will otherwise stand rejected. The costs throughout in both Courts up to date shall be borne by the plaintiff-respondents."

That order was based upon the ground that as it was the action of the Commissioner by which the plaintiffs were deprived of the land, the cause of action of the plaintiffs was primarily against Government, as Government was the principal offender, and that the defendants had incurred no independent responsibility towards the plaintiffs. This, however, is a misconception of the nature of a suit in ejectment. The owner of land is entitled to maintain a suit for its recovery from the person in possession without regard to the question how he (the owner) has been deprived of possession or how the present possessor has obtained it. The cause of action is the wrongful retention of the land by the defendants from its owners.

In appeal before us it has been argued for the respondents that the cases of Mahomed Israil v. Wise (1), Krishno Lall v. Bhyrub Chunder (2) and H. H. Cannon v. Bissonath (3) show that Government [233] is a necessary party to the suit, and that as the plaintiffs have not made Government a party to it, or withdrawn the suit, it now properly stands dismissed. For the appellants, on the other hand, it is argued that though Government might have properly been made a party so as to bind it by the decree and prevent future litigation, Government is not a necessary party to the suit, and that all the questions involved in it can, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, be decided in the absence of the Government; and that the order of the appellate Court, which is in effect an order dismissing the suit for want of parties, is erroneous.

We are of opinion that the appellants' contention on this point is correct. We consider that if the plaintiff in an ejectment suit can make out a legal title to land, he is entitled to maintain a suit against the person in actual jurisdictional possession of such land for its recovery without making the person under whom the latter claims to hold a party to the suit. It is in the power of the Court at the instance of the defendant or of its own motion, if it considers it expedient, to make the person under whom the defendant claims to hold a party to the proceedings. This is the English rule and practice (Dicey on Parties, Rules 112 and 113), and it appears to us to be the most convenient and just course. It is enough for the plaintiff to sue the person in actual possession. It would be unfair upon him to compel him to add a party of whom he may know nothing and against whom he may have no cause of complaint, while the defendant by disclosing the

The name of the person under whom he claims to hold can have him made at his own risk a defendant to the suit.

The cases in the Calcutta High Court to which we have been referred do not, in our opinion, decide more than this—that Government is a proper party in a suit like the present. In that view we entirely concur.

In the present suit the defendants' case is that they were placed in possession of the land by Government, and they could have asked that Government should be made a party. They did not ask this, neither has there been any application on the part of Government to be made a party. The issue in the first Court was based on the plea of the defendants that the suit was bad, inasmuch as it was not brought against Government. That issue was properly decided in the negative by the Court. The appellate Court wrongly decided otherwise. The suit is not bad as it is framed and brought, neither is Government a necessary party to it. The most that can be said is that if Government be made a party, the questions at issue between the plaintiffs and Government can be effectually tried and determined in this suit, but the plaintiffs do not ask that those questions shall be determined in this suit, and Government cannot be affected by the result of this suit, so that those questions may safely be left to be determined, if necessary, in future litigation. Had the Court of first instance in the exercise of its discretion joined Government as a party, there would have been nothing to say against its procedure, but we think that it was unfair and unjust in the present case for the appellate Court to have called on the plaintiffs at that stage of the proceedings to amend their plaint by adding Government as a party. Such an amendment would have the effect of materially changing the frame of the suit and nullifying the whole of the proceedings already had in it, since it would necessitate the return of the plaint to the plaintiffs and their presenting it afresh in another Court.

We must, therefore, set aside the order of the lower appellate Court and remand the appeal for a trial on the merits, that is, for a determination of the title of the plaintiffs to the land as against the defendants. Costs hitherto incurred to abide the result.

Order set aside.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

BALAJI RAGHUNATH PHADKE (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. BALBIN RAGHOJI DALVI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [22nd November, 1895.]

Khoti Act (Bombay Act I of 1865)—Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1890), ss. 16, 17, 21 and 33 (c)—Khoti—Occupancy tenant—Entries made by the settlement officer in a form headed as issued under Bombay Act I of 1865 when Act I of 1880 was in force—Finality of the entry as to the liability of the tenant.

* Second Appeal No. 762 of 1895.

† Sections 16, 17, 21 and 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880):—

16. Whenever a survey settlement of the land-revenue of any village to which this Act extends is made or revised under the provisions of Chap. VIII of the Bombay Land
I of 1865, entries of rent payable by the occupancy tenant to the khoti with regard to some survey numbers of a fixed amount of grain and with respect to one survey number as held rent-free instead of a fixed share of the gross annual produce of the land as detailed in the second paragraph of cl. (c) of s. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act 1 of 1880) without recording that the rent had been so fixed by agreement.

Held, that the entries of the rent payable by the occupancy tenants were duly made under s. 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act 1 of 1880) according to the provisions of s. 33 so as to make them conclusive and final evidence of the tenant's liability which it was not open to a Civil Court to question.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. W. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Rao Sahib Parashram B. Joshi, Subordinate Judge of Rajaspur.

The plaintiff, a khoti sharer in the village of Khannaoli, sued for a declaration that he was entitled to recover from defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 one-third of the produce of bhat and varkasal by pahani (survey settlement) as rent of certain lands situate at mauje Khannaoli and for an order directing the said defendants to deliver to him the said fraction of the produce. He alleged that the defendants were cultivating tenants and liable to pay rent according to pahani, and that the survey settlement officer, on the 13th March, 1890, had wrongfully decided that the said defendants were liable to give to the khoti only 7½ maunds of bhat on account of the aforesaid lands, and that the settlement officer also wrongly

Revenue Code, 1879, the settlement register prepared under s. 108 of the said Code shall show the area and assessment of each survey number and also whether such survey number is held by a privileged occupant or not.

If a survey number is held by one or more privileged occupants, the said register shall further specify the tenure on which such number is held, the name of the occupant thereof, and, in the case of a survey number held by an occupancy-tenant, whether his interest therein is transferable otherwise than by inheritance or not.

Survey numbers which are not held by privileged occupants shall be entered in the said register in the name of the khoti, or if a partition of the khoti has taken place, of the co-sharers to whose shares they respectively belong.

The said register shall also contain a list of all the co-sharers of the khoti, if the village not held by one khoti in his own sole right, and shall specify the extent of each such co-sharer's interest in the khoti.

17. The other records prepared under the said section shall specify the nature and amount of rent payable to the khoti by each privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33 and any entry in any record duly made under this section shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established.

21. In any such matter the decision of the said survey officer, when not final, shall be binding upon all the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court.

33. Rent payable to the khoti by privileged occupants shall be as follows, (namely):—

(a) by a dhrerekari; the survey assessment of his land;

(b) by a quisii-dhrerukari; the survey assessment of his land and in addition thereto the amount of grain or money respectively set forth in the schedule;

(c) by an occupancy tenant; such fixed amount, whether in money or in kind, as may have been agreed upon or as may at the time of the framing of the survey record, or at any subsequent period, be agreed upon between the khoti and the said tenant;

or on the expiry of the term for which any such agreement shall have been, or shall be made, or if no such agreement have been, or be made, such fixed share of the gross annual produce of the said tenant's land not exceeding one-third in the case of rice-land, nor one-third in the case of varkas-land and such share, if any, of the produce of the fruit-trees on the said tenants' land, as the survey officer who frames the survey record shall determine to be the customary amount hitherto paid by occupancy tenants in the village in which the said land is situate.
decided that the said defendants should enjoy part of the said lands rent-free. The plaintiff further alleged that defendants Nos. 4—12, who had along with him an eight annas share in the khoti, were made party defendants, as they would not join him in instituting the suit.

Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 denied the plaintiff's claim.

The other defendants were absent.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit.

The following are extracts from his judgment:

"I do not think from the wording of the s. 17 (of Bombay Khoti Settlement Act I of 1850) that a civil suit is barred to rectify the entry made under ss. 16, 17, 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act, if that entry be shown to be wrong. What I understand from the above-named section is that if the khot were to claim more rent from the privileged occupant, then the privileged occupant can show, from the [237] entry made under s. 33, that he is not liable for more. It is only when the question is as to what rent the privileged occupant is liable, the entry made in the register under s. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act is conclusive and final evidence. The entry would be final and conclusive evidence in a rent suit, if any, instituted by khot against occupancy tenant. The entry is not said to be conclusive and final for all purposes. Having regard to the provisions of the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876), Bombay Land Revenue Code (V of 1879) and Bombay Khoti Settlement Act (I of 1880) I do not think that the khots in the Ratnaagiri and Kolaba districts have lost the right of instituting suits to set aside decisions of survey settlement officers, if those decisions be shown to be wrong and when those decisions refer to matters in dispute between superior and inferior land-holders. The decision referred to in this suit, and which is sought to be set aside, has reference to matters in dispute between the khots and occupancy tenants. I am, therefore, of opinion that this suit is maintainable in this Court."

There is no reliable evidence to show that the defendants ever used to give vasul by pahani. None of the plaintiff's witnesses or the plaintiff has produced papers of the management of the village of the last 25 or 30 years. This the plaintiff could have easily done if defendants Nos. 1—3 were really tenants paying vasul ¼rd by pahani. The settlement officer, when he made inquiry, found that within 12 years previous to the inquiry no kam just vasul (less or more rent) was given, that is, one and the same amount was given throughout for 12 years continuously (see Ex. 63). If the vasul had been taken by pahani, the same amount every year could not have been found due against defendants Nos. 1—3. The plaintiff has, therefore, failed to prove that defendants Nos. 1—3 are tenants of the plaint lands and are liable to pay rent ¼rd of the produce by pahani."

On appeal by the plaintiff the Judge confirmed the decree on the ground that the suit was barred by the entry made by the settlement officer on the 18th March, 1890.

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Ganesh K. Deshmukh, for the appellant (plaintiff):—We sued to recover thaül (rent in kind according to the Khoti Settlement) in spite of the maktta (fixed rent) settled by the survey authorities. With respect to one of the survey numbers, the survey authorities settled that nothing was payable and that the tenants should enjoy the land rent-free. The settlement was made on the 18th March, 1890, and the present suit was brought on the 16th March, 1891. The entry made by the settlement officer is Ex. 63 in the case. The settlement was made under Bombay Act I of 1865 and Government Resolution No. 1474, dated the 26th April, 1876. If the entry was made under Bombay Act I of 1865, then it was not final. The settlement which [238] was completed in 1890 came into operation when Bombay Act I of 1865 was in force. It had commenced before the Khoti Act I of 1880 came into operation. Section 30 of Act I of 1880 shows that all the khoti villages in the Konkan did not come directly under the operation of the Act as soon as it was passed. It appears from Government order (Ex 21) that Act I of 1880 was not made applicable till the 30th August, 1890, that is, after the settlement was made applicable to the village on the 18th March, 1890.

Assuming that the settlement was made under Act I of 1880, we submit that the decision of the settlement officer is ultra vires. The entries under s. 17 of the Act would be final if they were in accordance with the provisions of s. 33. In the present case the tenants are occupancy tenants, and, therefore, cl. (c) of s. 33 applies. Under this clause the settlement officer has jurisdiction to settle a fixed amount only when there is an agreement. In the present case the settlement officer has fixed the amount of rent at 7½ maunds of gana. Under paragraph 2, cl. (c), the settlement officer is empowered to settle only a fixed share of rent and not the amount of the rent. In column 5 of Ex. 63 the reason given by the settlement officer for settling the fixed amount of rent is that the khot did not show that varying rent was paid during the last twelve years. We submit that the reason is bad. Further, the settlement officer had no jurisdiction to declare that a tenant should hold particular land rent-free.

Daji A. Khare, for the respondents (defendants).—There is no allegation on the part of the plaintiff that the settlement was made under Bombay Act I of 1865. Under that Act no such settlement as the present could be made. The first Court held that the settlement was made under the Khoti Act I of 1880. The settlement in dispute is the settlement between the khot and occupancy tenants, and such a settlement could not be made under Bombay Act I of 1865. That Act refers only to a general settlement. Act I of 1880 provides for a settlement between khots and their tenants. The entry in Ex. 63 being made under s. 17 of Act I of 1880 must stand. Government [239] Resolution No. 1474, dated the 26th April, 1876, was the result of a compromise between the khots and rayats, and the Khoti Act I of 1880 is the outcome of that Resolution. It may be contended that s. 33 of Bombay Act I of 1865 provides for a settlement between the khots and rayats, but that provision was repealed some time before the settlement was made in 1890. We submit that a settlement, which commenced under an existing Act, but finished after that Act was repealed and another Act has come into force, would be good under the latter Act—Sankappa v. Basappa (1).

Next we contend that, even according to the provisions of the Khoti Act I of 1880, the entry made by the settlement officer in Ex. 63 is not ultra vires. The Act has given some particulars for the guidance of the settlement officer, and in fixing the amount of rent it took into consideration the circumstance that the khot did not prove that the tenants paid more or less rent during the past years. An entry made under s. 17 of the Act is conclusive, and no suit can be brought to set it aside—Gopal Krishna v. Sakhoojirao (1); Ramchandra v. Raghunath (2); Ramchandra v. Mukundshet (3); Second Appeals Nos. 565 and 673 of 1893, decided on the 11th November, 1895 (Jardine and Ranade, JJ.).

If the plaintiff thinks himself aggrieved by the entry of the settlement officer, he can seek redress under s. 21 of the Khoti Act I of 1880.

With respect to the entry that the tenant should enjoy particular land rent-free, it seems that the khoti did not take any rent from the tenants with respect to that land for the past years, and, therefore, the settlement officer made an entry to that effect.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C.J.—I do not entertain doubt that, notwithstanding the heading of the record of the settlement officer in this case, the particulars entered therein, in accordance with the provisions of ss. 16 and 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, must be taken to have been entered in pursuance of the provisions of those sections. At the time when the entries were made, Bombay Act I of 1865, s. 38, had been repealed, and Bombay [240] Act I of 1880, which repealed it, had come into operation. It was only under the provisions of the later Act that the survey officer could have made the entries, and the fact of his making them under an improper heading, probably having used an old form, does not, I think, deprive them of legal validity. See Sankappa v. Basappa (4). When, therefore, the settlement on the 12th of August, 1890, came into force, as sanctioned by Government by the order (Ex. 21) of the 18th of March, 1890, those entries became, if made in accordance with s. 33 of the Act, conclusive and final evidence under s. 17.

The more important question argued before us hence arises whether the entries of the rent payable by the occupancy tenants, the defendants in this case, were duly made under s. 17 of the Khoti Act according to the provisions of s. 33 so as to make them conclusive and final evidence of the defendants' liability, which it is not open to the Civil Court to question—Gopal Krishna v. Sakhoojirao (1).

It is contended that the entries are not in accordance with the provisions of s. 33, because the rent entered is not a fixed share of the gross annual produce of the land as directed in the second paragraph of clause (c) of that section, but is in the case of some of the survey numbers a fixed amount of grain, and in the case of No. 118 it is entered as hold rent-free, and it is not recorded that the rent has been so fixed by agreement. In considering this question it must be borne in mind that the object of the Act, as appears from the preamble and the provisions of ss. 16 and 17, is to compile, through the agency of the settlement officer, a complete record of the nature of the holding of each and every privileged occupant in the khoti village, and to ascertain and define the amount of rent payable by each. Section 33 accordingly provides for the case of occupancy tenants, which it places in two classes—those tenants who have their rents fixed by agreement, and those whose rents are not so fixed. It is, I think, clearly intended that such classification shall be exhaustive. The section makes no special provision for the case in which tenants have been paying a fixed rent for a long period, but who may be unable to prove the origin of their right:

(1) 18 B. 138.
(2) P.J. (1895), p. 142 = 20 B. 475.
(3) P.J. (1895), p. 145.
(4) P.J. (1880), p. 106.
to pay [241] in that form. As it cannot, I think, have been intended that such tenants should be deprived by the settlement operations of their established right, it seems to me that the Legislature must have intended to embrace them within the class of those whose rents have been agreed upon before the time of the survey. As the Courts in such cases would presume a lost agreement, it would be open to the settlement officer to infer the same. Where in such cases there is a dispute between the khot and the occupancy tenant as to the rent payable by the latter, s. 20 imposes upon the survey officer the duty of investigating and determining it, and framing the record accordingly. When he has thus, after such investigation, framed the record under s. 17, it becomes conclusive and final evidence of the rent payable by the tenant.

In the present case the survey officer found the tenant paying a fixed amount of grain in respect of part of the land and as to part holding the land rent-free. To that effect he has made an entry, and it is not, I think, open to the Civil Courts to say that he has made his entry on insufficient or inadequate evidence. It must, I think, be taken that he has found the tenant to fall within the scope of the first paragraph of cl. (c) of s. 33 and to have made the entry accordingly. If we were to hold otherwise we should be frittering away the finality as evidence which s. 17 gives to the entry of the settlement officer and opening the door to litigation (which it was the object of the Act to avoid) in every case in which the settlement officer has recorded a fixed amount of rent as payable by the tenant. It appears to me to make no difference whether the tenant has established his right to the satisfaction of the settlement officer to hold his land on a fixed rent or rent-free. The settlement officer is bound to frame his record in accordance with his decision.

In so deciding I follow what has been already ruled in second appeals Nos. 565 and 673 of 1893 by another Bench, though the particular instance of an occupancy tenant holding rent-free did not arise in these cases.

PARSONS, J.—This case raises a very important question between khots and occupants of land in khoti villages. The plaintiff is in the position of the khot. The defendants have been [242] held by the survey officer to be occupancy tenants, and the rent payable by them to the khot has been determined by him after inquiry to be 7½ maunds of rice. The plaintiff disputes the legality of this determination, and has brought this suit for a declaration that he is entitled to recover from the defendants for rent one-third of the actual produce of the land.

In the face of the decisions of Gopal Krishna v. Sakhojirao (1), Ramchandra v. Raghunath (2) and Ramchandra v. Mukundshet (3) it is not contended that the determination if duly made would not be conclusive and final and would not bar the present suit. The argument is, first, that the determination has not been made under s. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, at all, and, secondly, that if it has, it is not a legal determination under that section.

The first argument is founded upon the heading of the form in which the entry is recorded, which is thus "Maoji Kuanavle Trif Sonji, Taluka Rajapur, Appendix D classifying the Ryots, etc., under Act I of 1865, and Government Resolution No. 1474 of the 26th April, 1876." The determination was made on the 18th March, 1890, at a time when the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, was in force and Act I of 1865 was repealed. There could, therefore, have been no proceedings at all held under Act I of 1865;

(1) 18 B. 185.
(2) 20 B. 475
(3) P.J. (1895), p. 145.
proceedings could have been had under the Act of 1880 only and I must assign the acts of the survey officer to a valid and proper enactment. In all probability the misdescription arose from the fact that the survey had been commenced at a time when Act I of 1865 was in force though it was not introduced until 1890 and the printed forms that were suitable to the time when the survey was commenced continued to be used throughout. There can be no doubt that the determination in question was really made under ss. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, and that the entry of it in the record was made under ss. 17 of the same Act. I think, therefore, that there is no force in this first argument.

The second argument relates to the determination itself. It is laid down in s. 33 that an occupancy tenant shall pay [243] such fixed amount, whether in money or kind, as may have been agreed on in the past or may in the present or future be agreed on between him and the khot, and in the absence of agreement, such fixed share of the gross annual produce of his land as the survey officer shall determine to be customary. In the present case the survey officer has determined the rent for survey Nos. 121, 123, 122, 36 and 28 to be a fixed amount of 7½ maunds of rice, and has held that survey No. 118 (9) is rent-free. The award of a fixed amount of grain in the absence of agreement and awarding no rent at all for survey No. 118 (9) are relied on as illegalities under the section.

It appears, however, to me that it is not open to a Civil Court to go behind the entry and inquire whether it is the correct result of a legal and valid determination. The Legislature has entrusted to the survey authorities the duty of determining the amount of rent that an occupancy tenant shall pay to the khot, and has declared that the entry of the nature and amount of rent so determined to be payable in the record made under s. 17 shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereof established. Determinations on other matters it has allowed to be reversed or modified by decrees of competent Courts. This one it has declared to be final (s. 21). Unless a Court can go behind the determination and enquire into its merits, it is impossible for it to say that it is either illegal or invalid. In the present case, for instance, the survey officer may have found upon absolutely undeniable evidence that there was an agreement to pay the amount of grain he fixed for the rent of the land and to pay nothing for survey No. 118 (9), in other words, an agreement to pay for the whole holding 7½ maunds of rice. If this was the case, his determination would be perfectly legal and valid.

For this reason I think that the lower Courts have rightly dismissed the suit. Plaintiff's remedy is clearly not by suit in a Civil Court. If he has a remedy at all, it is before the authorities to whom the Legislature has entrusted the work of framing and keeping the record. We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

[244] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880), ss. 16, 17, 20, 21, 22 and 38†—Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), ss. 109, 110, 120, 129, 156, 203, 211 and 212—Determination by the survey officer of the liability of the defendant to khoti—Entry in the settlement register as occupancy tenant—Revision of the record by the Collector—Power of alteration—Decision as to the rent payable not final and conclusive evidence—Difference between declaring an entry to be a final and conclusive evidence and a decision to be final—Appeal lies from a decision.

In May, 1885, under s. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880) the survey officer determined the liability of the defendant to pay to the khot as rent for his land the survey assessment and the local fund cess, and this was entered in the record made under s. 17 of the Act notwithstanding that in the settlement register the defendant was entered as an occupancy tenant. In April, 1889, the Collector, on the application of the plaintiff, revised the former record, which, as revised, showed that the defendant was liable to pay one-third of the produce of his land as rent to the khot.

Held, that the revised entry in the record was duly made by the Collector under s. 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880) and was conclusive and final evidence of the liability established by it. It is not open to a Civil Court to inquire into the legality or otherwise of the reasons which may have led to the determination of the amount of rent payable.

The Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880) does not make the decision of rent final. In s. 33 it only makes the entry, which is the result of the decision, final and conclusive evidence. Under s. 33 an appeal lies from a decision, and the decision can be revised under s. 211 of the Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879) by the authorities therein mentioned.

[245] SECOND appeal from the decision of A. S. Moriarty, Acting District Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of B. Y. Gupte, Subordinate Judge of Devrukh.

The plaintiff as khot sued to recover a certain amount as that rent (rent in kind) due to him by defendants for three years in respect of his eight-annas share in a certain khoti village.

The defendants pleaded (inter alia) that the settlement officer had decided in the year 1885 that they were liable only to pay assessment

* Second Appeal No. 51 of 1894.
† Sections 16, 17, 21 and 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880), see ante p. 239; ss. 20 and 22 are as follow:—
Section 20 of Act I of 1880:—
"If it shall appear to the survey officer, who frames the said register or other record, that there exists any dispute as to any matter which he is bound to record, he may, either on the application of any of the disputant parties or of his own motion, investigate and determine such dispute and frame the said register or other record accordingly."
Section 22 of Act I of 1880:—
"No suit shall lie against the said survey officer or against Government, or any officer of Government to set aside any such decision of a survey officer, but the record shall from time to time be amended by the said survey officer, or when the survey settlement is concluded, by the Collector, in accordance with any such decree as aforesaid which the parties may obtain inter alia on an application, accompanied by a certified copy of such decree, being duly made to the said survey officer, or to the Collector for that purpose."
and local fund cess on their lands, and that the plaintiff could not claim rent without setting aside the settlement officer’s decision.

The Subordinate Judge found that the settlement officer’s decision was final and conclusive, and could not be set aside by any subsequent proceedings in a Civil Court. He, therefore, rejected the claim.

On appeal by the plaintiff the Judge confirmed the decree. The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Daji A. Khare, for the appellant (plaintiff).—Our claim was rejected on the ground that under s. 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bomb. Act I of 1880) the determination by the settlement officer (Ex. 37) that the defendants were liable to pay assessment and local fund cess was conclusive. In Ex. 37 the defendants are entered as khetadar kuls. We submit that under s. 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act, the decision of the settlement officer is not final and conclusive. The decision is liable to be modified or set aside by a competent Civil Court. Under s. 17 of the Act, the entry as to the tenant’s liability is only final and conclusive.

Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar, for the respondents (defendants).—In the year 1885 the settlement officer made the entry under s. 20 of the Khoti Settlement Act, and the entry is final and conclusive under s. 17. Subsequently the Collector revised the entry on the plaintiff’s application. We submit that the Collector had no power to do so. Section 20 read along with s. 17 of the Act, shows what entries are final and conclusive, and what entries can be interfered with by Civil Courts. Section 3, cl. (12) of the Act enacts that any word or expression [246] which is defined in the Land Revenue Code (Bomb. Act V of 1879), and is not defined in the Khoti Act, shall be deemed to have the meaning given to it by the code. Section 212 of the code lays down that when a decision or order is final, no appeal can lie against it. The order passed by the settlement officer being final, no appeal could, therefore, lie against it. The Collector was, therefore, wrong in revising it. Entries made by officers specially appointed are held to be final, as, for instance, entries made by officers appointed to settle boundaries under ss. 119 and 120 of the Land Revenue Code—Bai Ujam v. Valiji Rasulbhai (1).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—There is no dispute about the facts of this case. On the 3rd May, 1885, under s. 33 of the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, the survey officer determined the liability of the defendant to pay to the khot, as rent for his land, the survey assessment and the local fund cess, and this was entered in the record made under s. 17 of the Act, notwithstanding that in the settlement register the defendant was entered as an occupancy tenant. On the 25th April, 1889, the Collector on the application of the plaintiff revised the former record, and as it now stands it shows that the defendant is liable to pay one-third of the produce of his land as rent to the khot. We have held in the case of Balaji Raghunath v. Dal bin Raghoji (2), that it is not open to a Civil Court to enquire into the legality or otherwise of the reasons which may have led to the determination of the amount of rent payable. The Court must accept an entry in a record duly made under s. 17 as conclusive and final evidence of the liability established by it.

The only point, therefore, that arises is, whether the revised entry in the record was duly made by the Collector. The Act of

(1) 17 B. 456. (2) 21 B. 286.
1880 is not very clear in its terms, but ss. 16 and 17 read together show that the record of rent is a separate record from the settlement register, so that the restrictions as to alterations and corrections of the latter contained in ss. 109 and 110 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code would not apply to the former. The terms of s. 33 itself seem to imply a power of alteration, since it speaks of an agreement made at some period subsequent to the framing of the survey record. Section [347] 20 provides for the investigation and determination of disputes, s. 21 declares that the decision, when not final, shall be binding till reversed or modified by a decree of a competent Court and s. 22 provides for the amendment of the record in accordance with such decree when obtained.

As s. 17 has declared the decision of the rent payable to be conclusive and final evidence, and as no suit lies to reverse or modify that decision, there can be no amendment possible under s. 22. We are, therefore, driven to the conclusion, that the Act of 1880 gives no express power of appeal or of revision. We can, however, look to the Land Revenue Code itself to see whether there is anything in it which gives such power. Section 203 gives a general right of appeal from all decisions or orders passed by a revenue officer to that officer’s immediate superior in the absence of express provision to the contrary. Section 212 restricts this power by declaring that no appeal shall lie from a decision or order declared in the Act to be final.

It has been argued before us, and it is the opinion of the lower Courts, that the Act of 1880 has declared the decision of rent to be final. This, we think, is a mistake. Had the Legislature intended to make the decision final, it would have expressly said so in s. 33 (Cf. ss. 120, 129 and 156 of the Land Revenue Code). It does not, however, there say a word about the decision, and in s. 17 it only makes the entry, which is the result of the decision, final and conclusive evidence. There is a marked difference between declaring an entry to be final and conclusive evidence and a decision to be final.

There being, then, no express provision prohibiting an appeal, we think that an appeal lies from a decision under s. 33, as indeed it is only right an appeal should lie from a decision on such an important point. It follows that not only an appeal lies, but that the decision can be reviewed under s. 211 of the Land Revenue Code by the authorities therein mentioned. In the present case the Collector on the application (it is called an appeal in the document itself) of the plaintiff has modified the decision of the survey officer, which was that the defendant, though only an occupancy tenant, was liable to pay rent as if he were a dharekari, and has held him liable to pay the rent that an occupancy tenant is liable to pay. It is not within our power to go behind that later decision or to inquire into the validity of the reasons which induced the Collector to exercise his jurisdiction. It is an entry duly made under s. 17, and we must accept it as final and conclusive evidence of the liability established thereby.

We reverse the decree of the lower Courts and award the claim with costs throughout.

Decree reversed.

NARAYAN BHASKAR KHOT (Original Plaintiff No. 1), Appellant
v. BALAJI BAPUJI KHOT (Original Defendant), Respondent.*

Small Cause Court suit—Second appeal—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 596—Suit to recover a certain sum on account of a share in property—Amount to be found due on taking account—Title.

Plaintiffs sued to recover on account of their share in the produce of certain dhara and khoti properties, Rs. 339-14-2 or any other sum which might be found due to them on taking account from the defendant, who was the managing khot. The defendant denied the plaintiffs’ right to the produce of some of the properties. The first Court and the Court of appeal found that the amount due to plaintiffs was Rs. 72-14-11. On second appeal,

Held that the suit was a Small Cause Court suit, and no second appeal lay. The mere fact of a question of title arising does not prevent a suit being cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. By merely asking, in the alternative, for an account of the profits, a suit cognizable by a Small Cause Court cannot be converted into one of a different nature.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Rao Sahib K.S. Patankar, Subordinate Judge of Dapoli.

The plaintiffs sued to recover Rs. 339-14-2 as their one-twelfth share in certain dhara and khoti properties, or any other sum which might be found due to them from the defendant, who was the managing khot, on taking accounts between them.

[249] The defendant denied the plaintiffs’ claim in respect of some of the properties.

The Subordinate Judge passed a decree for the plaintiffs for Rupees 72-14-11, and on appeal by plaintiff No. 1 the Judge confirmed the decree. Plaintiff No. 1 preferred a second appeal.

Gokuldas K. Parekh (with Gangaram B. Rele), for the respondent (defendant) took a preliminary objection.—This is a small cause suit in which no second appeal is allowed—s. 596 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882); Damodar Gopal Dikshit v. Chintaman Balkrishna (1).

Daji A. Khare, for the appellant (plaintiff No. 1).—This is a suit for account. There is a distinct prayer to that effect in the plaint. There are also questions of title in the suit. We claim a share in the profits of immovable property, and the defendants have denied our title to those properties. Therefore s. 23 and art. 31 of sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) are applicable, and the suit is not a small cause suit. In Damodar Gopal Dikshit v. Chintaman Balkrishna (1) no account was asked for.

* Second Appeal No. 213 of 1894.

Gokuldas K. Parekh in reply.—In a small cause suit the question of title can be incidentally gone into. In calculating profits the Court has to make accounts, but that circumstance would not make s. 23 or art. 31 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act applicable.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, O. J.—The mere fact of a question of title arising does not prevent a suit being cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. That has been determined in a long series of decisions. Section 23 of the Small Cause Courts Act, 1887, does not alter the law upon this subject, but points out a course which a Small Cause Court Judge may adopt when he considers that he cannot conveniently try such a question as is there indicated in his Small Cause Court jurisdiction. See Muttukaruppan v. Sellan (1). It can have no application when a case is filed in the Court of a Subordinate Judge not invested with the jurisdiction of a Court of Small Causes.

We must, therefore, consider whether this, as a suit for an account, is excepted from the jurisdiction of the Small Causes Court. This question is determined by authority. We cannot distinguish the present case from Damodar Gopal Dikshit v. Chintaman Ballrishna (2). Here, as there, the profits sought are not alleged to have been wrongfully received. By merely asking, in the alternative, for an account of the profits the plaintiff cannot convert a suit cognizable by a Court of Small Causes into one of a different nature. There is no account within the meaning of art. 31, sch. II of the Small Cause Courts Act here to be taken. A definite sum only is to be ascertained, viz., the amount of profits received by defendant during the years in question, from which by a simple calculation what the plaintiff’s share in those profits amounts to can be ascertained. No second appeal lies under s. 586 of the Civil Procedure Code.

We, therefore, reject the appeal with costs.

Appeal rejected.

[25th November, 1895.]

Small Cause Court—Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), s. 25—Jurisdiction of the High Court.

An error of law or procedure in the Small Cause Court confers jurisdiction upon the High Court to exercise the power committed by s. 23 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887).

The powers conferred by the section are, however, purely discretionary, and the section does not give a right of appeal in all Small Cause Court cases either on law or on fact. The High Court is to determine in what cases it shall exercise the powers conferred upon it.

It is not the practice of the Bombay High Court to interfere under s. 25 of the Act when there are no substantial merits in the case of the applicant. It interferes to remedy injustice. It is slow to interfere where substantial justice has been done by the Subordinate Court, although that Court may technically have erred.

do not afford a safe guide for the exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887). The wording of the two sections is wholly different, that of s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act being of the widest description and conferring the most ample discretion on the High Court, while it has been held by the Privy Council that
s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) ought to be construed in a very restricted and limited sense.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court against the decision of Khan Bahadur Navroji Dorabji, Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Poona, under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887).

The plaintiff sued the Municipality of Poona to recover Rs. 809-3-11 alleged by him to have been paid as octroi duty on goods imported by him for the use of Government and which he claimed to be refunded under the octroi rules in force at Poona.

The plaintiff contracted to supply corn to Government at Poona, Kirkee and the Camp of Exercise from 1st April, 1892, to 31st March, 1893, and during that period he imported corn into Poona for the purposes of his contract and paid octroi duty upon it according to the revised octroi rules.

By one of these rules (Rule No. 3) it was provided that where imported goods were intended for the use of Government or subsequently became the property of Government, the duty paid on importation should be refunded on production of the proper certificate. The following is the rule referred to:

"Rule 3. Goods, the property in which is not vested in Government at the time they passed the barrier, but which, being imported with a view to the fulfilment of a Government contract or otherwise intended for the use of Government, will, in the ordinary course of things, become the property of Government, after importation, shall, on passing the barrier, be declared as intended for the use of Government, i.e., in fulfilment of a certain (specified) contract. The duty on them shall then be paid, and subsequently if they actually do become the property of Government the duty shall be refunded on a certificate to that effect signed by the departmental officer concerned."

The plaintiff alleged that he had produced the necessary certificates in respect of a large quantity of grain, and asked to be refunded the amount claimed, but the defendants allowed a refund in respect of such grain only as had been delivered to Government in the Poona Cantonment, but refused it in respect [252] of such as had been delivered to Government at Kirkee and the Camp of Exercise. The plaintiff, therefore, brought the present suit.

The Municipality pleaded that as, in the case of goods taken to Kirkee and the Camp of Exercise, the goods passed outside the octroi limits, the plaintiff ought to have taken certificates for export as required by Rules 14 to 21; that in the absence of such export certificates the plaintiff was not entitled to claim the refund, and that Rule 3 applied only to such goods as were delivered to Government within municipal limits, and not to goods delivered to Government outside these limits.
The following were the rules relied on by the Municipality:

"14. Persons, importing goods in transit which enter the city and pass out of it intact within a week of their entering, shall deposit the amount of duty due on them at the ingoing octroi naka and receive a receipt for the same. They shall present the receipt at the outgoing naka for endorsement as to the goods having passed out of the city intact, and present the endorsed receipt at the municipal office, where on satisfying the municipal officers of the correctness of the endorsement, &c., they will obtain a refund of the amount of duty deposited by them.

"15. Such goods if they stay in the city longer than a week, shall be treated as imported goods for purposes of refund, provided that the importer gives notice to the octroi superintendent to the effect that the goods have remained in the city and gets his receipt endorsed to that effect.

"16. Goods which pass out of the city within 12 months of the date of importation shall be entitled to refund of duty.

"17. In cases in which the computed duty shall exceed four rupees, the goods shall, on their way out, be brought to the municipal office for inspection and verification by the secretary or the octroi superintendent.

"18. Refund of duty on goods which have to break bulk or undergo a change of form in the city shall be claimable, provided the manufactured articles are brought to the municipal office for inspection by the secretary or the octroi superintendent, packed for export in his presence, and a certificate obtained from the outgoing naka within 48 hours after packing, certifying the despatch of the articles in question out of the city.

"19. In cases where goods are exported by railway, the conditions imposed by the two last preceding Rules 17 and 18 (of bringing the goods at the municipal office for inspection) shall be dispensed with, and the railway invoice shall be accepted in lieu thereof as evidence of exportation.

"20. All demands for refund as above should be made within 4 days of the time of export, and they should be supported by the original receipts acknowledging payments of duty and the certificates of export mentioned above."

"21. All octroi receipts are transferable, and they will change hands with the goods to which they appertain. Refund will be paid only to the party who actually exports the goods and produces the original receipt."

The Judge found that the plaintiff was entitled to the refund, and awarded the claim to the extent of Rs. 730-7-11 which he found to be covered by proper certificates from the commissariat officer. The Municipality applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decision of the Judge should not be set aside, contending that the Judge erred in construing the octroi rules, and that the award of the refund was illegal and inequitable.

Macpherson with Mahadeo B. Chavval appeared for the Municipality in support of the rule.—The dispute relates to grain brought into Poona and afterwards taken outside. With respect to such grain the certificates given by the commissariat officer is not sufficient. There is no guarantee that the grain supplied to Government outside the municipal limits was the identical grain which had been imported into Poona. Rule 3 must be read along with the succeeding rules. Grain supplied to Government outside Poona were goods in transit, and the plaintiff ought to have complied with the provisions of Rules 14 and 17. The plaintiff did not comply with them, and is not entitled to a refund.

Branson with Gangaram B. Rele appeared for the plaintiff to show cause.—The Judge has come to the conclusion that Rule 3 is applicable to our claim. He has not committed any error in law, and there are no merits in the defendant’s case. His decision cannot be interfered with under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (see s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act IX of 1887)—Muhammad Bakar v. Bahal Singh (1); Raghunath Sahai v. The Official Liquidator of the Himalaya Bank, Limited (2); Sarman Lal v. Khuban (3).

There is no allegation by the Municipality that the plaintiff has committed any fraud. We contend that Rule 3 applies to goods supplied to Government, and the other rules apply to goods [254] which are not supplied to Government. We have complied with rule 3. The rules as they stand now do not impose on us any liability to produce certificates other than those we have already produced.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—This is an application by the Poona City Municipality under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887, by which they seek for a reversal of a decree passed against them in the Poona Small Cause Court for the sum of Rs. 730-7-11, on the ground that the decree was passed against them on an erroneous construction of their Revised Octroi Rules. Cause was shown against the application on the 19th November last, when we took time to consider our judgment. Mr. Branson for the opponent cited Muhammad Bakar v. Bahal Singh (1), Raghunath Sahai v. The Official Liquidator of the Himalaya Bank, Limited (2), Sarman Lal v. Khuban, (3), and urged that this was not a case in which we should interfere under the section. He also argued that the construction put upon the Poona Octroi Rules by the Small Cause Court Judge of Poona was correct. Mr. Macpherson for the Municipality maintained the contrary propositions. As there is no reported decision in the Bombay High Court upon the first point, it appears to us to be advisable to state our views upon the general law before dealing with the concrete circumstances of this particular case.

The primary question for consideration is: What are the extent and nature of the power which the section confers upon the High Court? And as to this, it is, we think, clear that an error of law or procedure in the Small Cause Court confers jurisdiction upon the High Court to exercise the power committed to it by the section. The wording of the section is of the widest description. The High Court is entitled to interfere when a decree or order of the Small Cause Court is not “according to law.” Further, we agree with the opinion of the Allahabad High Court, expressed in Muhammad Bakar v. Bahal Singh (supra.), that the powers conferred by the section (25 of Act IX of 1887) are purely discretionary, and that it was not the intention of the Legislature [255] to give by that section a right of appeal in all Small Cause Court cases, either on law or on fact. In the event of the decree not being according to law, the Legislature has conferred this jurisdiction on the High Court, but has left it to the High Court to determine in what cases it shall exercise it. It is undesirable, and would be improper for us to attempt, when a power is discretionary, to define the limits within which such power should be exercised. That must depend upon the facts of each individual case, but speaking generally we may say that it has not been the practice of this High Court to interfere under s. 25 when there are no substantial merits in the case of the applicant. This has been always a cardinal principle with this High Court. It interferes to remedy injustice. It is slow to interfere when substantial justice has been done by its Subordinate Court, though technically the plaintiff or defendant may have a legitimate ground of attack or defence. This principle has also been enunciated in the Allahabad High Court in the case of Raghunath v. The Himalaya Bank (supra), but we hesitate to agree with that decision in holding that the provisions of s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code and the earlier cases decided under it afford a safe guide for the exercise of our discretion under the section which we are considering, though that ruling has been to some extent approved by the Full Bench at Allahabad in Sarman Lal v. Khurban (supra). The wording of the two sections is wholly different, and the decision of the Privy Council in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (1) shows that s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code ought to have been construed in a very restricted and limited sense. This last mentioned decision must have been within the knowledge of the Legislature when Act IX of 1887 was passed, and yet it used the widest words in framing the later enactment. The Legislature intended, we think, to confer the most ample discretion on the High Court.

Turning to the case before us, we think that there is much force in the argument of Mr. Macpherson, that when goods imported into Poona and "declared as intended for the use of Government, i.e., in fulfilment of a certain (specified) contract" become subsequently [256] the property of, and are delivered to, Government, not in Poona itself but outside the municipal limits, the importer of such goods is not entitled to a refund merely on the production of a certificate signed by the departmental officer such as is contemplated under Rule 3. It is clear that in such a case the certificate signed by the departmental officer affords no proof that goods upon which octroi duty has been paid have been delivered to Government. The contractor may sell the declared goods in Poona and deliver other similar goods to Government in Kirkee or elsewhere outside the Poona limits without having paid octroi duty upon them at all. My learned colleague is disposed to think that the expression "after importation" in line 6 of Rule 3 imports that the goods became the property of Government in Poona, and that the words "and before exportation" may be implied after it, and I am inclined to agree which his view, but on the ground that the "certificate to that effect" in lines 11 and 12 of the Rule means a certificate which shows that the imported goods have become the property of Government. That is the most obvious meaning of the phrase, and it is manifest that a certificate given of goods having been delivered outside of Poona in pursuance of a particular contract does not show that goods which have been imported into Poona to fulfil it have been so delivered. The difficulty in the way of adopting this, the obvious construction of the phrase, is that even in the case of goods delivered in Poona the certificate does not show that the particular goods imported to fulfil the contract have been delivered under it, inasmuch as the importer may even in that case substitute other goods. He would, however, have no object in doing so, and the certificate of goods of the specified nature having been delivered under the contract in Poona is practically sufficient to safeguard the interest of the Municipality. We shall not, however, decide the point, as we think that we ought not to exercise the jurisdiction in this case which the section (25) has conferred upon us, even if we were to decide the question in favour of the Municipality.

In the first place it does not appear that the Municipality asked the Small Cause Court Judge to state a case for the opinion of the High Court under s. 617 of the Civil Procedure Code. [257] Had they done so, and had the Judge refused to accede to the application, we should probably have given a decided ruling to guide the Court in the future when dealing with these rules. The Municipality were apparently contented to take the decision of the Small Cause Court Judge on the construction of their rather ambiguously worded rules, and when he decided against them without their having asked for a case, they cannot, we think, complain that the High Court does not exercise its extraordinary powers to assist them.

In the second place, the defendants have no merits on their side. According to the finding of the Small Cause Court, which has not been challenged, and which there is no reason to distrust, the goods imported into Poona in this case have actually become the property of Government, and the plaintiff is on the merits entitled to the refund which he has obtained, though from the certificate alone he may not be able to prove his right, and he has not taken the precautions which entitle exporters under Rules 14 to 17, inclusive, to a refund. We discharge the rule with costs.

Rule discharged.

SAYAD HUSSEIN MIYAN DADA MIYAN AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. THE COLLECTOR OF KAIRA (Original Plaintiff), Respondent." [25th November, 1895.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1892), s. 539 — Sanction — Court cannot grant reliefs outside the sanction.

When sanction is given to the institution of a suit under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1892) the suit must be limited to matters included in the sanction. It is not competent to the Court to enlarge the scope of the suit and grant reliefs other than those included in the terms of the sanction.

Appeals from the decision of Dayaram Gidumal, Joint Judge of Ahmedabad, in suit No. 19 of 1891.

This was a suit filed by the Collector of Kaira under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882).

18th March, 1891, directed the Collector "to move the District Court to appoint new trustees for the administration of the trust funds, and to settle a scheme for their management."

A Jain widow named Manekbai, of Kapadvanj, died in 1876, possessed of considerable moveable and immovable property; she left a will by which she created several public religious and charitable trusts. In 1886 defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were appointed administrators of her estate, under Reg. VIII of 1827.

The plaintiff stated that some of the trusts were such as could not be satisfactorily carried out by defendant No. 1, who was a Mahomedan, and that in view of s. 22 of Act XX of 1863, the appointment of the defendant No. 2, who was nazir of the Subordinate Judge's Court at Kapadvanj, was objectionable.

The plaintiff, therefore, prayed that the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 should be removed and new trustees appointed, that a scheme of administration should be settled by and under the direction of the Court, and such relief granted as the Court might deem fit.

Defendant No. 1 did not contest the suit; he expressed his willingness to abide by the Court's orders.

Defendant No. 2 asked to be made a plaintiff and made serious allegations of misappropriation, not only against the former administrators of the estate,—Nihalchand (since deceased) and Chhotalal,—but also against Amratbai, the mother and legal representative of Nihalchand. He asked that these persons should be added as defendants, and made to account for the trust funds in their hands.

The District Court accordingly added Amratbai and Chhotalal as defendants Nos. 3 and 4, respectively.

The Joint Judge found that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were unfit to administer the religious and charitable trusts created by Manekbai's will; that the former trustees, Nihalchand and Chhotalal, had been guilty of gross negligence and had committed several breaches of trust for which they were responsible to the trust estate. He, therefore, passed a decree directing defendants Nos. 1 and 2 to be removed, and new trustees appointed in their stead. He framed a scheme for the future administration of the trust, and ordered defendants Nos. 3 and 4 to render an account of the trust funds in their hands and made good the losses sustained by the charity in consequence of their default.

Against this decree defendants Nos. 1 and 3 made a joint appeal (No. 68 of 1894) to the High Court.

Defendant No. 4 preferred a separate appeal (No. 103 of 1894).

Scott (with him Govardhan M. Tripathi), for appellants in appeal No. 68 of 1894.

Gokaldas K. Parekh, for appellant in appeal No. 103 of 1894.

Rao Sahib Vasudev J. Kiritkar, Government Pleader, for the respondent in both the appeals.

A preliminary objection was taken that this suit did not fall within s. 639 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) and that the District Court had no jurisdiction to hear it. The High Court overruled the objection (see ante p. 46), and the appeal now came on for hearing on the merits.

Scott.—The sanction given to the Collector by Government was of a limited character, and did not include the question as to the removal of trustees or the account and refund. The relief granted by the lower Court as against Amratbai was, therefore, unwarranted by the sanction and ultra vires of the District Court under s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code—Tricumdass v. Khimji Vullabhass (1).

The case started by defendant No. 2 is quite independent of the sanction and ought not to have been included in a suit brought expressly under the sanction. Amratbai had no notice that she was to be made liable to account. The plaint here does not ask inquiry into the conduct of the trustees or for accounts to be taken—Rendall v. Blair (2); The Attorney General v. Earl of Decon (3); Strickland v. Weldon (4).

The claim against Amratbai is also barred by limitation.—Article 93 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). Amratbai is the [360] mother of the deceased trustee, Nihalchand. She succeeded to his property as heir on his death in January, 1883, and remained in management until defendant No. 1 was appointed trustee on 26th June, 1886. It is not alleged that Amratbai herself committed any fraud or waste. It is only for Nihalchand’s gross negligence that she is held responsible. The case against her, therefore, does not fall within s. 10 of the Limitation Act, and is barred. The suit ought to have been brought within three years from the death of Nihalchand, the trustee (art. 93). It was not brought until more than seven years after his death—Advocate General of Bombay v. Bai Punjabai (5); Vishvanath v. Rambat (6); Augustine v. Medlycott (7); Sitaram v. Lakhsidas (8).

Gokaldas K. Parekh, for appellant in appeal No. 103.

Rao Saheb Vasudev J. Kirtikar, for the respondent in both appeals.—The Government is not interested in the case against the defaulting trustees. The suit was brought for the purpose of having a scheme prepared for the future management of the trust fund. The Government is not responsible for the fact that defendant No. 2 intervened and asked the District Court to go into questions which the Government did not include in the sanction. Whatever view the Court may take as to the liability of the trustees, the decree, so far as it grants reliefs that were prayed for by Government, is correct and ought to be confirmed.

JUDGMENT.

Jardine, J.—This suit was brought by the Collector of Kaira in the District Court under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882). The sanction for the suit is Government Resolution No. 1532 of the 13th March, 1891, Judicial Department, which instructs the Collector "to move the District Court to appoint new trustees for the administration of the trust funds referred to and to settle a scheme for their management.

The suit was brought against the existing trustees, defendant No. 1, Sayed Husein Miyan, and defendant No. 2, Amratdal. Defendant No. 1 pleaded that he did not oppose, and submitted himself to the Court. Defendant No. 2 objected to the prayer of [261] the plaintiff, urged that Amratbai, mother of a past trustee, Nihalchand, then deceased, had retained property of the trust, and that as actual trustee he wished to sue her for this property (which he did not specify) and for an account, and, also that another past trustee, Chhotalal, had been guilty of neglect, and that he wished to sue him for damages therefor. Defendant No. 2 also prayed that for these torts or misfeasances they should both be made defendants in this suit. The District Court passed decision joining them as defendants, a course advocated by the plaintiff's pleader and objected to by the now defendants Nos. 3 and 4.

Niralchand died in 1883, and though Amratbai did manage certain \textit{aims} of the trust after his death as his representative, and although Chhotalal was at one time a trustee, they ceased to be such in June, 1886, when defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were appointed. The suit was filed in 1891. The District Court has made the new defendants liable by its decree.

In the appeals here Mr. Scott contends for Amratbai that this relief should be refused as unwarranted by the sanction, and, therefore, \textit{ultra vires} of the District Court under s. 539. Mr. Gokuldas for Chhotalal adopts this argument. Mr. Scott also argues that the claim against Amratbai is barred by limitation under art. 98 of Act XV of 1877. Indian cases were cited out of the reports. We called for a second argument in order to have the advantage of a discussion of some analogous Chancery cases on the subject of sanction which seemed to us important.

It is not necessary to consider whether the claim made by defendant No. 2 against defendants Nos. 3 and 4 is one to which s. 539 applies, as no question about the forum has been raised here, as in Vishwanath v. Rambhat (1) and Augustine v. Medlycott (2). Neither is it necessary to consider the argument raised, but not much pressed by Mr. Scott, that the powers which under s. 539 the Collector may exercise are only those under which the Advocate General gives a consent in writing to a suit.

The argument raised was that as the Advocate General had, before s. 539 was enacted, a power \textit{ex officio} of instituting his own suit, that power was not assigned under the word "conferred." The Government Pleader asked us to read "conferred" as equivalent to "specified." Coming to the Indian authorities on sanction, under s. 539 we follow the judgment of Parsons, J., in Tricumdass v. Khimji Vullabhdass (3) and hold that the section is mandatory. \textit{Prima facie}, therefore, the District Court ought not to have allowed the defendant No. 2 to enlarge the scope of the suit so as practically to start a new suit without any regard to the absence of a sanction from the Local Government for that purpose. The suit actually determined is not the same as that for which sanction was accorded. See Srinivasa v. Venkata (4) on a Judge's sanction under ss. 14 and 18 of Act XX of 1863, where the plaintiff omitted to sue for one of the reliefs sanctioned. The claims started by defendant No. 2 are quite unconnected with the suit sanctioned by the Governor in Council to get defendants Nos. 1 and 2 removed and for framing a scheme. If defendant No. 2 had brought a suit at his own risk, all the pleadings would have been different, as Mr. Scott pointed out in his answer—in our opinion a sufficient answer—to the question from this Bench suggested by the remarks of the Lords Justices in Randall v. Blair (5) in regard to the absence of express prohibition in s. 539 and as to whether it might not be the duty of this Court to allow the Collector to apply for a fresh sanction before the decision of the appeal. This radical difference of the two suits which defendant No. 2 succeeded in raising in the District Court under cover of s. 539 from the particular suit sanctioned by the Governor in Council, distinguishes the case from The Attorney General v. Earl of Devon (6) and Re Godmanchester Grammar School (7) which are cited by Tudor as exceptions to the rule about sanction in the Chancery cases where he says: "The Court has, however, been in the habit of receiving petitions without the allowance of the Attorney General upon matters arising out of or having reference to what the Court has before done upon a petition properly signed by him"(1).

[263] In the paucity of decisions it may be well to consider the reasons for the requirements about sanction which may be inferred from those found in the English decisions. The controlling powers given to the Attorney General in England under the old procedure by information(2) were intended to prevent scandalous suits being brought by individuals about charities in order to make a profit by way of costs. It is the reason for the enactment of s. 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853(3)—Braund v. Earl of Devon(4). In Rendal v. Blair(5) Bowen, L.J., says: "This is a Chancery statute. It was intended to cure the mischief of strangers instituting suits when the Charity Commissioners were the proper persons really to form an opinion on the subject." See also Strickland v. Welldon(6). The cases about amendment are generally on informations. The amendment required the sanction of the Attorney General—Attorney General v. Fellows(7); for otherwise the whole suit, except the introduction, might be changed. A private petition was under his control; and it was for him to say for what objects the case should proceed, and Lord Chancellor Eldon referred the proceedings to him—Attorney General v. Green(8). In Attorney General v. Wyggeston's Hospital(9) a similar reference was made where the relators asked for more than he thought them entitled to and in Attorney General v. Corporation of Carlisle(10), where the interrogatories were too extensive. In Attorney General v. Wright(11) it was held that he was the only person to make an application on an information, and the relator had no such authority.

Turning to India it is obvious that the requirement of sanction protects trust funds and the trustees also from vexatious suits, as so great an officer as the Advocate General will not sanction suits without inquiry about the motives, the merits, the expense, and such bars as limitation. The Governor in Council will use the same circumspection. Though express prohibitory [263] words are not used in s. 539, as in the enactment before their Lordships of the Privy Council in Biseswar Roy v. Skoshi Sikar Esuwar Roy (12), the inference clearly is that a sanction from the Governor in Council was required to the enlargement of the suit; and that case is an authority for holding the absence of the sanction for that part of the suit to be a fatal object to the reliefs so claimed by defendant No. 2 and the plaintiff Collector. This Court must, therefore, withhold them in the decree which it will pass.

It is not necessary to decide the questions of limitation raised for Amratbai on the findings of the District Court at pp. 8 and 9 of its printed judgment, cls. C, E and F. As to the trivial item G, a silver article, this Court may well be silent. As to the other two findings that Amratbai is bound to pay over to the trust certain money that Nibalchand never collected, but might, except for his own negligence, have collected, from debtors, and other money computed as interest which he ought to have paid on money in his hands, I am of opinion that s. 10 of Act XV of 1877 does not apply, as these monies were not vested.

I concur in the views expressed in Satku v. Subramanya (1) and refer also to Balwant v. Purun (2). The claim set up by defendant No. 2 was substantially for an account; and it is doubtful whether such a suit would be permitted under the circumstances for mere laches of Nibalchand and no misconduct of hers—Advocate General of Bombay v. Bai Punjabe (3). It is unnecessary to say whether the claim is barred by art. 98, as urged by Mr. Scott, or whether art. 120 applies. But it is clear that such a question of limitation is one which the Governor in Council would have felt bound to consider if the District Court had required the Collector to consult that authority before it allowed the scope of the litigation to be enlarged.

As the Collector allowed defendant No. 2 to urge the enlargement and the defendant No. 2 is not a party here, perhaps the order of the District Court to treat the contention as that of the Collector and to allow defendant No. 2 costs out of the trust funds (265) may be justified by the Attorney General v. Governors, etc., of Sherborne Grammar School (4), where the Attorney General was held bound by what he had permitted the relations to urge by their counsel.

The Court dismisses the suit as regards the defendants Nos. 3 and 4, and in other respects confirms the decree. All costs of these appeals to be paid out of the trust monies.

RANADE, J.—The question of jurisdiction has been already disposed of by our interlocutory judgment. Two more preliminary points were argued by Mr. Scott on 25th September, 1895. One of these relates to the limited nature of the sanction, and the other to the question of limitation. It was contended that as the sanction by Government was of a limited character, and did not include the relief about the removal of old trustees, and requiring them to render an account and refund monies, the suit was not maintainable in its enlarged form. It was further urged that the defendants were allowed no opportunity to meet the enlarged case. The old trustees in this case were willing to resign the trust; and the sanction of Government was accordingly applied for, and given for the limited purpose of appointing new trustees, and settling a scheme of administration, and the District Judge’s inquiry into other matters, and his judgment thereupon, were ultra vires. We think there is considerable force in this contention. There has been no ruling on this part of s. 539, but the Madras High Court has ruled on a corresponding section of the Religious Endowments Act, XXI of 1863, that there must be close correspondence between the suit instituted and the suit sanctioned. Section 18 of that Act relates to the sanction by the District Judge of suits against trustees of religious endowments, and the ruling in Srinivasas v. Venkata (5) shows that where the sanction given included two reliefs, viz., removal of old trustees, and a claim for damages against them, and the suit prayed only for removal, and did not include a claim for damages, it was held that the omission was fatal to the maintenance of the suit. If the omission of a relief has this consequence, the addition of reliefs for which no sanction was (266) obtained must prove equally fatal. This objection was taken by the Madras High Court of its own motion, and the judgment states that the necessity for such leave or sanction indicates on the part of the Legislature an intention to provide an adequate protection to the trustees against vexatious suits. This principle would equally apply to the present case. There is a case under the Bengal Court of Wards Act, where, for want of sanction, a suit properly instituted by the manager under s. 55 of that Act was held to be not maintainable—Biseswar Roy v. Shashi Sikar Eswar Roy (1); see also In re Kowlab Koer (2). Though the case relates to criminal procedure, the ruling in Reg. v. Vinayak Divakar (3) may also be usefully consulted. It was held there that when the Local Government sanctions the prosecution of a public servant, a Court has no jurisdiction to entertain a charge if preferred otherwise than in the manner directed. Following the spirit of these rulings, we must hold that the District Judge was in error in inquiring into matters not included in the order of sanction. It is not necessary on this account to reject the plaint. The plaint, so far as it prayed for the appointment of new trustees and the settlement of a scheme of administering the trusts, was strictly within the limits of the sanction. The old trustees being willing to resign, their removal was also a matter covered by the sanction. In so far as the inquiry was extended to the investigation of breaches of trust, and the order of the District Judge required the old trustees to refund certain sums, the action of the lower Court seems to us not to be warranted by the terms of the sanction, and as such was ultra vires. The action of the Government Pleader in adopting Amratbai's charges was similarly unwarranted.

As regards the question of limitation, it arises only in regard to Bai Amratbai. She is the mother of Nihalchand, and succeeded to his property as heir on his death in January, 1883, and remained in management until the Sayad was appointed trustee on 26th June, 1886. The District Judge absolves Nihalchand from all dishonest mismanagement. He is, however, found [267] fault with in respect of three matters, (C), (E), (F), in which the District Judge thought he was guilty of gross negligence. The period of limitation to make good out of the general estate of a deceased trustee the loss occasioned by a breach of trust is three years from the trustee's death. It is not alleged that Bai Amrat has herself committed any fraud or waste. She was ready to assign over the securities and she applied to the District Court for the appointment of trustees. As against Amratbai, therefore, the claim in regard to outstanding and loss of interest (E), (F) is not of the nature contemplated by s. 10 of the Limitation Act, namely, a claim to follow up specific property, and s. 10, therefore, does not protect the present claim which is barred under art. 98—Shapurji Noorji v. Bhi-kaiji (4); Sethu v. Subramanya (5); Chintamoni v. Sarup (6). The claim marked (C) [the silver censor] is of that nature, but it is of too trivial a character to require further notice.

We are, therefore, of opinion that both the objections urged by appellant's counsel are valid in law, and we uphold them accordingly. We amend the decree by limiting its relief to the two points covered by the sanction.

Decree amended.
YASHVANT V. VITAL
21 B. 237.
APPELLATE CIVIL.
Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

YASHVANT NARAYAN KAMAT (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v.
VITTHAL DIVAKAR PARULEKAR AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents. [*] [25th November, 1895.]

Mortgage—Right of mortgagor to sell mortgaged property—Regulation V of 1827—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1892), s. 67—Covenant to pay interest—Separate suit to recover arrears of interest—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 43.

The breach of covenant in a mortgage-bond to pay interest each year which covenant is not confined to the fixed period of the mortgage and is distinct from and [263] independent of the claim of the mortgagee to recover the principal sum, and the performance of which is secured in a different manner, gives rise to a distinct cause of action which can be sued upon without suing for the principal, and a decree obtained on such bond for overdue interest does not, under s. 43 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), bar a subsequent suit to recover the principal and interest by sale of the mortgaged property.

Where a mortgage provides that possession of the mortgaged property, if taken by the mortgagee, is only to be taken for securing due payment of the interest, the mortgagee paying the balance (if any) of the profits to the mortgagor, the mortgage is not a usufructuary mortgage, but a simple mortgage, and is governed by the general law applicable to mortgages of this nature. In such a case, although there is no covenant to pay the principal other than that implied in the statement that the principal has been received, and that the property has been mortgaged for the stipulated term of years, and although there is no express provision that it is to be recovered from the mortgaged property, Reg. V of 1827 gives the mortgagee the right to bring the property to sale, and s. 67 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) confers upon him the same privilege.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Rao Saheb Narayan Balkrishna, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Malvan.

The plaintiff sued in the year 1893 to recover from the defendant personally, or by sale of property mortgaged to the plaintiff, Rs. 1,000 principal and Rs. 818.12-0 interest due on a bond dated the 24th March, 1873. The following is the translation of the material portion of the mortgage-bond:

"I (the mortgagor) on this day pass this mortgage-deed in writing as follows,—I, for my own necessity, took from you Rs. 1,000 in cash of the Queen's currency. I received the same. In security for the above I mortgage the property situate at mouje Malvan......And as I have kept with me the possession of the property, I have agreed to pay interest on your money at the rate of Rs. 7 8-0 per cent. per annum, and the period of this mortgage is fixed at five years. As to the assessment to be paid to Government in respect of the plots, I will pay the same to Government directly, and I will continue to pay rupees seventy-five every year as interest. In the year in which interest will remain unpaid I will deliver the property into your possession without any objection. And out of the income which may be realized you are to pay me the amount in respect of Government assessment, and out of the remaining profits you should take your interest, and the balance, if any remaining, should be paid to me.

* Second Appeal No. 316 of 1894.
If perchance the income is not sufficient for the assessment and your interest as mentioned above I will pay the deficit occurring every year. By the time I redeem the mortgage, should I fail to pay the same, I will, before redeeming the mortgage, pay the deficit occurring in respect of the income, the amount of Government assessment which you may perchance be obliged to pay, as also any increase made in the present assessment or any other cess which may be levied together with interest at 9 per cent. per annum, and then redeem the mortgage."

[269] The defendants pleaded (inter alia) that the plaintiff had, in the year 1892, sued and obtained a decree for interest only, that the right to recover principal as well having then accrued, the suit was barred by s. 43 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and that the claim against the defendants personally was barred by limitation.

The Subordinate Judge rejected the claim.

On appeal by the plaintiff the Judge confirmed the decree. After referring to the authorities cited by the parties the Judge said:

"The mortgage-bond (Ex. 4) provides that the interest on the principal amount of Rs. 1,000 should be Rs. 75, and if the mortgagor failed to pay that sum to the mortgagee, the latter should take possession of the property specified in the deed. This is the only remedy provided, and I can find no reason to suppose that it was ever the intention of the parties that the property should be sold in payment of either principal or interest; nor is it anywhere provided that the mortgagee is personally liable for the debt. I am, therefore, of opinion that neither of the reliefs sought by plaintiff can be granted. Whether he is now barred by s. 43 from suing for foreclosure is a point I am not now called upon to decide, but I will not allow an amendment of the plaint to that effect as an alternative relief, as Mr. Namjoshi suggests.

"Exhibit 9 shows that the plaintiff sued for interest from 1875 to 1891, due on this mortgage-bond. I am not called upon to criticise that decision, but I think that plaintiff’s remedy was to sue for possession, and, perhaps, also, for foreclosure; but as I am doubtful whether he was bound to demand his principal, I have some hesitation in thinking that the present demand for it is barred by s. 43. While, therefore, I decide that the property cannot be sold, nor can a personal decree be granted against defendants, I will decide that issue in plaintiff’s favour."

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Branson with Vasudev G. Bhandarkar, for appellant (plaintiff).—The lower Courts have refused to give us any relief at all on the ground of limitation, and also because there is no covenant in the deed to pay the principal amount. We submit that though our personal remedy may be barred, still on principle we are entitled to recover the debt by sale of the mortgaged property. There can be no dispute that the transaction is a mortgage, and that being so it must carry with it the remedies which are open to a mortgagee—Musaheb Zaman Khan v. Inayat-ul-lah (1); Motiram v. Vitai (2); Datto Daudshwar v. Vithu (3).

[270] Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for respondents (defendants):—The plaintiff cannot bring the property to sale, the mortgage being a usufructuary mortgage without any covenant to pay the principal—Shaik Idrus v. Abdul Rahman (4); Hikmatullah Khan v. Imam Ali (5); Sadashiv Aboji Bhat v. Vyankatrao Ramrao (6). Interest being not paid, the plaintiff.

ought to have brought a suit for possession and ought to have retained possession till the debt was paid off. But he did not ask for possession in the suit of 1882, and now he is debarred under s. 43 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). In that suit he ought to have asked for possession in addition to interest, because the principal had then become due—Duncan Brothers v. Jeetmull (1); Subbaraya Kamti v. Krishna Kamti (2); Anderson, Wright and Co. v. Kalagarla Surji Narain (3). Section XV of Reg. V of 1827 provides a remedy for possession, so also s. 67 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Branson, in reply:—This mortgage is not a usufructuary mortgage, while the mortgages in the cases relied on were so. The covenant was to take possession only on failure of payment of interest and to deduct interest from the produce and to hand over the balance to the defendant. Section 43 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) does not bar our suit because the document expressly refers to two agreements, one as to the payment of interest, a liability arising every year, and the other as to the payment of principal which did not arise until after the lapse of five years. The causes of action are totally different.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—This was a suit by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants personally, or by sale of the mortgaged property, Rs. 1,000 principal and Rs. 818-12-0 interest. The claim against the defendants personally is clearly barred, so that portion of the relief sought may be disregarded.

The mortgage-bond on which the suit is founded is dated the 24th March, 1873. The material parts of it are as follows:—(His Lordship read the bond and continued.)

[271] Upon reading the above mortgage it will be observed—(1) That there is no covenant to pay the principal other than that implied in the statement that the principal has been received and that the property has been mortgaged for five years, nor is there an express provision that it is to be recovered from the mortgaged premises. (2) That there is a distinct covenant to pay interest, and that the possession of the property, if taken by the mortgagee, is only to be taken for the purpose of securing due payment of the interest, the mortgagee paying the balance (if any) of the profits to the mortgagor.

In 1882 the plaintiff sued for the interest in arrear from 1875 to the end of 1881 and obtained a decree. He did not then sue for possession of the mortgaged premises nor for the principal. It is now contended that his present claim is in consequence of that action barred by the provisions of s. 43 of the Civil Procedure Code. We do not consider that the contention is well founded. The mortgage-deed contains a covenant to pay interest each year. This covenant, which is, we think, not confined to the fixed period of the mortgage, is distinct from and independent of the claim of the mortgagee to recover the principal sum, and its performance is secured in a different manner. Its breach, we consider, gives rise to a cause of action which can be sued upon without suing for the principal. It is similar to the covenant to pay interest which is inserted in well-drawn English mortgage-deeds for the purpose of enabling the mortgagee to sue for overdue interest without calling in the principal after the date fixed for the payment of the latter. See Davidson on Conveyancing, Vol. II,

(1) 19 C. 372. (2) 6 M. 159. (3) 12 C. 339.
The cases cited to us, Duncan Brothers v. Jeetmal, Anderson v. Kalagarla (2) and Taruck Chunder v. Panchu Mohini (3), which show that all existing breaches of the same contract must be joined in the same suit although they may have arisen at different times, do not apply, as here there are two separate contracts contained in the same instrument. Subbaraya v. Krishna (4) favours our opinion, but is not really in point. Nor is the case of Hikmatulla v. Imam Ali (5) when it is carefully considered. There it was held that the cause of action in 1894 (the date of the suit for interest) was not the non-payment of the interest, but the mortgagor's non-delivery of possession of the mortgaged premises which gave the plaintiff the right to recover the principal and interest which formed but one cause of action. There was not (as here) a separate covenant for the payment of interest secured in a separate manner. On this point we agree with the judgment of the District Court. That Court has, however, held that the mortgage provides no remedy for the payment of the principal sum, and that "there is no reason to suppose that it was the intention of the parties that the property should be sold in payment of either principal or interest, nor is it anywhere provided that the mortgagor is personally liable for the debt." The case of Shaik Idrus v. Abdul Rahiman (6) is relied upon in support of that view. The mortgage in that case was a usufructuary mortgage and contained peculiar provisions from which the Court drew the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties that the land mortgaged to the plaintiff should not be sold in satisfaction of the mortgage-debt. The mortgages in the cases in which that authority was followed, Sadasiv Abaji v. Vyankatrao (7) and second appeal No. 844 of 1893, were in similar terms, and the same conclusion was drawn. The present is not a usufructuary mortgage; and when the special stipulations for possession, which are inserted to secure the due payment of the interest during the continuance of the mortgage, are read as confined to the purpose to which they are expressly limited, the mortgage is a simple mortgage of the property in question for five years to secure an advance of Rs. 1,000 with a covenant by the mortgagor to pay interest thereon till the mortgage is redeemed at the specified rate and is governed by the general law applicable to mortgages of this nature. In such case Reg. V of 1827 gives the mortgagor the right to bring the property to sale, and s. 67 of the Transfer of Property Act confers upon him the same privilege.

We must, therefore, reverse the decree of the District Judge and remand the appeal for re-trial, having regard to the above observations. Costs to abide the result.

Decree reversed and case remanded.

MIR ALI MAHOMED PATEL v. BIHARILAL SUKLAL 21 Bom. 274

21 B. 273.

[273] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

-Company—Winding up—Suit against manager of company—Company not a party to the suit—Attachment before judgment of company’s property—Remedy of Liquidator—Appeal—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 263, 483, 491, 495, 587-598 and 622—Indian Companies’ Act (VI of 1882), s. 177.

The Dhulia Manufacturing Company, Limited, carried on business at Dhulia and had its registered office at Bombay. One Ahmad Mahomed was the manager at Dhulia, and he had authority to borrow money and draw hundis on behalf of the company. In August, 1894, the directors opened negotiations for the sale of the company’s factory to one Hajji Umer, and in September, 1894, while the negotiations were pending, a special resolution was passed to wind up the company voluntarily. The resolution was confirmed in October, 1894, and Mr Ali Patel was appointed liquidator under s. 177 of the Indian Companies’ Act (VI of 1882). In December, 1894, the liquidator agreed to sell the factory to Hajji Umer for the said sum of Rs. 35,000. Under the agreement Hajji Umer was to enter into possession of the factory, but the company was to have a lien upon it until the completion of the purchase which was to take place in May, 1895. A month before the date fixed for the completion of the sale one Biharilal filed a suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia against Ahmad Mahomed, the manager of the company, in his individual capacity and as manager of the company. His claim was professedly against the company, but he did not make the company, which was then in liquidation, a party to the suit. Subsequently Biharilal applied for and obtained an order for attachment before judgment of the company’s factory at Dhulia. No notice of the application or of the order made on it was given to the liquidator. He at once applied to the Court to raise the attachment, contending that the Court had no power to attach the property of the company which was not a party to the suit. The Court made the company a party and dismissed the liquidator’s application, confirming its previous order for attachment. The liquidator appealed to the High Court.

Held, that the order of attachment should be reversed. The intended sale by the liquidator, which was the sole reason for making the order, was not with intent to obstruct any decree that the plaintiff (Biharilal) might obtain against the company, but was being effected by the liquidator in the course of his duty and in pursuance of a contract entered into long before the suit was instituted. The plaintiff’s claim, if established, would be satisfied pari passu with the other debts of the company. The plaintiff was not entitled to security for his claim in preference to the other creditors.

It was contended that no appeal lay against the order of the Subordinate Judge, and that the liquidator’s sole remedy was by suit under ss. 283 and 487 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

[274] Held, that the company having been made a party to the suit, the order of attachment was made under s. 485 of the Civil Procedure Code and consequently under s. 588 an appeal lay from that order. If the company had not been made a party, the High Court would have set aside the order of attachment under s. 622 of the Code, as in that case the Subordinate Judge would have had no jurisdiction to make it.

APPEAL from an order passed by Rao Bahadur Chunilal Maneklal, First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia.

The Dhulia Manufacturing Company, Limited, which was registered under the Indian Companies’ Act (VI of 1882) had a cotton ginning factory at Dhulia and its registered office at Bombay. The manager of the company at Dhulia was one Ahmad Muhammad, who had full authority to borrow money and draw hundis and to do all necessary acts on behalf of the company.

In August, 1894, the directors of the company opened negotiations for the sale of the company's factory at Dhulia to one Haji Umer for Rs. 38,000, and on the 7th September, 1894, while the negotiations were pending, a special resolution was passed to wind up the company voluntarily. The resolution was confirmed on the 6th October, 1894, and in pursuance of it, Mir Ali M. Patel was appointed liquidator under s. 177 of the Indian Companies' Act VI of 1882.

On the 12th November, 1894, the liquidator entered into an agreement with Haji Umer to sell him the factory for the agreed sum of Rs. 38,000.
Under the agreement Haji Umer was to be put in possession of the factory, but the company was to have a lien upon it till the 1st May, 1895, on which date the purchase was to be completed.

In January, 1895, Ahmed Mahomed, the manager, drew hundis for Rs. 10,000 in favour of Biharilal Suklal, the opponent. These hundis were dishonoured and thereupon Biharilal filed a suit in the early part of April, 1895, against Ahmed Mahomed in his own capacity and as manager of the company to recover Rs. 10,552-8-0. His claim professedly was against the company, but he did not make the company, which was then in liquidation, a party to the suit.

On the 6th April, although the company was not a party to the suit, the Subordinate Judge on the application of Biharilal [276] made an order under s. 485 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) attaching before judgment the factory of the company, and the company was prohibited from alienating the factory. Whether or not a notice of the plaintiff's application or of the order made on it was given to the liquidator, was not clear from the record of the case.

The liquidator on the same day applied to the Subordinate Judge to raise the attachment, contending that the Court had no power to attach the property of the company, which was not a party to the suit. On the 8th July the Subordinate Judge made the company a party to the suit, and disallowing the liquidator's objections confirmed his previous order of the 6th April for the attachment of the property. In his judgment the Subordinate Judge treated the company as having been a party throughout.

The liquidator appealed against this order, refusing to raise the attachment.

_Russell with Vishnu K. Bhatavdekar_, for the appellant (liquidator) :-
The order for attachment was wrong on three grounds. First, the company having gone into voluntary liquidation, no order affecting it could be passed without the leave of the Court—s. 212 of the Indian Companies' Act (VI of 1882). The proper Court to apply to in the present case was the High Court, because the company's registered office is at Bombay: see s. 130 of the Act. Section 163 of the English Companies' Act is similar to s. 212 of the Indian Companies' Act. See also Buckley on the Companies' Act, (6th Ed.), p. 396; _In re Thurso New Gas Company (1); Westbury v. Twigg and Co., Limited (2).

Secondly, under s. 484 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), the company ought to have been called upon to furnish security before the

(1) 42 Ch. Div. 486. (2) (1892) 1 Q. B. 77. order for attachment was made, and that not having been done the order is illegal.

Thirdly, the agreement made by the liquidator for the sale of the company's property having been made before the suit was filed, the interest in the property had passed to the intending purchaser. The liquidator should, therefore, be allowed to complete the sale. He will have to account for the proceeds of the sale.

[276] Branson with Trimbak R. Katval, for the respondent (plaintiff).—Our claim is a just one and we shall not be able to reap the benefit of our decree if the attachment is removed and the sale completed.

[FARRAN, C.J.—The liquidator will have the proceeds of the sale in his hands, and you can proceed against him. He is a responsible officer.]

On the merits we contend that the attachment should not be removed. The liquidator should at least be asked to give security.

The Court passed the order for attachment under s. 484 of the Code, and an order passed under that section is not appealable under s. 588. The liquidator can seek redress under ss. 283 and 487 of the Code by instituting a suit.

Russell, in reply.—The order was passed under s. 485, and s. 588 of the Code gives an appeal against an order passed under that section.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The proceedings in this matter have been so very irregular that it is difficult to ascertain precisely in what position the parties now stand. The Dhulia Manufacturing Company, Limited, was a company registered under the Indian Companies' Act, 1882, which carried on business at Dhulia, but had its registered office at Bombay. In August, 1894, the directors of the company had opened negotiations for the sale of the company's factory at Dhulia to one Haji Umer for Rs. 38,000, and while the negotiations were pending, a special resolution was passed in September, 1894, to wind up the company voluntarily. The resolution was confirmed on the 6th October, 1894, when Mir Ali M. Patel was appointed its liquidator under s. 177 of the Act.

On the 12th December, 1894, he entered into a general agreement with the purchaser to sell him the factory at Dhulia for the agreed sum of Rs. 38,000. Under the agreement the purchaser was to enter into possession of the factory, but the company was to have a lien upon it until the completion of the purchase which was to take place on the 1st May, 1895.

On or about the 1st April, 1895, Biharilal Suklal commenced a suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Dhulia [277] to recover a sum of Rs. 10,552-8-0. He made one Ahmad Mahomed the defendant to the suit, professing to sue him in his own individual capacity and as manager of the company. His claim professedly was against the company, but he did not make the company, which was then, as we have said, in liquidation, a party to the suit.

A day or two after filing the suit the plaintiff applied under s. 483 of the Code to attach before judgment, the company's factory at Dhulia, and strange to say, the Subordinate Judge, though the company was not a party to the suit, issued under s. 484 a notice to the defendants to show cause why they should not be required to furnish security for the sum of Rs. 11,000, or why, in default, the property specified in the application should not be attached until further order, and conditionally attached the company's factory until further order.

On the 6th April, under s. 485, this rule was made absolute, as the defendants did not furnish the required security, and the defendants were prohibited from alienating the factory of the company. It does not appear that notice of this application or of the order made upon it was given to the liquidator of the company, though under s. 177 of the Companies' Act he was engaged in winding up its affairs and was charged with the duty of distributing its assets.

On the same 6th April the liquidator of the company applied to raise the attachment. The intending purchaser also made a similar application, but with that we are not concerned here. The application was argued before the Subordinate Judge, when the strange anomaly of attaching the property of the company in a suit to which the company was not a party, was pointed out to him. On the 8th of July the Subordinate Judge made the company a party to the suit, and disallowing the liquidator's objections, confirmed his previous order for the attachment of the property. In his judgment the Subordinate Judge treats the company as having been a party throughout, though technically it was not named as such in the heading of the suit. From this order the company through its liquidator has appealed to this Court.

[278] It is objected that no appeal lies, as the liquidator's remedy is by suit under ss. 283 and 487 if he feels himself aggrieved by the order. That no doubt would be so if the company were not a party to the suit, but in that case the strange anomaly which we have pointed out would remain, that property admittedly the company's, and not the property of the defendants, would have been avowedly attached in a suit to which the company was not a party. It is clear that the Subordinate Judge would have no jurisdiction to make such an order, and we should not, under these circumstances, have hesitated to set aside the order under s. 622 of the Code. It must, however, we think, be taken that the order has now been made against the company under s. 485, and the order is in that case appealable under s. 588.

The appeal must, we think, be allowed. The sale which the liquidator proposes to carry out, and which is the sole foundation for the making of the attachment, is clearly not being carried out "with intent to obstruct or delay the execution of the decree which may be passed against the company." It is a sale about to be completed by the liquidator in the course of his duty in winding up the affairs of the company and in pursuance of a contract of sale entered into long before the plaintiff's suit was instituted.

The order is attempted to be supported by the Subordinate Judge on the ground that the liquidator does not admit the plaintiffs' claim, and that, therefore, he will distribute the company's assets under s. 177 without regard to it. There is no ground for that supposition. The liquidator will be bound to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, if he establish it as a debt, pari passu with the other debts of the company as he is bound to do under s. 177, and there is no reason whatever in this case to suppose that he will not perform his duty. The plaintiff is not entitled to security for his claim in preference to the other creditors of the company. It is unnecessary to consider the other objection made to the order. It will be discharged with costs.

Order discharged with costs.
Municipality—Election—Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Act (II of 1884), s. 231—Application to set aside a municipal election—Order made as to costs—Jurisdiction—High Court, power of, to review such order under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882)—High Court's Circular Order No. 62.

A District Judge acting under s. 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Act (II of 1884) is not a Court within the meaning of the word in s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and the High Court has no jurisdiction to revise his order refusing to set aside an election, nor can it interfere with an order made by him that the applicant shall pay the costs incurred by the opponent.

The High Court's Circular Order (No. 62 at p. 33 of the Order Book) refers to Courts.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the order of F. C. O. Beaman, District Judge of Thana.

The applicant Balaji Sakharam Gurav applied to the District Judge of Thana under s. 23 of the District Municipal Act [280] (Bombay Act II of 1884) to set aside the election of certain persons as municipal commissioners of Thana, alleging that the said elections were irregular and illegal. Notices of the application were issued to the commissioners, and after hearing them the Judge rejected the application and directed the applicant to pay Rs. 200 to one of the commissioners as actual costs sustained by him in opposing the application and Rs. 320 as costs of the commissioner who was appointed to recount the votes given at the said elections.

* Application No. 158 of 1895 under extraordinary jurisdiction.
† Section 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Act (II of 1884):—

23. If the validity of any election of a Municipal Commissioner is brought in question by any person qualified either to be elected or to vote at the election to which such question refers, such person may, at any time within ten days after the date of the declaration of the result of the election, apply to the District Judge of the district within which the election has been or should have been held.

The District Judge may, after such inquiry as he deems necessary, pass an order for confirming or amending the declared result of the election, or for setting the election aside.

For the purpose of the said inquiry the District Judge may exercise any of the powers of a Civil Court, and his decision shall be conclusive.

If he sets aside an election, a date shall forthwith be fixed, and the necessary steps taken for holding a fresh one.

† High Court's Circular Order No. 62:—

In any miscellaneous proceeding not being one involved in or necessary to the conduct of a suit or an appeal to decrete, and in which the subject-matter does not admit of a precise valuation in money, the fee allowed shall, in a District Court or in a Court of Small Causes, be Rs. 10, subject by special order of the Court to diminution to a sum not less than Rs. 5 and to increase to a sum of not more than Rs. 20 for each such proceeding. In the Subordinate Court, and Mamladhar's Courts constituted under Bombay Act III of 1876, the fee shall ordinarily be Rs. 5 subject to increase by special order to a sum not exceeding Rs. 15.
The applicant applied to the High Court under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), contending that the District Judge's order as to costs was made without jurisdiction. A rule nisi was issued to the opponent to show cause why the order should not be set aside.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar appeared for the applicant in support of the rule:—The District Municipal Act has made no provision for costs which are provided for by the High Court's Circular Order No. 62. Though this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an application with respect to an order relating to municipal elections—Jagannath Ponapa v. Rev. M. F. De Sousa (1)—still we submit that the Court can entertain an application in connection with that part of the order which relates to costs. The District Judge had no jurisdiction to order payment of costs.

Chimanlal H. Sotelwad appeared for the opponent to show cause.—This Court has no jurisdiction to entertain this application. The order as to costs forms part and parcel of the order relating to municipal elections. One part of the order is not separable from the other part. Section 23 of the District Municipal Act empowers the District Judge as an individual but not as a Court. Section 622 of the Civil Procedure Code contemplates a Court and not a particular individual. Therefore the present application cannot lie under s. 622 of the Code.

The circular orders also are passed for the guidance of the lower Courts. If the District Judge is not a Court under s. 23 of the District Municipal Act, then the circular orders do not apply to him. Even supposing that the order is illegal or [281] passed without jurisdiction, the applicant's remedy is to bring a suit to recover the costs. The question of hardship cannot be considered under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C.J.—We are of opinion that a District Judge acting under s. 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act Amendment Act, 1884, is not a Court within the meaning of the word in s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and that this Court has no jurisdiction to revise his order refusing to set aside an election. (See Jagannath v. Rev. M. F. De Sousa (1).) For the same reason we cannot interfere with the order he has made that the applicant shall pay the actual costs incurred by the opponent. The circular order referred to (No. 62 at p. 33 of the Order Book) deals only with District Courts, Courts of Small Causes, Subordinate Courts, and Mamladars' Courts. The District Judge in the present case is neither of these, and the order can have no application to him. He is merely a persona designata, and if he has jurisdiction at all to award costs, there is nothing to prevent him from awarding them on the scale he has adopted. On this point of jurisdiction we express no opinion, as his power to award costs has not been contested before us.

We discharge the rule with costs.

Rule discharged.

GORDHANDAS JADOWJI v. HARIVALUBHIDAS BHAI DAS 21 Bom. 283

SMALL CAUSE COURT REFERENCE.

GORDHANDAS JADOWJI (Plaintiff) v. HARIVALUBHIDAS BHAI DAS (Defendant)* [3rd July, 1896.]

Minor—Minority, period of, where guardian has once been appointed although no longer in existence—Indian Majority Act IX of 1875, s. 3—Guardian and Wards Act VIII of 1899, s. 52.

The defendant was sued upon a promissory note executed by him on the 24th August, 1892, being at that time 19 years of age. Eight years previously, viz., [282] on the 4th March, 1884, a guardian of his person and property had been appointed by an order of the High Court, but the guardian had been discharged on the 25th June, 1892, and at the time of the execution of the note sued on there was no guardian in existence either of his person or property.

 Held, that having regard to the provisions of s. 3 of the Indian Majority Act, IX of 1875, the defendant was still a minor at the date of the note.

CASE stated of the opinion of the High Court by Rustomji Merwanji Patell, Second Judge, under s. 69 of the Presidency Small Cause Court Act (XV of 1882).

"1. This was an action on a promissory note for Rs. 501 dated the 24th August, 1892, and interest thereon Rs. 89-9-0.

"2. The defendant pleaded minority and the full payment of the promissory note. I held the defendant was of age at the making of the note, and allowing Rs. 209 only as payment proved, I passed a decree for Rs. 342, including interest and costs, contingent on the opinion of the High Court on the question of minority.

"3. The defendant was born on 20th August, 1873, or Shravan Vad 13th, 1929. At the date of the execution of the note he was 19 years and 4 days old, but it was contended that he was a ward of the High Court, and till be completed his 21st year he should be considered a minor under s. 3 of the Majority Act and s. 52 of the Guardian and Wards Act of 1890.

"4. The following facts were proved:

"(a) Under a decree of the High Court dated the 4th March, 1884, in the suit of Harkisondas Pranjinandas v. Purshotam Pranjinandas, one Parbhudas Govardhandas was appointed guardian of the person and property of the defendant (Ex. No. 1).

"(b) Under an order of the High Court dated 5th May, 1890, one Ramdas Maneclal was on his application appointed guardian of the defendant’s person in place of the said Parbhudas Govardhandas. By the same order the said Parbhudas was asked to hand over the property of the defendant to Mr. Watkins, who had been appointed receiver in the said High Court suit. Mr. Watkins is spoken of in that order as a receiver and not as guardian of the property of the minor (Ex. No. 2).

[283] "(c) On 26th June, 1891, the said Ramdas Maneclal was ordered to be discharged from his office as guardian of defendant’s person upon his rendering accounts to the Master in Equity. He was subsequently discharged as such on the 25th June, 1892, on the Master passing his accounts as per certificate of that date (Ex. No. 3). No other guardian of the defendant's person was thereafter appointed, and the defendant was then of the age of 18 years and ten months.

"(d) Defendant applied to the High Court by his affidavit dated 19th September, 1892, that Mr. Watkins, the receiver, should be ordered to hand over to him all his property. In paragraph 11 he stated that he had arrived at the age of majority and was of the age of 19 years and was sufficiently competent to manage his estate without the assistance of any receiver (copy affidavit put in by consent, Ex. A). The High Court thereupon ordered on the 22nd October, 1892, that Mr. Watkins be discharged as such receiver and hand over the property of the defendant to him (Ex. No. 5).

"6. The promissory note sued on having been executed on the 24th August, 1892, was, therefore, at a time when there was no guardian of the defendant's person or property. I was of opinion that the order directing Mr. Watkins, the receiver appointed under the Civil Procedure Code in the said High Court suit to take charge of the property of the defendant, did not constitute him a guardian of the minor's property (see s. 52 of Act VIII).

"7. The defendant's solicitor relied on Rudra Prokash v. Bholanath(1) and Birjimohan v. Rudra Perkash (2). These cases are based on the provisions of Bengal Act XL of 1858, which do not apply to us; and the ruling in the former case is not followed by the latter, the Court holding that it was clear, from s. 3 of the Majority Act, that the disability of the minority only continued as long as the Court of Wards retained charge of the minor's property and no longer (see p. 949). Yeknath v. Warubai (3) relying on Act XX of 1864 which does not apply to Bombay.

[284] "8. Reading s. 3 of the Majority Act as amended by s. 52 of the Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), I was not prepared to hold, in the absence of any Bombay cases, that on account of the mere circumstance that a guardian has been once appointed of a minor's person or property before he has attained his 18th year, the disability of infancy lasts till the age of 21st, whether the original guardian continues to act or not. On the other hand, looking at the conduct of the defendant, the discharge of the guardian of his person on the 25th June, 1892, his statements of the defendant in his affidavit in the 19th September, 1892, and the consequent release of his property from the hands of the receiver, it would be inequitable to stretch a point in his favour.

"9. I now respectfully submit the following question for the opinion of their Lordships:

"Whether under the above circumstances the defendant was a minor at the date of the execution of the note of the 24th August, 1892, so as to avoid his liability on the note passed by him.”

Macpherson, for the defendant.—He referred to the Indian Majority Act IX of 1875; the Guardian and Wards Act, 1890; Yeknath v.
Warubai (3); Birjimohan Lal v. Rudra Perkash (2); Rudra Prokash v.
Bholanath (1); Khwassish Ali v. Surju Prasad (4).

There was no appearance for the plaintiff.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The question referred for our opinion in this case should, I think, be answered in the affirmative.

(1) 12 C. 612. (2) 17 C. 944. (3) 19 B. 285. (4) 3 A. 599.

Were it not for the doubt expressed in Yeknath v. Warubai (1) I should have thought that the point was absolutely clear. The words of s. 3 of the Indian Majority Act IX of 1875, in so far as they relate to this matter both in its original and amended form, are "Every minor of whose person or property (or of both) a guardian has been or shall be appointed by any Court of justice * * * shall * * be deemed to have attained his majority when he shall have completed his age of 21 years, and not before." The words added to that enactment by s. 52 of Act VIII of 1890 only serve to elucidate its meaning and make it more clear. [285] They explain that a guardian ad litem is not within the scope of the section and show that the appointment of a guardian, in order to have the effect of extending the period of minority, must be made before the minor has attained the age of 18 years.

Now, in this case a guardian both of the person and property of the defendant has been appointed by the High Court by its decree of the 4th March, 1884, before the defendant attained the age of 18 years and the requirements of the section have been complied with. I can see no escape from that conclusion. The words of the section are free from ambiguity, and we have no warrant to vary its meaning by reading words into it which are not to be found therein, and thus to alter the expressed will of the Legislature.

This view is in accordance with the decision in Rudra Prokash v. Bholanath (2) and is not, I think, opposed to the ruling in Birjmohun Lal v. Rudra Perkash (3). When that case is examined it will be found that the ratio decidendi is that there was no proof before the Court that a guardian of the defendant had been appointed by a Court of justice. The Court differed from the decision in Rudra Prokash v. Bholanath only in this that they considered the appointment of a guardian by a Collector not to be an appointment of a guardian by a Court of justice, a point not apparently taken in the former case. The ruling as to the defendant not being at the time of the suit under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, and his majority not being extended by reason of his once having been so, was permissible under the section as it was then worded.

The wording of the section has by Act VIII of 1890, s. 52, been altered in that respect. If it were allowable to have recourse to s. 52 of Act VIII of 1890 to ascertain the intention of the Legislature in framing Act IX of 1875, the conclusion I should draw would be that it intended the effect of any appointment of a guardian to a minor and the assumption by the Court of Wards of the superintendence of his property to be the same, and that such effect should flow from the mere appointment of the guardian, or assumption of superintendence [286] by the Court of Wards, without regard to the circumstance whether the appointment of a guardian or assumption of superintendence continued or not.

The view which I take of the section was also that adopted by the High Court of Allahabad in Khwahish Ali v. Surju Prasad (4). But we have been referred to a later case, Patesri Partap Narain Singh v. Champalal (5) in which the same Court took the opposite view. The Court in the latter case would, I think, have come to a different conclusion had it had before it the language of s. 52 of Act VIII of 1890.

It might have been sufficient to have dealt with this case upon its special facts, which show that the defendant continued to have a guardian until after he had attained the age of 18 years; but it is undesirable to have the law left in doubt (so far as this Presidency is concerned) upon this important point. I have, therefore, dealt with the case in its broader aspect.

Strachey, J. — I am of the same opinion. I was at first impressed by the judgment of Sir John Edge, C. J., and Mr. Justice Knox in Patanari Partap Narain Singh v. Champalal (2); but upon consideration I think that that judgment proceeds not so much upon the terms of s. 3 of Act IX of 1875 as upon a speculation or theory as to the object which the Legislature, in passing the section, had in view.

The language of the section is, however, too clear for such speculation to be admissible in applying it. Speaking generally, it provides that every minor of whose person or property, or both, a guardian "has been or shall be appointed" by a Court of justice before the minor has attained the age of 18 years shall be deemed to have attained his majority upon completion of the age of 21 years, and not before. And we should not be justified in reading into the section an exception that this provision shall not apply where the certificate of guardianship was subsequently cancelled.

If the intention of the Legislature in passing s. 3 of the Act has not been fully effected by the language used, the remedy is in the hands of the Legislature itself. But the words, as they [287] stand, appear to me to be clear. I agree with the Chief Justice that they have been made clearer by the amendment of the section by s. 52 of Act VIII of 1890.

We answer the question in the affirmative. Costs costs in the case. This will leave the Small Cause Court the power to deal with them in its discretion.

VELJI HIRJI AND CO. (Claimants) v. BHARMAL SHRIPAL AND CO. (Attaching Creditors).* [7th August, 1896.]

One Ukerda Punja at Viramgam consigned certain bags of seed to Velji Hirji and Co. at Bombay for sale on commission, and drew hundis against the goods for Rs. 3,200, which at his request Velji Hirji and Co. accepted and paid on receiving the railway receipts by post. The goods were to be sold on arrival on Ukerda Punja's account and the proceeds credited to him as against the advances made by the payment of the hundis. On the arrival of the goods at Bombay, they were attached by Bharmal Shripal and Co., who had obtained decree against Ukerda Punja.

Held, that Velji Hirji and Co. were entitled to the goods. They had made specific advances against the goods, Bharmal Shripal and Co. as attaching creditors occupied the same position as Ukerda Punja himself and had no better claim to the goods than he had, and if he had attempted to prevent the goods reaching the hands of Velji Hirji and Co., who at his request had made specific advances against them, it would have been restrained by injunction.

Held, also, that at the date of attachment the goods were in possession of Ukerda Punja by the railway company "on account of or in trust for" Velji Hirji and Co., in the sense in which that expression is used in s. 280 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

This was a case stated for the opinion of the High Court under s. 69 of the Presidency Small Cause Court Act by [288] Mr. Rustomji Marwanji Patell, Acting Chief Judge, in the following terms:—

"These were three claimants' notices issued under s. 378 of the Civil Procedure Code, calling upon the attaching creditors to show cause why the attachment levied against 562 bags of castor seed, in the possession of the B. B. and C. I. Railway, should not be removed; and why the said goods should not be handed over to the claimants, who were the consignees under the railway receipts and had advanced Rs. 3,200 on the security of the said receipts.

"One Ukerda Punja had consigned the goods from Viramgam for sale on commission in Bombay by the claimants, and drawn four hundis against the same for Rs. 3,200. At the consignor's request, the claimants had accepted and paid the hundis on receiving the railway receipts by post. The goods represented by the receipt were then in transit and had not arrived in Bombay. The sale of the goods on arrival was to be made on account and at the risk of the consignor, and the proceeds thereof credited to him as against the advance to his debit.

"On the evidence I was of opinion that the claimants had made an advance by the payment of the hundi of Rs. 2,200 against the railway receipts for 387 bags and of Rs. 1,000 against the receipts for 175 bags.

"The railway receipts were in the usual form adopted by the B. B. and C. I. and the Rajputana-Malwa Railways, and were headed 'Goods receipt note.' The material portion was as follows:—

"Received from Punja the undermentioned goods for conveyance by goods train, consigned to Velji at Carnac Bridge Station. The railway company reserves to itself the right of refusing to deliver the goods without the production of the receipt or until the person entitled, in its opinion, to receive them has given an indemnity to the satisfaction of the railway. If the consignee does not himself attend, he must endorse a request for delivery to the person to whom it wishes it made."

"The goods arrived in Bombay on or about the 22nd August, 1895, and were immediately after attached by the firm of Bharmal Shripal, who had obtained three decrees against the consignor, Ukerda Punja. The claimants then applied for the removal [289] of the attachment, and based their claim (1) on being holders of the railway receipts representing the said goods; (2) on having advanced moneys on the security of the same; and (3) on having the property in the goods transferred to them by delivery of the railway receipts. Their counsel contended that the railway receipts were 'documents of title, or documents showing title to goods,' and relied on s. 103 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872).

"No evidence was laid before me to prove any custom or mercantile usage to show that merchants in Bombay had, in making advances on the security of railway receipts, invariably recognised these receipts as 'documents of title.'
I was of opinion that the circumstances of the present case of an advance made by an agent for his principal on the faith of the railway receipts did not fall within the purview of either s. 108 or 178 of the Contract Act; and that these sections did not apply. In the absence of any specific provision of the Contract Act, I applied the principles of common law as they stood before the passing of that Act; and I was of opinion that the railway receipts were not 'documents of title' or 'documents showing title of goods.' I also held that by the mere delivery of the receipts to the claimants, and the subsequent advance made on them, the consignor did not transfer any possession to the consignees. I held that the claimants had neither actual nor constructive possession by attachment of the goods; the possession of the carrier was the possession of the consignor, and not of the consignee, the goods having been carried at the risk and on account of the consignor, and not at the orders of the consignee.

I was of opinion that such railway receipts could not be placed on a higher footing than the delivery orders issued after the arrival of the goods at the railway station which in the case of Coventry v. G. E. Railway Company (1) Brett, M. R., held to be non-negotiable instruments that did not pass the property to the pledgee. The wording of the delivery orders in that suit was certainly much stronger than that of the railway receipts [290] in question. I, therefore, held that railway receipts could be regarded only as tokens of authority to receive possession, and that they did not operate to transfer possession, and relied on Farina v. Home (2) and McKenzie v. Smith (3). They could not be likened to bills of lading and could only be treated as delivery orders or dock warrants at common law, which, as Parke, B., said in the former case, were no more than an engagement by the wharfinger to deliver to the consignee or any one he may appoint. I also relied on the G. I. P. Railway Company v. Hanmandas (4), though it was restricted to the construction of s. 103 of the Contract Act as regards an unpaid vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, as the reasoning of Sir Charles Sargent seemed equally applicable to the circumstances of the present case.

I held, therefore, that the claimants had no lien against the 562 bags they claimed, and that they failed to establish any right to the possession of them as against the attaching creditor of the consignor; and under s. 281 of the Code I disallowed the claim.

At the request of the counsel for the claimants, my judgment was delivered contingent on the opinion of the High Court. I beg to invite the opinion of their Lordships on the following questions submitted on behalf of the claimants:

1. Whether the possession of the railway receipts, coupled with the fact of the claimants having made advances on the same, did not, in law, give the claimants the right to claim the goods represented or covered by such receipts wholly or to the extent of their advances.

2. Whether the possession of the railway company was not the possession of the claimants after the consignor parted with the railway receipts and obtained advances on the same.

3. Whether railway receipts in the hands of a commission agent, who had made specific advances against them, are not documents of title.

entitling the agent to claim the goods covered by the receipts against a judgment-creditor of such goods.

4. Whether the claimants obtained any lien over or property in the goods represented by the railway receipts on the security of which the claimants made specific advances.

5. Whether, on the facts found, the Court was not in error in disallowing the claim.

Lang (Advocate General) and Macpherson, for the claimants:—The lower Court has failed to see the real point in the case. There is a good equitable assignment of the goods to us. The consignor having induced us to pay the bills could not have stopped the goods. The attaching creditors can stand in no better position than the debtor, the consignor—Mekji Hansraj v. Ramji Joita (1); Whitworth v. Gaugain (2); Luscher v. Comptoir D’Escompte (3). There can be no doubt that the arrangement was that on paying the hundis we were to get the goods—Ranken v. Alfar (4).

Scott for the attaching creditors:—The advance in this case was not against the goods but against the railway receipts. This distinguishes the case from Mekji Hansraj v. Ramji Joita. So again Luscher v. Comptoir D’Escompte (3) is distinguishable, as the advance there was against the bill of lading which is the symbol of the goods at common law, whereas railway receipts are, under the decisions of this Court, not documents of title. Ranken v. Alfar (4) is in my favour, as it shows possession is a condition precedent to a lien. The claimant has advanced his money against documents which are worthless.

Lang in reply:—The Judge has held that by the agreement the payments were made for the goods. This is a specific appropriation in our favour—Ex parte Banner; In re Tappenbeck (5).

JUDGMENT.

FAHRAN, C.J.—The exact legal relations between the parties in this case do not seem to have been borne in mind with sufficient distinctness by the counsel or pleader who, on behalf of the claimants, presented the points for his consideration to the learned Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court.

It appears from the case as stated that one Ukerja Punja consigned the goods in question from Viramgam to the claimants (292) Velji Hirji and Co., Bombay, for sale on commission by the latter, and drew four hundis against the same, i.e., against the goods, which hundis the claimants’ firm accepted and paid on receiving the railway receipts by post. On the arrival of the goods in Bombay Bharmal Shripal and Co., who were judgment-creditors of Ukerja Punja, attached the same as the property of their judgment-debtor. The contest, therefore, lies between the judgment creditors of Ukerja Punja on the one hand, who have attached the goods, and the claimants’ firm of Velji Hirji and Co., who have made specific advances against the goods, on the other hand. The claimants’ firm have neither sold the goods to a purchaser nor pledged them to a third party; so neither s. 108 nor s. 178 of the Contract Act has any bearing upon the case. On the other hand, the firm of Bharmal Shripal and Co. are not either unpaid vendors of the goods seeking to stop them in transitu under s. 103 of the Contract Act, nor are they purchasers nor pledges of the goods. They simply occupy the position of attaching creditors. What that position is, has been pointed with great clearness by Wetropp, C.J., in the case of Megji Hansraj v. Ramji Joita (1). They occupy exactly the same position as their judgment-debtor Ukerda Punja himself. They stand in his shoes and are in no better and no worse situation with reference to the goods in question than he would have been in had he been to prevent the goods reaching the hands of Velji Hirji and Co. It is to our minds clear that Ukerda Punja, had attempted to prevent the goods reaching the hands of the claimants, who had made specific advances against them at his request, would have been promptly restrained in the attempt by an injunction. The case of Lutscher v.

Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris (2), cited by the Advocate General, is, in our opinion, exactly in point. There the equitable agreement was to place the bill of lading in the hands of the firm who had made advances against it. Here it is to place the goods in the hands of the advancing firm.
Mr. Scott, with extreme ingenuity, contended that the claimants' firm made the advances, not on the goods, but on the railway receipts, and, therefore, advanced their moneys on worthless documents which are not, like [293] a bill of lading, symbols of the goods at all. We do not so read the case. Its third paragraph states that Ukerda Punja drew against the goods, though the time when Velji Hirji and Co. were to accept and pay the hundis so drawn was on the receipt of the railway receipts. The rest of the paragraph (3) makes this still more clear. The sale of the goods on arrival was to be made on account of the consignor, and the proceeds thereof credited to him against the advances. The Judge no doubt goes on to say: "On this evidence I was of opinion that the claimants had made an advance by the payment of the hundis of Rs. 2,200 against the railway receipts for 387 bags, and of Rs. 1,000 against the receipt for 175 bags;" but what Ukerda Punja drew against were the goods, and the claimants were to be paid their advances out of the proceeds of the goods. The learned Judge cannot, we think, be taken to mean that he was of opinion that the claimants had made the advances against the railway receipts, but that the particular advances which he refers to were made against the goods specified in the particular railway receipts which he mentions.

It comes to this that by agreement between Ukerda Punja and the claimants the latter were to make advances against the goods specified in the railway receipts when they received such receipts, and were to pay themselves their advances out of the proceeds of such goods when they received and sold them. We cannot doubt but that that agreement constituted a good equitable charge upon the goods as between Ukerda Punja and claimants' firm when the rights of third parties did not intervene. We have already stated that the attaching creditors are but the alter ego for this purpose of Ukerda Punja. No argument was addressed to us by Mr. Scott, based upon the wording of s. 289 of the Civil Procedure Code. We do not, however, think that it offers any difficulty, as in the view which we take of the case we find no difficulty in holding that, at the date of the attachment, the goods were in possession of Ukerda Punja by the railway company "on account of or in trust for" the claimants in the comprehensive sense in which that expression is used in the section. We notice the point lest it might be thought that we had overlooked it. The only doubt which we have felt in the matter is whether, as the [294] aspect of the case, which we have been above considering, was not presented to the acting learned Chief Judge, and was probably not present to his mind when he was stating the case and framing the questions to be submitted to the Court for opinion, we ought to give our opinion upon it. But we think that, as the question (5) "whether on the facts found the Court was not in error in dismissing the claim" is in the widest possible terms, we are at liberty to determine it: and as the facts are all before us, that we ought not to make shipwreck of a good cause upon the rock of overfine technicality by refusing to entertain it. We answer the fifth question in the affirmative, but do not consider it necessary to answer the other questions submitted for our opinion, as our answer to the fifth question is sufficient to dispose of the case. Costs of the reference will be costs in the case.

SMALL CAUSE COURT REFERENCE.

IMPERIAL BANK OF PERSIA (Plaintiff) v. FATTECHAND KHUBCHAND (Defendant). [25th September, 1896.]

Hundi—Bill of exchange—Suit by holder and indorsee against payee and indorser—Presentment to acceptor—Local usage as to presentment—Usage of presentment at Bushire—Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), ss. 70, 71.

The plaintiff as holder and indorsee of a hundi drawn on one Haji Mirza sued defendant as payee and indorser to recover Rs. 1,193-4-0 on a hundi which had been dishonoured by the acceptor.

It was found by the Court (1) that the local usage at Bushire was to present the hundi for payment at the bank and for the acceptor to call at the bank at due date and effect settlement; (2) that the hundi in question was presented for payment to the authorized agent of the acceptor at the bank on the due date; (3) that the said agent refused payment and informed the bank that the acceptor would not pay the hundi. It was argued that presentment at the bank was not good presentment, having regard to ss. 70, 71 and 137 of the Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881).

Held, that the local usage made the presentment a good presentment.

[298] Case stated for the opinion of the High Court by Rustomji Merwanji Patell, Acting Chief Judge, Bombay Small Cause Court, under s. 69 of Small Cause Court Act (XV of 1882).—

"1. This was a suit by the holders and indorsee of a hundi written in the Persian character and drawn in Bombay on one Haji Mirza Ahmed Shirazi for 350 tunmans payable fifty days after date. The defendant was the payee and the indorser of the hundi. The plaintiffs sent the hundi from Bombay to their branch bank at Bushire on the 4th of August, 1895. On that day the acceptor refused payment, and plaintiffs after due notice to the defendant in Bombay filed this suit to recover Rs. 1,193-4-0 as on a dishonoured hundi.

"2. The case first came on for hearing on the 11th May, 1896, when the only defences raised were want of notice of dishonour, and payment of the hundi, either in whole or in part, by the acceptor. On the application of the defendant’s solicitor a commission was issued to Bushire to prove the plea of payment.

3. On the return of the commission evidence, the suit was heard on 10th August last, when the plea of payment was abandoned by the defendant’s solicitor and a fresh defence raised denying that the presentation for payment to the acceptor was made as required by the Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881).

4. The plaintiffs relied on the evidence of the manager, accountant and clerk of the bank at Bushire as taken on commission on the defendant’s behalf, and I held as proved (1st) that the hundi was presented for payment to the authorized agent of the acceptor at the bank on the due date; (2nd) that the said agent refused payment and informed the bank that the acceptor would not pay that hundi; (3rd) that the local usage or custom at Bushire was to present the hundis for payment at the bank and for acceptors of hundis to call at the bank on the due date to effect settlement.

5. For the defence it was argued that reading ss. 70, 71 and 137 together, the presentment at the bank could not be held valid, and that the suit must fail. This defence was disallowed, as I held that the latter part of s. 137 should be read with [296] the proviso to s. 1, which provides that nothing contained in the Act affects any local usage relating to any instrument in an oriental language. I was of opinion that in the case of native hundis the rules of English law were not strictly applicable, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

6. At the request of the defendant’s solicitor I beg respectfully to submit the following question for their Lordships’ opinion:—

Whether, under the circumstances hereinabove-mentioned and referring to the proviso as to local usage in s. 1 of the Act, the presentment at the bank was a presentment that satisfied the requirements of the Act.

7. The defendant has paid into Court the amount of judgment and professional costs, with Rs. 50 for costs of reference.

Macpherson appeared for the plaintiff.
Branson for the defendant.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C.J.—As we read the case, the local usage or custom found to prevail in Bushire does not exclude the usual presumption which accords with the law as laid down in s. 75 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, that what a person can himself do he can do by an authorised agent.

Reading it in that light we have no doubt that the local usage in this case makes the presentment a good presentment, and that the question referred to us must be answered in the affirmative.

Costs of reference to be costs in the suit to be taxed as on the original side of the High Court.

Re ARANVAYAL SABHAPATHY MOODLIAR, an adjudged Insolvent.
KARAMALLI JOOSUB AND ANOTHER, Petitioning Creditors.
[26th February, 1897.]

Insolvency—Adjudication of insolvency—Concurrent proceedings in two Insolvency Courts in India—Jurisdiction—Discretion of Court to which second application for adjudication order is made—Act of insolvency—Departure from jurisdiction with intent to delay creditors—Indian Insolvency Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21), s. 9.

On the 23rd April, 1896, A was adjudged insolvent under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvency Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21) by the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Bombay at the instance of certain creditors resident in Bombay. He subsequently took out a rule to annul the order of adjudication on the ground that as the date of the said order he had already (viz., on the 9th April, 1896) been adjudged an insolvent by the Insolvency Court at Madras.

Held, discharging the rule, that the prior adjudication of the Madras Court did not deprive the Court at Bombay of jurisdiction to adjudicate him an insolvent at the instance of a Bombay creditor. The latter Court, however, was not bound under s. 9 to make such order, but had a discretion to refuse it if having regard to all the circumstances of the case it considered that adjudication in Bombay would be useless.

Subsequently to the order of adjudication in Bombay, and while it was still in force, the insolvent obtained his personal discharge in the Insolvency Court at Madras under s. 49 of the Indian Insolvency Act.

Held, that there being no longer any ground for apprehending that the proceedings in the Madras Court would be discontinued, the proceedings in the Court at Bombay should be stayed, leaving the Bombay creditors to take such steps in Madras as they might think proper. It would not be just or equitable to allow the proceedings in both Courts to go on concurrently. As the proceedings in Madras were prior in time and all the assets of the insolvent were vested in the official assignee there, the Court at Bombay ought to yield to the prior claim of the Court at Madras.

A debtor in Bombay summoned his creditors to a meeting fixed for the 28th March, 1896. He attended that meeting which was adjourned to the 90th March, and at the adjourned meeting he submitted a statement showing that he had a sum of Rs. 11,000 in cash in his hands. Two of his creditors asked him to give inspection of his Bombay books of accounts, but he refused to do so. A further meeting was summoned for the 8th April. On the 1st March or 1st April two of his Bombay creditors served him with a summons in an action of debt. On the 6th April he left Bombay for Bellary taking the said sum of Rs. 11,000 with him in order (as he admitted) to prevent the said two creditors from attacking it. The creditors attended the meeting of the 8th April, but it was dissolved when it was discovered that A had left Bombay. The books were not produced.

Held, that under these circumstances the Court was justified in concluding that A had left the jurisdiction of the Court with intent to defeat and delay his creditors within the meaning of s. 9 of the Indian Insolvency Act.

creditors fixed for the 8th April, 1896; (2) that on the 6th of April, 1896, he departed from his place of business with intent to defeat or delay his creditors; and (3) that he on the same day made a fraudulent assignment of a sum of Rs. 10,000.

On the 1st July, 1896, a rule was obtained on behalf of the said insolvent calling upon the said petitioning creditors to show cause why the said order of the 23rd April, 1896, should not be annulled or set aside on the ground that at the date of the Bombay adjudication he had already been adjudicated insolvent by the Insolvency Court at Madras.

On the 26th August, 1896, the rule came on for hearing.

Mankar, for the petitioning creditors showed cause against the rule.—Failure to attend a meeting of creditors is an act of insolvency—Ex parte Beer (1).

This Court has jurisdiction to make an adjudication order against the insolvent, although the Insolvency Court at Madras had made a similar order as far back as the 9th of April, 1896—Ex parte McCulloch (2); Ex parte Robinson (3).

It is clear from the affidavits that the insolvent did make a fraudulent assignment of Rs. 10,000.

Macpherson and Scott, contra.—Where there has been one adjudication, the Court under ordinary circumstances will not make another—Royal Bank of Scotland v. James Cuthbert (4). Section 7 of the Insolvent Act is similar to the Act under which that case was decided. The vesting is imperative. All the assets of the insolvent have already vested in the Official Assignee at Madras, [299] and there is nothing now on which the vesting order made here can operate. There is no reason why there should now be a second adjudication. If it is suggested that it will be hard upon the creditors to have to go to Madras to oppose the insolvent's discharge, the answer is that, if this adjudication is not revoked, the creditors will be able to oppose his discharge and proceed against him under the criminal sections of the Act in both places, which will be unfair to the insolvent.

STRACHEY, J.—This is a rule granted by me on the 1st July, 1896, at the instance of Aranvayal Sabhapathy Moodliar, who on the 23rd April was adjudged by Fulton, J., under s. 9 of the Indian Insolvent Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21) to have committed an act of insolvency, calling upon the petitioning creditor to show cause why the order of adjudication should not be revoked.

At the time when the order was made, the Court was not aware that on the 9th April the same debtor had already been adjudged to have committed an act of insolvency, and that a vesting order had been made by the Court for the Relief of the Insolvent Debtors at Madras. The circumstances in which the order of the Madras Court was made are stated in my judgment of the 11th August granting an application by the official assignee of Madras under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the release from attachment of property which, after the vesting order, had been attached in execution of the decree in suit No. 181 of 1896 (5). The petition upon which the order of the 28th April was made is supported by affidavits which, if I believe them, disclose ample grounds for an adjudication under s. 9 of the statute.

The main ground upon which I am asked to revoke the order is that after the Madras Court had adjudged the debtor to have committed an act of insolvency and had made a vesting order, a second adjudication by this Court should not have been made and ought not now to be continued. Having regard to the cases of Ex parte McCulloch (1), Ex parte Robinson (2) and In re Artola [301] Hermanos (3) I am satisfied that this Court had jurisdiction to make its order of adjudication, notwithstanding the prior adjudication by the Madras Court. Those were decisions under the English Bankruptcy Acts of 1869 and 1883; but the principles upon which they are based appear to me equally applicable to cases under the Indian Insolvent Act. Indeed, the jurisdiction to make the order was not seriously contested in the argument at the Bar, and the substantial contention on behalf of the insolvent was that the Court had discretion in the matter, and that in the exercise of that discretion an adjudication ought not to be made after the Madras Court's order. On behalf of the petitioning creditor it was not contended that, assuming the Court to have jurisdiction to make the order, it had no discretion to refuse an adjudication upon proof of the facts required by s. 9 of the statute. That seems, however, to be implied by the decision of Marriott, J., in In the matter of Thucker Bhagvandas Hariyvan (4). He held that the words "it shall be lawful for the Court to adjudge that such person has committed an act of insolvency" were not intended by the Legislature to give the Court a discretion to adjudge or not according to the circumstances of each particular case, but that "inasmuch as they confer on the Court authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, they make it imperative on the Court to exercise that authority when the case arises, and the exercise of that authority is duly applied for." As authority for this conclusion he relied on the case of Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford (5) in which the effect of the words in a statute "it shall be lawful" was discussed by the House of Lords. It appears to me that his application of the principles established by that case is open to question. None of the judgments lay down an absolute rule that where the words "it shall be lawful" confer on a Court authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, they make it imperative on the Court to exercise that authority when the case arises, and the exercise of that authority is duly applied for. What they lay down is that the words themselves are always permissive and enabling, and never imperative; but that the context, the subject-matter of the statute, the nature of the authority or the thing authorised and all the surrounding circumstances may show that the Legislature intended to couple with the authority a duty to exercise it when invoked. Whether the Legislature intended to create an imperative duty or to allow a discretion in the matter, depends upon the nature, the objects, and the construction of the statute itself, and not upon the enabling words "it shall be lawful" which create the authority. It was further held that it lies upon those who contend that an obligation exists to exercise the authority to show in the circumstances of the case something which creates this obligation: see also In re Baker (6).

The question, then, is whether it can be inferred from the nature and objects and construction of the Indian Insolvent Act that the Legislature intended the exercise of the authority created by the words in s. 9 "it shall be lawful" to be a duty in the performance of which the Court was to have no discretion. Now in England, no doubt, under the 13 Eliz., c. 7, which enacted that the Lord Chancellor, upon complaint being made to him against any bankrupt, should have "full power and authority" to issue a commission, it was held in the case of Alderman Backwell (1) in 1883 that the Lord Chancellor had no discretion, but was bound to issue the commission. In later cases, however, it was held that although a commission of bankruptcy was a matter of right to the subject, still the Court had a large discretion to prevent proceedings in bankruptcy being taken for an improper purpose or a purpose not connected with the legitimate objects of a commission—Yate Lee on Bankruptcy (3rd Ed.), p. 80. Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, it was held that the commissioner had jurisdiction to refuse to adjudicate if he knew anything which made an adjudication improper—Ex parte National Bank of England (2). The terms of s. 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were far more imperative than the "it shall be lawful" of s. 9 of the Indian Insolvent Act: they provided that the Court, if satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading (302) if necessary, and the act of bankruptcy, "shall adjudge the debtor to be bankrupt." Yet in Ex parte Brigstocke (3) the Court expressly refrained from holding "that the order for adjudication is to follow as a matter of course when the statutory requisites are proved to exist," and suggested cases in which a discretion to refuse the order might be exercised. In Ex parte McCullock (4) the Court went further, and not only refused to hold that s. 8 "made the adjudication so clearly ex debito justitiae that the Court had no discretion in the matter," but held that notwithstanding its terms, the Court "retained its old jurisdiction to refuse to make a man bankrupt for an improper purpose, and to annul an adjudication when the justice and convenience of the case required it." In Ex parte Robinson (5) the Court went still further, treated the discretion as complete, and held that the existence of a bankruptcy in Scotland or Ireland was prima facie a reason for not exercising the jurisdiction. In re Artaia Hermanos (6) was decided under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 7 (3) of which gives the Court a discretion to dismiss a creditor's bankruptcy petition if satisfied that no receiving order ought to be made; and, the jurisdiction to make the order being undoubted, the question whether it should be made was treated as entirely one of discretion. The cases appear to me to establish that there is nothing in the nature and objects of the bankruptcy laws to justify the inference that the Legislature, even when using much stronger expressions than "it shall be lawful," intended to make an adjudication an imperative duty in the performance of which, if the legal requisites of an adjudication were satisfied, the Court should exercise no discretion, however improper or inexpeditent such an order might be. I think that the same principle applies to the Indian Insolvent Act; that, therefore, the words in s. 9 "it shall be lawful" must be given their ordinary permissive and enabling sense, and that the Court has a discretion to refuse an adjudication under the section.

Assuming, then, on the one hand, that this Court had jurisdiction to make the order of adjudication notwithstanding the order (303) of the Madras Court, and on the other, that it has a discretion under the circumstances to refuse the adjudication, ought I now to exercise that discretion and revoke this Court's order? The principles upon which the discretion should be exercised are shown by the cases of Ex parte McCullock (4).

Ex parte Robinson (1) and In re Artola Hermanos (2). In the first it was held that, in the absence of any of the equitable considerations, which would make an adjudication improper or inexpedient, the creditors had a right to ask the proper tribunal to adjudge their debtor a bankrupt; that the fact that he had previously been adjudged a bankrupt did not make that untrue; that it was a material circumstance that the debtor was the only person opposing the adjudication; and that an adjudication should be made for what it was worth, leaving for future determination the question in what Court the assets ought ultimately to be administered. In the second case it was held that prima facie the mere existence of a bankrupt in Scotland or in Ireland would be a reason for refusing to make an adjudication, but also that prima facie, there being a good petitioning creditor's debt and an act of bankruptcy proved, the Court would make an adjudication if there were any assets in England. In the third case it was held (see the judgment of Fry, L. J.) that a receiving order ought to be made where the conditions of the Act had been satisfied, unless there was some valid reason to the contrary; and that not only was no such reason made out, but the presence of assets in England was a strong circumstance in favour of making the order. These principles are fully applicable to the present case. Assuming the facts stated in the affidavits to be established to my satisfaction, there is here a good petitioning creditor's debt; there are large assets in Bombay; an act of insolvency was committed here; and only the debtor opposes the adjudication.

The chief ground upon which the adjudication is resisted is that as all the assets of the insolvent have already vested in the Madras official assignee, there are no assets upon which a vesting order of this Court could operate, and consequently there would be nothing for the official assignee of this Court to administer, and the adjudication would be useless. That having regard to [304] ss. 7 and 11 of the statute, all the assets of the insolvent, future as well as present, vest in the Madras official assignee by virtue of the vesting order of the 9th April, and that no subsequent vesting order of this Court could affect the rights acquired under that order, I have no doubt whatever. All that the official assignee of this Court could obtain by virtue of this Court's order would be a sort of contingent or reversionary interest in the assets in the event of the order of the 9th April being hereafter set aside. In my opinion, however, this fact is not a reason for revoking the adjudication. In the first place, the argument that all the property of the debtor had already vested in the Irish assignee did not induce the Court in Ex parte McCulloch (3) to hold its hand. In the second place, although no doubt the distribution of assets is the principal object of an adjudication of insolvency, it is not the exclusive object. There are many cases in which an adjudication is made, though the assets are nil. The creditors have a right to an investigation of the whole of the insolvent's conduct. Apart from the distribution of assets, that investigation may possibly result in his prosecution under the penal provisions of the statute. It is not suggested that this insolvent has so acted as to bring himself within those provisions, or that his prosecution is likely or is desired by the creditors. But the question is whether it is reasonable that the Bombay creditors who would ordinarily be entitled to an investigation in this Court the result of which would show whether there is ground for a prosecution or not, should be deprived of that right.

or sent with their witnesses? all the way to Madras for the purpose.
Another consideration which influences my mind is that I am informed by the counsel for the insolvent that steps have been taken, or are about to be taken, to induce the Madras Court to revoke its adjudication. Having regard to the circumstances, in which that order was made, it is, at all events, possible that these steps may be successful. If merely by reason of the Madras Court's order I were to revoke an adjudication to which the Bombay creditors would otherwise be entitled, the result of that order being set aside would be that the property of the insolvent would revest in him and might be dealt with [308] to the serious injury of the creditors.
On the other hand, if the adjudication stands, the assets, in the event of the Madras order being set aside, would immediately vest in the official assignee of this Court, who would at once take steps for their protection.
I fully recognise that the Madras Court by virtue of its prior order has the right to control the proceedings; and care must, of course, be taken that nothing is done here which could interfere with the exercise of that right or of the functions of the Madras official assignee. It seems reasonable, however, that, as was done in Ex parte McCulloch, the adjudication should continue for what it is worth, and that the Madras Court should have before it all the proper materials for deciding whether it is for the benefit of the creditors generally that the administration should be conducted there or here. For these reasons I am of opinion that if an act of insolvency has been committed, and the other conditions of the statutes satisfied, the rule should be discharged.

(His Lordship then proceeded to find on the facts that an act of insolvency had been committed, and discharged the rule, ordering the costs of the petitioning creditor to be paid out of any assets of the insolvent which might vest in the official assignee of this Court in his capacity as such and not in his capacity as agent or attorney of the official assignee of Madras.)

The insolvent appealed against the order discharging the rule on the following grounds:—

(1) That prior to the date of the order of adjudication in Bombay all the assets of the insolvent had become vested in the official assignee of the Insolvent Court in Madras by an order of that Court dated 9th April, 1896.

(2) That it was unjust and inconvenient that the insolvent should be subject to insolvency proceedings in Madras and Bombay concurrently.

(3) That the evidence showed that the petitioning creditors knew, when they presented the petition for adjudication at Bombay, that the appellant had already been adjudicated an insolvent at Madras and had willfully concealed the fact from the Court.

The appeal came on for hearing before Farran, C. J., and Fulton, J., on the 26th February, 1897.

Inverarity and Anderson, for the appellant (insolvent):——The first question is whether there can be concurrent proceedings [306] in different Insolvent Courts in India against the same person. The Court below has decided the point in reliance on the English cases which have held that a foreign bankruptcy is no bar to an adjudication in England —Ex parte Mc Culloch (1); Ex parte Robinson (2); In re Artola Hermanos (3). These cases, however, do not apply. There the bankruptcies were in two different Courts foreign to each other and acting under wholly different laws.

(1) 14 Ch. D. 716.    (2) 22 Ch. D. 816.    (3) 21 Q. B. D. 640.
Here the Courts are the Courts of the same country and are acting under the same statute. There is no provision in the Act for transferring cases from one Court to another as there is in England, and there is nothing in it to show that concurrent proceedings in different Courts may go on. See ss. 77 and 81. A vesting order has been made in Madras. How can there be a second vesting order made in Bombay? Further proceedings in the insolvency have been taken in Madras. An application to revoke the adjudication order has been made and refused, and on the 11th January last, the insolvent got his personal discharge under s. 49 of the Insolvency Act. Are these proceedings to be taken over again in the Insolvent Court in Bombay? We submit that the proceedings in the Madras Court are sufficient, and that the adjudication order made in the Court should be set aside—In re Strick (1).

The next question is whether the appellant committed an act of insolvency so as to justify the adjudication order under s. 9 of the Act. We submit that he has not.

Lastly we say that from the affidavits filed it appears that this adjudication order was obtained by the petitioning creditors, because the appellant would not give them a fraudulent preference. The authorities show that when creditors seek to use the Court from an improper motive it will refuse an adjudication order—In re Davies (2); In re Adams (3).

Mankar, for the respondent (petitioning creditor) :—The two last points are not taken in the memorandum of appeal and should not be heard. It is clear, however, that the appellant did [307] commit an act of insolvency under s. 9 in leaving Bombay on the 6th April, 1896, with intent to defeat his creditors. A meeting of his creditors was called for the 8th April, and he left Bombay two days before it—Ex parte Beer (4).

It is not shown that the adjudication order in this case was obtained from any improper motive, and the cases cited do not apply.

With regard to concurrent proceedings, this Court in the absence of any Indian authority on the point will follow the English rulings—Ex parte McCulloch (5); Ex parte Robinson (6); In re Artola Hermanos (7). The Indian Insolvency Act contains no provision on the point.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—We agree with the learned Judge who presided in the Insolvent Court in this matter that the prior adjudication of the Madras Court did not deprive the Insolvent Court in Bombay of jurisdiction to adjudicate the appellant an insolvent at the instance of a Bombay creditor, assuming that the elements necessary to give the Court jurisdiction existed in the case. In analogous cases in England, the Lords Justices had no doubt as to the jurisdiction, and we feel unable to distinguish them in principle from the case before us—Ex parte McCulloch (5); Ex parte Robinson (6); In re Artola Hermanos (7).

We also agree with the learned Judge that the Court had a discretion vested in it to refuse the adjudication order if having regard to all the circumstances of the case it considered that adjudication in Bombay would be a vain and useless proceeding. The cases which we have referred to are also authorities for that proposition. In re Betts (8) is an authority to the same effect. The words of our statute (11 and 12 Vict. c. 21, s. 2)—"It shall be lawful for the Court to adjudge that such person has committed an act of insolvency; provided always that it shall be lawful for the said Court * * * to revoke or confirm such adjudication"—appear to us to continue to the Insolvent Courts in India the jurisdiction which English Courts of Bankruptcy [308] have always exercised "to refuse to make a man bankrupt for an improper purpose, and to annul an adjudication when the justice and the convenience of the case require it," per James L. J. in Ex parte Mc Cullock (1).

On the part of the appellant it is contended that he has not committed an act of bankruptcy in Bombay, and that, therefore, an element necessary to give the Court jurisdiction does not exist in his case. The act of bankruptcy relied on before us by the respondent is that the insolvent being a trader liable to become bankrupt "departed from within the limits of the jurisdiction of this Court with intent to defeat or delay his creditors." It is not denied that the appellant was a trader. He carried on business on an extensive scale, and had (as appears from a statement which he made out to be laid before his creditors, annexed to the petition of the petitioning creditor) a head office at Bellary and branches at Madras and Bombay. The same statement shows that his debts in Bombay amounted to nearly Rs. 7½ lakhs, while he had a large amount of assets, there—not, however, free assets. The free assets were comparatively small. It also appears that his total assets fall short of his liabilities, by nearly seven lakhs. Narayan Dhondiba was the manager of his Bombay Branch.

It does not appear when the insolvent came to Bombay on the last occasion. On the 21st March, 1896, he sent circulars to his Bombay creditors, requesting them to attend a meeting on the 28th of that month. It was held, the insolvent being present, and was adjourned to the 30th March. He then submitted a statement to the meeting, showing, amongst other things, that he had a sum of Rs. 11,000 in cash in his hands. Two of his creditors asked him to give inspection of his Bombay books of account, but he refused to do so. A further meeting was arranged on the 8th April. On the 31st March or 1st April, two of his Bombay creditors, Sardarmal and Lalchand, served him with a summons in an action of debt. On the 6th April he left Bombay for Bellary, taking the balance of the Rs. 11,000 (after paying some wages) with him, to prevent, as he admits, Sardarmal and Lalchand from attaching it. The creditors attended the [309] meeting of the 8th April, but it was dissolved when it was discovered that the insolvent had left Bombay. The books were not produced. On the 9th April he was adjudicated an insolvent in Madras.

We think that under the above circumstances the learned Judge of the Insolvent Court was justified in coming to the conclusion that the insolvent left the jurisdiction of this Court with the intent alleged in the petition. The natural result of an insolvent thus leaving Bombay with a large sum of money, and refusing to allow his books to be inspected, is, we think, to defeat and delay creditors, and the case of Ex parte Beer (2) shows that the Court will attribute to the insolvent the intention which is the natural result of his acts. His admission, moreover, that he took away the cash to defeat an attachment, brings the case within the actual words of the section.

(1) 14 Ch. D. 716 (723).
(2) 1 M. D. & De G. 390.
We pass to consider whether the appellant has made out such improper motives on the part of the petitioning creditor as to induce the Court to revoke the adjudication. This reason for annulling the proceedings was not, it is admitted, urged before the Insolvent Court, but as the argument on this head was based upon the affidavits which were used before that Court, it is open to us to consider it. That the petitioning creditor was originally favourable to the insolvent, and that he and his partners hoped to induce the insolvent to use his influence in obtaining for them certain agencies which the insolvent had held, is pretty clear from the letter of the petitioning creditor of the 14th April to the insolvent and from that of his partner of the 16th April to the manager of the insolvent. It is also clear that the petitioning creditor endeavoured to get his commission of Rs. 4,000 paid by the insolvent early in April when the latter's affairs were desperate. Still it is not denied that the petitioning creditor is a bona fide creditor of the insolvent for the sum of Rs. 4,000 or thereabouts. At the time when the petition was presented on the 23rd April, 1896, the insolvent had already been adjudicated insolvent in Madras. It is suggested that the petitioning creditor's motive in taking proceedings in Bombay was revenge. This he denies. It appears to us that his proceedings here may have been just as well from a bona fide desire to protect his own interest as from the improper motives which the appellant seeks to attribute to him. That we ought not, therefore, to annul the proceedings on that ground; all the more so as this ground for revoking the adjudication was not urged before the Insolvent Court, though it is now relied upon before us in appeal. The conduct of the petitioning creditor in not mentioning to the Court the prior adjudication in Madras when he presented his petition to this Court was reprehensible; but as there were fair grounds for supposing that the petition in Madras was presented in collusion with the insolvent to prevent a similar petition being presented in Bombay, we think that that circumstance ought not, seeing that the other creditors in Bombay are equally interested with the petitioning creditors in upholding the adjudication here, to induce us to annul the adjudication.

We have lastly to consider whether, on account of the pending proceedings in Madras, the Insolvent Court ought not in its discretion to have annulled the adjudication here. In this connection it must be remembered that the Madras creditors were favourable to the insolvent and were willing to give him time. This is stated by the insolvent in his circular of March and is proved by other circumstances. The debts there, moreover, were comparatively small. There was some reason for believing that the petition might be withdrawn or dismissed. There were large assets in Bombay and very large liabilities. Taking these circumstances into consideration, we think that the English authorities fully justified the Commissioner in his action. Complete protection of the Bombay creditors was the object which he had in view. We are, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails.

We are now, however, asked to annul the proceedings on the ground that since the order of Mr. Justice Strachey was made the insolvent has obtained his personal discharge in Madras, and that there is no longer any ground for apprehending that the proceedings there will be discontinued. It appears to us that it would not be just or equitable to allow the proceedings in both Courts to go on concurrently. This would lead to most undesirable conflict of jurisdiction; and as the proceedings in Madras were prior in time, and all the assets of the insolvent are vested in the official assignee.

there, this Court ought to yield to the prior claim of the Court at Madras. The best course, we think, under the circumstances will be to stay the proceedings here till further orders of the Insolvent Court, leaving the Bombay creditors to take such steps in Madras as they may be advised to take. This may appear to be hard upon them but it would be equally hard on the Madras creditors to be compelled to take steps in Bombay, and the Bombay creditors for this purpose must be ranked with the Madras creditors, Madras being their natural Court to resort to, as there is no Insolvency Court at Bellary. Landlord and tenant — Lease — Sub-lease — Ejectment of tenant — Position of sub-tenant —
No privity of contract between landlord and sub-tenant — Notice to quit — Land Revenue Code (Bomb. Act V of 1879), s. 84. †

A sub-lease differs from an assignment of lease, in that it creates no privity of contract between the sub-tenant and the landlord. The landlord has to deal with his lessee and not with the sub-tenants of the latter.

A landlord putting an end, by proper notice, to the tenancy of his tenant thereby determines the estate of the under-tenants of the latter.

[312] Second appeal from the decision of E. H. Moscardi, Acting District Judge of Kanara, reversing the decree of Rao Sahib Phadnis, Subordinate Judge of Kumta.

The plaintiff had brought a suit (No. 205 of 1888) against Venkatesh Achutaya and others for possession of certain lands. The defendants in that suit alleged that they were mulgeni tenants, but the allegation was held not proved, and a decree was passed for the plaintiff. In execution the plaintiff was obstructed by Rama Venkanna, present defendant, who alleged that he was a mulgeni tenant under Venkatesh and the other defendants. The plaintiff thereupon applied under s. 331 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) for the removal of the defendant’s obstruction. The application was numbered and registered as a suit.

* Second Appeal No. 548 of 1894.

84. An annual tenancy shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be presumed to run from the end of one cultivating season to the end of the next. The cultivating season may be presumed to end on the 31st March.

An annual tenancy shall require for its termination a notice given in writing by the landlord to the tenant, or by the tenant to the landlord at least three months before the end of the year of tenancy at the end of which it is intended that the tenancy is to cease. Such notice may be in the form of sch. E, or to the like effect.
The defendant now pleaded that the land in suit was the mulgeni holding of Venkatesh and the other defendants in suit No. 205 of 1888; that the father of those defendants had let it out to him on mulgeni tenure thirty-five years before suit; that he had been in possession ever since; that the plaintiff had no power to oust him before the tenancy was determined, and that he not having been a party to the former suit (No. 205 of 1888) was not bound by the decree.

The Subordinate Judge found that the defendant was not a mulgeni tenant and passed a deeree directing that his obstruction be removed and possession be given to the plaintiff.

On appeal by the defendant the Judge reversed the order of the Subordinate Judge on the ground that the plaintiff could not sue to eject the defendant, because he admitted that the defendant was a tenant of the defendants in the former suit (No. 205 of 1888). He held that the present suit must fail for want of previous notice to the defendant to vacate under s. 84 of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879).

Narayan G. Chandavorkar, for the appellanplaintiff.—No notice was necessary to put an end to the defendant’s tenancy. There is no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the present defendant, who is only a sub-lessee—Platt on Leases, pp. 102; Woodfall on Landlord and Tenants, p. 359; Roe v. Wiggs (1); Meller v. Watkins (2); Bhutia Dhomu v. Ambo (3); Bejoy Gobind Singh v. Sukkur Dutt Singh (4); Pleasant v. Benson (5). The point of notice was, moreover, raised for the first time in the Court of appeal; it was not taken in the first Court.

Dattatraya A. Idgunji appeared for the respondent (defendant).—Where a lessee surrenders his estate, an under-lessee is not prejudiced by the surrender—Great Western Railway Company v. Smith (6). The defendants in suit No. 205 of 1888, our lessors, failed by their negligence to prove their mulgeni tenancy. This failure amounts to a surrender on their part and does not terminate our tenancy. The Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1893) has adopted the provisions of English law on this point, but those provisions are not applicable to agricultural lands: vide ss. 115 and 117 of the Act. Express notice to quit is, therefore, necessary to terminate our tenancy. The question of notice was raised in our written statement.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—A sub-lease differs from the assignment of a lease in that it creates no privity of contract between the sub-tenant and the landlord. The landlord has to deal with his lessee and not with the sub-tenants of the latter.

The English authorities show conclusively that a landlord putting an end by a proper notice to the tenancy of his tenant thereby determines the estate of the under-tenants of the latter. This is undoubted law—Roe v. Wiggs (1); Meller v. Watkins (2); Woodfall on Landlord and Tenants, p. 359.

The question is whether a different rule should be applied in this Presidency by reason of the provisions of s. 84 of the Land Revenue Code of 1879 or for any other cause. We think not. The provisions of the section in question in directing that a landlord must give the notice therein required to his tenant, and making no reference to the sub-tenants of the latter, rather imply the contrary, and convenience points in the same direction. The landlord in many cases knows nothing about the sub-tenants of his lessee, and when he has given due notice to and terminated the tenancy of the latter, and it may be, as here, has resorted to legal measures to evict him, it would be a hardship on him to find that he had to begin proceedings all over again against the sub-tenants. An assignee of a lease is of course in a different position, for he is brought by his assignment into direct relations with the landlord.

The surrender of a lease by the lessee also gives rise to wholly different considerations—Great Western Railway Company v. Smith (1).

We must, therefore, hold on the facts as found by the District Judge that notice by the plaintiff to the defendant in this case was not necessary, and reversing his decree restore that of the Subordinate Judge, with costs throughout on the defendant.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Strachey.

RAMACHARYA AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs), Appellants v. ANANTACHARYA AND OTHERS (Defendants), Respondents.* [9th December, 1895.]

Execution of decree—Decree—Death of a party to a suit after argument and before delivery of judgment—Execution against the heirs of deceased judgment-debtor—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1899), ss. 234, 249-250—Practice—Procedure.

On the 30th November, 1892, an appeal in the High Court was argued and the case adjourned for judgment.

On the 12th June, 1893, one of the defendants-respondents died.

On the 6th July, 1893, the High Court pronounced its judgment, and a decree was drawn up as if the deceased respondent was still living.

On the 15th December, 1893, the decree-holder applied for execution of the decree, but the application was rejected by the Court of first instance on the ground that as the heirs of the deceased defendant had not been placed on the record before the judgment of the High Court was delivered, the decree was incapable of execution.

Held, reversing the lower Court’s decision, that the decree was, on its face, a good decree, and it could be executed against the heirs of the deceased defendant under ss. 234 and 249-250 of Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1899) without placing them on the record.

[315] APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur K. B. Marathe, First Class Subordinate Judge of Satara, in suit No 1137 of 1893.

The plaintiffs filed a suit for partition of certain joint property consisting of lands, houses, and the profits of an ancestral trade. The Court of first instance passed a decree awarding a portion of the plaintiffs’ claim.

Against this decree the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court. The appeal was argued on the 23rd and 30th November, 1892, and the case then stood over for judgment.

* Appeal No. 99 of 1895.
(1) 2 Ch. D. 235.
Judgment was delivered on the 6th July, 1893, when the decree of the Court of first instance was confirmed.

In the meantime defendant (respondent) No. 1 died on the 12th June, 1893, but no steps were taken to amend the record by substituting in his place his heirs and legal representatives.

On the 15th December, 1893, the plaintiffs presented an application for execution of the High Court’s decree, making the heirs and legal representatives of the deceased defendant No. 1 parties to the execution proceedings.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed this application, holding that as the names of the heirs of the deceased defendant had not been placed on the record before the date of the High Court’s decision, the decree could not be executed against the heirs.

Against this decision the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

Ganpat Sadashiv Rao, for appellant.—In this case the judgment should be regarded as if pronounced at the date of the argument. The decree speaks from the day on which the argument was closed, and binds all parties. The suit does not abate, if either the plaintiff or defendant dies in the interval—Turner v. London and South-Western Railway Company (1). Where the delay arises from the act of the Court, it ought not to prejudice the rights of the suitors. In such cases it is the practice of the Courts in England to pass judgment nunc pro tunc—Harrison v. Heathorn (2); Lawrence v. Hodgson (3); Moor v. Roberts (4). There was no necessity [316] to bring on the record the heirs of the deceased respondent. Under s. 234 of the Civil Procedure Code the decree could be executed against the heirs—Hirachand v. Kasturchand (5); Surendro v. Doorgasoondy (6). No steps were taken by the heirs of the deceased to set aside the decree, and it is not shown that they have been in any way prejudiced by it. The ruling in Narna v. Manager Paramkhatia (7) is conclusive on this point.

Branson (with him Rao Saheb Vasudev J. Kirtikar), for respondents.—The Courts in India have no power to enter up judgment nunc pro tunc. They cannot alter the date of a decree. Under s. 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure if the case is adjourned for judgment, the Court is bound to give notice to the parties of the day when judgment will be delivered. How can such a notice be given, if one of the parties is dead, unless his representatives are brought on the record? Sections 202, 205, 206 of the Code also show that the date of the decree cannot be altered unless the decree is amended. These provisions of the Code are quite inconsistent with the practice of the Courts in England to pass judgment nunc pro tunc.

I contend that s. 368 of the Code applies; the heirs of the deceased respondent not having been brought on the record, the appeal abated, and the decree passed against the deceased respondent is now incapable of execution—Vishram v. Ganu (8); Roop Narain v. Ramuyee (9); The Representativees of Girendromath Tagore v. Hurnath Roy (10); Monee Lal v. Kazi Fuzul (11); Imdad Ali v. Jagan Lal (12).

Ganpat S. Rao, in reply.—The cases cited do not apply. In every one of them the death of the defendant or respondent had occurred before the argument.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—In this case the High Court on the 6th July, 1893, passed a decree for partition of the property in suit in confirmation of the decrees of the lower Courts. The plaintiff applied for execution of this decree to the Court of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, at Satara. That Court refused to execute the decree on the ground that one of the defendants was dead at the time when the judgment was pronounced and the decree drawn up. It appears that after the arguments had been concluded on the 30th November, 1892, the High Court took time to consider. The first defendant Anantacharya died on the 12th June, 1893, before judgment was pronounced on the 6th July, 1893. The decree was drawn up as though Anantacharya was still living. It was dated on the day on which judgment was delivered. On its face it is, therefore, a good decree which can be executed against the legal representatives of Anantacharya under ss. 234 and 248-250 of the Civil Procedure Code without placing them on the record of the suit—Hirachand v. Kasturchand (1)—unless the decree by reason of the death of Anantacharya is inherently defective.

The practice in English Courts of Equity was in such cases to disregard the fact of the death of a party occurring while the Court was considering, and to deliver judgment and draw up the decree as though he were still living. The question was much considered in the case of Eyre v. Hollier (2), where a defendant died while the House of Lords was considering its judgment. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland in the course of his judgment (at p. 610) said: "Nothing is better settled than that where a cause is heard and merely stands over for consideration, the Court will pronounce judgment though the plaintiff or defendant die; and that judgment refers back and is conceived in the same terms as if pronounced when the cause was heard." In a note appended to that case the practice of the English Court of Chancery was thus stated by its Registrar: "As to the drawing up decrees after the death of a party in cases where judgment has been deferred, we give the decree the date at which the judgment was pronounced, and that decree speaks from the day on which the argument closed, and binds all parties then before the Court, and also the representatives of any parties deceased in the interim or persons taking under parties living at the time of the hearing." The practice, however, as to the dating of the decree was not uniform. It was sometimes dated as of the day when the arguments concluded. This appears from the several cases noted by the Registrar in his latter above referred to and in the judgment and notes to Turner v. London and South-Western Railway Co. (3).

The practice prevailing in such cases in the Courts of Common Law was that judgment was entered as of the date when the Court took time to consider. This was done on the principle that the Court will in general permit a judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc where the signing of it has been delayed by the act of the Court. "It was a power at common law and by the ancient practice of the Court to prevent an unjust prejudice to the suitors by the delay unavoidably arising from the act of the Court"—Chitty’s Archbold’s Practice, Chap. LXXXVIII, where the authorities are collected. The power is now confirmed by O. XVII, r. 3, of the High Court of Justices.

In Surendro v. Doorgaonduerry (1) the Privy Council, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties pending consideration, delivered judgment and remitted the case to the Indian Courts for disposal without requiring the record to be amended.

We have referred to the English practice and that of the Privy Council to show that there is nothing anomalous or contrary to principle in the delivery of a judgment and drawing up a decree thereon though one of the parties to the suit is dead and the record has not been amended, provided that he has been fully heard in his lifetime.

Sections 198, 202, 205, 206, 368 and 574 of the Civil Procedure Code have, however, been read to us, and it has been contended that these provisions are inconsistent with such a course of procedure as has been adopted in England. It has been pointed out that the notice required by s. 198 cannot be given without amendment. We think, however, that, as there is no question of principle involved, we ought to follow the ruling in Narma v. Manager Parambhatta (2), and to consider the drawing up of the decree in this case as at the utmost merely irregular. The legal representatives of the defendant Anantacharya have not pointed out that they have been in any way prejudiced, nor have they taken any steps to set aside or vary the decree.

We have ascertained that the defendant in Vishram v. Ganu (3) (the case which the lower Court has followed) had died before the argument; and the cases cited by Mr. Branson—Roop Narain v. Ramayee (4), The Representatives of Girindranath Tagore v. Huronath Roy (5), Monoe Lal v. Kasee Fuzul (6), Imdad Ali v. Jagani Lal (7)—were similar in their circumstances. They are not, therefore, at variance with the decision in Narma v. Manager Parambhatta (2). We shall allow the appeal, and setting aside the order of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, direct him to proceed with the execution of the decree. The respondents have no merits. They must pay the costs of the appellants both here and in the Court below.

Order reversed.

next reversionary heir after Mathurabai, and in 1880 he (Balvant) became insolvent, and his estate vested in the official assignee, who sold to the plaintiff his interest in certain mortgaged property which had belonged to Mahadev and was then in possession of Mathurabai as his heir. Mathurabai died in 1886 and after her death the plaintiff sued to redeem the property from the mortgage.

Held that at the date of his insolvency, Mathurabai being then alive, the interest of Balvant as reversionary heir in the said property was only a spee succession in which (320) could not vest in the official assignee. The plaintiff, therefore, took no interest in the property by his purchase from the official assignee.

Atmaram and Sakharam were two divided brothers. Atmaram died leaving his brother Sakharam and a daughter-in-law Gangabai (the widow of his predeceased son Govind) him surviving. On Atmaram's death Sakharam inherited his property as his heir, but shortly afterwards Sakharam gave his son Mahadev in adoption to Gangabai, who duly adopted him as to her deceased husband Govind.

Held, that Mahadev on his adoption became not only the son of Govind, but also the grandson and heir of Atmaram. Having been adopted with the consent of Sakharam, he as the adopted grandson of Atmaram divested the estate in Atmaram's property which had vested in Sakharam. Sakharam by giving Mahadev in adoption to Gangabai while divesting Mahadev of the right to inherit as his heir invested him with the right to inherit Atmaram's estate.

For the purposes of inheritance an adoption may be considered as relating back to the death of the adoptive father divesting all estates which have during the intermediate period become vested as it were conditionally in another.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb S. M. Karandikar, Subordinate Judge of Devgad.

Suit for redemption. The land in question had been mortgaged by one Atmaram in 1863 to the father of the defendants. Atmaram died in 1865, leaving a divided brother Sakharam and a daughter-in-law Gangabai (widow of his predeceased son Govind) him surviving. Sakharam had two sons named Balvant and Mahadev, and soon after Atmaram's death in 1865 he gave Mahadev in adoption to Gangabai (daughter-in-law of Atmaram), who duly adopted him as son to her deceased husband Govind. Mahadev married Mathurabai. He died childless in 1870 or 1872, leaving her as his heir. She survived till 1886.

Sakharam died prior to 1880, and in that year his son Balvant became insolvent and his estate vested in the official assignee. He was next reversionary heir to Mahadev after Mathurabai. The official assignee sold Balvant's interest in the property to the plaintiff.

After the death of Mathurabai in 1886 the plaintiff filed this suit to redeem the property.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit.

On appeal by the plaintiff the Judge reversed the decree, holding that Mathurabai held the property for her life and that (321) according to the ruling in Jamiyatram v. Bai Jamna (1), Balvant had a right in remainder which became vested in the official assignee, who sold it to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had a right to redeem it.

The defendants preferred a second appeal.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan appeared for the appellants (defendants):
—The decision in Jamiyatram v. Bai Jamna (1) which was relied on by the Judge, has been overruled in Lakshmibai v. Ganpat Moroba (2). Balvant had no right to the property when it was sold by the official assignee to the plaintiff. Mathurabai was then alive. It is after the death of a widow that the next of kin becomes an heir and not before. Balvant had no right during Mathurabai’s life-time—Rupachand v. Rakhmabai (1). The last ruling was followed in First Appeal No. 129 of 1893 which was decided on the 18th September, 1895.

(2) 5 B.H.C.R. O.C.J. 128.

Section 265 (b) of the Civil Procedure Code has prohibited sale of expectancy of succession by survivorship or other contingent rights.

Daji A. Khare with Mahadeo V. Bhat appeared for the respondent (plaintiff) ;—When Atmaram died, his property vested in Sakharam as heir. On Sakharam’s death Balvant became his heir and we claim under Balvant. Govind having predeceased his father Atmaram, he did not inherit the property; consequently his widow Gangabai could not by adopting Mahadev with Sakharam’s consent prejudice Balvant. The Subordinate Judge has in his judgment relied on the decision in Ramji v. Ghamau (2). But that decision is not applicable to the present case, because in that case the adoption was in a joint family. In the present case Sakharam and Atmaram were not joint. Their families were separate. Sakharam’s consent to the adoption would make it valid, but it cannot deprive other persons of the property which was vested in them.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This was a suit filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Devgad in the Ratnagiri District. The plaintiff (322) claiming title through the official assignee and assignee of the estate of one Balvant Sakharam sought to redeem a mortgage executed in favour of Anaji, the father of the defendants Nos. 1—3, by one Atmaram Govind on the 28th May, 1863. The question for determination is in whom the equity of redemption is vested.

The facts as found by the lower Courts, though there is a mistake, probably clerical, in the statement of them by the Assistant Judge, are these :—Sakharam and Atmaram Govind were divided brothers. The property in question belonged to Atmaram, who, as above stated, mortgaged it to Anaji with possession in 1863. Atmaram had a son Govind, who died before his father without issue, leaving a widow Gangabai. Atmaram died in 1865, leaving his daughter-in-law Gangabai and his separated brother Sakharam surviving him. Sakharam had at that time two sons, Balvant and Mahadev. The exact date does not appear, but very soon after the death of Atmaram, Sakharam gave his son Mahadev in adoption to Gangabai, and the latter duly adopted him. It is beyond doubt that Gangabai adopted Mahadev to continue the line of Atmaram through her husband Govind.

A suit in which Sakharam was the plaintiff and Atmaram was a defendant was pending at Atmaram’s death (Suit No. 275 of 1865). Gangabai was placed upon the record of it as a defendant in his place. She died soon afterwards, and Sakharam on the 16th December, 1865, informed the Court of her death and bad Mahadev Govind put upon the record to represent Atmaram. The Subordinate Judge thus deals with this part of the case:

“According to the established rule of inheritance of the Hindu law in force in this Presidency the daughter-in-law does not succeed to the estate of her father-in-law in preference to the enumerated heirs. She comes as heir as a sapinda, and her position will have to be determined in each case. Here Sakharam being one of the enumerated heirs was the heir of Atmaram.

(1) 6 B.H.C. B. A. C. J. 114. (2) 6 B. 498.
in preference to Gangabai. Atmaram's estate vested in Sakbaram at Atmaram's death. Sakharam's son Mahadev, younger than the defendant Balvant, it is said was adopted by Gangabai for her husband. This adoption unless it was made by Sakharam's consent would have been void. Sakharam's consent to the adoption of Mahadev by Gangabai cannot under the circumstances detailed now be disputed, and by his consent and sole consent, because he thereby divested himself of the estate already vested in him, the adoption became valid—Ramji v. Ghama (1). Mahadev Govinda thus succeeded to the estate of Atmaram."

This view of the law was assailed before us by the pleader for the respondent. It was, however, adopted by the Assistant Judge, and we think rightly so. We continue the statement of facts before giving our reasons for this conclusion.

Mahadev married Mathurabai. He died childless in 1870 or 1872, leaving her as his heir. She survived until 1886. Sakharam died prior to 1880, and in that year Balvant filed his petition and schedule in the Insolvent Court of Bombay when his estate vested in the official assignee. He was then the next reversionary heir to Mahadev after Mathurabai. The official assignee sold Balvant's interest in the property in question to the plaintiff, who after the death of Mathurabai filed the present suit to redeem it from the defendants.

The Assistant Judge relying upon the decision in Jamiyatram v. Bai Jamna (2) differing from the Subordinate Judge has held that Balvant had at the time of his insolvency an estate vested in remainder upon the death of Mathurabai. That decision, however, rested upon a misapprehension of Hindu law and has since been overruled by Lakshmibai v. Ganpat Moroba (3) and cannot now be accepted as law. At the date of his insolvency Balvant had only a spece successionis which could not vest in the official assignee, and the plaintiff took no interest in the property in suit under his purchase from the official assignee. This was indeed conceded by the learned pleader for the respondent. He, however, contended that the property had never been vested in either Mahadev or Mathurabai and was, in fact, Balvant's property at the time of his insolvency. He argued that it vested in Sakbaram on the death of Atmaram and that the adoption of Mahadev by Gangabai, though it might be valid for other purposes, could not operate to divest the property which had already vested in Sakbaram. He distinguished the case of Ramji v. Ghama (1) on the ground that there the adoption was into a joint family and not by a widow in a separated branch. The adoption in that case was held to be invalid for want of the assent of the co-parceoners in whom the estate was vested, and so cannot be said to be an authority upon the question, though the Court doubtless assumed that, if the adoption had been with consent, the adopted son would as regards the family estate have stood in the shoes of the father to whom he was adopted. More directly in point are the decisions in Sri Raghunadha v. Sri Brozo Kishoro (4) and Rupchand v. Rakhmabai (5). In the latter it was held that the adoption of Badridas by Sarjabai, the widow of Anandram, who had predeceased his brother Sobharam, had the effect of divesting the estate which had then vested in Rakhmabai, the widow of the latter, and making Badridas the heir to the property of both.

Anandram and Sobharam. The adoption was with the assent of Rakhmabai. This authority was followed in Venkaji v. Dutto (1) by the present Bench. The facts in the Privy Council case above referred to are still stronger. The person whose estate was there divested was a male full owner.

We are unable upon principle to distinguish these decisions from the case before us. The effect of an adoption by a widow must always, whether the adoption take place in a united or separated family, operate to divest to some extent an estate vested elsewhere. That is, therefore, on principle no objection to the giving to the adoption by a widow its full effect. That effect is more striking when the estate has passed out of the immediate family of the adopting widow and has vested in a member of another family; but the principle is, we think, in each case the same.

The case before us differs in some respects from those which we have referred to, in that the estate never vested in Govind by reason of his not having survived his father, but was vested in Atmaram when he died. That, however, in our opinion does not affect the conclusion. The father's line is, we think, continued in the person of the boy adopted (with the assent of those capable of giving the validating assent) by his son's widow to her husband, just as though the latter had left a natural son born in his lifetime (325) or a posthumous son. The adoption when made ensures for the benefit not of the adoptive father alone. It benefits also the immediate ancestors of the adoptive father. For the purposes of inheritance the adoption may be considered as relating back to the death of the adoptive father divesting all estates which have during the intermediate period become vested as it were conditionally in another. See Raje Vyankatrav v. Jayavantrao (2); Maynes Hindu Law, pl. 171. Mahadev on his adoption became, we think, not only the son of Govind, but also the grandson and heir of Atmaram. Having been adopted with the assent of Sakharam, the adopted grandson of Atmaram divested the estate in Atmaram's property which had vested in Sakharam. Sakharam by giving Mahadev in adoption to Gangabai while divesting Mahadev of the right to inherit as his heir invested him with the right to inherit Atmaram's estate.

We must, therefore, reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the Subordinate Judge with costs both of this and of the lower appellate Court on the respondent.

Decree reversed.

VISHNU RAMCHANDRA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. GANESH APPAJI CHAUDHARI AND OTHERS
(Original Defendants), Respondents.* [9th December, 1895.]

Practice—Procedure—Wrong issue framed by lower Court—Finding on the point raised by correct issue clear from judgment—No remand—Second appeal—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), sch. II, art. 127—Partition suit—Limitation.

Where the lower appellate Court framed a wrong issue for decision, but it appeared from its judgment that there was a finding on the point which would have been raised if the correct issue had been framed, the High Court in second appeal refused to remand the case for a new finding on that issue.

The fact that the plaintiffs were not excluded from their share in part of the joint property does not preclude art. 127, sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) from operating in respect of another part from which they had been excluded to their knowledge.

[R., 17 C.L.J. 38 = 17 C.W.N. 280 = 18 Ind. Cas. 625.]

[326] SECOND appeal from the decision of Venkatram R. Inamdar, Assistant Judge of Bijapur with Full Powers, amending the decree of Rao Sahib T. V. Kalsulkar, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Muddabhal.

In 1890 the plaintiffs brought this suit for partition, claiming a third share of certain inam land (No. 200) and of certain occupancy lands, (Nos. 561 and 567) which they alleged to be ancestral property.

Defendants Nos. 1 — 4 denied the plaintiffs' right and claimed to be the owners of the land which had been in their exclusive possession for more than twelve years. They pleaded that the plaintiffs were barred by limitation.

The Subordinate Judge awarded to the plaintiffs a third share in all the lands in dispute.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge framed two issues, viz., (1) have the lands in question still remained joint between plaintiff and defendants, and (2) have plaintiffs enjoyed their share in their profits within twelve years. His findings on the above issues were in the negative so far as part of the land (No. 200) was concerned, and in the affirmative with respect to remainder (Nos. 561 and 567). He, therefore, amended the decree by dismissing the claim with respect to land No. 200.
The following is an extract from his judgment:

"On the whole, although plaintiffs might have had good claim to land No. 200, and that they might have been in possession thereof in generations, I do not think that there is any evidence to show that their possession continued after 1870, and I find that point accordingly.
Their possession was totally denied in 1874 under an alleged adverse claim, and this indicates that defendants had adverse possession since 1874 at least if not since before, and as this adverse possession was more than twelve years when this suit was instituted in 1890, plaintiffs' title, if any,
to the land was extinguished at that time."

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Mahadeo V. Bhat, for the appellants (plaintiffs) — The suit being one for partition the Judge wrongly framed the second issue under art. 144, sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). The suit is for partition. The Judge wrongly framed the issue under art. 144 of the Limitation Act. The issue ought to have been framed under art. 127 as to whether the [327] plaintiffs had been excluded to their knowledge from the joint family property for twelve years. Our claim as to land No. 200 cannot be barred by defendant's adverse possession, because we have received payments out of the joint rents and profits. That being so, the defendants cannot be in adverse possession of a part of the family property.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar, for the respondents (defendants):—The issue framed was no doubt a wrong one. Article 127, sch. II, of the Limitation Act is applicable, the suit being one for partition. Nevertheless, the Judge's finding satisfies the requirements of art. 127. The framing of a wrong issue was merely an irregularity which did not affect the merits of the case. The Judge has come to a right conclusion and, therefore, s. 578 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) is applicable.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The Assistant Judge, F. P., has in this case laid down the wrong issue for decision. He has worded it "Have plaintiffs enjoyed their share in the profits for twelve years," whereas the issue ought to have been "Have the plaintiffs been excluded from No. 200 and their share of its profits to their knowledge for twelve years." In considering the issue which it has laid down, the Court has, however, come to the conclusion that the defendants have had adverse possession of No. 200 for twelve years, by which we must, we think, having regard to the framing of the issue which had been laid down, understand that the plaintiffs have been excluded from No. 200 and their share of its profits for twelve years. There is no finding that such exclusion has been to their knowledge, but it is clear that the Judge so intended, as he speaks of there having been disputes between the parties about this survey number since 1874. It would be too technical, we think, to hold that there has not been a substantial finding to the effect required by art. 127, and it would be useless to send down an issue to have the same finding again recorded, but in different words, on a correctly worded issue.

It cannot, we think, be successfully argued that art. 127 of the Limitation Act does not afford a defence to the plaintiffs' claim in so far as No. 200 is concerned if its provisions are [328] satisfied. The fact that the plaintiffs were not excluded from their share in other fields does not prevent, we think, the statute from operating in respect of the field from which they have been excluded to their knowledge. The argument on this part of the case has not been pressed. Our view accords with the judgment in Buddha Mall v. Bhuwan Das (1), cited by Mr. Starling in his work on the Limitation Act, p. 254. We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

CIVIL PROCEDURE CODE (ACT XIV OF 1882), SS. 503, 505 AND 622—RECEIVER—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—NOMINATION BY SUBORDINATE COURTS WITH ARMS OF NOMINATION—SANCTION OF THE DISTRICT JUDGE—ORDER PASSED BY THE DISTRICT JUDGE—EX-PARTE ORDER—REVIEW —APPEAL.

The District Judge made an ex-parte order for the appointment of a receiver under s. 505 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). Subsequently it having been shown to the Judge that the nomination made by the Subordinate Judge on which the order was passed was incorrect, the District Judge made an order admitting a review. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court. Without deciding whether an appeal would lie against the order of the District Judge, the High Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the order of the District Judge, having, in the first instance, been ex parte, had clearly the power to review it.

APPEAL from the decision of W. H. Crowe, District Judge of Poona, in Miscellaneous Application No. 193 of 1895.

The plaintiff filed a suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Poona against his adoptive mother as administratrix of his property, and applied for the appointment of a receiver. The Court under s. 503 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) ordered that a receiver should be appointed to manage the money-lending business of the estate. In submitting the name of a receiver for the sanction of the District Judge under s. 505 of the Code, the Subordinate Judge referred to the whole of the property in dispute instead of only to the money-lending business. The District Judge having sanctioned the nomination made by the Subordinate Judge, the receiver attempted to take possession of the whole of the property in dispute. The defendant thereupon applied for review of the order granting the sanction, pointing out that the terms of the report made by the Subordinate Judge being at variance with his order, the sanction granted by the District Judge was illegal, and praying that the sanction having been granted ex parte without giving her an opportunity of being heard, was contrary to law and should be set aside.

The Judge granted the application for review.

The plaintiff appealed from the order granting the application for review.

Shivram V. Bhandarkar, for the appellant (plaintiff):—The Judge was wrong in granting a review of his order. Section 505 of the Code does not relate to the propriety of the order passed for the appointment of a receiver. What is to be taken into consideration under that section is the propriety of the nomination of the receiver. The Judge’s order is purely a ministerial order passed on the report of the Subordinate Judge. The Judge has confounded the Subordinate Judge’s judgment and his report. The order nominating the receiver is his judgment, and his communication asking for the Judge’s sanction for the nomination is his report. The Judge cannot sit in appeal as to the report. He had, therefore, no power to review the order passed on the report. The words "pass such other order as it thinks fit" in s. 505 of the Code mean that the Judge may approve or disapprove of the appointment, or suggest the name of any other person.

It was not necessary to issue a notice to the respondent because she had notice in the Subordinate Judge's Court. The Judge's order being purely ministerial no notice was necessary.

Mahadeo B. Choubal, for the respondent (defendant) :—Section 629 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) prescribes the grounds on which an appeal can be preferred. The objections now urged cannot be made the grounds of appeal under [330] that section. The Judge had authority to go into the question of the propriety of the order appointing the receiver —The Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company, Limited v. The S. S. "Zuary" (1); Birajan v. Ram Churn (2).

With respect to notice, we submit that both the parties should be heard when an order is to be passed.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—It is contended that this appeal will not lie from the order admitting a review. The contention is probably correct—The Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company, Limited v. The S. S. "Zuary" (1). It is not, however, necessary for us actually to determine the question whether the appeal lies or not, as it is open to us, if the Court had no jurisdiction to act as it did, to deal with the case under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code: and upon the merits the law seems to us to be clear. Section 503 gives power to Civil Courts in certain cases to appoint a receiver. That, however, is a power which subordinate Courts are forbidden by s. 505 to exercise without sanction. Such Courts can only make a nomination with the grounds for the nomination, and upon that the District Judge can authorize the Subordinate Judge to appoint the person so nominated, or pass such order as he thinks fit. The latter words give full discretion, we think, to the District Judge to pass such order as the circumstances of the case considered in all their bearings require. He may give the proper directions to the Subordinate Court. Nomination in s. 505 seems to be equivalent to the conditional appointment of a receiver which the District Court can accept or reject or modify. We agree entirely on the above points with the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Birajan v. Ram Churn (2).

It is not necessary to consider in this case whether an appeal will lie to the High Court or not when the Court has passed its order. We shall deal with that question when it arises.

The order of the District Judge having, in the first instance, been made ex parte, he has clearly the power to review it. Appeal dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SECOND APPEAL FROM THE DECISION OF F. C. O. BEAMAN, DISTRICT JUDGE OF THANA, REVERSING THE ORDER PASSED BY RAO SAEHEB B. S. JOSHI, SUBORDINATE JUDGE OF PEN, IN AN EXECUTION PROCEEDING.

On the 21st December, 1899, Vinayak Krishna Deebri obtained a decree against Vinayakrao Gopal Deshmukh awarding him possession of certain land and mesne profits. He obtained possession of the land on the 3rd June, 1890. On the 20th February, 1891, he applied in execution to recover the mesne profits and costs from the judgment-debtor, and on his failure to pay the same to realize them by the sale of the judgment-debtor's immoveable property; and if the proceeds of sale should be insufficient, them realizations the deficiency by sale of his moveable property. On the 6th August, 1891, he applied for permission to bid at the auction sale of the immoveable property, and the Court granted the permission. The immoveable property was accordingly sold. The proceeds of the sale being insufficient, the decree-holder paid the process fees for the attachment and sale of the moveable property and the Court made the necessary order on the 24th November, 1891, but no further steps were taken. On the 26th February, 1894, the decree-holder again applied for the execution of the decree.

The Subordinate Judge rejected the application as barred by limitation, not being made within three years from the 20th February, 1891, the date of the last previous application.

[332] ON APPEAL THE JUDGE REVERSED THE ORDER, HOLDING THAT WHEN THE DECEASED-DECREE PAID THE PROCESS FOR THE ATTACHMENT AND SALE OF THE MOVEABLE PROPERTY THERE MUST HAVE BEEN MADE AN ORAL APPLICATION TO EXECUTE THE DECREE, AND IF NOT, SUCH AN APPLICATION SHOULD BE IMPLIED FROM THE FACT OF THE PAYMENT OF THE PROCESS FEES.

The judgment-debtor preferred a second appeal.

Trimbalk R. Kotval, for the appellant (judgment-debtor):—There is nothing on the record to show that the decree-holder made an application for execution when he paid the process fees in November, 1891. An application for execution cannot be implied, because he paid these fees. He must set the Court in motion by an application—Dharanamma v.

Khan v. Gur Prasad (1); Toore Mahomed v. Mahomed Mabood Bux (2); Rajkumar Banerji v. Ray Lakhi Dabi (3).

Gangaram B. Rele, for the respondent (deedee-holder).—Our application is within time. In our first application there was a prayer that if the proceeds of the sale of the immoveable property were not sufficient, the moveable property should be sold. Our subsequent payment of the fees for the attachment and sale of moveable property was tantamount to applying for execution.

Next we contend that our application on the 6th August, 1891, for permission to bid at the sale of the immoveable property was a step in aid of execution—Bansi v. Sikree Mal (4).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—It will not be necessary for us to determine whether the District Judge was correct in implying an application for sale of the moveable property of the defendant by the plaintiff when he paid the process fee on the 30th November, 1891, because it has been pointed out to us that the decree-holder made an application for leave to bid at the sale of the immoveable property on 6th August, 1891, within three years of his present application. That application, it appears to us, falls within the very words of the art. 179, cl. 4. It is an application [333] to the Court to take a step in aid of execution of the decree, viz., to grant leave to the decree-holder to bid.

We agree with the decision of the Allahabad High Court in Bansi v. Sikree Mal (4) on this point, which dissents from the expression of opinion of the Calcutta High Court in Toore Mahomed v. Mahomed Mabood Bux (2) on this question, and accordingly confirm the order of the lower appellate Court with costs.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

MARUTI (Original Defendant), Appellant v. RAMA (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [10th December, 1895.]

Hindu law—Partition—Partition made under a bona fide mistake as to property subject to partition—Re-partition.

The parties to a partition under a bona fide mistake included in the division certain property which did not belong to the family, but was held in mortgage from a third person who subsequently brought a suit for redemption and recovered it from the party to whom it had been allotted at the partition.

Held that the party who had lost his share was entitled to claim a re-partition.

Suit for partition. The family to which the parties to this suit belonged was possessed of certain joint property consisting (inter alia) of two malas (or orchards).

At a partition made about twenty years before suit one of the malas was assigned to the plaintiff’s predecessors in title, and the other mala to the defendants’ predecessor. At the time the partition took place all the parties bona fide believed that the mala assigned to the plaintiffs’ predecessors was family property, but as a matter of fact it was only held on mortgage, it having been mortgaged to the family at a very remote period.

[334] In 1885 the mortgagor’s descendants brought a suit for redemption of the mala in question, and obtained a decree for possession, the Court finding that the mortgage-debt had been paid off out of the usufruct. In execution of this decree the plaintiffs were dispossessed of the mala.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this suit to recover their share in the other mala by its equal division between themselves and the defendants.

The Subordinate Judge rejected the plaintiffs’ claim, holding that the property could not be partitioned afresh.

This decision was reversed on appeal by the First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P.

The defendants thereupon preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Manekshaw Jehangirshah, for the appellants.

Ghanusham Nilkanth, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—An interesting point arises in the decision of this appeal. The family to which the parties belong thought that they owned absolutely two malas (or orchards), and at a partition made some twenty years ago one mala was assigned to the defendants’ and one to the plaintiffs’ predecessors in title. Very recently a suit was brought against the parties by a third person to obtain possession of the mala that had been assigned to the plaintiffs, and it was decided that the mala was held by the family on an ancient mortgage, the right to redeem which was still subsisting, and that the mortgage money had been paid off out of the usufruct; the plaintiffs consequently lost their mala, and they now bring this suit to make the defendants contribute towards the loss they have sustained, in other words, for a re-partition. No fraud is alleged at the time or in the mode of the partition. There was a bona fide mistake shared in by all parties as to the ownership of the mala. The Judge says: "It is beyond all doubt that the parties to the division made it in ignorance of the mortgage and under the idea that the mortgaged property was absolutely theirs and that their interest in it was not limited at all." Under these circumstances we think that the plaintiffs are [335] entitled to the relief they ask. In his work on Hindu Law, at p. 232, Sir T. Strange says: "Whenever from any cause not understood at the time the division proves to have been unequal or in any respect defective, it may be set to rights notwithstanding the maxim 'Once is partition of the inheritance made.'" In the case of Davola v. Rayagavoda (1) a person claiming by a paramount right came in after partition and took away one-half of the property. The learned Judges decided that in such a case the parties "were bound to bear that loss equally. They had divided under such a misapprehension of the true state of the case that the Hindu law, like common equity, would correct the error by distributing the existing but unknown burden evenly where it was placed on one only of the sharers." The principle of that decision applies exactly to the present case. We confirm the decree with costs.

TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Fulton.

GHELLABHAI ATMARAM (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. NANDUBAI
(Original Defendant), Respondent." [21st August, 1896.]

Executor—Will—Arbitration—Power of executor to refer the question of execution of a will to arbitration—Evidence—Evidence to explain written document—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 92 and 94—Practice.

Smallest—An executor against whose application for probate a caveat has been entered, cannot submit to arbitration the question whether the will propounded by him was duly executed by the deceased.

An executor having propounded a will, and applied for probate, a caveat was filed denying the execution of the alleged will, and the matter was duly registered as a suit. The executor and the caveator subsequently referred "the dispute" to arbitration, signing a submission paper, which was as follows:

"To Bhangari Kalidas Ramji, Written by us the undersigned. By this instrument we give to you in writing as follows:—In the matter of an application presented by Ghellabhai Atmaram Tambuwala to obtain 'power' (probate) from the High Court for the administration and enjoyment between us two persons of the property of Bai Godawari, widow of Darji (tailor) Bhawan Deya Dave, I, Nandubai, the [236] wife of Mulji Maha, having raised an objection have got a caveat registered in the High Court. In the matter thereof we the said plaintiff (and) defendant have appointed you an arbitrator to bring about a settlement of the said dispute. As to whatever award you may make and give on arriving at a decision, the same is to be agreed to and abided by us two persons. In this matter we each other agree and consent to act according to your 'award.' This submission paper we of our free will and at pleasure to that mind and consciousness have made and delivered after having read and understood the same. It is agreed to and approved of by us, and our heirs and representatives in Court (and) the Durbar, Bombay. The English date the 30th of October in the year 1893.

Before the arbitrator the parties were represented by solicitors, witnesses were called and examined, and the arbitrator made an award finding that the alleged will had not been executed. The executor nevertheless subsequently proceeded with his application for probate. The caveator contended that he was bound by the award. He alleged that the parties had never really intended to refer the question of the execution of the will to arbitration, and tendered evidence to prove this.

Held, that the evidence was admissible. The language of the submission paper was not so plain in itself, nor did it apply so accurately to existing facts, as to prevent the evidence being given—Section 94 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872).

APPEAL from Candy, J. (1) The plaintiff applied for probate of the will of one Godawaribai, alleging himself to be the executor according to the tenor of the said will. The defendant filed a caveat denying that Godawaribai had executed any will. The matter of the application was duly registered as a suit (see s. 83 of Act V of 1881).

While the said suit was pending, the parties, on the 30th October, 1893, referred the dispute between them to arbitration.

The "submission paper" was as follows:—

"To Bhangsali Kalidas Ramji. Written by us the undersigned. By this instrument we give to you in writing as follows:—In the matter of an application presented by Ghellabhai Atmaram Tambuwala to obtain 'power' (probate) from the High Court for the administration and enjoyment between us two persons of the property of Bai Godawari, widow of Darji (tailor) Bhowan Deva Dave. I, Nandubai, the wife of Mulji Mala, having raised an objection have got a caveat registered in the High Court. In the matter thereof we the said plaintiff (and) defendant have appointed you an arbitrator to bring about a settlement of the said dispute. As to whatever award you may make and give on arriving at a decision, the same is to be agreed to and abided by us two persons. In this matter we each other agree and consent to act according to your 'award.' This submission paper we of our free will and pleasure and in sound mind and consciousness have made and delivered after having read and got read and understood the same. It is agreed to and approved of by us, and our heirs and representatives in Court (and) the Darbar, Bombay. The English date the 30th October in the year 1893."

The parties appeared before the arbitrator and were represented by solicitors. After hearing the evidence the arbitrator on the 18th April, 1894, published his award whereby he found that the alleged will was not executed by Godawaribai. The award was as follows:—

"To all to whom these presents shall come, I, Bhangsali Kalidas Ramji, of Bombay, send greetings. Whereas by a suit in the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, being suit No. 21 of 1893, wherein one Ghellabhai Atmaram, who had applied to the said High Court on its Testamentary Side for probate of the will of Bai Godawari, widow of Bhowan Deva Dave, dated the 3rd day of April, 1890, was plaintiff and applied for probate of the said will, and one Nandubai, wife of Mulji Mala, who had filed a caveat to the said application for probate, was defendant and disputed the said will; and whereas by an instrument in writing dated the 30th day of October, 1893, and under the respective hands of the said Ghellabhai Atmaram and Nandubai it was referred to me as a single arbitrator to bring about a settlement of the said dispute. Now know ye that I, the said Bhangsali Kalidas Ramji, having taken upon myself the burden of the said reference, and having heard what was alleged by or on behalf of the said parties respectively, and having heard and considered all such evidence, oral and documentary, as hath been produced before me and having duly weighed and considered all and singular the matters and things to me referred as aforesaid, do make and publish this my award in writing and concerning the matters as follows. That is to say, I do award and determine that Bai Godawari, widow of Bhowan Deva Dave, did not execute the said will dated the 3rd day of April, 1890, which was produced and put in evidence before me by the said Ghellabhai Atmaram. In witness, &c."

Notwithstanding the said award the plaintiff subsequently proceeded with his suit to obtain probate of the will. He contended that he was not bound by the award, and he tendered evidence (objected to by counsel for defendant but provisionally admitted) to show that when he signed the... submission paper he was under the impression that the arbitrator would merely determine what sum of money should be paid to the defendant to buy off her opposition to the issue of probate.

The defendant pleaded that the award was binding and that, until set aside, the plaintiff could not proceed with the suit.

CANDY, J., dismissed the suit, holding that the award was binding (1). Branson and Macpherson, for the appellant (plaintiff).—We contend that an executor cannot refer the question of the genuineness of a will to arbitration. That question can only be determined by the Court. The point does not seem to have arisen hitherto. The evidence shows that the award was fraudulent, and it is, therefore, not binding on the appellant. They referred to Act V of 1881, s. 55.

Scott and Russell, for respondent (defendant).—The award is binding on the plaintiff. It does not affect others who are not parties to it, so that the beneficiaries under the alleged will are not prejudiced. They can prove the will if they please. There is no reason why an executor should not refer such a question to arbitration. He can compromise a suit—Evans v. Saunders (2); The Viscountess Hamborden v. Dunlop (3); Roadnight v. Carter (4); Norman v. Strains (5); Hargreaves v. Wood (6).

The evidence given in the lower Court as to what the plaintiff intended to refer to the arbitrator ought not to have been admitted and cannot be considered—Evidence Act, ss. 92 and 93; Thoburn v. Barnes (7).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The questions which we have to determine upon this appeal, though of a technical nature, are important. The circumstances under which they arise are these.

On the 27th September, 1893, the plaintiff Ghelabhai applied for probate of the will of a widow named Godawaribai. From that application it appears that the alleged testatrix left her surviving an unmarried daughter Ambabai said to be imbecile, her husband’s sister Nandubai, and the petitioner, alleged to be a paternal cousin of her husband. The will which has been propounded purports to provide for the maintenance of Ambabai and for her funeral ceremonies and for the maintenance of a boy named Krishna whom Godawaribai had brought up and got married. Subject to the maintenance of Ambabai and the establishment of a sadavarat, it gives two houses to her caste and provides for various outlays and ceremonies. It recites that Nandubai had given Godawaribai a release, and had no title or interest in the property, but it gives her a legacy of Rs. 5,000 and [339] concludes as follows:—“And after my death my true heir is my husband’s brother Ghelabhai Atmaram. He is the mukhtyar of all the said property and he shall personally carry on the management and after him the whole caste shall carry on the same.” The will purports to bear a large number of attestations.

On the 27th October, 1893, Nandubai entered a caveat, but filed no affidavit in support of it. A few days later the petitioner and caveatrix signed a submission paper in favour of one Kalidas Ramji in the following terms:

"In the matter of an application presented by Ghelabhai Atmaram Tumbuwa to obtain power from the High Court for the administration..."
and enjoyment between us two persons of the property of Bai Godawaribai, the widow of Darji Bhowan Deva Dave, I, Nandubai, the wife of Mulji Malu, having raised an objection have got a caveat registered in the High Court. In the matter thereof we, the said plaintiff and defendant, have appointed you an arbitrator to bring about a settlement of the said dispute. In this matter as to whatever award you may make and give on arriving at a decision, the same is to be agreed to and abided by us two persons."

There is a question between the parties as to what the dispute referred to in that submission really was. I shall revert to that matter hereafter, merely stating here that the plaintiff alleges that the existence of the will by the testatrix was not a matter in dispute and that he never intended to refer and did not refer that question to arbitration.

Several witnesses to prove the will were examined before the arbitrator. No witnesses were called by the caveator. On the 18th of April, 1894, Kalidas made an award which determined that Bai Godawaribai did not execute the will of which probate was sought. After this the plaintiff proceeded with his application for probate. Nandubai, whose caveat had been dismissed as no affidavit had been filed in support of it, obtained leave to restore it and put in an affidavit setting out the grounds for her caveat. In it she contended that Godawaribai had no right to make a will, as the property of which she purposed to dispose was the ancestral property of her husband, and she relied upon the award as conclusive against the plaintiff’s application for probate; and denied that the applicant was related to the husband of Godawaribai.

[340] Assuming for this purpose that the applicant by the submission which he signed referred the subject of the execution of the will to arbitration, the first question which we have to determine is the general one, viz.: Does an award made in the course of a probate case without the intervention of the Court between an executor and a caveator, that the will propounded had not been executed by the testatrix, preclude a Court of probate from considering an application by such executor for probate.

I agree with the Division Bench in its view that if such an award can be pleaded in bar of the application, the Probate Court is the tribunal which must determine the plea, even though in doing so it has incidentally to decide on the factum and validity of the award. The Probate Court is the only Court to determine whether probate of an alleged will shall issue generally or shall issue to the executor named in it. Before coming to a determination on that point it has often to decide upon questions incidentally arising, such as the domicile of the testator, where he has left assets, whether the executor has renounced, and other cognate matters. Whether the existence of an award precludes an executor from obtaining probate appears to me to be one of such cognate matters which a Court of Probate must determine for itself. We have, therefore, to consider whether the above is a valid legal plea.

A preliminary difficulty which presents itself to giving effect to it as a plea is this. It is admitted that such an award is not binding upon the beneficiaries who claim under the will. Application to prove the will can still be made by the persons entitled under s. 18 of the Probate Act to make such an application including the legatees. Upon such an application being made, and the will being proved, administration cannot be granted with the will annexed until the executor has been called upon to accept or renounce (s. 16). If the executor does not submit to the award, it is clear that he will not renounce. If he does not renounce, probate must go to him. An impasse is thus brought about. The difficulty though technical in its nature is nevertheless real. It can only, I think, be got over by treating the submission and award as an implied renunciation, but that would be adding a new mode of renunciation to those prescribed by the Probate Act (s. 17).

The Division Court has not intimated in its judgment under what provision of the Civil Procedure Code it has dealt with the plea which I am considering. There is no section of the Code which specially enables a Court to take cognizance of a submission to arbitration of a matter in issue in a suit made pending the suit (other than a submission through the Court) or of an award made upon such a submission. Such submission and award can only, I apprehend, be taken cognizance of in the same suit as an adjustment of the suit under s. 375 of the Civil Procedure Code, as was done in Samibai v. Premji (1). Section 375, however, only enables the Court to take cognizance of a lawful agreement. This directly raises the question whether a submission by an executor as to the execution of the will appointing him is a lawful agreement for an executor to enter into. The Division Court has assumed that it is. There are, I think, grave difficulties in the way of such an assumption. No authority bearing directly on the subject has been cited to us, and I have not been able to find any. I feel, therefore, some hesitation in coming to a conclusion upon it. The position of an executor is a peculiar one. His office being a private one of trust named by the testator and not by the law, the person nominated may refuse though he cannot assign the office—Williams on Executors (9th Ed.), p. 225. If he accepts the trust and intermeddles in the estate of the testator, he cannot afterwards retract, but is bound to proceed and prove the will—Mardaunt v. Clark (2); Williams on Executors, (9th Ed.), p. 227. The duty, therefore, of an executor appears to be first to consider whether the will appointing him is the will of the testator, and then whether he will act in the trust committed to him. Having determined these questions in the affirmative his next proceeding ought, I think, to be to prove the will in the Court to which the Legislature has granted exclusive jurisdiction in such matters. It is, I think, a plain violation of his duty to entrust to any other tribunal the determination of the question of the factum of his own appointment. If the arbitrator decides against the will, it appears (342) to me that if the executor still believes, as he alleges that he does here, that the will is the will of the testatrix, his duty to prove the will still subsists. An executor, I think, has no right to place himself in such a position as to preclude him from performing the duty which the law casts upon him. It must be borne in mind that an executor applying for probate is not an ordinary litigant. He is in the position of a trustee performing a duty. He represents both the testator whose will he is carrying out and is in the position of a trustee for the objects of the testator’s bounty. He is not dealing with a matter which concerns himself exclusively, though he may be personally interested in it. It appears to me that where it is conceded that his action in referring the factum of the will to another does not bind the beneficiaries under the will, it follows that his action is not authorized either by the mandate which he has received from his testator or by the trust which he is under to the beneficiaries. Whence, then, it may be asked, comes his authority to refer?

(1) 20 B. 304. (2) L.B. 1 P. & D. 592.
It is, I think, a fair test of the lawfulness of the executors' action in such a matter to consider whether the Court will itself in such a case refer the factum of the will to arbitration under s 508 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). In my opinion, it would have no authority to do so. Clearly it would not refer such a matter in which beneficiaries were interested without their consent and here none of them consented, and one of them, Ambabai, could give no consent. Again, assume that the arbitrator pronounced in favour of the will. It is clear to my mind that the Probate Court could not grant probate on such a vicarious finding. It must, I think, be itself satisfied by admissible evidence that the will is the will of the testator. In my opinion, s. 508 of the Civil Procedure Code is not applicable to probate proceedings. The provisions of s. 69 and of other sections of the Probate Act (V of 1881) appear to me to exclude the possibility of the Probate Judge referring the question of the execution of a will to arbitration, unless possibly all the beneficiaries appeared before him and consented to that course, and even then I doubt whether the Court could refer it. If a Judge could not himself refer such a question to arbitration, it follows, I think, that he cannot act upon an award which the executor and [343] caveator have otherwise than through the Court submitted to. The following cases though not actually in point support, I think, the above conclusions:—Norman v. Strains (1); Hargreaves v. Wood (2); Wytcherley v. Andrews (3). Counsel for the appellant rely in support of their appeal upon the absence of all precedent for such a plea as the one under consideration being set up in a Probate Court. I think that they are justified in doing so, and the absence of all authority upon the question is an argument against its validity. It leads to the inference that it is an unusual, if not an unprecedented, proceeding for an executor to adopt such a course and that a Court has not before sanctioned it.

Mr. Scott contends that there is nothing unusual in a compromise being entered into in the course of probate proceedings and that a reference to arbitration is only one mode of compromise. I have looked at all the cases of compromise which he has cited in addition to those above referred to. In each case (except in Evans v. Saunders (4)) where no facts are given) it appears that the result of the compromise was that probate of the will issued, opposition being abandoned. They, therefore, shed no light on the present case—The Viscountess Harewood v. Dunlop (5); Roadnight v. Carter (6).

There can be, of course, no doubt that a caveator can withdraw, upon terms, his opposition to the will.

It is said that if an executor cannot refer the question of the factum of the will to arbitration, it follows that he cannot withdraw from a suit for probate even if he finds that the will which he has propounded is not the will of the testator. That is, I think, a fallacy. A forged will imposes no obligation upon the executor named in it or on any one else. When the so-called executor finds that he has not been nominated by a testator, he is bound to withdraw from the position which he has unwittingly taken up; but it is, I think, the duty of the executor of a genuine will to prosecute a probate suit notwithstanding opposition, and he is, I think, bound to do so if he has intermeddled with the [344] estate. He can only legitimately escape from his position by renouncing it if he still has it in his power to renounce.

For these reasons I am strongly of opinion that notwithstanding the award, the Division Court ought to have tried the issue as to the genuineness of the will; but in view of the conclusion which I have come to on the remaining part of the case, it is not necessary for me finally to decide that point.

Turning to the next question, which is, whether the applicant referred the factum of the will of his testatrix to arbitration, we have to consider how far parol evidence is admissible in the case. There is no doubt as to the law upon this subject. Though parol evidence is not admissible to contradict, vary, add to or subtract from the terms of the submission which has been by the parties reduced to writing, such evidence is admissible to show in what manner the language of it is related to existing facts—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92. Thus if an undescribed dispute is referred to arbitration, evidence is admissible to show what the actual dispute was at the time of the submission. A qualification of the above rule is contained in s. 94 of the Act, which provides that when the language used in the document is plain in itself and accurately applies to existing facts, evidence may not be given to show that it was not meant to apply to such facts.

In this case the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses, which the Division Court has believed, proves, in my opinion, to demonstration that the plaintiff was informed by postcard (Ex. A) that "Kalidas had brought proposals with regard to Nandubai's matter, saying that Nandubai might be brought round and the matter might be thus settled, and that Nandubai wanted Rs. 5,000" (it must be remembered that Nandubai was the sister of Godarwarbai's husband and his nearest heir), "but Kalidas said that an amount to the extent of Rs. 2,000 might be named and paid to her; and that after settling the matter, she might be taken before the Das." The applicant says that he was willing to settle upon these terms, and that with a view to do so, he signed the submission paper. If this is to be believed, the only matter in dispute at the date of the submission was the amount to be paid [385] to Nandubai. This is established further by the letter (Ex. G) written by the instructions of Nandubai's agent Narayan, the day after the signing of the submission paper by the applicant, stating that "Nandubai had no intention of proceeding further with the caveat filed on her behalf, and had, therefore, not put in any affidavit in support thereof. She will, therefore, have no objection to your client's proceeding with the petition for probate of the will of the deceased and obtaining probate thereof." If this evidence is admissible, it establishes almost conclusively that Nandubai had through Kalidas proposed that her claim should be bought off and that the applicant agreed to that being done; and that the only dispute at the time of the submission was as to the amount which was to be paid to her.

The application of the law to the facts is the main difficulty in this case. Is the language of the submission paper so plain in itself and does it apply so accurately to existing facts as to preclude evidence of the fact which I have referred to being given? This is the question to be determined. If the nature of the objections made by Nandubai had been shown in an affidavit in support of her caveat, it would have solved the difficulty. Was it an objection made on the ground that her rights as next heir of Godarwarbai's husband had been ignored (which is put in the foregroup of her present affidavit), or was it an objection that the will propounded had not been executed by Godawaribai? If it had been the latter, we should, I think, have expected that the specific point would have been referred to the arbitrator. The language of the submission paper, "we  have appointed you an arbitrator to bring about a settlement of the said dispute" points rather to an objection of the former kind. Reading the submission in the light that has been given by the evidence which I have referred to, it appears to me that it is clear that it was an objection based upon the heirship of Nandubai which the parties had in view. The submission paper does not appear to me to be so plain in its language as to show accurately what was the nature of the dispute referred to arbitration and to exclude further evidence. That further evidence being given, I am satisfied that the question of the factum of the will was not the dispute which the parties had in mind when they respectively [346] signed the submission. The caveatrix, it is true, has not given evidence, but the letter (Ex. G), which we must take to have been written under instructions, is cogent proof of what her view of the dispute was. Although it is true that an objection to the will on the ground that the testatrix as a Hindu widow had no power to dispose by will of the property left by her husband is not one which a Court of probate would (except in a very extreme case) entertain, yet such an objection is so often in this Court put in as the only foundation for a caveat that I do not think that its inutility as a ground of caveat militates against the view which I have above expressed, as to the dispute which was really referred.

The Division Bench would apparently have come to the same conclusion, but considered that the subsequent action of the solicitors of the respective parties precluded the Court from acting on that view. They appear to have been in ignorance of the real subject of reference and to have appeared before the arbitrator to argue the execution of the will. Assuming that the dispute was at the time of reference that which I have indicated, there was nothing to prevent the parties from subsequently enlarging its terms or altering its character—Russell on Awards, Part I, Chap. III, s. 1. This the Division Court appears to have thought was done in this case. This, however, could only be done with the consent of the plaintiff and caveatrix, and it is clear that the plaintiff in this case did not agree to it. He was absent in Surat and knew nothing of what was being done. He appears to have been astonished when he saw the contents of the award, and went at once and told his solicitors that he had been swindled. I am, therefore, of opinion that the award decided a matter which was not originally or subsequently referred to arbitration; and that the finding upon it is not binding upon the applicant.

It is unnecessary to consider the further question as to whether the arbitrator was guilty of misconduct. The Division Bench thinks that though there may exist suspicion upon the point, corruption is not proved. The arbitrator, if Ghellabhai is to be believed, knew exactly what was referred to him. It is possible [347] that the conduct of the solicitors subsequently misled him, but I have great difficulty, upon the evidence, in believing that it was an honest award. However, I need not come to a positive conclusion upon that point. For these reasons I would reverse the decree and remand the case for retrial upon the fifth issue. Costs to be dealt with by the Probate Court.

Strachey, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to whether an executor against whose application for probate a caveat has been entered can lawfully submit to arbitration the question whether the will propounded by him was duly executed by the deceased, and whether an award made upon such submission against the will would preclude a Court of probate from considering the application, there seems to be a complete absence of direct authority; and I cannot say that I am entirely free from doubt. But I can see no answer to the reasoning of the Chief Justice, and I therefore concur in his judgment on the point. Whatever else such a submission to arbitration may be, it appears to me to involve an agreement by the executor in a certain event to renounce the executorship. He virtually undertakes, in the event of the arbitrator deciding against the will, not to make or proceed with the application for probate, and to treat the will as invalid in accordance with the award. Whether the award that the will is invalid is binding on the executor and the Court of probate, depends on whether a submission by the former involving such an agreement is lawful and constitutes a valid adjustment of the probate suit within s. 375 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If, at the time of the submission, the executor has intermeddled with the estate, he could not lawfully renounce the executorship, and the agreement to renounce it in a certain event would be bad as an agreement to do something which he could not lawfully do. If at that time he has not intermeddled with the estate, the result of treating the submission and award as precluding him from making or proceeding with an application for probate would be to give an agreement to renounce when followed by an award the effect of an actual renunciation which, under s. 194 of the Succession Act, 1865, and s. 17 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, should be made either orally in the presence of the Judge or by a writing signed by the person renouncing. I do not doubt that an executor may exercise his own judgment as to the execution and validity of the will, and is not bound to prove or carry out the provisions of a will which he believes to be a forgery. I do not think, however, that he can delegate the exercise of his judgment to another, and, whatever his own opinion may be as to the will, and whether or not he has intermeddled with the estate, bind himself to treat the will as a forgery if an arbitrator so decides.

As regards the rest of the case, I agree with the Chief Justice that evidence was properly admitted by the Division Court and may be considered by us to show what was the dispute to which the submission related, and that the dispute was not as to the execution of the will but as to the amount to be paid to the cestui que trust in consideration of her withdrawing her opposition. That being the dispute originally submitted to arbitration, and the scope of the arbitration not having been subsequently altered by agreement of the parties, the arbitrator was not competent to determine the question of the execution of the will, and his award was consequently ultra vires, and not binding on the executor. The principle referred to by the Division Court that “the parties, knowing the risk they ran, chose their tribunal, and they must abide by the result” has no application where the tribunal decides a matter which they have not submitted for its decision. I concur in the decree proposed by the Chief Justice.

On appeal from the judgment of Tyabji, J. (20 B. 316) and his decree dismissing the plaintiffs' suit the appeal Court reversed the decree holding that the accretions and accumulations in question were ancestral property as well as the corpus itself and passed as such to his sons and not to the University under the will.]

APPEAL from B. Tyabji, J. (1). The plaintiffs (appellants) brought this suit against the executors of the will of Sir Mangaldas Nathubhoy praying for a declaration that the said will was inoperative and void as far as it purported to dispose of certain ancestral property and for a declaration that certain immovable properties specified in the plaint and all their accumulations and accretions were ancestral property and devolved upon the plaintiffs and their heirs according to Hindu law irrespectively of the said will, and for an account of such accumulations and accretions, and for a declaration as against the plaintiffs and their heirs the said accumulations and accretions did not form part of the self-acquired property of the said Sir Mangaldas Nathubhoy, and that no part thereof was or could be validly disposed of by the will of the said Sir Mangaldas Nathubhoy.

The plaintiffs, who claimed the said properties and their accumulations as ancestral, were the two eldest sons of Sir Mangaldas Nathubhoy. It appeared that in 1881 they had entered into a certain agreement with their father, in the recitals to which Sir Mangaldas had expressly admitted that the said properties were ancestral. This agreement had remained in force, and its terms had been duly observed by the plaintiffs, up to the death of Sir Mangaldas on the 9th March, 1890.

In the interval, however, viz., in 1886, by a decree made by the High Court in a partition suit brought by a third (the youngest) son of Sir Mangaldas, the said immovable properties had been declared to be not ancestral property, but the self-acquired property of Sir Mangaldas.

In 1890 Sir Mangaldas died, and by his will, which was dated 27th January, 1888, he left the residue of his self-acquired property to the University of Bombay.

The main question in the suit was as to the effect of the agreement of 1881. The plaintiffs contended that the properties thereby admitted to be ancestral continued to be ancestral or at all events then became ancestral property in the hands of Sir Mangaldas, and that being ancestral all their accumulations and accretions were also ancestral, and that being so they were not included in the residue of his property bequeathed to the University.

The lower Court (B. Tyabji, J.) held up to this point that under the agreement only the corpus of the properties in question were ancestral property and that the accumulations and accretions thereof passed as self-acquired property under the residuary bequest in the will. The lower Court dismissed the suit. The case is fully reported in I. L. R., 20 Bom., 316.

JUDGMENT.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the Appeal Court (Farran, C.J., and Strachey, J.) reversed the decree, holding that all accumulations and accretions to the properties in question subsequent to the agreement of the 28th June, 1881, were ancestral property and passed, as such, to the sons of Sir Mangaldas Nathubhoy at his death. An account was ordered to be taken of such accumulations and accretions.

[351] ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Strachey.

CHANDULAL KHUSHALJI (Plaintiff) v. AWAD BAIN UMAR SULTAN NAWAZ JUNGE BAHADUR (Defendant).” [4th, 7th and 8th September, 1896.]

Under § 433 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) a consent given by the Governor General in Council after the commencement of a suit against a ruling chief—a consent not to the suit being instituted, but to its being proceeded with—is not a sufficient consent. If the consent has not been obtained before the commencement of the suit, the Court should dismiss the suit or allow the plaintiff to withdraw it with liberty to bring a fresh suit under § 373 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Where an insufficient consent has been obtained by the plaintiff, the defendant may by his conduct waive the defect, so that notwithstanding the absence of a valid consent under the section the suit can be heard and determined on its merits.

TRIAL of a preliminary issue as to whether the Court had jurisdiction to try the suit.

The defendant, who was the Chief of Shahr and Mokalla in Arabia, was the owner of a dockyard situate at Mazgaon in Bombay. On the 23rd March, 1893, the plaintiff brought this suit against him in the High Court of Bombay, claiming Rs. 1,50,000, damages for breach of an alleged contract to give him (the plaintiff) a lease for five years of the said dockyard at a rent of Rs. 4,000 a month. In August, 1893, the defendant filed his written statement in which he denied the alleged contract and made a counter claim against the plaintiff.

Various proceedings in the suit subsequently took place. In November, 1893, the defendant filed his affidavit of documents and in the same month he obtained an order that the plaintiff should do the same. Subsequently the suit appeared several times in the list for hearing, but was postponed. On the 23rd December, 1893, the defendant obtained an order for a commission for the examination of himself and certain witnesses at Hyderabad.

[352] In the month of April, 1894, the defendant's solicitor while at Hyderabad, where the defendant was then residing, ascertained that the defendant was "the Jamadar of Shihur and Mokalla on the southern coast of Arabia, holding a protectorate treaty with the British Government ratified on the 26th February, 1890." As such under s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), he could not be sued without the consent of the Governor General in Council. No such consent had been obtained by the plaintiff, and accordingly the defendant filed an additional written statement submitting that the Court had no jurisdiction to hear the suit, and alleging that it was only in the month of April, 1894, that he became aware of the provisions of s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that he had filed his first written statement in ignorance.

On the 7th July, 1894, an order was made upon a summons taken out by the defendant that the suit should be set down for hearing upon the preliminary issue as to the jurisdiction of the Court to hear it. Shortly after this order was made the plaintiff sent a petition to the Government of India stating the nature of the suit and applying for the consent of the Governor General in Council as required by s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and on the 28th August, 1894, a certificate, purporting to be under that section, was granted to the plaintiff in the following terms:—

"This is to certify that under the provisions of s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure the Governor General in Council consents to Chandulal Khushalji proceeding against His Highness the Sultan Nawaz Jung in suit No. 147 of 1893 instituted in the High Court at Bombay or in any suit based on the same causes of action which the said Chandulal Khushalji may hereafter institute against His Highness the Sultan Nawaz Jung in the said Court."

It appeared that the above sanction was granted upon a statement made by the plaintiff that the defendant carried on trade within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Bombay. The defendant denied that statement, and the Government of India thereupon suspended the certificate pending an inquiry into the facts. Ultimately, on the 6th November, 1895, the Government of Bombay informed the plaintiff's solicitors that the Government of India had decided that "the certificate granted by them under [353] s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code, authorizing the institution of Civil suits in the High Court at Bombay by Chandulal Khushalji against His Highness Sultan Nawaz Jung Bahadur of Shihur and Mokalla, should now be allowed to take effect."
On the same date, however (6th November, 1895), the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay wrote also to the defendant's solicitors as follows:—

"I am directed to inform you that the Government of India are of opinion that the point whether His Highness Sultan Nawaz Jung of Shihr and Mokalla does or does not carry on trading transactions in Bombay appears arguable and may conveniently be left for the decision in a Court of law, and that they have accordingly decided that the certificate granted by them under s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing the institution of Civil suits in the High Court at Bombay by Chandulal Kuhsalji against His Highness the Sultan, should now be allowed to take effect."

The material parts of the correspondence which took place relating to the grant of the sanction of this suit by the Government of India are set forth at length in the judgment of the Court.

The case now came on for hearing upon the preliminary issue as to whether, having regard to the provisions of s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1862), the Court had jurisdiction.

Macpherson (with Branson), for plaintiff:—This Court has jurisdiction. The necessary consent under s. 433 has been obtained. The sanction may be given at any time. Compare cl. 12 of the Letters Patent, 1865. But in any case the defendant has clearly waived his privilege under s. 433—Mighell v. Sultan of Johore (1).

Scott (with Lang, Advocate-General) for the defendant:—This suit was brought without the necessary consent of the Governor General. This consent is not merely a privilege given to ruling chiefs which may be waived by them: it is a condition necessary to give the Court jurisdiction—Sarnam Tewari v. Sakina Bibi (2). The language of s. 433 plainly shows that the consent must be given before the suit is brought. The phrases "may be sued" (cl. 1), "desiring to sue" (cl. 2a), "is to be sued" (cl. 2c) show this—Ladkuwarbai v. [354] Ghoel Shri Sarsangji (3); Kambkai v. Himatsangji (4); Phümmman Lal v. Raja Samsher Parkash (5); Jwala Pershad v. H. H. the Rana of Dholepore (6); Beer Chunder v. Ishan Chunder (7); Foot's International Law, p. 131.

The consent here given is to a suit already instituted. The Government had no power to give such a consent. Moreover, their letter of the 6th November to the defendant's solicitors shows that the Government was not satisfied that the defendant was trading within the jurisdiction. It could not, therefore, give a consent. This Court can inquire into the validity of the consent—Beer Chunder v. Raj Coomar Nobodeep (8). There was no waiver by the defendant. He could not waive a right of which he was ignorant.

Macpherson in reply.—Section 433 does not relate to jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of this Court depends on the Letters Patent. Section 433 merely relates to procedure. Compare Act XIII of 1868, s. 2, and see Begum Bibee v. The King of Oude (9). JUDGMENT.

[355] STRACHEY, J.—This suit has been set down for trial of the preliminary issues, whether the Court has jurisdiction to try it. The issue involves questions of considerable importance upon the construction of s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure, regarding suits against sovereign princes and ruling chiefs. The affidavits show, and it has not been contested by the plaintiff, that the defendant, though ordinarily residing at Hyderabad, is the Jamadar of Snir and Mokalla on the southern coast of Arabia, and a ruling chief within the meaning of the section. He can, therefore, be sued only with the consent of the Governor General in Council. In the present suit the plaintiff claims to recover from him Rs. 1,50,000 as damages for breach of a contract to lease for five years, at a monthly rent of Rs. 4,000, the Mazgaon Dockyard in Bombay, of which the defendant is the owner, and a further sum of Rs. 4,000, being one month's rent paid in advance by the plaintiff as a deposit. At the time when the suit was filed, the consent of the Governor General in Council under s. 433 had not been obtained or applied for; but it was given more than a year afterwards.

One of the questions to be decided is whether a consent given after the commencement of the suit—a consent not to the suit being instituted, but to its being proceeded with—is a sufficient consent within the meaning of the section. Another question is, whether, assuming it to be insufficient, the defendant has by his conduct waived the defect, so that, notwithstanding the absence of a valid consent under the section, the suit can be heard and determined on the merits.

To decide the question of waiver it is necessary to see exactly what the defendant has done in the suit since its commencement. The suit was instituted on the 23rd March, 1893. The defendant was served with the writ of summons and filed an appearance in the following June. On the 21st August, 1893, he filed his written statement. In it he raised no plea with reference to s. 433, or his status as a ruling chief, but contested the claim solely on the merits. He denied the breach of contract alleged in the plaint, asserted that it was the plaintiff and not himself who had broken the contract, and claimed by way of set-off to be entitled to a decree for Rs. 49,900 on account of the damages he had suffered from the breach. On the 22nd August, 1893, he obtained a Judge's order under s. 129 of the Code [356] calling upon the plaintiff to make an affidavit of documents; on the 18th November he filed his own affidavit; and on the 21st November he obtained a further Judge's order directing the plaintiff to file his affidavit by a specified date, and to pay the costs of and incidental to the summons. On the 10th June and the 7th October, 1893, the suit was on the board, but was postponed by consent, as the affidavits of documents had not then been filed. On the 4th December it was again on the board, and was called on for hearing and final disposal, when the defendant's counsel applied for a further postponement on the ground that his client had not completed inspection of the plaintiff's documents. Upon this application
Mr. Justice Parsons made an order postponing the hearing until the 11th December, directing that the suit should be set down on the trial board for that day, and ordering the defendant to pay the costs of the motion.
On the 12th December the suit was a third time on the board, but was postponed by consent pending the determination of a summons which the defendant had taken out on the 9th for the issue of a commission to Hyderabad for the examination of himself and his witnesses. This summons was issued upon an affidavit by the defendant's agent Abdulla Habib bin Abdulla stating, among other things, that the defendant was a resident of Hyderabad, that his witnesses also resided there, and that he was now advised that he could not safely proceed to a hearing in the absence of his own and their evidence. On the 23rd December an order was made for a commission and for the examination under oath of the defendant and his witnesses, the commission to be returned executed within two months from the date of its despatch. The order was made after reading another affidavit of the same date by the defendant's agent which set forth the nature of the evidence which the Hyderabad witnesses were likely to give, denied the plaintiff's allegation that the commission was applied for merely to delay the suit, and ended with these words:—"I firstly say that the defendant is the Sultan of Shihr and Mokalla and entitled to a salute of twelve guns under the order of the Government of India, and claims the privilege of exemption from attendance in Court." Although the defendant thus asserted his position as Sultan of Shihr [357] and Mokalla, the whole affidavit, taken in connection with the application for a commission which it supported, can only have meant that he desired that evidence should be taken and the suit decided upon such evidence and upon the merits, and did not desire to claim any exemption or privilege other than exemption from personal appearance in Court, under s. 641 of the Code. The next proceeding appears to have been a consent order on the 15th March, 1894, including the names of two other witnesses in the commission. Considerable delay, for which each party throws the blame upon the other, took place in the despatch of the commission, and at last on the 21st May, 1894, the plaintiff took out a summons before the vacation Judge calling upon the defendant to show cause why the order of the 23rd December, 1893, for the issue of the commission should not be revoked, and why the defendant and his witnesses should not be examined de bene esse before the Prothonotary. That summons was issued upon an affidavit of the same date affirmed by the plaintiff, alleging that the defendant had been delaying the despatch of the commission with a view to harass him and compel him to settle the suit, that the defendant and his three witnesses were then staying in Bombay, and that the application for a commission was a mere pretext to put off the hearing. Upon the same date as the summons, the defendant's attorneys, Messrs. Crawford, Burder and Co., wrote a letter to the plaintiff's attorneys in which they asked whether the plaintiff had obtained the consent of the Governor General in Council under s. 433 before filing the suit, requested an appointment or inspection of the consent if obtained, and observed that, if it had not been obtained, the suit must of course be dismissed. That letter written on the 21st May, 1894, when the defendant was being pressed with an application for revocation of the commission and for the immediate personal examination of himself and his witnesses, was the very first suggestion made on his behalf since the institution of the suit in March, 1893, that the suit was defective for non-compliance with s. 433. In opposition to the summons two affidavits were, on the 23rd May, 1894, filed on behalf of the defendant. The first was made by his agent, denying the truth of the statements in the [358] plaintiff's affidavit, and alleging, among other things, that the commission was being despatched that same day. The second was made by Mr. Burder, and among other statements it contained the following: "I say that, whilst I was in Hyderabad, I ascertained that the defendant, though sued as Awad bin Umar Sultan Nawaz Jung Bahadur of Hyderabad, is the Jamadar of Shihir and Mokalla on the southern coast of Arabia holding a protectorate treaty with the British Government ratified on the 26th February, 1890, and, as such, under s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code, cannot be sued without consent of the Governor General in Council. On my return to Bombay at the beginning of the present month, I having ascertained that such consent had not been obtained, received instructions to take the necessary steps for having the suit dismissed, but owing to the absence of the counsel retained for the defendant, and as there was no immediate hurry to justify an application during the vacation, I have not yet taken out the summons to that effect." Mr. Burder does not mention when it was that he ascertained at Hyderabad that the defendant was the Jamadar of Shihir and Mokalla, and as such entitled to the privilege of s. 433. At the time when he made that affidavit he must have forgotten the last paragraph of the affidavit made by his client's agent as far back as the 23rd December, 1893, in support of the application for a commission, in which it was expressly stated that the defendant was the Sultan of Shihir and Mokalla, and as such entitled to be exempted from personal appearance in Court.

The summons to revoke the order of the 23rd December, 1893, came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Bayley, but that learned Judge postponed passing orders upon it until after the vacation. During the interval the defendant on the 31st May, 1894, wrote to the local Government stating that in a suit filed against him in the High Court he was advised to plead to the jurisdiction of the Court, as the plaintiff had filed the suit without the sanction of Government as required by s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and applying for a formal certificate that he was recognized by the British Government as the chief of a foreign independent state. In reply [359] to this, Mr. W. Lee Warner, then Secretary to the Government of Bombay, wrote on the 16th June, 1894, that s. 433 required that the plaintiff should obtain the consent of the Governor General in Council to the defendant being sued, and that the Government should await an application from the suitor. On the 23rd June, 1894, the defendant took out a Judge's summons calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the suit should not be set down for trial upon the preliminary issue as to the jurisdiction of the Court to hear and determine it. The summons was issued upon an affidavit of Abdulla Habib bin Abdulla which contained the following passage:—"I say that the defendant did not take the above point before, because he did not know he was exempt from being sued, and that it is only recently that he happened to discover that under s. 433 of the Civil Procedure Code no suit can be brought against him without the previous consent of the Governor General in Council, and the defendant brought the fact of his being the ruling chief of the said Shihir and Mokalla to the notice of his solicitor Mr. Burder by producing to him the eleventh volume of the Treaties published in 1892 by Mr. C. U. Aitchison, the Under-Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department, wherein the treaty made by the defendant with the British Government appears, and Mr. Burder was convinced of the defendant’s position in life by the perusal of the said treaty." Upon the same date as the Judge’s summons, the defendant filed an additional written statement formally submitting that the Court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the suit, and adding, "the defendant says that he became aware only in the latter part of the month of April, 1894, of the provisions of the said s. 433, and he filed his first written statement in ignorance thereof." On the 7th July, 1894, the summons came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Starling, who ordered that the suit should be set down for trial upon the preliminary issue as to jurisdiction on the 10th September following. In fixing that date Mr. Justice Starling appears to have intended to allow sufficient time for the plaintiff to apply to the Governor General in Council for a consent to the suit under s. 433. A further Judge’s order of the 19th July, 1894, directed that execution of [360] the commission should be postponed and all proceedings in the matter stayed until the question of jurisdiction should be disposed of. On the 30th August, 1894, the defendant made an application under s. 235 of the Code for execution of the Judge’s order of the 21st November, 1893, awarding him the costs of the summons directing the plaintiff to file an affidavit of documents; on the 13th September this was followed by the issue of a warrant of attachment under s. 269; and ultimately the costs payable under the order and the costs of execution awarded under the warrant were paid by the plaintiff.

I have now stated all the facts bearing upon the question of waiver. What follows will show the manner in which the consent of the Governor General in Council was at last given. Shortly after the order of the 7th July, 1894, the plaintiff addressed a petition to the Government of India in which he stated the nature of the suit and its history up to that time, and applied for the consent of the Governor General in Council under s. 433 of the Code. On the 28th August, 1894, a certificate signed by one of the Secretaries to the Government of India was granted in the following terms:—"This is to certify that under the provisions of s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Governor General in Council consents to Chandulal Khushalji proceeding against His Highness the Sultan Nawaz Jung in suit No. 147 of 1893 instituted in the High Court at Bombay, or in any suit based on the same causes of action which the said Chandulal Khushalji may hereafter institute against His Highness the Sultan Nawaz Jung in the said Court." Soon after this, the defendant addressed a memorial to the Government of India protesting against this consent, which, according to a letter from the Government of India to the Bombay Government of the 24th October, 1894, was granted on the strength of the plaintiff’s statement that the defendant carried on a large trade and business within the local limits of the jurisdiction of this Court. The defendant denied the truth of that statement, and the Government of India thereupon "suspended" the certificate which it had granted, pending an inquiry into the alleged trading, while the defendant gave an undertaking to take no steps in the meantime to obtain the dismissal of the suit on the [361] ground of the absence of consent. Accordingly from the 24th October, 1894, to the 6th November 1895, the question whether the defendant in fact traded within the local limits of the jurisdiction was under investigation by the Government of India through the local Government for the purpose of determining whether the consent already granted but afterwards suspended should be confirmed or cancelled.

In the course of this inquiry the plaintiff forwarded a petition to the Government setting forth the particulars of the defendant’s trading operations on which he relied. A copy was furnished to the defendant and he submitted a rejoinder and memorials in which he denied the existence of the alleged trading. Ultimately, on the 6th November 1895 the Acting Chief Secretary to the Bombay Government addressed a letter to the plaintiff’s attorneys in which he said “I am directed to inform you that the Government of India have decided that the certificate granted by them under s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorising the institution of Civil suits in the High Court at Bombay by Chandulal Khushalji against His Highness Sultan Nawaz Jung of Shibir and Mokalla should now be allowed to take effect.” That is, in terms, an unqualified confirmation of the consent given on the 28th August, 1894. On the same date, however, the Acting Chief Secretary also wrote a letter to the defendant’s attorneys as follows: “I am directed to inform you that the Government of India are of opinion that the point whether His Highness Sultan Nawaz Jung of Shibir and Mokalla does or does not carry on trading transactions in Bombay appears arguable, and may conveniently be left for decision in a Court of law, and that they have accordingly decided that the certificate granted by them under s. 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorising the institution of Civil suits in the High Court at Bombay by Chandulal Khushalji against His Highness the Sultan should now be allowed to take effect.” It has been suggested on behalf of the defendant that the two letters are inconsistent, that the second letter shows that the Government of India were unable to come to any conclusion as to the defendant’s alleged trading, and consequently gave no such consent as s. 433 contemplates, but virtually left it to the Court to decide whether the defendant was entitled to the protection afforded by the section.

In my opinion, there is no force in this suggestion. To see whether consent to the plaintiff’s suit was given or not, the letter of the Government to the plaintiff and not their letter to the defendant must be looked at. The letter to the plaintiff simply confirms the previous consent without any sort of qualification. The letter to the defendant merely informs him of the confirmation, and in effect tells him that the Court is competent to go behind the consent to determine for itself upon evidence whether the defendant trades in Bombay, and if it should find that he does not, to treat the consent as invalid. To say that the question of trading is “arguable” is not to say that the Government have arrived at no conclusion in regard to it. To say that it may conveniently be left for decision in a Court of law is not to say that the Government are unable to decide it, or do not decide it, but that their decision under s. 433 is not final or binding upon the Court. Whether that is a correct construction of s. 433 is a question upon which I need not express an opinion. At all events the Government say that they have decided that the previous consent should now be allowed to take effect. I must presume that they would not have so decided unless in their own opinion the requirements of the section had been fulfilled, and I have no doubt that their letter to the plaintiff terminated the “suspension” of the previous certificate and left it whatever force it had when originally granted. The defendant himself in a letter to the Government of India of the 29th November, 1895, and in a memorial of the 27th January, 1896, called the Government’s attention to this point, suggested that they had left undetermined the question which under s. 433 they were bound to determine before giving their consent, and prayed that the consent might be withdrawn. However, on the 15th June, 1896, the Bombay Government informed the defendant "that the Government of India saw no reason for withholding the consent accorded by them to the institution in the High Court of Bombay of the suit filed against His Highness by Chandulal Khushalji." The result is that the consent of the Governor General in Council to this suit must now be taken to have been given on the 28th August, 1894.

[363] That is, in terms, a consent to a suit which had previously been instituted without consent "proceeding" against the defendant. Is that a consent which, having regard to the terms of s. 433 of the Code, can make a suit maintainable against a ruling chief? Upon this question there appears to be no direct authority. There are many provisions both in the Code and in other enactments which require the consent of the Court or of some other authority as conditions under which alone suits may in certain cases be maintained, and in connection with which the question has arisen whether the consent must be obtained before the institution of the suit or may be obtained afterwards. No general principle, however, can be extracted from the cases decided upon these provisions. In each case the question depends upon the intention of the Legislature as expressed in the particular section. Sometimes it is obvious that the consent must be obtained at the outset, as in s. 2 of Act XIII of 1868, which provides that suits brought against the King of Oudh cannot be "commenced or prosecuted" without the consent of the Governor General in Council "first had and obtained." Section 12 of this Court's Letters Patent, requiring that where the cause of action arises only partly within the local limits, the leave of the Court must be "first obtained" has been held to imply that leave must be granted at the time of the acceptance of the plaint and not afterwards. So, too, s. 55 of Bengal Act IX of 1879, which provides that "no suit shall be brought" under the Act without the sanction of the Court of Wards, has been held to require the obtaining of the necessary sanction before the suit is filed; and s. 18 of Act XX of 1863 providing that "no suit shall be entertained under this Act without a preliminary application being first made to the Court for leave to institute such suit" would probably be construed in the same way. In the Code of Civil Procedure a similar construction has been placed on s. 17 requiring the leave of the Court for the institution of certain suits, where some of the defendants do not reside or carry on business or personally work for gain within the jurisdiction; and s. 30, which allows one or more of numerous parties having the same interest, to sue, with the permission of the Court, on behalf of all parties interested. On the other hand, it has been [364] held under s. 440, providing that "a suit shall not be instituted" on behalf of a minor "except with the leave of the Court," and s. 3 of Act XL of 1858 (which corresponds with s. 2 of Act XX of 1864 relating to Bombay), that although the obtaining of permission should either precede or be contemporaneous with the institution of the suit, the course which should always be taken where a suit is brought in violation of these provisions is to return the plaint in order that the error may be rectified. In Ziāulunisa Begam v. Mottram(1) it was held that in s. 1 of the Nawab of Surat Act, XVIII of 1843, providing that "no writ or process shall be sued forth or prosecuted.....

unless with the consent of the Governor of Bombay in Council first obtained," the expression "sued forth" implied that the consent was not a condition precedent to the filing of the suit, and that a consent subsequently given did not vitiate the proceedings. The Court at the same time suggested that under s. 11 of the Nawab Nazim's Debts Act, XVII of 1873, and s. 2 of the Prince of Arcot's Privilege Act, XX of 1873, the consent of the Government would be a condition precedent, and must be given before the suit is commenced. Again, in Nawab Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Mustaum Ladli Begum (1) the Privy Council held upon the construction of ss. 4 and 6 of the Pensions Act, XXIII of 1871, that a suit relating to a grant of property within the meaning of the Act need not be dismissed because the certificate of the Collector had not been obtained before its commencement, but that the Court was justified in going on with the suit when the certificate was received. Upon the analogy of this decision, the Madras High Court held in Ramayyanar v. Krishnayyanar (2) that, notwithstanding the terms of s. 539 of the Code allowing persons to "institute" suits relating to public charities, "having obtained the consent in writing of the Advocate General," a consent obtained after the institution was good and related back. I agree, however, with the judgments in Tukaram Azmat Joshi [365] v. Vitha Joshi (3) and Dinesh Chunder Roy v. Golam Mostapha (4) that the decision of the Privy Council lays down no general principle of construction but depends upon the special language of the Pensions Act. Another case in which leave to bring an action was required by statute, but in which it was held that leave might be obtained after action brought, is Rendall v. Blair (5). That case was decided upon s. 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, which provided that "before any suit, petition, or other proceeding" relating to a charity "shall be commenced" the leave of the Charity Commissioners must be obtained. It was unanimously held by the Court of Appeal, dissenting from Mr. Justice Kay, that although these words showed that the consent ought to be applied for before the action was begun, other expressions in the section implied that, in the absence of the consent, the suit should not be dismissed but stayed until the consent should be obtained. As Lord Justice Bowen expressed it, they indicated that "the absence of the consent of the Commissioners is only a bar to the Courts dealing with the action, and not a bar to the original institution of the suit."

These cases show that there is no general principle applicable to the question, and that it must be decided exclusively with reference to the terms of s. 433 itself. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the consent of the Governor General in Council must be obtained before the institution of the suit. The language of the section seems inconsistent with any other view. The consent is necessary to enable a sovereign prince or ruling chief to be "sued in any competent Court." "Sued" includes every part of a suit, every step in it including the filing of the plaint, and, therefore, the filing of the plaint must require consent as much as any other and later proceeding. Again, a sovereign prince or ruling chief may be sued with the consent of the Governor General in Council" but not without such consent." Consequently the filing of the plaint and every other step taken in the suit before the consent has been obtained is suing "without such consent" and, therefore, a violation of the section. Further, I agree with the argument [366] of Mr. Scott that the language of cls. (a) and (c) of

(1) 9 I.A. 8.
(2) 10 M. 195.
(3) 13 B. 656.
(4) 16 C. 89.
(5) 45 Ch. D. 139.
sub-s. (2) points to the same conclusion. The expression in cl. (a) “the person desiring to sue him,” and the expression in cl. (c) “is to be sued” refer to something to be done in the future, not something which has been done in the past. If the consent might be given after suit brought, the Legislature would have said that it should not be given unless the prince or chief “has instituted a suit in the Court against the person suing or desiring to sue him,” or “is in possession of immovable property... and is being sued or is to be sued with reference to such possession.”

If then the consent ought to be, but has not been obtained, before the commencement of the suit, what is the consequence of the defect? Ought the Court to adjourn the suit to enable the consent to be obtained, and to proceed with the suit when it has been obtained? There is nothing in s. 433 of the Code, as there is in s. 6 of the Pensions Act and in s. 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, in England, which would justify such a course. I think that it would be inconsistent with the intention of the Legislature, and that a ruling chief who has not precluded himself from raising the objection is entitled to apply for the dismissal of the suit on the ground that it is barred by the section. I think that in such a case the Court should dismiss the suit, or perhaps allow the plaintiff to withdraw it with liberty to bring a fresh suit under s. 373.

The result of this view is that the consent of the Governor General in Council given in August, 1894, and confirmed in November, 1895, to the plaintiff “proceeding against” the defendant in a suit instituted in March, 1893, is not a consent within s. 433 of the Code, and that it is unnecessary to consider the other objections which have been urged against its validity. The suit must, therefore, be dealt with upon the footing of no consent having been obtained under the section. Still it remains to consider whether that is an objection which is necessarily fatal to the suit. That depends upon the further question whether the objection is one which can be and which has been waived by the defendant. Is the absence of consent a defect in the jurisdiction [367] of the Court to hear and determine the suit, a defect not capable by any consent or waiver on the defendant’s part? Or is it an irregularity in procedure in the exercise of jurisdiction, a bar to the suit fatal if properly pleaded, but in the nature of a personal privilege which the person entitled to it may waive by submitting to the jurisdiction and electing that the suit shall be tried on the merits? In my opinion it has nothing to do with jurisdiction, except in the loose sense in which jurisdiction is continually confounded with procedure. At all events, if it can properly be called a question of jurisdiction, it is not so in the sense in which it is true that consent cannot confer jurisdiction, or that defects of jurisdiction cannot be waived. Here is a suit which, as regards its nature and class, is undoubtedly within the general jurisdiction of this Court, a suit for damages for breach of contract, for which, as the cause of action arose in part beyond the local limits, the leave of the Court was first obtained under cl. 12 of the Letters Patent. The Court has thus jurisdiction over the subject-matter, but in the exercise of that jurisdiction a particular rule of procedure requires the consent of the Governor General in Council before the suit can be entertained against this particular defendant. The absence of consent was, therefore, a good ground of objection to the hearing, a special defence which the defendant was entitled by the section to plead as a bar to the suit. The fact, however, that a particular defence is allowed by statute in a suit within the general jurisdiction of the Court, and may be fatal to the suit in limine, does not in that event withdraw the suit from the Court's jurisdiction. I infer from a passage in the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Beer Chunder Manikyka v. Raj Coomar Nobodeep Chunder Deb Burmanto (1) that the learned Judges were of opinion that s. 433 created a privilege which might be waived, and that in an unreported case a Division Bench of the same Court refused on appeal to allow a ruling chief to take the plea of no jurisdiction, because he had not taken it in the lower Court. It appears to me that the principle which governs this case is stated in the following passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in Ledgard v. Bull (2):—"The District Judge was perfectly competent to entertain and try the [368] suit, if it were competently brought, and their Lordships do not doubt that, in such a case, a defendant may be barred by his own conduct from objecting to irregularities in the institution of the suit. When the Judge has no inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a suit, the parties cannot by their mutual consent convert it into a proper judicial process, although they may constitute the Judge their arbiter, and be bound by his decision on the merits when these are submitted to him. But there are numerous authorities which establish that when, in a case which the Judge is competent to try, the parties without objection join issue and go to trial upon the merits, the defendant cannot subsequently dispute his jurisdiction upon the ground that there were irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to the dismissal of the suit. The present case does not come strictly within these authorities, because the defendant's plea was stated before issue was joined on the merits, and, in reliance on that plea, he objected to the case being tried, and withheld his objections to the validity of the patent. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the facts from which their Lordships are asked to infer that the defendant did, in point of fact, waive all objection to the competency of the suit, and engage that the cause shall be tried on its merits by the District Judge."

In the present case, the Court is "perfectly competent to entertain and try the suit if it were competently brought;" the Judge has "inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit;" the cause is one which he is "competent to try." The terms f.s. 433 providing that a ruling chief may, with the consent of the Governor General in Council "but not without such consent, be sued in any competent Court" imply that the giving of the consent is one thing and the competency of the Court another: that the Court may still be "competent," though by want of consent the defendant is protected. The defendant, therefore, "may be barred by his own conduct from objecting to "irregularities in the institution of the suit." The absence of consent is such an irregularity: it exactly corresponds to their Lordships' description of "irregularities in the initial procedure which, if objected to at the time, would have led to the dismissal [369] of the suit." If the defendant by filing a written statement directed entirely to the merits, and allowing the suit to be actually three times on the board for hearing and final disposal, did not in strictness "join issue and go to trial upon the merits," the question still remains whether at all events it is not to be inferred from the facts that he waived all objection to the competency of the suit, and engaged that the "cause should be tried on its merits." In Moore v. Gamjee(3), the same principle was applied to a case more nearly resembling the present in this respect, that the "initial irregularity" was the absence of a consent required by statute for the bringing of an action. That was an application by the defendant for a prohibition directed to the Judge of the County Court in which the action was brought, to prohibit the proceedings. By s. 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as the defendant did not at the time of commencing the action dwell or carry on business within the district of the County Court, but had carried on business there within six months before the commence ment, the action could only be brought against him in that Court by the leave of the Judge or Registrar. The plaintiff without obtaining the necessary leave brought his action, which was an ordinary action for specific performance of a contract, which the County Court was competent to try. The defendant appeared by a solicitor, and the case was heard and partly determined, and adjourned to a future day. At the hearing on the second day, the solicitor for the defendant for the first time took the objection that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action, as no leave had been obtained to bring the action in that Court. The Judge held that the defendant, by appearing and contesting the action, had waived the objection; and he proceeded with the hearing. The defendant's application for a prohibition came before Mr. Justice Cave and Mr. Justice A. L. Smith. They held that the County Court Judge was right. In his judgment Mr. Justice Cave said (pp. 246-247): "There are two senses in which it may be said that there is no jurisdiction to entertain an action—first, where under no circumstances can the Court entertain the particular kind of action, as in cases within s. 56 of the Act—that is, libel, slander, [370] seduction, or breach of promise of marriage; secondly, there are the cases provided for by s. 74, when under certain circumstances leave can be given to bring an action which the Court could not otherwise entertain; in these cases there is no want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, but leave is required in the particular case before the Court can entertain the action, and it is an objection which may be taken to the hearing of the action that the defendant does not dwell or carry on his business within the jurisdiction, and leave has not been obtained. In the present case the plaintiff was issued, and the case was heard and partly decided before the objection was taken. There is always some difficulty in drawing an analogy between proceedings in the High Court and proceedings in the County Court, because the High Court has jurisdiction by the common law, whereas the jurisdiction of the County Court is entirely created by statute; but there is some analogy between such a case as the present and a case in the High Court where it is sought to serve a writ on a defendant who is resident abroad. In such a case in the High Court, if the defendant is served, and takes any step in the action except moving to set aside the service, he waives the objection of want of jurisdiction, and cannot be heard; but a conditional appearance may be entered, which has not the effect of waiving the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction. In my opinion the case is much the same in the County Court. Part III of the County Courts Act, 1888, is headed 'Jurisdiction and Law,' and Part IV, which includes s. 74, is headed 'Procedure and Trial.' It seems, therefore, that cases which are within s. 74 would come under the head of procedure rather than under the head of jurisdiction, although no doubt this Court would have power to issue a prohibition in a proper case. I think, therefore, that the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court may be waived by taking any step in the proceedings before applying to dismiss the action; and this view is borne out by a case which was not cited in argument—In re Jones v. James (1)." That was a case in which Erla, J., held that an objection to the validity of an order granting leave to the plaintiff to issue a summons against the defendant was waived by the conduct of [371] the defendant, after being served with the order and summons, in appearing before the County Court and giving notice to the clerk of his intention to set up the statute of limitations as a bar to the plaintiff's claim.

(1) 9 C. 595 (556).  (2) 13 I. A. 134 (145).  (3) 25 Q. B. D. 244.

The distinction drawn by Mr. Justice Cave between cases where there is a want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, where "under no circumstances can the Court entertain the particular kind of action," and cases where, jurisdiction over the subject-matter existing, "leave is required in the particular case before the Court can entertain the action," exactly corresponds with the distinction drawn by the Privy Council in Ledgard v. Bull between the absence of inherent jurisdiction over the subject-matter and initial irregularities in the institution of a suit which the Court is competent to try. The present is not a case "where under no circumstances can the Court entertain the particular kind of action," but "leave is required in the particular case before the Court can entertain the action." The absence of such leave is "an objection which may be taken to the hearing of the action." In the Code of Civil Procedure, just as in the County Courts Act, 1888, the section requiring leave does not come under the heading of "jurisdiction," but under a heading referring to procedure: it is not, as if it were a kind of proviso to s. 10 or illustration to s. 11, placed in Chapter I which specifically relates to "the jurisdiction of the Courts," but in Chapter XXVIII which is included in Part III "of suits in particular cases," and clearly relates to procedure. If Mr. Justice Cave's principle applies, an objection to the jurisdiction based on the absence of consent under s. 433 would be waived by taking any step in the proceedings before applying to dismiss the suit, even, if the decision in In re Jones v. James is right, such a step as formally declaring an intention to rely upon a particular technical defence other than the absence of consent. A fortiori, it would be waived by formally pleading to the merits.

There is another point of view from which the question may be regarded. What s. 433 does is to create a personal privilege for sovereign princes and ruling chiefs and their ambassadors and envoys. It is a modified form of the absolute privilege [372] enjoyed by independent sovereigns and their ambassadors in the Courts in England, in accordance with the principles of international law. The difference is that while in England the privilege is unconditional, dependent only on the will of the sovereign or his representative, in India it is dependent upon the consent of the Governor General in Council, which can be given only under specified conditions. This modified or conditional privilege is, however, based upon essentially the same principle as the absolute privilege, the dignity and independence of the ruler, which would be endangered by allowing any person to sue him at pleasure, and the political inconveniences and complications which would be the result. If then s. 433 constitutes a modification of the international rule for Indian purposes, and if the absolute privilege given by that rule may be waived by the independent sovereign, it seems to follow a fortiori that the modified privilege given by the section may be waived by the ruling chief. In the recent case of Mihhell v. The Sultan of Jokore (1); the Court of Appeal were agreed that an independent sovereign may, when sued, waive his privilege and elect to submit to the jurisdiction by appearance to a writ; and in Taylor v. Best (2) it was held that an ambassador who, in an action brought against him, appeared, pleaded, joined issue, and obtained a rule for a special jury to try the action, was estopped from afterwards setting up his privilege. In India, before the enactment of s. 433 of the Code of 1877, the privilege of independent sovereign princes stood on exactly the same footing as in England—Jwala Pershad v. The Rana of Dholepor (3), Phummun Lal v. Raja Shamsher Purkaz (4) and Ladkuwarbai v. Ghoot Shri Sersangji Pratapsangji (5), where the Court, at p. 160 of the report, distinctly implied that the defendant might have waived his privilege by acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the Court. No doubt the question of privilege now depends on the construction of s. 433, and I am alive to the danger of pressing too far an analogy between a rule of international law and a specific enactment of the Legislature. But is there anything in the section which suggests that the Legislature for the first time in 1877 intended that the privilege of a ruling chief, an ambassador, or an envoy, could not be waived however willing or even anxious he might be that a suit brought against him should be decided on the merits? In such a case it might happen that none of the conditions specified in cls. (a), (b) or (c) of the section existed, and that, therefore, the consent of the Governor General in Council could not legally be given. Such a suit as that in Mycibel v. The Sultan of Jokore, if brought in India, would be an instance. If in such a suit the privilege could not be waived, the result would be to fasten upon a ruling chief, ambassador, or envoy an absolute incapacity for being sued which neither he nor the Governor General in Council could get rid of, and thus to impose a far greater correlative disability on persons dealing with him than that imposed by the corresponding privilege in England. I do not believe that the Legislature intended s. 433 to have such results, or desired to be more anxious for a ruling chief's dignity and interests than the ruling chief himself. On the contrary, cls. (a), (b) and (c) imply that a ruling chief who becomes a suitor, or a trader, or a "land-holder in our territories" may "fairly be subjected to the incidents of the position he has chosen to assume." Why should not a ruling chief who goes still further, and assumes the position of voluntarily submitting to the jurisdiction in a suit brought against him, be fairly subjected to the incidents of that position? At one time, I felt some difficulty on account of the words in s. 433 "but not without such consent," which suggested an absolute prohibition. Upon consideration, however, I do not think that these words affect the question of waiver: their effect, apart from waiver, is to make the consent of the Governor General in Council necessary before any step can be taken in the suit.

The question, then, is whether the defendant before raising this objection took any step in the proceedings, from which it should be inferred that he "waived all objection to the competency of the suit, and engaged that the cause should be tried on the merits." To this question only one answer is possible. From the filing of his written statement on the 21st August, 1893, to his attorney's letter of the 21st May, 1894, he never made the remotest suggestion that he disputed the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground of want of consent or otherwise. His written statement was directed exclusively to the merits, to a denial of the claim, and an assertion of a set-off. He filed his affidavit of documents, obtained a Judge's order compelling the plaintiff to do the same, and took steps in execution of that order as to costs after his additional written statement objecting to the jurisdiction had been filed. He allowed the suit to be three times on the board for hearing, and it would have been actually heard and disposed of, but for consent orders for its postponement to enable him to complete inspection of the plaintiff's documents and to apply for a commission to examine witnesses. His application for the commission and the affidavits supporting it implied throughout that he was anxious that the suit should be tried on the merits, and in one of those affidavits he asserted his position as Sultan of Shihir and Mokalla, not for the purpose of defeating the suit for want of jurisdiction, but as a ground for his examination, as in previous suits, on commission and not in Court. As late as March, 1894, he took steps for adding the names of other persons to be included in the commission, and it was not till near the end of May, when, being pressed by the plaintiff's application for the revocation of the commission and for the examination of himself and his witnesses on the ground that the commission was a mere pretext for delay, that he at last objected to the Court's jurisdiction. At the time when that objection was first raised, the whole of the costs of the suit prior to the actual hearing had been incurred. For nearly a year, he acted in every possible way as a litigant anxious for a decision of the Court on the merits; if even a litigant engaged that a cause should be tried on the merits he has done so; and it would, in my opinion, be inequitable to the last degree to allow him to recede from that position and to avoid a trial of the issue raised by himself whether it is he or the plaintiff that has broken the contract between them. I am of opinion that he cannot do so.

Mr. Scott did not contend that, if the absence of consent under s. 433 could be waived, such acts as the defendant's would not amount to waiver. In some of the affidavits, however, and in the additional written statement, it is suggested that at the time when the original written statement was filed, the defendant and his advisers were ignorant of the existence of his privilege, and that they pleaded it as soon as they were aware that they could do so. All the facts, however, were necessarily within the defendant's knowledge, and what he seeks to rely on is mistake or ignorance of the law. It is clear from the last paragraph of the affidavit of Abdul Habib bin Abdulla made on the 23rd December, 1893, in support of the application for the commission, and from the fifth paragraph of the affidavit of Krishnaraao Vinayak made on the 20th September, 1894, that on the former date the defendant's attorneys as well as himself must have known that, besides being a resident of Hyderabad, he was the Sultan of Shihir and Mokalla entitled to a salute of twelve guns, and claiming the privilege of exemption from personal appearance in Court. I do not lay stress on the allegation in the sixth paragraph of the plaintiff's affidavit of the 17th September, 1894, that, during the argument on the summons for a commission, the defendant's counsel in reply to an observation from the Bench expressly stated that this client did not intend to raise at the hearing an objection to the jurisdiction founded on the plea of sovereignty. That allegation is made upon information and belief; in the affidavit in reply of Krishnaraao Vinayak it is denied that the defendant's counsel ever waived the question of jurisdiction; and the notes of the learned Judge make no reference to the subject. I observe, however, that Krishnaraao Vinayak, so far from meeting with a specific denial the-plaintiff's specific statement that on that occasion the defendant's counsel alleged that his client was a sovereign prince and the recipient of twelve guns of honour, says that "the counsel for the defendant was obliged to state the position in life held by the defendant as the ground for the defendant's exemption from personal appearance in Court." In the additional written statement, the defendant says that it was only in the latter part of April, 1894, that he became aware of the provisions of s. 433 of the Code. A similar plea was raised by the defendant in Moore v. Gaugier, where it was contended, in reference to the question of waiver, that "the objection was taken as soon as the defendant's [376] solicitor became aware of the want of jurisdiction." In dealing with that objection, Mr. Justice Cave said: "The defendant knew as a matter of fact that he lived out of the jurisdiction, and, therefore, he ought to have known as a matter of law that there was a want of jurisdiction unless leave had been obtained." So here the defendant knew as a matter of fact that he was the ruling chief of Shibir and Mokalla, and, therefore, he ought to have known as a matter of law that there was a want of jurisdiction unless the consent of the Governor General in Council had been obtained. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the defendant has waived the objection to the jurisdiction, that the preliminary issue as to the jurisdiction must be decided in favour of the plaintiff, and that the suit must be heard and determined on the merits.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Strachey.

HARILAL PRANLAL AND OTHERS (Original Defendants). Appellants v. BAI REWA (Original Plaintiff). Respondent. [10th December, 1895.]

Reversioner—Right accruing after the death of widow—Adoption—Invalid adoption by widow—Suit by reversioner after widow's death—Limitation—Limitation Act XV of 1877, sch. II, arts. 118, 141—Will—Construction—Request to wife—"Take possession of and enjoy"—Direction that she was to be owner just as testator was owner—Life-interest.

A claim by a reversioner to recover his share of the property of a Hindu who has died leaving a widow, accrues from the death of the widow, and, as to immovable property, art. 141 of Act XV of 1877 allows twelve years within which to bring a suit. An adoption to the deceased taking place in the meanwhile, does not curtail such period or impose upon the reversioner the necessity of filing a suit to have it declared invalid during the lifetime of the widow under pain of losing the inheritance upon the widow's death. Article 118 of Act XV of 1877 does not operate to give validity by lapse of time to an invalid adoption, if no suit is brought by the reversionary heirs within six years of its taking place to obtain a declaration that it is invalid.

[377] Where a Hindu by his will directed that after his death his wife was to take possession of and enjoy his property, and in another passage declared that "just as he was the owner so she was to be the owner," but there were no words of inheritance used, nor did he directly give his wife any power of disposition over the property.

Held, that she took only a life-interest in the property.

* Appeal No. 100 of 1894.
The Courts have always leaned against such a construction of the will of a Hindu testator as would give to the widow unqualified control over his property.

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur Lalshankar Umashankar, First Class Subordinate Judge of Ahmedabad. One Pranlal Narotam died on the 17th May, 1875, leaving a widow Ujam, and three daughters, viz., Rewa (the plaintiff), Bai Parvati (defendant No. 2), and Bai Kashi (defendant No. 3). Parvati was his daughter by his wife Ujam. Rewa and Kashi were his daughters by other wives who predeceased him.

By his will Pranlal directed that after his death his wife Ujam should take possession as owner. Then after making certain provision for his daughters Kasbi and Parvati he again directed his wife to take possession after his death, and added: "Just as I am the owner of the property at present, in the same way after my death my wife Ujam is the owner."

Ujam died on the 26th March, 1890, and on the 5th April, 1893, the plaintiff brought this suit to recover her share of her father Pranlal's property. She alleged that under Pranlal's will Ujam had enjoyed the property during her life and that on her death the property so far as it had not been specifically disposed of by Pranlal's will was divisible among his three daughters and heirs.

The defendants denied that Pranlal had made a will, and contended (inter alia) that the will alleged by the plaintiff was forged; that defendant No. 1, who was the only son of Parvati, had been adopted by Ujam on the 8th November, 1882; that the plaintiff had had full knowledge of the adoption; that any claim to set aside the adoption was barred by limitation; that according to the custom of the caste to which the parties belonged, an only son and a daughter's son could be adopted, and that Ujam got a certificate of administration independently of the will.

The Subordinate Judge held the alleged adoption to be invalid, and that the will was proved, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Gokaldas K. Parekh, appeared for the appellants (defendants).—The adoption of defendant No. 1 by Ujam may be invalid, but the plaintiff cannot now question it. She ought to have sued to set it aside within six years after 1882—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), art. 118. She knew of the adoption in that year. She is now barred by limitation, and the adoption stands.

Next we contend that under Pranlal's will, Ujam took the property absolutely. Her daughter Parvati, therefore, is the only person entitled to succeed to the property as her heir. The plaintiff has no claim.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi appeared for the respondent (plaintiff).—The plaintiff sues as reversionary heir of Pranlal entitled to his property on the death of his widow Ujam. She died in March, 1890, and our cause of action then arose, and from that date we have twelve years in which to sue. The alleged adoption of the first defendant has been found invalid. An invalid adoption does not affect the right of the reversionary heir. Such an adoption cannot become valid against her by lapse of time. As to the will, it did not give Ujam the property absolutely under it; she takes only a widow's estate for life.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C.J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, First Class, at Ahmedabad. The property in suit belonged to one Pranal Narotam. He died at Nadiad on the 17th May, 1875, leaving a widow Ujam and three daughters, the plaintiff Rewa, and the defendants Kashi and Parvati. The last-named defendant was the daughter of Pranal by his wife Ujam. Rewa and Kashi were his daughters by other wives who predeceased him.

It is the case of the defendants (other than Kashi) that Ujam adopted Parvati's only son, the defendant Harilal, on the 8th November, 1882. The Subordinate Judge, without recording any finding as to the factum of the alleged adoption, has decided against its legal validity. The correctness of his decision on that point has not been questioned before us. Ujam died on the 20th March, 1890, and since then, if not before, the defendants Harilal and Parvati have been in possession of the property.

[379] The plaintiff Rewa filed the present suit to recover her share of her father's estate on the 5th April, 1893. Her case is that her father Pranal left a will (Ex. 54), and that Ujam in accordance with its terms enjoyed the property of Pranal during her lifetime, and that now, in so far as that property is not specifically disposed of by the will, it is divisible amongst the three daughters and heirs of Pranal. The Subordinate Judge has found in favour of the will. The parties have not objected here to that finding.

The only points urged before us are:—(1) That the suit is barred by limitation. (2) That on the true construction of the will, Pranal's widow Ujam took an absolute interest in the residue of his property, which on her death devolved upon her heir, her daughter Parvati, to the exclusion of the other daughters of Pranal.

As to limitation, we consider that the suit is not time-barred. The plaintiff's claim to recover her share of the residue of her father's property accrued on the death of Ujam, and as to the immovable property, which alone has been decreed to her, she had, under art. 141 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) twelve years within which to sue for her share in it. The alleged adoption, if it in fact took place, did not, we think, curtail that period, or impose upon the plaintiff the necessity of filing a suit to have it declared invalid during the lifetime of Ujam under pain of losing her inheritance upon Ujam's death. Whatever may have been the law under the earlier Act (IX of 1871), art. 118 of the present enactment (Act XV of 1877) does not, we think, operate to give validity by lapse of time to an invalid adoption, if no suit is brought by the reversionary heirs within six years of its taking place to obtain a declaration that it is invalid. Upon this point there has been a consensus of opinion in most of the High Courts, and it must now, we think, be taken to be concluded by authority. We refer to the cases cited below(1). Were, however, the question still open, we do not think [380] that in this case the knowledge of the defendant Harilal's alleged adoption by Ujam has been satisfactorily brought home to the plaintiff, nor does Harilal appear to have had any such exclusive possession of the property during the lifetime of Ujam as would have thrown upon the plaintiff the necessity of taking action under art. 118 in order to protect her reversionary rights. We proceed to consider the construction of the will.

When Ujam applied for a certificate of administration to the estate of Pranbai she ignored the will; but the District Court on the application of the plaintiff and the defendant Kashi held it proved and granted a certificate to Ujam under it. In the present suit the defendants other than Kashi contended its execution in the lower Court and did not there contend that it gave power to Ujam to dispose of the residue after her death, or that its terms conferred upon her an absolute interest. That construction of the will has been for the first time contended for before us in appeal.

The scheme of the will is this:—The testator states his object in making it to be that his property may not be misappropriated and that his funeral and obsequial ceremonies may be performed and that some portion of his property may be spent in charity. He then gives a description of his possessions of which he declares himself to be the owner as long as he lives, and directs that after his death his wife Ujam is to take possession as owner. After this he makes provision for the maintenance of his widowed daughter Kashi and directs Ujam to give a house and some mrdas to Parvati and Rewa upon (as we read it) his death. He then again directs that his wife is to take his property into her possession after his death and adds: "Just as I am the owner of the property at present, in the same way after my death my wife Ujam is the owner." Then he directs certain ceremonial and charitable outlays to be made by her; appoints trustees to see that they are carried out, and finally directs that his wife is to enjoy the remaining property.

His main objects appear to be the protection of his property and the maintenance of his wife and children. His wife is to take possession of and enjoy the property, but he adds to this no words of inheritance, nor does he directly give her any power of disposition over it. The Courts have always leaned against such a construction of the will of a Hindu testator as would give to his widow unqualified control over his property. By the use of such expression as "my wife is the owner after me" or "my wife is the heir" it is usually understood that the testator is providing for the succession during the lifetime of the widow and not altering the line of inheritance after her death. In the present case the testator is no doubt very emphatic in his declarations that his wife is to be the owner after his death, in one passage stating that just as he is the owner so she is to be the owner. The phrase is, however, ambiguous. It may mean that he intended emphatically to protect her peaceable possession and management during her lifetime against the claims of the husbands of his daughters and their own; or it may be intended to confer as full ownership and power over the property as he had. The latter construction did not, however, occur to the parties or to the Court below. It is suggested here for the first time in appeal. If it were the clear and only construction of the will we should have been forced to give effect to it even now, but it is not. We entertained during the argument and still entertain doubts as to what the testator really intended, but the appellant's pleader has failed to convince us that the construction put upon the will by the lower Court is erroneous. We confirm, therefore, its decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.
APPENDIX CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Parsons and Mr. Justice Candy.

GANPATI (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. GANGARAM AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [11th November, 1895.]

A sale of a holding for default of payment of assessment is not invalid although prior to the sale there has been no declaration of forfeiture by the Collector. The declaration is not so essentially a necessary preliminary of a sale that without it the sale is illegal and invalid. The fact that a sale has taken place is prima facie evidence that forfeiture had been declared.

[382] SECOND appeal from the decision of A. Steward, District Judge of Ahmednagar, confirming the decree of Rao Saheb G. N. Kolarkar, Subordinate Judge of Sangamner.

On the 21st February, 1880, certain land of which one Mukta Vithu was the registered occupant was sold for arrears of assessment due to Government. Mukta was then in possession of part of the land; the rest was in the possession of other persons who were apparently not the registered occupants. At the sale one Yeshvant became the purchaser and he afterwards re-sold one-third of it to Mukta and assigned the remaining two-thirds to the plaintiff.

In 1892 the plaintiff sued the defendants to recover possession of the two-thirds share assigned to him, alleging that they were in possession, but he did not know under what title.

The defendants answered (inter alia) that their land was never sold to their knowledge; that they had never been out of possession, and that they had no knowledge of the assignment by Yeshvant to plaintiff. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit.

On appeal by plaintiff the Judge raised only one issue, viz., as to the validity and binding effect of the revenue sale. He held that the sale was invalid and not binding on the defendants and he confirmed the decree. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"This sale took place in 1880, and Government Resolution No. 4000, dated 31st July, 1879, the last day of the revenue year, directs that failure in payment of land revenue makes the occupancy liable to forfeiture. The Collector is empowered to declare the occupancy forfeited at any time after the arrear is due. Forfeiture takes place when the Collector declares it. He can declare it at the end of the period named in the notice. There is nothing to show that in this case the holding was forfeited before it was sold for default in payment of assessment; there was no declaration of forfeiture by the Collector. I agree with the Subordinate Judge in holding that the sale is not valid or binding on respondents. Assuming, however, that the sale was valid and binding, it rather appears to me, as it does also to the Subordinate Judge, that there was some collusion between Mukta and Yeshwant Sonwani, the purchaser at the revenue sale. I think that Yeshvant Sonwani was merely the nominal purchaser, and this would appear to be the case from the fact that the status quo ante remained, and that no attempt was made for eleven years to oust those who had occupied the land.

* Second Appeal No. 780 of 1894.
before the revenue sale. Yeshvant Sonwani afterwards disposed of his right such as it was under the revenue sale to the present plaintiff. What his object in doing this does not appear, more especially as he admits [383] having re-sold to the khatedar Mukta his share of the land in dispute, though it was included in the revenue sale. This lends belief to the theory that at the revenue sale the purchase by Yeshvant Sonwani was collusive, at any rate as regards Mukta. The plaintiff brought this suit in the twelfth year to recover possession, if possible, of his two-thirds share in the land which was conveyed to him by Yeshvant Sonwani. He could not gain more by his assignment than Yeshvant had gained in his purchase at the revenue sale and that was nothing, as the sale was invalid. This fact also renders the suit time-barred, for the adverse occupation of defendants extended back for some time before the revenue sale and for eleven years afterwards; the defendants have clearly been in possession of the land in their own right for more than twelve years. As I agree with the Subordinate Judge in considering the sale invalid, because prior to it there was no declaration of forfeiture by the Collector, I confirm the decree."

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Ghanesham N. Naikarni, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The Judge did not raise proper issues. There is no dispute as to the sale having taken place for arrears of assessment. The first question that ought to have been determined is whether the entire holding was sold, or whether only a share therein was sold. We contend that as the sale was effected against Mukta, the registered occupant of the holding, the entire holding was sold free of incumbrances. Even if there be nothing on the record to show that there was declaration of forfeiture prior to sale, still as the sale did actually take place, forfeiture must be presumed. But we submit that there is no provision of the Land Revenue Code which makes it incumbent upon the Collector to declare a forfeiture in the case of every sale. The Code provides for forfeiture, but does not lay down that a sale without forfeiture shall be invalid. Whether there was a forfeiture or no, the property having been sold for crown-debt, the purchaser acquired title to it.

Gangaram B. Rele, for the respondents (defendants).—Under the provisions of the Land Revenue Code forfeiture prior to revenue sale is necessary. The provision as to forfeiture in the Code would be nugatory if sales without prior forfeiture were upheld. We rely on Govind v.
Bhiwa (1). The Judge has found that the sale was collusive.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The Judge of the lower Court evidently is of opinion that a sale duly confirmed by a Collector of a holding [384] for default of payment of assessment is invalid if prior to the sale there was no declaration of forfeiture by the Collector. I can find no authority for such a proposition. The cases cited, Venkatesh v. Mhat Pai (2) and Dasharatha v.
Nynhalchand (3), do not decide this. Section 56 of the Land Revenue Code enacts that a failure to pay arrears of land revenue makes the holding liable to forfeiture, whereupon, that is to say in which case, the Collector may sell the holding. Section 153 enacts that the Collector may declare the holding to be forfeited to Government and sell or otherwise dispose of the same. A declaration of forfeiture may be necessary for some purposes, e.g., it was admitted, I will not say whether rightly or wrongly, to be necessary to extinguish existing incumbrances in Govind v. Bhiwa. (1) but I cannot hold that it is so essentially a necessary preliminary of a sale that a sale without it would be altogether illegal and invalid.

258
Again, the only reason why the lower Court has held that there was no declaration of forfeiture is because there is no written declaration of such filed among the sale proceedings. This is quite insufficient to justify a finding in the negative on a point that was not taken by the defendants and on which there was no issue. It is nowhere said in the Act that the declaration must be in writing, and I think that evidence ought to have been taken by the Court before the point was decided in the negative.
The fact that a sale has taken place is to my mind strong prima facie evidence that forfeiture had been declared. The Division Bench in Govind v. Bhiwa (1) apparently was of a contrary opinion. The point is not one of any importance, since by proper enquiry it can be definitely determined in each case whether a forfeiture has been declared or not.
In the present case such a determination is unnecessary. Had it been necessary I should have ordered further enquiry.

The decision, then, of the District Judge as to the invalidity of the sale being wrong, his decree must be reversed and the appeal remanded for disposal on the merits. I do not wish in any way to prejudge those merits; but the remarks that he has made [385] oblige me to say that the chief point for determination is whether the whole occupancy holding or only Mukta’s rights in it were sold, and this has to be found from the sale proceedings. Unless the sale was brought about fraudulently by the collusion of Mukta and Yeshvant, collusion between them at the sale or afterwards would hardly affect the position of the plaintiff, who is apparently a bona fide purchaser for value from Yeshvant. Then as to limitation, it seems to me that the plaintiff clearly has twelve years from the date of the sale within which to bring his suit, and that the possession of the defendants prior to the sale cannot possibly be added to their possession after the sale.

We reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and remand the appeal for disposal on the merits with reference to the above remarks.
Costs to be costs in the cause.

CANDY, J.—Mukta was the registered occupant of a certain survey number. He was in possession of part of the land, the rest being in possession of other persons, but these other persons were apparently not registered occupants or recognised in the village records. The occupancy was sold by the revenue authorities on 21st February, 1860, for arrears of assessment due for 1878-79. The sale certificate (3) and Ex. 34 show that the Manlatdar reported that owing to disputes among the sharers the assessment had not been paid. One Yeshvant purchased the occupancy, and the sale was confirmed by the Assistant Collector. Yeshvant did not attempt to take possession of his purchase, but conveyed to Mukta for consideration the one-third share of the field which Mukta was cultivating.
Yeshvant assigned his rights in the remaining two-thirds to plaintiff, who filed this suit in January, 1892, to recover possession of the two-thirds.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit for several reasons.
Plaintiff appealed to the District Judge, who framed one issue only, viz., whether the revenue sale in 1880 was valid and binding. He found that it was invalid and not binding. He also made some remarks on other points in the case, assuming that the sale was valid and binding. But he gave no finding on those points.

(1) P.J. (1895), p. 70 (72).
Plaintiff has made a second appeal to this Court; and the only point argued before us was whether the District Judge was wrong in holding that the revenue sale in 1880 was invalid and not binding because there was nothing to show that the holding was forfeited before it was sold for default in payment of assessment. He found, in short, that Yeshvant bought "nothing, as the sale was invalid." In my opinion the District Judge was wrong.

Under ss. 150, 153 of the Land Revenue Code the Collector may recover an arrear of land revenue by forfeiture of the occupancy in respect of which the arrear is due, and selling the same under the provisions of ss. 56, 57. Here the revenue records show that the "occupancy" of Mukta was sold for default of payment of assessment due on that occupancy. It could not be sold without forfeiture, because it was the occupancy in respect of which the arrear was due. Under s. 155, Mukta's occupancy of any other land could have been sold without forfeiture. But when the occupancy of the defaulting occupant in the land in respect of which the arrear was due was sold, then ex hypothesi the occupancy was forfeited. There is no provision in the Land Revenue Code that in the case of such a sale of an occupancy there must be a formal written declaration of forfeiture, and there is no form for such in the Act or in the Rules under the Act. It is not analogous to attachment under the Civil Procedure Code, which is necessary to render a sale valid. By s. 56 failure in payment of arrears of land revenue makes the occupancy liable to forfeiture, whereas upon the Collector may levy all sums in arrear by sale of the occupancy. In the present case the District Judge does not deny the liability to forfeiture of the occupancy, whereupon the sale of the occupancy has taken place. But because there is not on the record a declaration of forfeiture by the Collector, the sale is held not valid.

I cannot agree with that view. Mr. Rela referred us to the decision of this Court in Govinda v. Bhiwa (1). No doubt in that case the purchaser of an occupancy which was sold for arrears of assessment and given into the possession of the purchaser was ejected by the Court at the suit of an incumbrancer of the [387] previous occupant, on the ground that in the absence of evidence of an actual forfeiture the Court was bound to hold such forfeiture unproved. But it is to be noted that the Judges in that case did not express any opinion as to the presumption to be drawn from a sale taking place subsequent to the liability to forfeiture. They said that the existence of forfeiture "could not properly be assumed as a fact from the mere legal consequence of failure to pay arrears of assessment." But they did not say that forfeiture could not be presumed to have taken place when the Collector proceeded to sell the occupancy, his right to do so being founded on the liability of the occupancy to forfeiture and sale. Of course if in any case there is direct evidence that the Collector omitted or refused to declare a forfeiture, and yet proceeded to sell, the validity of the sale and of the consequences, which would follow from a valid sale, may well be questioned. But I have confined myself to the present case, and for the reasons given am of opinion that we cannot hold the sale invalid simply because there is no written declaration of forfeiture. I have not touched upon the several important questions raised by the Subordinate Judge. These no doubt will be duly considered by the District Judge when he rehears the appeal.

Decree reversed and case remanded.

(1) P. J. (1895), p. 70.
APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) against the decision of Khan Babadur M. N Nanavati, Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Poona.

The plaintiffs sued in the Small Causes Court of Poona to recover rupees four hundred from the defendants under an agreement dated the 18th June, 1882, which was passed by the defendants' father to the plaintiffs and their brother. The following is the translation of the agreement:

"To RAJESHRI HARI, NAHAYAN, VISHNU GANESH JOSHI; From SHIRMANT SAMBHAJIRAO YESHAJANTRAO PAVAR, of Malthan, &c., &c.,

"Your father the late Ganpatrao Kaka Joshi was of great use in various ways to me during my infancy, and also after I attained majority in my private concerns and business, and also as a pleader and in other things. He also assisted my mother during my minority in business and in the shape of money, and was of use to her. For these reasons when Ganpatrao Kaka was alive, it had been agreed to give a perpetual allowance (nemnek) towards the expenses of the idol in the temple of Shri Vishnu Panahayatan built by him. But owing to the death of your father and my having gone to Dhar, it (the agreement) was not carried out. I have now come here from Dhar and having thought of carrying out to completion my former intention, the allowance (nemnuk) as specified below is given:

"Rs. 100-0-0 To be given to you from year to year in perpetuity from generation to generation in the shape of a charitable endowment for the expenses of the idol in the temple of Shri Vishnu Panchayatan built by your father Ganpatrao Kaka Joshi at Poona, peth Sadashiv, Kalavavar.

[389] "Rs. 50-0-0 To be given every year to your mother Ganga Bhagirathi Sarasvatibai during her lifetime for her expenses in the shape of a pension.

"Thus in all Rs. 150 during your mother's lifetime and Rs. 100 thereafter every year from the current year * * * and thereafter from year to year will be paid to you at Poona in perpetuity from generation to generation. You should have vakhat as aforesaid. There will be no obstruction in the way of paying the same to you, either from me or my heirs in any way."

The defendants pleaded that this agreement being unregistered was inadmissible in evidence; that it was without consideration and was passed under mistake and misrepresentation. They contended that they were not bound by it, alleging that the deceased left no property of his own. They also contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

The Judge dismissed the suit. He held that he had no jurisdiction, the claim being for an hereditary allowance, which was immovable property. He was also of opinion that the agreement sued on being unregistered was not admissible in evidence and was not binding on the defendants.

The plaintiffs applied under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court, and obtained a rule nisi calling on the defendants to show cause why the decision should not be set aside.

Mihadeo B. Chauhul appeared for the applicants (plaintiffs) in support of the rule.—The Judge was wrong in holding that the allowance is immovable property. It is not charged on any immovable property, nor is it to come out of the income of any such property. Under the agreement the donor has merely created a personal liability which bound him during his lifetime and his assets in the hands of his heirs after his death. Section 3 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) defines immovable property, and the definition clearly shows that a hereditary allowance is a benefit arising out of land. The definition of immovable property given in cl. (16), s. 3, of the General Clauses Act is also similar. The allowance, then, not being immovable property, the Judge was wrong in holding that he had no jurisdiction to try the suit; and that the agreement required registration under s. 17 of the Registration Act. We submit that the agreement is admissible, and the Judge should decide the case on the [390] merits. The defendants will be liable only if they have got assets of their father in their hands.

Gangaram B. Rele appeared for the opponents (defendants) to show cause.—Under art. 13, sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) the Judge had no jurisdiction to try the suit. Assuming that the allowance in dispute is moveable property, still as it is hereditary and given for the benefit of a temple, it is taken out of the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court by the above article. But we contend that the allowance is immovable property according to the definition given in the Registration Act. The expression hereditary allowances in the definition is to be taken by itself, and not read with the words "any other benefit to arise out of land." All hereditary allowances do not arise out of land. Some are charged on land and some are personal. The allowance being immovable property, the agreement regarding it required registration, and the Judge was right in holding that under art. (13), sch. II of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, he had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an application under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act to set aside the decree of the Poona Small Cause Court Judge dismissing the suit. The plaintiffs' claim was to recover Rs. 400 for arrears alleged to be payable to the plaintiffs under an agreement by the defendants' father to pay Rs. 150 per annum to the plaintiffs' father, of which Rs. 50 were for the maintenance of the plaintiffs' mother and the residue was to be applied towards defraying the expenses of a temple. The terms of the agreement appear to show that it was intended that the payment for the expenses of the temple should be continued in perpetuity. Such a suit is not, in our opinion, a suit for the possession of immovable property or for the recovery of an interest in such property within the meaning of art. (4) of sch. II to the Act, nor does it come within the purview of art. (13). It is clearly not a suit for immovable property or an interest in it as defined in the Bombay General Clauses Act (III of 1886) or within the ordinary meaning of the term, nor is the annual payment which the plaintiffs seek to enforce, an allowance called malikana or a fee called hakk. It is simply an [391] annual sum which the father of the defendants bound himself by agreement to pay. It does not, in our opinion, alter its character that the defendants' father purported to promise to pay or have it paid in perpetuity. The Small Cause Court had, therefore, jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

The document further we consider is not an instrument purporting or operating to create or declare an interest in immovable property within the meaning of s. 17 of the Registration Act. It cannot, we think, be said to create a "hereditary allowance" in the sense in which that expression is used in s. 3 of the Act. It is not an allowance by Government or secured in such a way as can constitute it an hereditary allowance. If enforceable at all after the death of the contractor, it can only be enforced against his general estate in the hands of his legal representative, so long as that estate remains undistributed. It is a mere personal obligation which the contractor has undertaken, not secured in any way whatever.

The suit lastly will not (as held by the Judge of the Small Cause Court) lie against the heirs of the grantor directly. The plaintiffs' claim is only, as we said, enforceable, if enforceable at all, against the general estate of the deceased under s. 252 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

We set aside the order dismissing the suit upon the above preliminary grounds, and direct that it be heard upon the merits. Costs to be costs in the case.

Order set aside.
LALA (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. NARAYAN AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [12th December, 1895.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 328 and 331—Execution of decree—Obstruction to the delivery of possession—Complaint made more than a month from the time of the obstruction—Claim numbered and registered as a suit—Objection with respect to limitation in appeal.

Although no appeal lies against an order passed under s. 331 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882; numbering and registering as a suit a complaint made at a time beyond a month from the time of the obstruction in an application under s. 328, such order can be objected to when the final order which is appealable as having the force of a decree under s. 331 is appealed against. The Judge in appeal is bound to entertain the objection that is then made, and to dismiss the application when he finds that it has been wrongly admitted.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur N. G. Phadaks, First Class Subordinate Judge of Sholapur with appellate powers, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb G. B. Laggate, Subordinate Judge of Karmala.

The plaintiff obtained a decree against one Ravji for possession of certain land, and in execution he was obstructed by the defendants on the 3rd April, 1891. The Court executing the decree was closed on account of the summer vacation from the 14th April to the 1st June, 1891. On the 12th June, 1891, the plaintiff applied for the removal of the defendants' obstruction, and his application was numbered and registered as a suit under s. 331 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The Subordinate Judge allowed the claim and directed removal of the defendants' obstruction.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge reversed the decree and dismissed the suit, on the ground that the application for the removal of the obstruction not having been made within thirty days from the date of the obstruction, it was time-barred under art. 167, sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Mahadeo B. Chauabal, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The Judge was wrong in going behind the order of the first Court which [392] numbered and registered our application for the removal of the defendants' obstruction as a suit—Namdev v. Ramchandra (1). Assuming that the application was barred on the date on which it was made, the Judge should not have raised the point of limitation of thirty days, as it was not raised by the defendants.

Purushottam P. Khare, for the respondents (defendants).—Under art. 167 of the Limitation Act the plaintiff was bound to make the application for the removal of our obstruction within thirty days from the date of the obstruction. In our appeal we had raised the point, and an issue in connection with it was raised in the appeal. The Judge was, therefore, right in deciding that the plaintiff's application was time-barred.

* Second Appeal No. 746 of 1894.

(1) 18 B. 37.
JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The appellant complained to the Court under s. 328 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) at a time beyond a month from the time of the obstruction; nevertheless the Subordinate Judge numbered I and registered the claim as a suit under s. 331, and passed an order in favour of the appellant. It does not appear that the respondent took the objection in that Court that the application had been presented beyond time. He did so, however, when he appealed from the order, and the Judge of the appellate Court finding that the application had been presented after the time allowed by law passed an order rejecting it. We are of opinion that the Judge was right. Although no appeal lay against the order admitting the application, that order could be objected to when the final order, which was appealable from as having the force of a decree under s. 331, was appealed against (s. 591). The Judge was bound to entertain the objection that was then made, and he was equally bound to dismiss the application when he found that it had been wrongly admitted. This is not a case in which an appellate Court takes an objection of limitation of its own motion to which the cases cited by Mr. Starling at p. 12 of his work on Limitation would apply. In the case of Namdev v. Ramchandra (1) the application was made within time. We confirm the decree, dismissing the application with costs.

Decree confirmed.

GOPALRAO KRISHNA RAJOPADHRI (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. MAHADEVRAO BALLAL MULJ (Original Defendant), Respondent.* [13th December, 1895.]

Landlord and tenant—Inamdar—Permanent tenant—Notice to pay enhanced rent or quit the land—Denial of landlord’s right to enhance rent—Suit to recover enhanced rent—Limitation—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 23.

An inamdar gave to his permanent tenant notice to pay enhanced rent or quit the land on a certain date. The tenant denied the liability to pay enhanced rent and, stating that he held the land on payment of Government assessment only, refused to quit. The inamdar more than twelve years after the date mentioned in the notice sued the tenant to recover enhanced rent.

Held, that the plaintiff’s (inamdar’s) right to enhance the rent and to recover the land in default of payment of such rent was barred by limitation, the tenant so far as the right was concerned having been holding adversely to him for more than twelve years.

Held, also, that s. 23 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) had no application to the case.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur Chintaman N. Bhat, First Class Subordinate Judge of Satara with appellate powers, reversing the decree of Rao Sahib V. P. Deshapande, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Tasgaon.

* Second Appeal No. 119 of 1895.

(1) 18 B. 37.
The plaintiff, an inamdar of the village of Vasambe, served the defendant, who was a permanent tenant of certain land in the village, with a notice dated the 6th September, 1879, to pay enhanced rent at the rate of one hundred and twenty-five rupees per annum or to quit the land on or before the 10th April, 1880.

The defendant in reply, by a notice served on the plaintiff on the 6th October, 1879, denied the plaintiff’s right to enhance the rent.

The plaintiff subsequently continued to receive from the defendant the rent previously paid.

On the 6th July, 1892, he brought this suit to recover Rs. 294-13-9 on account of the balance of the enhanced rent for three years preceding the suit.

The defendant denied the plaintiff’s right to claim enhanced rent and contended (inter alia) that the claim for enhanced rent was now barred, as he had denied the plaintiff’s right to enhance more than twelve years before suit.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff was entitled to enhance the rent, that rupees seventy-five per annum was the proper amount chargeable for rent, and that the claim was not time-barred. He awarded to the plaintiff Rs. 144-13-9 as the balance of the enhanced rent.

On appeal by the defendant the Judge reversed the decree and dismissed the claim, holding that it was time-barred.

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Balaji A. Bhagawat, for the appellant (plaintiff):—The suit being for the recovery of rent, it is governed by art. 110, sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). The right to recover rent is a recurring right under s. 23 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) and, therefore, it cannot be barred by the defendant’s refusal in 1877 to pay enhanced rent. The right recurs every year, and we are entitled to recover three years’ enhanced rent.—Vithalbowa v. Narayan (1).

Mahadeo R. Bodas, for the respondent (defendant):—Article 144, sch. II of the Limitation Act is applicable to the case, and not art. 110. The right to enhance rent is an interest in immovable property and is liable to be barred after twelve years. The notice was served by us on the plaintiff on the 6th October, 1879, by which we denied the plaintiff’s right to claim enhanced rent. The present suit was not brought until July, 1892, that is, more than twelve years after we denied the plaintiff’s right. The claim is, therefore, time-barred. The right to demand rent at the usual rate may be a recurring right, but the claim to demand enhanced rent is not a recurring right.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—This is a suit by an inamdar to recover rent at an enhanced rate from the defendant, who is a permanent tenant. The lower Court has held the suit time-barred. It appears that the plaintiff in September, 1879, gave the defendant a notice that he was to pay enhanced rent or quit the land on or before the 10th April, 1880. The defendant replied that he was not liable to pay enhanced rent, that he held the land on payment of the Government assessment only, and that he could not be ejected, and he refused to quit. He did not quit on the 10th April, 1880, and he has continued to hold on ever since, paying the assessment only.

(1) 18 B. 507.
The plaintiff’s present suit was brought on the 6th July, 1892, that is, more than twelve years from the 10th April, 1880. The defendant, therefore, so far as the right of the plaintiff to enhance the rent and to evict the defendant in default of payment is concerned, has been holding adversely to the plaintiff for more than twelve years, and the plaintiff’s right to enhance the rent and to recover the land in default of payment of such rent has become lost by operation of the law of limitation. Section 29 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) has no application to the present case. We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

BABAJI (Original Plaintiff), Applicant v. MAGNIRAM AND OTHERS
(Original Defendants), Opponents.* [17th December, 1895.]

Mortgage—Redemption—Mortgage—Mortgagor taking other land in exchange for mortgaged land—Land so taken in exchange is subject to the mortgagor’s right to redeem—Forest Act (VII of 1879), s. 10, cl. (d)—Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), s. 56.†

[397] In 1876, one Babaji mortgaged certain land (Survey Nos. 51 and 52, to Sangapara, who died, and his brother Gautapa succeeded him. The Forest Department being desirous of acquiring the mortgaged land entered into negotiations with Gautapa, who admitted that he was only a mortgagee, Babaji (the mortgagor) had left the village and could not be found. Under these circumstances it was arranged that Gautapa should allow the assessment to fall into arrear, upon which Government would forfeit the holding and that Gautapa should receive other land (Survey No. 105) in exchange. This arrangement was actually carried out; Gautapa received Survey No. 105 in exchange for the mortgaged land. In the order giving the land in exchange, Gautapa was styled mortgagee. The heir of Babaji (the mortgagor) subsequently brought this suit to redeem Survey No. 105 from the mortgagee of 1876. The defendant contended that this land was not subject to the mortgage and that by the exchange Gautapa had acquired the full ownership in it.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem Survey No. 105. The mortgagee, Gautapa, had lost the mortgagor’s equity of redemption in the mortgaged land by fraud, and the land (Survey No. 105) which he obtained in exchange was, therefore, subject to the mortgage. He held the equity of redemption in this land as trustee for the mortgagor.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 623 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1883) against the decision of C. H. Jopp. Special Judge under the Dekkhan Agriculturists’ Relief

* Application No. 166 of 1895.
† Section 66 of the Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879):—

56. Arrears of land revenue due on account of land by any landholder shall be a paramount charge on the holding and every part thereof, failure in payment of which shall make the occupancy or alienated holding, together with all rights of the occupant or holder over all trees, crops, buildings and things attached to the land, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the land, liable to forfeiture, whereupon the Collector may levy all sums in arrear by sale of the occupancy or alienated holding, freed from all tenures, incumbrances and rights created by the occupant or holder or any of his predecessors in title, or in any wise subsisting as against such occupant, or holder, or may otherwise dispose of such occupancy or alienated holding under rules or orders made in this behalf under s. 314.
[398] The defendants (mortgagors) contended (inter alia) that Survey No. 105 was not subject to the mortgage, and that Gautapa had become absolute owner of the land obtained by him in exchange for the mortgaged land.

The Subordinate Judge allowed the claim. The defendant under s. 54 of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act applied for revision to the Special Judge, who reversed the decree and rejected the claim. The Special Judge framed six issues for decision, the fourth of which was as follows:

"4. If Survey Nos. 51 and 52 were mortgaged by Babaji to Sangapa, can plaintiff sue to redeem No. 105?"

On this issue the finding was—
"4. Even if Survey Nos. 51 and 52 were mortgaged by Babaji to Sangapa, plaintiff cannot sue to redeem No. 105."

The plaintiff applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi requiring defendant No. 4 to show cause why the decision of the Special Judge should not be set aside.

Purushottam P. Khare appeared for the applicant (plaintiff) in support of the rule:—Gautapa, the mortgagee, could not defeat the rights of the mortgagee by any arrangement made with the Forest Department—Balkrishna v. Madhuvrav(1). The mortgagee must make over to the heirs of the mortgagee the property he acquired by way of compensation for the loss of mortgaged property.

Ganesh S. Daudavate appeared for the opponent (defendant) to show cause:—The mortgaged lands were forfeited to Government and Government now stands in the place of the mortgagee. The plaintiff should sue Government for redemption. He has no claim against Survey No. 105.

JUDGMENT.

Parsons, J.—The finding of the Special Judge on his fourth issue would be right if Gautapa transferred to Government his rights as mortgagee only in Survey Nos. 51 and 52 and if Government were now in the position of mortgagee. The Judge has not found this. The history of the case shows the contrary.

[399] The Survey Nos. 51 and 52 had been mortgaged by Babaji to Gautapa's deceased brother. The Forest Department wanted to acquire these lands and entered into negotiations with Gautapa. Gautapa admitted he was only the mortgagee. The mortgagor had left the village and could not be found. Under these circumstances, it was arranged between Gautapa and the Forest Department that Gautapa should allow the assessment to fall into arrears, upon which of course Government would forfeit the holding, and that then Gautapa should receive Survey No. 105 in exchange. Such compensation could be given under s. 10, cl. (d), of the Forest Act, 1878. This arrangement was actually carried out. Gautapa did not pay the assessment. Under s. 56 of the Land Revenue Code, Survey Nos. 51 and 52 were entered as Government waste land, and Survey No. 105 was given to Gautapa. It is to be noted that in the order giving him the land he is styled the mortgagee Gautapa. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to hold otherwise than that Gautapa received Survey No. 105 as compensation for his own rights as mortgagee of Survey Nos. 51 and 52 and for the rights of the mortgagor, their occupant. By non-payment of the assessment, the whole holding became liable to forfeiture, and the forfeiture that ensued extinguished the rights of the mortgagor who could no longer maintain his equity of redemption against Government in whom the land became vested. Had the holding been sold, the purchaser would have taken an absolute title. If, however, Gautapa had been the purchaser, as the forfeiture was the result of his own fraud and default, he could not have claimed to hold as other than trustee for the mortgagor. See Balkrishna v. Madhavrai (1). The fact that there was no sale but that the Government took the land itself and gave Gautapa Survey No. 105 in lieu thereof does not, in our opinion, alter the position of Gautapa. He is a trustee for the mortgagor of the latter’s equity of redemption which he had caused to be lost out of his hands by his own fraud. He obtained Survey No. 105 as the compensation or price of Survey Nos. 51 and 52, and as the rights of the parties in the latter numbers are transferred to the former he obtained the former to hold just as he held the latter, viz., as mortgagee for the occupant Babaji and his heirs. See Viraragava v. Krishnasami (2). The Special Judge, therefore, acted illegally in reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge on his finding on his 4th issue, and we must reverse his order and remand the case to him in order that he may dispose of the other points at issue before him. The opponent must pay the costs of this rule.

Order reversed.

APPENDIX CIVIL.

Before Chief Justice Farran and Mr. Justice Parsons.

NAVAZHAI (Original Defendant No. 1), Applicant v. PEstonji RATANJI (Original Plaintiff), Opponent. [19th December, 1895.]

Executor—Executor de son tort—What constitutes an executor de son tort—Liability of such executor to creditors of deceased—Intermeddling with estate after order for probate made but before issue of probate—Receipt of assets with consent of person appointed executor—Indian Succession Act X of 1865, s. 255—Act XXL of 1858.

Probate is necessary to complete the title of a rightful executor, and until it is actually taken out, a person intermeddling with the assets constitutes himself executor de son tort.

The executrix appointed by the will of one Jamsetji Jehangirji applied to the High Court for probate of the will, and Navazbai, the widow of Jamsetji, entered a caveat. By a consent decree, dated 25th February, 1892, it was ordered that probate should issue to Ratanbai, and by the same decree it was declared that Ratanbai as executrix was not entitled to a sum of Rs. 4,179-10 or any other sum or sums of money to be received from the B.B. and C.I. Railway Company. In that same year Navazbai obtained payment from the Railway Company of the said sum of Rs. 4,179-10 and of another sum of Rs. 166 due to the deceased. On the 3rd February, 1893, probate was issued to Ratanbai. In 1894 the plaintiff sued Navazbai and Ratanbai for Rs. 166 due to him by the deceased Jamsetji. He claimed against Navazbai as executrix de son tort.

 Held that probate not having actually issued to Ratanbai at the time that Navazbai received the money from the Railway Company although an order for probate had been made, she had by receiving it constituted herself executrix de son tort and was, therefore, liable to the plaintiff, and could be joined as co-defendant with Ratanbai in the suit.

[401] Held, also, that the fact that by the terms of the consent decree of the 25th February, 1892, she was allowed to receive the money and retain it, was no defence. The consent decree did not bind the creditors or free her from her responsibility to them to the extent of the assets which she received.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, IX of 1887) against the decision of Khan Bahadur B. E. Modi, Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Surat.

One Jamsetji Jehangirji Dalal died in Bombay on the 14th October, 1891, leaving a will dated 25th August, 1887, whereby he appointed one Ratanbai Sorabji Umrigar as his executrix and bequeathed to her all his estate.

Ratanbai applied for the probate of the will to the High Court, and Navazbai, the widow of the deceased, filed a caveat against the grant.

On the 25th February, 1892, a consent decree was passed by the High Court (No. 36 of 1891) between "Bai Ratanbai, the sole executrix named in the will of the deceased," as plaintiff and "Navazbai, widow of the deceased," as defendant. The decree ran as follows:

"This Court doth by consent order and direct that probate of the will of the said Jamsetji Jehangirji Dalal, deceased, do issue to the said plaintiff and that the schedule to the said petition be amended by striking out the words 'Monies standing to the deceased's credit at the time of his death in the Provident Fund in the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company, Rs. 4,200'; and this Court doth declare that the plaintiff as executrix of the estate of the said J. J. Dalal, deceased, is not entitled to the said sum, Rs. 4,178-10, or any other sum or sums of money hereafter to be received from the B. B. & C. I. Railway Company by way of gratuity or otherwise howsoever."

Probate of the will was granted to Ratanbai on the 3rd February, 1893.

In 1892, while the proceedings in the High Court were pending, Navazbai, the widow of the deceased, applied to the Railway Company and received from the Company's Provident Fund Committee the above-mentioned sum of Rs. 4,178-10-0. A further sum of Rs. 166 was paid to her by the company in respect of certain arrears of salary and bhatta due to the deceased.

In the year 1894 the plaintiff sued Navazbai and Ratanbai in the Court of Small Causes at Surat to recover Rs. 166, in respect of certain loans advanced by him to the deceased during his life-time.

The Judge awarded the plaintiff's claim to be recovered from the estate of the deceased, and held (inter alia) that Navazbai had by her conduct rendered herself liable to the plaintiff as an executrix de son tort.

Navazbai applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decision should not be set aside, contending that the Judge erred in holding that she was executrix de son tort and as such liable for the debt sued on; that he should have held that the consent decree made by the High Court protected her from the claims of the creditors of the deceased, and that he should have held that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was against Ratanbai, the executrix of the deceased, and not against the applicant.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, appeared for the applicant (defendant Navazbai) in support of the rule:—Navazbai has been held liable as executrix de son tort because she obtained the sums of Rs. 4,178-10 and Rs. 166 from the Railway Company. We deny that she was executrix de son tort. The consent decree of February, 1882, gave her the right to these sums, and the plaintiff has no claim to any part of them—Hilli v. Curtis(1). At the time she received these sums the order for probate had been made by the consent decree although probate had not actually been issued. But the order for the grant of probate is tantamount to the grant itself—Magraram v. Gursahai Nand (2). There was, therefore, an executrix in existence. It is she who is liable to the creditors, and Navazbai, if she has done wrong, is liable to her. But the creditors cannot sue Navazbai. They can only sue the executrix Ratanbai. Navazbai has not rendered herself liable as executrix de son tort.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar, appeared for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause:—Navazbai had no authority under the will to recover any money due to the deceased, and having done so, she was rightly held to be executrix de son tort, and is, therefore, liable to the plaintiff—s. 265 of the Indian Succession Act; Padget v. Priest (3).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—Upon this application we have been asked to set aside the decree made by the Provincial Small Cause Court at Surat against the defendant Navazbai as executrix de son tort of her deceased husband Jamsetji. Ratanbai, the executrix of the deceased, was joined as a co-defendant in the suit, and a decree was also passed against her.

(1) L.R. 1 Eq. 90. (2) 17 C. 347. (3) 2 Term. Rep. 97.
It appears to be settled law that an executor de son tort, or "of his own wrong," as he is styled in the Indian Succession Act, can be sued jointly with the rightful executor—Williams on Executors, p. 217 (9th Ed.). No objection has been taken before us to the decree on that ground.

It is, however, contended that there was a rightful executrix in existence when the defendant Navazbai intermeddled with the estate of the deceased by collecting a debt due to him by the Bombay Baroda and Central India Railway Company, and that s. 265 of the Succession Act (X of 1865) shows that under these circumstances Navazbai cannot be sued by a creditor of the deceased, the only person to whom she is responsible being the rightful executrix.

The deceased Jamsetji died on the 14th October, 1891. Thereafter Ratanbai applied to the High Court for probate of his will. To that application Navazbai filed a caveat. By a consent decree made on the 25th February, 1892, the caveat was dismissed, and it was ordered that probate should issue to Ratanbai. Probate did not, in fact, issue until the 3rd February, 1893. In the meantime in May or June, 1892, Navazbai collected the debt of Rs. 166 from the company. This collection, it is not denied, would constitute Navazbai an executrix de son tort, unless there was at the date of its collection a rightful executrix in existence. We are of opinion that there was not then a rightful executrix in existence within the meaning of s. 265 of the Succession Act. The following passage from Williams on Executors, (9th Ed.), p. 211, explains the law upon this question:—[404] "When the will is proved or administration granted, and another person then intermeddles with the goods, this shall not make him executor de son tort by construction of law, because there is another personal representative of right against whom the creditors can bring their actions, and such a wrongful intermeddler is liable to be sued as a trespasser." In Tomlin v. Beck (1) Sir Thomas Plumer, M. R., describes a rightful executor as one "deriving his title from the will which he has proved." Probate is, therefore, we think, necessary to complete the title of a rightful executor, and until it is taken out, a person by intermeddling with the assets can constitute himself executor de son tort.

Probate, as defined in the Succession Act, means not the mere declaration by the Court that the will has been duly executed, but (s. 3) "the copy of the will certified under the seal of a Court of competent jurisdiction with a grant of administration to the estate of the testator." The provisions of the Succession Act are wholly different from those of Act XL of 1858, and the case of Mugniram v. Gursahai Nand (2) does not, therefore, apply.

In the present case it being admitted that Navazbai received the Rs. 166, it lay upon her to discharge herself from the liability she thus incurred to the creditors of Jamsetji. This she could only do by showing under s. 266 of the Succession Act payment of it over to the rightful executor or payment made in a due course of administration. She has not established either of these defences. What she has shown is that by the terms of the consent decree of the 25th February, 1892, she was allowed to receive this sum and retain it. This consent decree does not, bind the creditors of the deceased, nor does it, in our opinion, free her from responsibility to them to the extent of the assets which she has received. This case does not come within the principle laid down in Sykes,

(1) 1 Turn. & Russ. 435.
(2) 17 C. 347.
v. Sykes (1), nor within the rule enunciated in Hill v. Curtis (2). Navaz-bai does not hold the moneys which she has collected for the executrix, nor has she settled accounts with the latter. To the detriment of the [405] creditors she has been permitted to collect and retain part of the property of the deceased. The Judge finds that she has done so without the knowledge and consent of the executrix. The application must, therefore, be dismissed with costs. We see no grounds, even if we had the power, for directing in what order the decree is to be executed.

Application dismissed.

INSOLVENCY JURISDICTION.

Before Mr. Justice Strachey.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES CURRIE AN INSOLVENT.

Jurisdiction—Insolvent Court of Bombay, jurisdiction of—Indian Insolvent Act Stat. 11 and (12 Vict., c. 21), s. 5—High Court Charter, cl. 18 and 44—Act V of 1872—Trader at Karachi presenting petition in Bombay—Relation of Insolvent Court to High Court—Acts limiting jurisdiction of High Court limit jurisdiction of Insolvent Court.

J. C., a European British subject residing at Karachi in Sind, failed in business in 1895, and on 11th June of that year he filed his petition in the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors in Bombay.

Held that, having regard to Act V of 1872 (3) read with cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, 1865, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition.

By s. 5 of Statute 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21 the Insolvent Court was given jurisdiction over residents within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Bombay. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extended over all inhabitants of the town and island of Bombay and over European British subjects in any of the factories subject to or dependent on the Government of Bombay.

The jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court as defined by the above section remained unaffected by the establishment of the High Court in the place of the Supreme Court except so far as it may be limited by cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, 1865.

[105] A European British subject residing within the Presidency of Bombay, though outside the town and island of Bombay, may petition the Insolvent Court of Bombay for relief.

The powers and authorities originally of the Supreme Court and now of the High Court given by the Insolvent Act form a branch of the jurisdiction of the High Court and are, therefore, subject to any legislative restriction of that

(3) Act V of 1872 as amended by Act XX of 1872:—

Whereas it is expedient to remove doubts which have arisen as to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Bombay over the Province of Sind; it is hereby enacted as follows:

1. The High Court of Bombay has not, and shall be deemed never to have had, jurisdiction over the Province of Sindh.
2. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the Administrator-General’s Act, 1874.
3. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to invalidate the grant of any probate or letters of administration heretofore or hereafter made by the High Court of Judicature at Bombay or to affect the rights, powers or duties of any executor or administrator under, or by virtue of, any such probate or letters.
4. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the Criminal Jurisdiction of the said High Court, so far as regards European British subjects of Her Majesty.
jurisdiction whether imposed by the Letters Patent or by any subsequent enactment.

The power of the High Court and any Judge of it to exercise the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court, whatever that jurisdiction may be, is locally limited by cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, 1865, to the Presidency of Bombay and cannot be exercised outside that Presidency or outside any area within it to which it may by subsequent enactment be restricted.

The effect of cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, 1865, which makes the provisions of cl. 18 subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council, must be that any Act of the Governor-General in Council, still further limiting the jurisdiction of the High Court and excluding it from any place even within the Presidency, must also still further narrow the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court, for otherwise the Judge of the High Court presiding as Commissioner would be exercising jurisdiction in a place where his jurisdiction under cl. 18, by virtue of which alone he could act as Commissioner, had been abolished. Act V of 1872 is such an Act.

The insolvent was a European British subject who had carried on business at Karachi in the Province of Sind. In 1895 his firm failed, and on the 11th June, 1895, he filed his petition in the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in Bombay.

At the hearing, counsel for the opposing creditor took the objection that the Insolvent Court at Bombay had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition, the insolvent having resided and carried on business at Karachi and not in Bombay.

JUDGMENT.

[407] Strachey, J.—This is a petition under s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors’ Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21) for the benefit of the provisions of the Act, by a European British subject residing at Karachi. The question is whether this Court has jurisdiction to entertain the petition.

By s. 5 an application for the benefit of the Act may be made by any insolvent debtor “who shall reside within the jurisdiction of any Supreme Courts at Calcutta, Madras, or Bombay, respectively.” As regards Bombay, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extended, under cl. 29 of its charter, to all the inhabitants of the town and island of Bombay, and, under cl. 23, to all European British-born subjects residing “within any of the factories subject to or dependent upon the Government of Bombay.” Since the replacement of the Supreme Courts by the High Courts established by Stat. 24 and 25 Vict., c. 104, and the Letters Patent issued thereunder, it has been held that the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court as defined by s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors’ Act remains untouched—In the matter of Dorothea Ricks (3)—except so far as it may be limited by cl. 18 of the Letters Patent—In the matter of Tietkens (5); In re Cockburn (4); and in Bombay it has always been held that a European British subject residing within the Presidency, though outside the town and island of Bombay, may petition this Court for relief—In re George Blackwell (1).

It has, however, been argued by Mr. Raika for the opposing creditor that by reason of s. 11 of the High Courts Act, the material words in s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act must now be read "who shall reside within the jurisdiction of any of the High Courts at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay respectively," so that, since the passing of the statute of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 104), the jurisdiction of the High Court as defined by that statute and the Letters Patent, and not the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as defined by its charter, would be the text or measure of the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court. Whether that construction is correct, and what would be its [408] consequences if accepted, I need not now consider. Nor need I consider whether, under cl. 28 of the charter, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction over European British subjects in Karachi, though I may say that no case in which either that Court or the Insolvent Court exercised such jurisdiction has been cited. Whatever view of s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act is adopted, it appears to me that the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain the present petition is excluded by Act V of 1872 read with cl. 18 of the Letters Patent of the High Court.

This conclusion is based on the following considerations:—Although it is clear from the whole of the Insolvent Debtors' Act and from ss. 2, 3, 4, 73, 76 and 86 in particular that the Insolvent Court was a separate tribunal from the Supreme Court, and is now equally distinct from the High Court—In re Bhagwandas Hurjivan (2), it nevertheless stands in such a special relation to the High Court that a limitation or exclusion of the High Court's jurisdiction may indirectly limit or exclude its own. The Insolvent Court is to be held before a Judge of the High Court; the High Court has power to make rules for regulating its proceedings and to appoint and remove its officers; the High Court is a Court of appeal from its decision; and in certain cases the Insolvent Court may direct judgment against an insolvent to be entered up in the High Court and to be executed there in certain events. All the powers of the High Court and its Judges in these respects are included in cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, the object of which was to define the jurisdiction of the newly-established High Court in relation to the Insolvent Court. It provides that "The Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Bombay shall be hold before one of the Judges of the said High Court of Judicature at Bombay, and the said High Court, and any such Judge thereof, shall have and exercise, within the Presidency of Bombay, such powers and authorities with respect to original and appellate jurisdiction, and otherwise as are constituted by the laws relating to insolvent debtors in India."

This shows, first, that all the "powers and authorities" under the Insolvent Debtors' Act, originally of the Supreme Court and now of the High Court, to which I have referred, and including [409] the power to sit in and hold the Insolvent Court as its Commissioner, form a branch of the jurisdiction of the High Court, just as much as its powers under cl. 17, as to infants and lunatics, and are, therefore, subject to any legislative restrictions of that jurisdiction, whether imposed by the Letters Patent themselves or by any subsequent enactment. Secondly, that the power of the High Court or any Judge of it under cl. 18 to exercise the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court, whatever that jurisdiction may be, is locally limited by the clause "within the Presidency of Bombay," and, therefore, irrespective of s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, cannot be exercised outside the Presidency, nor outside any area within the Presidency to which the scope of the clause may by subsequent enactment be restricted.

This view of the jurisdiction of the High Court as including as one of its branches the power to exercise the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court is supported by s. 638 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882), which speaks of "any Judge of a High Court in the exercise of jurisdiction as an Insolvent Court," and by the judgment of the Privy Council in Napatkhahu v. Turner (1) where their Lordships held that the insolvency powers of the High Court under cl. 18 formed part of its ordinary civil jurisdiction. In the matter of Tietkins Mr. Justice Markby decided that assuming Sir Lawrence Peel to have rightly held in an unreported case of 1851 that the word "jurisdiction" in s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act meant, as regards European British subjects, the whole Presidency, still the effect of cl. 18 of the Calcutta Letters Patent of 1865 was to "narrow" the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court to the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William. He accordingly held that, sitting in the Insolvent Court, he had under cl. 18 no jurisdiction to entertain a petition by a European British subject residing at Cawnpore, a place within the Presidency, but outside the Bengal Division of it. Upon the same principle, apart altogether from s. 5 of the statute, a Judge of the High Court of Bombay obviously could not, by reason of cl. 18, exercise original jurisdiction in insolvency by entertaining a petition by a person residing outside the Bombay Presidency. Upon the same principle the effect (410) of cl. 44 making the provisions of cl. 18 as well as the rest of the Letters Patent subject to the legislative powers of the Governor General in Council must be that any Act of the Governor General in Council still further limiting the jurisdiction of the High Court and excluding it from any place even within the Presidency, must also still further narrow the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court: for otherwise the Judge of the High Court presiding as Commissioner would be exercising jurisdiction in a place where his jurisdiction under cl. 18, by virtue of which alone he could act as Commissioner, had been abolished. Now Act V of 1872 is precisely such an Act. As originally passed, it lays down in the most general terms that "the High Court of Bombay has not and shall be deemed never to have had jurisdiction over the province of Sind." Therefore, the High Court, including every Judge of it, has not and must be deemed never to have had, over the province of Sind, that portion of the High Court's ordinary original civil jurisdiction under cl. 18 which consists in exercising the powers of a Commissioner in the Insolvent Court. Thus, by Act V of 1872 the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Court was narrowed to the Bombay Presidency, excluding Sind, just as in Bengal it was narrowed by the Letters Patent of 1865 to the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William. That this is the necessary result of Act V of 1872 is further shown by the amending Act XX of the same year. In the course of a few months it was discovered that the absolute exclusion of the High Court's jurisdiction from Sind effected by the earlier Act was too sweeping; and hence it was in substance provided that nothing in that Act should be deemed to exclude that jurisdiction from Sind in three classes of cases—cases—under the Administrator General's Act, grants of probates and letters of administration, and criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects. The necessary inference from this is that, in the opinion of the Legislature, all these specified kinds of jurisdiction of the High Court would have been excluded from Sind by Act V of 1872 as originally passed, and that all other kinds, including insolvency, not specified and so not saved by Act XX fall within the general exclusion. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that but for Act V of 1872 a Judge of the High Court would, under \[411\] cl. 18 of the Letters Patent, have had power to exercise original jurisdiction in the Insolvent Court over Sind as well as over the rest of the Bombay Presidency, the effect of Act V is exactly as if the following proviso had been added to the clause:—"Provided that the said High Court, and any such Judge thereof, shall not have or exercise, and shall be deemed never to have had, any such powers and authorities within the province of Sind." That would as effectually prevent a Judge of the High Court from entertaining in the Insolvent Court a petition by a European British subject residing at Karachi as the clause, apart from Act V of 1872, would undoubtedly prevent him from entertaining a petition from such a subject residing outside the Presidency.

In any question relative to the jurisdiction of this Court, it is necessary, in my opinion, to have regard not only to that jurisdiction as defined by s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, but to the powers of the High Court and its Judges to exercise that jurisdiction under cl. 18 of the Letters Patent and any enactment affecting that clause. In this view of the case I need not decide any of the other matters which were argued at the Bar regarding s. 5 of the Insolvent Debtors' Act and various provisions of the Supreme Court Charter, the High Court Act, and the Letters Patent. It must not be inferred from anything in this judgment that I dissent from the decision in \[1\]—which is distinguishable on the ground that there the petitioner resided at Poona—or desire to throw doubt on the jurisdiction of this Court, where not excluded as in the case of Sind, to entertain petitions by European British subjects residing anywhere within the Presidency. This petition must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, with costs.

Petition dismissed.

AGA GULAM HUSAIN (Plaintiff) v. SIR ALBERT DAVID SASSOON AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [11th January, 1897.]

Partnership—death of partner—right of representative of deceased partner to sue for a specific asset—Contract Act (IX of 1879), s. 45.

On the death of a partner leaving a surviving partner still carrying on the business of the firm, the representative of the deceased partner may sue for and recover debts due to the firm, although the firm's assets in the hands of the surviving partner are already sufficient to answer all the claims made on behalf of the deceased partner and although the surviving partner is willing to satisfy such claims and disapproves of, and refuses to join in, the suit brought by the representative of the deceased partner.

THE plaintiff was the administrator in Bombay of one Haji Abool Cassum of Bushire, who in his life-time carried on business at Bushire in partnership with his brother Haji Ali Akbar (defendant No. 5).

The firm traded in the joint names of the two brothers and for many years had dealings with the firm of Messrs. David Sassoon and Co. of Bombay, the partners in which were defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4. Accounts of these transactions were periodically sent by Messrs. David Sassoon and Co. addressed to the firm at Bushire. Messrs. David Sassoon and Co. also held in deposit two lakhs worth of Government promissory notes which belonged to the firm of Haji Abool Cassum and Haji Ali Akbar at Bushire. These notes were included in the accounts furnished from time to time by David Sassoon and Co. to that firm.

On the 7th February, 1893, Haji Abool Cassum died at Bushire, leaving five sons and a daughter; two of the sons, viz., Aga Mahomed Karim and Aga Mahomed Ismail, had attained majority; the rest of the children were minors.

At the time of Haji Abool's death, David Sassoon and Co. owed his firm a considerable sum of money in respect of the dealings between them. An account for the year 1892 had been duly sent to Bushire addressed as usual to the firm, and the [413] receipt of the account was acknowledged by a letter signed as usual with the name of the Bushire firm and sent to David Sassoon and Co. of Bombay. This letter of acknowledgment was dated the 6th February, 1893, i.e., the day before Haji Abool died.

The Bushire firm under the surviving partner continued to carry on its business as before, notwithstanding the death of the partner Haji Abool Cassum. A few further transactions took place between it and David Sassoon and Co. of Bombay, who continued to furnish their accounts addressed, as before, to the firm. No objections were taken to these accounts or had been taken to any of the previous accounts furnished by David Sassoon and Co.

In March, 1894, and February, 1895, Haji Ali Akbar (defendant No. 5), the surviving partner in the Bushire firm, settled with Aga Mahomed Ismail and Aga Mahomed Karim, two of the sons and heirs of his deceased brother and partner Haji Abool Cassum. The settlements were respectively reduced to writing and were verified by the Vice-Consul at Bushire. By these settlements certain property was allotted to these heirs as their respective shares in their deceased father's property.

On 8th October, 1895, the plaintiff as duly constituted attorney of Aga Mahomed Karim and Aga Mahomed Ismail, the two above-mentioned sons of the deceased Haji Abool Cassum, obtained from the High Court letters of administration (for their use and benefit and limited until they or either of them should obtain letters of administration) of the property and credits of the said Haji Abool Cassum to have effect throughout the province of Bombay. On the 23rd October, 1895, as such administrator he called upon Messrs. David Sassoon and Co. for an account of all moneys, &c., belonging exclusively to the deceased Haji Abool Cassum or jointly to him and his brother Haji Ali Akbar. The next day David Sassoon and Co.
furnished an account showing a sum of Rs. 1,63,971 standing to the credit of the Bushire firm and referring to the accounts previously rendered to the Bushire firm. The plaintiff then demanded copies of the previous accounts furnished by Sassoon [414] and Co., to which the latter replied that accounts had been regularly furnished to the surviving partner, to whom he (the plaintiff) might refer for copies.

The plaintiff then filed this suit, praying

(1) For an account of the dealings between David Sassoon and Co. and the Bushire firm and of the securities held by David Sassoon and Co., &c.

(2) That David Sassoon and Co. might be ordered to pay to the plaintiff as administrator or to him and Haji Ali Akbar such sum as might be found due on taking accounts and to deliver up all securities, &c.

The surviving partner in the Bushire firm (Haji Ali Akbar) took no notice of the letters and notices addressed to him by the plaintiff's solicitors. The plaintiff, therefore, made him a defendant in the suit (defendant No. 5). A summons was served upon him, but he did not appear.

In their written statement David Sassoon and Co. stated that they were always willing to hand over the money and the securities in their possession to the persons entitled, but for their own protection wished to have it decided who was entitled. They alleged that Haji Ali Akbar (defendant No. 5), the surviving partner of the Bushire firm, entirely repudiated and denied the plaintiff's right to the accounts, moneys and securities claimed by him and that they had notice of his settlement with two of the heirs of the deceased. They also submitted that, in the event of accounts being ordered to be taken by the Court, the accounts which they had rendered to the Bushire firm before and after the death of Haji Abool Cassum, to none of which any objection had ever been taken, should be held binding as settled accounts.

At the hearing the following issues were raised:

1. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this suit.

2. Whether, if so, the accounts rendered by David Sassoon and Co. (defendants Nos. 1—4) to the fifth defendant, and not objected to, are not binding on the plaintiff.

[415] Kirkpatrick and Scott for the first four defendants (Sassoon and Co.).—We admit the money claimed is due from us to the Bushire firm. We only desire to ascertain to whom to pay it. That firm is still carrying on business, and the surviving partner may perhaps demand the money from us. The question is whether the representative of a deceased partner of a foreign firm can sue debtors of that firm to recover a specific asset although there is a surviving partner still carrying on the business who does not join in the suit, who desires to manage and to wind up affairs of the firm himself, and who is willing to satisfy all the claims of the deceased partner. There is no suggestion that the surviving partner here (defendant No. 5) desires to commit any fraud upon the estate of his deceased partner or that he and these defendants are in collusion. On the contrary it is alleged and is not denied that he has already recognised and settled the claims of the two sons of his deceased partner whose attorney the present plaintiff is. Nor is it suggested that the firm's assets now in his hands are not sufficient to meet the claims made on behalf of the deceased partner and his heirs. Under these circumstances has the plaintiff a right, independently of the surviving partner and without any necessity shown, to sue persons who owe money to the firm? To give the representative of a deceased partner an independent right to sue, at his pleasure, all or any of the debtors of the firm, puts the firm and the surviving partner at the mercy of a stranger whose proceedings may possibly ruin both.

We submit that his right is merely a right to sue the surviving partner for partnership accounts and for a share in the final balance when ascertained. That is so in England—Lindley on Partnership (6th Ed.), pp. 288, 344.

Section 45 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872) will be relied on. That section clearly does not apply to partnerships, which are dealt with in a separate chapter of the Act. The very words of the section itself exclude partnerships, for the mere fact of dealing with a partnership, as to which special rules apply, sufficiently shows the contrary intention mentioned in the section—Gobind Prasad v. Chuniar Sekhar (1); Ram Narain v. Ram Chunder(2); [416] Imam ud-din v. Liladhar(3); Motilal v. Ghellabhai(4); Vaidyarnatha v. Chiunnasami (5).

This Court has no jurisdiction to take general partnership accounts of a firm at Bushire—Suganchand Shivdas v. Mulchand (6); Kessovji Damodar v. Luckimidhas Ladhia (7). What decree can it give in this suit for a single asset? The plaintiff has no right to the whole, and the part to which he may be entitled cannot be ascertained without taking general accounts. As to the accounts regularly furnished by the defendants to the Bushire firm, they must be taken as settled accounts. No objection has been taken to them.

Inverarity (with Lang, Advocate General), for the plaintiff.—Motilal
v. Ghellabhai (4) practically decides this case, for it assumes that the representatives of a deceased partner can sue. If they could not sue, the question as to the necessity of joining them as parties could not arise.
Under s. 45 of the Contract Act the right of the deceased co-contractor survives to his representative. If the right survives, there is a remedy—Cunningham and Shephard’s Contract Act, notes to s. 45. In Motilal v.
Ghallabhai (4), Farran, J., (at p. 11) says: “We cannot doubt but that these sections (i.e., 43 and 45) relate to partners as well as to other co-contractors.” From Rivett-Carnac v. Goculdus (8) it is also clear that the representative of a deceased partner has a separate and independent right of suit.—In that case he was allowed to recover a specific asset from a surviving partner without a general partnership account.

As to the accounts we are entitled to have accounts from the defendants from the beginning of their dealings—at all events from the end of 1891. The account for 1892 did not arrive at Bushire until after Abool Cassum’s death. The defendants, who do not deny their liability to the firm, ought to have paid the amount due into Court.

Kirkpatrick in reply:—We could not pay into Court. Section 376 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) does not [417] apply to such a case as this, and it is the only section which provides for payment into Court.

firm of David Sassoon and Co., who acted as agents for the Bushire firm in purchasing and selling goods, and (apparently as cover) held Government paper to the extent of two lakhs of rupees on behalf of the said Bushire firm.

It is admitted that David Sassoon and Co. have, at this present time, as the result of their transactions with the Bushire firm, a large sum of money to the credit of that firm, and also they are responsible to the Bushire firm for a large sum of money held by Sassoon and Co. in China to the credit of the Bushire firm.

Abool Cassum died at Bushire on 7th February, 1893, leaving him surviving two adult sons, Aga Mahomed Karim and Aga Mahomed Ismael, and two other sons and one daughter, these three being minors. It is clear from the correspondence which has been filed in the case that the surviving brother and partner, Haji Ali Akbar, claimed to be sole executor of his deceased brother's estate, and he asked David Sassoon and Co. to be his agents and to obtain probate of his brother's will, mentioning that one Aga Gulam Husain was using his influence with the adult sons of the deceased to obtain probate in the name of Mahomed Karim. David Sassoon and Co. pointed out that they could not act as agents of Ali Akbar, but that he should come to Bombay and take all necessary steps after obtaining letters from his grown-up nephews to act on their behalf. They also pointed out that the will of the deceased could not be acted upon, as it seems to have been executed (in 1869) for the special purpose of a pilgrimage. Haji Ali Akbar replied that he had come to a settlement with his elder nephews. But he took no steps to come to Bombay, and administer his brother's share of the assets of the partnership in Bombay.

In the meanwhile, the above-mentioned Gulam Husain, as the duly constituted attorney of the said Mahomed Karim and Esmail, obtained letters of administration (dated 8th October, 1895) of the property of the said Abool Cassum within the Bombay Presidency for the benefit of the said Mahomed Karim and Mahomed Esmail, and limited until they or either of them should obtain letters of administration.

Armed with these letters Gulam Husain's solicitors wrote on the 23rd October, 1895, to David Sassoon and Co. for an account of all monies due by them to the Bushire firm or to Abool Cassum personally. D. Sassoon and Co.'s solicitors replied furnishing an account of what in their clients' books was shown due to the Bushire firm, and refusing to recognise the right of Gulam Husain to deal with the same except with the concurrence of Ali Akbar. They further stated that accounts had been rendered from time to time to Ali Akbar. Gulam Husain's solicitors also wrote (November, 1895) to Ali Akbar at Bushire, asking him to join in the administration of the estate of the deceased in recovering what was due from David Sassoon and Co. In that letter, mention was made of the accounts of the partnership having been made up and settled between Ali Akbar and the two adult sons of the deceased, the statement of account being signed by Ali Akbar and the two sons. It does not appear that any answer was received to that letter.

The present suit was filed on 9th January, 1896, by Gulam Husain against David Sassoon and Co. and Ali Akbar, praying that an account should be taken of all the dealings between Sassoon and Co. and the Bushire firm, and that David Sassoon and Co. should hand over to him, or to him and defendant Ali Akbar, the balance found due and the Government paper above mentioned. Defendant Ali Akbar has not appeared to plead in the suit. It being shown to the Judge in Chambers that service of the summons could not be effected under s. 90 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XlV of 1882) an order was made that the summons should be sent by registered post, and that such should be deemed good and effectual service. The postal cover has been returned as "refused." I hold that the summons was duly served. The ruling in Jagannata v. J.E. Sassoon (1) does not apply, as the defendant in that case resided in British territory. It would be practically impossible in the present case to prove directly that the person to whom the postal official at Bushire tendered the cover, and by whom it was "refused," was the defendant Ali Akbar. But there is the indirect evidence of the fact that the cover is most clearly addressed to Ali Akbar, a person who must be well known in Bushire, and there is the affidavit before the Judge in Chambers, showing that Ali Akbar knows of this suit. The rule that there can be no valid service on Ali Akbar (for that would be the effect of the ruling that the present service is ineffectual) would amount to a denial of justice, assuming that this Court has jurisdiction. That is the main question which arises on the written statement filed by David Sassoon and Co., and forms the subject of the first issue raised by their counsel "whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this suit."

Mr. Kirkpatrick’s argument may be put briefly thus:—There is no authority for the representative of the estate of a deceased partner in a foreign firm (there being a surviving partner of the foreign firm still carrying on the business of that firm) coming into this Court as such representative, and claiming to recover a specific asset from a debtor of the firm. All he can do in the present case is to sue Ali Akbar for a partnership account in the Court in Persia, and, if the Persian law allows a receiver to be appointed, to obtain such appointment; and such receiver could then come here and ask David Sassoon for an account, and recover the specific sum found due. Section 45 of the Contract Act does not apply to partnerships: even if it does, there is here a "contrary intention" implausible from the fact that the promisees were partners, and the ordinary common law of partnership would thus apply by which the right of action belongs to the surviving partner only. As this Court cannot take a general account of the whole partnership of the firm in Bushire, complete justice cannot be done here between the surviving partner and the representative of the deceased partner, and it cannot entertain the suit for the recovery of a specific asset. Such, in brief, is the learned counsel’s argument.

(420) Now, first as to the word "foreign:" this may really be at once eliminated from the argument. In this case part of the cause of action certainly arose in Bombay, and leave to sue has been obtained under cl. 12 of the Letters Patent. The fact, therefore, that the surviving partner, who is sued with the Bombay debtors of the firm, is a Persian subject, not ever living or carrying on business within the jurisdiction of this Court, cannot oust the jurisdiction of the Court. Eliminating the word "foreign" the argument then comes to this that the right of the representative of the estate of a deceased partner is limited to a general suit for the partnership account (which in this case would not lie in any Court in British India); and such apparently is the reasoning of Sir J. Edge, C.J., in Gobind Prasad v. Chandar Sekhar (2), where he says: "The legal representative in this case would not be entitled necessarily to a moiety of the amount recovered in the action: his share of the amount

(1) 18 B. 606.
(2) 9 A. 486.
recovered would depend on a settlement of accounts on the realization of the partnership assets, and it would, in my judgment, be highly inconvenient and possibly mischievous to allow him to interfere in the realization of the assets, unless through the intervention of the Court, by the appointment of a receiver in cases in which such interference by the Court might be necessary.

But in this Court I am bound by the decision of the Appeal Court in Rivett-Carnac v. Goultras (1), in which case the headquarters of the partnership were at Karachi, and the partners all dwelt and worked for gain outside the jurisdiction of this Court. On the dissolution of the partnership by the death of one of the partners, no adjustment of the partnership accounts was made. The surviving partners had, however, recovered certain assets of the firm which were in Bombay in the hands of an officer of the Court, and the suit in question was brought by the representative of the deceased partner against the surviving partners and the holder of the assets to recover those assets on the ground that they belonged wholly to the estate of the deceased partner. Leave was obtained under cl. 12 of the Letters Patent. On the question of jurisdiction the appeal [421] Court were quite unable to feel any doubt (see pp. 44-45 of the report), and their Lordships decreed in the terms of para. B of the plaint, that if necessary for the purposes of the suit the account of the partnership between the estate of the deceased partner and the surviving partners should be taken by this Court.

Now here no such general partnership account is asked for or is necessary. The representative of the deceased partner simply says to the surviving partner: "Join me in recovering an amount due to the firm in Bombay: if you refuse, then I must sue alone and join you as defendant: the only account at present to be taken is that of the debtor of the firm in Bombay." Is it a valid answer to say "The Court has no jurisdiction, and cannot assist you, because the Court cannot recognize you; it can only recognize the surviving partner if he chooses to sue to recover this asset, or a validly appointed receiver, if such can be appointed by the Courts and law of Persia?" The decision in the case quoted above gives an answer in the emphatic negative.

There remains the argument regarding s. 45 of the Contract Act. That point has been definitely settled by this Court. The answer is shadowed forth in the judgment just quoted at the top of p. 43 of the report. But in the previous case of Motilal v. Ghellabhai (2) the Chief Justice (then Mr. Justice Farran) with the late Acting Chief Justice laid down clearly that s. 45 of the Contract Act does relate to partners as well as to other co-contractors. Not only so, but the ratio decidendi of the whole judgment goes to show that in this Court we cannot accept the argument now put forward by Mr. Kirkpatrick, viz., that in India the right to enforce a partnership contract rests with the surviving partner only. It is shown in that judgment that the only logically consistent result of the application of s. 45 of the Contract Act to partnerships is that "the right to performance of the contract, as far as the other contracting party is concerned, rests just as much with the representative of the deceased partner as with the surviving partner," and that though it is logically inconsistent to allow the surviving partner to sue without joining the representative of the deceased partner as a party to the suit, yet it was not necessary, notwithstanding [422] the provisions of the Contract

(1) 20 B. 15.
(2) 17 B. 6.
Act, to change the old practice of Small Causes Court which permits the surviving partner to sue alone.

Of course, it follows that the representative of a deceased partner can join the surviving partner in a suit; and if the latter does not join as plaintiff, then he can be made a defendant, and so a party to the suit. What right have David Sassoon and Co., the debtors of the firm, to raise any objection? It is no answer to say that under s. 63 of the Contract Act Ali Akbar could have given them a valid receipt and discharge for their liabilities to the Bushire firm. As a fact they admit that they have not discharged their liability to the firm. On the contrary when they had notice that Ali Akbar had made an adjustment of the accounts of the firm with his two adult nephews, Mohamed Karim and Mohamed Ismail—(see the accounts 2, 3) and 4—in March 1894, and February and May, 1895, they refused payment of a draft drawn on them apparently in liquidation of that adjustment. Subsequently, in July, 1895, Mohamed Karim and Mohamed Ismail gave a power of attorney to the present plaintiff to obtain letters of administration and so recover the debt due in Bombay to the firm. How far Mohamed Karim and Mohamed Ismail may be bound to Ali Akbar by the alleged settlement of partnership accounts, it is not for this Court now to say. But the fact of that adjustment, if it is a fact, cannot prevent them or the plaintiff on their behalf from recovering the debt due in Bombay from David Sassoon and Co., so long as Ali Akbar is made a party to the suit. Nor can the writ of attachment (Exhibit 11, with which compare the letters O and P) under s. 268 of the Civil Procedure Code, or the letter from the Bank of Persia in London to the firm of Sassoon and Co., in London (Ex. 12), be pleaded by David Sassoon and Co. as a bar to the present suit, that is, to the account being taken in order to show what is due from David Sassoon and Co. to the Bushire firm. The finding on the first issue must, therefore, be in the affirmative.

There remains the question as to the accounts rendered by David Sassoon and Co. to the Bushire firm. Clearly they are not settled, that is, adjusted accounts. But they are stated accounts. There [423] is the evidence of the manager of David Sassoon and Co. that they were never objected to. The last one received by the Bushire firm before the death of Abool Cawsum was received and acknowledged the day before his death. That was up to the end of 1893. It follows that all the accounts rendered up to and including the period up to the end of December, 1891, must be taken as stated accounts, no objection having been made thereto within a reasonable time. These accounts, therefore, must remain in full force and vigour as stated accounts, except so far as they can be impugned by the plaintiff, who has the burden of proof on him to establish errors and mistakes (Story's Equity Jur., s. 523). The fact that the Bushire firm had no agent in Bombay, and no partner of the firm came to Bombay to examine David Sassoon and Co.'s accounts with vouchers, &c., would not make the account less stated accounts. It is for him to surcharge and falsify with regard to the accounts rendered up to and including 1891, and, subsequently, the account must be taken as open and treated accordingly by the Commissioner in the ordinary way. He should include the moneys due on account of the China transaction and referred to in para. 4 of the written statement, and also the Government promissory notes with interest held by David Sassoon and Co. on behalf of the Bushire firm. It is unnecessary to pass any decree now regarding those notes, as the interest has always been included in the account, and the final order as to the disposal of the notes can be passed when the final decree is to be made.
There will be a reference to the Commissioner in accordance with the above directions. All costs and further directions reserved.

[425] APPELLATE CIVIL—FULL BENCH.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine, Mr. Justice Candy and Mr. Justice Ranade.

ERAVA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. SIDRAMAPPA PASARE (Original Defendant), Respondent.* [19th December, 1895.]

Execution—Decree—Death of judgment-debtor after decree but before execution—Legal representatives not made parties to proceedings—Sale in execution without notice to legal representatives under s. 248 of Civil Procedure Code—Notice given to wrong persons—Title of purchaser—Mortgage—Redemption—Limitation—Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877), ss. 234, 246, 311.

On the 28th March, 1877, one Nagappa mortgaged certain property to the defendant. On the 27th June, 1877, one Hanmant Vithal obtained a money decree against Nagappa, but before it could be executed, Nagappa died leaving all his property to his daughters (the plaintiffs). On the 22nd November, 1878, Hanmant applied for execution against Nagappa, deceased, by his heir and nephew Ramlinga. Ramlinga appeared and stated that he was not the heir, but that the heirs of Nagappa were his daughters, the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, however, were not made parties to the execution proceedings, nor were notices served on them under s. 248 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act X of 1877). The execution proceedings were continued and the mortgaged property was sold on the 9th June, 1890, and was bought by the defendant (the mortgagee) subject to his mortgage. The sale was confirmed and a certificate of sale was duly issued to the defendant, who got formal possession on the 11th October, 1880, he being already in possession as mortgagee. In 1889 the plaintiffs sued the defendant to redeem the mortgage. It was contended that the defendant having purchased at a Court sale was entitled to the property free from the claim of the plaintiffs.

Held, by CANDY and JARDINE, JJ., that even assuming that the execution proceedings and sale had conveyed an absolute title to the purchaser, the present suit, which was brought within twelve years of the sale, did, in effect, challenge the sale, and that the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to redeem.

Held, by RANADE, J., that, in respect of the plaintiffs who were not parties, the sale proceedings were invalid and null and without jurisdiction; that the auction-purchaser acquired no rights under his certificate of sale as against these legal representatives, and that as against them he could only claim title by adverse possession not falling short of twelve years. As the present suit was admittedly brought within that period, it was maintainable.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur N. G. Phadke, Joint First Class Subordinate Judge of Sholapur, with appellate powers, confirming the decree of Thomas Moore, First Class Subordinate Judge.

[426] Suit for redemption.

The plaintiffs were the daughters of one Nagappa, who mortgaged the property in question to the defendant for Rs. 3,000 on the 28th March, 1877. Subsequently, i.e., on the 27th June, 1877, one Hanmant Vithal obtained a money decree (No. 687 of 1877) against Nagappa, but before it was executed, Nagappa died, having by his will, dated 15th February, 1878, bequeathed all his property to the plaintiffs.

* Second Appeal No. 824 of 1898.
After Nagappa's death, Hanmant Vithal on the 22nd November, 1878, applied for execution of the decree against "defendant Nagappa, deceased, by his heir and nephew Ramlinga." A year having elapsed since the decree, notice was issued under s. 248 of the Civil Procedure Code. This notice, however, was issued to one Ramlinga, the nephew of Nagappa, and not to the plaintiffs. Ramlinga appeared and informed the Court that he was separated from his deceased uncle Nagappa and that he was not Nagappa's heir; that the plaintiffs were Nagappa's heirs and that he was not in possession of the estate. He was informed by the Court that the application was not against his property but against the estate of the deceased Nagappa and that if his property should be attached, he would have his remedy after attachment.

The attachment issued and was followed by a proclamation of sale in which the defendant was described as "Nagappa, deceased, after decree—heir Ramlinga" and the interest to be sold as that of "Nagappa, deceased, his heir Ramlinga." At the execution sale on 9th June, 1880, the mortgagee Sidramappa purchased the property, and a certificate of sale was granted to him when the sale was confirmed. He had given notice of his mortgage and the sale was made subject to it. The certificate of sale described the interest sold as that of "the deceased Nagappa." On the 11th October, 1880, Sidramappa was put into formal possession, he being already in possession as mortgagee.

In the year 1889 the plaintiffs brought the present suit as heirs of their father Nagappa and also as legatees under his will for an account of the mortgage of the 28th March, 1877, and for redemption. The defendant contended that as purchaser at an execution sale he was entitled to the property; that the plaintiffs [426] had full knowledge and notice of the sale; that the certificate of sale was duly registered; that in a redemption suit they could not call in question the legality of the sale, &c., &c.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, holding that the equity of redemption belonged to the defendant, he having purchased it at an execution sale, and that the plaintiffs had no claim to redeem.

On appeal by the plaintiffs the Judge confirmed the decree.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

Macpherson (Acting Advocate General) and N. G. Chandavarkar appeared for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The equity of redemption is in the plaintiffs as the heirs of the mortgagor and they are entitled now to redeem. The equity of redemption did not pass to the defendant by the execution sale. We contend that as against the plaintiffs the sale was null and void. The decree was passed against Nagappa, but he died before it was executed. At his death the property passed to the plaintiffs as his heirs and representatives. That property was no doubt liable to the decree, but it could only be made available to satisfy the decree in the mode prescribed by the Civil Procedure Code: see ss. 234 and 248. But no notice under s. 248 was given to the plaintiffs. The legal procedure was thus not followed, and as against the plaintiffs the sale is null and void—Abrahamji Dooji v. Nathwa Kallya (1); Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (2); Sahdeo Pandey v. Ghasiram (3); Chathekalan v. Govinda (4). Sections 255 and 244 of the Civil Procedure Code also support our contention.

As the heirs of the mortgagor we may sue for redemption at any time within sixty years—art. 148 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

This suit has been brought within twelve years after the date of the mortgage and only nine years since the sale in 1880 to the defendant. As to acquiescence we rely on Baswantoba v. Ranu (1); Bhagvari v. Kondi (2); Rambhat v. Bababhat (3); Aba v. Dhondu Bai (4).

[427] Inverarity (with Daji A.Khare and G.M. Tripathi), appeared for the respondent (defendant).—The mortgagor's equity of redemption was sold to the defendant at an execution sale. The sale gave him an absolute title to it and the plaintiffs as heirs of the mortgagor have no claim. It is alleged that the mere failure of the decree-holder to give the plaintiffs notice of the intended sale under s. 248 of the Civil Procedure Code makes the sale null and void as against them. We contend that the omission was a mere irregularity of procedure and that the defendant as purchaser at the sale is not affected by it. He is not bound to see that the proceedings are regular—Rewa v. Ram Kishen (5); Natha Hari v. Jammi (6). The sale to him was duly confirmed and a certificate was granted, and the defendant got a complete title. The plaintiffs in this suit really seek to set aside the sale, but a mere irregularity is not a sufficient ground to set it aside once it has been confirmed.—Kishory Mohun Roy v. Mahomed Musaftar Hossein (7); Suryauna v. Duryqi (8). Notice to persons in possession is sufficient—Prosunno Chunder v. Kriso Chyutu (9); Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (10). Section 234 of the Civil Procedure Code is permissive and not mandatory. It applies only when the property sought to be attached is in the hands of the legal representative—Aba v. Dhondu Bai (4); Kunhammad vs. Kutti (11). The notice contemplated by s. 248 is required to be given when execution is sought against the legal representative, but not otherwise—Aba v. Dhondu Bai (4); Hiracund v. Kasturchand (12).

If the plaintiffs were dammified by the sale, they should have applied to set it aside under s. 311 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Macpherson, in reply.—There is a distinction between an illegality and a mere irregularity—Girdharme Lall v. Kantoo Lall (13). A purchaser at a Court-sale is bound to inquire whether the proper legal representatives of a deceased judgment-debtor are informed of proceedings in execution, so that they may have an [428] opportunity of being heard. A decree-holder can, according to s. 234 of the Civil Procedure Code, get at the property of the judgment-debtor only through his legal representative. This is made clear by the change in the language of s. 210 of the Code of 1859. Under that section the decree-holder could get at the property without the legal representative being made a party. The words "estate of the deceased" are omitted from s. 234 of the present Code.

Section 311 of the Code applies only to a material irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale. This section does not apply to a vital illegality which cannot be cured by any equitable consideration. Section 248 of the Code makes it incumbent upon the Court to issue notice to the legal representative.

JUDGMENT.

survey numbers from the defendant Malkarjun, the son of Sidramappa, the original mortgagee.

The questions to be decided in the appeal are (1) whether the sale certificate of the equity of redemption granted by the Court to Sidramappa legally conveyed the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises to him so as to extinguish it, and (2) whether, assuming that not to be the case, Sidramappa acquired a title by estoppel or acquiescence on the part of the representatives of Nagappa, or by limitation, to the equity of redemption so as to prevent their now redeeming.

The facts which give rise to the former are these:—In March, 1877 Nagappa mortgaged the four survey numbers in question to Sidramappa, the father of the defendant. Sidramappa obtained possession under his mortgage. In the month of June following, one Hanmant Vithal obtained a money decree in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Sholapur against Nagappa, the principal debtor, and his son-in-law Vyankappa, his surety. Nagappa died soon after the decree and before proceedings in execution of it had been taken. He left two daughters Erava and Tukava, and also a separated nephew Ramlinga. On the death of Nagappa, accordingly, the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises devolved upon his daughters Erava and Tukava.

[429] After Nagappa’s death, Hanmant Vithal applied under s. 234 of Act X of 1877 for execution of his decree against “the defendant Nagappa, deceased, by his heir and nephew Ramlinga,” to recover Rs. 65.62 by the attachment and sale of the four survey numbers which had been mortgaged to Sidramappa. The application was also headed with the name of Vyankappa, but no execution was sought against his property. The Court directed notices to issue under s. 248 of Act X of 1877. Ramalinga was, it appears, in possession of a house which formed portion of the estate of Nagappa. He appeared in answer to the notice to him, and stated that he was not the heir of Nagappa, but that Erava and Tukava were the heirs. He was informed by the Court that the plaintiff’s application was against the property of the deceased, and that, if he had any interest in that sought to be attached, he should take steps after attachment. The attachment issued, and it was followed by a proclamation for sale, in which the defendant was described as “Nagappa, deceased after decree, heir Ramlinga,” and the interest to be sold was described as that of “Nagappa, deceased, his heir Ramlinga.” Sidramappa purchased at the auction sale, and a certificate of sale was granted to him on the sale being confirmed. He had given notice of his mortgage, upon which he alleged that Rs. 3,680 were then due, and the sale took place subject to it. The certificate of sale described the interest sold as that of “the deceased Nagappa.” Formal possession was given to the purchaser, but he had already been, as I have said, in possession under his mortgage.

The sections bearing on the question before us are identical in Act X of 1877 and in the present Civil Procedure Code. I may, therefore, treat the case as though the proceedings in execution had proceeded under the latter. As these sections have given rise to different and somewhat irreconcilable views it will be desirable that I state the reasons for my decision in some detail.

Now in approaching this subject it is well to have before us a clear perception of the position of the judgment-creditor of a deceased person in relation to the property and to the representatives of his deceased judgment-debtor. A mere money decree creates no lien upon the property of the judgment-debtor, but it [430] renders every part of such property liable to be attached and sold in execution of the decree. Its effect is explained by the Privy Council in Mirza Mahomed v. The widow of Balmukund (1). At p. 248 of the report their Lordships say: "A judgment does not vest in a judgment-creditor any portion of the property of his judgment-debtor. It gives him a right to have the judgment executed, but until execution the property of the judgment-debtor does not vest in the judgment-creditor simply by virtue of the judgment. That is so according to the law of this country, and it is also the case under the Code of Civil Procedure, * which is the law in force in India." Their Lordships were then speaking of the Civil Procedure Code of 1859, but their remarks apply a fortiori to the present more definite Code. It follows, as was there indeed ruled, that the property of a deceased judgment-debtor devolves upon his heirs free from any lien in their hands, but subject to his judgment and other debts, and liable in the same hands to be attached and sold in execution of the decree already obtained against him, a decree which can be enforced by following the procedure laid down in the Civil Procedure Code and in no other way.

The decree, however, does not by the death of the judgment-debtor cease to be operative. It does not, like proceedings before decree, abate, but continues as it were a living decree, which without revival the judgment-creditor can enforce. The views entertained upon this subject in the other High Courts have not been uniform (see Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (2), where the cases are collected, and Krishnayya v. Unnissa Begam (3) and Aba v. Dhondu Bai (4), where they are again cited), but it was so ruled in this High Court in Gulabdas v. Lukshman (5), which has been always followed here. The Legislature has also recognized it as the correct view of the Code in Act VI of 1892. Accordingly it has been held in the Bombay High Court that after decree it is not necessary to place the representatives of a deceased judgment-debtor upon the record—Hirachand v. Kasturchand (6) which followed an earlier unreported ruling, confirmed on appeal, on the Original [431] Side of the High Court. Notice to the representatives is all that the Civil Procedure Code requires before execution is issued in such cases. Section 248 of the Code places a decree where a year has elapsed since the last proceeding in execution and a decree in cases in which the judgment-debtor has died upon the same footing. A duty is imposed on the Court to give the requisite notice before execution issues in either case. The procedure to be adopted in the case of the death of the judgment-debtor where execution is sought against his property is that laid down in s. 234 of the Code. To my mind it appears to be the only way in which the decree can be enforced. The Code of 1859 provided (s. 210) that an application for execution could be made against "the estate" of a person dying after decree against him, but no such provision is to be found in the present Code. The argument that such a decree can be enforced by giving notice to the person in possession of a part or even of the whole of the property of a deceased judgment-debtor, as to Ramalinga or Sidramappa in this case, seems to me to be without warrant. The cases cited in support of it—Prasunmo Chunder v. Kristo (7) and Janaki v. Dhanu Lall (8)—were cases where a wrong legal representative was sued to decree, and effect to a certain extent was given to such decree, and were of a very peculiar nature. To me it appears that where the Legislature has indicated a mode of procedure in a given case, that course of procedure, and that only, can be pursued. The necessity of having the legal representative and not a mere stranger before the Court in cases of attachment is pointed out in Abrahamji Dooji v. Nathwa Kallya (1); though that judgment may have gone too far in saying that the Code requires him to be placed upon the record. The case of Chathakelan v. Govinda (2) is also an authority upon this point. The legal representative in whom the property of the deceased is vested is the person interested in seeing that it shall not be attached and sold improperly. Section 234 accordingly provides that if execution is sought in cases where the judgment-debtor is dead, application is to be made to execute it against the legal representative of the deceased. The Court then is directed by s. 248 to issue [432] a notice to such legal representative to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him. On no sufficient cause being shown, the Court shall order the decree to be executed (s. 249), and then it shall issue its warrant for execution (s. 250). The execution-creditor is, when these steps have been taken, in a position to attach and sell the property of the deceased though it is then vested in his legal representative. The object of giving notice to the legal representatives is not stated in the Code. It may be, not only to enable them to show cause why the decree by reason of its being time-barred, adjusted or otherwise satisfied should not be executed at all, but also to give them an opportunity of satisfying it before execution issues and thus preventing the sale of all or any part of the property which has devolved upon them.

The words of s. 248 being imperative “The Court shall issue a notice” it appears to me to follow that, unless such notice is issued and the representatives of the judgment-debtor are given an opportunity of showing cause against the enforcement of the decree by execution, a warrant to execute it is issued and an attachment levied under such warrant and a sale held in pursuance of it are informal and irregular, and that the legal representative is entitled to have the same set aside as of right if he applies in time and an interest superior to his has not supervened. It does not appear to me to be material whether the notice has not issued at all, or whether it has issued to a wrong person, whether he be a near heir, not being the legal representative of the deceased, or a stranger. The result to the legal representative is the same in each case.

The further question, however, arises whether the several proceedings prior to and including the auction sale are in such cases absolutely null and void, or whether they are not, though liable to be avoided at the instance of the legal representative of the judgment-debtor, valid until set aside. The latter is, I think, the case. The proceedings and sale, if not challenged within the time which the law allows for that purpose, convey title to the purchaser. The decree is, as I have shown, a living decree;
the formal steps have been taken to effect a sale under it; the property [433] attached and sold is property liable to be attached and sold under the decree; the law confers upon the Court the jurisdiction to sell. All is complete save that a person who ought to have had notice of the proceedings has not been notified. I can see no reason for holding that on that account the proceedings are a nullity and that nothing passes under the sale. A decree passed without summons served on the defendant is not a mere nullity. I see no reason for holding that an order to issue execution is on a different plane. The legal representative can object and set the

(1) P. J. (1876), p. 190.
(2) 17 M. 186.
order aside, but if he does not do so, I think that the sale, confirmed by the Court, conveys title to the certified purchaser.

How, it may well be asked, can a purchaser know whether a notice under s. 248 has been issued or not, or if issued, whether it has been duly served. To use the language of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, "To hold that a purchaser at a sale in execution is bound to inquire into such matters would throw a great impertinence in the way of purchases under executions"—Rewa Mahtom v. Ram Kishen Singh (1). No purchaser would be safe who purchased the property of a deceased judgment-debtor. Again, how, if he inquires and finds that the notice has been served, is he to know that it has been served on the proper person though served upon the apparent heir. A will appointing an executor may subsequently be found. There is no security for him. Consider, then, the position of the legal representative. As a rule he is not damnified at all. The property of the dead man is made answerable for the debt of the dead man. If the legal representative objects to this, he can come and set the sale aside. This affords him full protection. Is he to be allowed, when the estate which has devolved upon him has had the benefit of the sale proceeds of the property sold, to fold his hands for twelve years and see whether the property will rise in value, and then if it does, to evict the purchaser? I cannot bring myself to believe that such is the law.

As to the procedure which the legal representative can adopt to set aside the proceedings, it would, I think, be rather a straining of language to say that his case falls within s. 311 of the Code. That section is found in a division of the Code which [434] relates to sales, as to the mode of publishing and conducting which elaborate rules are laid down.
Section 311 provides that the decree-holder or any person whose immoveable property has been sold may apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of a material irregularity in publishing or conducting it, but such sales shall not be set aside on those grounds unless the applicant proves that he has sustained substantial damages by reason of such irregularity. In such a case as the present there is nothing irregular in publishing or conducting the sale. The improper step taken is long anterior to the publication of the sale. It goes back to and attacks the validity of the order under which the sale is held. An ex parte order has been made, which ought to have been made after giving the party whose interests have been affected by it an opportunity of showing cause against it. Such an order may of course be set aside by taking the proper steps in the suit at any rate until the sale is confirmed—Ramessuri Dassee v.
Doorgadass Chatterjee (2); Krishnayya v. Unissa Begam (3). Until confirmation the rights of the auction-purchaser are inchoate and incomplete—s. 314. After confirmation the proceedings can, I apprehend, only be set aside by suit. The provisions of s. 244 do not, I think, apply, as the purchaser is not a party to the suit. As to the necessity of a suit in cases not provided for by the Code, see Mirza Mahomed v. The widow of Balmukund (4).

In the present case the legal representatives did not come in before the sale was confirmed and seek to have it set aside. It is contended that it has become absolute as against them on two grounds—(1) Because Sidramappa was a bona fide purchaser for value whose title on confirmation became absolute. (2) Because the plaintiff's right to set aside the sale has become time barred.

Mr. Inverarity, for the respondent, in support of the first ground contends that as a purchaser at a Court's sale cannot be disturbed by reason of the decree under which he purchased having been erroneous and subsequently to his purchase set aside—Nawab Zain-ul-Abdin Khan v. Muhammad Asghar Ali Khan (1); Girdharee Lal v. Kantoo Lal (2)—so a bona fide purchaser is not bound to inquire whether the attachment proceedings under which the property has been put up for sale have been regular or not. He relies on Rewa Mahlon v. Iain Kishen Singh (3), where their Lordships say (p. 111):—"A purchaser under a sale in execution is not bound to inquire whether the judgment-debtor had a cross-judgment of a higher amount any more than he would be bound in an ordinary case to inquire whether a judgment upon which an execution issues has been satisfied or not. Those are questions to be determined by the Court issuing the execution. To hold that a purchaser at a sale in execution is bound to inquire into such matters would throw a great impediment in the way of purchasers under executions. If the Court has jurisdiction, a purchaser is no more bound to inquire into the correctness of an order for execution than he is as to the correctness of the judgment upon which the execution issues." I am inclined to yield to that contention notwithstanding the decision in Baswanapala v. Ranu (4) relied on by the Advocate-General. There the decree was obtained against the wrong person as legal representative, and it was held that it could not be executed against what was in fact the property of the true legal representative. The distinction is pointed out in Natha Hari v. Jammi (5).

It is, however, unnecessary to decide this question, as I think that the second objection must prevail. Whatever may be the legal limitation within which the representatives of the mortgagor could have brought a suit to set aside the sale to Sidramappa, it is plain that it could not extend beyond twelve years, and even now no suit has been filed to set it aside. The present case does not fall within the ruling of Bhagvant v. Kondi (6). The defendant does not rely here upon adverse possession, but upon the title which the plaintiff's might at one time have avoided, but which they have not taken the proper steps to impeach. It is found that they knew of the sale. It is certain that they were not purposely kept in ignorance of it. In deciding in this manner I am not ruling, so far as I know, in opposition to any reported case. [436] In Sahdeo Pandey v. Ghaisiram (7) the Judges no doubt used expressions tending to show that a sale without notice in circumstances like the present would be wholly void (as did also Straight, J., in Imam-un-Nissa v. Liakat Husain (8), but this was not necessary for the decision, and the cases upon which they relied did not go to that extent.

It is unnecessary for me to consider the question of estoppel and acquiescence. I have felt doubts as to whether the decree could have been supported upon these grounds, and have, therefore, dealt with the broader issue.

PARSONS, J.—There is no dispute about the facts of this case.

On the 28th March, 1877, Nagappa mortgaged the property in suit with possession to Sidramappa, the defendant. On the 27th June, 1877, one Hanmant obtained a money-decree against Nagappa. Nagappa died some time before November, 1878. On the 22nd November, 1878, Hanmant applied to have his decree executed against Nagappa, deceased, his heir and legal representative, his nephew, Ramlingappa. A notice was issued under s. 248 and served on Ramlingappa, who appeared and said that he was not the heir or legal representative of Nagappa, as the latter was separated in estate and had left two daughters, Erava and Tukava, who were his legal heirs and representatives. Nevertheless the Court allowed execution to proceed, the property was proclaimed as that of Nagappa, deceased, his heir and legal representative Ramlingappa, and it was sold and purchased by Sidramappa on the 11th October, 1880.

The plaintiffs as the legal heirs and representatives of Nagappa have brought this suit to redeem the mortgage of 1877 and recover possession of their property. There is no question but that they are the rightful heirs of Nagappa, and that Ramlingappa was not, and the suit is brought within twelve years of the sale, having been filed in 1889.

The point that arises is this:—Does a purchase at a sale in execution of a mere money-decree convey any title to the purchaser when the application to execute the decree has been made against a person other than the legal representative of the deceased judgment-debtor, and no notice under s. 248 of the Civil Procedure Code has been given to the legal representative? In my opinion the question must be answered in the negative.

My first proposition will be: “The only mode in which a decree-holder (I am speaking of money-decrees only throughout) can execute his decree after the death of the judgment-debtor is by application to execute it against the legal representative of the deceased as provided in s. 234 of the Code.”

“A judgment does not vest in a judgment-creditor any portion of the property of his judgment-debtor. It gives him the right to have the judgment executed; but until execution, the property of the judgment-debtor does not vest in the judgment-creditor simply by virtue of the judgment.”—Mirza Mahomed v. The widow of Balmakund (1). This decision was passed under the Code of 1859 and applies with greater force to the present Code which has taken away the power of proceeding against the estate given by s. 210 of the Code of 1859. On the death of a judgment-debtor his estate vests in his legal representative alone, upon whom alone also devolves the duty of paying the debts whether due on deeds or otherwise, and it is clear that that estate cannot be made liable except by proceeding against the legal representative. It is said in Abrahamji Daoji v. Nathwa Kallya (2) citing Lekraj Roy v. Becharam Misser (3): “It is manifest from s. 234, that there must be some person on the record as representative of the deceased defendant before execution can be had against the estate which belonged to that defendant at his decease. Execution against such estate cannot be had otherwise.” It is held in Ramasami v. Baginathi (4) that the representative of a deceased judgment-debtor ought to be brought in in the case, and that sale could not legally take place without some person on the record representing the deceased; and again in Krishnayya v. Umysara Begam (5) that the property might be liable in the hands of a legal representative, but that the right, title and interest of a deceased person could not be sold. In *Sheo Prasad v.
Hira Lal* (1), Edge, C. J., at p. 445 says: "If at the time of [438] the death of the judgment-debtor his property is not under attachment, the judgment-creditor must (except in the case of a decree under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act) proceed under s. 234 if he desires to execute his decree against property which was of the judgment-debtor in his lifetime and which came into the hands of his legal representative at his death."

My second proposition will be: "Not only must there be an application against the legal representative, but there must be a notice issued to him." Section 248 imperatively requires this to be done. The Privy Council in the case above cited—Mirza Mahomed v. The widow of Balmakund (2)—speak of the notice being necessary and say that "plaintiff could not have executed the decree until he had given notice." The High Court at Calcutta have held that the omission so give the notice required by the section to be given to the judgment-debtor renders the whole of the execution proceedings altogether bad and ineffectual to bind the judgment-debtor, so that the sale could not be sustained —Sahdeo Paney v. Ghasiram (3). To the same effect is the decision in Liakat Husain* (5), Straight, J., says: "It certainly does appear to me that the sale was void ab initio as being held in pursuance of a warrant for execution irregularly and illegally granted against the legal representative of a deceased person who has had no opportunity of showing cause why it should not be issued. Such a proceeding was as much ultra vires as it would have been for the Court trying the original suit to pass a decree against a person not a party to it. The provisions of ss. 248 and 249 seem to me peremptorily to require, as a condition precedent to the issue of a warrant for execution of decree, that the legal representative of a deceased judgment-debtor should, upon notice duly given, have an opportunity of showing cause;" and in the same case Pearson, J., says: "The opinion expressed by the Calcutta High Court in Rameswuri Dassee v. Doorgudass Chatterjee (4), that the omission to give the notice required by s. 248 to the judgment-debtor affects the regularity [439] of the sale, and the validity of the entire execution proceedings, appears to me to be indisputaable.

My third proposition directly arises out of the two former ones and is this: "When a person other than the legal representative has been proceeded against in execution, and no notice has been given to the legal representative, any sale that may take place is a nullity and has no valid or binding effect on the estate of the deceased in the hands of the legal representative."

I can see no practical difference between this case and the case where a stranger is joined as the legal representative of a person who has died before decree. The law in the latter case is clear. "It behoves an intending purchaser to see that the person sued as a representative was really the representative of the debtor deceased, since by sale of the derived interest (which is no interest) of A, the real interest of B, the true representative, cannot in general be affected."—Baswantapa v. Ranu (6).

On the death of a judgment-debtor his estate vests in his legal representative, who alone has the power to deal with it. By a notice given to the latter he and the estate become bound by the order of the Court, but neither would be in any way bound by a notice given to a stranger. A person, who buys what was the property of A sold by order of the Court, after due notice given to B, A's legal representative, would no doubt obtain the title both of A and B as it existed at the date of the sale, but even he would not obtain the title of A as it existed at the date of A's death, for it then vested in B, and B may have disposed of it in the meanwhile. Similarly a person who buys what was the property of A sold by order of the Court after due notice given to C, who is not A's legal representative, would only obtain the title of A and C as the same existed at the date of the sale. That of course would be no title at all, for A's estate had on his death vested in B, and C had no title at all in the property. There is no hardship in this. It is purely a case of caveat emptor, the would-be purchaser has to see that the persons whose interests are put up for sale are the real owners. He has full information given to him in the proclamation of sale as to who is the deceased judgment-debtor and as to who has been joined and noticed as his legal representative, and it is his duty to enquire into their title. If he were dealing out of Court for the purchase of the property, and were to purchase from a person other than the legal representative, he would acquire no good title. The Court gives no warranty of title, and I fail to see how a sale by a Court can possibly convey a better title than the persons named as the persons whose interests are to be sold could themselves give. There is nothing in the decision of the Privy Council in Rewa Mahton v. Ram Kishen Singh (1) opposed to this view. Their Lordships say (p. 25): “If the Court has jurisdiction, a purchaser is no more bound to enquire into the correctness of an order for execution than he is as to the correctness of the judgment upon which the execution issues.” The Court has jurisdiction to sell the estate of A after it has vested in his legal representative on proper proceedings being taken against that legal representative, but it has not jurisdiction to sell that estate on proceedings taken against a stranger. In the latter case it has only jurisdiction to sell what it purports to sell, viz., the estate in the hands of that stranger, and if that turns out to be no estate at all, it is the look-out of the purchaser. It would be contrary to first principles to hold that a man’s property could be validly sold away from him in proceedings taken behind his back and without his knowledge and without his being in any way represented in them.

My fourth proposition results necessarily I think from the third, and is this—

“The legal representative can bring a suit to recover the property sold so long as his right to do so has not become barred by the law of limitation, that is, by twelve years’ adverse possession on the part of the purchaser.”

It is obvious, I think, that he is not obliged to apply to the Court to set aside the sale under s. 311. There may have been no irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale. Neither would he be bound to sue to set aside the sale, for that could only be if he were affected by the sale. Here the sale is an absolute nullity so far as regards his property, for the Court did not purport to sell his interest in that property. Moreover, he might not even know of the sale and his possession of the property might not be attempted to be disturbed until long after the expiration of the year which would be allowed to him to bring a suit to set aside the sale.

His right to recover possession would, I think, clearly subsist until the purchaser had by adverse possession cured the defects of his original defective title and gained a good title by prescription. Until then the real owner would be entitled to treat the purchaser as being what indeed he was, no more than a trespasser. As authorities for this proposition I need only refer to the cases mentioned at p. 142 of Starling's Indian Limitation Act (3rd Ed.).

The lower Court seems to think that even if the sale was not legally binding on the appellants, they became bound by their acquiescence in it. There is, however, no finding that they personally had any notice of the intended sale, still less that they put forward Ramaligappa as the representative of Nagappa so as to deceive and mislead the execution creditor or the purchaser. At the most, if it be assumed that they did know of the sale, there was quiescence, and mere quiescence could not deprive them of their legal rights. See Baswantapa v. Rana (1). There is no estoppel which alone would deprive the plaintiffs of their right to sue to recover their property.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have not lost their right as owners of the equity of redemption and that the defendant has not acquired the same by the sale and purchase in 1880, and I would reverse the decree and remand the case for an account to be taken of what is due on the mortgage and for a determination of the amount that the plaintiffs must pay in order to redeem the property. As, however, I have the misfortune to differ from the learned Chief Justice on the fourth proposition only,—for we agree, I think, on all the other points in the case,—the appeal must be referred to other Judges under s. 575 of the Code.

[442] The case having thus referred under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) it came on for argument before a Full Bench composed of Jardine, Candy and Ranade, JJ.

Macpherson (Acting Advocate-General, with Narayan G. Chanda-varkar), for the appellants (plaintiffs).—We submit that the sale to the defendant was wholly void—not voidable. Voidable proceedings are those which the parties can elect to carry on. But in this proceeding the plaintiffs, who are the legal representatives, were not parties and could not elect—Natha Hari v. Jamni (2); Baswantapa v. Rana (1); Sahdeo Pandey v. Ghasiram (3). We admit that we could have brought a suit to set aside the execution proceedings, but the fact that we did not do so does not destroy our title. A suit to set aside the sale would be a suit for a mere declaration and not a suit for possession. As to the distinction between illegality and an irregularity, Oghad v. Nag (4); Ardesar v. The Secretary of State (5). No notice having been given to the legal representative, the Court had no jurisdiction to carry out the execution proceedings which were against the wrong person.

Branson (with Daji A Khare and Govardhanram M. Tripathi), for the respondent (defendant).—Failure to give notice to the legal representatives does not affect the jurisdiction of the Court. The decree was passed by a competent Court, and it had jurisdiction to execute it. If the execution was issued against a wrong person, that was merely an irregularity. A decree does not become a nullity if no summons has been served on the defendant or if it has been served on a wrong person. Non-service of notice is treated as a mere irregularity—Jagannath v. J. E. Sassoon (1); Sham Lai Pal v. Modhu Sudan Sircar (2). A purchaser at an execution sale is generally a stranger and cannot be expected to see that the proper persons are put on the record. He is not bound to see that the proper representative is a party to the proceeding—Girdharee Lall v. Kantoo Lall (3). What the purchaser has to see to is that there is a proper sanction of the Court for the sale—Nawab Zain-ul-Abdin Khan v. Mohammad Aqshar Ali (4); [443] Rewa Mahto v. Ram Kishen Singh (5). It has been held by a Full Bench of Allahabad that if a judgment-debtor dies after the commencement of the execution proceedings, it is not necessary to apply to bring his legal representative on the record—Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (6). See also Gulabdas v. Lakshman (7).

The next question is what limitation is to apply. Under art. 12, sub. II of the Limitation Act (XIV of 1877), a suit to set aside the sale ought to have been brought within one year after the confirmation of the sale. Further, we say that our possession has been adverse to the plaintiffs. We have been in possession for eleven years and by the time the plaintiffs could now bring a suit to recover possession by setting aside the sale, our title by adverse possession will be complete.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar in reply:—The Court has no jurisdiction to attach and sell B's property in execution of a decree against A. That rule holds good in this case. The difference between s. 210 of the Code (Act VIII) of 1859 and s. 224 of the present Code clearly shows that the Legislature intended the legal representative to be on the record. In the present case as we were not put on the record, the execution proceedings are a nullity. In the cases relied on, there was irregularity in the modus operandi. Section 248 of the Code is imperative. After the judgment-debtor's death the property vested in his legal representatives and the purchaser could not take anything if the legal representative was not brought on the record. Once the legal representative is brought on the record, the Privy Council cases apply, and the purchaser's duty of inquiry is fulfilled by reading the decree and the warrant of attachment and sale. The Privy Council cases merely lay down that the purchaser need not go behind the decree. As to limitation we rely on Bhogvant Govind v. Kondi (8).

JUDGMENT.

CANDY, J.—This appeal has been referred under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code; so the whole appeal must now be decided, not only one or more points on which the Judges may have differed. I need not repeat the facts. The question simply [444] is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled in the present suit to redeem the mortgage.

As regards the equities of the case, there is not, in my opinion, much to choose between the parties.

It is found that the plaintiffs were aware that the property was to be sold by the Court in 1880. It is also found by the lower appellate Court that defendant, who was mortgagee in possession of the property, was fully aware, from accounts in his own books, that Nagappa and Ramlingappa had been separate in estate; and he must have known, therefore, when (to use the words of the lower appellate Court) he interleaved in the execution-proceedings, and applied to the Court to have his mortgage-lien recognized, that the legal representatives of Nagappa were not on the record.

But, in my opinion, those facts do not deprive either side of its legal rights. The quiescence on the part of the plaintiffs does not deprive them of the right of asserting their ownership of the equity of redemption, if it still exists, and if the form of the present suit is no obstacle. The quiescence on the part of defendant does not deprive him of the right of asserting that the equity of redemption has been extinguished, or that plaintiffs in the present suit are not entitled to redeem.

In the view which I take of the case, it is unnecessary to decide whether the Court-sale in 1880 was a nullity or only voidable. I will take it that notice under s. 248 to the legal representatives was absolutely necessary, but that the proceedings and sale, if not challenged according to law, conveyed title to the purchaser; also that the legal representatives can object by regular suit. I hold that the present suit to redeem, brought within twelve years of the Court-sale, does in effect challenge the sale, and therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to redeem. The learned Chief Justice holds that the plaintiffs have not taken the proper steps to impeach the sale. By this I take it he means that there should have been in the plaint a formal prayer to have the sale set aside. It is on this point that I differ from the learned Chief Justice. The Subordinate Judge in the Court of first instance evidently regarded the suit as in effect one to set aside [445] the sale. He said:

"The plaintiffs now seek to set aside the purchase." Had the plea been raised that the plaint contained no formal prayer to that effect, opportunity would no doubt have been given to the plaintiffs to amend their plaint. Now in the present case it has not, as I understand, been contended that the present plaintiffs were bound to have sued to set aside the sale within one year from the date of the confirmation thereof. There are cases quoted by Mr. Starling in his notes to art. 12 of the Limitation Act, showing that that article would not apply to a case in which the plaintiff seeks for a declaration that the sale is inoperative as regards himself.

But it is said by the learned Chief Justice: "Whatever may be the legal limitation within which the representatives of the mortgagor could have brought a suit to set aside the sale, it is plain that it could not extend beyond twelve years, and even now no suit has been filed to set it aside. The present case does not fall within the ruling of Bhagvant v. Kondi.(1) The defendant does not rely here upon adverse possession, but upon the title which the plaintiffs might at one time have avoided, but which they have not taken the proper steps to impeach. It is found that they knew of the sale." In my opinion, the present case does fall within the principle enunciated in Bhagvant v. Kondi. In that case the plaintiff, in 1865, sought to redeem a mortgage executed by his father in 1858. Defendants pleaded that in 1863 the widows of the mortgagor (the plaintiff being then a minor) had sold the equity of redemption to the second defendant, who, it was found, was in possession as agent or trustee for the mortgagees, the first defendant. Sir C. Sargent, C. J., said: "It is contended for the second defendant, first, that the plaintiff's right to impugn the sale to second defendant is barred by art. 44 of the Act of Limitation" (plaintiff not having sued within three years of his attaining majority); "secondly, that the plaintiff's right to recover possession is barred by his

(1) 14 B. 279.
(the second defendant) having been in adverse possession for more than twelve years before the suit.

"Now it is to be remarked that this suit is to redeem this mortgage, under which, according to the finding of the District [446] Judge, the second defendant took possession as the legal mortgagee, although, as a fact found by the Court, he was a trustee or agent for the first defendant's father. The necessity of impugning the sale of 1863 to the second defendant arises from the second defendant's resisting the plaintiff's suit to redeem the mortgage, and is, therefore, subservient to that suit, and the case is, therefore, analogous to that of Ramaosar Pandey v. Raghubar Jati (1), where the High Court held that the setting aside the mortgage-deed in that case, which was impugned by the minor, was subservient to the suit to recover the land, and that art. 142 and not 44 of the Statute of Limitation of 1877 was applicable. The same principle was acted upon with regard to art. 92 of Act IX of 1871—Boo Jinatboo v. Sha Naqar Valab Kanji (2). As to the second point, the second defendant having entered into possession as mortgagee could not afterwards set up an adverse possession as owner so as to defeat the plaintiff's right to redeem—Ali Muhammed v. Lalta Baksh (3); Tanji v. Nagamma (4)."

It will be seen that the plea of adverse possession relied on by the second defendant in the above case was entirely distinct from the plea as to the necessity of the plaintiff formally impugning the sale by the widows. Here, as there, defendant holds possession and uses the Court-sale to him to defend it. The necessity of impugning that sale arises from the defendant's resisting the plaintiff's suit to redeem the mortgage. If the plaintiff can justly impugn the sale on the ground that no notice was given to them under s. 248, then I cannot see how defendant can resist the present claim for redemption. As the Chief Justice Sir Charles Sargent said in Akoba v. Sakhararam (5), the inheritance not having been substantially represented, plaintiffs' equity of redemption must prevail.

Being unable to distinguish this case from the principles laid down in Bhagwant v. Kondi (6), I would reverse the decrees of the lower Courts and remand the case for an account to be taken of the mortgage.

[447] JARDINE, J.—Dealing first with the chief contention, I think Mr. Macpherson put his argument too high when he called the proceedings in execution a nullity, although the Court had jurisdiction. The decisions do not go so far. Oghad v. Naq (7) is a case of an officer after becoming functus officio making an order. To such an act the word "nullity" applies; and the learned Judges after referring to Ardesar v. The Secretary of State (8) for the distinction between what is a nullity and what is an irregularity say: "That which is a nullity, being legally of no force and absolutely void and not merely voidable, cannot be set aside, and is by the Courts simply declared to be null and void." Oghad v. Naq thus resembles the cases of coram non judice where the judgment is void in respect of the authority or commission of the Judge. So a judgment contrary to the verdict has been held void, also one given in a wrong Court. These classes of judgments are to be found in Viner's Abridgement, Tit. Judgment; and also those that are merely to be set aside for irregularity or as being erroneous. The present matter more resembles those discussed in Coke on Littleton, ss. 436, 437 and 438, of a prisoner disseised or outlawed or against whom there was a recovery by default. As the law presumed that the prisoner was "without intelligence of things abroad, and also that he hath not libertie to goe at large to make entrie or claime or seeke counsel;" he was allowed to avoid the judgment, but only by writ of error, for the law recognized that the procedure had been that of the lex terrae and the execution done by the King. This shows the antiquity of the principle. In England a completed sale by the sheriff under writ of fi. fa. even if obtained irregularly is effectual and gives a right to the purchaser: see Doed. Emmett v. Thorn (1); Jeans v. Wilkins (2); Manning's Case (3), and other authorities collected by Mr. T. Kerr Anderson in his Treatise on the Law of Execution, p. 185. The subject is discussed in Dorab Ally Khan v. Abdooll (4) by their Lordships of the Privy Council, where the Sheriff of Calcutta on a writ of fi. fa. sold land outside of his jurisdiction. Treating real estate in India like a chattel (448) the sheriff was held to be in the position of an ordinary person who has sold that which he had no title to sell. The inclination of their Lordships' opinion was, that if the execution-creditor had given an implied warranty of title there would be an exception to the rule about chattels of caveat emptor. They treated the sale as possibly a nullity on the ground only of want of jurisdiction. They say: "In the present case the subject-matter of the sale was the estate of the execution-debtor, so that if the sheriff had had jurisdiction, his conveyance would have passed the title. It was solely because he was acting beyond his territorial jurisdiction that the sale became ineffectual and wholly ineffectual." This case is commented on and followed in Sundara v. Venkatavarad (5).

The High Court of Calcutta has treated decrees passed against dead men, not as nullities, but rather as bad and erroneous where there was a jurisdiction—In the matter of the petition of Samuel Cochrane (6).

There it was held that the decree-holder having been the purchaser could not successfully contend as against the assignee of the owner that a suit to set aside the sale would not lie. In Nawab Sidhee v. Rajah Ojoodhyaram (7) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that a sale obtained under Act I of 1845 by fraud might be avoided by suit; and that the limitation of one year under s. 24 to set aside the revenue sale did not apply, for "the plaintiff claimed a right, as it were, to confess and avoid that sale by imposing a trust on the estate which passed under it," and that as against the plaintiff the sale ought to be viewed as a private sale. That decision proceeded partly on fraud, partly on the rule of estoppel that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong. But there is no suggestion that the judicial proceedings were a nullity. As said there from the Duchess of Kingston's case, the sentence of the Court "is impeachable from without; although it is not permitted to show that the Court was mistaken, it may be shown that they were misled." More mistakes or misleading are not apparent; they have to be shown to the Court as contrary to s. 283 of the present Code a stranger in possession is wrongly proceeded against in execution as if he were a legal representative—[449] Chathakelan v. Govinda (8). Actus legis nemini facit injuriam. What is irregular is not void, but may be corrected by the Court, if its aid is sought by whatever procedure apolies; as, e.g., by suit to set aside a decree for fraud. Therefore I think that the analogy which the Chief Justice has taken of a decree passed without notice of the suit to the defendant is just. I am of opinion upon principle and upon the cases that although the act of the Court may have been irregular in not following s. 248, or the Court may have been misled, it acted with jurisdiction, and its action is not a nullity. I adopt the statement in 1 Dan. Chancery Practice (Ch. 16, s. 4) that it is an established principle that every order and judgment made with jurisdiction, however erroneous, is good until it is discharged—see Chuock v. Cremer (1).

The less argued question is as to the procedure by which what the Court did is to be impeached, as upon that hangs the question of limitation. I concur with my brother Candy in holding that art. 12 does not apply, and that the suit is within the twelve years' limit—see also Fannyamma v. Manjaya (2); Lalchand v. Sakharam (3); Nawab Sidhee v. Rajah Ojoodhyaram (4); and also generally in his view of the respective rights and equities of the parties. The mortgagee Shidramappa knew of what was being done, a matter which has always been a circumstance of note; he thus resembles somewhat a decree-holder who has purchased at the Court-sale, knowing of the irregularity. I take note also that the plaint contains a general prayer for relief; and I am of opinion that the present suit is effectual under all the circumstances. I would, therefore, make the decree procured by my brother Parsons.

RANADE, J.—The chief point on which the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parsons appear to differ relates not so much to the fourth proposition laid down in the judgment of Mr. Justice Parsons, but to his third proposition. They both affirm the necessary of having the true legal representative, and not a mere stranger, before the Court in cases of attachment-proceedings; and they also hold that it is necessary to issue notice to such legal representative under s. [450] 248. The Chief Justice thinks that, in the absence of such a notice, the subsequent sale-proceedings are not absolutely null, but are only irregular, and as such liable to be avoided at the instance of the true legal representative, not necessarily by an application under s. 311, but also by a regular suit if brought within the time allowed by law, which period cannot, at the most, exceed twelve years. On the other hand, Mr. Justice Parsons holds that, in the absence of a notice to the legal representative, the sale-proceedings are a nullity, which the legal representative might set aside by a regular suit, if such suit were brought within twelve years from the date of the confirmation of the sale. As the legal representatives in this case brought no suit to set aside the sale within twelve years, the Chief Justice was of opinion that the legal representatives had no right to succeed in their present claim for redemption, while Mr. Justice Parsons was inclined to hold that as the present redemption claim was made within twelve years, defendant, as the auction-purchaser, had not acquired an adverse title by possession, and that the suit for redemption was maintainable.

The learned Advocate General for the appellant, and Mr. Branson for the respondent, chiefly confined their arguments to the question whether the sale-proceedings, in the circumstances of this case, were absolutely null, or were only irregular and voidable. It is thus clear that the difference of opinion relates to the third proposition, and not to the fourth, as stated to the conclusion of Mr. Justice Parsons' judgment.

There is always some room for ambiguity in the unqualified use of the words "irregular" or "null" apart from all reference to the person in respect of whom the proceeding may be described as irregular or null. The attachment and sale-proceedings in this case might both be regular and null—regular as regards the parties to the record, and null as regards those who were not parties to it. The facts of this case show that, on the death of the judgment-debtor Nagappa after decree, a notice under s. 249 was issued at the instance of the judgment-creditor to his separated nephew Ramlinga, who accordingly appeared, and informed the Court that he was not in possession of the property sought to be attached, and that he was not the heir or legal representative, as Nagappa had left two daughters, who were his heirs and legal representatives. The creditor, however, took no notice of this statement of Ramlinga, and the Court allowed Ramlinga’s name to remain on the record as Nagappa’s legal representative, and issued no notices to the daughters of Nagappa. The sale took place accordingly, and defendant bought the property of which he was already in possession as mortgagee of Nagappa.

The immediate question for consideration is thus whether, under the circumstances, the sale was only irregular, or was absolutely null as regards the true legal representatives of Nagappa, who were not parties to the execution proceedings. There was no bona fide mistake in this case, but all parties had full knowledge that Nagappa’s representative on the record was Ramlinga, who disclaimed that status, and not his daughters. I am inclined to hold that, in respect of these daughters, the sale-proceedings were invalid and null, and the auction-purchaser acquired no rights under his certificate of sale as against these the true legal representatives, and that as against them he could only claim title by adverse possession not falling short of twelve years. As the present suit was admittedly brought within that period, I am disposed to hold that the suit was maintainable.

The reasons which lead me to this view may be thus briefly stated: It is a mere accident that the defendant as mortgagee was in this case in possession of the lands in dispute. A parallel case of a mortgage without possession might well be supposed, in which the mortgagor Nagappa, and after his death his daughters, as his heirs and legal representatives, would be in possession of the mortgaged property. If in such case, a judgment-creditor of Nagappa had, after Nagappa’s death, proceeded to execute his decree, and, without issuing any notice to the legal representatives in possession, had joined Ramlinga’s name as representative in the execution proceedings, and the sale had taken place, at which the mortgagee without possession bought the property, and then sued for possession as owner, I do not think that, in such a case as this, the true legal representatives would be debarred from urging that the sale conveyed no title of ownership to the auction-purchaser as against them, and that the mortgage still subsisted intact. The sale would be pronounced in such a case to be not merely voidable, but absolutely invalid as against the daughters in possession.

Suppose again there was no judicial sale, but a private sale by Ramlinga to the defendant-mortgagee in possession, or without possession behind the back, and without the knowledge, of the daughters. If the daughters’ rights were beyond dispute, the private deed of sale would not be held to have conveyed as against them the equity of redemption to the mortgagee, who could only claim ownership by adverse possession of twelve years and more. If this view held good in respect of a private sale, it should hold good a fortiori in the case of a judicial sale where the maxim caveat emptor applies with greater cogency.

Quite independently of these analogies, it may be noted that, looking at the reasons which clothe judicial procedure with the finality and validity that generally attend it, the main reason no doubt is that all parties concerned have an opportunity allowed to them to represent their respective case before a judicial order is pronounced. It is this circumstance which gives the Courts jurisdiction over persons and interests so represented. The jurisdiction has no foundation when this opportunity has not been allowed.

The absence of a notice under s. 249 prevents such a jurisdiction from arising in regard to those persons who have a right to receive such notice, and in the words of a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court the order of sale “was of no effect whatsoever as against the judgment-debtor,” and a fortiori as against the legal representative—Mirza Mahomed Aga Ali Khan Bahadur v. The widow of Balmukund (1); Romeshury Dasi v. Durgadass (2); Sahdeo Pandey v. Ghasiram Gyawal (3); Imamun-nissa Bibi v. Liaquat Husain (4); Ramesses Dasse v. Doorgadass Chatterjee (5); Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (6); Abrahajvi v. Nathwa (7); Lekraj Roy v. Beharam Misser (8); Ramasami v. Bagirathi (9).

[453] It was indeed admitted by Mr. Branson that when the omission to follow the procedure laid down by law affected the jurisdiction of the Court, then the order was absolutely null, and not merely voidable but he contended that, in this case, the Court had jurisdiction, and the omission was, therefore, only an irregularity. No doubt, the Court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, i.e., the execution of its own decree, but over and above this jurisdiction over the subject-matter, it ought also to have jurisdiction over the parties, and this it can only claim when the proper parties are allowed an opportunity to appear before it. Failure in this respect operates as an obstacle in the way of its jurisdiction as though it had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter itself.

It was urged, however, that the liability in this case affected the estate of the deceased Nagappa only, and that it was a mere informality that the true heirs’ names were not joined in the record in execution proceedings. This view had some force under the old Act, which apparently has influenced some of the earlier decisions. Later legislation, however, lends no countenance to this view. The so-called estate of a deceased person is a very convenient legal fiction, but, as a matter of fact, there is in Hindu law at least no such objective reality as the estate of a deceased person. At the moment of Nagappa’s death, the property owned by him ceased to be his, and became the property of his heirs subject, of course, to the liabilities and obligations created by him. The obligation to satisfy these liabilities is not in the strict Hindu law limited by the value of the assets received, though such a limit has now been placed thereon by express legislation (s. 234 and Bombay Act V of 1865). If a judgment-debtor dies before a decree is passed against him, the decree is not enforceable as such against his estate. The legal representative’s name must be joined before a decree can be passed against a deceased person and similarly the legal representative’s name must be joined if death occurs after decree, and it is sought to execute it. The fiction of the estate of the deceased cannot dispense with this necessity. The omission to follow the procedure laid down in ss. 234 and 248 is not a mere informality, but is an illegality which affects jurisdiction.

Section 311, no doubt, permits not merely the decree-holder, but all persons whose property has been sold, to apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of a material irregularity, but the irregularities referred to in this section are irregularities in publishing and conducting the sale. The section does not cover grounds of objection which seek to make out that the decree was passed without jurisdiction, or that the party whose property was sold was not the judgment-debtor or if the property sold belonged to the legal representative, that he had Inherited no property from the deceased. The omission in the present case to issue notice under s. 248 affected the jurisdiction of the Court to order the sale, or rather its order could only affect the sale of the right which Ramlinga, joined as legal representative, had in the property, and it was this Ramlinga’s right alone which passed to the purchaser. The rights of the true legal representatives who were not parties to the record were not affected by the order, and did not pass to the purchaser under the sale.

There have been some conflicting decisions, no doubt, on this point, but the general tendency of the authorities is altogether in favour of the invalidity of a sale brought about under such circumstances. The facts in Raswanta v. Ranu (1), following Natha Hari v. Jamuni (2), have been indeed distinguished from the present case on the ground that the debtor had died before suit, and the creditor brought his suit against a stranger, omitting to proceed against the true legal representative. The principle of the ruling, however, ought to hold good equally in respect of execution proceedings, for these are only a later stage of the suit. The ruling in Bhagavan v. Kondi (3), relates to an omission to join the proper legal representative in execution proceedings, and I do not think that it can be distinguished on the ground that the defendant here did not rely, as in that case, on adverse possession, but upon a title which the plaintiffs might have avoided, but which they did not impeach. Looking at the written statement of the defendant in this case, I find that he did rely on his adverse possession as owner after the sale, being only mortgagee before.
The ruling in Imam-un-nissa Bibi v. Liakat Husain (4), also related
(5) to the case of a legal representative who received no notice under
s. 248. The decisions in Ramasami v. Bagirathi (5), Krishnayya v.
Unnissa Begam (6), Sahdeo Pandey v. Ghansiram Gawayal (7), also relate to omissions to join the names of legal representatives in execution proceedings. I had occasion to review all these cases in Aba v. Dhondu Bai (8), and the principles laid down there appear to me equally applicable to the facts of this case, though these facts relate to a different set of transactions.

It was finally urged that a purchaser at an auction sale cannot be expected to inquire whether the proper legal representative was or was not served with a notice under s. 248, and that above all his interest must be protected. If the defect in this case had been merely that the legal representatives had not been duly served with a notice, then this argument would have held good, and the purchaser’s protection would be complete. In this case, however, the purchaser had notice that the present plaintiffs' names were not joined, and that the sale was of the property of the deceased so far as he was represented by Ramlinga. Under these circumstances, the purchaser can claim no equities which should override those of the legal representatives, who were ignored altogether throughout the proceedings. The ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bawa Mahlon v. Ram Kishen Singh (1) assumes that there was jurisdiction.

The whole question thus turns upon the question of jurisdiction, and for the reasons stated above, I am inclined to hold that the order of sale in this case was without jurisdiction as regards the legal representatives who were not made parties to the record. The rulings of this Court cited above appear to me to fully cover the circumstances of the present case, and the right of the present plaintiffs to sue for redemption must, therefore, be affirmed, as defendant's possession under the certificate of sale has not ripened into adverse ownership.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 223 and 239—Transfer of decree—Execution of decree—Power of Court executing a decree sent for execution.

Where a decree is passed by one Court and sent to another Court for execution, the Court executing the decree cannot question the propriety of the order transferring the decree to such Court for execution.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Surat.

Suit to declare property liable to attachment.

The plaintiff obtained a decree for Rs. 250 against one Salebhai in the Court of Small Causes at Bombay (No. 32136 of 1890). It was transferred for execution to the Court at Surat under s. 31 of Act XV of 1882, and certain immovable property in Surat was attached in execution. The defendants thereupon applied for the removal of the attachment, alleging that the property was theirs, and the Court granted their application. The plaintiff now brought this suit in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Surat for a declaration that the property at Surat was liable to attachment in execution of his decree against Salebhai.

At the trial it appeared that Salebhai was the plaintiff's stepson, and evidence was given that Salebhai had property in Bombay of the value of Rs. 10,000.

* Second Appeal No. 285 of 1895.

(1) 18 I. A. 106 = 14 G. 18.
The First Class Subordinate Judge found that the property which had been attached did not belong to Salebhai, and he, therefore, dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed, and the appellate Court confirmed the decree on the grounds stated in the following passages from its judgment:—

"The decree which plaintiff seeks to execute was obtained in the Court of Small Causes in Bombay. His judgment-debtor is his own stepson and the decree was passed by default.

[487] "The said stepson has admitted that he has property worth some Rs. 10,000 in Bombay. The decree in question is for Rs. 250 only. The darkbast shows that no attempt has been made to satisfy that decree out of the Bombay property, and, therefore, no execution can be taken out here. The suit must fail on this account alone."

Plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Lallubhai A. Shah, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The question before the lower Court was merely whether the property in question was the property of Salebhai. If it was, the Court at Surat is bound to execute the decree which was transferred to it for execution. It could not consider the propriety or otherwise of executing it against any particular portion of Salebhai's property—Deershunder v. Maymana Bibee (1); Shib Narain v. Gobind Doss (2); Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 223, 223 B and 239.

N. M. Samarth, for the respondent.—Section 31 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882) provides that a decree of the Court may be transferred to another Court for execution only when the judgment-debtor has not, within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court which passed the decree, moveable property sufficient to satisfy the decree. Here the judgment-debtor Salebhai has in Bombay property worth more than Rs. 10,000. It was wrong, therefore, to transfer the decree under s. 31 of that Act for execution to another Court. See Haji Musa v. Purmanand (3) and Imdad Ali v. Jagan Lal (4). The District Judge, therefore, was right in holding that no execution could be taken out in Surat while there was sufficient property in Bombay to satisfy the decree.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The Presidency Court of Small Causes empowered under s. 31 of Act XV of 1882 so to do, sent the decree for execution to the Court of Surat, which under the same section had to follow the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882). The District Judge, on the mere statement of the judgment-debtor, not a party to the execution proceeding before him, held that the debtor had sufficient property in Bombay: as if such a question could be inquired into twice over, first in Bombay and then at Surat. Then the District Judge gives as his sole reason for [488] dismissing the application—"the darkbast shows that no attempt has been made to satisfy that decree out of the Bombay property, and, therefore, no execution can be taken out here." This court statement is not a proper judgment. The District Judge ought to have considered the statutes, as interpreted, by the decisions.

Section 233 of the Civil Procedure Code required the Surat Court to certify to the Bombay Court the fact of execution or the reasons of failure. This is inconsistent with a power to refuse to execute the decree on the ground that the proceedings of the Bombay Court were irregular or mistaken. The cases cited in support of the District Judge's order—Haji Musa v. Purmanand (1) and Imdad Ali v. Jagan Lal (2)—relate to decrees passed without jurisdiction, and are irrelevant to questions of mere procedure. Although it is unnecessary to consider s. 239, we may refer to Beerchunder v. Maymana Bibe (3) and Shib Narain v. Gobind Doss (4) as showing the limits of the function of the Court to which the decree has been transferred.

For those reasons the Court sets aside the decree of the District Judge and remands the cause to the District Court for disposal according to law. Costs of this appeal on the respondents; other costs to abide the result.

Case remanded.

RAMAKANT RANGNATH JOSHI RAIRIKAR AND OTHERS
(Original Defendants). *  [7th January, 1896.]

Partition—Inam village—Right of management.

Property consisting of an ordinary inam village and a cash allowance payable out of the revenue of another village is liable to partition at the suit of a co-sharer, except when it is held on saranjam or other impartible tenure, or where the terms of the [199] original grant impose a condition upon its enjoyment that the management shall rest with a particular branch of the family of the grantee; and possibly a long-continued practice from which a family custom may be inferred, may operate to bring about the same result.

[Att., 27 B. 353.]

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur Chunilal Maneklal, First Class Subordinate Judge of Poona.

Suit for partition. The plaintiff sued to recover his share in the inam village of Ahire and of a cash allowance paid by Government. The thirteenth defendant (Vinayak Vaman Joshi) contended that he was entitled to manage the village and to receive the cash allowance and to divide them among all the co-sharers according to their shares; and that the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to partition.

The Subordinate Judge found that the property in dispute was not liable to partition; that defendant No. 13 had a right to manage the whole of the property as contended by him, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief. He, therefore, rejected the claim. The plaintiff appealed.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The original grant of the inam was made by the Peshwa in 1762 to six brothers who were the ancestors of the parties. The grant contains no condition with respect to the management of the inam. The village remained in the management of Chinto, one of the six brothers and the ancestor of defendant No. 13, because he was the active member of the family, and subsequently the management continued in his branch of the family merely by agreement and for the convenience of the family. Under these circumstances the possession of defendant No. 13 cannot be adverse to the other members of the family—Narayan Jagannath Dikshit v. Vasudeo Vishnu Dikshit (1);

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The plaintiff has sued in this case for partition of the village of Ahire and of the cash allowance payable by Government out of the revenue of the village of Vagaz. It is admitted that he is entitled to a one-fifth share in the property sought to be partitioned, but his claim is resisted by Vinayak Vaman Joshi, the thirteenth defendant, on the ground that he, Vinayak, is [460] entitled to manage the village, and to receive the cash allowance on behalf of all the co-sharers, and to distribute the profits of the village and the cash allowance amongst them in proportion to their respective shares, and that the plaintiff is, therefore, not entitled to partition.

The Subordinate Judge has held that the defendant Vinayak has established that position. The question which we have to determine upon this appeal is whether the facts of the case, which are practically undis-dputed, justify that conclusion.

The Subordinate Judge has relied upon the case of Dikshit v. Dik-shit (1) as establishing the proposition that the right to manage property on behalf of co-sharers is an interest in land which is recognized by the law. That case is certainly an authority for that conclusion when the land is held upon saranjam or other imparitable tenure. In the present case the village in suit is an ordinary inam village, and there is nothing peculiar or imparitable in the nature of the cash allowance.
Doubtless even in such cases it may be that the terms of the original grant by the ruling Power can impose as a condition upon its enjoyment that the management shall rest with a particular branch of the family of the grantees, and possibly a long-continued practice from which a family custom may be inferred may operate to bring about the same result. Upon that we do not consider it necessary to express any opinion.

The judgment of the Privy Council in Shankar Baksh v. Hardeo Baksh (2), however, shows that there must be very clear and cogent evidence to establish the existence of such an anomalous estate. In our opinion, the evidence in the present case is insufficient for this purpose.
We deal with that relating to the village of Ahira in the first instance.
The cash allowance from Vagaz and the revenues of another village, not mentioned in suit, are in some of the documents, to which we shall have to refer, mentioned along with the Ahira village. They all in many respects stand upon the same footing. The original grant of the village of Ahira, which is dated 27th December, 1762, is a simple grant in inam to the sons of Vithal. [461] The reasons assigned for the grant are that the grantees were great and worthy Brahmans and performed the Shatkarma.

(1) 15 B. 247.
(2) 16 C. 397.
wishing well to the Rajeshri Swami, and that Chinto Vithal, the youngest of the six, had served the Sarkar with singleness of purpose, by undergoing much trouble and risk. It contains no conditions or provisions with reference to the management or the partition of the village. The confirmatory grant is similar. As a fact, however, it would seem that the village was entered in the name of Chinto and that he managed it for the co-sharers. He appears to have been the most active and energetic member of the family. The sons of Vithal were joint at the date of the grant, but subsequently became separate in estate. They did not, however, when they separated, partition the village, but left it to be managed on their behalf by Chinto, who divided the produce of it between them. In 1777-78 the village was attacked by the Government of the day and remained under attachment until the year 1800. At the latter date Chinto was dead, but his adopted son Trimbak succeeded in getting the attachment removed. The takid ordering its removal, dated 14th November, 1800, directs that the inam of the village should be continued as before to Trimbak Chinto. The Subordinate Judge treats this order as in the nature of a fresh grant after a forfeiture, but it is in terms simply an order releasing the village from attachment, and it has not been contended before us that it is of a different character. When the attachment was removed, the village was held as before under the terms of the original grant. (His Lordship then examined the further evidence in the case and continued.)

The management of the villages has continued since 1830 with the family of Vaman and is now in the hands of his son Vinayak.

From the long continuance of the management in Chinto's branch of the family, coupled with the terms of the documents to which we have referred, we are asked to draw the inference that by the custom of the family the village of Abire is impartible and that the management of it rests, of right, with Chinto's branch. It appears to us, however, that the documents emanating from the ruling Power, subsequent to the original grant, were not intended to have the effect of varying the terms of that grant, but that, recognizing its validity, they provide for the continuance of the enjoyment of the villages in accordance with its terms, and that when they recognize Chinto's branch as in the management of the villages, they recognize merely the actual mode of management which the grantees had adopted. When we look to the documents which passed between the members of the family themselves we see that that mode of management was adopted for family convenience and rested upon agreement. The terms of the yadis of 1820 and 1830 appear to us to be conclusive upon this point. The presumption then arises that the management confined to Vaman in 1830 by the agreement of that year continued with him and his sons upon the same terms until now. Neither, therefore, by the terms of the original grant nor of the subsequent orders of the ruling Power, nor by family custom, nor by adverse possession (if such there could be in a case like this), has Chinto's branch of the family, it appears to us, acquired a right to perpetual management of the village of Abire or in consequence to resist its partition.

The cash allowance stands upon the same footing, save that, as it is paid by Government, and the Court cannot direct Government in what manner they are to pay it—a matter which is entirely in their option—no direction for its partition can be made by this Court; the Court can only declare that as between the several parties entitled to the allowance no right to recover it in the first instance has been established by the defendant Vaman, and that the several co-sharers are entitled to receive it in proportion to their shares.

The decree of the lower Court must, for these reasons, be reversed and a decree made for a partition and declaration in accordance with this judgment. The costs will be awarded as provided in the decree.

Decree reversed.

[463] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parsons.

YELAPPAPA (Original Defendant No. 2), Appellant v. RAMCHANDRA AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents.*

[9th January, 1896.]

Execution—Execution sale—Sale in execution of decree already satisfied.—Bona fide purchaser at such sale—Right of such purchaser.

Where a person, a stranger to the proceedings, purchases property bona fide at an auction sale held in execution of a decree, the sale to him cannot be set aside on the ground that the decree had already been satisfied out of the Court at the time the sale was held.

Rowa Malton v. Ram Kishen (1) and Mohur Mahun v. Akhey Kumar (2) followed.

SECOND appeal from the decision of J. B. Alcock, District Judge of Sholapur-Bijapur, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb V. V. Tilak, Subordinate Judge of Bijapur.

Suit to set aside a sale in execution. In 1884 a decree was obtained by one Fulchand against Ramchandra and others (present respondents), and on the 20th July, 1886, in execution of that decree certain land was sold and was purchased by Yellappa (the appellant).

In the same year Ramchandra applied to set aside the sale, alleging that Fulchand’s decree had been satisfied and that Yellappa, the purchaser, had had full notice of the fact. The Court, however, refused to set aside the sale, but found that the decree had been satisfied, and ordered that the purchase-money paid by Yellappa should be paid to Ramchandra.

The plaintiffs (Ramchandra and others) thereupon brought this suit, praying that the sale to Yellappa might be set aside on repayment by them to Yellappa of his purchase-money.

The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, holding that although the decree had been satisfied, Yellappa was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the satisfaction of the decree.

[464] The plaintiffs appealed. The appellate Court following the ruling in Ganga Pershad v. Gopal Singh (3) reversed the decree, holding that a sale in execution of a decree by accident or mistake after the decree had been satisfied was of no effect. The Judge, therefore, directed that possession be restored to plaintiffs on their paying the amount of purhase-money to Yellappa. Yellappa preferred a second appeal.

Shamrao Vithal, for the appellant (defendant).—The Judge was wrong in holding that because the decree was satisfied out of Court, the Court sale in execution did not confer any right on us as purchasers. We purchased the property bona fide for value without notice of satisfaction of the decree. The Court sale was legal and we are entitled to hold the property—Mothura Mohun v. Akhoy Kumar (1); Rewa Mahton v. Ram Kishen (2).

Ganesh K. Deshmukh, for the respondents (plaintiffs).—The question is who is to suffer. We had satisfied the decree before the sale took place, and we contend that, therefore, the sale was inoperative and conferred no title on the purchaser—Ganga Parshad v. Gopal Singh (3); Pat Dasi v. Sharup Chand Mala (4).

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The case is, we think, concluded by authority later than the case upon which the District Judge has relied. The Privy Council in a case very analogous to the present has decided that where a person, a stranger to the proceedings, purchases property bona fide at an auction sale held in execution of a decree, his sale cannot be set aside on the ground that the existence of a cross decree rendered the sale in execution improper. "If the Court has jurisdiction," their Lordships say, "a purchaser is no more bound to inquire into the correctness of an order for execution than he is as to the correctness of the judgment upon which the execution issues"—Rewa Mahton v. Ram Kishen (2). In a case almost on all fours with the present, the Calcutta High Court followed the principle laid down by the Privy Council and applied it—Mothura Mohun v. Akhoy Kumar (1).

[465] In the case relied on by the District Court, fraud was alleged, and that possibly may distinguish it from the later case; but whether that be so or not, we consider that the latter was correctly decided, and must, therefore, follow it. We reverse the decree and restore that of the Subordinate Judge, with costs in both appellate Courts on respondents.

Decree reversed.

VYANKATESH CHIMAJI JOSHI AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. SAKHARAM DAJI GANPULE (Original Plaintiff), Respondent. 8 [8th January, 1896.]

Award—Deeere upon an award—Res judicata—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 13 and 522.

A judgment and decree passed in terms of an award under s. 522 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) constitute a res judicata.

Waseer Mahton v. Chuni Singh (1) followed.

[Appl. 2 O.C. 28 (33).]

SECOND appeal from the decision of A. S. Moriarty, Acting District Judge of Ratnagiri, in appeal No. 164 of 1894.

Plaintiff alleged that he was a pujari of the shrine of Parshuram near Chipuln and that the defendant was the manager of the shrine; that as such manager the defendant had to make certain payments to the family to which he (the plaintiff) belonged; and that he (the plaintiff) was entitled to a share of such payments; that in 1892 he had brought a suit (No. 232 of 1892) against the defendant to recover the share due to him for the years 1889—1892 and that that suit was referred to arbitration; and that by the award made he was held entitled to his share; that the award was duly filed in Court and a decree (No. 232 of 1892) passed in accordance therewith.

He now sued for his share for the years 1891—1893.

[466] The defendant contended that the decree (No. 232 of 1892) passed upon the award was not conclusive of the plaintiff's right.

The Joint Subordinate Judge of Chipuln held that the judgment of 1892, which affirmed plaintiff's right, was conclusive and binding upon the defendants. He, therefore, passed a decree for the plaintiff.

On appeal the District Judge of Ratnagiri confirmed the decree.

Defendants preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Daji Abaji Khare, for the appellants.—The judgment in the suit of 1892 does not operate as a res judicata. A judgment can be only treated as res judicata when it is the decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction. An arbitrator is not a Court of competent jurisdiction; his jurisdiction is limited to the decision of the particular matter referred to him. Further, the award dealt only with the claim for certain specified years. It cannot be a bar to all inquiry as to other years. The case of Waseer Mahton v. Chuni Singh (1) will be cited against us, but see the later case of Keshava v. Rudran (2); Jenkins v. Robertson (3) was a case of a consent decree.

Ganesh Krishna Deshmukk, for the respondent (plaintiff).—Jenkins v. Robertson (3) has been explained in In re South American and Mexican Company; Ex parte Bank of England (4). I rely upon Waseer Mahton v. Chuni Singh (1).

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The chief question argued is whether a judgment and decree of a Court passed under s. 522 of the Code of Civil Procedure according to an award can constitute a res judicata as held in Waseer Mahon v. Chuni Singh (1), a case on the Code of 1859. Perhaps some doubt is thrown on that decision by the view taken by Turner, C. J., and Kindersley, J., in Keshava v. Rudran (2), where a decree passed upon the oath of a party under ss. 9 and 11 of the Indian Oaths Act was held not to create the estoppel, Jenkins v. Robertson (3) being cited to show [487] that there was no judicium. The same case has been relied on by Mr. Khare. It differs from a reference to arbitration under Chap. XXXVII of our Code, inasmuch as there was no such reference of the matters in dispute, but, as observed by the Lord Chancellor in his judgment, "the interlocutor in the former action having been the result of a compromise between the parties, it cannot be considered as a judicium: nor can it be admitted as res judicata." The case is explained by Vaughan Williams, J., in In re South American and Mexican Company, Ex parte Bank of England (4), as no decision whatever upon the general law. In the appeal from that learned Judge, Lord Herschell, L. C., and Lindley, L. J., held that a judgment by consent cannot be re-opened. Per the Lord Chancellor (p. 50): "The truth is that a judgment by consent is intened to put an end to litigation between the parties just as much as a judgment which results from the decision of the Court after the matter has been fought to the end." A fortiori a judgment and decree passed after solemn investigation by arbitrators on the award may constitute res judicata. We are, therefore, of opinion that Waseer Mahon v. Chuni Singh(1) should be followed, and we confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

KRISHNAJI NARASINVA KARANDIKAR (Original Defendant No. 1), Appellant v. KRISHNAJI NARAYAN JOSHI (Original Plaintiff), Respondents.* [10th January, 1896.]

Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880), ss. 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22 and 23—Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), ss. 108 and 110—Khot—Privileged occupant—Dharekari—Entry made by Survey Officer—Conclusive and final evidence—Entry specifying the amount and nature of rent.

Under the Khoti Act (Bombay Act I of 1880) it is only an entry of the Survey Officer specifying the nature and amount of rent payable to the khot by a privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33 in a record made under s. 17 that is declared to be final and conclusive evidence.

[487] An entry of a Survey Officer specifying that an occupant, who was found to be not a dharekari or privileged occupant, should pay assessment and local fund cess only for the lands in his possession is not conclusive and final evidence under the Khoti Act, s. 31 declaring such decision binding only on the parties until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Rao Sahib K. N. Patankar, Subordinate Judge of Dapoli.

The plaintiff sued to recover that (customary rent in kind), alleging that he was the managing khot and the defendants were tenants of the lands in question.

The first defendant alleged that the lands were his dhara and that no that was payable in respect of them; that the plaintiff was only entitled to Government assessment and local cess, with had been duly tendered to him but was refused.

He relied on a copy of an order dated 24th September, 1887, made by the Special Assistant Collector and Settlement Officer, which stated that he had looked into this matter and found that though the land was khoti and not dhara, it was not shown that the khoti sharers had been in the habit of receiving customary rent from this land and so it was decided that defendant No. 1 should pay survey assessment and the local fund in respect of these lands.

The Subordinate Judge found that the lands were not defendants' dhara and that the plaintiff was not restricted only to Government and local cess. But he allowed the claim partially because notice demanding the that according to abhavanis (apportionment of crops) was not proved by plaintiff to have been served on the defendant.

The following is an extract of the Subordinate Judge's judgment:

"Defendant Krishna seems to rely principally upon the special Officer's decision (Ex. 21) declaring that he is liable to pay only assessment and local cess. This officer, however, holds the lands to be khoti. The dues on khoti lands are regulated by s. 33 of the Khoti Act. In the present case an agreement is not even alleged. The Special Survey Officer had, therefore, no power to fix an invariable amount. He could, at the best, fix a certain proportion of the actual yield. This he has not done. His decision is against the provisions of the Khoti Act, and must, therefore, be treated as a nullity."

On appeals by both the parties the Judge confirmed the decree. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"Exhibit 21 is the decision of the Settlement Officer, dated 24th September 1887, that the land is khoti, and that Government assessment and local fund are leviable from the tenant. Defendant No. 1 in this case is admittedly a privileged occupant, as this entry specifies the nature and amount of rent payable; it would have been conclusive under s. 17 of the Khoti Act, if it had been 'duly made' according to s. 33. Unfortunately it has not been duly so made, as that section requires the rest of an occupancy tenant to be fixed at a share of the gross produce, and on the face of the order, this has not been done. In other cases, a suit is expressly allowed and provided for by s. 22."

Defendant No. 1 preferred a second appeal.

Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar for Daji Abaji Khare appeared for the appellant (defendant No. 1).

Ganesh K. Deshmukh, appeared for the respondent (plaintiff).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—Both the lower Courts have found that the land in suit is not the defendant’s dhara land, and we see no reason to hold that that finding is wrong.
The only other point argued before us is, in our opinion, quite untenable. It is that the entry of the Survey Officer specifying that the defendant shall pay assessment and local fund cess for the lands in suit is conclusive and final evidence. Under the Khoti Act, it is only an entry specifying the nature and amount of rent payable to the khoti by a privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33, in a record made under s. 17, that is declared to be final and conclusive evidence. Here the defendant is not a privileged occupant, for he is found not to be the dharekari which he had claimed to be, and he does not claim to be an occupancy tenant. His real status is that of a sharer in the khotki of the village, which admittedly is undivided, and the land is khoti land. The dispute now is only as to what rent he has to pay for the land. Plaintiff claims that, i.e., a share of the produce. The Survey Officer has decided that he should pay the survey assessment and local fund cess. It is not stated under what provision of law that decision was passed; but having regard to the status of the defendant and the tenure on which he holds the land, it is clear that it could only be passed under s. 18 of the Khoti Act (Bombay Act I of 1880). Nowhere in the Act is finality given to the entry of such a decision as evidence. On the contrary in s. 21 the decision is declared binding only on the parties until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court; in other words, the point at issue is one that can be tried and determined on evidence by a Civil Court, as has been done in the present case. The question is purely one of fact to be determined by the custom and practice found to prevail among the co-sharers in the khotki. The lower Courts agree that the defendant is bound to pay that. No error of law is shown in this decision and it is one binding on us in second appeal. We, therefore, confirm the decree with costs.

CANDY, J.—Plaintiff as managing khot of Shirkhal for the years 1888-89 and 1839 90 sued defendants for that rent due on their lands for those years. Defendant Krishnaji contended (inter alia) that the lands are his dhara, that he himself is a khot, and so that cannot be claimed from him, and that he had tendered the Government assessment and local cess which was all that was due from him.

At the trial defendant Krishnaji relied on Ex. 21, which purports to be a copy of an order of the Special Assistant Collector and Settlement Officer dated 24th September, 1887, and addressed to the Huzur Deputy Collector, reciting that Krishnaji had applied to him that his lands at Shirkhal which had been entered as khoti should be entered as dhara, that he (the Special Officer) had called for the papers and looked into the case, and found that though the land was khoti and not dhara, it was not shown that the khot sharers had been in the habit of receiving the customary rent from this land, and so it was decided that Krishnaji should pay the survey assessment and the local fund in respect of the land standing in his khata.

The Subordinate Judge held that this decision being against the provisions of the Khoti Act must be treated as a nullity. He further held that the land was Khoti and not dhara, and that plaintiff was entitled to demand the customary rent. The Subordinate Judge referred to a decree of the Civil Court awarding customary rent for this land. [The Special Officer had also (Ex. 21) alluded to two decrees of the Civil Court, but remarked that they were subsequent to the passing of the Khoti Act.]
Both sides appealed to the District Court, plaintiff on the ground that the full rent had not been awarded (this appeal requires no further consideration); and defendant Krishnaji on the ground that the land was his dhara, and in any case he as a khotar sharer was not liable to pay that.

The Assistant Judge found that the decision of the Special Officer would have been conclusive under s. 17 of the Khoti Act I of 1880 if duly made according to s. 33 of the Act. "Unfortunately it has not been duly so made, as that section requires the rent of an occupancy tenant to be fixed at a share of the gross produce, and on the face of the order this has not been done."

The Assistant Judge also held that Krishnaji was barred by previous decrees from pleading that the land was his dhara. He confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge.

Krishnaji has now made a second appeal to this Court, and his plender Mr. D. A. Khare contended that the Court cannot award more than the survey assessment and local fund cess as fixed by the Special Officer, and that the former decrees of the Civil Court are no bar to such award; while for plaintiff Mr. Deshmukh argued that it is directly contrary to the Khoti Act to hold that an occupancy tenant can pay survey assessment and local cess, and Krishnaji’s contention that he is a dharekari shows that there could not have been any agreement between himself as an occupancy tenant and the managing khot to pay as rent a fixed amount in money.

In answer to our request that he would furnish us with an “extract from the revenue records showing how the numbers in question are entered in the records under s. 16 of Bombay Act I of 1880, viz., as to the nature of the tenure and the nature and amount of rent,” the Collector of Ratnagiri has furnished us with a true extract from the “botkhāt” of the village in question showing the entries made against the fields now in dispute. Column 5 is “description, that is, inam, or khalasa, dhara or khoti,” and the entry is “old khoti tenant.” Under the columns relating [472] to the “amount (akur) to be paid according to the survey” we find certain amounts in cash, and in the last column there is an entry signed by Govind Atmaram Karkun, dated 14th January, 1888, recapitulating the order No. 167 dated 24th September, 1867, from Mr. Cumine to the Deputy Collector (that must be Ex. 21 alluded to above), to the effect that the regular assessment under the survey and the local fund cess should be taken from the khataudar in question.

Thus the point for consideration is whether the above entry is under s. 17 of Bombay Act I of 1880 conclusive and final evidence of the liability of Krishnaji Narisinha Karandikar to pay in respect of the lands in suit the survey assessment and local fund cess only. If it is, then according to the decision of Sargent, C.J., and Bayley, J., in Gopal Krishna Parachure v. Sakhojirao(1), any other evidence on the subject which might be adduced before the Civil Court is shut out, and, apart from the question as to any previous decrees of competent Courts on the point at issue, this Court would be bound to reverse the decisions of the Subordinate and Assistant Judges and award to the plaintiff not a share of the produce, but the survey assessment and local fund cess only.

Part III of Bombay Act I of 1880 lays down certain provisions which are to be carried out when a survey settlement of a khoti village is made or revised under Ch. VIII of the Land Revenue Code. By s. 16 the-

... "settlement register," which under s. 108 of the Land Revenue Code must show the area and assessment of each survey number together with the name of the registered occupant, must in the case of khoti villages also show whether such survey number is held by a "privileged occupant" or not, and if it is so held, then the tenure on which such number is held must be specified, i.e., whether the holder is a dharekari or quasi-dharekari or an occupancy tenant, and if the last named, whether his interest is transferable otherwise than by inheritance or not. Section 108 of the Land Revenue Code also refers to "other records" which must be prepared by the Survey Officer on the occasion of making or revising a settlement of land revenue. These "other records" are to be in accordance with [473] such orders as may from time to time be made on their behalf by Government; and by s. 17 of Bombay Act I of 1880 they must specify the nature and amount of rent payable to the khot by each privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33 of the Act (Bombay I of 1880), "and any entry in any record duly made under this section shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established." It will be noticed that, in order to make the entry conclusive, it must be duly made under s. 17, and no entry will be duly made under s. 17 unless it is an entry in one of the "other records" prepared by the Survey Officer; and unless it specifies the nature and amount of rent payable to the khot by the privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33 of the same Act. This s. 33 is to be found in Part IV of the Act, which is headed "Administration of survey settlements made under this Act," whereas Part III deals with what takes place at the introduction of a survey settlement (new or revised).

Section 33 lays down what rents shall be payable to the khot by privileged occupants, viz.:—

(a) by a dharekari, the survey assessment of his land;
(b) by a quasi-dharekari, the same with a certain addition.
(c) by an occupancy tenant, in the absence of or at the expiration of the term of any agreement for a fixed amount in money or in kind, such share of the gross annual produce of the tenant's land as the Survey Officer who frames the survey record shall determine to be the customary amount hitherto paid by occupancy tenants in the village in which the said land is situate.

It is thus evident that an entry of the nature and amount of rent payable by an occupancy tenant in order to be conclusive under s. 17, must duly show under s. 33 either that the rent so specified is the customary rent of the village, or that it is a fixed amount in money or in kind agreed upon between the khot and the said occupancy tenant either before or at the time of the framing of the survey record. Of course it may happen that years after the framing of the survey record, which takes place at the introduction of the new or revised survey settlement, an occupancy tenant, who has hitherto paid merely the customary rent to his khot, may agree with his khot to pay him in future or for a stipulated term a fixed amount in money or in kind. Such fixed amount will then under s. 33 be the rent payable by that occupancy tenant to his khot; and it will not be the less so because it is not found in the survey record which is framed at the introduction of the survey settlement (new or revised). It is the duty (s. 108, Land Revenue Code) of the Survey Officer on the occasion of making or revising a settlement of land revenue to prepare other records (besides the "settlement register"), which under s. 17 of Bombay Act I of 1880 must specify the nature and amount of rent payable to the khot by each occupancy tenant. That can only mean the amount of rent so payable at the time of framing the record. There is no provision in Bombay Act I of 1880 for the subsequent amendment of any entry in the survey record specifying the nature and amount of rent payable by an occupancy tenant. In s. 110, Land Revenue Code, a distinction is drawn between the settlement register and other records prepared by the survey officer, and the village records and accounts prepared in accordance with the settlement register and other records.
All changes that may take place are to be registered in the village records and accounts. It is necessary to call attention to this distinction between the survey records which under the Land Revenue Code cannot be altered, and the village records in which changes must be registered, because when we come shortly to consider the provisions of ss. 21 and 22 of Bombay Act I of 1880, it will be seen that the only record which is to be binding upon all the parties affected thereby is the survey record, not the village record, and the only amendment of a survey record which is permitted by that Act is one that is not applicable to the specification of the nature and amount of rent payable by any occupancy tenant. No inconvenience can thereby arise. The fact that when the survey record was framed there was no agreement between the khot and the occupancy tenant for a fixed amount in money or in kind, and so there was no entry of any such agreement, will not prevent any such subsequent agreement being given effect to; and in any subsequent suit for rent either the khot or the occupancy tenant can rely on an alleged agreement, and the entry merely in the survey record of the customary rent [475] payable in that village will not invalidate any agreement which came into existence, it may be, many years after that survey record was framed. It is necessary to emphasize this point, because so far as s. 33 is concerned there is no allusion to the decision of the Survey Officer, or of any other officer, beyond the determination arrived at by the Survey Officer when framing the survey record as to what is the customary rent of the village. The section provides that an occupancy tenant shall pay that rent, unless there is an agreement between the khot and the occupacy tenant to pay a fixed amount in money or in kind. Section 33 does not deal with the question as to who is to determine whether there is any agreement for a fixed amount in money or in kind. It merely provides that the occupancy tenant shall pay such fixed amount when agreed upon; otherwise he shall pay the customary rent of the village as determined by the Survey Officer when framing the survey record.

Coming back to Part III, the next sections to be considered are ss. 18 and 19, which provide that whether the khotki is undivided or divided, the co-sharers' respective rights shall be specified in the said records (i.e., the other records prepared under s. 108, Land Revenue Code). It is necessary to emphasize the important distinction between ss. 17 and 18.
By the latter section the Survey Officer is to enter in the records the rent payable by each co-sharer on account of the survey numbers in his possession. There is no mention of any section, like s. 33 with regard to privileged occupants, laying down what that rent should be. So far as the provisions of the Act are concerned, the Survey Officer is entrusted with the duty of ascertaining or determining the amount of rent payable by each cosharer, and there is no mention of the entry made by the Survey Officer being conclusive.

Next we come to ss. 20 to 22, which are headed "determination of disputes." Section 20 provides that the Survey Officer, who frames the said register (s. 16) or other record (ss. 17 to 19), may investigate and determine any dispute as to any matter which he is bound to record, viz., the matters referred to in (ss. 16 to 19) and he may frame the said register or other record accordingly. He is not apparently bound to determine [478] such dispute. He may do so; he may apparently refer the parties to the Civil Court. But if he does determine the dispute, then his decision under s. 21 "when not final shall be binding upon all the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court," and (s. 22) "the record shall from time to time be amended by the said Survey Officer, or when the survey settlement is concluded by the Collector in accordance with any such decree as aforesaid." Thus the only amendment contemplated of any entry in "the register or other record" is one made in accordance with a decree of a competent Court; and that only when the decision of the Survey Officer is "not final.
When the decision of the Survey Officer is "final," then apparently no one can amend the record. The entry once made stands good. It has been held in the case quoted above that "the words 'when not final' can only properly refer to the finality ascribed in s. 17 to the entries of the nature therein mentioned and which follow as contemplated by s. 20 on the Survey Officer arriving at his decision." That decision must be as to the nature and amount of rent paid by the privileged occupant. If either the khot or the privileged occupant wishes to contest the specification of the tenure made by the Survey Officer on the occasion of making or revising a settlement of land revenue in "the settlement register" (s. 108, Land Revenue Code, 1879 and s. 16, Bombay Act I of 1880), then he can obtain a final decree of a competent Court, and call on the Survey Officer, or if the settlement is concluded on the Collector, to amend the register in accordance with that decree.

Coming now to the facts of the present case, and applying the provisions of the law as shown above, the first point to be noticed is that the Collector was asked to furnish the Court with an extract from the revenue records showing how the survey numbers in question are entered in the records under ss. 16 and 17 of Bombay Act I of 1880. The Collector in reply has forwarded "the extract called for." This is one record only, viz., an extract from the "botkhat" of the village in question for the year 1879. Now it is clear from Nairne's Hand-book (3rd Ed., p. 141) that the "botkhat," or detailed record of each holding, is one of the "other survey records" prepared by the Survey Officer under [477] s. 108, Land Revenue Code. A copy of this record according to the orders of Government quoted in the Hand-book is to be given to the khot. Further, it is clear that from this copy furnished to the khot the latter provides and keeps the appraisement register, which also is termed "botkhat"—see notification No. 1659, Bombay Government Gazette, 1882, Part I, pages 263 to 275, Rules VI and VII under cl. (e) of s. 40 of Bombay Act I of 1880 (pages 573 to 593 of the General Rules in force in the Revenue Department); and it is evident that this latter record is a "village record," no doubt based on the survey record, but not identical with the survey record which is framed by the Survey officer. The extract furnished by the Collector in the present case would seem to be an extract from the village botkhat, and not an extract from the original "survey record" framed by the Survey Officer.

Assuming, however, that it is an extract from the survey record, the next point to be noticed is that it purports to have been prepared in 1879.
Now it is well known that between 1876 and 1880 the present survey settlement was introduced into the Ratnagiri District, the principles of that settlement being subsequently legalized by Bombay Act I of 1880. (See Bombay Gazetteer, Volume X, pages 255 to 257.) If the settlement was introduced into the village in question in 1879, it is difficult to see how a Settlement Officer could in 1887 make an entry in one of the survey records framed at the introduction of the survey. In connection with this point it is necessary to call attention to the fact that Krishnaji in his application to the Special Assistant Collector and Settlement Officer (see Ex. 21) stated that the land in question had been entered as khoti at the time of the "rozuvat." This "rozuvat" is the review of the khots and villagers in whose presence the Survey Officer frames the register and other records. (See Gazetteer, idem, p. 256.) It would thus appear that the register and other records had been already prepared; and if so, the only way, in which the entries when not final could, after Bombay Act I of 1880 become law, be altered, was by the final decree of a competent Court.

Assuming, however, that the Special Assistant Collector and Settlement Officer in 1887 was really framing the register under [478] s. 2o of Bombay Act I of 1880, can it be said that his proceedings were according to law? It appeared to him that there existed a dispute as to a matter which he was bound to record, the dispute being, as Krishnaji said, whether the land in question was khoti or dhara. Mr. Cumine hold that the land was khoti and not dhara; and presumably the entry specifying the tenure in the "settlement register" as khoti was made, or if made was allowed to stand.

But the Survey Officer was also bound to specify in other survey records the nature and amount payable by Krishnaji according to the provisions of s. 33 of the act. Krishnaji being an "occupancy tenant," —that is the position asserted for him by his pleader in this Court on the strength of the entry in the botkhut, "Khoti june kul,"—would according to s. 33 of the Act, in the absence of any agreement to pay a fixed amount whether in money or in kind, pay the customary rents of the village. Apparently there was no dispute as to the existence or non-existence of any such agreement. But Mr. Cumine went on to hold that, as the khoti sharers had not proved that they had received the customary share of the produce from Krishnaji, who was also a khoti sharer, "it is, therefore, decided that the applicant should pay the survey assessment and the local fund."

Now it is quite possible that Krishnaji, though a khoti sharer, is still an occupancy tenant of the particular lands in question. "Khoti june kul" may mean that the land was khoti and had originally been held by old tenants, but had lapsed to the khots, who instead of throwing it into the khoti khasgi had allowed Krishnaji's family to hold it as occupancy tenants. The original entry in the settlement register, specifying the tenure, &c., which is binding on all the parties until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court, has not been produced. But assuming, as is contended by Krishnaji's pleader here, that Krishnaji is an occupancy tenant of these lands, then clearly there has been no decision of the Survey Officer that as between the khot and the occupancy tenant there is an existing agreement that the latter shall pay the former a fixed amount, whether in money or in kind, in place of the ordinary customary rents of the village. No such agreement was pleaded or found proved. The [478] Settlement officer decided that Krishnaji should pay the survey assessment and local fund; but he had no power to pass such a decision. Section 36 prevented him from directing an occupancy tenant to pay local fund cess, and s. 33 prevented him from determining more than the customary rents of the village, and the existence or non-existence of any agreement between the khot and an occupancy tenant to pay a fixed amount of rent. Mr. Cumine’s decision does not purport to find the existence of any such agreement.

Regarding the case from the other point of view, and holding Krishnaji to be not an occupancy tenant, but a khoti sharer holding land, which had been originally occupied by old khoti tenants, but which had lapsed to the khoti co-parcenary, then according to Rules III of the Rules under cl. (e) of s. 40 of Bombay Act I of 1850 (Notification No. 1659, Bombay Government Gazette, 1882, Part I, pp. 262 to 275), “the rent payable to the managing khot by khoti sharers for their private khoti land shall be the customary rates of the village for occupancy tenants, unless it is proved that before 1865 khoti sharers paid a makta or a lower rate of that, in which case the ancient practice shall be followed.”

It will be noticed that the onus is by this rule put on the khoti sharers who are holding the land in question and not on the managing khot. The former have to prove that before 1865 they paid a makta (i.e., fixed amount whether in money or in kind) or a lower rate of that than the customary rates of the village. In default of such proof they must pay the ordinary customary rates. But Mr. Cumine held that, in default of proof that customary rates had been paid, Krishnaji should pay survey assessment and local fund cess. Thus his decision was directly contrary to the rules framed by Government under the Act.

Again, apart from the rule above noted, it is admitted before us in the present case that the khotki is undivided. If so, then under s. 18 the Survey Officer was bound to specify in the “other records” the survey numbers in the possession of each co-sharer, and the rent payable by such co-sharer on account of the same. But it is nowhere stated in the Act that such entry [480] shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established. Here we have the finding of fact of both the lower Courts that the land is not Krishnaji’s dhara. Prima facie, then, he must pay that for the same. It is for him to establish an exemption from that. He can only point to the Settlement Officer’s decision of 1887, which by itself is found to be valueless. No other reason is given why Krishnaji should not pay that for the lands in suit. I, therefore, concur in upholding the decree of the Assistant Judge.

Decree confirmed.
ANTAJI KASHINATH (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. ANTAJI MADHAV BHAVE AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.*

[23rd January, 1896.]

Khoti Settlement Act (Bom. Act I of 1880), ss. 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 29, 33 and 40—Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), s. 108—Decision of Survey Officer as to tenure—Reversal or modification of the decision by a competent Court.

The decision of a Survey Officer determining the tenure on which a survey number is held is not final under the Khoti Act (Bombay Act I of 1880), and it can be reversed or modified by a competent Court.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Walker, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri, confirming the decree of Ruo Sahib S. M. Karandikar Subordinate Judge of Devrukh.

Plaintiffs sued for a declaration that certain lands in their occupation were held by them on dhara tenure, complaining that the Special Survey Officer had entered them as khoti lands.

The defendants contended (inter alia) that the lands were not plaintiffs' dhara and that the claim was time-barred.

The Subordinate Judge found that the lands were not plaintiffs' dhara and that the claim for declaration was time-barred, [481] the suit not having been brought within one year under art. 14, sub. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) from the date of the Special Survey Officer's entry.

On appeal by the plaintiffs the Judge raised the issue—"whether the land is plaintiffs' dhara."

But without recording any finding on this issue the Judge confirmed the decree, observing as follows:—

"Respondents' pleader has produced in this Court the decision of the Settlement Officer fixing plaintiffs' liability, which of course is final under s. 17 of the Khoti Act. This shows that plaintiff has to pay that; and I had expected that, in view of this order it would have been thought unnecessary to press the appeal. Appellant, however, urges that the rights of a dharekari are transferable and heritable, while those of an occupant tenant are heritable, but not necessarily transferable. This is all very well, but plaintiff does not really want any such declaration. In face of the Settlement Officer's decision (Ex. No. 11 in appeal), I could not give him a simple declaration such as he seeks, as he would at once claim to pay only Government assessment. If he wants merely a declaration that his rights are alienable, there is no cause of action; and this is the first instance, in my experience, that anybody wishing to transfer his rights, first sued for a declaration that he might legally do so. The usual practice is to sell them first and let the purchaser settle matters as best he can."

Plaintiff No. 2 preferred a second appeal.

Nagindas T. Marphatia, for the appellant (plaintiff No. 2).

Ganesh K. Deshamukh, for the respondents (defendants).

* Second Appeal No. 859 of 1899.
The case came on for hearing before a Division Bench composed of Parsons and Candy, JJ.

PARSONS, J.—Plaintiffs sued for a declaration that certain thikaus in their occupation were held by them on the dhara tenure. The first Court found against them on the point. The plaintiffs appealed, and the appellate Court raised the issue whether the land was plaintiffs' dhara. The Assistant Judge recorded, however, no finding on this issue. He said that the decision of the Settlement Officer fixing plaintiffs' liability, which of course was final under s. 17 of the Khoti Act, showed that the plaintiffs had to pay that and that after that he should have thought that it was unnecessary to press the appeal. After a few other remarks as to the suit he rejected the appeal with costs.

A finding on the issue raised cannot, however, be avoided in this way. The plaintiffs are entitled to a decision as to the tenure on which they hold their land. The Survey Officer classing the plaintiffs under the designation of occupancy tenants has declared them liable to pay that. The plaintiffs object to that designation of their tenure and claim to be dharkeris.

The first point, therefore, that arises is as to the finality of this decision of the Survey Officer on the question of tenure, for, if that decision is final, it is fatal to the claim. We think there can be no doubt that the decision is not final. (See Faki Ghulam Mohidin v. Sajnak(1).) Section 21 of the Khoti Act provides that the decision of a Survey Officer when not final shall be binding upon all the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court. It thus distinctly assumes the power of a Court to reverse or modify all decisions of a Survey Officer other than final ones. The only section of the Act relied on as declaring finality in the present case is s. 17. It says that any entry in any record duly made under this section shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established. The record here alluded to is one of the other records prepared under s. 108 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and which under s. 17 of the Khoti Act are to specify the nature and the amount of rent payable to the khot by each privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33. Section 108 itself merely says that the other records are those that are prepared in accordance with such orders as may from time to time be made on this behalf by Government. There is not a word so far in any of these sections as to an entry of the tenure on which the land is held, and this must be so because that entry is not to be made in the other records, neither does it form a subject of determination under s. 33 of the Khoti Act. It is the settlement register which shows the tenure. That record has to be prepared under s. 108 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and shows the particulars specified in that section and also those specified in s. 16 of the Khoti Act, one of the latter being the tenure on which the number is held. It is thus, we think, quite clear that the decision of the Survey Officer as to a tenure affects an entry in the survey register itself, which is nowhere declared final in the Khoti Act, and which can, therefore, be reversed or modified by a decree of a competent Court. As, however, the ruling of a Division Bench of this Court in Ramchandra v. Makundesh (2) is directly opposed to this opinion of ours and to the opinion of this Court in

Is the decision of a Survey Officer determining the tenure on which a survey number is held final under the Khoti Act, or can it be reversed or modified by a competent Court?

The case being thus referred, it was fixed for argument before a Full Bench consisting of Farren, C.J., Jardine, Parsons, Candy and Ranade, JJ. Nagundas T. Marphatia, for the appellant (plaintiff No. 2).—We submit that the decision of the Settlement Officer is not final and is liable to be modified or reversed by a competent Civil Court. There is no dispute that before the Khoti Settlement Act came into force, Civil Courts had jurisdiction to interfere with such decisions. Therefore, in order to exclude the jurisdiction of Civil Courts, the language of the enactment under which it is contended that Civil Courts have no jurisdiction must be clear and unambiguous—Maxwell on Statutes, p. 152. The Khoti Settlement Act is a Revenue Act. The Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876) contemplates that in petty matters Civil Courts should not interfere, but in matters of importance they can. See s. 4(b) and 5(b) of the Act.

The word entry only occurs in s. 17 the Khoti Settlement Act. It does not occur in either s. 21 or in s. 33 which is incorporated with s. 17. Section 33 deals with rent only and not with tenure. The finality mentioned in s. 17 is as to nature and amount of rent and not as to the tenure. This conclusion is inevitable when ss. 17, 21 and 33 are read together—Fakir Ghulam Mohidin v. Saunak (1). The case of Ramchandra v. Mukundshet (2) is against us. We submit that the ruling in that case is not correct.

Ganesh K. Deshmukh, for the respondents (defendants).—The Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876) has no [484] application to the present case. It deals with disputes with Government: see s. 4 of the Act. In the present case the question turns upon the construction of s. 17 of the Khoti Settlement Act. The word “nature” in the section has reference to the tenure with respect to which the rent is to be paid and not to rent. Section 17 has reference to s. 33. Section 17 gives finality to certain entries, and all other entries are to be dealt with under s. 21. Section 20 of the Act empowers the Settlement Officer to determine disputes summarily. Section 16 provides for the determination of the tenure and for its entry in the settlement register. We submit that these sections show that s. 17 makes the entry as to tenure final.

We submit that under that section the entry in the settlement register would become final. The expression “other records” in the section may mean the addition of any columns to the settlement register. Under s. 33 of the Act, the rent in the case of a dharekari is rent fixed by the Act, and there is no discretion left in the Settlement Officer in connection with it. He has a discretion in the case contemplated by paragraph 2, cl. (e) of the section.

[Parsons, J.—Do you exclude the case of a disputed agreement from s. 33 ?]

Yes. Our argument is not affected by s. 20 of the Act which relates to disputes. Section 17 has reference to the first three cases mentioned

(1) 18 B. 244. (2) P. J. (1895), p. 145.
in s. 33. We submit that the word "nature" relates to tenure and the word "amount" relates to the quantity of rent. The word "nature" does not apply to rent, because whether the rent is in cash or kind, its nature is not changed. There may be a change in the form or manner of rent, but there can be no change in its nature. The rent in the case of a sharekari is fixed, and to such rent the word "nature" cannot be applied. Further, if the entry with respect to tenure is interfered with by civil Courts, the interference would affect the rent also, and thus the entry as to tenure would virtually make a change in the rent which the civil Courts have no jurisdiction to do under s. 22 of the Act.

[PARSONS, J.—The Collector has the right to change the entry as to rent.]

The Collector would then have to make a new settlement, which he is not empowered by the Act to do.

In Rambhadrav v. Mukundshet (1) it seems it was presumed that the entry as to tenure was final. The decision in Fakir Ghulam Mohidin v. Sajnaj (2) is not a ruling directly on the point arising in the present case.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The question for our determination is, as stated by the referring Court, "Is the decision of a Survey Officer determining the tenure on which a survey number is held, final under the Khoti Act or can it be reversed or modified by a competent Court?" It is admitted that it would be open to the civil Courts to adjudicate upon such a question of tenure were it not for the provisions of the Act (Bombay Act I of 1880). It is, therefore, in the express words of that enactment or in the necessary implication arising from its general object and scope that the exclusion of the jurisdiction (if it exists) must be sought.

Now s. 20 of the Act provides that "if it shall appear to the Survey Officer who frames the said register or other record that there exists any dispute as to any matter which he is bound to record he may . . . investigate and determine such dispute and frame the said register or other record accordingly," and s. 21 provides that "in any such matter the decision of the Survey Officer when not final shall be binding upon all the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court." The scheme of the Act, it is apparent from this provision, is not to exclude all matters, which the Survey Officer is bound to record, and upon which there exists a dispute between the parties, from the cognizance of the civil Courts, but only such matters as these upon which his decision is final. We must, therefore, examine the several sections of the Act to see what "matters" which the Survey Officer is bound [486] to record are final. Section 11 enables a khoti to confer tenure rights upon his tenants; and by s. 12 upon his application the Collector is bound to make an entry upon the record of the grant of such rights. The latter section (12) provides that an entry duly made shall be conclusive proof of the facts therein recorded. In such case the determination of the tenure upon which a khoti tenant holds, is withdrawn from the cognizance of the Court, or, more correctly speaking, the Court is forbidden to go behind the entry made by the Collector and is concluded by it. We do not find any other section in which the jurisdiction of the Courts to consider entries

(1) P. J. (1896) p. 145.
(2) 18 B. 244.
is dealt with until we come to Part III of the Act. The earlier sections, (16, 17, 18 and 19) of that part are headed "Settlement Records."

Section 16 provides for the preparation of the "settlement register" under s. 108 of the "Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879," and the matters which it is to contain. They may be thus summarised:

(1) The area and assessment of each survey number. This is a matter dealt with by the Land Revenue Code.

(2) A statement whether it is held by a privileged occupant or not.

(3) In the event of its being so held, the tenure upon which it is held, the name of its registered occupant, and an entry as to whether his interest is transferable otherwise than by inheritance or not.

(4) A list of the co-sharers of the Khotki if there are such and the extent of each co-sharer's interest therein.

Passing over s. 17 for the moment we find s. 18 providing that the records shall specify the manner in which the possession of the village is held by the khot in the case of an undivided village and shall record agreements determinative of their responsibility inter se and as to the rotation of their management; while s. 19 provides for recording particulars of the interests of khot in divided villages. In none of these sections is there any provision dealing with, or in any way excluding, the ordinary jurisdiction of the Civil Courts to inquire into the correctness of the entries; and in the case of many, if not of most [487] of them, it appears to me that the Civil Courts might naturally be expected to have the power to do so, as many of them relate to questions of title and estate.

We now turn to s. 17. The entries to be made under this section in "the other records" are of a different character. They relate to the rent payable by the privileged occupants to the khot. The section enacts that "the other records prepared under the said section (108 of the Land Revenue Code) shall specify the nature and amount of rent payable to the khot by each privileged occupant according to the provisions of s. 33 of this Act and any entry in any record duly made under this section shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability thereby established," thus using words similar to those occurring in s. 12 and again in s. 29. They do not occur elsewhere in the Act. It has been decided, and as we all think correctly decided, that these words preclude the Courts from questioning the correctness of the survey officer's entries duly made under s. 33 as to the amount of rent payable by the several privileged occupants in respect of their holdings—Gopal Krishna Parachure v. Sakhajirav (1) and the subsequent cases which followed it. It has been argued before us that not only have they that operation, but also that they inferentially preclude the Courts from inquiring into the correctness of the entries as to tenure made under s. 16. I am unable to agree with that contention.
The nature of the tenure may be, and often is, a matter of much moment, independently of the question of rent altogether. Upon it depends (inter alia) the extent of the assignability of the occupants holding. Sections 9, 10 and 11 deal with this subject. There is, therefore, I think a strong a priori presumption against this contention. The specification of the nature of the rent has reference, I think, to the medium of the payment, whether it is to be made in cash or kind or both, and not to the tenure in respect of which it is payable. There is no essential distinction in the nature of the rent arising out of his tenure payable by a privileged occu-

(1) 18 B. 139.
It is in its amount and the medium in which it is paid in which the difference consists. Quit rent and rack rent are well-known expressions denoting [488] the sort of tenures in respect of which they are payable, but it would be impossible to distinguish between the rents payable by the several classes of khoti tenants unless by a statement of the tenure under which they hold; but that is a matter already provided for in s. 16.

The reversal of the decision of the Survey Officer as to the tenure upon which a particular survey number is held, may, doubtless in many cases necessitate an alteration in the entry as to rent payable in respect of that number. The finality of the rent entries is thus indirectly impaired. That must be so. Cessante ratione legis cessat et ipsa lex. The rent is fixed with reference to the tenure. It is upon the assumption that the tenure has been correctly determined and entered that the finality of the rent entries depends. The functions of the Court, however, cease, I think, when it has corrected the decision of the Survey Officer as to the tenure, and it is left to him to make under s. 22 all necessary and consequential amendments, if any are needed in the rental entry. If there is any difficulty in his doing so, Government can provide for it under s. 40 of the Act.

I answer the first branch of the question in the negative and the second branch of it in the affirmative.

PARSONS, J.—I concur. It is unnecessary for me to say more, as I have fully stated my opinion in the judgment referring the case.

JARDINE, J.—I concur. The particular question argued before this Bench was not raised in Ramchandra v. Mukundesh (1), or Ramchandra v. Rugnath (2), though an opinion was incidentally expressed. That question is, whether the entry describing the tenure of a privileged occupant is made under s. 17 of Bombay Act I of 1880. Now Bombay Act V of 1879, s. 108, requires a settlement register and other records to be kept. The settlement register is to show the area and assessment of each survey number and the name of the registered occupants. The latter Act in s. 16 alludes to this particular settlement register, repeats the requirement about area and assessment, and instead of that about the name of the registered occupant, [489] requires a statement whether the number is held by a privileged occupant or not, and if so, the tenure is to be specified and the registered occupant’s name. Where there is no privileged occupant the name of the khoti or sharer is to be entered: but the Act does not call these persons registered occupants. Perhaps the definition was abandoned in order to raise the privileged occupant to the position of highest owner, the khot being looked on as in a sort of way paramount, analogous to Government. The tenure is to be specified in this settlement register by virtue of s. 16. Is it also required in the other records to which s. 17 relates, in like manner as the amount in figures of survey assessment must find a place in both, in the register as survey assessment, in the other record as rent? This depends on the meaning of the requirement that the nature and amount of rent shall be specified in the other records. In s. 17 I take the words “according to the provisions of s. 33 of this Act” as an adverbial phrase modifying the word “payable,” not the word “specify.” I infer, therefore, that the specification need not include all the facts mentioned in s. 33 and the schedule annexed; it is confined to “the nature and amount.

(1) P. J. (1896), p. 145. (2) 20 B. 476.
of rent" payable under the statute. Mr. Deshmukh asked the Court to treat the vague word "nature" as equal to "nature of tenure;"
the word "amount" being wide enough to refer to rent of both sorts, in money or in kind, and I may add whether fixed or unfixed.
Mr. Nagindas argued that "nature" is a phrase meaning what the words "money or in kind" mean in s. 33. On the whole, I think the word "nature" does not refer to tenure, but to the natural history quality of the rent, the species of coins, rupees, annas and pies, the species of grain and produce. The phrase "nature and amount of rent," &c., in s. 17 thus refers chiefly to the figures and species of such things as s. 33 and the schedule describe and not to the tenures. It is only to those figures and species that the rule of evidence in s. 17 applies. We did not fail to see that one result of allowing the tenure entry to be altered would be to allow the nature and amount of rent to be altered, as these vary with the tenure just as the value of a fraction varies if you alter the integer.
I meet this objection with the maxim "Cessat ratio, cessat lex." One result may be that the specification of nature and amount of rent entered against a tenure becomes meaningless and null in contemplation of law when the Court has decided that the tenure is of a different sort. I agree with the referring Judges that the decision of the Survey Officer on the question of tenure is not final, but under s. 21 may be reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court.
CANDY, J.—I concur in the answer proposed to the question put by the referring Bench.
I have had occasion recently in second Appeal No. 710 of 1893
(ante p. 467) to consider in detail some of the provisions of the Khoti Act (Bombay I of 1880). I will here merely refer briefly to one or two points which seem to me to be of special importance.
The entry in the record which by s. 12 of the Act is "shall be conclusive proof of the facts therein recorded" is the entry made on receipt of a written application from the khot that he has conferred on a certain person certain rights of a privileged occupant. There is no judicial adjudication of any rights contemplated.
So, too, with the certificate under s. 29 which "shall be conclusive evidence of the right of the khot therein named to manage the village to which it relates for the year therein specified:" the certificate is not intended to be on adjudication of the rights of the khots inter se, but merely a provision for the due revenue administration of the village in the year specified.
Similarly, reading ss. 17 and 33 together, the intention of the Act would appear to be that the entry in the record which "shall be conclusive and final evidence of the liability therein established," is merely the entry of the rents according to the provisions of s. 33, which lays down definitely the rents payable by privileged occupants.
Whatever entries the Survey Officer may make in the survey records
"other" than the settlement register, he cannot avoid the clear statutory provisions of s. 33. For instance, if he made an entry that A B, a dharekari, should pay as rent one-third of the produce of his dhara land, such an entry would be ultra vires, for it would be contrary to the provisions of s. 33.

So, too, with occupancy tenants:—They ordinarily pay the customary rates of the village, which are determined by the Survey Officer who frames the survey record, not for any particular occupancy tenant, but for the village as a whole. But the khot and any occupancy tenant may at any time agree to substitute for the ordinary customary rate a makta or khand, that is, a fixed amount whether in money or in kind, and not a fixed share of the produce. The manifest advantage of such agreements is that they obviate the necessity of crop inspections and appraisements which are such a fruitful source of dispute. Section 33 apparently contemplates that if the khoti and occupancy tenant agree before the Survey Officer as to the existence of such a makta or khand, then he makes an entry of the fact, which entry as with the entry in s. 12 is conclusive. Now, if (Maxwell, p. 30) the interpreter of a statute may call to his aid all external or historical facts for which he may consult contemporary or other authentic works and writings, then a reference to the Bombay Gazetteer, Vol. X, which gives an historical account of the introduction of the khoti settlement, bears out the above view. At pages 253 to 255 will be found an account of the principles adopted by Government, to legalise which Bombay Act I of 1880 was subsequently passed. "Existing agreements between khotis and tenants, where found, were to be respected and enforced." It was apparently intended that where the khoti and occupancy tenant appeared before the Survey Officer, and said that they preferred a fixed amount to the customary share of the produce, the same should be recorded and be conclusive.

So far there is no difficulty: there could not be from the nature of things any antagonism between entries under ss. 16, 18 and 19, which are nowhere in the Act said to be "conclusive," and entries under s. 17. For as the khoti and tenant could not agree before the Survey Officer, unless there was no dispute, and the Survey Officer could not record an agreement contrary to the provisions of s. 33, there would be no room for inconsistent entries.

But then we come to ss. 20 to 22. These sections provide most distinctly that the Survey Officer when framing the settlement register or other record can investigate and determine any dispute, and that his decision, embodied in a survey record when not final, is binding on the parties till reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court. When that decree is obtained, the survey record is amended in accordance with its terms.

Now whatever may have been the external circumstances connected with the introduction of the khoti settlement, they cannot justify a departure from the plain meaning of the words of these sections (Maxwell, p. 32). This much is clear that it was the intention of the Legislature by ss. 20 to 22 of Bombay Act I of 1880 to vest the Survey Officer, when framing the records at the introduction of the survey, with the power to adjudge in disputes connected with the preparation of those survey records, and that where the Act did not speak of an entry made in accordance with the Survey Officer’s adjudication being final or conclusive, the survey record could be corrected by a final decree of a competent Court.

It is objected that a settlement by which certain of the decisions of the Survey Officer are final and others are not so, must lead to inconsistency; seeing that the nature and amount of rent payable by a privileged occupant must depend upon the nature of his tenure, either both the decision as to tenure and also the decision as to nature and amount of rent must be open to correction by the civil Court, or else both must be final, and unalterable by the civil Court. I do not agree with this view.

The position of the words "when not final" in s. 21 shows that they can only refer to the finality ascribed in s. 17 to the entries of the nature therein mentioned, as was held in Gopal Krishna v. Sakhojirao (1). But when we come to consider the nature of that finality it will be seen that there need be no inconsistency.

Thus the Survey Officer decides that AB as dharekari pays survey assessment. He cannot under s. 33 decide anything else. If the khot obtains a final decree of a competent Court that AB is not a dharekari, but an occupancy tenant of the land in question, then under s. 33 AB must pay the customary rates of the village, unless the khot agrees to take makta from [493] him. There cannot be a decision of the Survey Officer when framing the record, that there is an existing agreement between the khot and AB as occupancy tenant that a fixed amount in money or in kind shall be taken in lieu of customary rates, for when the survey record was framed, the Survey Officer treated AB as a dharekari. This will not prevent any valid agreement between the khot and AB as occupancy tenant for makta being given effect to.

In the same way should AB have been entered by the Survey Officer as an occupancy tenant paying makta according to an existing agreement, and should AB denying the existence of such an agreement, obtain the final decree of a competent Court that he is a dharekari, then by s. 33 he must pay neither more nor less than the survey assessment and local fund cess, and a decision that he as occupancy tenant agreed to pay makta must be void when it is found that he is not an occupancy tenant at all.

The apparent inconsistency disappears when it is remembered that the only "decision" which the Survey Officer can give under ss. 17 and 33 is as to the existence or non-existence of an agreement for makta between the khot and occupancy tenant, and the determination of the customary rates of the village. He is not empowered to fix a "fair rent" for any particular occupancy tenant. He is not entrusted with the duty of ascertaining or determining the amount of rent that an occupancy tenant shall pay: the Legislature has done that in s. 33. All that a Survey Officer can do is to determine the customary rents of the whole village, and in the case of any particular occupancy tenant he can find as a fact that the khot and that privileged occupant qua occupancy tenant have agreed to a certain makta (fixed amount) whether it be fair or not. But if the Court finds that that privileged occupant is not an occupancy tenant, then it follows that no makta could ever have been agreed upon "between the khot and the said occupancy tenant."

For these reasons I hold that it is open to the civil Court to go behind the Survey Officer's entry in the settlement register as to the tenure of the various privileged occupants. When that [494] has been decided, the payment of rent follows automatically under s. 33.

RANADE, J.—I concur. As one of the Judges who decided the case of Ramchandra v. Mukundshet (2), I may state that there was no intention to lay down any principle, or to place any construction on the terms of s. 17 of the Khothi Act, at variance with the rulings in Fakir Ghulam Mohidin v. Sajnak (3). This is clear from the recorded judgment, the last but one paragraph of which sets forth the distinction between the effect of the words used in s. 17 as compared with those used in ss. 21, 22. We were of opinion then, and to that opinion I still adhere, that the "botikhat" is one of the "other records" prepared under ss. 17 and 33, and so far as the entries in it relate to the nature and amount of the rent, the entries are clothed with a final and conclusive character.

The qualifying words underlined above should have been expressly stated in their place, and there would then have been no room for misconception. This same record, so far as it relates to the tenure of lands, is some evidence, which, if not controverted and corrected in due course and time, may become very strong evidence, and bind parties on the point of tenure itself, but in its origin it is not clothed with the character of finality. In this view of the law, we examined fully the evidence in detail on the point of tenure. This examination would have been unnecessary, if we were of opinion that the Settlement Officer's entries in respect of tenure were final and conclusive. In this connection, there can be no doubt that in the last but one sentence in paragraph 6 of the judgment, the words "conclusive and final" were inadvertently used for "binding" under certain circumstances.

The entries are admissible evidence, but not conclusive or final. This correction does not affect the real point which was decided in that case, and there is thus no conflict between the views of the two Division Benches on this point.

Order accordingly.

[495] ORIGINAL CRIMINAL.

Before Mr. Justice Strachey.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. VISRAM BABAJI. [4th April, 1896.]

Evidence—Confession—Statement of prisoner made before inquiry—Statement of prisoner made in the course of or after inquiry—Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882), ss. 164, 364, 539.

The sections comprised in Chap. XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882) (except ss. 155) do not apply to the Police in the Presidency towns, and consequently a statement or confession made to a Presidency Magistrate does not come within ss. 164 and the procedure prescribed in regard to the recording of statements or confessions by that section, and (by reference) s. 364 does not apply to statements and confessions recorded by a Presidency Magistrate before the commencement of the trial. But such statement or confession though not taken under s. 164 is admissible in evidence against the prisoner.

Queen-Empress v. Nilmadhub (1) followed on this point.

During an inquiry before a Presidency Magistrate after the evidence for the prosecution was taken, the Magistrate examined the accused under ss. 209 and 347 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882). The accused was examined in Marathi, but the questions and answers were recorded in English. The Magistrate deposed at the trial that it was the invariable practice in his Court to take down depositions in English and that he could not himself have accurately recorded the prisoner's statement in Marathi. He also deposed that the statement was correctly recorded in English, and that each question and answer when recorded was interpreted to the accused in Marathi, and that the accused then made his mark at the end of the recorded statement. He further stated that there were at hand native subordinate officials of his Court who could have recorded the statement in Marathi, but that he himself had not sufficient knowledge of Marathi as to be able to read what was written by such a subordinate, or to satisfactorily check or test the correctness with which it represented the statement made by the accused.

(1) 15 C. 595.
Held that, assuming that it was practicable to record the statement in Marathi, and that consequently it was irregular, with reference to s. 364 of the Code, to record it in English, the statement was nevertheless admissible in evidence under s. 533, the irregularity not having injured the accused as to his defence on the merits.

The accused was tried on a charge of murder. In the course of the trial, counsel for the prosecution tendered in evidence two statements alleged to have been made by the accused in the presence of Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate. The first of these was made on the 28th February, 1896, before the commencement of the inquiry which resulted in the commitment (496) of the accused. The second was made on the 29th February during that inquiry, after the evidence for the prosecution had been taken, and when the accused was questioned by the Magistrate under ss. 209 and 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882). The statements were recorded in the English language, but the accused spoke and was examined in Marathi.

Lang (Advocate-General) and Sayani, for the prosecution.

Robertson, for the accused.

The following evidence was given by Mr. Hamilton with reference to the taking of these statements:

"I am Second Presidency Magistrate. The prisoner made a statement to me on the 28th February, 1896. I recorded it in question and answer. It has been correctly recorded in English. He spoke in Marathi. It was interpreted to him correctly. Questions were put to him in Marathi. The answers were in Marathi and correctly taken down in English. I don't think I could myself have correctly taken it down in Marathi. In my Court the invariable practice is to take the deposition down in English."

"At the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution, I questioned the accused. I recorded his answers in the same way. That is, at the end of the inquiry before me. I don't think that with any pretence to accuracy I could have myself recorded the statements in Marathi. I can read Marathi. I can write very imperfectly. I don't think I have written it for twenty years at least.

"As regards the statement of the 28th February, each question and answer was interpreted to him from English into Marathi. The same thing was done in regard to the latter statement. When this had been done, he made his mark. The interpreter could have taken down the first statement in Marathi. The second statement could have been taken down in Marathi by a subordinate of the Court. I can read Marathi. If a subordinate had written down the prisoner’s statement in Marathi, I could not have read what he wrote, so well, or checked it independently so as to satisfy myself that he had correctly recorded what the prisoner had said."

Robertson:—The statements are not admissible in evidence not being recorded in Marathi—Jai Narayan Rai v. Queen-Empress (1). Section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1882) does not apply in the Presidency towns—Queen-Empress v. Nilmadhub (2); Queen-Empress v. Viran (3); Reg. v. Sivya (4).

JUDGMENT.

STRACHEY, J.—The Advocate-General, on behalf of the Crown, has tendered in evidence two statements purporting to have been made by the prisoner Visram Babaji in the presence of Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate. The first of these was made on the 28th February, 1896, before the commencement of the inquiry in which the prisoner was committed for trial. The second was made on the 29th February during that inquiry, after the evidence for the prosecution had been taken, and appears to have been made in an examination of the accused by the Magistrate under s. 209 and s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act X of 1882). Each of the two statements is in the form prescribed by s. 364 except that the questions and answers are recorded in English, and not in Marathi, which is the language in which the accused was examined. Mr. Hamilton has been called and examined as a witness. He states that he does not think that he could have himself recorded the statements in Marathi "with any pretence to accuracy." He says that he understands Marathi, and that he took down the statement of the prisoner correctly in English, according to the invariable practice of his Court. On each occasion an interpreter was present, and as each question and answer was recorded in English, it was retranslated back to the prisoner in Marathi, and he acknowledged that what was so put to him correctly expressed his meaning, and made his mark on the document at the end with his own hand. Mr. Hamilton further says that on both occasions there were at hand native subordinate officials of his Court who could have recorded the statements in Marathi. But he adds that, although he is able, to some extent, to read Marathi, he could not do so well enough to read what such a subordinate might have written, and satisfactorily check or test the correctness with which it represented the statement made by the accused.

Mr. Robertson, on behalf of the prisoner, objects to both the statements tendered by the Advocate-General, on the ground that they are not admissible in evidence. As regards the statements [498] made on the 28th February, he contends that, if it is regarded as having been taken under s. 164 of the Code, the second paragraph of that section requires that it should be recorded in the manner provided in s. 364, and that as it was not proved that it was "not practicable" within the meaning of the latter section to record the examination in Marathi, the Magistrate was not authorised to record it in English. Mr. Robertson further contends, upon the authority of certain cases which he has cited, that the irregularity in the method of recording the examination could not be cured by applying the provisions of s. 533. Mr. Robertson further argues, on the authority of the decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Queen-Empress v. Niladhub Mitter (3), that s. 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not apply to the statements recorded by Magistrates in the Presidency towns. I should mention that the statement does not purport, on the face of it, to have been recorded under s. 164, and that the memorandum made by the Magistrate at the foot of the record of the statement is not in accordance with the last paragraph of that.

(1) 5 C. 826 (839). (2) 16 C. 849. (3) 15 C. 595.
section, as it omits to state that the statement "was read over to the person making it and admitted by him to be correct."

I shall deal first with the last point, which applies only to the statement recorded by the Magistrate on the 28th February. It appears to me that the decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court is, so far as this point is concerned, exactly applicable to the present case. I agree with Mr. Justice Prinsep in his note to the heading of Chap. XIV of the Code and again to s. 155 that the grounds of the decision of the Full Bench equally apply to Bombay. The first paragraph of s. 164 shows that the section does not apply generally to all statements or confessions made to a Magistrate, but only to statements or confessions made to him, either during or after "an investigation under this chapter;" that is to say, either during or after an investigation by the police under Chap. XIV. But s. 1 (a) of the Code provides that, in the absence of any specific provision to the contrary, nothing in the Code (and, therefore, [499]) nothing in Chap. XIV shall apply to the police in the towns of Calcutta and Bombay. As there appears to be no specific provision to the contrary, it follows that Chap. XIV (except s. 155, as to which see Queen-Empress v. Nilamdhur) (1) does not apply to the police in the Presidency towns; and consequently a statement or confession made to a Presidency Magistrate does not come within the words of s. 164: "a statement or confession made to him in the course of an investigation under this chapter or at any time afterwards." If that is so, then the procedure prescribed in regard to the recording of statements or confessions by s. 164 and (by reference) s. 364 does not apply to statements or confessions recorded by a Presidency Magistrate before the commencement of the trial.

The question then arises, whether the statement or confession, though not taken under s. 164 is admissible in evidence. The decision of the Calcutta Full Bench is a direct authority in the affirmative. The Court there held that "it being proved that the whole of the statements contained in the documents were either the actual words spoken by the prisoner, or were accepted by him as representing the true meaning of what he had said, and as the whole document is signed by him with his own hand, the whole of the admissions contained in the document were strictly proved to have been made by him, and were admissible against him under the Indian Evidence Act." The judgment specially refers to s. 26 of that Act. In the present case the statements contained in the document were not "the actual words spoken by the prisoner," but the evidence of Mr. Hamilton satisfies me that they were accepted by him as representing the true meaning of what he had said," and "the whole document is signed by him with his own hand." I think that I ought to follow the decision of the Full Bench, with which I agree, and I, therefore, overrule the objection as to the statement made on the 28th February, and I admit the document tendered by the Advocate-General.

I now come to the statement recorded by the Magistrate in the course of the inquiry, on the 29th February. There can be no doubt, in regard to that statement, that the provisions of [600] s. 364 of the Code were applicable. The first question is whether it was "not practicable" to record the statement in Marathi. Having regard to Mr. Hamilton's statement that he could not write Marathi with any pretence to accuracy,
I am satisfied that it was not practicable for the Magistrate to personally record the examination in that language. Mr. Robertson, however, contends that there is nothing to show that it was not practicable for the examination to be recorded in Marathi by a native subordinate. On the other hand, the Advocate-General contends that the record, under s. 364, must be made by the Magistrate personally, unless he is physically disabled from doing so. I think that would be going too far. The second paragraph of s. 364 requires the Magistrate to certify that "the examination was taken in his presence and hearing;" it does not require a certificate that it was recorded by his own hand. The third paragraph speaks of "cases in which the examination of the accused is not recorded by the Magistrate or Judge himself," and not of cases in which the Magistrate or Judge is physically disabled from recording the examination himself. The recent decision of the Calcutta High Court in Queen-Empress v. Razai Mia (1) distinctly implies that a Mohurrir may record a confession or statement, under s. 364, in a case where the only disability of the Magistrate is that he cannot write the language well. In Fekoo Mahato v. The Empress (2) a confession was recorded before a Deputy Magistrate by one of his clerks under s. 161, but the Court does not say in its judgment that this was irregular. In Queen-Empress v. Bachhanna (3) it was held that the Magistrate was justified in recording the statement in Hindustani, as the statement was made on a close holiday, "and there was no native official at hand to record the statements of the appellants in their own tongue." Mr. Justice Tyrrell says that "the exception is when the statement is made to an officer who cannot record it in Hindustani, and has not at hand the means of getting it so recorded. It is a question of fact in each case whether an amanuensis could or could not readily be had to record the statement in Hindustani." That implies that if a native official or amanuensis had been obtainable, it would have been "practicable" within the meaning of the s. 364 to record the statement in Hindustani. In the present case, the Magistrate has deposed that the statement could have been taken down in Marathi by a subordinate of his Court. Assuming, however, that it was practicable to record the examination in Marathi, and that consequently it was irregular to record it in English, the further question arises, what is the effect of the irregularity, having regard to the concluding words of s. 533? Upon this point Mr. Robertson referred to Jai Narayan Rai v. Queen-Empress (4), the passage at pp. 607-608 of the report of Queen-Empress v. Nilmadhub (5), Queen-Empress v. Viron (6) and Reg. v. Shrotya (7). The first of these decisions has been doubted in Lalchand v. Queen-Empress (8). With all respect for the learned Judges who decided the case of Jai Narayan Rai v. Queen-Empress, I cannot agree with them that the scope of s. 533 is limited to any particular kinds of non-compliance with s. 364, that a neglect to sign the confession or the certificate or to certify the facts requiring to be certified would be an "omission" curable by s. 533, but that a neglect to record the examination in the prisoner's own language would be an "infractation" or "direct violation," not curable by the plainest evidence that the prisoner had not been injured as to his defence on the merits. Neither the language nor the object of s. 533 appears to me to justify that distinction. The passage cited from the Full Bench decision is an obiter dictum not necessary to the decision, and not going beyond the expression of "very grave doubts." The Madras case is, in my opinion, inapplicable. It merely lays down that s. 533 does not apply where there has been a total and not merely a partial non-compliance with the provisions of ss. 164 and 364. The case of Reg. v. Shiyya is also inapplicable. It was decided with reference to a different question arising under the Criminal Procedure Code of 1872. I agree with the opinion expressed by Sir John Edge, C.J., and Mr. Justice Blair in Queen-Empress v. Anta (1) that "the object of s. 533 was to prevent justice being frustrated by reason of the Magistrate not having fully complied with the provisions of s. 164 or of s. 364." In that case the Magistrate took down the confession in English, though he could have taken it down in the vernacular. He deposed that he had re-translated it, word by word, to the accused, who had acknowledged it to be correct, and had made his mark at the end. The confession was attested by the Magistrate in the usual way. It was held to be admissible in evidence, the error not having injured the accused as to his defence on the merits. The case of Queen-Empress v. Bachanna, to which I have already referred in connection with another point, is an authority to the same effect. In the present case, even assuming that the examination of the accused was irregularly recorded in English instead of Marathi, I am satisfied by Mr. Hamilton's evidence that the accused was not injured as to his defence on the merits.

For these reasons I overrule the objection as to the statement made on the 29th February, and I admit the document. It will be obvious that the same reasons would equally justify the admission under s. 164 of the statement made on the 28th February if s. 164 were held applicable to that statement.

ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Candy.

LUXUMAN NANA PATIL (Original Defendant), Appellant v.
MOROBA RAMCHRISHNA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents.* [18th December, 1896.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 379—Suit for injunction or damages—Payment into Court by defendant to satisfy plaintiffs' claim—Costs in such case—Costs—Practice—Procedure.

The plaintiffs sued alleging certain windows in their house to be ancient windows and complaining that a building in course of erection by the defendant would, when completed according to the building plan, obstruct the light through the said windows. In his written statement the defendant denied that the plaintiffs' windows were ancient and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the light and air as an easement. At the time of filing his written statement the defendant paid into Court the sum of Rs. 200, which [503] in his written statement he stated was more than sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs for any damages they might sustain and which he (defendant) paid in without prejudice to his contents but for the sake of peace and to avoid litigation. At the hearing the plaintiffs abandoned their claim for injunction, but insisted that they were entitled to more than Rs. 200 as damages. The Court found that the plaintiffs'

* Suit No. 517 of 1895; Appeal No. 924.

(1) A.W.N. (1899) 60.
windows were ancient, but that the Rs. 200 paid into Court was sufficient damages. It, therefore, ordered that the defendant should pay all the plaintiffs' costs up to the date at which the Rs. 200 were paid into Court, and as to their subsequent costs that the defendant should pay three-fourths of the plaintiffs' subsequent costs and the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant one-fourth of the defendants' subsequent costs. The Court offered to simplify its order by directing the defendant to pay all the costs, of the plaintiffs up to the date of paying the Rs. 200 into Court and half the plaintiffs' taxed costs subsequent to that date.

The defendant appealed, contending that under s. 379 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) the plaintiffs should have been ordered to pay all the defendant's costs subsequent to the payment into Court.

Held, that the suit was not one to recover a debt or damages, and, therefore, s. 379 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) did not apply. That being so, the Judge had full discretion under s. 320 of the Civil Procedure Code to apportion the costs, and the Court of Appeal would not interfere with that discretion.

Held, also, that in cases not being suits to recover a debt or damages where money is paid into Court, the principle underlying s. 379 of the Civil Procedure Code ought to regulate the discretion of the Court in directing the payment of costs.

This was an appeal against the order of the lower Court as to costs of suit, the appellant (defendant) contending that the order was wrong having regard to s. 379 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The plaintiff sued alleging certain windows in their house to be ancient windows, and complaining that a building in course of erection by the defendant would, when completed, as shown by the building plan, diminish the light and air coming through their windows.

They also complained that the defendant had encroached upon an adjoining gully, alleging that he "had no right to build on any portion of the said gully, over the whole of which the plaintiffs claim to have the right of user."

The prayer of the plaint was as follows:

"1. That the defendant may be restrained by injunction from erecting or maintaining erected any building so as to obstruct the access of light and air through the plaintiffs' said seven ancient windows to a greater extent than the same were obstructed by the defendant's old building.

2. That the defendant may be restrained by injunction from encroaching upon or erecting or maintaining erected any erection or building upon the gully between the plaintiffs' and the defendant's premises.

3. That the defendant may be ordered to pay costs.

4. That the plaintiffs may have such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require."

The defendant when filing his written statement paid into Court Rs. 200 as compensation to the plaintiffs for the injury (if any) sustained by them.

The written statement (1) denied that the plaintiffs' windows except (3) were ancient windows; (2) denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to light and air as hitherto enjoyed through the said windows as an easement; (3) denied encroachment on the gully and denied plaintiffs had any right to use the gully.

The fifth paragraph of the written statement was as follows:

"5. The defendant without prejudice to any of the above contentions, but for the sake of peace and in order to avoid litigation, borrows into Court the sum of Rs. 200 which he says is more than sufficient to compensate the plaintiff for any damages which he may sustain by reason of the defendant's said intended building."
At the hearing the following issues were raised by the defendant:
1. Whether the windows 4, 5, 6 and 3 in the plaintiffs' house as shown in the plan annexed to the plaint are ancient windows; and whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any relief in respect of such windows.
2. Whether the proposed new building of the defendant will, if constructed, materially diminish the light and air heretofore enjoyed by the plaintiffs in the rooms lighted by the windows mentioned in the plaint.
3. Whether, if so, the sum of Rs. 200 paid into Court is not sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs for any loss sustained.
4. Whether the defendant has encroached on the gully in the plaint mentioned.
5. Whether the plaintiffs have any right to use the gully.
6. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any and what relief.

Upon the above issues the Court found as follows:
(1) For the plaintiffs, viz., that the windows were ancient.
(2) For the plaintiffs, viz., that the defendant's building would materially diminish the light and air.
(3) For the defendant, viz., that the Rs. 200 paid into Court were sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs.
(4) For the defendant, viz., that the defendant had not encroached on the gully.
(5) For the defendant, viz., that the plaintiff had no right to use the gully.
(6) That the plaintiff was entitled to Rs. 200 as damages for the causes of action mentioned in the plaint.

The following are the material portions of the judgment of the Division Court:

JUDGMENT.

TYABJI, J.—In the plaint the plaintiffs asked for an injunction; but this was abandoned at the commencement of the hearing before me. The defendant by his written statement, which was filed on 31st January, 1896, denied that any of the windows, except 1 and 2 on the ground floor and No. 7 on the first floor as shown in the plan (Ex. J), were ancient, or that the plaintiffs were entitled to any relief in respect of the same, but without prejudice to any of his contentions he brought into Court the sum of Rs. 200 which he said was more than sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs for any damages which they might sustain by reason of the defendant's intended building. At the commencement of the hearing before me on 24th February, 1896, the plaintiffs, although they abandoned their claim for injunction, insisted that they were entitled to more than Rs. 200 for damages. The defendant, on the other hand, persisted in his denial that the plaintiffs' windows were ancient, and asserted that they had only been put in in 1878. Having now found that the windows are ancient, and the claim for injunction having been withdrawn, the only question now remaining to be decided on the merits of this case is whether the Rs. 200 paid into Court by the defendant is sufficient. (His Lordship discussed the evidence and continued:—) The conclusion I have come to is that the plaintiffs upon whom of course the burden lies, have failed to show that he is entitled to more than the Rs. 200 paid into Court. I am not satisfied that the house is worth more than Rs. 800, nor that it will be damaged to the extent of one-fourth of its value, nor that the damages amount to Rs. 4 per month. I only assess the damages at Rs. 200, because that is the amount admitted by the defendant.
The next question in the plaint was in regard to the gully between the plaintiffs' and defendant's properties. It was admitted before me by the defendant's counsel that the whole length of the gully or the gutter, nine inches wide from the plaintiff's wall, belonged to the plaintiff, while it was admitted by the plaintiffs that the rest of the gully is the absolute property of the defendant. The defendant's counsel during the hearing before me disclaimed the right or the intention of the defendant to encroach upon that part of the gully which belonged to the plaintiff, while the plaintiff's counsel equally abandoned the plaintiff's contention that he had any right over that portion of the gully which belonged to the defendant. There is, therefore, no question before me now to decide in reference to the gully.

As to the question of costs, which unfortunately has become now the most important question in the case, it is clear from my findings that the plaintiffs have succeeded in proving that the windows are ancient, though they have failed in establishing that they are entitled to more than Rs. 200 paid into Court on 31st January, 1896. I, therefore, order that defendant should pay the plaintiffs' costs up to and inclusive of the 31st January, 1896. The subsequent costs related to the question, first, as to whether the windows were ancient or not; second, as to damages, and, thirdly, as to whether the defendant had originally intended to encroach upon that part of the gully which he now admits to belong to the plaintiffs; and fourthly, as to the plaintiff's right to use the whole of the gully.

As to the defendant's intention. After carefully considering the evidence of the surveyors on both sides and the plans put in as exhibits in the case and the correspondence prior to the suit, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant did originally intend or at least that he led the plaintiffs to believe that he intended to encroach upon the plaintiff's part of the gully. It is, therefore, fair that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the costs of his unfounded contentions or claims both in regard to the windows and in regard to the plaintiff's part of the gully, while the plaintiff should pay to the defendant the defendant's costs as regards the plaintiff's contention that the Rs. 200 was not sufficient compensation and as to his claim to use the defendant's part of the gully. But instead of direct[ing a complex taxation of the costs on the above basis I have thought it best to assess them roughly at three-fourths and one-fourth respectively and I accordingly order that the defendant, in addition to paying all the plaintiff's costs up to 31st January, 1896, should pay three-fourths of the plaintiff's costs subsequent to that date, and the plaintiff should pay to the defendant one-fourth of the defendant's taxed costs subsequent to the same date, or if the parties prefer, I could simplify my order by setting off the one-fourth costs payable to the plaintiff against one-fourth payable to the defendant, and this by directing that the defendant is to pay all the costs of the plaintiff up to 31st January, 1896, and half of the plaintiff's taxed costs subsequent to that date. Each party to bear his own costs of the rule for injunction.

The defendant appealed on the question of costs on the following grounds:

1. That the appellant having paid into Court at the time of filing of his written statement, viz., the 31st of January, 1896, the sum of Rs. 200 which he alleged to be sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs for any damage which they might sustain by reason of the defendant's intended building, and the said learned Judge having found that the said sum was sufficient to compensate the plaintiffs as aforesaid, it was an error in law on the part of the said learned Judge to order the defendant to pay half the plaintiffs' costs of suit after the 31st January, 1896.

2. That in making the said order in the said decree the said learned Judge violated the provisions of s. 379 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882.

3. That the said learned Judge under the circumstances aforesaid ought, having regard to the provisions of the said s. 379, to have ordered the plaintiffs to pay all the defendant's costs of suit and their own incurred after the 31st of January, 1896."

Scott (Lawned with him), for appellant (defendant).—Under s. 379 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) the Judge was bound to give the defendant all costs incurred after the payment into Court of Rs. 200 which was found to be sufficient to compensate the plaintiff. He cited Buckton v. Higgs (1); Wood v. Leetham (2).

Lang (Advocate-General) with Macpherson, for the respondents (plaintiffs):—Section 379 does not apply here. It applies only [508] to suits to recover debt or damages; see s. 376. This was a suit for an injunction. The plaintiffs were obliged to continue the suit in spite of the defendant's payment into Court, because the written statement denied their windows were ancient windows. The plaintiffs were bound to get that question decided or they would be afterwards barred. The defendant himself raised an issue on the point at the hearing and denied the plaintiff's right. Although, therefore, the plaint does not pray for a declaration of the plaintiff's right the suit was one of that nature, and not "to recover a debt or damages." Sections 376 and 379 of the Code do not apply, and the Judge had full power to apportion the costs in his discretion under s. 220 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Scott, in reply.—The suit was one for damages. The Court has power to award damages in lieu of an injunction. The plaintiff must be assumed to know that and to count upon the Court giving damages if not an injunction. Besides there is the prayer for "other relief." See Nicholson v. L. C. D. Radway (3) cited in Annual Practice for 1895, p. 530. Money is constantly paid into this Court in suits for injunction, and it is only under these ss. 376, 379 of the Code that such payment can be made. No other section provides for it. So that by long-established practice at any rate these sections must be held to apply where money is paid into Court in suits for injunction.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C.J.—We think that with regard to the gullly the question is so trivial that it may be left out of consideration. We think also that a suit for injunction to prevent a person from building so as to interfere with the plaintiff's light and air, and including no claim for damages, is not a suit "to recover a debt or damages" within s. 376 of the Civil Procedure Code, merely because in dealing with such a suit the Court has a discretion under the Specific Relief Act to award damages in lieu of an injunction. The claim is for an injunction and does not cease to be so because such a discretion is vested in the Court. We do not wish to throw any doubt on the validity of the payment of money into Court in injunction cases. It is a long-established practice of this Court, and, we think, in ordinary cases when [509] money is so paid in, the principle underlying s. 379 ought to regulate the discretion of the Court. But we further think that where, although no declaration is prayed for, the defendant raises an issue the finding on which operates as a virtual declaration of the right of the plaintiff, the principle of s. 379 ceases to be applicable and the Judge then has full discretion under s. 220 of the Code to apportion the costs. We think that is the course the Judge took in this case, and we do not feel at liberty to interfere with that discretion. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Strachey.

BUDESAB AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. HANMANTA (Original Defendant), Respondent.*

[14th January, 1896.]

Adverse possession—Adverse possession of a partial interest (e.g. tenants) in land—Title by adverse possession asserted by a plaintiff against the true owner as well as alleged as a defence—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 28 and art. 144.

Adverse possession for more than twelve years by one claiming to hold land as its full owner not only extinguishes the title of the true owner to the land so held and deprives him from suing for its recovery, but creates a title by negation in the occupant which he can actively assert, if he loses possession, even against the true owner.

A partial interest in land may be lost by adverse possession as well as the whole interest, and the right to such partial interest may be asserted by suit.

So where a landlord seeks to recover from his tenant possession of land in his tenant’s occupancy and the latter alleging a perpetual tenancy successfully resists on that ground the landlord’s attempt to dispossess him, the tenant may, after the statutory period has expired, plead limitation in bar of a subsequent suit in ejectment by the landlord.

A landlord allowing the tenant to assert the validity of an invalid lease for the statutory period of more than twelve years may be debarred from subsequently questioning the right of the tenant to hold under its terms.

[610] Second appeal from the decision of E. H. Moseardi, Acting Judge of Kanara, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb M. M. Nadgir, Subordinate Judge of Sirsi.

Suit for possession by tenants alleging an occupancy right against landlord. The plaintiff’s father (Fakirsab) held the land in dispute as a tenant of the defendant’s father Ramangavda. In 1862 Ramangavda sought to put an end to Fakirsab’s tenancy, alleging it to be chalgens (1).

* Second Appeal No. 300 of 1894.

(1) J. s., tenancy-at-will or occupation on paying rent for a short or indefinite term (see Wilson’s Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms).
Fakirsah thereupon took proceedings in the Revenue Court to protect his possession, alleging that he held the land on mulgeni tenure and was not liable to be evicted. The Revenue Court referred Ramangavda to a Civil Court if he desired to evict his tenant, and accordingly Ramangavda filed a suit in the Munsif’s Court at Yellapur to evict Fakirsah, but that suit was afterwards dismissed for want of appearance, Ramangavda having died; and Fakirsah and after him his sons (the plaintiffs) continued to occupy the land as tenants of the defendant (Ramangavda’s son), paying rent until 1882, when the Collector acting on behalf of the defendant, who was then a minor, and as his administrator took possession of it from the plaintiffs and in 1884 made it over to the defendant on his attaining majority.

In 1891 the plaintiffs filed this suit to recover possession of the lands with mesne profits, basing their claim (a) on a mulgeni lease alleged to have been granted in 1827 by the defendant’s grandfather to the grandfather of the plaintiffs, and (b) on adverse possession as mulgenidars for a long period.

The defendant pleaded that the plaintiffs were not mulgenidars; that the lands in dispute were let out to them on a chalgeni lease in 1860; that the suit brought by the defendant’s father Ramangavda in 1862 was disposed of on the ground of his non-appearance and subsequent to the disposal of the suit he died on the 10th October during the same year; that the defendant having been born three months after the death of his father Ramangavda, no steps could be taken to set aside the decree dismissing the suit, and that the plaintiffs were properly ejected in 1882 by the [511] Collector, who was not satisfied with the genuineness of their alleged mulgeni lease.

The Subordinate Judge found that the mulgeni lease set up by the plaintiffs was not sufficiently proved, but he allowed their claim on the ground that they had acquired a title by adverse possession to the lands which had been in their possession from 1862 to 1882 when they were wrongfully taken possession of by the Collector.

On appeal by the defendant the Judge reversed the decree. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"It is argued by the respondent’s pleader that under s. 23 of the Limitation Act, after the lapse of twelve years from a landlord learning that his tenant has set up a mulgeni title, his right to assert such title is extinguished. But that section applies to possessory rights only. No doubt, if plaintiffs were still in possession, they could not be ejected by the defendant if during the period of limitation allowed under s. 2, art. 144 of the Act above quoted, he had failed to take steps to assert his right to eject them. Consequently in 1882, even if defendant’s right to sue for a declaration that plaintiffs were his chalgeni tenants or for ejectment after due notice to quit had been taken away under the decision quoted (Sheikh Nuzimudin Hossein v. Lloyd, 6 Bengal Law Reports, Appendix, p. 130), yet his right to treat the plaintiffs as his chalgeni tenants was not extinguished, and having regained possession he can now rely on such right against the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs contend that they first set up their mulgeni title in 1862, and that defendant, knowing of such claim of plaintiffs, did not until 1882 take any steps to establish their chalgeni right. But this will not help the plaintiffs now that they are out of possession and must, therefore, prove the superiority of their title to that of the defendant. It remains now to see whether the plaintiffs have proved the mulgeni loan they rely on. I find it is not proved. Only one witness is called to prove the handwriting of the writer, and he denies that the document is in the handwriting of his father who purports to have written it. The document purports to be more than thirty years old, but there is reason to believe that it is a recent forgery, for as the lower Court remarks in its judgment, it never saw the light until 1884, although only two years before, when the Collector asked plaintiffs what documentary evidence they had of their mulgani rights, they gave a long written reply (Ex. No. 27), in which not a word is said about the lease.

Plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Branson, with Ghanasham N. Nadkarni, for appellants (plaintiffs).—
We contend that our possession was adverse to the defendant from 1862 to 1882, when the Collector dispossessed us. The interest of a tenant is, no doubt, a limited interest; still there can be adverse possession of such limited interest, and acquisition of title by possession during the statutory period can prevail as [512] against the landlord provided the tenancy is not denied. After the acquisition of such a title the tenant can bring a suit to recover possession on that title just as he can allege it as a defence in a suit brought by the landlord—Bhagv v. Byromji (1); Radhabai
v. Anantrav (2); Maidin Satba v. Nagapa (3); Madhava v. Narayana (4); Sankaran v. Periasami (5); Sheikh Nazimuddin v. Lloyd (6); Jugaldas
v. Ambashankar (7); Laehko v. Har Sahai (8).

Macpherson, with Shamrao Vithal, for the respondent (defendant).—
There is no doubt that if a rightful owner brings a suit after the expiration of twelve years from the time his title is denied by the person in possession his suit would be time-barred under s. 28 of the Limitation Act. But that principle is not applicable to the present case. The statute of Limitation applies to the institution of suits and can have no application to a case like the present. Further, the Judge has not found whether the possession of the plaintiffs was adverse to us. We rely on Orr v. Sundra Pandia (9); Scott v. Nixon (10); Brassington v. Llewellyn (11).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is a second appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Kanara dismissing the plaintiffs' claim which had been awarded by the Subordinate Judge.

The facts, as they appear from the judgment of the latter, are briefly these. The plaintiffs' father was a tenant, holding the lands in suit under the father of the defendant. In 1862 the latter sought to put an end to the tenancy which he alleged to be chalgeni. The plaintiffs' father took proceedings in the Revenue Court to protect his possession, and in the result the defendant's father was referred to a civil Court, if he desired to evict, as the plaintiffs' father asserted that he held the land on mulgeni tenure and was not liable to be evicted. The defendant's father accordingly filed a suit in the Munsif's Court at Yallapur to evict the plaintiffs' father. The suit was subsequently dismissed for want of appearance. It would appear that the defendant's father had [513] then died, and that the suit was not prosecuted in consequence; but there is no finding upon this part of the case, as the District Judge has not entered upon the question of adverse possession, deeming it, upon the view which he took of the law, to be unnecessary to do so. After the dismissal of the suit the plaintiffs' father, and subsequently the plaintiffs, continued to occupy the land as the tenants of the defendant, paying rent until 1843, when the Collector, acting on behalf of the defendant, who was then a minor, and as his administrator, took possession of it from the plaintiffs, and in 1854 made it over to the defendant on his attaining his majority. The plaintiffs filed the present suit in 1891 to recover possession of the land with mesne profits, basing their claim (a) on a mulgeni lease alleged to have been granted to their ancestor in 1827, (b) on adverse possession as mulgenidars for a long period.

Both the lower Courts have found that the alleged mulgeni lease set up by the plaintiffs has not been proved, and the District Judge has intimated his opinion that it is forgery.

The Subordinate Judge, however, relying on the decision in Maidin Saiba v. Nagapa (1), awarded the plaintiffs' claim on the ground that they and their father had held possession of the land adversely to the defendant and his father for a period of twenty years. The District Judge, without recording any finding as to the nature of the plaintiffs' possession during this period, and considering the case cited by the Subordinate Judge to be inapplicable, dismissed the plaintiffs' claim. Hence this appeal.

The question for decision is, whether the plaintiffs' father and the plaintiffs continuing to hold the land after the unsuccessful attempt of the defendant's father to evict in 1862 constituted such an adverse possession as would create a title to the land in the plaintiffs to the extent which they claimed, viz., a right to hold it on mulgeni tenure against the defendant, their admitted landlord and the true owner of the land. In considering that issue, inasmuch as the character of the possession of the plaintiffs since 1862 has not been found by the lower appellate Court, we must (for the purpose of our present decision) assume (as found [514] by the Subordinate Judge) that (he continued holding of the land by the plaintiffs) after 1862 was not under an arrangement with the defendant, but was in assertion of their alleged right to be considered his mulgeni tenants. We proceed to consider the case upon that assumption.

It was conceded in argument before us, and as we think rightly conceded, that an adverse possession for more than twelve years by one claiming to hold land as its full owner, not only extinguishes the title of the true owner to the land so held and debar him from suing for its recovery, but creates a title by negation in the occupant which he can actively assert if he loses possession even against the true owner—Scott v. Nixon (2); Brassington v. Llewellyn (3); Sanders v. Sanders (4). This result, we think, flows naturally from the wording of the provisions of s. 28 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877), which enacts that "at the determination of the period hereby limited to any person for instituting a suit for possession of any property, his right to such property shall be extinguished." There is certainly authority for the proposition that a landlord allowing a tenant to assert the validity of an invalid lease for the statutory period of more than twelve years may be debarred from subsequently questioning the right of the tenant to hold under its terms—Bhag v. Byramji (5). That decision purports to be based upon the ruling in Radhabai v. Anantrav (6), but the latter was the case of a grant, and the relation of landlord and tenant did not at any time exist between the parties. The decision itself is, however, in point as an authority. In Sheikh Nizamudin v. Lloyd (7) the Judges (Jackson and Ainslie, J.J.) were of opinion that a landlord who allowed his tenant to pay him rent under a supposed mokurrari lease for more than twenty-seven years after an attempt to dispossess him was barred by limitation from maintaining a suit for a declaration that the lease of the defendant was of a different character. The suit was originally framed as a suit to eject the defendant, but that portion of the relief was abandoned. The learned Judges [516] based their judgments mainly upon the deduction which they drew from the effect of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rajah Sahib Perhlad Sein v. Doorgapershad Tewaree (1) and in Rajah Sahib Perhlad Sein v. Run Bahadoor Singh (2). It was not in those cases necessary for their Lordships to consider the question of limitation, as their Lordships took the view that the facts did not raise it, and they cannot, therefore, be treated as authorities. Their Lordships did not, however, intimate an opinion that limitation could not be pleaded in such a case, and it may be contended that they assumed that it could. In Madhava v. Narayana (3), it was held that where the father of the plaintiffs demised to the defendant’s ancestor two items of family land on kanam and placed him in possession, the plaintiffs could not, after the defendant had held under the kanam for more than twelve years, sue to eject him on the allegation that the kanam was illegally granted. The learned Judges were of opinion that “adverse possession for twelve years of a limited interest in immovable property is a good plea to a suit of ejectment to the extent of that interest.” That case was followed in Sankaran v. Periasami (4), where it was held that payment of poruppu by the person in possession did not prevent his possession from being adverse to the person to whom he made such payments. The Court say: “Possession of a limited interest in immovable property may be just as much adverse, for the purpose of barring a suit for the determination of that limited interest, as is adverse possession of a complete interest in the property to bar a suit for the whole property.” On the other hand, in Watson v. Banee Shurut Soonduree Debia (5) it is laid down that a tenant cannot plead limitation against his landlord; but in Sheikh Nazimudin v. Lloyd (6), the Court say that the rule was there stated in too general terms.

By art. 144 of Act XV of 1877 a suit for possession of immovable property or any interest therein is barred after the lapse of twelve years from the time when the possession of the defendant becomes adverse to the plaintiff. In cases like the [516] present it may, we think, be fairly contended that though the landlord’s interest is throughout in the possession of the landlord by his tenant (as it certainly is as regards third persons), the tenant’s interest is in possession of the tenant, and that it is the latter which the landlord in a suit in ejectment against his tenant who admits the tenancy seeks to recover. If that be so, it is competent to the tenant, while admitting the landlord’s title to the land, and paying him rent in pursuance of such admission, to set up the case that the tenure upon which he holds is such as to dissuile the landlord to eject him so long as he pays the rent and to become entitled to the tenant’s interest in the land which he claims by adverse possession. We do not say that a tenant by a false allegation as to the terms of his tenancy though continuously repeated can alter those terms. Such allegations do not necessarily throw upon the landlord the onus of refuting them by suit—

(1) 12 M.I.A. 322. (2) 12 M. I. A. 392. (3) 9 M. 244 (247).
Rajah Nilmom Singh v. Kally Churn Bhattacharjee (1). But where a landlord seeks to recover possession of land in his tenant's occupancy from the tenant, and the latter, on the allegation of a perpetual tenancy, successfully resists the landlord's attempt to dispossess him for the statutory period, the current of authority to which we have referred in our opinion establishes that the law of limitation can be successfully pleaded in bar of a suit in ejectment by the landlord. And as we do not think that there is any principle of law which prevents us from following that current, or that the authorities are based upon a necessarily incorrect interpretation of the provisions of the Limitation Act, we consider that we ought to follow them.

It has, however, been contended before us that even assuming the law to be in accordance with this view, the provisions of s. 28 of the Limitation Act are not applicable to the case. We are unable to follow that contention. If the defendant has lost by the operation of art. 144 his right to institute a suit to recover the tenant's alleged interest in the land from the latter, it seems logically to follow that the defendant's right to such interest has become extinguished by the operation of s. 28, and that by negation it has become vested in the plaintiffs. A different rule cannot, we think, be applied to a partial interest in the land lost by limitation from that which is admittedly applicable to the case of the whole interest. The principle laid down in the cases cited in the beginning of this judgment is, in our opinion, therefore, applicable to the present case. We must send down an issue to have the nature of the possession of the plaintiffs' father and of the plaintiffs between 1862 and 1882 determined. It will be:

Was the possession of the plaintiffs and of their father between 1862 and 1882 adverse to the defendant within the meaning of this judgment?

Finding to be certified in this Court within two months.

Issue sent down.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

IMPERATRIS v. APPAJI BIN YADAVRAO.* [16th January, 1896.]

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 161—Public servant—Revenue and police patel—Agreement to restore village Mahars to office on payment of Rs. 300 towards repair of a village temple—Gratification—Official act.

The Mahars of a certain village having been suspended from their office for some months a meeting of the villagers was held at the house of the Patel, at which the Patel was present, to consider the question of their restoration to office, and an agreement was there come to that they should be restored on their paying a sum of Rs. 300 towards the repair of the village temple.

Held, that the Patel, being a public servant, had committed an offence under s. 161 of the Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860).

This was an application under s. 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act X of 1882) for the exercise of the High Court's criminal revisional jurisdiction.

* Application for Criminal Revision No. 364 of 1895.

(1) 2 I. A. 83.

The accused was the revenue and police patel of Chinobodi in the Ahmednagar District. He was convicted under s. 161 of the Penal Code (XLV of 1860) of taking a gratification for an official act under the following circumstances.

In 1892 the Mahars of the village in question were removed from the services of the village, and Mungs were employed in their place. In 1894 a meeting of the villagers was held at the house of the accused, at which meeting the accused was present, to consider the question of the restoration of the Mahars, and an agreement was come to that they should be restored on their paying a sum of Rs. 300 for a village purpose, viz., the repair of one of the village temples. This payment was apparently in the nature of a fine for the poisoning of certain cattle of which the Mahars were supposed to have been guilty during the period of their suspension.

The Collector sanctioned the prosecution of the accused for taking part in this transaction. The charge against him was that of taking a gratification for an official act under s. 161, Penal Code.

The First Class Magistrate of Ahmednagar convicted the accused and sentenced him to suffer imprisonment for four months and pay a fine of Rs. 50, or in default of such payment further imprisonment for one month.

In appeal the Sessions Judge (G. C. Whitworth) of Ahmednagar confirmed the conviction and sentence. The following is a portion of his judgment:

"The evidence leaves no doubt that some three years ago the Mahars were removed, if not completely, yet in the main, from their services, and that in the rains of 1894 there was a general meeting at the appellant's house when the question of the restoration of the Mahars to service was considered, and an agreement was come to that on the payment of Rs. 300 they might be restored. These facts are proved by several persons who were present on the occasion and whose testimony is not weakened by the fact that some of them mention incidents not spoken to by others. Nor are they wholly denied by the patel himself. He has at one time taken the position that the villagers other than himself made the whole settlement with the Mahars and merely informed him of it. But when examined by the Mamlabir in 1894 he said that he and the villagers removed the Mahars from service and subsequently brought them back on their furnishing security to pay Rs. 300 in consideration of their re-employment. It was natural that the patel should take a leading part in a transaction of this kind carried out on behalf of the village at large, and there is no doubt that he did so. The evidence in particular of Mahadu (No. 6), the Vani who made himself responsible for the payment and who was obviously (as appears from his deposition) a most unwilling witness for the prosecution, confirms this.

"A more difficult question, however, remains, namely, whether this transaction, which seems to have been carried through without concealment and to have been at one time avowed by the patel, comes within the provisions of s. 161 of the Penal Code. It is contended that the money was intended for a village purpose, namely, [519] the repairing of a temple; that it was in the nature of a fine in respect of cattle supposed to have been poisoned by the Mahars during their period of suspension; and, further, that this suspension was only from their private services to the villagers and not from their public service to Government. The village system is older than the institution of patel as Government servants, and it was probably not the intention of the criminal law to forbid a bargain being made between the general body of the residents of a village and the distinct body of the Mahars. I do not find it proved that the patel intended to take the Rs. 300 for himself alone. On the contrary the Mahars themselves seem to have regarded the transaction as a contract and not as a bribe, for they claimed, according to the chief constable’s evidence, to cancel the hawala they had given through Mahadu when they found that their restoration to service was forbidden.

"But though there might be a legitimate bargain between the villagers and the Mahars, I do not think the present one was such. I do not think the public and private services of the Mahars can be distinguished in the way attempted, or that the distinction was present to any of the parties' minds at the time. It is well known, and the records of any village will show (see, for instance, Village Form 9 in Hope’s Manual of Revenue Accounts) that public remuneration is given to village servants who are useful to the village community as well as to those who are useful to Government. Besides, I think it is proved that the Mahars were removed generally from the essentially public function of carrying the village revenue to the taluka. For though the trying Magistrate is mistaken in saying that there is no instance of their doing this during the period of suspension, yet the fact that only four instances have been found and that none of these is later in date than 14th December, 1892, shows that the suspension was general and was, for the space of a year and a half, complete.

"The appellant as a public servant must have known that he had no right to deal with the Mahars who were in receipt of remuneration from the State. His first act in removing them is not in question now; but when in his public capacity he becomes a party to their restoration, and agreed to accept, even for a village purpose, a sum of money as a consideration for such restoration, which could not be effected without his concurrence—for the Mahars serve immediately under him—he committed the offence of which he has been convicted."

The accused applied to the High Court under its revisional jurisdiction.

Kirkpatrick (N. C. Chandavarkar with him), for the accused.—There has been no offence under s. 161 of the Penal Code. The Judge finds that the Rs. 300 were to be paid, not to the patel (accused) but to repair a village temple. This cannot be a "gratification" within the meaning of the section. The accused is not shown to be personally interested in the temple. If he has any interest it is an interest common to all the parties to the arrangement and to the whole village community. He had no power, as patel, to restore the Mahars to their employment. Only the villagers as a community could do that. His concurrence, therefore, was not an "official act." It was not as patel, but as a villager, he concurred. The fact that he holds the office of patel does not divest him of his rights and interests as a villager. There was no corrupt motive on either side, nor any concealment. The arrangement was made by the villagers at a meeting at which he was present, but not as an official. He was surely not bound to absent himself or, if present, to dissent and by his influence prevent an arrangement restoring peace between the different classes in the village. The satisfaction arising from the knowledge that he had assisted in restoring peace is not a "gratification" within the section.

There was no appearance for the Crown.
JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—On the findings of fact of the Sessions Judge we have to say whether the act done is punishable under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code. The accused, being the revenue and police patel, is a public servant. He agreed to accept money as a motive for restoring some village Mahars to office. These village servants have duties connected with the public revenue, the village police, and the civil administration; they are usually remunerated by haks of money or kind; and have long been recognized as officers, and are called so in such statutes as Bombay Act III of 1874. The patel is their superior; he is the head of the village police under Bombay Act VIII of 1867, and of course must use all his lawful powers to prevent and detect cattle-poisoning, a form of crime to which such persons as village Mahars are sometimes prone, as recognized in s. 64 of Bombay Act III of 1874, because of their alleged right to the corpus or the skin of dead cattle as a hak. This statement shows that the bargain about reinstating the Mahars in office was connected with official functions. It appears to come within the words of s. 161 of the Penal Code, which are wide, and deal with any gratification whatever other than legal remuneration.

The question then arises whether what was done comes within the meaning. The plain words exclude the defence that the benefit bargained for was to go to somebody else, and also exclude [621] the notion that an officer is protected if he agrees to let his official acts be swayed by the motive of accepting a gratification to be used professedly for advancing some public, not private, object, such as charity, science, or religion. That kind of motive is different to the desire of private lucre: but it may easily lead to oppression, and the subject in the pursuit or enjoyment of a right ought not to be bampered by any thought of pleasing the officer by promising a subscription of any kind, however laudable. Nor ought an officer to be affected in his duty to the Crown in dealing with a subject by such a consideration. There is no distinction between offices held at common law or by statute. The Imperial legislation extended to India is sweeping in its penalties against acceptance of gifts by officers. (See 33 Geo. 3. c. 52, s. 62.) The law is very jealous of bargains for offices, as the numerous reported decisions on English and Indian cases on the Statute 5 and 6, Edward VI, c. 16, show, for which see chap. 15 of Bk. 2, Russell on Crimes, of buying and selling offices. The scope of Parliamentary legislation is fully discussed in the case relating to the corrupt mamlatdars, who confessed to the purchase of offices of civil and criminal judicature. Such a person is disabled from holding office during life, and although the Queen may pardon the misdemeanour, it is not lawful for the Queen to replace him in office. (See In re Ganesh Narayen Sathe (1)).

One chief reason of the disability is the danger of extortion from the suitors. So the Commons in impeaching Lord Chancellor the Earl of Macclesfield replied: "When it is said that a good officer may give money for his place and may resist the temptation of extortion, it is what the law of England would not trust to human frailty." So in matters outside that Act of Parliament the Courts have often held these bargains to be against the public policy.

In the present case there was the danger that if the village Mahars paid Rs. 300 for restoration to office, they might make the enterprise profitable by illegal or dishonest practices. On these considerations we infor that the act done is a misdemeanour, and, therefore, such as the law strikes at by penalties. (See Queen-Empress v. Ganesha [1]) followed in Queen-Empress v. Soshi [2] Bhushan (2). The answer to an argument of the learned counsel that the village people were equally concerned in the bargain is that such a circumstance does not lessen the misdemeanour. The principle applied to the Member of Council of Madras by the King's Bench on a criminal information—Rex v. Holland (3)—applies here. The accused officer is liable for his own acts and omissions as well as for what he did in concert. We confine our remarks to the present case, as we concede to Mr. Kirkpatrick that there may easily be cases apparently within the words of s. 161 which are outside its spirit. (See Lord Macaulay's Note E. on the Penal Code: and what is said by the Judges as to corruption in Richardson v. Mellish (4), which illustrates the care required in forming a judgment on the quality of the motive, and the difference between an office and an employment.)

As regards the case before us, we think the objections taken by Mr. Kirkpatrick to the danger of a wide interpretation are met by the judgments in Douglas v. The Queen (5), construing the scope and intent of 33 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 62. While upholding the conviction, we are of opinion that the publicity of the bargain should weigh in reducing the punishment. The facts as found by the learned Judge, with whom we concur, appear to show the absence of corrupt or oppressive motive; and the Patel's conduct may be explained by referring it to a wish to end quarrels and promote a public object. We have already admitted him to bail, and we now reduce the sentence to one of fine of Rs. 10 only.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Stracey.

[14th January, 1896.]

Contract—Condition against sub-contract—Subcontract made notwithstanding condition—Suit by sub-contractor—Illegality of sub-contract—Damages—Compensation for work done—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 23.

[23] Defendant contracted with the Executive Engineer of the Public Works Department to supply materials for the construction of a public road. One of the conditions of the contract was that no work was to be undertaken, or let by task work, by the contractor without the express permission, in writing, of the Executive Engineer or his duly authorized agent. Subsequently the defendant without obtaining the requisite permission entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiff, under which the plaintiff was to do the contract work and the defendant to pay him all moneys received from the Executive Engineer under the contract after deducting ten per cent. the defendant's profit. It did not appear that the plaintiff knew of the condition against under-letting contained in the contract.

The plaintiff sued the defendant for the balance of money due to him under the oral agreement. The first Court found that the plaintiff had executed the whole of the contract work; that the defendant had received from the Executive

Engineer a total sum of Rs. 2,766-11-11 and of this had paid to the plaintiff Rs. 2,334-13-6, leaving a sum of Rs. 431-14-5 still in his hands. It ordered the defendant to pay this sum to the plaintiff less 10 per cent. of the whole sum of Rs. 2,766-11-11, and passed a decree accordingly for Rs. 155-3-8.

On appeal the Judge varied the decree by awarding to the plaintiff the whole sum of Rs. 431-14-5. He found that it had been agreed that the defendant should retain 10 per cent., but held that the agreement to assign or sublet the contract was contrary to public policy and bad under s. 28 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872). On appeal to the High Court,

"Held (reversing the decree of the Judge and restoring that of the first Court) that as it did not appear that the plaintiff knew of the condition in the contract and as the objection of illegality was not taken by the defendant, the plaintiff was not precluded from enforcing against the defendant his own contract. Even if, however, the plaintiff could not enforce the contract, he would, under the circumstances, be entitled to receive from the defendant compensation for the work and labour of which the defendant had received the benefit. The only question was how the work done should be valued. There was no direct test of its market value. The best available test was the amount which the plaintiff at the time when he entered into the agreement accepted as sufficient, namely the amount to be paid by the Executive Engineer less 10 per cent. The High Court, therefore, restored the decree of the Subordinate Judge."

Second appeal from the decision of A. H. Unwin, District Judge of Nasik, amending the decree of Rao Saheb D. G. Gharpure, Subordinate Judge of Yelga.

The plaintiff sued to recover from the defendant Rs. 599-15-3. In June, 1888, the defendant had contracted to supply to the Executive Engineer, Public Works Department, Nasik, materials for the construction of the Manmad-Kopargaon road. One of the conditions of the contract was as follows:—""No work is to be underlet, or let by task work, by the contractor without the [824] express permission, in writing, of the Executive Engineer or his duly authorised agent."

Subsequently, however, and without obtaining the required permission, the defendant entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiff that the plaintiff should do the contract work and that the defendant should pay him all sums received from the Executive Engineer under the contract after deducting 10 per cent., which the defendant was to retain as his profit. It did not appear that the plaintiff knew of the condition against under-letting contained in the contract.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff had executed the whole work; that the defendant had received from the Executive Engineer a total sum of Rs. 2,766-11-11 and had paid the plaintiff Rs. 2,334-13-6, thus leaving the Rs. 431-14-5 still in defendants' hands. The Court ordered that the defendant should pay the plaintiff this amount less 10 per cent. on the whole sum of Rs. 2,766-11-11, and passed a decree accordingly for Rs. 155-3-8.

On appeal the Judge varied the decree by awarding to the plaintiff the whole sum of Rs. 431-14-5. He found that it had been agreed that the defendant should retain 10 per cent., but held that the agreement to assign or sublet the contract was contrary to public policy and void under s. 23 of the Contract Act (IX of 1872).

The following is an extract from his judgment:

"On the facts, I concur with the Subordinate Judge that witnesses Nos. 55, 78, 79, 80 and 81 for defendant do prove that defendant did verbally sublet this public road (in) contract to plaintiff on the understanding that he, defendant, was to take 10 per cent. of the moneys that came to his hand from the Executive Engineer. It is also quite clear that plaintiff must have performed the contract work, for defendant fails to show who else did it, if plaintiff did not, so as to satisfy the Public Works Department and enable defendant to draw the final sum. Assuming, firstly, that there was no express departmental rule or clause in the defendant's contract with the Executive Engineer against a subletting of this kind, I do not think a Court would be justified in upholding such an agreement, which is surely 'of a tendency calculated to injure the public interest,' and 'against public policy,' and the consideration of which is, therefore, unlawful; vide s. 23 of the Contract Act, and Cunningham, pp. 95 and 99. This was public money and the road a public highway, and if the contractor with the Public Works Department were suffered to 'sweat' the sums paid by the department and sublet in this indolent fashion, his sub-lessee might, of course, do the same and so on ad infinitum, to the scamping of the work and detriments of the public.

But thinking it very unlikely that the Public Works Department permitted such transactions, I sent for defendant's original contract dated 2nd June, 1888, with the Executive Engineer, and that officer has furnished the file from which Exs. 10 and 11 are extracts. The 16th condition of this contract signed by plaintiff (defendant?) Gangadhar Raghunath runs thus: 'No work is to be underlet, or let by task work, by the contractor, without the express permission, in writing, of the Executive Engineer or his duly authorised agent.' There is no pretense that this sub-agreement was known to that officer.

"The decree must, therefore, be amended by adding the sum in disputes, Rs. 276.10-9, to the amount already decreed to plaintiff. As the agreement in respect of it was unlawful, and I hold with the Subordinate Judge that plaintiff has falsely denied that there was any such agreement, interest cannot be allowed on any portion of the sum decreed to plaintiff up to date; but the total sum, viz., Rs. 431.14-5, or any part of it unpaid by defendant to plaintiff, shall bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st August, 1894."

The defendant preferred a second appeal, and the plaintiff presented cross-objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Mahadev V. Bhat, for the appellant (defendant).—The Judge found that the assignment of the contract to the plaintiff was illegal and against public policy. Therefore, he ought to have dismissed the suit—Debi Prasad v. Rup Ram (1); Juddanath Shaha v. Nobin Chunder (2).

Narayan G. Chandavarkar, for the respondent (plaintiff).—The defendant did not plead the illegality of the assignment. The point was raised by the Judge himself in appeal. Even if the assignment is illegal, the illegality would not affect the defendant's liability to pay for the work done for him. The Judge has given us a decree for work done. We submit that the assignment is not illegal or opposed to public policy. It is found that we have worked for the defendant, and we are entitled to recover from him the value of the work done.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This was a suit for the recovery of Rs. 599-15-3 with interest as the balance due upon an agreement under which the plaintiff supplied the materials for the construction of a public road. In June 1888, the defendant had contracted with the Executive Engineer of the Public Works Department at Nasik to supply the materials for the Manmad-Kopargaon road, and [526] one of the conditions of the contract signed by him was as follows:

"No work is to be under-let, or let by task work, by the contractor without the express permission, in writing, of the Executive Engineer or his duly authorised agent."

Subsequently, as found by both the Courts below, the defendant entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiff that the latter should do the contract work, and that the defendant should pay to him all moneys received from the Executive Engineer under the contract, after deducting 10 per cent. as the defendant's profit. The permission, in writing, of the Executive Engineer or his duly authorised agent was not obtained as required by the contract.

It is found that the plaintiff executed the whole of the contract work, that the defendant received from the Executive Engineer under the contract payments aggregating Rs. 2,766-11-11, and that of this he paid to the plaintiff Rs. 2,334-13-6, leaving unpaid Rs. 431-14-5. The Subordinate Judge of Yeola, who heard the suit in the first instance, gave the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 155-3-8, the balance of the Rs. 431-14-5, after deducting, in accordance with the agreement, Rs. 276-10-9, or 10 per cent. on the Rs. 2,766-11-11 received by the defendant from the Executive Engineer. Both parties appealed to the District Judge of Nasik, who variad the decree by awarding to the plaintiff the entire Rs. 431-14-5, and disallowing the 10 per cent. reduction claimed by the defendant. The Judge found that the plaintiff's denial of the stipulation as to the 10 per cent. reduction was false, but held that the agreement to assign or "sub-let" the contract made by the defendant with the Executive Engineer was contrary to public policy and void under s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act. He refused to allow interest on the Rs. 431-14-5 prior to decree, and directed that each party should bear his own costs throughout. Against this decree the defendant has appealed, and the plaintiff has filed cross objections.

Although the learned Judge apparently regards the whole agreement as opposed to public policy, and not merely the stipulation for the 10 per cent. reduction, he nevertheless enforces the [527] agreement with the exception of that stipulation. By his decree he recognises the right of the plaintiff to recover all the moneys paid to the defendant by the Executive Engineer, and thus gives effect to the agreement so far as it is for the plaintiff's benefit, but rejects it so far as it is for the benefit of the defendant. The result is that the plaintiff is allowed to recover, under an agreement held to be void, more than he would have been entitled to recover if the agreement had been valid. It is, however, unnecessary for us to decide whether the learned Judge is right in holding that an assignment or sub-letting of a contract such as that made by the defendant with a public department, in breach of an express condition of the contract, is necessarily void as opposed to public policy. In the cases of Judownath Shaha v. Nobin Chunder (1) and Debi Prasad v. Bup Ram (2), which were cited to us, the agreements held to be void on that ground were agreements to assign or sub-let licenses granted under the excise laws and which the Legislature clearly intended should be held and used by the licensee only. In the present case it is not found, nor does it appear, that the plaintiff knew of the condition in the defendant's contract that the contract work was not to be underlet. The objection was not taken by the defendant. The Judge himself discovered, by sending for the original contract, that it contained the provision against sub-letting, and no evidence was given upon the question of the plaintiff's knowledge of that provision. The plaintiff would not, therefore, it appears to us, be precluded from enforcing his own contract against the defendant. If, however, the Judge is correct in holding that the plaintiff cannot enforce his contract, he would at all events under these circumstances be entitled to receive from the defendant compensation for the work and labour of which the defendant has received the benefit, and the only question is, how the work done should be valued. The real test in that case would be the market value, but of that there is no direct evidence. According to the plaintiff's contention it should be valued at the entire amount which the Executive Engineer paid to the defendant. The District Judge has adopted this view. To us it appears that it should be valued at the amount which the plaintiff, at the time [528] when he entered into the agreement, accepted as sufficient, namely, the amount to be paid by the Executive Engineer less 10 per cent., and we see no reason why he should recover more. In this view Rs. 276-10-9 must be deducted from the Rs. 431-14-5 decreed by the District Judge, and the plaintiff will have a decree for the balance Rs. 155-3-8.

We allow the appeal, and, disallowing the cross-objections, set aside the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the Subordinate Judge with costs of the appeals both in the lower appellate Court and in this Court on the plaintiff.

Decree reversed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

VASUDEO BHAIKJI JOSHI (Original Defendant No. 11), Appellant v. BHAI LAKSHMAN RAVUT AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents: BHAI LAKSHMAN RAVUT AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. RAMCHANDRA BHAIKJI JOSHI AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [16th January, 1896.]

Mortgage—Sale—Conditions for repurchase.

The plaintiffs sued to redeem an alleged mortgage made in 1823 by their ancestor to the ancestor of the defendant. The alleged mortgage recited a previous mortgage under which the mortgagor Gopal Gokhale was in possession, and it stated that a sale had been contemplated, but the parties could not agree as to price, but that they had now settled it at Rs. 125 and the amount due on the mortgage at Rs. 200, and that the following arrangement was come to, viz. that if within four years the mortgagor paid Rs. 125 with interest, he should get back the land; if not, that the land should be the absolute property of Gokhale.

Held, that this was not a mortgage but a sale. It was an agreement which put an end to the previously existing mortgage. A mere stipulation for repurchase does not make a transaction a mortgage. To make a mortgage there must be a debt, and here there was no debt, nor was the property here conveyed as security.

* Cross Second Appeals Nos. 103 and 253 of 1895.
CROSS second appeals from the decision of Rao Bahadur V. V. Wagle, First Class Subordinate Judge of Ratnagiri, with appellate powers, reversing the decree of Rao Sabeb V. K. Sovani, Joint Subordinate Judge of Rajapur.

[539] Suit for redemption. The plaintiff alleged that in 1823 the lands in question were mortgaged by their ancestors Krishnaji and Arjun to the first defendant's father Gopal Gokhale and that the mortgage-debt was now paid off.

At the trial the original of the alleged mortgage was not produced by the mortgagee, and the plaintiff was allowed to put in a certified copy. The following is a translation:

(Sale-deed).

"Shri (i.e. Prosperity, &c.).

"Peace—the lunar date the 7th of Shravan Shudh of the Shake year 1745 in the cyclical year named Subhanu (13th August, 1823). On that day (this) deed of sale, i.e., mirasaptra, is given in writing to Rajeshri Gopal Anant Gokhale Murukar Mahajan (of) majre Hollidale Karyat Mithgavne, by Krishnaji Naik and Arjunji Naik bin Harji Naik Bavut of majre Madkhah Karyat aforesaid. I give this deed of sale, i.e., mirasaptra, in writing as follows:—There are my thikans at the abovementioned majre (i.e., village) which have continued uninterruptedly. Out of them my own mirasi field, Kagur field, together with sal; batty ground, and together with 'Temba field' situate at majre Kuveshi were formerly given (in mortgage) in the Shake year 1739 (1817-18 A.D.) by a mortgage-deed for Rs. (170) one hundred and seventy given in writing in the names of yourself and Lakshman Narayan Desai, according to which you have been carrying on the vabivat (i.e., management) thereof, and as mentioned in the former deed a mirasaptra (i.e., a title-deed of miras) was to have been given in writing; but as you and myself could not come to an agreement as to the price, the same was not given in writing. Now by your and my consent the price has been settled, and I give (a letter is missing) in writing, the particulars whereof are as follows:—

1. The above amount due to you (letters missing) and the balance settled on account of interest up to this day is (Rs.) 30, making together Rs. 200, which is the amount payable (to you). Out of them the price (letters missing) (made) payable on the (mortgage) deed is (125) one hundred and twenty-five rupees. If I pay the same within five years, I will pay your amount with interest at the rate of three-quarters of a rupee (per cent. per month), and redeem the field. Therein (that is, in the account) you are to give me credit for whatever produce the field may yield; you are to give me credit (for the produce) after deducting the Government (assessment). If I fail to pay the amount within five years, then as mentioned above the fields have (will) become your miras (i.e., property by miras rights).

75. The remaining seventy-five rupees due to you are made payable on personal security. I will pay these within one year as moneys carrying no interest, or I will give you my own (field called) 'Khavlatil shet' itself.

Such is the agreement given in writing according to which I will act. I will not fail to do so. The handwriting of Atmaram Bahirav Karkare.

[580] The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, holding that the property in dispute was not mortgaged and that the claim was time-barred.
On appeal by the plaintiffs, the Judge reversed the decree and passed a decree directing the plaintiffs to redeem the lands on payment of Rs 200 to defendants within six calendar months and in default to be foreclosed forever.

Defendant No. 11 and the plaintiffs preferred cross second appeals. Manokshah, J. Taleyorkhan, for appellant (defendant) in second appeal No. 103 and respondent in second appeal No. 253.—The certificate copy is the only evidence of the alleged mortgage, and it cannot prove the transaction under s. 90 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872). A certified copy cannot prove the genuineness of the original document, though it would be a very good evidence of the contents thereof.

[FARRAN, C.J., referred to Khetter Chunder Mookerjee v. Khetter Paul Sreeteertuno (1).]

We contend, however, that the transaction in dispute is a sale and not a mortgage, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to redeem—Subhabhat v. Vasudevbat (2) and Bapuji v. Senavaraji (3).

Narayan V. Gokhale, for respondents (plaintiffs) in second appeal No. 103 and appellants in second appeal No. 253.—The defendant will not produce the original of the mortgage, and we are compelled to put in the certified copy which we obtained in the year 1882.

The construction put on the document by the Judge is correct. The transaction is a gahan-lahan mortgage. The document clearly mentions that, if the money be not paid in time, the transaction is to become miras. This is a gahan-lahan condition, which cannot be given effect to. Further, the document stipulates that, after the expiration of the period of five years, the mortgagee is to keep account of the profits. The transaction in Subhabhat v. Vasudevbat (2) was a sale liable to be converted into a mortgage. [531] The transactions in Bapuji v. Senavaraji (3) was an out and out sale. The clause in Ramji v. Chinto (4) was similar to the clause in the present document.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—This suit was brought by plaintiffs to redeem an alleged mortgage of the year 1823 passed by an ancestor of the Ravus (plaintiffs) to one Gokhale, whose rights were purchased in 1833 by the Marathes through whom the appellant (defendant No. 11) claims.

It appears that the defendant No. 1 (a member of the Gokhale family) produced in the course of some criminal proceedings in 1832 the original deed of 1823, and the plaintiffs obtained a certified copy of it. This they now have filed as secondary evidence of the deed itself. They are entitled to do this, as the defendant No. 1 does not and will not produce the original.

It was, however, contended on behalf of the defendant No. 11 that the presumption to be drawn, under s. 90 of the Evidence Act, as regards the genuineness of ancient documents should not be drawn in the case of this copy. The decision of Wilson, J., in the case of Khetter Chunder Mookerjee v. Khetter Paul Sreeteertuno (1) is opposed to the argument, as also are some remarks in s. 621 of Taylor on Evidence (8th Ed.). It is, however, unnecessary in the present case to elaborate the point. We have only to determine whether the plaintiffs have a right to redeem. They can only have that right if there is a mortgage still subsisting. The document: is put forward by them as the mortgage and they are bound by its terms. It does not purport to be a mortgage at all but a sale-deed. It recites the fact of a previous mortgage in 1817-18 for Rs. 170 under which Gokhale was in possession, and it states that although a sale had been contemplated, it had not been effected, because the parties could not agree as to the price of the lands mortgaged. It goes on to say that now the price of the lands has been settled at Rs. 125 and the amount due under the mortgage at Rs. 200, and the following arrangement is come to. If within five years Ravut paid Rs. 125 with interest, he should have back the lands, Gokhale accounting [532] for the profits; if he did not so pay, the lands should be the absolute property of Gokhale. The Rs. 75 balance were to be paid in one year; in default, another field was to be given to Gokhale.

(1) 5 C. 866. (2) 2 B. 113. (3) 2 B. 231. (4) 1 B.H.O.B. 199.

It seems to us that by this agreement the parties put an end to the mortgage that was subsisting at its date and substituted for it the agreement in question. This latter agreement is not a mortgage. It extinguished the mortgage-debt, so that after its execution Gokhale could no longer have enforced payment of what was due to him. A mere stipulation for repurchase will not make a case one of mortgage. To make a mortgage there must be a debt, and here there was no debt. Moreover, the property was not conveyed to Gokhale as security for the payment of the Rs. 125, but it was to be his, unless that sum with interest was paid within five years. The sum of Rs. 125 was the actual value of the lands; it was a fair price for the absolute purchase, and we find that the parties carried out their agreement, for the money was not paid, and in 1888 the lands were transferred to Gokhale's name in the revenue books. We are unable to distinguish this case from the case of Bhuvi v. Sidu (1), which follows Bapuji v. Senavarji (2).

We, therefore, reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court, and restore that of the Court of first instance, with costs on plaintiffs throughout.

Decree reversed.

[533] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farrar Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parsons.

PARASRAM AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. GANPAT AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents.*
[[20th January, 1896.]]

Registration—Registration Act (111 of 1877), s. 17, cls. (c) and (h)—Receipt for purchase money—Document creating or extinguishing a right to immovable property.

The plaintiffs sued to recover the property sold to them by the defendants. The defendants set up a re-purchase and produced a receipt passed to them by the plaintiffs which stated that the plaintiffs had no longer any interest in the property and that they would execute a new sale-deed. The plaintiffs contended that the receipt required registration.

Held, that as the receipt created or declared or extinguished a right to the property with a super-added covenant to execute a stamped document to the same effect on a future occasion, it required registration.

* Second Appeal No. 171 of 1895.

(1) P. J. (1898) p. 368.

(2) 2 B. 281.
SECOND appeal from the decision of Arthur H. Unwin, District Judge of Nasik, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb S. M. Kale, Subordinate Judge of Malegaon.

Suit in ejectment. The plaintiffs had bought the house in question in 1875 from the defendants, and now sued for possession. The defendants alleged that in 1883 they had re-purchased the house from the plaintiffs, and they relied on a document of which the following is a translation:

"Receipt passed on Magh Shudh 13th, Shaka 1804, cyclic year of the name of Chitrabhanu (19th February, 1883), to Ganpati valad Navji of Chinchvad, taluka Malegaon, district Nasik, by Parashram valad Raja Patil of Chinchvad, taluka Malegaon, district Nasik, as follows:—Rs. 322-8-0, that is Rs. 222-8, former debt, including principal and interest up to date and Rs. 100, being the price of your two houses which are with us by reason of purchase, in all Rs. 322-8-0 is due to us by you. The same debt you have discharged by giving us twenty-seven maunds of cotton worth Rs. 135 at the rate of Rs. 5 per maund and by paying us this day in cash Rs. 187-8. Thus you have paid us in all Rs. 322-8-0 which we have received. Now up to date nothing is due to us by you. Should there be any khatra or bond, the same is to be deemed as cancelled. We have no longer any interest remaining in any way in the aforesaid two houses. We shall execute to you a now sale-deed on a stamp. This receipt is passed by us in our sound mind and of free will and accord."

The Subordinate Judge passed a decree for the plaintiffs. He held that the above document not being registered was inadmissible in evidence.

[334] On appeal by the defendants, the Judge reversed the decree, holding that the receipt did not require registration and was admissible in evidence, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to eject the defendants.

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Ganesh K. Deshamukh, for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The document relied on by the defendants, either creates a title or it does not. If it does create a title and operates as a sale-deed, then not being registered it is inadmissible in evidence. If it does not create a title, then the defendants cannot resist our claim, as they have no other evidence. Whether the document is a sale-deed or a mere receipt, it requires registration under cl. (c), s. 17 of the Registration Act (III of 1877)—Valaji Isaji v. Thomas(1); Basawa v. Kalkapa (2); Waman Ramchandra v. Dhondiba Krishnaji (3); Faki v. Khotu (4); Ramapa v. Umanna (5). The language of the document shows that it was intended to be evidence of title.

Vasudev G. Bhandarkar, for the respondents (defendants).—The document does not require registration, as it contemplates the execution of another document. Further, it shows that there was a previous oral contract of sale. The property became vested in the defendants when the whole consideration was paid and not under the document. It, therefore, does not require registration—cl. (h) of s. 17 of the Registration Act. It does not by itself create or extinguish any right in immovable property—Chunilal v. Bomanji (6), Shridhar v. Chintaman (7).

JUDGMENT.

FAIRFAX, C. J.—The plaintiffs seek to recover the property in suit by reason of an admitted sale of it by the defendants to them. The defendants attempt to resist plaintiffs' claim by alleging a repurchase of the property on 19th February, 1893, from the plaintiffs. In proof of this repurchase they produce the document bearing date on that day. It is the only proof which [535] they adduce. The question is whether it is admissible in evidence, not being registered.

In the document the plaintiffs state that they received Rs. 322-8-0, which, as the receipt shows, included a sum of Rs. 100, the alleged consideration for the repurchase. It is contended that under cl. (c) of s. 17 of the Registration Act the document, therefore, requires registration. Mr. Bhattacharyya for the defendants, on the other hand, argues that there was a prior oral sale which passed the property, but which became complete only on payment of the consideration; but assuming that to be so, the payment of the consideration which completed the title to the land is evidenced by the document, and it, therefore, falls within the express words of cl. (c), as the payment extinguishes the plaintiffs' title to the land. There is not, however, any evidence of the prior oral agreement which Mr. Bhattacharyya suggests. The document then goes on: "We (the plaintiffs) have no longer any interest remaining in any way in the aforesaid two houses. We shall execute to you a new sale-deed on a stamp." The lower appellate Court has treated this as an agreement falling within cl. (a) of s. 17 of the Act as not in itself creating or declaring or extinguishing a right, but merely creating a right to a document, which will, when executed, create, declare or extinguish a right. We are unable to agree in that view. To us it appears to create or declare or extinguish at once a right to the property with a superadded covenant to execute a stamped document to the same effect—another sale-deed stamped—on a future occasion. Manifestly it requires registration.

We reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court, and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in this and the lower appellate Court on the respondents.

Decree reversed.

[536] CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

IMPERATRIX v. KESAVLAL JESHRISHNA AND OTHERS.*

[20th January, 1896.]

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 426 and 441—Criminal trespass—Mischief—Who may complain?

The words "any person in possession" in s. 441 of the Indian Penal Code do not mean only "a complainant in possession."

Certain persons were prosecuted under ss. 426 and 441 of the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860) for committing mischief and criminal trespass by entering upon a certain field which was in the possession of the complainant's tenants and destroying the seed sown therein.

* Application for Criminal Revision, No. 967 of 1895.
The defence raised was an alibi; it was also contended on behalf of the accused that the field belonged to one of them, and that the complainant had no title whatever to it.

The Magistrate, who tried the case, declined to go into the question of title; he found that the complainant’s tenants were in possession of the field; and disbelieving the evidence of alibi he convicted the accused and sentenced them to fine.

On an application in revision to the High Court it was urged (inter alia) that the complainant, not being the person in possession, could not legally institute the criminal proceedings, and that, therefore, the conviction was bad.

Held that, looking to the nature of the false defence set up by the accused, this was not a case for interference in revision, as to do so would encourage perjury.

Held, also, that the words “any person in possession” in s. 441 of the Indian Penal Code do not mean only “a complainant in possession,” there being no authority for taking the offences of mischief and criminal trespass out of the general rule which allows any person to complain of a criminal act.

Reference in the case of Kaimal Niz Chowdhury (1), Chandhi Persad v. Evans (2), Ishwar v. Sital (3), and In re Ganesh Sathe (4) referred to.

This was an application under s. 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act X of 1882) for the exercise of the High Court’s criminal revisional jurisdiction.

The accused were charged with having entered and ploughed up a field in the possession of the complainant. They were convicted of mischief and criminal trespass under ss. 426 and 447 of the Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860).

The accused at the trial pleaded an alibi. The first accused (Keshavlal) further pleaded that he was the owner of the land in question, and that the complainant had no title to it.

The Magistrate disbelieved the evidence as to the alibi and declined to go into the question of title. He found that the complainant was in possession, through his tenants. He convicted the accused, and sentenced them to pay a fine.

The accused applied to the High Court under its revisional jurisdiction.

Robertson (with him Ramdatt Vithoba Desai), for the accused:—

The defence was that the land was not the complainant’s, but belonged to the first accused (Keshavlal). If it was Keshavlal’s, he had a right to enter and plough it, and his doing so was no offence. The Magistrate ought to have referred the complainant to a Civil Court in order that the question might be properly tried. If he desired to try the case himself, he should have heard our evidence of title.

Again, the complainant was not himself in possession of the land, nor was he the person injured by the conduct of the accused. He was not the person in possession contemplated by s. 441 of the Penal Code. He ought not, therefore, to be allowed to be the complainant in this case—Kaimal Niz Chowdhury (1); Chandhi Pershad v. Evans (2); Ishwar v. Sital (3); Bacon’s Abridgement—Trespass, p. 554; 4 Comyn’s Digest, Indictment, p. 372; Hale’s Pleas of the Crown, pp. 514, 515; Archbold, p. 5; Stephen’s History of the Criminal Law, 495.

(The Court referred to In re Ganesh Sathe (4).) That was a case in which Magistrates were accused of purchasing their offices, a matter in which the general public are interested. This is an entirely different case and is not of the slightest importance to the public.

There was no appearance for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—This is not a case for interference by revision. The plea of the accused under s. 242 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was aibis; and the Magistrate is clearly of opinion that the evidence of aibis was false. Thereupon he convicted. It would encourage perjury if this Court re-opened the case on the ground that one of the accused was owner of the land, and that he entered on it with the others, and ploughed it on a bona fide claim of right.

Mr. Robertson contended that the only person having a right to complain of criminal trespass is the person in possession or the person injured, and cited Reference in the case of Kalimuth Nag Chowdhry (1), Chandi Pershad v. Evans (2).

We do not think it can be contended that the learned Judges meant to say that in s. 441 of the Penal Code the words "any person in possession" mean only "a complainant in possession." Nor is that construction supported by Iswar v. Sital (3). The destruction of the crop must have been damaging or annoying to the owner or tenant or both as in the present case. The leading authority on the question of criminal law, who may complain? is In Re Ganesh Sathe (4).

Mr. Robertson sought to distinguish that case on the ground that the complaint there related to higher misdemeanours, corrupt purchases of judicial offices, a matter of immense public concern. But he has shown us no authority for taking the offences of mischief and criminal trespass out of the general rule which allows any person to complain of a criminal act. Exceptions are made by statute; if by our decision we added a new exception to Chap. XV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, we would invade the functions of the Legislature.

The Court rejects the petition.

Petition rejected.

ACHUT RAMCHANDRA PAI (Original Defendant), Appellant v. MANJUNATH VENKATNARANAPPA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents; MANJUNATH VENKATNARANAPPA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. ACHUT RAMCHANDRA PAI (Original Defendant), Respondent*. [20th January, 1896.]

Under s. 210 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act VIII of 1859), an execution sale of the property of a deceased judgment-debtor was binding, if the estate of the deceased was sufficiently represented (1) by the widow and (2) by their minor sons.

* Cross Second Appeals Nos. 5 and 6 of 1896.

(3) 8 B.L.R. App. 63. (4) 18 B. 600.
A Hindu judgment-debtor died, leaving a widow and two sons, who were minors. His widow was placed on the record as his heir, and not his sons. Certain property of the deceased was sold in execution. The sale certificate issued to the purchaser stated that he had purchased the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor in the property. In a suit subsequently brought by the sons,

"Held, that they were bound by the sale. The widow of the deceased judgment-debtor, who as natural guardian of the minor sons was in possession of the property, was upon the record, and it was clear that it was the interest of the judgment-debtor, and not that of the widow, that was intended to be sold."

Cross second appeals from the decision of E. H. Moscardi, District Judge of Kanara, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb H. S. Phadnis, Subordinate Judge of Kurna.

On 21st February, 1866, Venkatesh Pai obtained a decree against Venkat for Rs. 951 with interest and costs. Subsequently Venkat died, leaving a widow and two sons (the plaintiffs), who were then minors. Venkatesh had made several ineffectual attempts to execute the decree during the lifetime of Venkat. In the year 1876 he again applied for execution, placing Venkat's widow, and not his sons, on the record. In his application for execution, the judgment-debtor was described as "Venkat, deceased, by his heiress and widow Sundrabai." The application was granted, and the property now in dispute was [340] put up to auction sale. It was purchased by the decree-holder Venkatesh Pai on the 19th September, 1876, and he was put in possession on the 22nd June, 1879.

The certificate of sale granted to him as purchaser ran as follows:—"In the sale of 19th September, 1876, the plaintiff Venkatesh having paid Rs. 1,075 has purchased the right, title and interest in the above-mentioned property of the original defendant Venkat."

After the purchase a partition took place between Venkatesh and his nephew the defendant, and the property in dispute fell to the latter's share.

On the 21st June, 1891, the plaintiffs, who were minors at the time of their father's death and of whom the younger attained majority within three years, brought the present suit against the defendant to recover possession with mesne profits for twelve years.

The defendant pleaded that the sale was binding on the plaintiffs, and that the suit was barred by limitation.

The Subordinate Judge rejected the claim, holding that the sale was binding on the plaintiffs, and that the claim was time-barred.

On appeal by the plaintiffs, the Judge reversed the decree, holding that the claim was not time-barred, and that the plaintiffs were not bound by the sale, not having been parties to the execution proceedings. He, however, directed that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendant Rs. 1,075 principal, plus Rs. 1,075 interest, within six months before delivery of the property to them.

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni, with Ganpat S. Mulgaumkar for the appellant (defendant).—We say the Court-sale is binding on the plaintiffs. It took place under the Civil Procedure Code (Act VIII of 1859), s. 210. The plaintiffs were then minors, but they were sufficiently represented by their mother and guardian who was on the record. The certificate of sale clearly shows that what was sold was the estate of the deceased Venkat and not of his widow. The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot impeach the sale.
—Chathakelan v. Govinda Karumiar (1), Suryanna v. Durgi (2); Haji v. Atharaman (3). The suit is barred under art. 12 of sch. II of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

Narayan G. Chandavarkar, for respondents (plaintiffs).—The plaintiffs were not parties to the sale. The decree-holder was aware of the existence of the plaintiffs, who were minors at the time of the sale, and yet he omitted to join them as parties. Even supposing that art. 12 is applicable, still the suit cannot be held to be barred in the case of the plaintiffs, who attained majority within three years of the institution of the suit.

Section 210 of the Code (Act VIII of 1859) is not materially different from s. 234 of the present Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). The widow of the deceased judgment-debtor was brought on the record as the heir of the deceased and not as the guardian of the plaintiffs. We submit that the plaintiffs were not represented by the widow, and the sale as against her in her capacity as heir cannot bind the plaintiffs. We submit that the sale is null and void, because the minors were not parties to the proceedings—Shaik Abdulla Sahiba v. Haji Abdulla (4).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—On the 21st February, 1866, Venkatesh Pai obtained a money decree for Rs. 951 with interest and costs against Venkat, the father of the plaintiffs. That decree Venkatesh Pai made several attempts to execute during the lifetime of the plaintiffs’ father. The last application, which was made in the lifetime of the father of the plaintiffs, was made and granted in 1874.

After the death of the plaintiffs’ father, Venkatesh Pai not having then obtained satisfaction again applied, in 1876, to execute his decree. His darkhast mentioned Sundrabai, the mother of the plaintiffs, as the widow and heir of the plaintiffs’ deceased father Venkat. The plaintiffs were then minors, but as they were the sons of Venkat, the judgment-debtor, they, and not his widow, were his heirs. The property in suit was put up for sale by the Court and was sold on the 19th of September, 1876. Venkatesh Pai, the decree-holder, purchased it for Rs. 1,075, and a sale-certificate was granted to him as follows:—“In the sale of the 19th September, 1876, the plaintiff Venkatesh having paid Rs. 1,075 has purchased the right, title and interest in the abovementioned property of the original defendant Venkat.” Venkatesh Pai was put in possession of the property which he had thus purchased on the 22nd June, 1879. The defendant and appellant Achut Ramchandra Pai, his nephew, now represents him.

The plaintiffs as the heirs of Venkat filed the present suit to recover possession of the property from the defendant on the 22nd June, 1891, just twelve years after Venkatesh Pai had been put in possession. It is not found when the plaintiffs respectively attained their majority, but their ages as given in the plaint are not challenged. According to that statement the younger plaintiff became of age within three years of the date of suit. It is not denied that the decree in execution of which the sale took place is binding on the plaintiffs as the sons of Venkat.

The Subordinate Judge upon these facts dismissed the suit, holding that the sale was binding, as the provisions of the old Code of Procedure (VIII of 1859) had been sufficiently observed. The District Judge upon

(1) 17 M. 186.  (2) 7 M. 259.  (3) 7 M. 512.  (4) 5 B. 8. review reversed that decision. He was of opinion that there was an irregularity in the execution proceedings arising from the plaintiffs not being made parties to them, and that that irregularity had prejudiced the plaintiffs' interest. It is somewhat difficult to agree with the District Judge's view upon the latter point having regard to the mortgage to which the premises were at the date of the sale supposed to be subject, but it is unnecessary for us to consider that question, or whether it is open to us, as we are of opinion that the sale is binding on the plaintiffs.

The sale having taken place under the old law, its validity must, of course, be determined by the provisions of that law. Execution under s. 210 of Act VIII of 1859 could be taken out, either against the estate of the deceased judgment-debtor or against his legal representatives, and the authoritative rulings under that Act show that a sale of property of a deceased judgment-debtor was binding if the estate was sufficiently represented [543] quaed such property. Here the widow of the deceased, who would be as the natural guardian of his infant sons in possession of the property, was upon the record; and it is clear beyond doubt that it was the interest of the judgment-debtor, and not of the widow, which was intended to be sold. We refer to the cases of Ishan Chunder Mitter v.
Bakhsh Ali Soudagar (1); General Manager of the Raj Durbhunga v.
Maharaja Coomar Ramaput Singh (2); Biswesur Lall Sahoo v. Maharajah Luckmesser Singh (3); Sotish Chunder Lahiri v. Nil Comul Lahiry (4); Dumput Singh Bahadur v. Rane Rajessuree (5); and Chathakelan v.
Govinda Karumiar (6). In this view of the law, it is unnecessary to consider whether, assuming that the infant sons of Venkat ought to have been represented upon the execution proceedings, and that the sale was, therefore, invalid, the sale could be treated as a nullity, or whether proceedings were not necessary to set it aside, and, if so, within what period such proceedings should be taken. We must reverse the decree of the District Judge, and restore that of the Subordinate Judge with costs of the appeals in this and the lower appellate Court on the plaintiffs. Too cross appeal falls within this judgment. It must be dismissed with costs.

PARSONS, J.—I concur in dismissing the suit. The estate of the father of the plaintiffs having been sold in execution of a decree in proceedings taken under Act VIII of 1859, the utmost right that the plaintiffs could now have in order to set aside the sale would be to show that the decree was not binding on the estate in their hands by reason of the debt not being one for which that estate was liable. This they have failed to show. No ground, therefore, exists for setting aside the sale, and the plaintiffs have no title to the property in suit.

Decree reversed.

PIRJADA AHMADMIYA v. SHA KALIDAS KANJI 21 Bom. 545

21 B. 545.

[545] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

PIRJADA AHMADMIYA PIRMITA AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. SHA KALIDAS KANJI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [31st January, 1896.] 1896

Mortgage—Subsequent mortgage of same land—Decree on first mortgage—Sale in execution of some of mortgaged land—Purchase by subsequent mortgagees subject to their own mortgage—Effect of such sale—Redemption—Subsequent suit by mortgagees for redemption of lands other than those sold—Redemption of part of mortgaged property—Apportionment of mortgage-debt.

In 1874 plaintiffs mortgaged to one Samaldas seven fields, of which four were Survey Nos. 22, 23, 40 and 41. In 1876, they mortgaged those same four fields with other lands to the defendants. In 1877 Samaldas obtained a decree upon his mortgage and in execution sold only Nos. 22, 23 and 41, which realized sufficient to satisfy his decree. These three fields were on the application of the defendants sold subject to their mortgage, and they themselves purchased them at the sale. The plaintiffs now sued to redeem the remaining lands comprised in the mortgage of 1876, exclusive of those which had been sold in execution.

Held, that they were entitled to redeem this part of the mortgaged property, as the mortgagees had themselves acquired the plaintiffs' (mortgagors') interest in the other part and so severed their claim under the mortgage.

Held, also, that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem on payment of such portion of the mortgage-debt as remained after deducting the portion of it to which the lands purchased by defendants were liable.

[R., 6 Bom.L.R. 264 ; D., 24 M. 96 (112).]

APPEAL from the decision of J. Weir, Additional Assistant Judge of Ahmedabad.

Suit for possession and declaration and that the property in suit was not subject to certain mortgage liens. The plaintiffs sued under the following circumstances:—

On the 8th June, 1874, the plaintiffs mortgaged to one Samaldas Survey Nos. 7, 22, 23, 32, 35, 40 and 41 for Rs. 6,995. The mortgage purported to be in possession, but possession was not given to the mortgagee.

On the 24th March, 1876, the plaintiffs mortgaged with possession to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 (Kalidas and Nagam Vallab) Survey Nos. 22, 23, 40, 41, 43 and 46 and five houses for Rs. 4,999.

[545] In 1877 Samaldas sued on his mortgage and obtained a decree, in execution of which he attached the property comprised in his mortgage-deed. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 then applied to the Court that the property should be sold subject to their mortgage. The property was accordingly put up to sale, but Survey Nos. 22, 23 and 41 only were sold, enough money having been realized by their sale to satisfy the decree.

At the auction sale the property was purchased by defendants Nos. 3 and 4. Defendant No. 4 purchased in his own right and defendant No. 3 bought benami for defendants Nos. 1 and 2, with whom he was joint. The auction sale took place on the 4th February, 1881, and the purchasers recovered possession in or about October, 1882.

In the year 1893 the plaintiffs brought the present suit to redeem the property comprised in the mortgage of 1876, with the exception of that portion of it which had been sold at the auction sale.

* Appeal No. 192 of 1894.
1896

The Judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree for redemption of the property mentioned in the plaint, but he ordered them to repay to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 the whole of the original debt, viz., Rs. 4,999.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Ghanasham N. Naidi, for appellants (plaintiffs):—The Judge requires us to pay the whole debt due to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 under the mortgage of 1876. But as to part of mortgaged land, viz., Nos. 22, 23 and 41, our equity of redemption was sold and is now the property of the defendants, who themselves bought it at the sale. They applied that those lands should be sold subject to their mortgage, and that was done. They, therefore, now hold those lands subject to their due share of the original mortgage-debt and the remaining lands which we now seek to redeem are only subject to the remaining portion of the mortgage-debt. But the order of the Judge makes them subject to the whole debt, thus exempting the land bought by the defendants. The debt should be apportioned on the whole of the mortgaged property—Moro Raghunath v. Balaji Trimbak (1).

[546] Chimnialat H. Setalvad, for respondent No. 2 (defendant No. 2).

Govardhanram M. Tripathi, for respondent No. 4 (defendant No. 4).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—In 1874 the plaintiffs mortgaged to one Samaldas for Rs. 6,995 Survey Nos. 7, 22, 23, 32, 35, 40 and 41 (Ex. 70), but remained on in possession. In 1876 the plaintiffs mortgaged to the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for Rs. 4,999 Survey Nos. 22, 23, 40, 41, 43, 46 and five houses and placed them in possession (Ex. 56).

In 1877 Samaldas sued on his mortgage and obtained a decree in execution of which he caused the property mortgaged to him to be attached. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 then applied to the Court stating their mortgage and asking that their charge on the property might be continued (Ex. 21). Notices were issued to the parties to the decree, and an enquiry was held, the defendant's deed of mortgage was found to be proved, and the Court ordered that "in case of notifications being issued under the plaintiffs' darkhast, the kind of interest that this applicant puts forward should be mentioned." The proclamation of sale accordingly mentioned the lien. It further stated that the right, title and interest of the plaintiffs as now existing was to be sold (Ex. 59). The memo. of the sale (50) contains these words: "Making mention of the mortgage charge of Nagar Valab and Kala Kanji for Rs. 4,999, the auction-sale is made so that only the right, title and interest of the defendants Pir Miya and Mamdu Miya alone will be sold."

At the sale only Survey Nos. 22, 23 and 41 were sold, enough money having been realised by their sale to satisfy the decree. Defendants Nos. 3 and 4 were the purchasers. Defendant No. 4 was a purchaser in his own right, but defendant No. 3 bought tenami for defendants Nos. 1 and 2, with whom he was joint so that really defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 4 are the purchasers and present owners.

The certificate of sale states that "on the abovementioned patas (lots), Survey Nos. 22 and 23, there is the san lien of Nagar Valabb and Kala Kanji under a deed for Rs. 4,999; and moreover [547] on the pata (lot) No. 22 there is the san lien of the abovementioned Nagar Valab and Kala Kanji under a deed for Rs. 500; and on pata (lot) No. 41 there is the mortgage lien of the said Nagar· Valabh and Kala Kanji claimable under the same deed for Rs. 4,999. Subject to these liens, which have been notified, the sale by auction has been made. The surplus money after satisfying the decree was paid to the plaintiffs (58).

There can, therefore, be little doubt on this part of the case as to what the defendants purchased. It is quite clear that they bought the land subject to the charge created by the deed of mortgage (56) and the defendant No. 4 admits that is what he bought (72). Of course, Samajdas need not have had the land sold subject to that charge, but he apparently did not oppose the application of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 that it should be so sold, and by order of the Court it was sold accordingly. It was by the action of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2, the mortgagees themselves, that this was done, and they also became the purchasers of a share of their mortgagees in the mortgaged property.

The position, therefore, of the parties is this: Survey Nos. 22, 23, 40, 41, 43 and 46 and five houses are held subject to the charge created by the mortgage-deed (Ex. 56). Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 4 have purchased the right the plaintiffs had to redeem Nos. 22, 23 and 41, but the plaintiffs have the right to redeem the rest of the property.

The plaintiffs brought this suit practically for the purpose of redeeming this property, and the Assistant Judge has allowed them to do so, but only on payment of the full mortgage-debt of Rs. 4,999. This is wrong. It ignores the fact that the property purchased by the defendants was sold subject to the mortgage and is still burdened with the mortgage-debt. The plaintiffs can redeem a part of the mortgaged property since the mortgagees have themselves acquired the share of their mortgagees and so severed their interests under the mortgage. See Moro v. Balaji (1). This is also the present law under the Transfer of Property Act, ss. 60 and 67. It will, therefore, have to be ascertained what proportionate amount of the mortgage-debt is charged on the property [548] purchased by the defendants, for that has to be deducted from the whole amount in order to ascertain the amount that the plaintiffs have now to pay.

We ask the lower Court to find on this issue, viz., what proportionate amount of the whole mortgage-debt due under the Ex. 56 are the defendants liable for in respect of Survey Nos. 22, 23 and 41?

Evidence can be given by the parties, and the finding should be certified to this Court within a month.

Issue sent down.
APPELLATE CIVIL.
Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parsons.

BAPU AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Applicants v. VAJIR AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Opponents.* [21st January, 1896.]

The dismissal of an appeal under s. 551 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) leaves the decree of the lower Court untouched, neither confirmed, nor varied, nor reversed, and it remains the decree of the lower Court which can amend it, in order to bring it into accordance with its judgment.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Bahadur Chunnial Manecklal, First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia, with appellate powers.

The plaintiff sued to establish his right to have a mortgage-bond passed to him by the defendants registered under the Registration Act (III of 1877). The defendants having denied execution before the Registrar, registration of the bond was refused.

The defendants denied execution of the bond.

The Subordinate Judge (Rao Saheb Vaman M. Bodas) found that the execution of the bond by the defendants was not proved. He, therefore, rejected the claim.

[549] On appeal by the plaintiff the Judge found that the execution of the bond by the defendants was proved, and he passed the following decree:

"I reverse the decree of the Court below and award the plaintiff's claim with costs. Costs of the plaintiff in both the Courts should be borne by the defendants in addition to their own."

The defendants having preferred a second appeal (No. 653 of 1894), the High Court dismissed it under s. 551 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Subsequently the plaintiff applied to the Judge for a review of his judgment in appeal, on the ground that it was necessary that the decree should contain an order directing the registration of the document. The Judge ordered the decree to be amended as prayed for. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"The Code of Civil Procedure, s. 574 and s. 579 require that the judgment and decree of an appellate Court shall specify clearly the relief granted. The decree in the present case simply says 'plaintiff's claim is awarded.' The Registration Act, s. 77, says that the decree must be one directing the document to be registered. Under these circumstances, I think the decree must be amended under s. 206 of the Code and not under s. 630 of the Code."

The defendants applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction, contending that the decree of the Judge in appeal having been superseded by that of the High Court in second appeal, the Judge had no power to pass any order either under s. 206 or s. 630 of the Civil Procedure Code; that s. 206 was not applicable; that the plaintiff having applied for a review of judgment, the Judge had no power to proceed under s. 206, and that the amendment in the decree granted a relief not prayed for in the plaint.

* Application No. 108 of 1895 under Extraordinary Jurisdiction.

A rule nisi was issued, requiring the plaintiff to show cause why the order of the Judge should not be set aside.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi appeared for the applicants (defendants) in support of the rule.—The Judge had no jurisdiction to amend the decree after our second appeal was dismissed by the High Court. The Judge's decree became merged in the decree of the High Court, and the application for review or [550] amendment of the decree ought to have been made to the High Court—Shivlal Kalidas v. Jumakia Nathji Dessi (1).

Next we say that the plaintiff's application to the Judge was for review. The Judge, however, treated the application as one for the amendment of the decree. The procedure to be adopted under s. 206 of the Civil Procedure Code is quite different from that to be adopted under s. 630, and the Judge had no power to treat an application for review as an application for amendment. Further, the plaintiffs' suit was for the registration of a mortgage-deed.

The Judge allowed the claim. But the plaint originally did not contain a prayer for an order directing the registration of the document. This was a fresh prayer made in the application for the amendment. The Judge has by the amendment granted to the plaintiffs a relief which was not claimed in the plaint. The Judge had no authority to do so, either by granting a review or the amendment of the decree.

Gokaldas K. Parekh appeared for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause.—The second appeal was summarily dismissed under s. 551 of the Civil Procedure Code. The High Court did not confirm the decree. A decree is drawn when a decree of the lower appellate Court is confirmed in second appeal, but no decree is drawn when a second appeal is dismissed. Therefore, in the present case, the High Court did not draw any decree, and there being no decree of the High Court, the Judge's decree remained intact, and there was no decree in the High Court in which it could become merged.

There being no decree of the High Court, the only tribunal before which we could go for redress was the Judge.

As to the other points which have been urged, they are merely technical, and such as the High Court will not entertain under its extraordinary jurisdiction unless substantial justice is defeated.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi, in reply:—Reading ss. 551, 577, 572 and 2 of the Civil Procedure Code together it is clear that an order passed under s. 551 is a decree. When the [551] lower appeal Courts dismiss appeals under s. 551, the parties come up to this Court in second appeal. But if an order under s. 551 be not a decree, there can be no second appeal. It is, therefore, clear that the order dismissing the second appeal in this case under s. 551 was a decree of the High Court, in which the decree of the lower appellate Court became merged. Moreover, the dismissal of the appeal includes the confirmation of the decree, and, therefore, the order of dismissal is virtually a decree.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This case differs from those which have been cited to us, in that here the decree of the lower Court has not been confirmed by the High Court. The High Court, acting upon the power given to it by s. 551 of the Code of Civil Procedure, dismissed the appeal. The change of language made in 1888 in that section by the Legislature shows, we think, that it was intended that there should be a difference between the results of a dismissal under it and of a confirmation under s. 577; as, indeed, we think, there must be. Dismissing an appeal is, we think, refusing to entertain it as in the case of an appeal dismissed as being time-barred. Where an appeal is dismissed under s. 551, there is no decree of the High Court which can be executed, and the reasoning in the cases to which we have been referred does not apply.

Mr. Govardhanram argues that the dismissal of the appeal under s. 551 is a decree and appealable under s. 584. That may be conceded. Still it is clearly not one confirming the decree of the lower Court. It leaves the decree of the lower Court untouched, neither confirmed, nor varied, nor reversed, and it remains, we think, the decree of the lower Court.

The District Court had, therefore, jurisdiction to amend its decree to bring it into accordance with its judgment. The other objections are of such a technical and unsubstantial character that we need not further consider them.

[552] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

DADABHAI JAMSETJI (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. MANEKSHA SORABJI (Original Defendant), Respondent. [23rd January, 1896.]

Limitation—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s. 5—Sufficient cause—Appeal—Time for presenting appeal—Appeal to wrong Court.

The presentation of an appeal to a wrong Court under a bona fide mistake may be "sufficient cause" within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

Sitaram v. Nimba (1) explained.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Surat.

The plaintiff sued the defendant in the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Surat. His suit was dismissed on the 21st August, 1891. On the 24th November, 1891, the plaintiff presented an appeal to the High Court, and it was duly admitted by a Judge on the 12th February, 1892. On the 9th January, 1893, the appeal was heard by a Division

Bench of the High Court, which held that it did not lie to the High Court, and ordered that the petition of appeal should be returned for presentation to the proper Court.

On the 10th January the petition was returned to the plaintiff, and it was presented by him to the District Court at Surat on the 11th of January, 1893.

The District Judge of Surat dismissed the appeal on the ground that it had been presented after the period allowed by law for the presentation of appeals had expired. He observed:

"The appeal was presented to the High Court just within the prescribed period for appeal, viz., 3 months, i.e., 2 months beyond the time allowed for appeal to the proper Court, viz., the District Court.

"Plaintiff's pleader says that his client was taken ill immediately after the judgment of the lower Court was pronounced and wants to be allowed to file affidavits to that effect. But it is not pretended even that plaintiff would have presented his appeal to the High Court earlier than he actually did, or rather that it was actually presented for him by his step-brother. The appeal was in time for the High Court in spite of plaintiff's dangerous illness, and no number of affidavits can affect the defendant's contention that the appeal is barred here.

The whole time which elapsed before plaintiff presented his appeal in the wrong Court cannot be deducted under the clear ruling in I. L. R., 12 Bom. 330, which is binding on this Court. The appeal is two months beyond time, and must be dismissed with costs."

From this decision the plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The plaintiff believed that his appeal lay to the High Court. He presented it there in time, and it was admitted. The High Court, however, subsequently held that it was not the proper Court for the plaintiff's appeal. The plaintiff's mistake was made in good faith, and the circumstances constitute "sufficient cause" within the meaning of s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877)—Ihro v. Surnamoji (1) followed in Krishna v. Chathapany (2). The case of Sitaram v. Nimba (3) relied on by the District Judge is no authority in this case. In that case the memorandum of appeal was not returned by the Court, as here, for presentation to the proper Court: see also Shrimant Sagojirao v. S. Smith (4).

Nagindas T. Marphatia for Ganpatrao S. Rao, for the respondent.—The time for presenting an appeal to the District Court is one month (thirty days) from the date of the judgment appealed against. But in the present case the appeal was not presented to any Court until after the lapse of one month from the date of the judgment. The plaintiff was negligent, he must suffer the consequences. The period that elapsed between the 21st August, 1891, the day on which judgment was pronounced in the suit, and the 9th January, 1893, when the High Court decided that no appeal lay to it, was wasted by the plaintiff. He ought during that time to have discovered his mistake without waiting for the High Court to find it out for him. Ignorance of law is no excuse—Jag Lal v. Har Narain (5); Ramjiwan v. Chand (6); Husaini Begam v. The Collector of Musafarnagar (7); Bechi v. Ahson-ullah-Khan (8); Govinda v. Bhandari (9).

JUDGMENT.

[554] JARDINI, J.—The admitted dates are as follows:—On the 21st August, 1891, the Subordinate Judge passed a decision. On the 24th November, the plaintiff presented an appeal to the High Court, which was duly admitted by a Judge on the 12th February, 1892. The High Court decided on the 9th January, 1893, that the appeal did not lie to it, and ordered the return of the petition for presentation to the proper Court, which return was made on the 10th, and presentation on the 11th January, 1893.

We are satisfied that, in acting on the opinion that the appeal lay to the High Court, the plaintiff used good faith; and the admission of the appeal by a learned Judge confirms this view. The District Judge has, however, ruled as follows:—"The whole time which elapsed before plaintiff presented his appeal in the wrong Court cannot be deducted under the clear ruling in Sitaram v. Nimba (1) which is binding on this Court. The appeal is two months beyond time, and must be dismissed with costs." We are of opinion that the learned Judge is wrong, and that under the circumstances there was sufficient cause to extend the time for admitting the appeal within the meaning of that phrase in s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877).

But we find that in the case cited, Sitaram v. Nimba (1), West and Birdwood, JJ., held on the construction of s. 5 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) that mere ignorance of law cannot be recognized as a sufficient reason for delay; and although such a dictum must be taken as made with reference to the particular case, Richardson v. Mellish (2), the use of general expressions led the District Judge to treat the judgment as ruling that the maxim "Ignorantia legis non excusat" excludes from s. 5 all cases where the cause of not presenting an appeal in time is that it had first been presented to a wrong Court. Mr. Nagindas has relied on Jag Lal v. Har Narain (3) in support of this view; but we think it clear from the report that the learned Judges held that, if the presentation to the wrong Court was shown to have been attended with bona fides, s. 5 might apply; although the mere profession of ignorance of the law was not enough by itself. In Ramjiwan v. Chand (4) it is said: "It [555] is no excuse merely to say that they preferred their appeal to a wrong Court by mistake" and also that to get the indulgence of s. 5, they must show bona fides. Huro v. Surnamoyi (5) is an authority for holding that where the period was exceeded by a bona fide mistake as to which Court the appeal lay, although the appeal was not presented to the wrong Court, s. 5 might be applied by the Court. That case is followed by the High Court of Madras in Krishna v. Chathappan (6), a case on all fours with the present. The learned Judges say: "We think that s. 5 gives the Courts a discretion which in respect of jurisdiction is to be exercised in the way in which judicial power and discretion ought to be exercised upon principles which are well understood; the words "sufficient cause" receiving a liberal construction so as to advance substantial justice when no negligence, nor inaction, nor want of bona fides is imputable to the appellant."

We think the above is a correct interpretation of s. 5. The words "sufficient cause" are wide; and as is said In re Manchester Economic Building Society (1) per Brett, M. R., "the Court has the power to grant the special leave, and, exercising its judicial discretion, is bound to give the special leave, if justice requires that leave should be given." At p. 503, Bowen, L. J., relies on the judicial nature of the discretion as meeting the argument from inconvenience. Pritchard v. Pritchard(2) is another authority of the same tenor.

We do not think the learned Judges who decided Sitaram v. Nimba intended to lay down that the maxim of law quoted must be imported into every matter arising under s. 5; and the language used does not necessarily mean that. We, therefore, agree with the other High Courts in their construction of the section.

The Court now reverses the order of the District Judge and admits the appeal and refers it to the District Court for disposal according to law. Costs of this appeal on the respondent.

Order reversed. Appeal admitted and referred for disposal.

[556] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

ANNAJI RAGHUNATH GOSAVI AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. NARAYAN SITARAM AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents.* [27th January, 1896.]

Trust—Trustee—Devasthan—Manager—Hereditary trust—Mistake by trustee as to true legal position—Management lax and imprudent, but not fraudulent and dishonest—Appointment of a devasthan committee—Scheme of management.

A mistake by a hereditary trustee of a devasthan as to his true legal position does not of necessity afford a ground for removing him from his post of manager and entrusting it to new hands.

The management of a devasthan being found to be lax and imprudent, but not fraudulent and dishonest, the Court declined to remove the manager, but appointed a devasthan committee to supervise and control him, and framed a scheme for the management of the trust.

APPEAL from the decision of S. Tagore, District Judge of Satara.

Suit under s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).—The plaintiffs prayed for the removal of the defendants as trustees and managers of a certain devasthan situate in the Satara District; that trustees should be appointed by the Court to manage it; that proper direction as to its future management should be given by the Court, &c., &c.

The defendants contended that the suit was not maintainable under s. 539 and denied the allegations of the plaintiffs with regard to their misconduct and the mismanagement of the property.

The Judge found that the endowment was a trust for public, religious and charitable purposes, that the suit was rightly brought under s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that there had been mismanagement by the defendants in the administration of the trust. He, therefore, framed a certain scheme for the management of the sansthan, without, however, removing defendant No. 1 from his office as trustee. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"With regard to the third issue (namely, whether there has been any mismanagement by the defendants in the administration of the trust?) I am of opinion that [557] the trust property has not been properly managed. Defendant No. 1 does not appear to take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the sansthan, and, as far as I can judge, he is not a good manager. The accounts are left unsigned, and I doubt whether defendant No. 1 ever takes the trouble to examine them. He has lent his private money on interest to the shrine. The estate is largely involved in debt and yet a math and a mandap have been erected at a cost of Rs. 5,000. The defendant admits that the debts amount to Rs. 10,000. Several lands have been let on permanent lease to rayats, and one property is admitted to have been mortgaged. If the plaintiffs' witnesses are to be believed, proper attention is not paid to the celebration of the customary festivals and the maintenance of the annachatra. Considering the state of confusion and indebtedness in which the affairs of the sansthan are, I cannot wonder if these things are neglected. I cannot say, however, that any instance of fraudulent or dishonest misappropriation of the sansthan funds had been brought home to the defendants. The plaintiffs have failed to satisfy the Court that the defendants were guilty of gross misconduct or gross dishonesty, or that they were guilty of any defalcations or misappropriation. Under all the circumstances I do not consider it necessary to take the extreme step of removing defendant No. 1 from the trusteeship. At the same time, considering the way in which the endowment has been generally mismanaged, and the defendants' assertion of their right to treat the trust property as their private estate, it appears to me that the object of the endowment will be frustrated, and the estate will be brought to the verge of ruin, if the present management is allowed to continue without sufficient checks and safeguards. There can be no doubt that the sansthan is at present charged with debts some of which at least ought never to have been thrown on it. It should be freed from such burden and restored in its integrity to the sacred and charitable purposes for which it was intended."

The defendants appealed and the plaintiffs preferred cross-objections under s. 561 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Macpherson (with Daji A. Khare), for the appellants (defendants).
Lang (Advocate-General with Vasudeo R. Joglekar), for the respondents (plaintiffs).

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C.J.—This was a suit filed by the plaintiffs under s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code against the defendants who are managing the devsthan property described in the pleadings. The plaintiffs prayed that the defendants might be removed from the management of the devsthan; and that trustees should be appointed by the Court to manage it; that proper directions to regulate its future management should be given by the Court; and that such other orders should be passed for its management as the Court should think fit.

[558] The District Court of Satara has come to certain findings which have not been questioned in the appeal before us, and which may be taken to be conclusively established. They are: (1) That the endowment is a trust for public, religious and charitable purposes. (2) That a suit like the present is in respect of it maintainable under the provisions of s. 539 of the Civil Procedure Code.

The position in connection with the santhan which the defendants hold has not been exactly defined by the District Judge, but he has assumed that they are its hereditary managers and trustees. That appears to be their true possession. The decree or award of the Peishwa in A.D. 1777-78 (Ex. 87) contains the following passage—"You" (Raghunath Gosavi), "your sons, grandsons, &c., from generation to generation should enjoy a moiety of the sanjam of the shiri (i.e., deity), and the income of the offerings placed before the shiri, whatever the same may come to, and continue to perform the annual festivals, distribute food, and please (i.e., feed) the Brahmans. Be this known! The 6th Moon of Moharram (5th February, 1778). The order is valid."

The first defendant is the eldest lineal descendant in the male line of Raghunath Gosavi. The second defendant, his son Raghunath Annaji, assists him in the management of the endowment. The District Court, while recognizing its jurisdiction to remove even an hereditary manager or trustee for misconduct in his office (Chintaman v. Dhondo (1)) in the exercise of its discretion has declined to remove the defendant Annaji Raghunath from his trusteeship, but has appointed a devasthan committee which virtually superseded him. Against that judgment the defendants have filed an appeal, while the plaintiffs have taken cross-objections asking for the removal of the defendants from the management and for accounts.

After a careful consideration of the evidence in the case we have come to the conclusion that sufficient ground has not been shown to justify us in interfering with the discretion of the District Judge refusing to remove the defendant Annaji from [569] the trusteeship. It is doubtless true that that defendant has asserted claims in connection with the devasthan inconsistent with his true legal position as found by the District Court. His idea was that he was entitled to manage the endowment free from control and very much as though he was its absolute owner. There was, however, much in the documents in his possession to foster that feeling in his mind and especially in the award of A. D. 1777-78 to which we have referred. The judgment in the Chinchwad Santhan case (1) has now shown that such a view was wholly erroneous, and that the Courts will exercise the fullest supervision over such endowments and will take care that their income is properly and legitimately expended so as to ensure the due fulfilment of the objects which their founders and their benefactors from time to time had in view. But it would, we think, be going too far to hold that a mistake by the defendant as to his true legal position, as disclosed by the light of the English authorities upon the subject, should of necessity afford a ground for removing an hereditary trustee of such an institution as this from his post of manager and entrusting it to new hands. "Where the Court sees nothing but mistake while it gives directions for the better management in future it refuses to visit with punishment what has been transacted in time past." See Lawin on Trusts, p. 936 (8th ed.), and cases there cited. Counsel for the appellants assures us that the defendants now recognize their true position. If after this they err, the plea of ignorance will no longer be open to them. The District Judge has acquitted the defendants of fraudulent or dishonest misappropriation of the santhan funds, and we think that no such misconduct has been brought home to them upon this appeal.

The Advocate-General in support of the cross-objections has principally relied upon the evidence of Raghunath Babaji (Ex. 79), a servant of the santhan, who in cross-examination deposes that "when the math borrows money at interest from the defendant as from a savkar, interest is paid to him" and "defendant sometimes borrows from the math funds. I cannot remember his doing so at interest." No particulars were obtained from the witness. The defendant was not questioned upon the subject. In re-examination Raghunath says: "We borrow moneys from defendant with or without interest . . . He sometimes borrows money from savkars to accommodate the santhan." In this state of the evidence we cannot find that any thing serious on this head is proved against the defendant.

The grants in miras for premiums and the two mortgages may be evidence of bad management, but are not of dishonesty. The moneys received on the making of the grants in miras and those raised on the mortgages were credited in the books of the santhan to be applied to its purposes, or at all events the evidence is to that effect, and it is not disproved.

The case as to the building materials of the santhan wall and as to trees of the santhan being used by the defendants is not established.

The defendants, or the defendant Anjaji, however, appear to owe money to the santhan and to have done so for some time. This is improper, and such sums as they or he owe to the institution they or he must repay. The amount should be ascertained in execution. But beyond this we see no necessity for taking a general account of the defendants' management, and, moreover, it was not specifically asked for in the plaint.

The District Judge has found that the management of the defendant Anjaji has been lax and improvident, if not negligent, and we agree with him in that respect; and that it is desirable that efficient means of supervision and control over the defendants and the manager of the santhan for the time being should be adopted. At the same time we think that the actual management should rest with the manager. The scheme which the District Judge has drawn up, therefore, appears to us to need modification and amendment.

We would amend it by substituting the following:

(1) Appoint a devasthan committee of three persons to supervise the management of the devasthan and of its property and to give general directions for their due administration.

(2) Let it consist of (as in the Chinchwad Case) one member to be selected from amongst the descendants of Raghunath Gosavi who may, but need not, be the manager for the time being of the devasthan; one member to be selected from the descendants of the junior branches of the family of the original granter; one member to be selected by, or in accordance with the absolute discretion of, the District Judge of Satara, which member may, but need not, be an officer of the Court.

(3) The District Judge of Satara shall nominate the said members after ascertaining from the members of the family or in such other manner as he may deem desirable who are eligible to act as such and what their qualifications are.

(4) The members of the committee shall hold office for life, but it shall be competent to the said Judge, of his own motion, or upon the application of any person interested in the devasthan, to remove from the committee any member who may be found to be unfit or incompetent to continue a member of the committee.
(5) Upon the death, resignation or removal of any member of the committee, the District Judge shall proceed to appoint another person in his place in the manner set forth.
(6) It shall be the duty of the manager for the time being—
(a) To manage the devasthan in accordance with the ancient practice, but subject to the directions of the committee to the extent hereinafter provided.
(b) To keep in his charge all the moveable and immovable property of the devasthan and to recover the rents and profits of the same, and to defray all reasonable and necessary expenses connected with the devasthan.
(c) To keep true and correct accounts of all moneys received and disbursed for, or on account of, the devasthan and to produce the accounts whenever called for by the committee and to afford them every facility for conducting their inquiries and discharging the duties of their office.
(d) The manager shall not have power to alien, mortgage or charge the property of the devasthan or to grant land on miras or other perpetual tenure.

[562] (7) The duties of the devasthan committee shall be as follows:—
(a) On taking charge of their office to examine the accounts and ascertain, (1) the net income of the sansthan, (2) the extent of its liabilities.
(b) The committee may from time to time examine the accounts of the sansthan, and after the accounts of each year are complete shall meet to examine, audit and pass the same.
(c) To give directions so that the expenditure shall be kept within bounds and to provide for its distribution to its legitimate purposes, including the salaries of servants; and to make provision for the payment of interest upon the debts due by the devasthan and for the payment of such debts by decrees.
Out of the annual income Rs. 1,000 should be set apart annually and applied towards the liquidation of the debts of the sansthan and the residue to its customary expenses. On the liquidation of the debts the amount of Rs. 1,000 above referred to should be carried to the general funds of the sansthan. When the affairs of the sansthan are placed on a sound footing, its surplus funds should be deposited in a Bank or put in some safe and profitable investment as the committee may think fit.
(d) To see that the fairs and festivals at the chief place of the sansthan are duly held at the proper time, and that the furniture, jewels, utensils, &c., are kept in proper custody and brought to proper uses on suitable occasions.
(e) With the permission of the District Judge, but not otherwise, to mortgage any portion of the property of the devasthan in order to pay off the debts now due by the devasthan, making provision in such mortgage for the payment of the same by instalments.
The amount of the debt (if any) due by the defendants to the devasthan when ascertained in execution and paid should be applied to reduce the debts due by the devasthan. The parties shall be at liberty to apply to the Court for further directions in the working out of this decree.

The decree will be varied in the above particulars, and in all other respects will be confirmed. The parties to bear their own costs.

Decree varied.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

Ganesh Jagannath Dev (Original Defendant), Appellant
v. Ramchandra Ganesh Dev and another (Original Plaintiffs), Respondents.* [27th January, 1896.]

Probate—Application by executors for probate—Order refusing probate—Subsequent suit by executors as persons entitled under will to property of deceased—Res judicata—Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), s. 14, ch. V, ss. 89 and 85—Succession Certificate Act (VIII of 1889).

The plaintiffs applied to the District Court at Poona under the Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881) for probate of a will of which they were appointed executors. The defendants opposed their application, and on appeal the High Court rejected it, holding that on the evidence the execution of the will was not proved. The plaintiffs thereupon filed the present suit as the persons beneficially entitled under the will for a declaration that the property of the deceased belonged to them, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing them in the enjoyment of it. The defendant contended that the suit was barred as res judicata.

Held, that this suit was not barred by the order refusing probate of the will.

The refusal to grant probate does not conclusively show that the will pronounced is not the genuine will of the testator.

[F. 2 N.L.R. 123; R., 12 C.L.J. 195 = 14 C.W.N. 924 = 7 Ind. Cas. 126; 13 C.L.J. 547 = 15 C.W.N. 1021 = 10 Ind. Cas. 434.]

Appeal from the decision of W. H. Crowe, District Judge of Poona, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb P. V. Gupte, Subordinate Judge of Haveli, and remanding the case for re-trial.

In the year 1890 the plaintiffs as executors appointed thereby applied to the District Court at Poona for probate of the will of one Jagannath Gajanan Dev.

The defendant opposed the application, which, however, was granted, and an order was made ordering probate to issue.

The defendant appealed to the High Court, which, reversed the order of the Judge, holding that, on the evidence before the Court, due execution of the will was not proved. (See Printed Judgments for 1891, p. 194.)

The plaintiffs then filed this suit in the Subordinate Judge's Court as persons beneficially entitled under the will for a declaration that the property of the deceased belonged to them and for an injunction restraining the defendant from obstructing their enjoyment of it.

The defendant contended that the suit was barred by the previous order of the High Court rejecting the application for probate.

* Appeal No. 39 of 1895 from order.
The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, holding that having regard to s. 83 of the Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881) the decision of the High Court operated as res judicata between the parties.

On appeal by the plaintiffs the Judge reversed the decree and remanded the case for re-trial and determination on the merits under s. 562 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The defendant now appealed to the High Court against this order of remand Nagindas T. Marphatia, appeared for the appellant (defendant).—The plaintiffs base their claim in this suit on the will which this Court has refused to admit to probate. We submit that this order of refusal is binding and conclusive, and cannot be questioned in this suit. An order holding a will to be proved is a decree in rem—Komolochun v. Nilrutun (1). This order must be equally conclusive. The parties here are the same and cannot re-open the question. The issue as to execution of the will was, in effect, raised between them and was finally decided.

PARSONS, J.—Is it necessary to have probate for the purposes of filing a suit to recover property?

Probate is necessary for the purposes of administration. Ramdatt V. Desai appeared for the respondents (plaintiffs).—In this case the Hindu Wills Act does not apply, and it is not necessary to take probate—Shaik Moosa v. Shaik Essa (2). Further in order that a finding may operate as res judicata, it must be a finding in a suit. The former proceedings were not in a suit, [565] but in a miscellaneous application. That finding, however, was merely that the will was not proved. That means that the will was neither proved nor disproved. A finding of this nature cannot prevent us from bringing a fresh suit to establish our title—Bapuji Jagannath and another (3); Arummoji v. Mohendra (4). See also s. 149, cl. (b) of the Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881).

It is the grant of the probate that operates as a judgment in rem, but a refusal to grant probate on the ground that the will was not proved cannot do so. Section 59 of the Probate and Administration Act makes the grant of probate conclusive, but it makes no similar provision as to a refusal of probate.

Again, this suit has been brought in the Subordinate Judge’s Court. It could not be brought in the District Court in which the application for probate was made. Under s. 13 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) the suit must be such as could have been brought in the District Court in order to make the finding in the former proceeding res judicata.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The plaintiffs in this case had applied, under the provisions of “The Probate and Administration Act, 1881,” for probate of the will of Jagannath Gaajan Dev, who died at Chinchwad on the 10th August, 1890, of which will they alleged themselves to be executors. The High Court, in appeal, on the 14th July, 1891, rejected the application on the ground that on the evidence before the Court due execution of the will was not proved. The present defendant had entered a caveat against that application; and had appealed against the order of the District Judge of Poona, who had in the first instance granted it. The proceedings were accordingly contentious proceedings under s. 83 of the Act.

(2) 8 B. 241.
(3) 20 B. 674.
(4) 20 C. 888 (895).
The plaintiffs have now filed the present suit as the persons beneficially entitled under the will for a declaration that the property of the deceased belonged to them and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing them in the enjoyment of it. The defendant contended before the Subordinate Judge that the suit was barred as being res judicata, and his plea was allowed. The District Judge, on appeal, held that it was not so barred, and remanded the suit for trial upon the merits.

Against that remanding order the defendant has preferred the present appeal.

We agree with the District Judge that the order on appeal of the High Court of the 14th July, 1891, does not debar the plaintiffs from filing the present suit. The judgment in Shaik Moosa v. Shaik Essa (1) determines that such a suit as the present can be maintained by a Hindu, in cases to which, as before, the Hindu Wills Act is not applicable, without the necessity of proving the will under Act V of 1881. The circumstance that the Court has refused to grant probate of the will clearly cannot render probate necessary in cases in which it was optional for the party interested under the will to apply for it. It merely relegated the parties to their former position.

The contention of the pleader for the appellant was, that as the grant of probate under the Act is conclusive proof, so long as the grant remains unrevoked, of the title of the executors and of the genuineness of the will admitted to probate—Romolochan v. Niruittan (2), a similar consequence, but in an opposite sense, must flow from the refusal of the Court to grant probate. This is not so. The conclusiveness of the probate rests upon the declared will of the Legislature as expressed in ss. 59 and 12 of the Act. There is no section which declares that any corresponding result in an opposite sense shall flow from the refusal to grant it. From a refusal to grant probate it by no means follows that in the opinion of the Court the will propounded is not the genuine will of the testator. It may be based on entirely different grounds. Doubtless under the provisions of Act VII of 1889 such a refusal, until a fresh application shall be successfully made, may operate to prevent the executor recovering debts due to the deceased, but it has, so far as we know, no other disenabling effect.

It has, however, been further argued that the issue which has to be determined in this suit has already been directly and substantially in issue and has been heard and determined between (567) the same parties in the contentious proceedings taken under Chap. V of Act V, 1881. In point of fact, however, no issue was ever raised throughout these proceedings, and the High Court only held that on the evidence on the record the due execution of the will had not been proved. It came to no conclusion as to whether it was a forgery or not. Such a finding cannot, we think, be treated as a final decision of the Court upon the genuineness or otherwise of the will. The Act does not in express terms preclude a fresh application on the part of the executors when they are in a position to support it with more complete proof.

Without, therefore, deciding whether, if an issue upon the question of forgery had been raised and decided, it would have concluded the parties in the present suit, we are of opinion that the decision of the District Court in the present case is correct, and we accordingly confirm the order with costs on the appellant.

Mortgage—Apportionment of mortgage-debt—Question of apportionment first raised in second appeal—Practice.

A plaintiff, who had purchased part of certain mortgaged property and sued for possession, obtained a decree ordering that he should get possession on payment of the whole mortgage-debt. He did not in the lower Courts ask that the mortgage-debt should be apportioned, but did so in second appeal to the High Court. Under the circumstances the High Court refused to interfere with the decree. The plaintiff had a remedy by suit for contribution.

SECOND appeal from the decree of L. G. Fernandez, First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P. of Thana.

In 1889 the first and second defendants mortgaged the plots of land in dispute together with some other land for Rs. 300 to one Martand.

[568] In 1890 they sold the lands in dispute to the plaintiff for Rs. 300 and executed a sale-deed to him.

In 1893 Bhaskar (defendant No. 3), who was the heir of Martand, sued them on Martand's mortgage and obtained a decree for Rs. 600 As defendants Nos. 1 and 2 could not pay this sum within the time allowed by the decree, they received Rs. 200 more from Bhaskar (defendant No. 3) and sold him the lands.

The plaintiff now sued defendants Nos. 1 and 2 for possession of the land sold to him in 1890. Defendant No. 3 was subsequently added as a party.

Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 alleged that, although they had executed the sale-deed to the plaintiff, he had not completed the sale by paying the purchase-money, and they, therefore, had sold the lands in question together with the other mortgaged property to Bhaskar (defendant No. 3).

The Subordinate Judge found that Bhaskar (defendant No. 3) had purchased with knowledge of the previous sale to the plaintiff and he ordered that possession should be given to the plaintiff on his paying Rs. 500 (the amount of the decree on the mortgage) to Bhaskar (defendant No. 3), and passed a decree accordingly.

In appeal the Judge confirmed the decree.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, contending that as the mortgage to Martand included other property, the whole of the mortgage-debt should not be made payable out of the lands which he (the plaintiff) had purchased.

Narayan G. Chandavarkar and T. R. Kotwal, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The burden of the mortgage-debt ought to be apportioned between the plaintiff and defendant No. 3, who have each bought a part of the mortgaged property. It is inequitable to order the plaintiff to pay the whole—Lomba v. Vishwanath (1); Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir (2).

* Second Appeal No. 271 of 1895.

(1) 18 B. 56 (91). (2) 13 M.I.A. 404.
Mahadev B. Choubal, for the respondents.—It is too late now to raise the question of apportionment. The debt cannot be [569] apportioned without taking evidence of the respective values of the lands.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—It has been admitted that the plaintiff might have been entitled, on pleading it in the Courts below, to the benefit of the doctrine of apportionment of the mortgage-debt over the two parts of the mortgaged property, as in Lomba v. Vishevanath (1). We have been urged to pass a similar decree, and thus allow the sum to be paid to be ascertained in execution, although the matter does not appear to have been mooted in the Courts below, or suggested itself to either of the Judges. Such a course prolongs litigation, and tends to draw to the High Court matters which are more easily determined by lower Courts,—a result objected to in Queen-Empress v. Chagan (2). Where otherwise there might be a failure of justice, especially where there is no other remedy, or where some special circumstance exists, such as the deep ignorance of a party, the intricacy of the law, or the passing of a new statute, or of a judgment altering the interpretation, such indulgence, as has been sought, has often been given. But it is not denied that the doctrine of apportionment is not one of recent introduction into the mofussil; and we see no circumstance, and have been shown no authority, for treating it in a special way. It is admitted that the plaintiff has a remedy by suit for contribution. We refrain, therefore, from interfering with the decree on the above ground.

We notice that the lower Court of appeal has failed to give effect in its decree to its finding that the plaintiff is entitled to the rent claimed, namely, Rs. 30, from the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. We, therefore, amend the decree by making that provision; and in other respects confirm it. Costs of his appeal on the appellant.

Decree amended.

[570] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

TAPIRAM (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. SADU (Original Defendant), Respondent. [29th January, 1896.]

The amendment of a plaint under s. 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882) is in the discretion of the Judge, and is not the right of the suitor in all circumstances. It is not enough for a plaintiff to show that the amendment does not alter the character of the suit.

[D., 57 P.R. 1904.]

SECOND appeal from the decision of G. C. Whitworth, District Judge of Khandesh.

* Second Appeal No. 427 of 1896.

(1) 18 B. 86. (2) 14 B. 391 (342).
Certain houses and land belonged to four brothers, viz., Hussain, Ismail, Nasarali, and Sarafali, of whom Hussain and Ismail mortgaged them to the defendant Sadu, who entered into possession.

In execution of a money decree afterwards obtained against the other two brothers Nasarali, and Sarafali their right, title and interest in the property were sold and were purchased by the plaintiff Tapiram, who sought to obtain possession and was obstructed by the defendant Sadu. The plaintiff then brought this suit to eject Sadu and to obtain possession of the property.

Subsequently the plaintiff applied to amend his plaint so as to claim only the shares of Nasarali and Sarafali, making Hussian and Ismail co-defendants in the suit.

The Subordinate Judge of Yaval rejected this application on the ground that it sought to convert a suit for ejectment into one for partition, and he dismissed the suit.

In appeal the District Judge confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge.

Plaintiff preferred a second appeal against this decision to the High Court.

Vasudeo Gopal Bhandarkar, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The suit will lie in its present form. The plaintiff desires to amend the plaint and sue for an undivided moiety by partition and to [571] join Ismail and Hussain—Lakshman Bhusaji v. Hari Dinkar (1); Krishnaji v. Sitaram (2); Ramchandra v. Vasudeo (3); Radanath v. Gisborne (4); Mylapore v. Yeo Kay (5); Syed Mujefar v. Syed Gulam (5); Sheik Ismail v. Raghu (7); Moti Jeohand v. Khusal (8); John A. Menesse v. Nasarwani Pallonji (9); Baburav alias Babaji v. Sitaram (10); Ahmedkhan v. Jamiatkhan (11).

Ghanashan Nilkanth, for the respondent (defendant) was not called upon.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—We are of opinion that the power to get a plaint amended is subject, under s. 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the discretion of the Judge, and is not claimable as a right of the suitor in all circumstances. In Krishnaji v. Sitaram (2) the amendment was allowed, as the plaintiff had been erroneously advised as to the form of the suit. In Ramchandra v. Vasudeo (3) an opinion was expressed that an amendment ought not to be allowed. It is not enough for a plaintiff to show that the amendment does not convert the character of the suit. In the present case the District Judge has found that the plaintiff acted with his eyes open. We think the suit was rightly dismissed, and confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

In the Matter of Runchod Khushal, An Insolvent.
[16th December, 1896.]

Insolvency—Insolvent Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 24), s. 86—Purchaser of scheduled debts—Right of purchaser to be paid full amount of such debt—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 135 and 139.*

An insolvent having filed his schedule in April, 1881, obtained his personal discharge in September, 1881, and on the same day judgment was entered up against him for the amount of his scheduled debts under s. 86 of the Insolvent Act (11 and 12 Vict., c. 21). The schedule contained the names of thirteen creditors. The insolvent afterwards settled with four of them. The remaining nine, whose aggregate claims amounted to Rs. 1,800-7-0, sold their claims. Certain assets belonging to the insolvent’s estate having subsequently come into the hands of the Official Assignee, the purchasers claimed to be paid the full amount of the scheduled debts which they had bought. It appeared that the debts in question were debts incurred on certain promissory notes passed by the insolvent. The insolvent contended that under s. 135 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) the purchasers were only entitled to the amount which they had actually paid for the debts they had bought.

Held, that they were entitled to be paid the full amount of the scheduled debts. If the debts at the time of purchase were to be regarded as debts in respect of promissory notes, s. 130 of the Transfer of Property Act applied, and if the claim was under the judgment entered up against the insolvent, then cl. (d) of s. 135 applied.

Investigation of claims to dividends under Rule 36 of the Bombay Rules and Orders under the Insolvent Debtors Act (Stat. 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21).

The insolvent filed his schedule in April, 1881. Thirteen persons were entered in it as creditors, and the total of the debts due to them was Rs. 1,600-7-0.

In September, 1881, the insolvent obtained his personal discharge under s. 47 of the Insolvent Act and on the same day judgment was entered up against him for the amount of the scheduled debts, under s. 86 of the Act, in the name of the Official Assignee.

The insolvent subsequently settled with four of the thirteen creditors mentioned in his schedule, but the remaining nine, whose aggregate claims amounted to Rs. 1,180-7-0, assigned over these claims to three persons, viz., Ali Mahomed Vulley, Gorbandh Purushotam and Shaik Boolun.

In 1893 the insolvent inherited some immovable property from his father, and in 1896 the Official Assignee, at the instance of the above mentioned three assignees, caused the right, title and interest of the

(b) Where it is made to a creditor in payment of what is due to him;
(c) Where it is made to the possessor of a property subject to the actionable claim;

insolvent in the property so inherited by him to be advertised for sale by auction, in execution of the decree entered up against him as above-mentioned.

The sale, however, was stopped by payment to the Official Assignee of the whole amount of the decree held by him, viz., Rs. 1,600-7-0.

The insolvent alleged that the three assignees had bought in the claims of the original creditors for 4½ annas in the rupee, and he contended that under s. 135 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) they were not entitled to receive from the Official Assignee more than the sums which they had actually paid, with interest thereon, from the date of their purchase, and that the balance of the amount in the hands of the Official Assignee should be refunded to him (the insolvent).

The Official Assignee did not admit the insolvent's contention, and he, moreover, demanded from the insolvent, in addition to the Rs. 1,600-7-0 already paid to him, a further sum of Rs. 2,186 as interest on the scheduled debts. In default of payment of this additional sum he threatened to proceed with the sale of the property.

In September, 1896, the insolvent obtained a rule calling on the Official Assignee to show cause why he should not be restrained from proceeding with the sale and why satisfaction should not be entered up on the judgment entered up against the insolvent in 1881.

When the rule came on for hearing it was arranged that the Court should first, under Rule 36 of the Rules and Orders under the Insolvency Act, decide the question as to the amount to which the three assignees of the scheduled debts were entitled. They denied the insolvent's allegation that they had only paid 4½ annas in the rupee as the consideration for their assignments, but they contended that, in any case, they were entitled to be paid the full amount of the scheduled debts assigned to them, with interest thereon from the date of the entering up of the judgment in 1881.

The matter now came on under Rule 36 for investigation and determination of the claim of the assignees.

Anderson, for the assignees.—It is unnecessary to inquire into the amount of consideration paid by us for the assignment of the debts. We have bought the scheduled debts, and are entitled to be paid them in full. Section 135, cl. 1 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) does not apply. What we bought was not an actionable claim; but, in any event, cl. (d) of s. 135 excludes this case from the operation of the section. Further, the debts we bought were debts due on promissory notes as stated in the schedule, and s. 139 of the Act (IV of 1882), therefore, applies.

Devare, for the insolvent.—We contend that s. 139 does not apply. For, it is clear that what the assignees bought was something quite distinct from the promissory notes on which the original debts were incurred. These notes had no force and were not in existence when the assignees bought the claims against the insolvent. They were merged in the judgment, which was entered up in 1881. What the assignees bought was the right, title and interest of the Official Assignee under that judgment. It is in virtue of that judgment that the Official Assignee now claims to bring the insolvent's property to sale, not in virtue of the promissory notes. The notes became valueless when judgment was passed.

We contend, therefore, that s. 135 applies and that the assignees are not entitled to more than they paid for the claim they bought. Clause (d) of that section does not apply. The judgment there referred to is clearly a judgment of a Civil Court [576] in an ordinary suit. The judgment entered up in this case under s. 86 of the Insolvent Debtors Act is a judgment of a special kind. It is not one "affirming the claim," nor one that the creditors can individually or collectively enforce. It is a comprehensive judgment comprising many claims, passed under a special provision of a special law.

JUDGMENT.

STRACHEY, C. J.—The assignees here contend that they are entitled to receive from the Official Assignees the full amount of the debts entered in the schedule as due to the creditors whose claims they have purchased. The insolvent contends that, under s. 135 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), they cannot get more than the price they paid for these claims.

It appears that the claims which the assignees have purchased were originally claims against the insolvent in respect of promissory notes passed by him to the several creditors whose names are set forth in the schedule. It is clear that s. 139 applies, and that in this case the insolvent cannot contend that the assignees are not entitled to the whole amount of the scheduled debts. The operation of s. 135 is expressly excluded. Mr. Dabar has, therefore, been obliged to argue that the assignees have purchased a claim against the insolvent under the judgment entered up against him under s. 86 of the Insolvent Debtors Act. If so, I am of opinion that assuming such a claim to be an "actionable claim" within Chap. VIII of the Transfer of Property Act, cl. (d) of s. 135 applies, and that the insolvent cannot obtain the benefit of the earlier provision of that section. That being so, I must hold that the assignees are entitled to be paid the full amount of the scheduled debts which they have purchased.

The question as to the amount of the interest to be paid on these debts stands over.

Attorneys for the assignees:—Messrs. Payne, Gilbert and Sanyal.
Attorneys for the insolvent:—Messrs. Edgelow and Gulabchand.

[576] ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Tyabji.

JUMNABAI (Plaintiff) v. VISWONDA (Defendant).* [22nd January, 1897.]

The plaintiff's suit having been dismissed for non-appearance under s. 98 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) she applied to have it restored to the list for hearing, but her application was refused on the 21st September, 1896. On the 17th October, 1896, she petitioned for leave to appeal in forma pauperis against the order of the 21st September and annexed to her petition an unstamped memorandum of appeal. On the 4th December, 1896, her petition for leave to appeal in forma pauperis was rejected, and she was directed by the Court to appeal in the ordinary way if she desired to appeal. On the 11th

* Suit No. 423 of 1895.
December, 1896, she applied for further time to pay the stamp fee on the memorandum of appeal and to deposit the usual security. The Court made no order as to the stamp fee, but gave her time to furnish security until the opening of the Court after the Christmas vacation. On the 21st December she tendered to the officer of the Court the proper stamp, asking to have it affixed to her memorandum of appeal, but he refused on the ground that it was too late. The plaintiff, therefore, now applied to the Court of appeal asking that the stamp should be affixed and the appeal filed.

_Held_, that the application should be granted. As the Court had made no order on the 11th December as to the day on which the stamp duty should be paid, the case should be considered as if the stamp had been affixed to the memorandum of appeal on the 21st December, i.e., the day on which the officer of the Court refused to receive the stamp. That being so, the memorandum of appeal should be regarded as presented on the 17th October, 1896, and consequently within the time of limitation.

The appellant also applied for a further extension of the time for giving security for the costs of the appeal on the ground that in the exceptional state of things in Bombay caused by the prevalence of the plague she had been unable to raise the money required.

_Held_, that under the circumstances the application should be granted. Section 519 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) does not absolutely preclude such an order if the circumstances render it just to do so. The Court cannot lay down a hard and fast rule that in no case, after the time for giving security has expired, an appellant can be allowed further time.

This suit having been dismissed under s. 98 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) the plaintiff applied to have the case restored to the list of causes for hearing. That application was rejected on the 21st September, 1896.

On the 17th October, 1896, she presented a petition for leave to appeal in _forma pauperis_ from the order of the 21st September, annexing to her petition a memorandum of appeal, which, however, was not stamped.

On the 4th December, 1896, her application for leave to appeal in _forma pauperis_ was rejected, and the plaintiff was directed by the Court to proceed in the usual way if she still desired to appeal.

On the 11th December, 1896, the plaintiff applied to the Court to give her time to pay the stamp fee on the memorandum of appeal and to deposit the usual security. The Court made no order as to the stamp fee, but gave the plaintiff time to furnish security until the opening of the Court after the Christmas vacation.

On the 21st December, 1896, the plaintiff tendered to the officer of the Court the proper stamp, asking to have it affixed to her memorandum of appeal, but the officer refused to receive it on the ground that it was too late.

The plaintiff, therefore, applied to the Court of appeal, asking that the stamp should be received and that the appeal should be duly filed. She also asked that the time for giving security should be extended.

The plaintiff (appellant) in person.

_Lang_ (Advocate General) for the defendant (respondent) opposed the application and referred to _Balkaran v. Gobind Nath_ (1); _Yakut-un-Nissa v. Kishoree_ (2); _Patcha v. Sub-Collector of North Arcot_ (3); _Skinner v. Orde_ (4). As to the deposit of security, s. 549 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882); _Moshaullah v. Ahmedullah_ (5).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The application of the plaintiff to have her case restored to the board for hearing was rejected on the 21st September, 1896. On the 17th of October following she presented a petition for leave to appeal from that order in forma pauperis, annexing thereto a regularly drawn, but unstamped, memorandum [578] of appeal. The Court took the petition into consideration and on the 4th December rejected the application to appeal in forma pauperis, directing the applicant, if she still desired to appeal, to proceed in the usual way. This impliedly carried with it a direction to pay the stamp fee on the memorandum of appeal, and to deposit the security for costs required by the rules, within a reasonable time. On the 11th December the appellant petitioned the Court to give her time to pay the stamp fee on the memorandum of appeal and to deposit the usual security. The Court made no order as to the stamp on the memorandum of appeal, but gave the appellant time to furnish security until the opening of the Court after the Christmas recess.

On the 21st December the appellant tendered the stamp proper to be affixed to the memorandum of appeal to the officer of the Court, but he declined to receive it as being far too late.

The appellant now asks that the stamp may be received and that the appeal may be filed. The application is opposed by counsel for the respondent.

We think that as the Court made no order as to the day when the stamp fee should be paid, the officer ought to have received it and affixed the stamp to the memorandum of appeal, and that we must treat the case as though the stamp had been affixed to the memorandum of appeal on the 21st December. So treating it and the opposition of the Advocate General as an application to take the appeal off the file, we think, following the decisions in Patcha v. Sub-Collector of North Arcot (1) and of this Court in suit No. 2 of 1892 (unreported) and the principle laid down in Skinner v. Orde (2), we must regard the memorandum of appeal as presented on the 17th October, 1896, and consequently in time so far as the statute of limitation is concerned. The case in Keshav v. Krishnarao (3) is, we think, distinguishable. The proper stamp will, therefore, now be affixed to the memorandum of appeal.

The appellant also asks that the time for her giving security be further extended on the ground that in the exceptional state [579] of affairs now prevailing in Bombay she has been unable to raise the requisite money to pay into Court as security for the respondent's costs. We think that s. 549 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) does not absolutely preclude our making the order if the circumstances are such as to render it just that we should do so. We cannot lay down a hard and fast rule that the Court can in no case, after the time for giving security is passed, allow the appellant further time for giving security. The Allahabad High Court appears to have thought that it could not do so; and its ruling was followed in Calcutta and Madras—Haidar Bai v. East Indian Railway Co. (4); Budri Narain v. Sheo Koer (5); Skjaujadin v. Krishna (6); but the ruling of Privy Council in Balwant Singh v. Daulat Singh (7) is not quite consistent with these authorities. That was the case of restoring an appeal, but if the Court can restore an appeal after dismissing it under s. 549 if can, we think, under similar circumstances attain the same result without a pro forma dismissal. Here the refusal of the Court officer to accept the stamp of the memorandum of appeal would naturally have the effect of preventing the appellant from lodging the security for costs. It is true that that is not the ground on which she now asks our indulgence, but still we think that she ought to have the same opportunity of giving security as if her appeal had been stamped when she tendered the stamp fee. She could not have applied for extension after that refusal earlier than she has done.

We do not, however, extend the time further than to put her in the same position as she would have been had her memorandum of appeal been stamped when she tendered the fee.

The order on this part of the application will be that the time for appellant’s furnishing security be extended until 4 P.M. on Thursday next the 4th February. If it is not then furnished, the appeal will be set down for dismissal on Friday the 5th February. Costs costs in the appeal.

FATMABAI AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. PIRBHAI VIRJI (Defendant).*

[29th January, 1897.]

Limitation Act (XV of 1877), s 22—Suit by heirs of deceased Mahomedan—Suit originally filed in time by one heir—Another heir subsequently made co plaintiff beyond time of limitation—Letters of Administration obtained, only by second plaintiff—Parties—Practice—Procedure.

The plaintiff as widow and heir of a Khoja Mahomedan sued on a promissory note, dated 31st October, 1895, passed by the defendant to her deceased husband. The suit was filed on the 9th October, 1895. Disputes subsequently arose between her and her father-in-law as to the succession to her husband’s property and she applied to the High Court for letters of administration. On the 9th September, 1895, the plaintiff’s father-in-law, on his application, was made a co-plaintiff in the suit. Subsequently the plaintiffs came to terms, and the widow withdrew her application for letters of administration, and her father-in-law applied for and obtained letters of administration instead. On the 14th November, 1896, the suit came on for hearing. The first plaintiff did not produce any letters of administration or certificate under the Succession Certificate Act (VII of 1889). The second plaintiff produced the letters of administration obtained by him.

Held, that the suit was barred by s. 22 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877). When the second plaintiff was added as a party, the suit was barred as against him. If the letters of administration had been obtained by the plaintiff Fatmabai, her suit would not have been barred, and the Court could have passed a decree in her favour.

Section 22 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) ‘in terms applies as well to plaintiffs suing in their representative capacity as in their personal capacity.

Held, also, that the second plaintiff was properly joined as party plaintiff. When one or more heirs sue, there is no objection to joining all to make the representation complete.

369
CASE stated for the opinion of the High Court by C. M. Cursetji, Third Judge of the Bombay Small Cause Court, under s. 617 of Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

"The following are the facts of the case. The suit was originally filed by the first plaintiff Fatmabai alone on the 9th October, 1895, as the widow and heir and legal representative of Mahomed Jan Mahomed, deceased.

"The claim is on a promissory note of Rs. 500, dated 21st October, 1892, passed by the defendant to the said Mahomed Jan [581] Mahomed. The summons in suit was not served till the 16th January, 1896.

"Meantime disputes having arisen between the said plaintiff Fatmabai and her father-in-law Jan Mahomed Jetha about the succession to the property of the said deceased, Fatmabai applied to the High Court for letters of administration. Pending such application the defendant appeared in this suit with his vakil Mr. Ruel on the 26th March last; he admitted this claim to be due, but denied Fatmabai's right to recover the debt without letters of administration or certificate of heirship under Act VII of 1889. It was also urged by the defendant that Jan Mahomed Jetha claimed from him the same debt as heir and legal representative of his son the said Mahomed Jan Mahomed. This suit continued to be postponed from time to time pending the disposal of Fatmabai's application for letters of administration.

"On 9th September 1896, Mr. Manchashankar, vakil, appeared on behalf of the said Jan Mahomed Jetha and applied that his client be made a co-plaintiff with the consent of the plaintiff Fatmabai. This application was granted and the summons was accordingly amended by making the said Jan Mahomed Jetha party-plaintiff with Fatmabai.

"On the 14th November, 1896, this suit coming finally on the board, the second plaintiff, the said Jan Mahomed Jetha, produced letters of administration to the estate of his son the said Mahomed Jan Mahomed obtained by him alone. The first plaintiff Fatmabai does not produce any such letters or any certificate under Act VII of 1889. It appears that the plaintiffs having come to terms the first plaintiff withdrew her application for letters of administration and allowed the second plaintiff to take out the same. She has, in fact, practically assigned over her claim and all interest in this suit to the second plaintiff. The plaintiffs are Khoja Mussalmans. They are the only surviving heirs of the said Mahomed Jan Mahomed, deceased, and they and the said deceased had been living together as members of a joint family.

"The defendant now pleads that this suit is barred under s. 22 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877. The questions [582] which thus arise, and which I have the honour to refer, are:

"(1st.) Is the plaintiff No. 2 properly joined as party plaintiff?

"(2nd.) If yes, then on the facts and under the circumstances above stated is this claim barred as against him?"

As to the first question the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court was of opinion that the second plaintiff had been properly made a party and referred to Chunder Coomar v. Gocool (1).

As to the second question he thought the claim was not barred. He referred to Suput Singh v. Imrit Tewari (2); Ganpat v. Adarji (3); Boydonath v. Grish Chunder (4); Saminatha v. Muthayya (5); Kasurchand v. Soaramal (6); Manni v. Crooke (7); Progi Lal v. Maxwell (8); In re petition

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—We think that the second plaintiff was properly joined as party plaintiff. Section 4 of Act VII of 1889 [583] does not preclude the heirs of a deceased Kheja from filing a suit to recover a debt due to his estate, but only prevents the Court from passing a decree in favour of such heirs except on the production of probate or a certificate of the nature referred to in the section. When one or more heirs sue, there is no objection to joining all to make the representation complete so far as it can be complete without probate or certificate.

The answer to the second question depends substantially upon this: whether an heir of a deceased Mahomedan added as a party in a suit to recover a debt due to the deceased is a "new plaintiff" within the meaning of s. 22 of the Limitation Act. If he is, it follows that when the plaintiff Jan Mahomed was added as a plaintiff, the suit was barred as regards him, and the fact that he subsequently obtained letters of administration to the estate of the deceased cannot, we think, operate to remove that bar. If the letters had been granted to Fatmabai, her suit clearly would not have been barred, and the Court could have passed a decree in her favour. It is, it must be allowed, a curious anomaly that the result of the suit should depend, in so far as limitation is concerned, upon which of the plaintiffs took out letters of administration to the estate of the deceased; but though we cannot help regretting the result, we feel constrained to hold that the section in terms applies as well to plaintiffs suing in their representative as in their personal capacity. The proviso to it shows, we think, the plaintiffs suing in their representative capacity are plaintiffs within the contemplation of the Legislature. As to that particular class of plaintiffs when the action has been instituted in the lifetime of the deceased, it shall as regards them be deemed to have been instituted when the deceased filed it. There is no special provision for representatives suing after the death of their intestate or testator. The same reasoning seems to us to apply to them as was held to apply to the joint surviving co-parceeners in a Hindu family in Kalidas v. Nathu (9).

When it is once allowed that representative plaintiffs are within the scope of the section, it seems to us to follow that the adding of a plaintiff in his representative capacity (the suit being filed after the death of the intestate) is the adding of a [584] new plaintiff within the section. The representatives are the plaintiffs who sue. The estate is not a persona capable of filing a suit.

Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the ruling in Subodini Debi v. Cumar Ganoda (1) and from it asked us to draw the deduction that when the only change made in a suit is in adding or substituting parties for the purpose of more correctly representing the right originally asserted, the change is not within the scope of the section. It is not, however, easy to reconcile that decision with the exact wording of s. 22 of the Limitation Act, and it would be unsafe to rely upon any general deductions drawn from it. The cases of Kasturchand v. Sagarnal (2) and Pragi Lal v. Maxwell (3) were also relied on, but they were decided upon the ground that all the partners in the firm sued were impliedly made defendants in the suit brought against the firm sued in its own name and are obviously not authorities upon the question before us.

To prevent hardship it might be desirable to lay down the law in the sense contended for by Mr Anderson, but it seems to us that if we were to do so, we should be making and not interpreting the law. If the law is too stringent, it is for the Legislature and not for the Courts to mitigate its severity. Its provisions do appear to us to operate harshly as well in the case of the representatives of a deceased person as in the case of joint promisees; but in the former case any plaintiff by taking out letters of administration to the estate of the deceased can relieve himself of the apparent hardship.

We answer the second question in the affirmative. Costs costs in the case.

of a Mamlatdar within the meaning of s. 8 (1) of the Mamlatdars’ Courts Act (Bombay Act III of 1876). He is an officer exercising on an extraordinary occasion some such powers under the Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879), s. 15. Therefore a decree passed by him in a possessory suit is a decree made by an unauthorised person purporting to exercise a jurisdiction which no competent authority had conferred upon him.

[F., 25 B. 318.]

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Sabeh Narayan Gaunsh, Mamlatdar of Samugaoon in the Belgum District.

Suit in the Mamlatdar’s Court to recover possession of certain land from the first defendant. The first defendant had got possession of the land in question under a decree (No. 2 of 1895), which had been obtained in the Court of the same Mamlatdar during his absence on leave, and while his head karkun was in temporary charge of his office. The plaintiff had sued to get back the lands, contending that the karkun had no jurisdiction to try the former suit or to pass the decree, and that the decree was, therefore, illegal. The plaintiff joined the head karkun and the village officers, who gave possession to the first defendant in execution of his decree, as co-defendants in the suit.

The Mamlatdar allowed the plaintiff’s claim, holding that the decree obtained by the first defendant was passed without jurisdiction and was not binding, inasmuch as the head karkun had not been appointed Mamlatdar by the Commissioner during his (the Mamlatdar’s) temporary absence on casual leave, and, therefore, had no authority to decide the suit under the Mamlatdars’ Act (Bombay Act III of 1876).

The first defendant applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction, and obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decision of the Mamlatdar should not be set aside.

Mahadeo V. Bhat appeared for the applicant (defendant No. 1) in support of the rule. — We ask that the decision of the lower Court in this suit be set aside. The Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, because we had obtained possession in due course of law by executing the decree which we had obtained in the previous suit.

[FARHAN, C. J.—Your decree was not passed by the Mamlatdar. It was passed by his clerk while he himself was absent on casual leave.]

Section 3 of the Mamlatdars’ Act and s. 15 of the Land Revenue Code invest the Mamlatdar’s head clerk with authority to act for him in his absence. If the head clerk had no authority to pass a decree, the plaintiff ought to have applied to get the decree set aside. He allowed the proceedings to go on without objection and this is acquiescence on his part—Vishnu Saktharam v. Krishnarao Mathar (1). We were lawfully in possession, because it was given to us by the Patal and Kulkarni, who are the village officers empowered to execute the Mamlatdar’s decrees. A third person in execution of a decree does not derive any right to sue—Ramchandra Subrao v. Ravji (2).

[587] Chitropiti (with Datrara A. Idg disclaimer) appeared for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause. — The decisions of the lower Court restoring us to possession was right and should not be set aside. The head karkun of the Mamlatdar was not a Mamlatdar under the Mamlatdars’ Act. See Rules compiled by the Legal Remembrancer, p. 518.

(1) 11 B. 163.
(2) 20 B. 351.
During the absence of the Mamladhar, the head karkun was a revenue officer under s. 15 of the Land Revenue Code, but he was not a Mamladhar under s. 3 of the Mamladhas’ Act. A subordinate of a Mamladhar put in charge of his office does not thereby become a Mamladhar. The fact that we did not question his authority is of no importance. Our acquiescence could not give him jurisdiction—Meenakshi Naidoo v. Subramaniya Sastri (1). Under s. 44 of the Indian Evidence Act we have a right to show that the head karkun had no authority to pass the decree.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C.J.—We are of opinion that a karkun taking temporary charge of the office during the absence of the Mamladhar on casual leave is not a revenue officer ordinarily exercising the powers of a Mamladhar within the meaning of s. 3 of the Mamladhas’ Courts Act, 1876. He is an officer exercising on an extraordinary occasion some of such powers under the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879, s. 15. His so-called decree was, therefore, a decree made by an unauthorized person purporting to exercise a jurisdiction which no competent authority had conferred upon him. The dispossessio which followed upon such a decree was a dispossessio otherwise than by due course of law. We cannot, therefore, interfere in this case. We dismiss the rule with costs.

Rule dismissed.

(1) 14 I.A. 160.
[889] Per CANDY, J.—Having regard to the decision in Pranpant v. Jaishankar (1) and the object of the Bhagdari Act (Bombay Act V of 1862), it is doubtful whether the Legislature intended to exempt from attachment the materials of a house belonging to a ‘bhag.’

SECOND appeal from the decision of R. S. Tipnis, Assistant Judge with full powers at Broach, confirming the decrees of Rao Saheb Karpurram M., Subordinate Judge of Jamnagar.

Certain creditors of one Lakha Rayaji obtained decrees against him and in execution attached a certain house-site with its superstructure. The Collector of Broach thereupon applied under s. 2 of the Bhagdari Act (Bombay Act V of 1862) to raise the attachment, alleging that the said house-site with its superstructure was part of a bhag standing in the names of Lakha Rayaji and Lala Pertap and could not be sold or dismembered from the bhag.

The decree-holder withdrew his claim against the house-site, but contended that he was entitled to attach and sell the superstructure.

The Subordinate Judge held that the Bhagdari Act did not prohibit the attachment and sale of the superstructure of the house, and rejected the Collector's application regarding it, but removed the attachment of the house-site or gaban.

On appeal by the Collector the Judge confirmed the order of the Subordinate Judge.

The Collector (applicant) preferred a second appeal.

Rao Saheb Vasudeo J. Kirtikar (Government Pleader) for the appellant (applicant).

Chimanlal H. Sethalavat and Markund K. Mehta, for the respondents (opponents) in second appeals Nos. 939 and 940.

[890] The appeals came on for hearing before a Division Bench composed of Candy and Ranade, J.J., who differing in opinion referred the following question to a Full Bench:—

Whether the superstructure of a house belonging to a ‘bhag’ in a bhagdari village is exempt from attachment under the provisions of Bombay Act V of 1862.

Lang (Advocate General with Rao Saheb Vasudeo J. Kirtikar, Government Pleader) appeared for the appellant (applicant).—The question sub-division thereof. Any alienation, assignment, mortgage, charge, or incumbrance contrary to the provisions of this section shall be null and void; and it shall be lawful for the Collector or other chief revenue officer of the district, whenever he shall upon due inquiry, find that any person or persons is or are in possession of any portion of a bhag or share of any homestead, building-site (gaban) or premises appurtenant or appendant to such bhag or share in any bhagdari or naravadari village other than a recognized sub-division of such bhag or share in violation of any of the provisions of this section, summarily to remove him or them from such possession, and to restore the possession to the person or persons whom the Collector shall deem to be entitled thereto; and any suit brought to try the validity of any order or orders in which the Collector may make in such matter must be brought within three months after the execution of such order or orders.

5. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as prohibiting the alienation, assignment, mortgaging, charging, or incumbrance any bhag or share, or recognized sub-division of any bhag or share, in any such village as aforesaid or jointly and in the gross with its homestead, building-site (gaban), and other proper appurtenances, if such alienation, assignment, mortgage, charge, or incumbrance be in other respects warranted by law, the object and intention of this Act being to prevent the dismemberment of bhags or shares or recognized sub-divisions thereof, in bhagdari or naravadari villages, and also to prevent the severance of homesteads, building-sites (gaban) or other premises, appurtenant or appendant to bhags or shares, or recognized sub-divisions of bhags or shares, from the same or any of them.

is as to the meaning of the word "homestead" in the Bhagdari Act (Bombay Act V of 1862). There is no dispute that under the Act the site cannot be sold; but it is contended that the superstructure can be removed and sold by the judgment-debtor. Sections 1 and 3 of the Bhagdari Act prohibit alienation of a bhag or any portion of it. We submit that the word "homestead" includes, in its ordinary popular sense, the site, the building on it and its appurtenances, and that none of these can be sold. Words are to be construed in their general popular sense—Maxwell on Statutes, p. 69. The Bhagdari Act has not made a distinction between gahram (site) and homestead. As to the meaning of the word "homestead," see Wharton's Law Lexicon, Webster's Dictionary, Johnson's Dictionary, &c. They all support our contention. Section 266 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1872) has laid down that the house of an agriculturist cannot be sold.

Chimanlal H. Setalvad, appeared for the respondents (opponents).—Under the Bhagdari Act the word "homestead" means only the site or land as distinguished from the superstructure—Pranjivan v. Jaishankar (1). The Object of the Bhagdari Act was to prevent dismemberment of bhagdari estates—Manohar v. Chutabh (2). The evil which the Act was to remedy was the curtailment of Government revenue. The bhagdars beganalienating their lands, and the lands being thus alienated, there was a decrease in Government revenue. But the sale of the superstructure would not in any way curtail the revenue. Section 266 of the Civil Procedure Code is not applicable to the present case [591] because the judgment-debtor is a bhagdar and not an agriculturist. The object of the Code is to protect an agriculturist, while that of the Bhagdari Act is quite distinct. The Gujarati official translation contains the expression gharthrani jamin (building-site), which shows what the intention of Government was in using the word homestead.

Section 3 of the Bhagdari Act prevents alienation by a bhagdar. If, as contended, homestead includes the superstructure, then a bhagdar would not be allowed to remove and sell an old dilapidated superstructure however desirous he might be to do so. We rely on the referring judgment of Candy, J.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The question referred to the Full Bench in these appeals is "whether the superstructure of a house belonging to a 'bhag' in a bhagdari village is exempt from attachment under the provisions of Bombay Act V of 1862."

I answer the question in the affirmative. The considerations which may be urged in support of an affirmative or negative answer to it are so fully set out in the referring judgments that it will be sufficient for me briefly to indicate the salient points, which, in my opinion, necessarily determine the meaning which ought to be put upon the statute.

The enacting section upon which the question arises is (s. 1) as follows:—"No portion of a bhag or share in any bhagdari or navadari village other than a recognized sub-division of such bhag or share shall be liable to seizure, sequestration, attachment or sale by the process of any civil Court, and no process of such Court shall be enforced so as to cause the dismemberment from any such bhag or share or recognized subdivision thereof of any homestead, building-site (gabhan) or premises.

(1) 4 B.H.C.R.A.C.J. 46. (2) 8 B. 347.
appurtenant or appendant to such bhag or share or recognized sub-division thereof." The object of that enactment appears from the preamble of the Act which states that it had been found that the permanence of the tenures known as the bhagdari and naroudari tenures was endangered by the increasing practice of attachment and sale by civil process of the homesteads and building-sites (gabhan) appertaining or appendant to the constituted bhags, and that it was desirable to prevent the alienation, assignment, mortgaging, charging or incumbering of any portion of any bhag or of any homestead, building-site (gabhan) or premises appurtenant or appendant to any bhag, &c. The bhag and its homestead and gabhan and premises are treated as an homogeneous whole. The object was, therefore, to preserve the tenure known as the bhag tenure which was considered to be endangered by the dismemberment of the homogeneous whole caused by the increasing practice of attachment and sale by civil process of, inter alia, the homesteads and building-sites appurtenant and appendant to the bhags. The reason for the enactment as distinguished from its object probably was to protect Government in collecting the revenue from the village. The matter is fully discussed in Manohar Ganesh v. Chutabhai (1). With the reason which led to the passing of the statute we are not directly concerned. The object of the Act should, however, be borne in mind when considering the meaning of its several clauses. That object is carefully set out in the preamble which I have read. It is, I think, worthy of notice that it is stated in that preamble that decree-holders were in the habit of attaching the "homesteads" and the gabhan or village sites. We have no evidence before us as to whether when they attached sites upon which buildings were erected they attached both the site of the house and the building upon it or confined themselves to the mere site; but seeing that it is most probable—I should say almost certain—that attaching creditors when seeking satisfaction of their claims would attach the whole, at that time, available asset of their debtors and not merely one of its component parts, I think that we are justified in assuming that the practice was to attach both site and building when the site was built upon, and I conclude that the framers of the Act, seeking for an appropriate word to describe the composite asset so attached, used the word homestead which we find in the preamble a peculiarly appropriate word to describe the dwelling-house of a Hindu house-holder of the cultivating class. If that is its meaning in the preamble, it should, I think, have the same meaning assigned to it in the body of the enactment, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary. In my opinion, there is nothing in the [593] body of the Act to show that a different meaning should be assigned to it from that which most naturally attaches itself to it in the preamble.

Now in determining the meaning of a word used in a statute not being a term of art we ought to assign to it its ordinary, natural or popular meaning. "In general, statutes are presumed to use words in their popular sense; uti loquitur vulgus"—Maxwell on Statutes, p. 69. This is a well-established rule of construction. In colloquial language I can hardly doubt that an ordinary educated Englishman speaking of a homestead would intend to express by the word both the house itself and its immediate surroundings not perhaps very definitely determined in his mind. Popular dictionaries certainly assign that meaning to the term. Webster brackets the words "homestead" and "homestall" and interprets them to mean "the place of a mansion-house; the enclosure or ground immediately connected with the mansion." "Farmstead" he defines as "a farm with the buildings upon it; a homestead." Latham's Dictionary (founded on Todd's Johnson) defines it as "Homestead; farm building about a house," quoting the passage from Dryden which has been referred to—

(1) 8 B. 347.

"Both house and homestead into seas are borne,
And rocks are from their old foundations torn"

and that from Carlyle's French Revolution, Pt. iii. b. i., Ch. VII. Richardson does not refer to "stead" as one of the compounds of home, but he quotes Cowper as to its synonym homestead "And homestead thatched with leaves." Tennyson speaks of the "smouldering homestead." In classical English "homestead" is, I think, clearly not used as exclusive of the buildings of the home. In Wharton's Law Lexicon and in Stroud's the definition of homestead is "a mansion house," and Webster gives its legal signification as a person's dwelling-house with that part of his landed property which is about and contiguous to it. We have not been referred to any English writer who uses the word as meaning the site of a house to the exclusion of the building upon it. To my mind it conveys the idea of a mansion of the more homely kind, or of a farmstead, with their contiguous buildings and curtilage, and I think that used in connection with a Hindu [594] residence in a village it includes the site of the building, the dwelling-house, the trees, wells and shrine and all the appendages which together constitute the usual surroundings of the ordinary Hindu village home.

I am not satisfied that even etymologically it means the site of the house exclusive of the building. The latter component of the word (from the same root as the the Latin store) rather denotes something fixed or stable, the fixed place of the home as distinguished from a nomadic residence—and it is evidently in that sense that Webster interprets the word when he denotes it "the place of the mansion." The meaning which he assigns to "farmstead" makes that sufficiently clear. The place (positus) of the home and the site (situs) of the house do not appear to me to be synonymous expressions. Etymological considerations are, however, I think, out of place when interpreting the meaning of a word used in a legislative enactment. If you go back to the etymological meaning of an English word you often find it widely differing from its present accepted signification. Such being, as I conceive, the ordinarily accepted both popular and legal meaning of the word, I can find nothing in the context, scope or object of the Act under consideration which should induce us to hold that the Legislature intended to use it in an unusual and unfamiliar sense.

It is suggested that the effect of this interpretation will be to prevent a bhagdar from pulling down his house and selling the materials in order to build a new one. I do not find that such a proceeding is forbidden by the Act, and even if such a consequence flowed from our ruling I doubt whether it would be sufficient to justify us in attaching an unusual meaning to a well-known word.

The fact that the translator of the Act understood the word as meaning the site of a house and mistranslated it does not affect the question. The official translation of an Act has, as pointed in _Jetha Parkaha v. Ramchandra_ (1), no legislative force or sanction.

It is unnecessary for me to refer to the several cases decided in reference to the Act. It is admitted that the meaning of the word “homestead” has not directly come under the consideration of this Court or been judicially determined. In Broach three of the predecessors of the Assistant Judge, from whose decision this appeal is brought, interpreted it in accordance with my view.

Lastly, it cannot be said that the interpretation, which I have indicated, in any way defeats the professed object of the Act. Rather I should say that it tends to advance it. The utmost which can be argued is that that interpretation is not absolutely necessary to effect the purpose which the Legislature had in view. So much may be conceded, but as I have said I think that its tendency is to advance the declared object of the Act. To me it appears to be a dangerous practice for a Court of law to endeavour to find a recondite meaning in the words of an Act of the Legislature, because in its opinion the Legislature has expressed more than was necessary to effect its purpose.

Parsons and Ranade, J.J.—We concur.

Jardine, J.—I concur with the Chief Justice on all points, and would do so silently, were it not that after judicial debate this Bench is not all of one opinion. The word “homestead” is a household word, and much like other such words used in decisions and deeds about dwelling-houses. No authority has been shown either in the law or the language for treating the word “homestead” as limited to the site, and leaving out the building used as a home. I will first deal with homestead as a term of law. From the law dictionaries of Jacob and of Wharton we find that homestead = homestead = mansion: and then Webster tells us that in law it means “a person’s dwelling place with that part of his landed property which is about and contiguous to it” the courtyard or curtilage. The first inquiry is, what does “mansion” mean at law? Mansio and domus are found in Domesday; Kenelm thinks they may be distinguished (1). The word comes through the Norman-French like the word manor, with the sense of sedes, an abiding place. Manerium dicitur a manendo secundum excellentiam sedes magna fissa et stabilius. Thus says Coke of Manor; and then refers us to Bracton, Blast [396] and the Mirror: “in these ancient authors you shall see the difference inter mansionem, villam, et manerium”(2). The great lawyer deals fully with the subject when treating “of Burglarie”(3). The indictment saith, Domus mansionalis, a mansion or dwelling-house.

“Domus mansionalis is divided into two branches, viz., the inset edifices, as hall, parlor, buttery, kitching and lodging chambers, &c., and the outer buildings, as barns, stables, cowhouses, dairies, &c., all these are parcels of the mansion house, and will passe by the name of domus mansionalis.” Again, “Our ancient authors and old records did express burglary under this word hamsukne or hamsokne. This first is derived from two Saxon words, viz., of ham, that significeth a mansion house; domus mansionalis, which to this day we call our home; and suckne or succen, that is seeken, as much as to say, as to seek a man in his house to slay or rob him.” Again, “others derive hamsockne from ham, which of both sides is considered to be a mansion house.” Coke also quotes the Mirror “car droit est que chascun clyt quiet en son hostel.” The whole passage requires study, as also chap. 15: of Burning of houses, whence it appears that Fleta uses the words "ades" and Britton using the word "mansion" as altered from Latin into Norman-French calls it "meason" and the Mirror "maison home." Hawkins (1) writing of Burglary follows in most things Coke—"And Sir Edward Coke seems to say, that the breaking a church, &c., is, therefore, burglary because the church is the mansion-house of God." Britton's words about Bourgesours (2) are "eglises ou autri mesouns." In another place (3) he varis the spelling "principal manor ou mies" which Nicholas translates as "principal manor or mansion." It would seem these terms applied then to the houses bought by farmers, freemen, not villeins.

In Termes de la Ley under the word "mease," maison and mansion are treated as the same French word, "which is no other but a place of abiding and habitation." But while "house" means (597) only the matter of building, "mease or messuage shall be said of all the mansion place, and the curtilage shall be taken as parcel of the messuage." In Brooke we find—"Nova Anno 3 Ed., 4. Fo. 3. Fuit agris que terre poeto estre parcelld dun mease." In Sury v. Albon Pigot (5) the plaintiff declares that he was possessed of the rectory of M in Berkshire of which a curtilage was parcelled. "By the name of messuage the garden and curtilage shall pass" (6). This is Coke's view (7): and though in the Note by Hargrave we are referred to a contention that messuage extends to the curtilage, though not to the garden, but that domes only comprehends buildings, this bye-gone opinion (8) is not the same contention as my brother Candy favours. I can find no suggestion, even in the law, that any of these words signifying a place of abode was ever thought to mean only the soil down to the centre of the planet. In Chap. 7 of Magna Charta we find the widow's quaretile for dower (9)—"Maneat in capitali messuagio mariti sui, per quadraginta dies," which Coke translates—"She shall tarry in the chief house of her husband by forty days." He means the capital messuage of Glanvill (10), which is the manorial house or best of several manorial houses: and might even be a castle. See Uoe dem Rose Riddell (11) and Dominus Gerrard v. Dominam Gerrard (12). This law would be unmeaning if the word, Latin, French or English, used for house and home means only the ground after the building is razed. It is used in the old Abridgments and Reports for the tenement to which attached prescription for common as in the more recent cases Hockley v. Lamb (13); Enterton v. Selby (14). Also it is said in English in 36 Eliz. in the King's Bench. The house of every one is the proper place to preserve his goods (15). A widow, possibly burdened with a "ventre sa mere," never could be housed on a bare site in the England of John or here in India under the law of maintenance. The camp is for (598) wanderers and strangers and pilgrims as appears by the cases on tents and booths. The hermit had his cell and the outlaw went to the green-wood. As a general rule we may safely follow Coke, who says (16): "House mese or maison called in legal Latine messagium, containeth, as hathe been said, the building, curtilage, orchard and garden." I assumed before from the law dictionaries that homestead as a term of law is much the same as mansion. Those writers appear to me borne out by what Coke says about "home."

No use of the word "homestead" in any statute or legal authority has been shown us; I infer, therefore, that it was not much used in writings. We know that Latin and Norman-French constituted for a long time the language Sir Walter Scott writes in Ivanhoe—"At Court and in the castles of the great nobles where the pomp and state of a Court was emulated, Norman-French was the only language employed; and in Courts of Law the pleadings and judgments were delivered in the same tongue." Blackstone has some eloquent remarks on the French phrase whereby the Queen assents to laws. Even after Styles had given up Norman-French under the Commonwealth, Siderfin began again under Le Roy Charles le II, calling himself "Jades dit Melieu-Temple, Londres" in his curious title-page; and of course called a house a mease or meason in his black-letter reports, e.g., Nevell v. Hamerton (1), where an enclosure of common was argued bad—"Quiane dit que son meason est auncient meason neque qua curtilage est straight." Even under Victoria phrases like autrefois acquit et custui quafe trust are heard in her Courts; and when we search the Abridgments for Husband and Wife the title is Baron and Feme. No wonder then that Coke writing in English had to explain how mansion meant the home. The general words lasted long in law, such as terre and tenement and domus; some got modified by adjectives; and others altered in common discourse, but not much in law. Mansion and messuage have, I think, not altered as terms since Coke defined them, although "dwelling-house" is now generally adopted in indictments for burglary: and "homestall" is treated [599] by Russell (2), who quotes Blackstone, as including the curtilage. But mansion has changed in common use since castles ceased to be; it has two meanings as Latham tells us..."Lord’s house in a manor; manor-house; manse (hence when used in a more general sense as a place of residence, it always conveys the idea of a place of magnitude and importance) abode, house." "Messuage" has become purely technical; and thus "homestead" not being needed in a law where "mansion" and "messuage" have long been defined, has been left to literature. I think, however, that if Coke had bought a freehold abode as a homestead he would have been startled, if the vendor had come next day with masons and carts to remove the materials of the house. The only instance of which I am aware of the law ignoring these materials is an argument in 1859 in Hill v. Bunning (3) that a cottage is different from a messuage, and is not of any account at law; and (quod fuit concessum) could not like a messuage be the object of a common recovery. Cottagers, qui cottagia et curtillia tenente, were hut little above bondsmen; and 31 Eliz. Cap. 11, had been passed to stop the increased building of cottages. See Coke (4). These things perhaps explain the argument.

"Homestead," a purely Saxon word, meant something better than the huts of the depressed and enslaved classes squatting on the lord’s waste or border or curtilage, and after the Conquest must have meant something not so grand as the lord’s abode, rather such a place as a steady frankelain might in Shakespeare’s phrase stall himself in or a freeholder might establish as his home to have and to hold for his children, for some of these middle class men had in Chaunter’s time comfortable homes, like the lord’s reeve or steward—

"His woning was full fayre upon an bathe
With grove trees yahadowed was his place."

I am of opinion, then, that as a word of law homestead means the same as mansion or messuage; and if mansion is too stately and messuage too technical, and farm possibly confined to the [600] fields—Hockey v. Lamb (1st. ser.)—it is an appropriate term for a ryot's farm in India. Sir M. B. Westropp, who drafted the Act, was very learned in the law. He must have known that the scholarly Colebrooks had found it necessary to explain as well as translate "mansion" and the terms "patrimonial house," principal messuage, &c., in Harita and Manu (1); and in Vyasa held the word "field" used as a place of abode to mean the house and garden (2). It would have been obvious to a lawyer of such varied learning that the phrases often used by us in judgments such as family house, ancestral house, dwelling-house are too inexact to be used in a statute, as we see in Mangala v. Dinanath (3), where Chief Justice Peacock formally distinguishes the dwelling-house of the family from dwelling-houses which belong to an ancestor, as a mere matter of investment or productive property. The word selected, viz., homestead, seems exact enough; especially as there is no real difference between the legal meaning and the common.

I think that circumstance would sway the Legislature in choosing words to affect an Indian people. Although terms from English conveyancing are used, the Act is to govern persons under Hindu law, and the law-makers knew quite well that the need of a house as a home in all senses of that word is under the sacred law one of the holy songs which are chanted by every breeze. For Colebrooks explains the saying of Ratnakara that a wife is a home, by the fact that the sacrament of marriage is the gateway to the great order of grahasthas, i.e., holders of houses, to whom thereupon the getting of a son becomes a duty, leading to union with Brahma (4). As a dwelling-house in England is fixed with the notion of dower and free-bench, since the Church fastened them on our law, so a lawyer can never think of the Indian dwelling, except as a residence where the family must be maintained. The mansion is not to be given away, and not wantonly to be split up. Katyayana declares that a man may not give away his dwelling-house (5); and in the case cited above Sir Barnes Peacock adopts the view that he must reserve one [601] house, without which he himself or his family might want a dwelling. Then Jagannatha is quoted on this text as showing that "house" is meant generally, comprehending a pond supplying water for common use or the like: the meaning being, adds that learned Chief Justice, that whatever is appurtenant to a dwelling is to be retained with the dwelling. Here the widow has a right to abide: and Sir B. Peacock added that he did not remember a case in which an attempt had ever been made, by a Hindu son, whether natural or adopted, to turn his mother out of the house in which his father left her at the time of his death. The authorities I have cited support the view we have come to, and which the Chief Justice has expressed for us about the courtyard being included: and also our view that "homestead" is used as including the fabric, since the other view would be highly repugnant to the general law. I come then to the opinion that "homestead" is used in the Act as meaning a messuage, which is at the same time a mansion-house.

But there is also some difference of opinion about the present meaning of this word seemingly dropped out of our law; and now I pass from the sages of the law to the masters of the language. Now there seems to be not one who uses homestead as meaning only a site, just as there is no authority for saying that "woning" and "place" in the passage from Chaucer mean only situs, and not locus or positus. Longfellow has a fine pictorial passage in Evangeline—

"Day with its burden and heat had departed and twilight descending, Brought back the evening star to the sky, and the birds to the homestead."

To use Coke's terms, the poet describes the insel and the outset, the herds of kine being milked in the farmyard, the former at his own fireside. It would be foolish to hold that the cows were to get under the foundations to be milked. There is a passage in Silas Marner where George Eliot brings out the meaning in a picture of a rural village—

"Two or three large brick and stone homesteads with well-walled orchards and ornamental weathercocks, standing close upon the road and lifting more imposing fronts than the rectory, which peeped from among the trees on the other side of the churchyard, a village which showed at once the sumptuaries of its social life, and told the practised eye that there was no great park and manor house in the vicinity: but that there were several chiefs in Raveloe who could farm quite handsomely at their ease."

The phrase "brick and stone homesteads" shows the brick and stone to be part of the homestead. Our mother-tongue like Magna Charta is our birth-right: we brought it here: it shall not be explained by Gujarati. But it is a fair test of the meaning of an ancient word as it is of an overpowering statute to inquire, has such a thing ever been seen or approved before? If not, I would in the sedate words of Sir Thomas Browne about the two-headed snake "crave leave to doubt until we have the advantage to behold."

As our conclusions are affected by the methods we use, I must add that, in my opinion, the Gujarati translation is no more a guide to the meaning, than a translation of Coke would be to him, or than a translated judgment of Sir Michael Westropp would be to a lawyer whose wide learning and deep research put us in mind of Coke. In Queen Empress v. Maganlal (1) an extra judicial opinion, although written by a learned jurist, and made into a State document, was not treated as any authority on the legal meaning of necessity. Much less then can an unskilled person define a term of law, on which after argument we are not all agreed; although, as the case of Prohibitions del Roy shows, the decision of causes is committed to the Judges on the ground that by long study and experience they can apply the artificial reason and judgment of the law.

CANDY, J.—The further argument in this case before the Full Bench has not removed the doubts expressed by me in my referring judgment.

For the argument amounted to this, that we are bound to construe the word "homestead" in its ordinary popular sense which must mean simply a house, and that the decision reported in the 4th volume of the Bombay High Court Reports was no authority, the house in that case being ex hypothesi not a "homestead."

(1) 14 B. 116 (129).
bbag. It was attached and sold in execution proceedings, and the bhag-dar then sued the purchaser to compel him to remove the house. The defence was that the site of the house was not part of the bbag but this fact was found against the defendant in both the Subordinate and District Courts. The Chief Justice Sir R. Couch and Newton, J., on the facts found said: "By the Bhagdari Act it was not competent to the defendant to purchase more than the materials of the building.... The Act prevents the defendant acquiring any right in the gabhan or wada" (enclosed ground). If these words have any meaning at all, they must mean that under the special provisions of the Bhagdari Act process could issue for attachment and sale of the materials of a house appendant to a bbag. If ex hypothes the case did not fall within the special provisions of the Bhagdari Act, then it is impossible to understand the direct reference to the Act. Sir R. Couch and Mr. Justice Newton were Judges whose interpretation of an Act cannot lightly be ignored.

Next, as to the ordinary popular sense of the word "homestead," no doubt Maxwell says (p. 69) "In general, statutes are presumed to use words in their popular sense;" and then he gives certain exceptions, and proceeds (p. 75): "But it is in the interpretation of general words and phrases that the principle of strictly adapting the meaning to the particular subject-matter in reference to which the words are used finds its most frequent application. However wide in the abstract, they are more or less elastic, and admit of restriction or expansion to suit the subject-matter. While expressing truly enough all that the Legislature intended, they frequently express more in their literal meaning and natural force; and it is necessary to give them the meaning which best suits the scope and object of the statute, without extending to ground foreign to the intention. It is, therefore, a canon of interpretation that all words, if they be general and not express and precise, are to be restricted to the fitness of the matter.
They are to be construed as particular if the intention be particular; that is, they must be understood as used in reference to the subject-matter in the mind of the Legislature, and strictly limited to it."

And again, v. 96: "It is, therefore, an established rule of construction that general words and phrases, however wide and comprehensive in their literal sense, must be construed as strictly limited to the immediate objects of the Act, and as not altering the general principles of the law."

Now the primary meaning of "homestead" must be "the place of the home." Stead is a totally different word from stall, vide dictionaries passim; and whatever connection there may be in stead with the root st, which is found in words like the Latin verb stare, it is obvious that the idea of fixedness and stability is more easily connoted with the site or place, which cannot be moved, rather than a building which can at any time be taken away. Stead is derived from the Anglo-Saxon stade, and its first meaning is "place in general." "From this sense," says Wedgewood,
"we have homestead, the home place; bedstead." And in Stormonth's Dictionary I find: "Homestead, the ground on which a house stands, and the enclosed ground surrounding it." Then, as to the classical use of the word, the weight of authority is doubtless in favour of the inclusion of dwelling-house. As to its legal sense, I have been unable to find the word in any statute of the British Parliament, or in any Act of the Indian Legislature except this Bombay Act V of 1862. In the Homestead Acts of the United States, as I have shown in my refer-ing judgment, the word includes a large tract of culturable land, which in the Act in question is, it is admitted, quite outside the "homestead."
Lastly, as to the popular sense, I venture to think that this is so vague and undefined that it offers us no real assistance. With the greatest deference to the opinion of my learned colleagues I doubt whether the only popular sense of the word is a mansion, with contiguous buildings and curtilage. That no doubt may be one sense, but I think that the popular sense is even wider. As an illustration of what I mean I append to this judgment a cutting from the London Times of 14th October, [605] 1895. It is a review of Mr. Walter Lawrence's book lately published, "The Valley of Kashmir." The reviewer says: "It seems doubtful whether the Kashmir system is not wiser than that of British India in so far as the Kashmir cultivators are denied the right of selling their land. Acting on the advice of Mr. Lawrence, the Kashmir Government has decided that the title given by the new settlement to the cultivators, heretofore, serfs, may not be alienated by sale or mortgage. This means, of course, that the Kashmir cultivator will have to pay a higher interest for borrowed money than he would have to pay if he could pledge a first class security such as his homestead. Mr. Lawrence was perfectly aware of the fact, but he considered that high interest was a less evil than the expropriation of the cultivators from their land if they were allowed to alienate it." It is obvious that the word homestead is here used in a wide popular sense meaning ancestral lands. The title given by the new settlement to the cultivators which cannot be pledged as security for debt is the title of the cultivated land, not of the mansions. The evil mentioned is the expropriation of the cultivators from their lands, not from their houses. Of course I do not quote the extract for any other purpose than to show how the word is used in a popular journal of the present day. But it is a striking instance of the width and vagueness of the popular sense of the word. In brief, it is a farm, but that is just the sense which is excluded from the section now under consideration, which deals with the farm land in other words. As an illustration of the way in which the meaning of the word stead has been developed from its primary sense of place to a farm, I may refer to Jamieson's Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language (1882) where the author under "stead, steadying, steddying" "gives first the primary meaning of stead, and, quoting Ruddiman, says that it is commonly taken for the foundation or ground on which a house or such like stands, or the tract or impression made in the earth appearing when they are taken away; then comes the secondary meaning, a farm house and office; and thirdly the word is used for a farm itself.

An apt illustration of the sense in which the word homestead has been interpreted in the very Act now under consideration is to [606] be found in Baden Powell's Manual of the Land Revenue systems and the Land Revenue of British India (1882). The learned author writing of the bhagdari and narvari tenures says (p. 586): "The main object of the Act of 1862 was to prevent confusion being introduced by the sale or mortgage of the sites for habitation (gabhan) and the homestead land belonging to each share or bhag (apart from the share in the village land), and also to prevent portions of the land other than recognized shares being sold, and so obliterating the ancient and recognized divisions and sub-divisions." The same passage is repeated in the edition of 1893, Vol. III, p. 268, the words in brackets being omitted. In both cases the sense is the same: it is evident that the author like Sir B. Couch and Mr. Justice Newton was clearly of opinion that the Act did not forbid the alienation of a bhagdari's house apart from the site.
One word as to the official translation of the word "homestead."—Of course it has no legislative sanction; if it had, there would be an end of the question. But I have shown the highest authority—Jetha Parkha v. Ramchandra (1)—in favour of consulting, though to a limited extent, the official vernacular version of an Act; and in my humble opinion to assume that the Official Translator to Government must have mistranslated the word is in reality begging the question. "Gharthamai zamin" means and can only mean land on which houses stand.

No doubt the affirmative answer to the question put by the referring Bench must tend to advance and not defeat the object of the Act; for the greater must always include the less. The attachment and sale by civil process, which were endangering the permanence of the bhagadi and marvari tenures, may in some instances have covered the houses as well as the sites, but it is evident that the danger to the joint village tenure would arise not from the sale of the materials of a house, but from the introduction on to the land of outsiders, not belonging to the bhag. If the permanence of the tenure would not be endangered by the attachment and sale of the house apart from the site, then it seems to me somewhat of an assumption to say that because creditors must have attached houses and sites, therefore homestead [607] in the preamble of the Act must mean houses as well as sites. That is why I venture to doubt whether the Legislature intended to go further than the necessity of the case required. Mr. Baden Powell, basing his remarks on Mr. Pedder's well known report, describes (p. 583) how "in these villages we have a proprietary body in possession of a certain area; they built the village on a convenient site, called in artisans gave them houses and bits of land for their support, &c." Surely a house built on a portion of a bhagdar's gaban would be a house appurtenant or appendant to that bhag. But the Act says s. 3, that it shall not be lawful to alienate and assign, mortgage or otherwise charge or encumber any homestead, &c., appurtenant or appendant to any such bhag apart or separately from any such bhag. There is no limitation. It is not enacted that only a bhagdar may not alienate, charge or encumber, &c. The official gaban register makes no distinction between various sorts of houses.

Were the matter res integra, and were there ground for assuming that the object of the Legislature was simply to relieve a class generally from indebtedness, or to prevent the bhagdars from being "eaten out of house and home," the doubts which I have indicated might not have been expressed. But on the contrary the Act expressly contemplates the bhagdars' estates, including the homesteads, being sold or mortgaged so long as the "bhags" are not broken up. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue the subject further; as I understand that my learned colleagues have no doubt upon the point, the affirmative answer to the question referred must in future govern this and other similar cases arising under the Act.

Order accordingly.

Note.—From the records of the High Court, it appears that the draft of the Act, which eventually became Bombay Act VI. of 1862, was prepared by the Judges of the Sudder Dewanee Adawlut (Messrs. R. Keays, W. Hart and H. Hubbert) in accordance with a request by Government on a reference with regard to the case of The Collector of Broach v. Jejeebhac Kooskal (1 Morris, 132).

Gopal v. Nageshwar

[608] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

Gopal Sadashiv Palekar and others (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v. Nageshwar Sitaram Phalsalkar and others (Original Defendants), Respondents.† [3rd February, 1896.]

Khoji Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880) — Survey register — Defendants entered by Survey authorities as occupancy tenants — Suit by plaintiffs for reversal of Survey Officer’s decision and for declaration that defendants were ordinary tenants — Decision of Survey Officer as to tenure not final — Khoji holding dhara land.

A Survey Officer under the Khoji Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880) having determined and entered in the survey register that the defendants held the lands in suit as occupancy tenants, the plaintiffs, who were the khoja of the village, objected to the decision and brought a suit for its reversal and to obtain a declaration that the lands were held by them on the dhara tenure, and that the defendants were ordinary tenants thereof. The Judge dismissed the suit in appeal, holding that the survey entry was conclusive proof of the tenant’s liability, and that it gave no cause of action to the plaintiffs.

Held, reversing the decree, that the decision of the Survey Officer as to tenure is not final, and that a suit like the present will lie.

A khoja of a village can hold dhara lands.

Second appeal from the decision of T. Walker, District Judge of Ratnagiri, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb Parasram B. Joshi, Subordinate Judge of Rajapur.

The plaintiffs sued for a declaration that they were dharekars of the lands in dispute which were situate in the village of Torvan, alleging that there was no khoja land in the village; notwithstanding that the whole village was dharekari the defendants had fraudulently induced the Special Assistant Collector to apply the rules of the Khoji Act (Bombay Act I of 1880) to the village and got the lands entered as khoji and themsesthes as occupancy tenants.

The Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiffs were owners of the lands in dispute and allowed the claim in the terms of the prayer of the plaint, which was that (a) the lands be entered in the Government books as plaintiffs’ dhara, that (b) defendants’ name be erased, and that (c) it be declared that there were no khoja rights in the lands and the Khoji Act did not apply.

[609] The following is an extract from the Subordinate Judge’s judgment:—

"The village of Torvan is dharekari, but there are hereditary khojas whose duty it is to collect Government revenue from dharekaris, and credit it to Government, and for which the hereditary khojas obtain certain remuneration. The khojas of dharekari villages are like patils in the villages above the Ghatas. They have no right to claim any more usual from dharekari beyond that fixed by Government. These khojas are like talatis.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge reversed the decree. The following are extracts from his judgment:—

"That plaintiffs are in the position of the khojas of this village is proved by their having in that capacity seized upon the khoja of Hari Narayan

Palikar, who died without heirs, instead of allowing it to pass to Government under s. 72 of the Land Revenue Code. The Khoti Act, therefore, applies to this Khoti village, and the Survey authorities have rightly framed registers showing the various tenants as dharekaris, quasi dharekaris and occupancy tenants. Their entry is conclusive proof of the tenant's liability under s. 17 of the Khoti Act.

"The relief sought by plaintiffs must thus be refused. For, while the Collector will amend the record in accordance with any decree obtained by the parties, the survey entry gives no cause of action. I cannot, therefore, order plaintiffs' name to be entered in his books, nor defendant's to be erased; and, as above shown, the Khoti Act does apply.

"As regards the declaration that plaintiffs are dharekaris, I am of opinion that it also must be refused as not arising between the parties. A dharekari is a person who holds land, in perpetuity or for thirty years, on payment of Government assessment to the khot. It would be absurd to pass a decree that plaintiffs are their own dharekaris, and this is not what they really want. They probably wish it declared that defendants have no rights in the land; but they do not state whether defendants are tenants-at-will, yearly tenants, trespassers, or what they are; and on this ground also I am justified in throwing out the claim. It discloses no cause of action, and there is besides no demand for consequential relief."

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Ganesh K. Deshmukh, for the appellants (plaintiffs).
Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, for the respondents (defendants).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The Assistant Judge has not gone into the merits of the appeal, but has dismissed it on the preliminary point that the suit would not lie. In this he is wrong. The Survey Officer under the Khoti Settlement Act, 1880, had determined and entered in the survey register that the defendants held the lands in suit as occupancy tenants. The plaintiffs objected to that decision and entry, and they brought this suit for its reversal and to obtain a declaration that the lands are held by them on the dhara tenure, and that the defendants are ordinary tenants thereof.

That the decision of the Survey Officer as to tenure is not final, and that such a suit as the present will lie, was hardly disputed before us and has now been settled by the Full Bench decision in Antaji Kashinath v. Antaji Mahadev (1). The fact that the plaintiffs are the khotas of the village does not seem to us to affect the case, for a khot can hold dhara land just as any one else can. The Subordinate Judge disposed of the suit on its merits, and the Assistant Judge should have heard the appeal also on its merits and determined the real point at issue between the parties, viz., whether the lands are the dhara lands of the plaintiffs or whether the defendants are the occupancy tenants thereof within the meaning of the Khoti Settlement Act.

We reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and remand the appeal for legal disposal. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Decree reversed.

Husband and wife—Restitution of conjugal rights—Defence—Plea of impossibility of sexual intercourse—Legal defences to suit for restitution—Judge has no discretion to refuse decree except when legal plea is proved.

A plea by a wife that sexual intercourse with her is impossible owing to her incurable disease or physical malformation is not in itself a good defence to a suit by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights.

A judge has no discretion to refuse a decree for restitution of conjugal rights for other causes than those which in law justify a wife in refusing to return to live with her husband, and he cannot abstain from passing a decree in favour of a plaintiff-spouse, because he considers that it would not be for the benefit of either side that the decree should be granted.

[611] Dadaji v. Rukunabai (1) followed.

Where, therefore, the lower appellate Court found that there was no cruelty, but that the suit was brought by the husband as a counter-move to defeat the claim of the wife for separate maintenance and a considerable time after she had cess to live in his house and because on the last occasion when she returned to live with him she left the house crying.

Held, that these circumstances were not sufficient in law to justify the Court in refusing the husband’s claim for restitution of conjugal rights.

[D., 13 Ind. Cas. 609=16 O.C. 159.]

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Surat, in appeal No. 99 of 1893.

Suit by a husband for restitution of conjugal rights. The defendant pleaded cruelty and that the plaintiff had superseded her by marrying a second wife.

The Subordinate Judge passed a decree for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed, and in appeal urged (inter alia) that she might not be compelled to live with her husband, as by reason of her state of health sexual intercourse was impossible.

The District Judge of Surat reversed the decree of the lower Court, and dismissed the suit. In his judgment he said:—

"Defendant appeals on the ground (inter alia) that she ought not to be compelled to live with her husband, as sexual intercourse is impossible and as her state of health is bad.

"Although this plea was not specifically raised in the lower Court, it can, I think, be allowed in appeal, as the facts now alleged by the defendant were admitted by plaintiff in the lower Court.

"The marriage has admittedly never been consummated owing to some physical malformation of the defendant. They have now been married some twelve years and defendant is said to be twenty-five years of age. Doctors have been consulted, and the case appears to be a hopeless one. Consequently plaintiff has taken a second wife.

"I am not aware if a marriage between Hindu adults is voidable, as it is amongst Christians, by reason of a physical impossibility to sexual intercourse. A plea such as is now raised by defendant is a good answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights in England. It is more than enough, for it is a plea that the marital relation does not and never did exist. There is, I believe, no decision of any High Court on the point now raised by defendant. As suits for restitution of conjugal rights are foreign to Hindu law, strictly speaking, though allowed now-a-days, I think I shall be justified in adopting the rule of canon law, and in holding that defendant cannot be compelled to live with her husband."

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.
Shivram Vithal Bhandarkar, for the appellant (plaintiff).

[612] Nagindas Puisidas for Ganpat Sadashiv Rao, for the respondent (defendant).

The following authorities were cited:—Ricketts v. Ricketts (1); Dadaji v. Rukmabai (2); Scott v. Scott (3); B. v. M. (4); P. v. S. (5); Norton v. Seton (6); X v. Y (7); Lewis v. Hayward (8); Binda v. Kaumilia (9).

PARSONS, J.—This suit was brought by the appellant for restitution of conjugal rights against his wife, the respondent. The defence was cruelty. The Subordinate Judge held this unproved, and passed a decree for the appellant. The District Judge on appeal took up one only of the grounds of appeal and disposed of the appeal on it though it was a plea not raised in the Court of first instance. He considered that he could do this, because the facts alleged by the defendant were admitted by the plaintiff in the lower Court. We are of opinion that the facts were not so clearly admitted as to justify the neglect to follow the proper practice, viz., to raise an issue on a new plea and decide it only after allowing the parties a full opportunity of adducing evidence thereon. The District Judge assumes physical malformation and that the case is a hopeless one. The Subordinate Judge says only that the defendant has some incurable disease about her hip-bone. No medical evidence has been taken. No issue was joined. We are, therefore, at a great disadvantage in dealing with the case.

The only point we can raise is this, viz.: Is a plea by a wife, that sexual intercourse with her is impossible owing to her incurable disease or physical malformation, in itself a good defence to a suit by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights? That point we decide in the negative. In Browne and Pole's Work on Divorce (5th Ed.) at p. 141 it is stated that "the impotency of the petitioner with a prayer for a decree of nullity is clearly an answer (to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights), as that sets up a denial of the marriage (Ricketts v. Ricketts (1)). And so also would be any other ground for nullity of marriage." The last sentence can only mean a ground on which the defendant in the suit could ask for a decree of nullity. It is obvious that the defendant could not set up his or her own adultery or cruelty as a defence to the suit. This is clearly laid down in Dadaji v. Rukmabai (2), where Sargent, C.J., concludes his judgment in these words: "Civil Courts cannot with due regard to consistency and uniformity of practice (except perhaps under the most special circumstances) recognise any plea of justification other than a marital offence by the complaining party, as was held to be the only ground upon which the Divorce Courts in England would refuse relief in Scott v. Scott (3)." At p. 192 of the same work it is said: "If at the time of its solemnization either of the parties to the marriage is impotent, the marriage is voidable ab initio, and the Court may pronounce a decree declaring it null and void—B. v. M. (1) and P. v. S. (2)." But a suit for nullity on this ground can only be brought by the party who suffers the injury. Therefore the impotent party cannot sue on the ground of his own impotency—Norton v. Seton (3); X. v. Y. (4); Lewis v. Hayward (5). Marriage does not exist solely for sexual intercourse. The reciprocal duties and obligations of the husband and wife under Hindu law will be found exhaustively discussed by Mahmood, J., in the case of Binda v. Kanwulia (6). It would manifestly be wrong to allow one of the parties to withdraw from the performance of the duties and obligations binding on him on a ground which gives him no just cause of complaint and of which the other party does not complain.

We reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and remand the appeal for a legal disposal on the merits. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Decree reversed and case remanded.

On remand the District Court reversed the decree of the [614] Subordinate Judge and dismissed the plaintiff’s claim. The following is an extract from the judgment:

"I agree with the view of the lower Court, that, on the evidence in the case, legal or gross cruelty is not proved by defendant against plaintiff. Nor has this point been seriously pressed in appeal. The main contention for defendant has been that, in spite of gross cruelty not being proved, there are sufficient reasons in this case to justify the Court in refusing to compel defendant to return to her husband’s house. It is admitted by the plaintiff himself that, although he and defendant were married some eleven years before this suit, defendant had only lived with him four or five months since the marriage and that she had been living with her relations. It is not denied that, for all these years, plaintiff made no provision for his wife. Again, there is the admitted fact of plaintiff’s second marriage. This was in defiance of the rules of his caste, and he was fined Rs. 500 on this account by his caste. The cause of this second marriage is clearly owing to the fact of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant never having been consummated, because of defendant’s bodily defects. It is true, as pointed out by the High Court in their order of remand, that marriage does not exist solely for sexual intercourse. The fact, however, that this marriage has never, and apparently, can never be consummated, has an important bearing on the bona fide or otherwise of plaintiff’s present claim. He has let the defendant live so many years away from him and admits that he is satisfied with his second wife. It is only when defendant had instituted several proceedings against him in 1899 (e. g., for maintenance and also a criminal charge of bigamy) that we find him bringing the present claim for restitution of conjugal rights. Though before the Magistrate on 31st July, 1899, plaintiff proposed his willingness to receive his wife back again, yet there can be no doubt (as held by the lower Court) that he did not treat her properly when she returned, for defendant ‘left the house crying’ at once, as plaintiff admits. Having regard to all these facts it may reasonably be inferred, as urged for defendant, that the present suit is not brought bona fide, but as a counter-move to defendant’s claim for maintenance."

From this decision the plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court, S. A. 595 of 1896.

Shivram Vithal Bhandarkar for the appellant (plaintiff).
Randatt Vithoba Desai Nagindas Tulsidas for the respondent (defendant).

The following cases were cited in argument:—Paigi v. Sheonarain (1); Bai Premkumar v. Bhika (2); Uka v. Bai Heta (3); Basappa v. Ningi (4); Dadaji v. Rukmabai (5); Scott v. Scott (6); Binda v. Kaunsilia (7).

JUDGMENT.

[615] FARRAN, C. J.—We think that the District Judge is not correct in holding that the cases show that a Judge has a discretion in refusing a decree for restitution of conjugal rights for other causes than those which in law justify a wife from refusing to return to live with her husband and that he cannot abstain from passing a decree in favour of a plaintiff spouse, because he considers that it would not be for the benefit of either side that the decree should be granted.

The law which we are bound to follow upon this subject is, we think, that laid down in Dadaji v. Rukmabai (5), where Sir Charles Sargeant, C.J., says: "It may be advisable that the law should not adopt stringent measures to compel the performance of conjugal duties; but as long as the law remains as it is, civil Courts, in our opinion, cannot with due regard to consistency and uniformity of practice (except perhaps under the most special circumstances) recognize any plea of justification other than marital offence by the complaining party, as was held to be the only ground upon which the Divorce Courts in England would refuse relief in Scott v. Scott."

That decision was given after all the cases upon the subject which have been relied upon by the respondent before us and in the judgment of the District Judge had been cited, and was a most carefully considered judgment. It has been adopted as the correct view in Binda v. Kaunsilia (7) and ought, we think, to be considered as settling the law. It would, in our opinion, lead to great doubt and difficulty if any other view of the law were adopted.

Here the District Judge has held that there was no cruelty, but that the suit was brought by the husband as a counter-move to defeat the claim of the wife for separate maintenance and a considerable time after his wife had ceased to live in his house and because on the last occasion when the wife returned to live with her husband she left the house crying. These are not, in our opinion, circumstances sufficient in law to justify the Court in refusing the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff by his pleader expresses his willingness to allow the defendant a separate room [616] in his house and to supply her with food and raiment. On this undertaking being given, which should be embodied in the decree, we reverse the decree of the District Judge and restore the decree of the Subordinate Judge. Each party to bear his and her own costs throughout.

BHANA v. CHINDHU

21 B. 616.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranada.

BHANA (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. CHINDHU (Original Defendant No. 1) Respondent.* [3rd February, 1896.]

Hindu law—Joint family—Family debt—Liability of family property—Manager—Decree against a manager—Execution sale—Auction purchaser.

Where family property is sold in execution of a decree, obtained against a brother as manager of a joint Hindu family, for a family debt contracted by his father and himself and a brother, the interest of all the members of the family passes to the auction purchaser though they have not been joined as parties to the suit or to the execution proceedings.

SECOND appeal from the decision of Rao Bahadur Chunilal Maneklal, First Class Subordinate Judge with appellate powers at Dhuman.

Ramsing Megha, and Meher Chand and Ramdas, two of his five sons, borrowed money from Chindhu, the defendant, and passed an acknowledgment (khata) for the amount.

Ramsing died and Ramdas being absent, Chindhu sued Meher Chand on the khata and obtained a decree against him. In execution of this decree Chindhu attached and sold certain fields which were the ancestral property of Meher Chand and his four brothers. The property was sold as Meher Chand’s.

Ramdas, the absent brother, subsequently sold his interest and that of his three minor brothers in these fields to the plaintiff, who brought this suit against Chindhu to recover ⅓ths of the fields in question which Chindhu had bought at the execution sale.

Both the lower Courts rejected the plaintiff’s claim. They found that Meher Chand was manager of the joint family, and ⅓ that the debt for which Chindhu’s decree was passed was a joint family debt.

The plaintiff prefered a second appeal to the High Court.

S. S. Setlur (with him Trimbuck R. Kotwal). for the appellant.—In this case only one of five brothers was sued. Three of them were not parties in the transaction which gave rise to the claim. The decree has been passed against one brother individually and not as manager of the family, and the property sold in execution was stated to be his property.

Under such circumstances the Court will not hold the family property liable—Mayne’s Hindu Law, s. 290; Deendayal’s case (1).

Macpherson (with him M. R. Bodas). for the respondent.—The case of Daulat Ram v. Mehr Chand (2) has been interpreted in Vishnu v. Venkatrao (3). It has been found by both the Courts below that the father and his two adult sons borrowed for family purposes. On Ramsing’s death his eldest son Meher Chand became the new manager. Jankibai v. Mahadev (4) is a much stronger case.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—On the facts found, and in the absence of other special circumstances, I am of opinion that the decree should be confirmed with costs. See Maruti v. Babaji (1); Vishnu v. Venkatappa (2); Pandu v. Manilal (3); Dasaraya v. Bakirgavda (4) and Jankibai v. Mahadev (5).

RANADE, J.—The only point in dispute between the parties is the extent of the interest which the auction-purchaser, who in this case is also the judgment-creditor, acquired under his certificate of sale. The acknowledgment (ruji khate) was passed by the father and two of his sons, and the father being dead, and one of the sons being absent, the suit was brought against the other son Meherchand, and in execution of the decree the property in dispute was sold as Meherchand's.

The absent brother subsequently sold his own right and the rights of three minor brothers to the appellant, and on the strength of this purchased, the present suit was brought to recover \( \frac{3}{4} \)ths share of the property which the judgment-creditor had purchased, and of which he obtained possession through Court unopposed.

Both Courts have found it as a fact that Meherchand was manager of the joint family of the five brothers, that the debt was a joint family debt, and that the two adult sons joined with their father in executing the ruji khate. They also found that the sale was intended to be of the whole house, and not of Meherchand's share only therein.

It is contended, however, before us that as the four brothers were not parties, their interests could not be affected by the execution proceedings. It was suggested by Mr. Setlur, counsel for the appellant, that the general rule being that nobody should be prejudicially affected by the proceedings to which he was not a party, the Courts should be cautious not to extend the operation of such decrees to cases like the present, if they are not expressly covered by the rulings referred to as authorities on respondent's behalf. Mr. Mayne, however, has, after discussing all the decisions of the Privy Council on the point, summed them up by laying down six propositions in all, and the third of these propositions states, on the authority of Deodari's case (6), as also of two later cases, Baboo Hurdey Narain v. Pandit Roodeer Perkash Misser (7), Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun (8), "that a creditor may enforce payment of the personal debt of a father, not being illegal or immoral, by seizure and sale of the entire interest of father and son, and it is not absolutely necessary that the sons should be parties to the suit" or to the execution proceedings. Of course the words "right, title and interest" of the judgment-debtor are themselves ambiguous and it is a mixed question of law and fact to determine what the Court intended to sell, and what the purchaser expected to buy—Appaji v. Keshev (9) and Jankibai v. Mahadev (5). In the absence of special circumstances showing a larger intention, only the interest of the judgment-debtor passes by the sale—Maruti v. Babaji (1). The special circumstances must be such as those found [619] in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modun Mohun (8), Meenakshi Naidu v. Immodi Kanaka (10), and Mahabir Pershad v. Moheswar Nath (11). As a representative case of the absence of such special circumstances, Sargent, C.I., referred to Baboo Hurdey Narain v. Pandit Roodeer Perkash Misser (7).

In the present case the debt was one in which the two adult sons joined with the father. There was no concealment in the plaint why the father and the other brother were not joined as parties. It is found as a fact that the son sued was manager of the joint family. The debt was a family debt. The sale realized the full price of the house, and the creditor obtained possession unopposed. The appellant's deed of purchase was executed pendente lite, and after the attempt to raise the attachment had failed. There is thus no reason shown why the decree of the lower Court should be disturbed. We dismiss the appeal and confirm the decree. All costs on appellant.

(10) 16 I.A. 1.  (11) 17 O. 89 (589).

Decree confirmed.

[3rd February, 1896.]

When a mortgagee acquires by purchase the interest of some of the mortgagees, he acquires only a right to sue for partition after the redemption of the entire security has been effected. He must first surrender or restore the mortgagee's interest and then urge what title he may have acquired by the purchase.

[650] The general rule is that a mortgagee has a right to insist that his security shall not be split up, but in the following cases there is no objection to do so and to rateably distribute the mortgage-debt :

(a) When the mortgagee does not insist on keeping the security entire.

(b) When the original contract itself recites that the mortgagees join together in mortgaging their separate shares.

(c) When the mortgagee has himself split up the security; e.g., when he buys a portion of the mortgaged estate. In this case he is estopped from seeking to throw the whole burden on that part of the property still mortgaged with him.

In 1872 the plaintiffs' father (Khushal) and another (Bapu) mortgaged seven lots of land with possession to the father of defendants Nos. 1, 2, and 3. Four of these lots were subsequently sold to defendants Nos. 4 to 8 with the consent of the mortgagees, who continued in possession of the remaining three lots. In 1878 in execution of a decree, Bapu's interest in those latter three lots was sold and was purchased by defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3. In 1849 the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 sold these three lots to defendant No. 9. In 1891 the plaintiffs (sons and brothers of the original mortgagees) sued to redeem all the lands comprised in the mortgage of 1872. The first Court as to the first four lots held that defendants Nos. 4 to 8 had; been in adverse possession of the first four lots for more than twelve years and that as to them the suit was barred. As to the remaining three lots it passed a decree for redemption of the plaintiffs' three-fourths share of the lands and directed that on payment within six months by them of Rs. 500 to defendant No. 9 (who stood in the place of defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3) they should be put in possession of the lands jointly with defendant No. 9. In appeal the decree was confirmed as to the first four lots, but as to the remaining three lots the Judge found that the mortgage-debt had been paid and that a sum of Rs. 348-5-0 was due from the mortgagees in possession (defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 9), to the plaintiff. He, therefore, ordered payment of three-fourths of: this amount by defendant No. 9 to plaintiffs, and directed that they should be put in possession of their three-fourths share of the lands jointly with defendant No. 9. On appeal to the High Court as to the right to redeem the said three lots,

* Cross Second Appeals, Nos. 573 and 625 of 1893.

 Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem the whole of the said three lots which had been admittedly mortgaged in 1872 and not merely a three-fourths share thereof, and were also entitled to the whole of the surplus sum of Rs. 349 found due by the mortgagees in possession.

 Held, also, that defendant No. 9, who had acquired from the mortgagees (defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3) the equity of redemption in part of the mortgaged property, was not entitled to possession of his share jointly with the plaintiffs. The mortgaged property should first be restored to the plaintiffs and then defendant No. 9 might bring a separate suit for partition.

SECOND appeals from the decision of Rao Bahadur N. N. Nanavati, First Class Subordinate Judge, A. P., at Dhulia.

Suit for redemption. The land in question consisted of seven lots, which in 1872 had been mortgaged with possession by the plaintiffs' father and brother (Khushal and Bapu) to one Totaram, the father of defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

In the same year one of the lots was sold by the mortgagee to defendants Nos. 4 and 5; similarly another was subsequently sold in the same year to defendant No. 6, and a third to defendant No. 7, and in 1876 a fourth lot was sold to defendant No. 8.

The three remaining lots remained in the possession of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 (the sons of the original mortgagees). In 1878 the mortgagees' interest in them was sold in execution of a decree against them, and it was purchased by defendants Nos. 1, 2, and 3, who duly obtained formal possession, being already in possession as mortgagees. This decree was against Khushal and Bapu, but in the certificate of sale it was stated that what was sold was the right, title and interest of Bapu; and in the list of property which had been attached in execution these lands were also mentioned as belonging to Bapu.

In 1889 defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 sold these latter three lots to defendant No. 9.

In 1891 the plaintiffs (the sons and brothers of the original mortgagees) brought this suit for the redemption of all seven lots of land comprised in the mortgage of 1872.

Defendants Nos. 4 to 8 pleaded adverse possession for more than twelve years, and that the suit was barred by limitation.

Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 as to the four lots sold to defendants Nos. 4 to 8 pleaded limitation, and as to the three lots sold to defendant No. 9 they contended that the plaintiffs' right to redeem had been extinguished by the execution sale at which they had purchased the mortgagees' equity of redemption.

The Subordinate Judge held that as to the four lots held by defendants Nos. 4 to 8, the plaintiffs' claim was barred by limitation. As to the remaining three lots, he held that by the sale in execution one-fourth share therein had passed to the purchasers (mortgagees) and that the plaintiffs (mortgagees) were, therefore, only entitled to redeem three-fourths jointly with defendant No. 9. He ordered, therefore, that the plaintiffs might redeem on payment within six months of Rs. 500 to [622] defendant No. 9, "who stands in the place of the mortgagees (Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3) together with his costs of this suit in satisfaction of the mortgage-debt due on three-fourths of the fields mentioned in the plaint. On payment being made within the aforesaid period, the plaintiffs will be put in possession of their three-fourths' share in the fields joint by with defendant No. 9.

On appeal the Court confirmed the decree of the lower Court as to the four lots held by defendants Nos. 4 to 8, but as to the three remaining lots he found on taking the accounts that the mortgage-debt had been paid off, and that a surplus of Rs. 349-5-0 was due by the mortgagees in possession (defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3) to the mortgagors (plaintiffs). He, therefore, ordered as follows:

"The defendant No. 9, who stands in the place of the mortgagees (the defendants Nos. 1 to 3), must, therefore, pay three-fourths of this surplus to the plaintiffs over and above the restoration of three-fourths of these three fields by him to them * * *. Plaintiffs be put in possession of their three-fourths share therein jointly with the defendant No. 9. * * *"

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court, and the defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 9 filed a cross appeal.

Vicaji and Babaji Abaji Bhagvat, for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The plaintiffs are entitled to redeem the whole of the three lots in question and not only three-fourths, and defendant No. 9 is not entitled to joint possession with them. He stands in the place of defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, the mortgagees. They purchased the right of Bapu at the execution sale. Bapu had an interest jointly with the plaintiffs in these lands. The purchase by the defendants of his interest gave them only a right to sue for his share by partition after all the lands had been redeemed. Their purchase of this share did not affect the right to redeem the whole security given by the mortgage of 1872. Whatever right they had, is vested now in defendant No. 9, but that right can only be exercised after redemption of the whole mortgage security—Naro v. Vithalbhat (1); Mora Joshi v. Ramchandra (2).

[623] Scott and Daji Abaji Khare, for respondents (defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 9).—By the execution sale the whole interest in the three lots in dispute passed to defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3. The decree was against both Khushal, the father of the plaintiffs, and Bapu, their brother, and the interest of both passed by the sale. The land was either joint family property standing in Bapu's name or it was Bapu's exclusive property. In either case the whole interest was sold to the purchasers—Hari Vithal v. Jairam Vithal (3). The mortgagors themselves severed the security by selling part of it to third persons with consent of mortgagees.

Vicaji in reply.—Both the lower Courts have found that the interest of the plaintiff's father Khushal was not sold at the execution sale and that Bapu was not the manager of the family, as Khushal was alive at the date of the sale—Appaji Bapuji v. Keshav(4); Maruti Sakharam v. Babaji (5).

JUDGMENT.

RANADE, J.—These are cross appeals from the decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia rejecting the original plaintiffs Nos. 1, 2's claim for the redemption of four lands, and awarding them joint possession with defendant No. 9 of a three-fourths share in the remaining three lands, and directing defendant No. 9 to pay to plaintiffs a three-fourths share in Rs. 348.5-0, being the surplus left after satisfying the mortgage debt.

(1) 10 B. 643.  (2) 16 B. 24.  (3) 14 B. 597.

The mortgage of which redemption was sought was effected by plaintiffs' father and their brother Bapu in 1872, and included seven lands in all, but four of these had been alienated by Bapu to defendants Nos. 4—8 more than twelve years before the institution of the suit, which suit was accordingly held to be time barred in respect of these lands. Bapu's right, title and interest in respect of the remaining three lands were purchased in an execution sale by defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3, who represented the original mortgagee, and were subsequently in 1889 transferred by them to defendant No. 9. There was no bar of time in respect of this part of the claim, and both the lower Courts have held that these sale transactions affected only Bapu's share, and plaintiffs [624] were accordingly allowed joint possession with defendant No. 9 of their three-fourths share in these lands. It is from this decree that both plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 9 have preferred the present cross appeals, plaintiffs contending chiefly that they were entitled to redeem the whole of these three lands, while the defendants contended that the sale of Bapu's interest transferred to them the whole interest of all the mortgagors, and not Bapu's share only.

In regard to the contention of the plaintiffs (appellants in second appeal No. 575 of 1893), I feel satisfied that the lower Court of appeal was in error in awarding joint possession of a three-fourths share in the three lands to the plaintiffs, and directing the defendant No. 9 to refund to plaintiffs three-fourths share in the surplus left after satisfying the mortgage debt. If the plaintiffs had a right to redeem the mortgage of these lands that right, entitled them to sue for the redemption of the whole of these lands. Indeed, if they had brought the suit in the first instance to redeem only their share in the mortgaged lands, such a suit, splitting up the mortgage security, could not have been maintained under the rulings of this Court, which have held that when a mortgagee acquires by purchase the interests of some of the mortgagors, he acquires only a right to sue for partition after the redemption of the entire mortgaged property has been effected. He cannot resist the claim for redemption based on the mortgage admitted by him. He must first surrender or restore the mortgage security, and then urge what title he may have acquired by purchase.

In the present case, the respondent-defendants did not claim any equitable relief by way of contribution and apportionment. Their defence was that the transfer of Bapu's interest made them owners of the entire property. Plaintiff-appellants also claimed to redeem the whole, and not any portion of the mortgaged lands. The parties having thus joined issue on this basis, both the lower Courts were in error in apportioning the mortgage security and debt in the way they have done. The burden of bringing a partition suit has been thus cast upon the plaintiff-appellants, when it should properly fall upon the mortgagees and their assigns.

[625] Looking at the authorities, it will be found that the view taken by the Madras High Court in Mamy v. Kuttu (1) has been expressly disent- ed from in several decisions of this Court. The Madras High Court held in the case noted above that in such cases the mortgagor must first by a regular partition suit ascertain his share before he sues for redemption. The judgment cites no authorities, and it does not appear that the peculiar incidents of a mortgage contract were fully considered. So far back as 1876, it was held by a Division Bench of this Court (Melvil and Nanabhai Haridas, JJ) that such a mortgagee must first restore the security, and it will be then open to him in another suit to establish any rights he may have acquired by purchase—Santaji v. Bayoji (1). This view of the law was affirmed in Alikan v. Mahamadkhan (2), which ruling is of special interest, for it makes a clear distinction between the mortgagee purchasing a portion of the equity of redemption, and a mortgagee succeeding to it by right of inheritance. While in respect of the mortgagee’s rights as purchaser, it was ruled that he should surrender the security, and then establish his claim as purchaser, in respect of the rights which devolved on him by inheritance, the right of contribution and apportionment in redemption was upheld. This same view was again given effect to in Bhikaji v. Lakshman (3). The authorities bearing on this subject were fully considered in Naro v. Vithalbhat (4) and again in Vishnu v. Venkatrao (5), and finally in Moro Joshi v. Ramchandra (6), in which last case, as also in Bhikaji v. Lakshman (3), the ruling in Mamo v. Kuttu (7) was expressly disentangled from.

Of course there are special circumstances in which the Courts have allowed some of the mortgagors or part purchasers of the equity of redemption to redeem a part of the mortgage security on payment of a proportion of the mortgage-debt. The Privy Council case, Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (8), represents [626] one class of such cases. In that case the suit was brought by the purchaser of one out of the sixteen mouzahs mortgaged to redeem his purchase, and the mortgagee in that case did not insist on the redemption of the whole mortgage. The general rule appears to be that a mortgagee has a right to insist that his security shall not be split up—Hurreckur Singh v. Dabee Sahay (9), Mouliw v. Jubbah (10)—but of course (1) when he does not insist on such a right, Asansab v. Yaman (11); Ram Kristo v. Musassam Ameeroonssal (12); Mirza Ali v. Tarasoondeer (13); Kesree v. Seth Roshun Lal (14); or (2) where the original contract itself recites that the mortgagors join together in mortgaging their separate shares or (3) where the mortgagees himself split up the security,—Kuray Mal v. Puran Mal (15); Marana v. Pendiya (16); Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (17); Nathoo Sahoo v. Lalak Amir (18); Mahab Rai v. Sant Lal (19)—there can be no objection to rateably distribute the mortgage-debt. In the last class of cases, the mortgagees himself splits the security by buying a portion of the estate mortgaged, and he is very properly held to be estopped from seeking to throw the whole burden on the part of the property still mortgaged with him. It was on this principle that in the present case the mortgage charge has been apportioned between the four lands sold away with the mortgagee’s consent by the mortgagor Bapu, and the remaining three lands. Lastly, contribution was allowed in the case where the mortgagee succeeded by inheritance to a part of the mortgaged estate—Alikhan v. Mahamadkhan (20).

In so far as the three lands in dispute are concerned, the facts of the present case do not fall within any of the special classes noted above, and the lower Courts were, therefore, not justified in departing from the current of decisions which require mortgagees to restore possession of the mortgaged property, and refer them to a separate suit for partition.

[627] The respondents' pleader Mr. Khare admitted that the decree for joint possession was not formally correct, but he contended that the informality was not of a sort which justified interference in second appeal. I cannot for reasons set forth above accept this view, and the decree must be accordingly amended.

In the other appeal, Mr. Scott for defendants Nos. 1 to 3 and 9 contended that the transfer of Bapu's interests conveyed the whole property. This contention was made to rest on two inconsistent grounds, namely, (1) that those three properties were Bapu's self-acquired property, and, (2) that Bapu was manager of the joint family, and his acts bound them all. Both the lower Courts have, however, found distinctly that the properties were not self-acquired, and that Bapu's interests sold were not those of a manager of the joint family. We must, therefore, disallow the contention, and reject this appeal.

In appeal No. 575, we vary the decree of the lower Court, so far as to direct that defendant No. 9 should restore the three lands in dispute, Nos. 9, 17 and 19 of Mahalkhedi, into plaintiffs' possession, and pay Rs. 348.50 to the plaintiffs. The respondents Nos. 1, 2, 3, 9 should pay appellants' costs of this appeal, and bear their own costs, and pay the respondents' costs in appeal No. 625. Appellants in appeal No. 575 to pay the costs of the respondents-defendants Nos. 4 to 8.

JARDINE, J.—I concur in holding that the authorities just cited cover the first point argued and in the decree proposed.

Decree varied.

[628] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

TRIKAMALI JAMNADAS (Original Defendant), Applicant v. KALIDAS DALPATRAM (Original Plaintiff), Opponent.*

[4th February, 1896.]

Contract—Sale of goods—Contract to supply goods at fixed price—Duty imposed on material subsequently to date of contract—Liability to supply goods—Indian Tariff Act (VIII of 1894), s. 10 (1).

On 2nd November, 1894, the defendant contracted to supply the plaintiff with a certain quantity of dhotars made of European or Egyptian yarn No. 50 at the rate of 254 pairs each month for a period of one year. In January, 1895, an import duty of five per cent. was imposed by Government on the yarn. The defendant thereupon declined to supply the dhotars unless the plaintiff paid the duty in addition to the contract price.

Held, that under s. 10 of Act VIII of 1894 the defendant could call on the plaintiff to pay the duty which he had paid on the yarn, that is, he could add so much to the contract price as would be equivalent to the duty which he himself had paid. The question was whether the dhotars supplied to the plaintiff were actually made out of yarn on which duty had been paid by the defendant.

APPLICATION under s. 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1897) against the order of Rao Bahadur Krishnamukthram A. Mehta, Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Ahmedabad.

On the 2nd November, 1894, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a contract, under which the defendant agreed to supply to the plaintiff dhotars for one year at the rate of 225 pairs per month. The dhotars were to be made of European or Egyptian yarn woven in the defendant’s mill.

In January, 1895, an import duty of five per cent. was levied on the yarn under art. 44, sch. IV, of the Indian Tariff Act (VIII of 1894) as amended by the Cotton Duties Act (XVI of 1894). The defendant thereupon declined to supply dhotars unless the plaintiff paid the increased duty. The plaintiff then brought this suit for Rs. 300, damages for breach of contract, alleging that for the four months from 2nd November, 1894, till the 2nd March, 1895, the defendant ought to have supplied 900 dhotars, but had only supplied 167 during that period.

The Judge found the defendant had committed a breach of the contract and was liable for damages. He, therefore, passed a decree in

* Application under Extraordinary Jurisdiction No. 216 of 1895.

(1) Section 10, Act VIII of 1894: “In the event of any duty of customs or excise on any article being imposed, increased or decreased or remitted after the making of any contract for the sale of such article without stipulation as to the payment of duty where duty was not chargeable at the time of the making the contract, or for the sale of such article duty-paid where duty was chargeable at that time,

(a) If such imposition or increase so takes effect that the duty or increased duty, as the case may be, is paid, the seller may add so much to the contract price as will be equivalent to the duty or increased duty and he shall be entitled to be paid and to sue for and recover such addition, and

(b) If such decrease or remission so takes effect that the decreased duty only or no duty, as the case may be, is paid, the purchaser may deduct so much from the contract price as will be equivalent to the decrease of duty or remitted duty, and he shall not be liable to pay or be sued for in respect of such deduction.”
plaintiff's favour for Rs. 256-2-0. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"The defendant admits in his deposition that on the date of the agreement with the plaintiff he had with him 1,000 lbs. of such yarn in his possession and that he ordered out 4,000 lbs. more for preparing the dhoties in his mill. He further stated that these 4,000 lbs. of yarn would be sufficient to prepare three thousand pairs of dhoties. At that rate the 1,000 lbs. of yarn were quite sufficient for 750 pairs. The plaintiff's pleader has examined the defendant's account and has found out that 1,948 lbs. of such yarn was received by the defendant before the date of plaintiff's agreement, and defendant's pleader admits this. It would thus appear that the defendant had with him sufficient quantity of European or Egyptian yarn for 1,500 pairs of dhoties on which he had to pay no duty. During the first four months of the contract the defendant had to supply to the plaintiff 900 pairs only, whilst he had yarn sufficient for 1,500 pairs, yarn for which no duty was paid. The plaintiff, therefore, is not liable to any duty so far as this claim is concerned.

"Supposing, however, that the defendant had had to pay an import duty on all the yarn that was required for the preparation of the dhoties agreed to be given to the plaintiff, still the plaintiff cannot be liable for that. The defendant's pleader relies on s. 10 of the Tariff Act (1). Here the contract was for the sale of dhoties and not for the sale of yarn. The article contracted to be sold was dhoty and not yarn, whilst the duty was leviable on yarn. The schedule does distinguish the yarn from the piece-goods, and I do not think the defendant can claim to recover from the plaintiff any duty that he might have to pay for the yarn."

The defendant applied to the High Court under the extraordinary jurisdiction, contending that the plaintiff was liable for the duty; that there was no understanding that the yarn in stock was to be used in manufacturing the dhoties to be supplied to the plaintiff; that the defendant was not bound at once to buy in at the date of the contract all yarn required for the plaintiff's dhoties, and that the defendant was entitled to buy in from time to time such yarn as might be required for the said dhoties. A [630] rule nisi was issued calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decree should not be set aside.

Chimanlal H. Setalvad, appeared for the applicant (defendant) is support of the rule.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan, appeared for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The subject of the contract was Egyptian yarn made up into dhotias. Upon this article a duty was imposed by Act XVI of 1894, sched. IV, art. 44. Section 10, therefore, of Act VIII of 1894 would apply, and the applicant could call on the opponent to pay the duty paid, that is, he could add so much to the contract price as would be equivalent to the duty he had paid. We think that the lower Court has not properly considered the latter point. The question is not whether the applicant had yarn in stock out of which the dhotias could have been made, but whether the dhotias were actually made out of that yarn or out of yarn on which duty had been paid by the applicant. It is only in the last case that he could ask for an increased price.
We make absolute the rule, reverse the decree, and remand the case for a fresh trial with reference to the above remarks. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Rule made absolute.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

THE SURAT CITY MUNICIPALITY (Original Defendant), Appellant v. OCHHAVARAM JAMNADAS (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

[5th February, 1896.]

Municipality—District Municipal Act (Bombay Act VI of 1873), s. 21, cl. 1 and 2—Amendment Act Bombay Act (II of 1884), s. 27, cl. 7, and s. 32—Tax imposed by Municipality.

In 1891 the Municipality of Surat appointed a Committee to revise the taxation of the city, proposing to reduce some of the existing taxes and impose others with a view (inter alia) of obtaining a better water supply for the city. A scheme of taxation drafted by the Committee was subsequently adopted by the Municipality, and it included a new house and property tax. The Municipality then issued a notice with regard to this last mentioned tax under the provisions of s. 21 of Act VI of 1873 setting forth the particulars of the proposed tax and requiring objections to be lodged within a fortnight from the date of the notice. A number of objections were received which were laid on the table for twenty-one days for perusal and consideration by the Municipal Commissioners. At the end of that time a special meeting of the Commissioners was held at which it was resolved that the objections were invalid, and the scheme and the rules with regard to the levying of tax were forwarded to Government and were sanctioned. The plaintiffs sued for an injunction restraining the Municipality from levying the tax, contending that it was illegal, on the ground (1) that there was no Municipality desirous of imposing the tax for any of the purposes allowed by the Act, inasmuch as the Commissioners who passed the resolution to impose the tax did not know for what purpose the tax was to be imposed; (2) that the resolution imposing the tax was illegal because the notice calling the meeting of the Commissioners which passed the resolution did not specify this tax as the object of the meeting; (3) that the notice given under s. 21 of Act VI of 1873 was bad, as it did not state the purpose of the proposed tax; (4) that the nature and amount of the tax were not sufficiently stated in the notice; (5) that the notice ought to have stated the mode in which the valuation of property for the purpose of the tax was to be made; (6) that the objections of the rate-payers were not sufficiently considered; (7) that it did not appear whether the tax was to be paid in advance or not; and (8) that the assessment of the tax was made on a wrong basis.

Held, that the purpose of the tax was sufficiently known to the Commissioners; (9) that the resolution imposing the tax was not invalid, although the notice convening the meeting did not specify the object of the meeting; (10) that the notice need not specify the purpose of the tax; (11) that as to the nature and amount of the tax the notice was sufficient, as it stated that the amount would depend on the valuation of the property; (12) that the notice need not define the mode of valuation; (13) that the objections were sufficiently considered; (14) that the tax was to be paid partly in advance; (15) that the assessment would not affect the validity of the tax, but would give a right of appeal to have the valuation set right.

Held, therefore, that the tax was legally imposed.

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur V. V. Paranjpe, First Class Subordinate Judge of Surat.

*Appeal No. 145 of 1895.
Suit for an injunction restraining the defendants from levying house-tax from the plaintiff. The proceedings of the Municipality of Surat are regulated by the District Municipal Act (Bombay Act VI of 1873), and the Amendment Act (Bombay Act II of 1884), of which the following are the provisions material to this report:

"Section 21, clause 1. Every municipality desiring from time to time to impose any tax, toll or other impost for the purposes of this Act shall give notice of such intention, and shall in such notice define the nature of the tax, toll or other impost, the class of persons or property to be made liable thereto, and the amount to be imposed.

"Clause 2. Any inhabitant of the municipal district objecting to such tax, toll or impost, may, within a fortnight from the date of the said notice, send his objection in writing to the municipality, and the municipality shall take such objection into consideration and report their opinion thereon to the Governor in Council."

"Section 27. The following provisions shall be observed with respect to the proceedings of a municipality:

"Clause 7. Except with the permission of the presiding authority, no business shall be transacted and no proposition discussed at any general meeting, unless it is mentioned in the notice convening such meeting and is brought forward by the presiding authority or by any Commissioner who has given ten days' previous notice thereof to the President, or, in the case of a special general meeting, unless mention thereof has been made in the written request for such meeting.

"Section 32. Every municipality shall, as soon as conveniently may be, after it has been constituted, make and may from time to time alter or rescind rules consistent with this Act and with the principal Act:

"(a) regulating the conduct of its business and the delegation of any of its powers or duties to one or more committees;

"(h) prescribing, subject to the provisions of the principal Act, the tolls, cesses, taxes or other imposts to be levied in the municipal district for municipal purposes and the fees to be charged for licenses or permissions granted under s. 22 of the said Act and the times and modes of levying are recovering the same;

"Provided that,

"(k) No rule made under this section shall have effect unless and until it has been approved by the Governor in Council, or by such officer as he appoints in his behalf."

In August, 1891, the Municipality of Surat at a general meeting appointed a Committee to revise the taxation of the city with a view to reduce some of the existing taxes and improve others, in order that the town might (inter alia) obtain a good water-supply. The Committee accordingly drafted a scheme which it submitted with a report to a general meeting of the Municipality on the 17th and 18th May, 1892. The scheme which it suggested was adopted by the meeting. The scheme included (inter alia) the imposition of a house and property tax.

Correspondence with Government on the subject subsequently took place which is immaterial to this report, and on the 23rd November, 1892, another special general meeting of the Municipality was held at which the revised scheme of taxation was again discussed and again adopted with reference to the house and property tax, and a further resolution was passed that the following schedule of house and property tax be adopted and steps [638] taken under s. 21 of the Municipal Act VI of 1873." Then followed rules giving the classification of houses, &c.

The Municipality having, as above stated, adopted the scheme proposed by the Committee issued a notice dated the 3rd December, 1892, with regard to the House and Property Tax as required by s. 21 of Act VI of 1873 as follows:

NOTICE.

"In accordance with the resolution of the Municipality, dated the 23rd November, 1892, notice is hereby given that the following schedule of house and property tax is proposed to be added to Appendix B of the Municipal Rules.

"SECTION IV.

"House and Property Tax.

"1. A house and property tax shall be levied on houses, factories, shops and ware-houses, on storeyard and on spaces and places used for storing property or for trades or for manufactures or for keeping carts, livestocks, &c., according to the following classification."

(Then followed a schedule setting forth the rate of taxation in different classes of property.)

"2. The tax shall be payable by the owners or their agents. If the owner or his agent cannot be found, payment may be demanded from the occupier or occupiers.

"3. As soon as possible for the year 1893-94 and on or before 1st April in every subsequent year, a classification list shall be prepared by the Managing Committee of all houses, buildings and other properties on which the tax is imposed containing (a) the name of the street or division in which the property is situated ; (b) the designation of the property either by name or number sufficient for identification ; (c) the name of the owner or his agent ; (d) the name of the occupier if any ; (e) the class in which it is assessed at ; (f) the amount of tax assessed thereon. For the purpose of framing the classification list for 1893-94 the Managing Committee shall employ an officer specially selected by the Municipality."

(Then follow thirteen rules which need not be set out, and the notice concluded as follows: —)

"Objections against the imposition of the above tax will be received by the undersigned within the period of a fortnight from the date of this notice and placed thereafter before the Municipality for consideration."

In compliance with the invitation contained in the last clause of the above notice, a large number of objections were received, and, as required by cl. 2 of s. 21 of Act VI of 1873, a meeting of the Municipality was held on the 20th December, 1892, to consider them, and it was unanimously resolved that the objections should be laid on the table for twenty-one days for perusal and consideration by the Commissioners.

[638] At the end of that time, viz., on the 14th January, 1893, another special meeting was held to consider the objections. At that meeting it was ultimately resolved after discussion that "the Municipality having considered the objections, and being of opinion that they are invalid, the rules passed on the 23rd November, 1892, be forwarded for sanction by Government." An amendment was proposed that the objections, received should be severally considered and disposed of, but this amendment was lost.

On the 21st June, 1893, the scheme was sanctioned by Government.

On the 25th November, 1893, it was resolved at a special meeting, after the work of assessment had actually commenced, that the term "assessed" should be defined and the definition added to the rules. Some trifling additions and amendments were made, and a notice with regard to them was duly issued and objections invited. One objection only came in, and it was considered at a special general meeting on the 5th January, 1894. The additions and amendments were adopted and then submitted to Government for sanction, which was granted by Government Resolution dated 8th March, 1894.

Thus the whole scheme of the house and property tax comprised in sixteen rules became complete on the 8th March, 1894. The work of assessing properties was, however, going on in the meantime under directions given to the specially appointed Assessing Officer as to how valuations should be made. The directions permitted the Assessing Officer to make valuations on consideration of rents as well as other matters, but the consideration of rents was wholly excluded by the definition of the term "assessed" as given in the rules. The work of preparing classification lists was finished on the 15th January, 1894, that is, before the definition of the term "assessed" and other amendments of the rules were sanctioned by Government. The classification lists were adopted by the Managing Committee after the date of the Government sanction, namely, 8th March, 1894. As required by Rule (4), a public notice was given to the effect that the lists for the year 1894-95 would be ready on the 28th March, 1894.

On the 14th August, 1894, the Municipality having presented to the plaintiff a bill for payment within fifteen days of Rs. 1-12-0 as the first instalment of the house-tax since 1st April, 1894, the plaintiff brought this suit for an injunction restraining the Municipality from levying the house-tax upon him. He contended that the tax was illegally imposed, the provisions of Bombay Act VI of 1873 not having been observed.

The Subordinate Judge granted the injunction prayed for and passed a decree for the plaintiff. He held the tax illegal, finding (inter alia) that the notification of the 3rd December, 1892, was inadequate, and also that all the objections sent in had not been considered. The following extracts from his judgment are necessary in order to follow the judgment of the appeal Court:

"30. The several steps in the machinery for imposing a tax as laid down in s. 21 are as follows:

(1) Desire or intention of a Municipality to impose a tax for the purposes of the Act.

(2) Giving notice of such intention.

(3) Requisite contents of the notice—(a) the nature of the tax, (b) the classes of persons or property to be made liable thereto, and (c) the amount to be imposed.

(4) Liberty granted to inhabitants of the municipal district to take objections, if they have any, to the imposition of the tax.

(5) Considerations of such objections by the Municipality.

(6) Report of the Municipality stating its opinion on the merits of the objections after such consideration to be submitted to the Governor in Council."
(7) The decision of the Governor in Council."

"(44) We have next to see how far the provisions of the 2nd paragraph of s. 21 have been complied with. In accordance with notice (Ex. 30) numerous petitions of objections, more than six-thousand, signed by 10,458 persons, were received from people. By a resolution passed by the Municipality, they were laid on the table of their office for a period of 21 days, for being read by the several Commissioners. On the expiry of that period a special meeting was convened for considering them. When the meeting assembled, a majority of 16 members to 7 pronounced all of them as invalid. It is alleged that they were not, as a fact, considered at all. That they were not read at the meeting except perhaps a very few, is an admitted fact. It was, indeed, a physical impossibility to read all of them, filed as they are in not less than eleven large files, in the course of two hours for which the meeting held its sitting. It appears from its proceedings that two amendments were proposed to the original proposition, one for reading all the petitions, and the other for reading the English petitions; but they were both rejected. Mr. Bejanji says that in a previous meeting not a single member had taken objection to the petitions being laid on the table, and they having been placed there, sufficient opportunity was given to the members to read them. This fact coupled with the statement made in the proceeding (Ex. 33), to the effect that they were considered, must be regarded as sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the law in that behalf. He urges that this Court has no power to inquire how they were considered and what amount of thought was given to them. On the other hand the counsel of the plaintiff say that the mere statement, that they were considered, will not do. They urged that there ought to be a joint discussion and debate about them, in the meeting itself. Now let us see what was actually done in this behalf. The proceedings of the meeting do not help us much. They make the bare statement that the objections were considered, but supply no further information as to the way in which it was done. We have, therefore, to look into the oral evidence to ascertain this point. There are thirty members on the Municipal Board including the President. Eighteen of the Commissioners and the Secretary of the Municipality are examined as witnesses. It appears from their depositions that only three of them (Nos. 182, 195 and 236) read all the petitions. One witness, No. 143, says that he did not read any petition at all, neither did he ever go to the Municipal Office for reading them. From the evidence of the rest of the witnesses it can be seen that all the petitions were not read by any of them. One read fifty, another one thousand, a third four or five thousand and so on. This much was done while the petitions were lying on the table. When the subject came before the meeting, there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether any petitions were read there at all. Some say that not a single petition was read, and amongst these is one who voted in favour of the tax, and who was afterwards appointed the special officer for preparing classification lists (Ex. 104); while others say that a few petitions were read. Some depute that the President asked the Commissioners to state their opinions as to the objections, when some of them said what they thought about them. It does not appear that a regular discussion on each point taken in the objections, took place. One of the witnesses, No. 195, says that when he used to go to read petitions as they were lying on the table, he had discussion with other Commissioners who too came there to read. Taking the above as all that occurred at and out of the meeting, let us see whether it satisfied the..." requirement of the law. Mr. Bejanji contends that sufficient opportunity was given to the Commissioners to go through and consider the petitions; and if some or many of them did not avail themselves of the opportunity, it was not the fault of the defendant. This argument may look plausible at the first sight, but if we look into it a little deeper, its hollowness would be apparent. A Municipal Corporation is one whole body, consisting of several Commissioners. Each Commissioner forms a part of that body, just as one limb is a part of the body of one individual person. As this individual person has no existence independently of his several limbs, so the corporate body has no existence independently of its several members. Now suppose one single person is required by law to consider a thing and report his opinion thereon, and also suppose that he says: 'I gave myself, that is, all the parts of my body and mind, sufficient opportunity to consider the matter. They neglected. Was it my fault? I say, however, that I considered that matter, and my opinion is that it is improper and invalid.' Can it be said that the person has obeyed the direction of the law? Certainly not. In the same way, affording opportunity to the Commissioners is alone not sufficient. The proper question to be decided is whether the objections were or were not, as a matter of fact, considered. A bare statement to that effect in the proceedings [637] will not do when there is evidence to the contrary. It is said that the mode of considering the objections by laying them on the table for a time, was resolved upon by the unanimous decision of all the Commissioners. It may be so. But it does not satisfy the requirement of the law when it is found that they were not so considered. It was not, moreover, meant by that resolution that it should be the final consideration. The object of it was, as is said by one of the witnesses, to enable the Commissioners to make them acquainted with the objections, and thus to be ready to discuss the matter in the meeting and give votes as to their merits. If it could be shown that all the Commissioners, or at least those who were present at the meeting, had read all the objections or had, at least, got them read or explained to them, and if after having done this they or the majority of them had given their opinion that they were invalid, then that would have been the joint action of the board, and the direction of the law been regarded as substantially fulfilled. But this was not done and, therefore, I find that the direction of law remains unfulfilled. It may be said that as there were so many petitions, they could not be conveniently read in the meeting. Quite true. It would certainly be a wearisome task. The work would take several weeks, if not months, to finish. The proposal, therefore, to lay them on table for the Commissioners to read at their leisure was very proper. But as most of the Commissioners did not take advantage of it, as they ought to have done, and as they did not read all the petitions as they were bound to do, there was only one remedy left: and it was to have all the petitions read at the meeting. It might be urged why those Commissioners who were diligent and who had gone through all of them should be again troubled for the fault of others. The answer is that it was an unavoidable thing for passing the scheme through machinery to the last stage. I have compared a corporate body to an individual body. By carrying the analogy a little further it may be said, that as when some parts or limbs of a body refuse or become unable to carry on their proper functions, the rest of the parts or limbs are made to suffer the inconvenience; so if some of the members of a corporate body do not do their work properly, the others must necessarily put up with the inconvenience, if they wish to carry any particular aim of the body to a successful end.
if they have not so much patience, they are at liberty to cease to be its members.

"(45) The objections were submitted to Government through the Collector (who is also the President of the Municipality) and the Divisional Commissioner. These officers passed their several opinions on them. The Collector observed that 'out of 6,233 petitions more than 6,000 were presented by the hands of one individual. They bear the impress of having been the work of a few hands. For instance 1,138 are in the handwriting of a single man and apparently signed by a few men also.' It is further remarked that 'no less than 3,000 of the signatures now submitted do not contain the father’s name and 5,924 give no address. By this means, identification is made impossible’ (See Ex. 245.) By making these remarks it is suggested that a large number of the petitions was not genuine. This criticism, made ex parte without proper inquiry, cannot be accepted in a judicial proceeding as a true indication of the nature of the petitions. It, moreover, is not the opinion of the Municipal body, but the individual opinion of the Collector. The Divisional Commissioner passed a different, but equally unfavourable, opinion. He said 'it was a physical impossibility to read over in the meeting the whole of 6,233 petitions. It was, no [638] doubt, with the amiable object of creating this impossibility that most of the petitioners were made to sign individual petitions instead of the usual practice of drawing up united statements of all the arguments against the proposal. Besides, it was felt that if the Municipality devoted several days to hearing all the papers, rattled over one another, the real arguments would escape notice in the mass of verbiage (see Ex. 92).’ I believe there is considerable force in these remarks. Though the petitions may not have been generally written with the intention ascribed to them by the Divisional Commissioner, yet the result was just the same. I do not think the people acted wisely in drawing up so many separate petitions. There could not possibly be a separate and a new argument in each petition. The people seem to have lost sight of the principle that quality rather than quantity deserves attention, and if the quantity is allowed to increase beyond its reasonable limits, it brings in the risk of what little quality there may be, of being altogether disregarded. It would have simplified the matter if they, as remarked by the Divisional Commissioner, had drawn up a few representations stating their objections and reasons against the tax. It would have served their purpose far better if that purpose was simply to have their objections properly considered by the Municipality and the Governor in Council, and not to create unnecessary difficulties in their way. If the inhabitants of any place or some individual Commissioners of any Municipality are found to have a marked tendency of throwing obstacles and causing delay in the discharge of business, the Government have it in their power to abolish the Municipality altogether, or suspend it for a time, and have the work done by their own officers. But so long as this is not done, all the citizens have the privilege and choice of sending individual or joint petitions; and it will not be just and proper to refuse to consider individual petitions, because the more convenient way of making joint representations was not followed, though the work would entail and require a good deal of labour and time. Unless each and all of the petitions are read out, it will not be possible to judge whether they do or do not contain a valid argument. By reading a few or even most of them, the idea of what the rest may contain, cannot be had. The Government have recently issued a circular (Ex. 94) laying down the manner in which a Municipality should act under s. 21. In para. 3 of it, they require that the report of the Municipality should set forth each objection taken by the people, with its opinion. I refer to this document, not because it enacts any new rule, but because the Government have also recognized the necessity of each objection being considered and reported on. For the foregoing reasons I find that, in the present case, the Municipality failed to consider the objections of the people in the way in which they ought to be considered. This is the most serious of all the irregularities which invalidate the tax."

"51. It is also contended by the plaintiff that Rule 7 does not clearly show whether the tax is to be paid in arrears or in advance. It mentions the due dates of half-yearly instalments of the year 1893-94 and of the succeeding years. The financial year of the Municipality begins with the 1st April and ends with the 31st March. The scheme was not complete before the first year was nearly at its close, and for that reason the tax of that year is not demanded. From 1894-95 the half-yearly instalments became due on the 1st July and the 1st January in each year. It is clear that the tax is made payable partly in arrears and partly in advance."

JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

PARSONS, J.—The most satisfactory way to deal with this appeal is, we think, to consider the objections to the legality of the tax in question seriatim, setting out the facts so far as they relate to the particular objection under review. This is the method that has been adopted by the Subordinate Judge against whose decree this appeal has been made, and it was the course adopted at the hearing of the appeal. We will consider, therefore, those objections in the order in which they have been dealt with by the Subordinate Judge, and which was followed in this Court, as far as was possible.

The history of the case is given by the Subordinate Judge in paras. 1 to 22 of his judgment and need not be restated. The objections dealt with by the Subordinate Judge in paras. 23 to 29 have not been pressed.

in appeal. The necessary steps for imposing a tax are sufficiently accurately set out in para. 30 (1) of his judgment, and the first objection to be considered falls under the first of the steps that he mentions.

[640] Section 21, cl. (1), of the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1873 begins thus: "Every Municipality, desiring from time to time to impose any tax, toll or other impost for the purposes of this Act." It was argued by Mr. Scott that in the present case there was no Municipality desirous of imposing a tax for any of the purposes of the Act, because, though there was a resolution passed to impose a tax, the Municipal Commissioners who passed the resolution did not themselves know for what purpose the tax was to be imposed, and he cited, in support of his argument, Exs. 59, 245 (para. 15), 236, 156, 104, 218, 223, 150, 182, 168, 148, 143, 79 and 69. The objection is one that was not expressly taken in the lower Court, and, therefore, has not been dealt with there. It seems to us that it is an untenable one, because every Municipal Commissioner knew that the whole scheme of taxation was to be revised with a view to reduce some of the existing taxes and impose others in order that the town might, among other benefits, obtain a water-supply. The resolution of the meeting held on the 23rd November, 1892, (Ex. 29) is conclusive on the point of desire. It is not alleged that the tax in question was sought to be imposed for any purpose contrary to or beyond those of the Act.

It is next objected that the resolution above mentioned (Ex. 29) was illegal, because the scheme was proposed to be adopted at a meeting without previous notice. "The notice calling the meeting (Ex. 29) does not specify the tax as the object of the meeting, but only the Government Resolution (Ex. 55). Section 27 of the Act of 1884 requires notice. Clause 7 does not apply to special meetings—Hiralal v. The Thana Municipality (3)." This objection is dealt with by the Subordinate Judge in paras. 32 to 34 of his judgment. We agree with him in the construction he puts on cl. 7 of s. 27. The words "except with the permission of the presiding authority" clearly govern the whole of the rest of the clause, and, therefore, even if there were no mention of this business in the notice convening the [641] meeting, the resolution would not be bad. We think, however, that the mention in the notice, that "the Government Resolution No. 3947 of the 31st October, 1892, with the opinion of the Legal Remembrancer about the revised scheme of taxation," was the business to be transacted, was under the circumstances sufficiently explicit, and justified a detailed revised scheme of taxation being placed before the meeting (see Exs. 55 and 56) and proposed for adoption. It was then open to any Commissioner to raise any objection he chose to the adoption. The resolution that was ultimately passed to adopt the scheme and to impose the tax (29) was, in our opinion, valid and binding.

The next objection is as to the notice required to be given under s. 21 (it forms the second and third of the necessary steps set out by the Subordinate Judge in para. 30). Section 21 (1) continues thus: "shall give notice of such intention, and shall in such notice define the nature of the tax, toll or other impost, the class of persons or property to be made liable thereto, and the amount to be imposed." Exhibit 30 is

(1) See ante, 21 B. 680. (2) P. J. (1891), p. 94. (3) 7 B. 399.
the notice actually given. It runs thus:—[His Lordship read the notice of the 3rd December, 1892, set out supra p. 633, and continued.]

It is objected that this notice is bad, because it does not state the purpose for which the tax was desired to be imposed. "The words 'such intention' include purpose. The tax-payers have a voice in the matter, and ought to be able to object to the purpose—Re Eastern Counties Railway Company and Overseers of Moulton (1).

Objections cannot properly be made unless the purpose of the tax is disclosed." The Subordinate Judge has discussed this objection and allowed it for reasons set out in paras. 35 to 38 of his judgment. We do not agree with him. Assuming the desirability of stating the purpose, we cannot hold that the law has declared it necessary to state the purpose in the notice. We think that the word "intention" means what it actually does mean and no more—"intention to impose a certain tax"—and that it cannot be construed to mean "intention and purpose." We should have expected the Legislature to have used these words had it considered it necessary to give notice of the purpose.

We observe that the Act evidently does not contemplate each particular tax being imposed for a specific purpose and applied to that purpose. The tax is to be raised "for the purposes of the Act." If the specific object of a particular tax were required by law to be stated in the notice, it could only be in order that the money to be raised by it should be applied to that purpose and no other. This is not, however, contemplated by the Act. Rates in England are raised for specific purposes, highway rates for highways—poor rates for the support of the poor—school rates for educational objects, and so on. Each rate must be applied to the purpose for which it is raised. Therefore it is that the purpose of such rates must be mentioned in the notice. This consideration distinguishes the case cited by Mr. Scott and shows its inapplicability to the clause in question. What the objectors really desire to have stated in the notice is the reason for raising the tax and not the purpose to which it is to be applied—but that could not conveniently be stated in a formal notice. It would be obviously impossible to do so fully. The reason for the tax is to be learned from the debate which takes place when it is proposed. In the present case the purpose of the tax was known to the inhabitants. The objections made to the tax show this clearly.

Then it is objected that the nature and amount of the tax were not sufficiently stated in the notice. "The bare statement that the tax was to be a house and property tax is insufficient. The principle on which it was to be assessed, on what rateable value it was to fall, the exemptions proposed to be allowed, the mode in which the value of the property taxed was to be arrived at,—all of these things ought to have been stated in the notice." This objection is discussed by the Subordinate Judge in paras. 39 to 43 of his judgment. He disallows the objection that the total amount which the tax is estimated to produce ought to have been stated in the notice, rightly holding that the word "amount" means that which the person or property will have to pay, but he allows the objection that the omission to state the principle on which the tax was to be assessed rendered the tax illegal, and that the subsequent addition defining the mode of assessment did not cure the illegality. It seems to us that there is some confusion of ideas here. The notice was that the tax was to be so much according to a certain classification, which classification depended upon the value at which the property was assessed. It was further provided that the classification lists were to be made by the Managing Committee, and a right of appeal was given from the decision of the Managing Committee. In other words, it was notified that the tax to be imposed was one the amount of which depended on the valuation of the property made in the first instance by the Managing Committee. That was the principle on which the tax was to be imposed and levied, and the notice is clear on the point. We fail to see any omission or illegality in the notice respecting such a tax as the one in the present case. As soon as the value of the property was ascertained, the amount of the tax was at once known.

It was further argued that the notice under s. 21 ought to have contained rules defining the mode in which the Managing Committee were to arrive at their valuation; but s. 21 (1) does not require this. No doubt it is expedient that there should be some rules, so that the Managing Committee should not be left guidanceless in the matter, but the framing of these rules seems to be an after-process, which is provided for by s. 32 of the Act of 1884. As a matter of fact in the present case such was done. At a general meeting held on the 23rd November, 1893, additions and amendments in the rules for the levy of the tax were passed by the Municipality. These additions and amendments were notified to the public under s. 21 (1); the only objection made was considered, and the sanction of Government was obtained to them on the 8th March, 1894 (Ex. 50). The Subordinate Judge says that on that date the whole scheme of the house and property tax consisting of sixteen rules became complete. He has, however, declared it illegal, because the scheme and rules were not all proposed and sanctioned by one and the same process at one and the same time. There is no authority for such a proposition. Under the Act there is no prohibition of an amendment of the scheme of taxation, provided only the provisions of s. 21 are complied with. In the present case it cannot be said that the scheme was amended. The tax was not altered either in its nature or incidence; the powers only of the Managing Committee were curtailed and [644] defined. They had been given the power of valuing property according to any mode they chose. This was now taken away, and certain rules were passed for their guidance and observance. These rules, however, as we have before said, were not passed until after the provisions of s. 21 had been observed, and there is no objection raised to them on the ground that these provisions were not fully complied with. We think, therefore, that they are perfectly legal and valid.

The next objection falls under the fifth step mentioned in para. 30 of the judgment. Section 21 (2) provides as follows:—"Any inhabitant of the municipal district objecting to such tax, toll or impost may, within a fortnight from the date of the said notice, send his objection in writing to the Municipality, and the Municipality shall take such objection into consideration." The Subordinate Judge deals with the objection in paras. 44 and 45 (1) of his judgment and allows it. He says the Municipality failed to consider the objections of the people in the way in which they ought to be considered. A great deal of evidence has been cited to us on the point. It appears that no less than 6,283 petitions bearing 10,458 signatures were sent in, in reply to the notice. In accordance with a resolution passed by the Municipality on the 20th December, 1892, they were left on the hall table for twenty-one days for perusal by the Commissioners. At the end of that time, namely, on the 14th January, 1893, a special general meeting was held to consider the objections. At that meeting it was proposed and seconded that "the Municipality, having considered the objections, and being of opinion that they are invalid, the rules passed on the 23rd November, 1892, be forwarded for sanction by Government." Three amendments were proposed successively to this proposition: viz., (1) that the scheme should not be submitted to Government, as it was illegal; (2) that the petitions be severally considered and disposed of; (3) that the printed petitions only be read and considered separately. Each was voted on and negatived, and the original proposition was ultimately put to the meeting and carried.

It seems to us that this is a consideration within the meaning of the clause which requires consideration only and is silent as [346] to the amount as well as the quality of that consideration. It is to be noted also that it is the objection only that has to be considered. The petitions may be innumerable, the objections may be few. In the present case it has been pointed out to us that they are very few: for the most part the petitions contain only individual objections to pay a house-tax and statements that a water-supply was not necessary. During the twenty-three days that the petitions lay on the table, most of the Commissioners went and read them, three of them read the whole, one read fifty, another a thousand, another four or five thousand, and so on. One witness only (143) says that he did not read any; but he had been sick and had not attended the meetings for one year and a half before he was examined. The members, therefore, who attended at the special meeting were generally well acquainted with the nature of the objections and so able to discuss and consider them. Apparently a full discussion took place about them. No one was refused a hearing, and it is not suggested that the meeting was brought to an end by any application of the closure or other abrupt method. All that was refused was the reading and consideration of the petitions severally. That, in our opinion, was unnecessary; in the present case it was almost impossible.

The next objection raised before us is dealt with in para. 51(1) of the judgment, and we agree with the Subordinate Judge in the conclusion he has come to in respect to it.

The only other objection raised before us is dealt with by the Subordinate Judge in para. 52. The plaintiff complains that the assessment of the value of the property classified has been made upon an erroneous basis, and not according to the amended rules. We need not discuss this objection, as we are of opinion that even if the complaint were well founded it would not affect the validity of the tax. It would only give the plaintiff and other persons whose property has been similarly assessed a right of appeal to have the valuation set right.

As all the objections fail, and the tax is proved to have been legally imposed, we reverse the decree of the lower Court and order the plaintiff's suit to be dismissed with costs throughout.

Decree reversed.
VUNDRAVANDAS v. CURSONDAS

21 B. 647

[646] ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before Sir O. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Tyabji.

VUNDRAVANDAS PURSHOTAMDAS (Original Defendant), Appellant
v. CURSONDAS GOVINDJI (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.*

[22nd and 29th January, and 1st February, 1897.]

Will — Dharam — Gift to dharam — Charity — Reversioner — Limitation applicable to reversioner—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), art. 141.

One Callianji Sewji died without issue on 6th January, 1869, leaving two widows Cooverbai and Nenavahoo, who thereupon took a widow's estate in such of his immovable property as was not validly disposed of by him. By his will dated 5th January, 1869, he appointed the defendant Vundravandas and two others his executors and trustees. The two latter were dead at the date of this suit. By his will he left two immovable properties to his wife Cooverbai for life and two to his wife Nenavahoo, and the residue of his property he left to his trustees, directing them to apply the same in charity (dharam). The properties left to his widows were to revert on their death to the charity fund held by the said trustees.

Cooverbai died in 1871, Nenavahoo survived till 1888 and died in November of that year, leaving a will.

The plaintiff was the nephew (brother's son) and heir of the testator and he sued to have his rights in and to his uncle's estate ascertained. He contended that the bequests for dharam were void and that the property bequeathed for that purpose was undisposed of. He claimed to be entitled to the whole of the testator's immovable property including that which had been devised to the widows for life.

The defendant pleaded that he and his co-executors had held and dealt with the estate in accordance with the testator's will, and contended (inter alia) that the plaintiff's claim was barred by limitation.

Held, that the devise to dharam was too general and indefinite for the Court to enforce, and was, therefore, void.

Held, also, that under art. 141 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877) the plaintiff's claim to the immovable properties left by the testator was not barred by limitation.

APPEAL from Parsons, J.

The appellant was the sole surviving executor of one Callianji Sewji, who died on the 6th January, 1869. The respondent (plaintiff) was the nephew (brother's son) and heir of the said Callianji Sewji, and he brought this suit to have his rights in and to the estate of Callianji Sewji ascertained and declared.

The plaint set forth that Callianji Sewji died in January, 1869, without issue. He, however, left two widows, viz., Cooverbai and Nenavahoo, who became entitled to a widow's estate in the immovable estate not validly disposed of by him.

[647] The only male relations of Callianji Sewji living at his death were his brother Govindji Sewji (the plaintiff's father), his half-brother (Dossa Sewji) and a nephew (Cursondas Purshotamdas). All these, however, were dead at the date of this suit.

At the time of his death, Callianji Sewji was possessed of a large amount of property, both moveable and immovable, in Bombay and

* Suit No. 554 of 1889; Appeal No. 931.
elsewhere. The day before his death (5th January, 1869) he made his will appointing three executors and trustees, viz., Vundavandas Purhotandas (the defendant), Deva Hurtas and Tulsidas Ichharam. The two latter were dead at the date of this suit.

By his will he left one of his immovable properties to his heirs on payment of Rs. 1,00,000 stated to be charged on it. He then left two other immovable properties to his wife Nenavahoo for her life and two to his wife Cooverbai for her life, and the residue of his estate he left to his three trustees, directing them to apply the same in charity. The properties left to his wives were to revert on their death to the charity fund held by the said trustees. The following are the material portions of the will:

"One cart (or garden) near the Gowalia Tank purchased from Sha Kalliaodas Mohandas. The said cart stands in my own name; but Rs. 1,00,000 are due to Messrs. Cameron and Ryan against the said cart. My heirs are duly to take the same, on paying the said money.

"Further, whatever ornaments, &c., there are in my house, in the possession of my two wives, have been apportioned to them respectively. Each is to take care of and retain her own.

"According to these particulars are the properties mentioned above. The particulars of the properties which have been given by me to my two wives out of the said property (are as follows):

"One cart at Mihim, called the Jaifal Wadi, has been given to my old wife named Nenavahoo. The income that may be derived therefrom is to be enjoyed (by her) during her natural life, and she is to make charities out of the said income, but it cannot be sold.

"Further, there is the abovementioned one house in Lodbargali (Ironsmith Lane) in the rear of (the house of) Miya Nakhoda Raiq*ay. Whatever rent may be derived from the said house is all to be enjoyed by my wife named Nenavahoo and to be made dharam (religious or charitable gifts) of. No one (else shall) have any right thereto, but the said house cannot be sold to any one.

"Further, my two estates have been given to my new wife named Cooverbai for enjoying the rent (thereof). The particulars thereof are as follows:

[648] "Whatever rent may be derived from one garden called the Setoor Bag, and one house in Mamonwada (known as that of Jevat Jugmall, making together two estates, is all freely to be enjoyed (by her) during her natural life, as long as (she) remains (faithful) to my name, and is to be made dharam (religious or charitable gifts) of. No one is to raise any dispute or objection whatever thereto, but these estates cannot be sold.

"According to these particulars, out of the above-mentioned estates, belonging to me, the above-mentioned estates, four in number, have been given to my wives, for enjoying the rent (thereof) and for making dharam dhan (charitable or religious gifts, &c., of the same), and whatever other estates, belonging to me, remain and whatever profit appertaining to my share may remain after deducting the debts, &c., in my books, belong wholly to me personally. I have during my lifetime appointed three trustees over the same. The particulars of their names are mentioned below:- Bhai Vundavandas Purhotandas; Bhai Deva Hurtas; my mehta, Tulsidas Ichharam.
"According to these particulars I have appointed 'trustees.' The said 'trustees' are to act in such manner as they think proper for preserving my name, so that my money might always be used for some good dhamam (religious or charitable purposes) after my death and by which good might be done to me. No one shall have any right (or) claim whatsoever thereto. Further, the whole of the said property has been acquired by my own exertions. No one (else) has any right (or) claim whatsoever thereto; and the particulars of what is to be paid out of my dhamam (religious or charitable) ‘fund’ to my step-mother, and step-brother Dossa, and my whole-brother Govindji, for (their) expenses, as stated below, (are as follows:—) To my whole-brother Govindji, for each month, Rs. 30, namely thirty. To my step-mother, Bai Maneck, for each month, Rs. 30, namely twenty. To my step-brother Dossa, for each month, Rs. 25, namely twenty-five. According to these particulars (and agreeably to what is written above) (the same) are to be paid every month.

"Further it is as follows:—As to the 'estates' which have been given by me to my wives they are to enjoy the rents of the said 'estates' during their natural lives, and on the death of my wives, the said 'estates' are to revert to my dhamam (religious or charitable fund), and whatever income may be (derivable) from the said 'estates' to be expended for my dhamam (religious or charitable purposes). No one shall have any right (or) claim thereto. My 'trustees' shall have 'power' over the whole of it in every respect. They are to act after my death in such a manner as to give (me) a good name. No one has any right (or) claim thereto. In this manner, I have in my lifetime made the whole of (this) 'will' in my sound understanding, agreeably to which 'will' my 'trustees' are to do all good works of a permanent nature. No one is to question my 'trustees' in any way respecting the same. Samvat 1925, Poush Vad the 8th, Tuesday (5th January, 1869)."

The testator's widow Cooverbai died in 1871. The other widow Nenavahoo survived till 1888 and died in November of that year, leaving a will.

[849] The plaintiff stated that after the death of the testator the said three trustees took possession of the whole of the property, and he complained that they had wasted and misappropriated a large portion of it. He contended that the bequests for dhamam in the will were void and inoperative, and that the property bequeathed for that purpose was undisposed of. He claimed to be entitled to the whole of the testator's immoveable property including that which had been devised to the widows for life. The following paragraphs of the plaint set forth his claim:

"8. The plaintiff submits that the said bequests in the said will contained for dhamam are void and inoperative and that the whole of the testator's property, save and except the said cart near Gowsia Tank, the said four immoveable properties devised to his said widows, and the said monthly allowances bequeathed by him to his whole-brother, the plaintiff's father, to his step-mother Bai Maneck, and to his step-brother Dossa Sewji, was undisposed of by the said will. The plaintiff claims to be entitled to the whole of the immoveable property of the testator, including the said four properties devised to his said widows, and also to such portions of the moveable property as may not have been disposed of by the said Nenavahoo in her lifetime."

"12. The plaintiff says that the defendant Vundravandas Pursbhatamdas and his co-executors and after their death the said defendant has continued misappropriating, mismanaging and wasting the estate, moveable and immovable, of the said Callianji Sewji, and alleges he is entitled to expend the said estate upon dharam as directed by the said will.

"13. The plaintiff says that Nenavahoo died intestate on or about the 19th day of November, 1888, and since her death the defendant Vundravandas Pursbotamdas has removed Rs. 1,500 in cash and articles which now belong to the plaintiff out of the house in which she lived without making any inventory thereof, and he is wasting and expending the same."

He prayed that his rights to the estate should be declared; that the bequests for dharam might be declared void; that accounts might be taken of the estate which had come to the hands of the trustees, &c., &c.

The defendant Vundravandas filed a written statement in which he pleaded that the plaintiff’s claim was barred by limitation. He denied that the estate had been wasted. He alleged that it had been always held and dealt with by him and his co-executors in accordance with and under the provisions of the will of Callianji Sewji. As to the allegation in para. 13 of the plaint, he stated that he had taken possession of the property therein mentioned as Nenavahoo’s executor. As to the bequests for dharam contained in Callianji Sewji’s will, the following paragraph of the written statement states his contention:—

"6. The defendant submits that the bequest to dharam in the said will contained is not void and inoperative as contended in the 8th paragraph of the plaint, and that the claims set up by the plaintiff in the said paragraph are unsustainable. The defendant further says that the various charities established by the defendant and his co-executors in carrying out the said bequest were so established with the full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff and his deceased father Govindji Sewji, and also of the testator’s widow the said Nenavahoo (the other widow Cooverbai being then dead). The defendant submits that the plaintiff is now estopped from in any way disputing the right of the defendant to establish the said charities, under the provisions of the testator’s will."

The Advocate General of Bombay was made a defendant to the suit.

At the hearing the following issues were raised:—

1. Whether the suit, or any part thereof, is barred by limitation?
2. Whether the defendant No. 1 is guilty of any of the charges of fraud and mismanagement set forth in paragraph 7 of the plaint?
3. Whether the bequests to dharam in the will of the testator are void and inoperative?
4. Whether the plaintiff by his conduct or otherwise is not now estopped from objecting to the application of the testator’s estate as in the will directed?
5. Whether the defendant has continued to misappropriate, mismanage and waste the estate of the testator as in paragraph 12 of the plaint alleged?
6. Whether Nenavahoo died intestate?
7. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to any and what portion of the estate of the said Nenavahoo?

Counsel for plaintiff in place of the issues 6 and 7 asked for the following issue:—

8. What portion of the moveable estate in the hands of Cooverbai and Nenavahoo has been validly disposed of by them or either of them?
It was agreed that the issues as to limitation and as to the validity of the bequests to dharam (issues 1 and 3) should be decided first, and after argument the Court (Parsons, J.) held that the suit was not barred, and that the said bequests were void. The following was his judgment:

PARSONS, J.—This was a suit which was brought on the 21st December, 1888, by the plaintiff, who claims to be entitled as the heir of his uncle Callianji to the whole of his immoveable property and to such portions of his moveable property as may not have been disposed of by his widow Nenavahoo.

Callianji, a separated Hindu, died childless in 1869, leaving two widows Cooverbai and Nenavahoo. Cooverbai died in 1871. Nenavahoo died in 1888.

On her death the plaintiff (who is the son of a brother of Callianji who died in 1884) became entitled to succeed as the heir of Callianji. Callianji made a will in which after bequests of certain specific legacies he gives two properties to each of his widows for them to enjoy the income or rents thereof for their lives. The rest of his estate and these four properties after the death of the widows he makes "dharam" and he directs his executors to expend the income for "dharam," which he explains to be "doing all good works of a permanent nature" and "acting in such a manner as to give me a good name."

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that this bequest to "dharam" is void, and on behalf of the defendants (the executor as representing the estate and the Advocate General the charity) (1) that the bequest is good and (2) that even if bad the suit is time-barred.

Preliminary issues have been raised on these two points and have now to be decided.

On the authorities cited, and on the plain construction of the terms of the will, I have no hesitation in holding that the provisions constituting the "dharam" and directing the executors to expend the income of the estate for the dharam are void.

This being so there would be an intestacy as to the whole of the estate so attempted to be dealt with, and the effect of this would be that the widows of Callianji would take not the limited estate devised to them by the will, but what is in law defined to be a widow's estate in his property. I say the effect would be, for no compulsion could be exercised to force them to take it, and it is not necessary that they should actually claim and take their widows' estate. They might out of deference to the wishes of their husband, or of their own choice, have preferred that the executors should devote the income of the estate to some charitable object whereby their husband's name would be kept in honour.

This, however, would not change the legal aspect of the effect of the void bequest, or alter the nature of the estate that on the death of Callianji would devolve on his widows. There would still be an intestacy, and no acquiescence or consent of the widows and no act of the executors could change that or validate the invalid bequest so as to affect persons not claiming through or under them.

Such, then, being my decision on the first point, it has next to be seen whether the plaintiff's suit is within time.

Numerous cases have been cited by the learned counsel for the defendants in support of their contention that the suit is time-barred. It appears, however, on an examination of them that the majority are in no way relevant to the present case. They refer either to a different law or to a different state of facts. If a period of possession... which would be adverse to and would bar the right of the widow, would be adverse to and would bar the right of the person entitled to possession on her death, then no doubt some of the cases are in point. This, however, is not the present law. It is settled that no alienation by the widow can affect her husband's heir either by giving the alienation a better title than the widow herself has or by making his possession during the lifetime of the widow adverse to the heir.

The precise article of the Limitation Act of 1877 applicable to the present case is, without doubt, No. 141 as contended for by defendants' counsel and not No. 140 as the plaintiff's counsel has urged. That article gives a Hindu entitled to the possession of immovable property on the death of a Hindu female, a period of twelve years within which to bring his suit for possession of that immovable property and provides that that period begins to run from the time when the female dies.

In the present case that time is the death of Nenavahoo, which took place in 1888, less than a year before the suit was filed. As long as either Cooverbai or Nenavahoo was alive, the plaintiff [653] would have no right of action. He could not sue for possession, and he would have no right whatever to interfere in the management or disposition of the income of the property. Even if it be assumed that the executors of Callianji expended that income on charity contrary to the wishes of the widows, still the plaintiff could have taken no possible objection thereto. Even if they had alienated some of the corpus of the estate, I know of no provision of law which would have compelled him to sue to set aside that alienation or otherwise hold it binding on him. His title and his right to possession would not come into being until the death of the last surviving widow, and then and then only could he legally sue for the property. Of course, if the testator had disposed of his property so that on the death of his widow there would be no estate left to his heir, then the case would be different; but the right of the heir would in that case be taken away not by any adverse possession, not by any act of the executor, not by any conduct of the widow, for none of these things could affect him, but by the act of the owner of the paramount estate, who alone could divest him of the estate which is conferred upon (him) by the law of inheritance. In the present case had the bequest of the testator of his estate in "dharam" been a valid bequest there is no question but that the plaintiff's suit must have failed. When, however, it is found that the bequest was not a valid bequest, but that there was an intestacy, the effect of which was to create an estate to which on the death of the last surviving widow the heir of the testator, whoever he might be at that time, would be entitled, then during the lives of the widows there can be no such thing as possession adverse to that heir. The law allows the heir twelve years from the death of the widow within which to bring his suit for possession, and it is not in the power either of the widow or of the executor or of any person claiming either through or against them to abbreviate that time or substitute another period. I find, therefore, that no part of the suit is barred by limitation, and that the bequests to dharam in the will of the testator contained are void and inoperative.

Subsequently the Court found issues 2, 4, 5, and 6 in the negative and on the issues 7 and 8 held that the plaintiff was entitled to the whole undisposed of [634] estate of Nenavahoo, and that Nenavahoo had validly disposed of her stridhan only.

The Court passed a decree for the plaintiff for possession of the properties mentioned in the will and ordered an account of the moveable estate left by the testator from the 19th November, 1888 (i.e., the death.
of Nenavahoo) up to the date of the decree, and also an account of the moveable property left by Cooverbai and Nenavahoo respectively at the time of their death, distinguishing between the stridhan of Nenavahoo and the other property.

The defendant Vundravandas appealed, contending (1) that the bequest for dharam was valid; (2) that the plaintiff’s claim was barred by limitation; (3) that the lower Court should have held that the estate conferred on Callianji’s widows was a life estate in the usual meaning of that term with power to dispose by will of all savings of income; (4) that no account should be ordered of the moveable property left by Nenavahoo, and that such property was validly disposed of by her will; (5) that the plaintiff was not entitled to the moveable property of the testator which never came to the possession of his widows.

Anderson and Vicaji (with Lang, Advocate General) for the appellants (defendants).—The gift to dharam should be upheld. The early cases on the point, viz., Advocate General v. Damaothar (1) and Gangbai v. Thavar Mull (2) are wrong and should no longer be followed. ‘Dharam’ or ‘dharamdas’ in a Hindu will has the same meaning as the word ‘charity’ in an English will: see Wilson’s Glossary, p. 137. The Courts in India are now more competent to say what objects a Hindu testator contemplates when he leaves money to dharam. He contemplates, as shown by the cases, dharamshala, sadaravatas, schools, hospitals, &c., which are all legal. See West and Bühler (3rd Ed.), p. 23; Mandlik’s Hindu Law, p. 333; Jamnabai v. Khimji (3). Purposes formerly held objectionable would now be held legal, e.g., feasting Brahmins or a caste—Dwarkanath Byssack v. Buroda Parsa (4); Lakshmishankar v. Purii (5).

[655] In Gangbai v. Thavar Mull (2) a devise to ‘charity’ in a will written in the English language was held good, although the word used by testator was evidently ‘dharam’. The tendency of legal decisions in India as well as in England has been to widen the definition of ‘charity.’ Any charity is now held good which is not purely private in its object and temporary in its application—Tudor on Charitable Trusts, Chap. I. What would formerly have been bad as superstitious uses are now good. If the public or any section of the public are intended to derive or do derive any advantage from the gift it is a good gift. In this will the trustees are directed to do all “good works of a permanent nature.” If the word ‘dharam’ is still to be held vague, these words limit and define its meaning. Permanency makes a merely benevolent gift a good charity—Tudor on Charitable Trusts, pp. 4 and 5.

But in any case we contend that the plaintiff’s claim except as to the two properties left to Nenavahoo for life and the dwelling-house in Barbhaya Street which was also in her possession until her death in 1888 is barred by limitation. All the other immovable properties have been held by the executors under the will as trustee for the charities for more than twelve years before Nenavahoo’s death. If the devise to dharam is void, Nenavahoo was entitled to these properties and not the trustees. Their possession, therefore, was adverse to her—Church v. Martin (6). She as a Hindu widow fully represented the estate. Therefore we contend if she was barred, all who claim after her are also barred.

The question depends on the construction of art. 141 of the Limitation (Act XV of 1877). Does that article refer to a suit for such rights of possession as the widow has at the time of her death, or does it give her successor a right independent of her? We contend the former is the true construction. See Saroda Soondury Dossee v. Doyamoyee (1). It was the view at first taken by all the Courts in India—Adi Deo Narain v.

Dukharan (2), Sambasiva v. Ragava (3), K.Subramaniam v. T. Subramaniam (4) [656] Chhoganram v. Bai Motugaviri (5). The Full Bench case of Srin-ath Kur v. Prosonno Kumar (6) has been regarded as a decision on art. 141 giving a different construction of art. 141, but from the judgment itself it appears doubtful whether it was so intended. But as such it has been followed. See Kokilmoni v. Manick Chandra (7); Ram Kali v. Kedar Nath (8); Moro v. Balaji (9). The decision in Srinath v. Prosonno (6) proceeded on the assumption that the Limitation Act (IX of 1871) in which the article in question appeared as art. 142 was intended to completely alter the law on the point and to give the heir twelve full years in which to sue from the date at which the estate fell into his possession, without regard to any thing that might have occurred in the widow’s lifetime depriving her of her right. This assumption the Privy Council has declared to be unfounded. See Hari Nath v. Mothura Mohun (10). This case has re-established the law as laid down in Saroda Soondury
v. Doyamoyee (1) and the earlier cases. Although on the facts it is a decision not in point here, the reasoning of the judgment directly applies.
Their Lordships say expressely that “no change in the then existing law” was intended to be made or was made when art. 142 of Act IX of 1871 was passed in the direction of bestowing rights of suit not then existing or enlarging such as did exist. Consequently the old law as established under Act VIII of 1859 is on this point still the law. What that law was is clearly laid down in Nobin Chunder v. Guru Persad (11) considered and approved by the Privy Council in Anritola’s case (12) and in the judgment in Hari Nath’s case (10); and these cases are approved as statements of the present law notwithstanding the different wording of the article in the Acts of 1871 and 1877. See also Lachhan v. Manoram Ram (13). It is true that in Moro v. Balaji (9) this Court took a different view of Hari Nath’s case; but we submit [657] that on a re-examination of the judgment that view would be modified. The decision of Parsons, J., in the present case was based on Srinath Kurar v. Prosonno (6) which has been declared by the Privy Council to be wrong; and the decree in this case ought, therefore, to be reversed.

Where a widow has allowed herself to be barred by lapse of time, her title to possession has become extinguished” (s. 28 of the Act). What, then, has become of it? To whom has it gone? It has passed away from her to the person who previously had only the possession and not the title,—in this case the trustee of the charity, the defendant. See per Lord St. Leonards in Trustees of Dundee v. Dougall (14) and per Lord Cairns in Dawkins v. Lord Penrhyn (15). Section 28 operates as a parliamentary conveyance of the title, as said by Parke, B., in Doe dem Jukes v. Sumner (16). Down to that time he had the possession and the title, i.e., the widow’s title. The whole question, then, is what was the widow’s title? The law was and is that a Hindu widow represents the whole estate;

(4) 4 M. 124.  (5) 14 B. 619.  (6) 9 C. 934.

consequently if she is barred from recovering, either by a decree against her (Shivanga case (1) or by lapse of time Nobin Chunder's case (2), all claimants to the same estate, whether claiming through or in succession to her, are equally barred. This is a matter of substantive law; not a mere question of procedure. If it was intended to alter the law, there would be a provision in the body of the Act and not a mere article contained in the schedule to the Act.

No presumption of an intention to alter the law is to be gathered from a mere change of phraseology in such Acts—Murray v. East Indian Company (3).

The heir is not without remedy. He can bring a declaratory suit to have his rights declared if he sees he is being prejudiced by the neglect of the female entitled to the possession. And if he were without remedy, his case would be no barther than that of others, who are liable to be prejudiced by the laches of their [658] predecessors; e.g., a son whose father has lost the estate by neglecting to sue in time; or issue-in-tail under the English statutes of limitation, where the tenant-in-tail has been guilty of similar neglect. Unless a Hindu widow is no more than a tenant for life, the Court must hold the heir bound: see Hari Nath's case (4), Nobin Chunder v. Guru Nath (2), and Amritlal Bose v. Rajoneekant Mitter (5).

The lower Court is wrong in ordering an account of the moveable property of either of the widows; and also in declaring the plaintiff to be entitled to any moveable property of the testator undisposed of at the death of Nenavahoo, the survivor. Part of the moveable property of the testator was never reduced into possession by either widow, and part of it was enjoyed by Cooverbai and on her death in 1871 taken possession of by the trustees for the charity; all claim to these parts of the moveable property is barred by limitation. And as to any moveable property of Nenavahoo in her possession up to her death, such property must have been either her own stridhan or her husband's ornaments which are given absolutely by the will; or the savings of the rents derived by her from the two properties given her for her life by the will. These last were, we contend, her own absolutely. They are given to her in words which impose no restriction whatever; she was to "freely enjoy" "consume" is a closer translation) and make any charitable donations she thought proper out of the same without hindrance from any one. This amounts to an absolute gift—Mayne's Hindu Law, s. 584; Bhagbutti v. Chowdry Bholanath (6). No account should be ordered of the moveable property.

Inverarity (with him Branson and Russell) contra.—A bequest to dharam has been held to be void in this Presidency for the last forty years; and it is too late now to open the question. In this will, moreover, the bequest is couched in a particularly objectionable form. So far from the words in the will relied on [659] being qualifying words, they are in reality enlarging words. "All good works of a permanent nature" is as vague and general an expression as it is possible to use. These words would include mere philanthropy as distinguished from charity. So in Kendall v. Granger (7) a bequest for objects of "general utility" was held bad as not necessarily charitable. So a bequest for "charitable or philanthropic" objects was held bad in In re Macduff (8) since confirmed in appeal.

Then as to limitation. We say that the possession of the trustees for the charity was not adverse to the widows at all. From the first the widows assented to all that they did. Probate was taken out with their consent; the money that was laid out was so laid out, as the defendant says in his written statement, "with the consent and advice of Nenavahoo" (Cooverbai being then dead). A temple erected on Nagdevi site by the trustees bears a tablet and an inscription that this was done "by the order of Nenavahoo." The defendant seeks to account for this by saying that Nenavahoo contributed some of the money, but it is clear, from the affidavit of himself made at an early stage in this case, that Nenavahoo was consulted in everything, and nothing was done without her consent. She was absolute mistress then, and could do what she liked with the income, and nothing that we could have done could affect her conduct. It would be very hard if, that being the case, the plaintiff were to lose his rights. The heir could not even bring a suit for a declaration, as the widows assented—Dhunbaijee v. Nowrojee Bomonjee (1) and Lyell v. Kennedy (2). In Churcher v. Martin an assenting trustee was also a beneficiary; but his assent was held to be in the former character only, so that it is not an authority against us. Further, under this will the trustees, as the first object—the charity—failed, became express trustees for the widows first, then for us; and no time bars us (s. 10, Limitation Act, XV of 1877). Once find an express trust created, and if necessary the Court will supply the beneficiary if it can see who was intended—Patrick v. Simpson (3).

[660] If I am wrong in these two contentions still the plaintiff cannot be held to be barred. Article 141 of Act XV of 1877 was intended to meet this very case and the hardship entailed on the reversioners by the previous law on the subject. The Full Bench decision of Srinath Kur v. Prosunna (4) has been accepted as correctly stating the law by most of the Courts of this country: see Ram Kali v. Kedar Nath (5); Mukta v. Dada (6); Azam Bhuyan v. Faisuddin (7); Sambasiva v. Ragava (8); Shamlall v. Amarendra (9). The latter case is a decision in point and is more recent than the Privy Council case of Hari Nath v. Mathura Mohun (10) relied on by the other side. The facts in Lachhan Kumwar's case (11) show that it was probably decided under the Act of 1859 and not under the Act of 1871 at all. In any case it cannot be treated as a decision on the point now in question: the widow entitled was herself alive. Hari Nath's case (7) does not touch the present point at all: the cases above cited were not even referred to. It would be absurd to hold that if, when the widow dies, possession adverse to her has been held for 11 years and 364 days, no time has run against the heir entitled on her death, and yet if her death occurs a day or two later the heir is completely barred. No argument is to be drawn from s. 28 of the Limitation Act; that section merely says the widow's right is extinguished: it does not touch our rights. They are specifically preserved by art. 141.

The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to all the immoveable properties of the testator in the defendant's hands. There must be an account as to what these are; we never admitted, nor was it proved, that they were merely those that are enumerated in the schedule to the decree. On the contrary it is clear that there were others. And as to the rents and profits of the immovable properties, the account ordered is insufficient. We admit that the widow had the power to spend them, if she thought fit, but so far as they were not actually expended on the charities they belong to us. There should be an account to ascertain how these stand.

[661] Anderson in reply.—The will does not leave the property to dharam and to good works of a permanent nature. The two are not contrasted. The will has to be read as a whole; so read, it means "I leave it to be expended on such works of dharam as are good or approved and of a permanent nature." Consequently the reasoning of the two cases (Kendall v. Granger (1) and In re Macduff (2)) cited on the other side does not apply.

The trustees’ possession was undoubtedly adverse to the widows throughout. Whether a possession is adverse or not, depends on the nature of the claim made by the person in possession, not upon the assent or dissent of the rightful owner. If the possession is held by a title independent of, and not derived from, the rightful owner it is adverse whether the rightful owner acquiesces or not. So much so that the possession of a grantee under a void grant is adverse to the grantor, though in that case there is much more than mere acquiescence—Angell on Limitations, s. 404; Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts (3); Churcher v. Martin (4). The test is, can the real owner sue for immediate possession; if he can, he must, or time runs against him. In this case it is clear, and is admitted throughout, that the defendant claimed and took possession under and by virtue of the authority derived from the testator,—that is, as trustee for the charities. This was a title fatal to the claim of all persons claiming by inheritance to the testator. There was an express trust, it is true, contained in the most explicit terms in the will, but not in plaintiff’s favour, but in favour of the charities. Patrick v. Simpson, therefore, is not applicable. This suit is brought to destroy that express trust and claim the properties covered by it in defendant’s hands as the executor of the will. Under these circumstances, whatever the position of the defendant is towards the plaintiff, he is certainly not an express trustee for him. The position is exactly that of the parties in Churcher v. Martin (4) followed in Cowasji N. Pochkhanawalla v. Rustomji D. Sethna (5). An executor is not an express trustee even for a legatee (Evans v. Moore (6)) much less for one whose claim is founded on the total [662] destruction of the will. If the facts in Dhunbajee’s case were as stated, that case was wrongly decided. The argument on the other side as to the meaning of art. 141 of the Limitation Act might have been of some use before the decision in Hari Nath’s case (7); but it is of no avail now since that decision. The learned counsel for the plaintiff has failed to distinguish Hari Nath’s case (7). There is nothing absurd in the reading of the Act we contend for. Time runs against the reversionary heir from the same date as under the previous Acts: the only change is that by the new provision the heir, if still entitled to possession at the widow’s death, has given him an extension of the period in which he may sue to recover it. There is no breach of principle in this; and in many cases it would remove what might seem to be a hardship.

The Court below took the right view of the rents and profits of the immovable properties accrued due antecedently to Nanavahoo’s death. She allowed those to go to the trustee for the charities, as if they were hers to spend; that alone is equivalent to her having expended them. There was nothing of the nature of accumulation, whether for herself or her husband’s estate.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an appeal by Vundavandas Pursbotumdas, surviving executor of Callianji Sewji, against the decree of the Division Court, which has declared that the devise in dharam contained in the will of the testator of almost the whole of his property, is void, and that the plaintiff, as the nearest heir of the testator upon the death of his surviving widow Nanavahoo, is entitled to his estate. The suit was in form a suit for the administration of the estate of the testator.

The facts are, in effect, undisputed. Callianji Sewji died on the 6th January, 1869, leaving a will bearing date the 5th of that month, whereby he appointed the appellant and one Deva Hurdas and one Tulsidas Ichharam (both of whom have since died) trustees of the whole of his property and executors according to the tenor of his will. The plaintiff states, and the fact is not disputed, that the executors, upon his death, took possession of the whole of the moveable and immovable property of the testator, consisting of cash, outstanding, ornaments, houses, lands, &c. at Bombay and elsewhere. At this time the heirs of the testator [663] were his two widows Cooverbai and Nanavahoo, while his nearest blood relation was his full brother Govindji Sewji, since deceased, the father of the present plaintiff. The executors proved the will and, on the 2nd March, 1869, with the consent of the two widows, administration of the testator’s estate was granted to them. We agree with the argument of counsel for the appellant, that notwithstanding such consent, and although, in giving effect to the directions of the testator as to dharam, the executors may have acted “with the consent and advice of the widow Nanavahoo,” (Cooverbai died soon after the testator), and with the consent and active concurrence of Govindji (the plaintiff’s father), and with the advice of Nanavahoo, and the knowledge of the plaintiff, the possession of the executors, in so far as they were not by the terms of the will made trustees for the widows and reversionary heirs of the testator, was adverse to the widows and heirs. The executors throughout and even in Exs. D and F professed to be acting under their title as executors and in accordance with the terms of the will, and never professed to deal with the property under a title derived from the widows or heirs. They acted not as agents or trustees for the widows and heirs, but as independent owners, deriving their title from the will and from that alone. They entered into possession under the will, and there is nothing, we think, in the evidence to show that the character of their possession was subsequently altered. On the contrary the execution of the trust deeds shows that, at their dates, at all events, they were dealing with the assets of their testator as his executors, and in no other capacity. The presumption that they continued to act in that character to the end, is not, we think, in any way displaced. This possession under a written instrument, the will, coupled with the intention to carry out its terms by reason of the title which it conferred, whether the persons entitled to take, in the absence of such an instrument, consented or did not consent to that possession, constituted, in our opinion, a possession adverse to the heirs.
It will here be convenient to deal with the argument that the executors by reason of the devise in dharan being incapable of enforcement, became express trustees of the whole estate, not validly disposed of by the will, for the heirs of the testator. The argument is based on the decision in Patrick v. Simpson (1). It must, we think, be conceded that where a Hindu will makes the executors trustees of the whole estate of the testator, and the bequests in the will are not sufficient to exhaust that estate, the executors become express trustees of the undisposed of residue for the next of kin of the testator. That has been so decided by this Court in Lallubhai v. Maancooverbai (2), where the case of Salter v. Cavanagh (3) was followed, as it was also followed by the Queen's Bench Division in England in Patrick v. Simpson (1). But here the will purports to deal with the whole estate and confers it upon the trustees for certain purposes. Assuming that these purposes are too vague for the Court to enforce, the bequest would still create a trust binding upon the conscience of the trustees. That appears to us to be the express trust upon which the trustees hold the estate, which excludes and is inconsistent with a trust inferred or implied from the terms of the instrument for the next of kin. It is upon the basis of the trust in favour of the next of kin being inferred from the instrument itself that the decision in the case of Salter v. Cavanagh (3) appears to us to be founded. The principle ceases to apply when the instrument impliedly excludes the idea of a trust in favour of the next of kin. Though the exact position of the defendant in this case differs from the position of the defendants in Churcher v. Martin (4), yet the following passage from the judgment of Kekewich, J., in that case shows that his decision would have been the same had the position of the defendant there been identical with that of the defendant here:—"The general proposition" (that the possession of the trustees is the possession of their cestui que trust) "is true enough and might be supported by other authorities. But what is its application to the present case (I will assume that those in possession were trustees in the proper and full sense of the term)? How can the possession of trustees enure to the benefit of him whose title was intended to be defeated by the deed which created the trust? How can the grantor be their cestui que trust. Because it is urged that there is an express trust in his favour—an express trust necessarily resulting from the failure of those declared. It would suffice to reply that such a resulting trust is implied by law, and that whatever else it may be it is not an express trust; but as Salter v. Cavanagh was referred to, I may point out that the trust there spoken of as express was one inferred from the deed...and not as here a trust against the deed and due only to the fact that the deed is void. This seems to have been appreciated by the learned author of the text book which was mentioned." If it is necessary for us, therefore, to decide this question, we think that it must be held that the trustees under the will in question were not express trustees for the heirs of the testator except in so far as the terms of the will constituted them such trustees. We have considered this question as though the expression "express trust" had been used in our statute (Act XV of 1877, s. 10), but for this purpose we think that "vested in trust for a specific purpose," may be treated as a more expanded mode of expressing the same idea. Our decision on this point is supported by the case of Kherodemoney v. Doorgamoney (1) which cannot, we think, be substantially distinguished from it.

We pass on to consider the question, the answer to which we have above assumed, whether the gift in dharam contained in the will of Callianji Sewji is capable of enforcement in this Court, and upon it we think that we are concluded by authority. In a long series of decisions, beginning with the Advocate General v. Damothar (2) followed by Pranivandus Tulisidas v. Deskuwarbai (3) and a host of subsequent reported and unreported cases, it has been laid down that a devise in dharam is void for vagueness and uncertainty, and this, we think, must be regarded as the established law of this Court until that law shall have been differently expounded by a superior tribunal. It is doubtless the case that this interpretation of the law defeats, in innumerable instances, the cherished wishes of Hindu testators. Few Hindu wills, that we have met with, are without a devise of this nature, though some testators define with precision the objects of their dharam, and it may well be that the Court would have acted with more regard to native feeling and ideas if, instead of considering the broad signification that the word dharam indisputably bears, which appears to be as wide as the words philanthrophy, or piety, or charity, in its untechnical sense, they had considered the objects which the Hindu Shastris and Hindu testators would consider to be embraced within the term and construed it in reference to the Hindu sacred law relating to dharam. These objects, we think, might be exhaustively enumerated under a few heads which would even now, with advancing ideas, not be wider than the objects which are deemed to be charitable by the Courts in England, and would not embrace such objects as are suggested in the argument in Macduff v. Macduff (4). In a native Court untrammelled by English precedent or decisions we can hardly doubt but that a devise in dharam would be upheld and applied. The question is, however, we consider not open to us. We have only made these remarks as indicative of what our judgment might have been, we do not say would have been, had the case not been concluded by authority.

It is contended for the appellants that, in the will now under consideration, the expression dharam is qualified and cut down by the context, and that the bequest ceases for this reason in this case to be too vague for the Court to enforce. We do not think that the argument is well founded. It would be impossible for us, we think, to distinguish the devise in this case from those which have from time to time been held to be unenforceable in our Courts. The expression dharmada is confined to the rents of the houses given to the widows, and does not assist in ascertaining the meaning of the expression dharam, to which the residue of the testator’s property is to be devoted. The passages in which the residue is dealt with are as follows: — "The said trustees are to act in such manner as they think proper for preserving my name, so that my money might always be used for some good, after my death and by which good might be done to me" or (as it may be otherwise translated) "by which my heavenly bliss may be secured." This it appears to us only expresses in words that which all orthodox Hindu testators regard as the object for making a gift in dharam—the advantage which it is supposed to insure to them in a future state and [667] does not narrow the broad significance of the word itself. The argument would apply generally to gifts in dharam of Hindu testators who would all desire that their gifts in dharam should be so applied as to secure their heavenly bliss. The language of the will which was deemed too vague for enforcement in Shichchunder Mullick v. Sreemutty Tripoorah (1) is, we think, impossible to be distinguished from that which we have quoted. Both convey precisely the same idea.

The other passage in the will is this:—"In this manner I have in my lifetime made the whole of (this) 'will' in my sound understanding, agreeably to which my trustees are to do all good works of a permanent nature." On this it is argued that the permanency of the dharam intended to be accomplished shows that the word is used in a limited sense; but there may be many benevolent and philanthropic works of a permanent character which are not charitable. The character of the work, and not its duration, is the test to be applied in order to ascertain whether it is charitable or not. The purposes mentioned in argument in Macduff v. Macduff (supra) as not being charitable are all of a more or less permanent character. The judgment in Kendall v. Granger (2) is a guide to us upon this part of the case. We agree with the Division Court that the devise in dharam is too general and too indefinite for the Court to enforce, and is, therefore, void.

We have next to consider whether the claim of the plaintiff is to any and what extent barred by the law of limitation. The testator, as we have stated, died in 1869. His widow Cooverbai died in 1871, leaving some moveable property. With this or its proceeds, the trustees of the testator purporting to be acting as the trustees of Cooverbai under her will, not duly attested, purchased an immovable property on the 21st December, 1872, which they or the survivors have since held in that capacity. Whether the moveable property left by Cooverbai included or did not include property which had come to her from the testator, we are clear that all claim of the plaintiff as to it is long since time-barred. She left no immovable property to which the provision of art. 141 of the schedule to the Limitation Act only applies. The decree in so far as it directs an account to be taken (668) in respect of the moveable property left by Cooverbai, distinguishing between such of it as was stridhan and such as was not stridhan, must be amended by striking out the whole direction. Cooverbai did not, it appears, enter into possession of the houses left to her for life. We need not further refer to her existence or to the clauses of the will which affected her.

The clauses in the will which were in favour of Nenavahoo were these:—"One catt at Mahim called the Jaifal Wadi has been given to my old wife Nenavahoo. The income which may be derived therefrom, is to be enjoyed (by her) during her natural life, and she is to make charities out of the said income, but it" (the catt, we think) "cannot be sold. Further, there is the above-mentioned one house in Lohargali in the rear of (the house of) Miya Nakhooda Bogay—whatever rent may be derived from the said house is all to be enjoyed by my wife named Nenavahoo and be made a dharam of. No one else shall have any right thereto, but the said house cannot be sold to any one." A later clause directs that these houses after the death of Nenavahoo are to revert to the general dharam fund. The widows lived in a house of the testator in Barbhaya Street. The properties mentioned above were made over to Nenavahoo. She died in 1888 and the defendant, who was her executor, took possession of the property on her death. This was all moveable and must have consisted of her own stridhan (if any), and of the rents and profits of the two properties bequeathed to her for life. The decree has directed an account in the case of Nenavahoo of her property similar to that directed in the case of the property of Cooverbai. This account we consider to be unnecessary. It appears to us that the testator has given full power of disposition to Nenavahoo over the income of the properties given to her for life. "No one else shall have any right thereto" expresses the wish of the testator that her power over this income shall be absolute. There is no reason for construing the words otherwise—Bhogbutti v. Chowdary Bholanath (1). By the same words the testator emphasises the gifts in favour of the executors. She is given full power of disposition over the income. The addition to Nenavahoo's estate which ensued by operation of law when the devise in [669] dharam failed, does not, we think, operate to deprive her of that power or to reduce the whole estate to the level of a Hindu widow's estate.

(1) Fulton, 108.
(2) 5 Beav. 300.

We are of opinion, therefore, that Nenavahoo had power to make the will which she has made, and that the decree must be varied by omitting the portion which directs an account of the moveable property left by Nenavahoo.

It remains to consider whether the claim of the plaintiff is barred by limitation as to the general bulk of the property left by the testator. It is admitted that as to the moveable property left by him and the profits of the immoveable properties which the executors expended during the lifetime of Nenavahoo and with her acquiescence, the plaintiff has no claim. As Nenavahoo could herself have dealt with this class of property, so she could authorize the executors of her husband to deal with it. The plaintiff's claim must, therefore, be confined to the immoveable properties left by the testator, and to such portion of his moveable property, and of the rents and profits of the immoveable property, as was unexpended at the death of Nenavahoo in 1888.

The article applicable to the immoveable property is art. 141 of the Limitation Act, which runs thus:—"Like suit" (for possession of immoveable property) "by a Hindu or Mahomedan entitled to the possession of immoveable property on the death of a Hindu or Mahomedan female." That article appears to us to be intended for limitation purposes to do away with the anomalies which surrounded a Hindu widow's estate and other estates analogous thereto, and to assimilate it for these purposes and for these purposes only to that of the estate of an ordinary tenant for life. The term "reversioner" being inapt to express the next heir of her husband succeeding upon a Hindu widow's demise the Legislature has, it appears to us, adopted the phrase "Hindu entitled to the possession of immoveable property upon the death of a Hindu female" to express the same idea. That it has designedly altered the law which formerly prevailed upon this subject as laid down in Nobin Chunder v. Guru Persad (2), and approved by the Privy Council in Amrittalal v. Rajonekant (3) [670] is obvious. It is clear that adverse possession against a Hindu widow for any period less than the full statutory period of twelve years is now valueless as against the person to succeed on her death. He has still the full statutory period of twelve years to sue after her death. No time has in that case run in favour of the adverse possession against the Hindu male heir. This was not so under the old law. Under it time was running in his favour during the widow's lifetime. Now it begins to run in his favour only on her death.

(1) 2 I.A. 256.  (2) B.L.R. (F. B. Rul.) 1008.  (3) 2 I.A. 118 (121).
A Hindu entitled to the possession of immovable property on the death of a Hindu female appears to us to mean a Hindu whose title to the possession of immovable property accrues upon the death of a Hindu female and does not except the case where during the lifetime of the widow the adverse possessor has been in possession for twelve years.
This view of the law has been accepted by all the Indian High Courts with the exception perhaps of Madras, but there the question was not discussed. We refer to the decisions in Srinath v. Prosunno (1); Kokilmoni
v. Manik Chandra (2); Sham Lall v. Amarendra (3); Dwarka Nath v.
Komolmoni (4); Ram Kali v. Kedar Nath (5); Mukta v. Dada (6); Moro v.
Balaji (7) without suggesting that the list is exhaustive. There are some decisions the other way, but those which we have mentioned are the decisions of the Courts at present binding. In the present case we have no concern with the old law prior to 1873, and we think that it may be fairly asked how and under what article of the present law the suit is barred.
If the plaintiff is not barred under art. 141, under what article is he barred?
The only article that can be suggested is art. 144, but under it the possession of the defendants never became adverse to the plaintiff even as that expression is interpreted by s. 3 of the Act.
Admitting that the Indian authorities are against him, Mr. Anderson contends that the judgment of the Privy Council in Hurrinath v. Mohunt Mothoor Mohun (8) is conclusive in his favour. We do not agree with that view. The judgment expresses no (671) opinion upon the effect of art.
141 save this, that it did not operate to prevent a decree which was binding upon Sampurna from being binding upon the plaintiff in that suit who became entitled to possession of the property on the death of Sampurna, even though the decree against Sampurna and in favour of the defendant was based upon the law of limitation. From the interlocutory dicta and remarks in the course of the argument for the appellant, it is clear that it was the extinguishment of the plaintiff's right by the decree against Sampurna, which appeared to their Lordships of the Privy Council to be the crus which prevented the plaintiff from recovering and that also is apparent in the judgment itself. If the Privy Council had intended to overrule the Calcutta Full Bench decision in Srinath v. Prosunno (1) the judgment would, we think, have made some allusion to that case. In our opinion their Lordships did not intend to deal with it. It is also by no means clear that Sampurna's title was not barred under the old law when the Act of 1871 came into force. The date of the death of Pearimoni is not given in the report. If this is not so, there is an anomaly in the law as pointed out by the Calcutta High Court in the case under consideration (see I.L.R., 21 Cal. at p. 12). In Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh (9), also referred to by Mr. Anderson, the present question did not arise.
We think, therefore, that we ought to follow the current of authorities to which we have referred, and to hold that the plaintiff's claim to the immovable properties of the testator Callianji in the possession of the defendant is not barred by limitation.

As to the movable property (if any) in the hands of the defendant at the death of Nenavahoo, and the rents and profits (if any) of the immovable properties in the defendant's hands at the same period, there has been but little argument. It appears to us that Nenavahoo's claim to both was barred at her death, and that there is no provision of the Limitation Act which gives the plaintiff a fresh starting point from that period.

This will considerably simplify the accounts which have to be taken and the form of the decree. As to the Nigroli fields, the defendant says that the executors gave them away in charity at [672] the time of the testator's death, but it is alleged by the respondent that there was no change of possession. The matter was not pressed in the Division Court. Our decree will leave it open to the plaintiff to show, if he can, that these fields are still in the defendant's possession.

The decree of the Division Bench will be varied by the substitution of the following decree after the recitals and the declaration as to the bequest to dharam being void:—And this Court doth further declare that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant the several immovable properties of Callianji Sewji which were in the defendant's possession at the death of Nenavahoo, and to the proceeds of such of them as have been since sold by the defendant, and to an account of the rents and profits of the said properties received by the defendant since the death of Nenavahoo, and doth refer it to the Commissioner to ascertain and report what properties (if any), in addition to those specified in the schedule to the decree, were in the possession of the defendant, and to take an account of the net rents and profits received in respect of the immovable properties of Callianji Sewji by the defendant since the death of Nonavahoo, and doth order and decree that the defendant do forthwith deliver to the plaintiff possession of the said several immovable properties specified in the schedule and pay to the plaintiff the sum of Rs. 18,719-14-9 which stands to the credit of the first defendant in the Bank of Bombay in his account No. 2. The defendants one and two to have their costs taxed as between attorney and client paid out of the property, the subject of this decree. Further directions and further costs reserved. Liberty to apply.

[673] TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice.

IN THE GOODS OF SIR ALBERT A.D. SASSOON (Deceased).

[29th March, 1897.]

Probate duty—Locality of asset.

S. died in England in October, 1896, and probate of his will was obtained in England on 1st December, 1896. He left a large amount of property and credits in Bombay, and he was a partner in the firm of David Sassoon and Company, which had its head office in London and had branches in Bombay and Calcutta.

Held, that no probate duty was payable on the value of the share of the deceased as a partner in the firm of David Sassoon and Company, or the properties of the firm situated in British India at his death.

Reference by the Taxing Officer of the Court under s. 5 of the Court Fees Act (VII of 1870) for the opinion of the Chief Justice.

The question arose on the application for letters of administration to the property and credits of Sir Albert A. D. Sassoon.

452
The application was made to the High Court of Bombay by Mrs. Flora Sassoon, the constituted attorney of the executor of the will of the deceased.

Her petition set forth that Sir Albert A.D. Sassoon died in England on the 24th October, 1896, leaving property and credits within the town and island of Bombay. He left a will and codicils, probate whereof was obtained in England on the 1st December, 1896. His executor (Sir Edward Sassoon) by a power of attorney executed by him on the 22nd December, 1896, appointed the petitioner his attorney to obtain administration of the deceased's estate in India.

The following clauses in the petition set forth the petitioner's case with reference to the payment of duty:

9. That the said deceased was at the time of his death and for many years previously a partner in the firm of Messrs. David Sassoon and Company of Bombay, Calcutta and London, in which firm he had at the time of his death a 35-100 share, but your petitioner submits that no Court-fee stamp is payable in respect of such share, nor in respect of any of the assets or credits of the said firm under the circumstances hereinafter set forth.

10. That the business of the said firm was started at Bombay many years ago by the late David Sassoon, in which business he afterwards associated with himself, under [674] the style of 'David Sassoon and Company,' his son the said Sir A. A. D. Sassoon, deceased, and other of the said testator's sons.

11. That subsequently branches of the said firm were opened at Calcutta and London respectively, and the said firm had also a branch firm at Hongkong and Shanghai in China which was carried on in the name of 'David Sassoon, Sons and Company,' in which latter firm there were partners who were not partners in the head firm of David Sassoon and Company.

12. That from the institution of the said firm of David Sassoon and Company at Bombay and until some time in the year 1894 Bombay remained the head-quarters of the said firm, where its principal books of accounts were kept and where the said accounts were made up annually, and the shares of its partners in the firm's profits and loss wheresoever earned were ascertained and debited or credited to their accounts as the case might require.

13. That for some time previous to the year 1894 all the partners in the said firm of David Sassoon and Company other than the late Mr. Solomon David Sassoon had ceased to reside in India and resided in England, and on the death of the said Mr. Solomon David Sassoon, which took place at Bombay on the 18th day of March, 1894, the head-quarters of the said firm of David Sassoon and Company became removed from Bombay to London, where they have ever since been and now are, and where in consequence the principal books of accounts of the said firm have since been and are now kept, and the said accounts have been and are now made up annually, the profit and loss of the business carried on at Bombay, Calcutta and in China and elsewhere being brought into the London books, and where the shares of the partners in the total transactions of the said firm have since been and are now ascertained and debited or credited to their accounts as the case may require.

14. That on the 1st day of January, 1895, your petitioner was admitted into and has since been a partner in the said firm of David Sassoon and Company, but all the other partners in the said firm have since been and now are in England which was at the date of the death of the said Sir A. A. D. Sassoon, deceased, and now is the head-quarter of the said firm.

15. That at the date of the death of the said Sir A. A. D. Sassoon, deceased, the said firm of David Sassoon and Company was possessed of moneys, properties and credits situated within British India, and the said testator was as a partner in the said firm interested in the said moneys, properties and credits, but was not entitled to any right therein other than a right to share in the net surplus assets of the said firm where-soever situated after providing for its liabilities wheresoever incurred and wheresoever due or payable, and it would not be possible to ascertain the value of the said testator's share and interest in the said moneys, properties and credits situated in British India only as distinguished from the value of his share and interest in the net surplus assets of the said firm wheresoever situated after providing for its total liabilities.

16. That the value of the share and interest of the said Sir A. A. D.
Sassoon, deceased, in the said firm of David Sassoon and Company (including its branches at Bombay and Calcutta and elsewhere and its branch firm of David Sassoon, Sons, and Company of China) has been treated as part of the estate of the said Sir A. A. D. [675] Sassoon, deceased, situated within England, and probate duty has been paid in England on that footing.

17. That the said Sir A. A. D. Sassoon, deceased, was at the time of his death domiciled in England and has been so held to have been domiciled by the Inland Revenue authorities in England, and legacy duty has been charged on his estate accordingly."

The Registrar of the Court was of opinion that duty was chargeable on the deceased's share of the firm's property situated in India, leaving the executor to obtain a refund on any debts appertaining to that share.

The Taxing Officer, therefore, under s. 5 of Act VII of 1870 referred the following question for the decision of the Chief Justice:

"Whether any probate duty is payable on the value of the share of the deceased as a partner in the firm of Messrs. David Sassoon and Company in the properties of the firm situate in British India at his death."

Lunacy, for the petitioner.

Lang (Advocate General), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—In this case the Taxing Officer has referred for my decision the following question:—"Whether any probate duty is payable on the value of the share of deceased as a partner in the firm of David Sassoon and Company in the properties of the firm situate in British India at his death" as being a question of general importance.
In connection with this and with reference to the valuation of the estate generally of the testator in British India, counsel for the petitioner has called in question the practice of the Registrar not to rest content with the statements of the petitioners for probate of letters of administration as to the value of the property of which administration is sought, but to require other evidence as to the value of the assets specified in the inventory of which the estate is made up. This practice was initiated by our Registrar with the approval of our late Chief Justice Sir Michael Westropp about the time when the Court Fees Act, 1870, came into operation, and may, therefore, be now considered to be an established practice, but no rule directly bearing upon the subject has been made by the Court.

[676] Mr. Inverarity first contends that the practice is inconsistent with the provisions of ss. 244, 246 and 243 of the Indian Succession Act, and that the only inquiry which the Court can hold is the inquiry authorized by s. 250 of that Act. He especially relies on the provisions of s. 243, which make the application for probate or letters of administration when made and verified in the manner required by the Act conclusive.

A consideration of these sections, however, satisfies me that they are enacted for the purpose of authorizing the grant of administration and rendering it conclusive even though there might be incorrect statements or omissions in the application upon which the grant is issued, and have no reference to the valuation of the estate for the purpose of levying a Court-fee upon it. They were enacted for jurisdictional and not for fiscal purposes. The examination and inquiry which may be instituted under s. 250 are also, I think, to be held for a similar purpose, though they are not in words confined to that object.

The ascertainment of the value of the estate for the purpose of fixing the stamp prescribed by s. 329 and in the schedule to Act X of 1865 does not appear to have been provided for by the Legislature in the Act itself. Section 329 and the schedule of Act X of 1865 were, however, repealed by s. 2 of the Court Fees Act, 1870, and it is to the latter Act that we must have recourse when considering what materials the Court or its officers must rely when it is called on to adjudicate as to the "Court-fee" payable on a grant of probate or letters of administration. Such express powers as are conferred on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue by Statute 44 Vict., c. 12, s. 87, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of an estate for probate purposes do not find a place in the Court Fees Act, 1870, but the duty of seeing that the proper Court fee is paid before issuing administration to an executor or administrator is clearly imposed on the High Court issuing the same.

Section 3 enacts that the fees "chargeable in each of such Courts under No. 11 of the first schedule to the Act..............shall be collected in manner hereinafter appearing." Section 5 provides as follows (His Lordship read the section and continued).—[677] That section without expressly casting upon any one the duty of collecting and assessing the stamp duty assumes that it rests with some officer of the Court (who in this case is the Testamentary Registrar) and provides for the case of difference arising between him and the suitor or his attorney as to the necessity of paying a fee or the amount thereof. It thus inferentially imposes upon him the ascertainment of the amount of the fee payable in each case. Except in probate and testamentary matters an ad valorem fee is not usually paid in the High Court, but such a fee is payable in some other cases. What its amount should in such cases be, is left to the proper Court officer to determine. How in the case of an ad valorem fee is he to ascertain its amount? The Act provides no machinery for doing so. It may well be that under these circumstances the Court should consider that its officer ought to base his opinion solely upon the sworn application of the petitioner. I cannot say that that would be an unreasonable conclusion. In this High Court, however, a contrary practice has prevailed, and it is impossible, I think, to say that that is an erroneous view to take of the statute. Under such circumstances I consider that the established practice should continue.
It is contended that such a practice is inconsistent with the provisions of Chap. III-A of the Act. I do not think that this is necessarily so. The provisions of that chapter are founded upon similar provisions found in English statutes 48, Geo. III, c. 149, ss. 35 and 55, Geo. III, c. 184, ss. 40, 41, 42, 43 and 51, and those provisions exist side by side with those contained in the latter English Act to which I have referred. A prima facie examination of the value of the declared assets of an estate seems to me to be quite consistent with a power to correct their valuation subsequently. The revenue authority—the Court officer—has and can have no means of ascertaining whether any items of property have been omitted from the inventory. He can only check the valuation of those items which are shown in it.

As to the practice of requiring the valuation to be made by certain named valuators, it is a good working practice, but I cannot see that it can be insisted on in a case where the petitioner can prove by other means the true value of the property. If [678] after giving such proof as he is disposed to give, a difference still exists between the petitioner and the Registrar, recourse must be had to the Taxing Officer. Beyond saying this I do not think that I have materials before me to enable me to give any special direction in the present case.

Upon the main question which has been referred to and argued before me the first point to consider is what is the nature of the asset which the Crown contends should be assessed for the probate duty. The question states it as the share of the testator in the properties of the firm; but that is not, I think, an accurate description. A deceased partner has (in the absence of special agreement) no share in the properties of the firm as such. It is his interest in the firm which is the asset which is assessable to probate duty. The cases of Laidlay v. The Lord Advocate (1) and Lord Sudeley v. Attorney-General (2) put that beyond doubt. It is not material to enquire what is the exact nature of the property of the firm. I read the passages from Lindley on Partnership quoted by the Solicitor General for Scotland at p. 461 of the report and the passage from the judgment of Lord Chancellor Herschell bearing upon this point:—"In Lindley on Partnership (5th Ed., p. 339) it is said 'what is meant by the share of a partner, is his proportion of the partnership assets after they have been all realized and converted into money and all the debts and liabilities have been paid and discharged.' And at p. 343 'from the principle that a share of partner is nothing more than his proportion of the partnership assets after they have been turned into money and applied in liquidation of the partnership debts, it necessarily follows that, in equity, a share in a partnership, whether its property consist of land or not, must, as between the real and personal representatives of a deceased partner, be deemed to be personal and not real estate, unless indeed such conversion is inconsistent with the agreement between the parties.'" (p. 491).

"One of the partners in this firm, Mr. Laidlay, has died, and the question has arisen whether his interest, whatever it may have been, derived from the deed of partnership to which I have called attention, is an asset situated in England and, therefore, made the subject of probate duty in respect of which probate [679] must be taken out in this country. There can be no doubt that the question to be determined is, what is the local situation of the asset with which we have to deal, because that the testator's interest in the partnership, however it is to be described, was one of his assets is beyond dispute" (p. 483).

That being the nature of the asset, the next question is, where is it situated. The mode of solving that question is pointed out in the same case (Laidlay v. The Lord Advocate) in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor thus (p. 489, para. 2):—

"Now, my Lords, I think that when that provision is considered, it renders it clear that this asset, which, by the hypothesis, was a share in a partnership business situated in India, did not by the exercise by the representatives of the deceased partner of this option, however they exercised it, convert that which otherwise would have been an Indian asset into an English asset. It is said that the representatives of the deceased partner sold to persons in this country; but that transaction of sale was a transaction altogether subsequent to the death, and the character of the asset and its local situation cannot be affected by circumstances arising out of a transaction subsequent to the death. The question is, where was the asset situated at the time of the death? That it was sold to a person residing in this country and that, therefore, the payment in respect of it became a debt from a person residing in this country, and that in the case of a debt the locality of the debtor is to be regarded as the locality of the asset, can matter nothing, because this was not a debt existing at the time of the death of the testator, but arose subsequently to his death by a sale of a part of his assets, and of course the local situation of his assets cannot be in the slightest degree affected by what arises out of a sale of those assets."

Where, then, is the business of David Sassoon and Company carried on—in India or in London, for this cannot be said to be carried on at both places? Where is the government of the firm situated? I have come to the conclusion that London is the locality in which the business which is the property of the partnership is situated. Upon the statements in the petition and the evidence of Mrs. Sassoon, there cannot be, I think, any doubt [680] upon that point, if there is only one business. The Advocate-General, however, contends relying upon the case of Bevan v. The Master in Equity of the Supreme Court of Victoria (1), and seeks to bring the circumstances of the present case within that ruling, but the circumstances of the two cases are very different, and I think that in this case there is but one business. The facts which existed in that case do not exist in this.

I should have been better satisfied if Mrs. Sassoon had searched for and produced the old deed of partnership; for though, as she says, it may be no longer in force it does not appear that other than the change to London there has been any alteration in the mode of managing the business, and the former deed might have thrown light on the present practice. Taking, however, the evidence as it stands, it appears that the same partners are partners both in London and India (the China firm stands on a different basis), and carry on business under the same name in both places. There is no capital account in Bombay at all. The real head of the firm to whom its good-will belongs resides in London, and new and important matters are only entered into by the Bombay firm after reference to London, though the ordinary every-day work of the firm is automatically conducted here. The results of the transactions of the firm in its different classes of business, though not the details of each transaction, are sent home to London to be entered in the books there. The profit and loss account of the working of the whole firm is made up in London, and the proportion of each partner in the year's profits of the firm is entered to his credit there in a book kept for that purpose, a book of the firm, though kept private from its employees and servants. In short, I feel unable to point out a single circumstance which enables me to say that the Bombay business is a distinct business from the London business which would not apply to the foreign branch of any English firm.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the question referred must be answered in the negative.

[681] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Forran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

ISHVAR LAKHMIDAT (Original Opponent). Applicant v. HARJIVAN RAMJI (Original Applicant), Opponent. [30th January, 1896.]

Decree—Execution—Order for sale of mortgaged property in execution—Application by judgment-debtor to be declared insolvent—Sale in execution pending application—Subsequent declaration of insolvency does not affect sale—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 344-351.

An order for the sale of mortgaged property having been made on the application of the mortgagee who had got a decree, and before the sale had taken place, the mortgagor (judgment-debtor) applied to be made insolvent under s. 344 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). Five months after the sale he was duly declared an insolvent under s. 351.

Held, that the subsequent declaration of the mortgagor's insolvency did not affect the sale or render it illegal. No consequences in derogation of the ordinary rights of judgment-creditor follow from an application by the judgment-debtor under s. 344 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). It is only when a receiver is appointed under s. 351 that the property of the insolvent vests in the receiver under s. 354 and the rights of the creditor are interfered with. It is not provided that such an order shall have any retrospective effect.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Gilmour McCorkell, District Judge of Ahmedabad, confirming the order of Khan Saheb Navroji Byramji, Subordinate Judge of Umreth.

On the 25th April, 1893, opponent Harjivan Ramji mortgaged his house and other property to one Ishvar Vrajfal for Rs. 300. Ishvar obtained a decree on the mortgage for the recovery of the debt by the sale of the mortgaged property in default of payment. On the 26th February, 1894, Ishvar applied for the sale of the mortgaged property in execution of the decree. While this application was pending, Harjivan, on the 2nd April, 1894, applied to be declared an insolvent under s. 344 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). On the 17th July, 1894, the mortgaged property was sold in execution and was purchased by the applicant Ishvar Lakhmidat. Subsequently the inquiry as to Harjivan's insolvency was proceeded [682] with, and he was declared to be an insolvent on the 22nd December, 1894. The Nazir of the Court was appointed receiver of his property and the sale of the house to the applicant was set aside on the ground that the pendency of the insolvent's application rendered the sale illegal.

* Application No. 195 of 1895 under the Extraordinary Jurisdiction.
On appeal by the applicant the Judge confirmed the order. The applicant then obtained a rule nisi to set aside the order.

Gokuldas K. Parekh appeared for the applicant in support of the rule. — We contend that the Subordinate Judge had no authority to quash the execution proceedings in a summary manner. A court-sale can be set aside only on the grounds mentioned in s. 311 of the Civil Procedure Code. Further, the order under s. 351 of the Civil Procedure Code is not retrospective. The mere application under s. 344 has no effect. There is no vesting order made until the applicant is declared an insolvent. The Subordinate Judge has relied on the decision in Viraragavara v. Parasurama (1), which has nothing to do with attachments which came into existence before a vesting order is made.

There was no appearance for the opponent.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The sequence of the proceedings which gave rise to this application was as follows. Ishvar Vrajlal early in 1894 obtained a decree upon a mortgage of the 25th April, 1893, against his mortgagor Harjivan. The decree directed the sale of the mortgaged premises—a house—in default of payment. On the 26th February, 1894, Ishvar applied to have the house sold in execution of his decree, and the usual orders for sale were made. Prior to the sale taking place, Harjivan on the 2nd April, 1894, presented an application to be declared an insolvent under s. 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure. While this application was pending, the house in question was sold in execution on the 17th July, 1894, and the present applicant, Ishvar Lakhmidat, became the purchaser.

Certain objections had been made as to the right of Harjivan to make the application to be declared an insolvent. These were [683] disposed of by the Subordinate Judge on the 1st August, 1894, when he decided to entertain the application and to proceed under s. 347 of the Code. The usual notices were served. Harjivan was examined, and on the 22nd December, 1894, was declared an insolvent. The Nazir of the Court was at the same time appointed receiver of his property.

At the same hearing the Subordinate Judge set aside the sale of the house to the auction-purchaser on the ground that the pendency of the insolvent’s application rendered the sale of the house illegal. The District Judge on appeal confirmed the order. The present application under s. 622 of the Code is made to set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge.

We are unable to find any ground for the action of the Subordinate Judge. The Code of Civil Procedure does not provide that any consequences in derogation of the ordinary rights of judgment-creditors shall follow from an application by the judgment-debtor under s. 344. It is only when a receiver is appointed under s. 351 that the property of the insolvent vests in the receiver under the provisions of s. 354, and the rights of the creditors are interfered with. It is not provided that such an order shall have any retrospective effect.

There was nothing illegal, therefore, in the sale of the house to the present applicant, and the order of the Subordinate Judge setting it aside must be cancelled. The difficulty has arisen from the great delay which occurred in dealing with the insolvent’s application. Such matters should be at once disposed of.

Rule made absolute.

[684] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

THIMBAL Gopal RAHALKAR (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents. [5th February, 1896.]

Revenue Jurisdiction Act Bombay Act X of 1876, ss. 4, cl. (f), 51—Survey and Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1865), s. 32;—Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879), ss. 38 and 398;—Free pasturage—Land set apart by Government for grazing—Subsequent sale by Government of part of such land—Right of pasturage by the inhabitants of a village over Government waste lands—Right of Government over such land—Jurisdiction of civil Courts.

The land comprised in three survey numbers situate in the village of Mahim were set apart by Government as free grazing land for the cattle of villagers.

* Appeal, No. 7 of 1895.

† Section 4, cl. (f), and s. 5 of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876):—

4. Subject to the exceptions hereinafter appearing, no Civil Court shall exercise jurisdiction as to any of the following matters:

(f) Claims against Government—

(a) to hold land wholly or partially free from payment of land-revenue, or to receive payments charged on or payable out of the land-revenue, or to set aside cess or rate authorized by Government under the provisions of any law for the time being in force, or respecting the occupation of waste or vacant land belonging to Government.

5. Nothing in s. 4 shall be held to prevent the civil Courts from entertaining the following suits:

(a) Suits against Government to contest the amount claimed, or paid under protest, or recovered, as land-revenue, on the ground that such amount is in excess of the amount authorized in that behalf by Government, or that such amount had been paid, in whole or in part, due to the plaintiff or the person whom he represents, is not the person liable for such amount;

(b) suits between private parties for the purpose of establishing any private right, although it may be affected by any entry in any record of a revenue survey or settlement or in any village papers;

(c) suits between superior holders or occupants and inferior holders or tenants regarding the dues claimed or recovered from the latter;

and nothing in s. 4, cl. (g), shall be held to prevent the Civil Courts from entertaining suits, other than suits against Government, for possession of any land being a whole survey number or a recognized share of a survey number;

and nothing in s. 4 shall be held to prevent the civil Courts in the districts mentioned in the second schedule hereto annexed from exercising such jurisdiction as, according to the terms of any law in force on the twenty-eighth day of March, 1876, they could have exercised over claims against Government:

(a) relating to any property appertaining to the office of any hereditary officer appointed or recognized under Bombay Act No. III of 1874, or any other law for the time being in force, or of any other village officer or servant;

(b) to hold land wholly or partially free from payment of land-revenue;

(c) to receive payments charged on, or payable out of the land-revenue.

† Section 32 of the Survey and Settlement Act (Bombay Act No. I of 1865):—

A Survey or Settlement Officer may set apart unoccupied lands in unalienated villages for free pasturage of village cattle and lands assigned specially for any such purpose shall not be otherwise appropriated or assigned without the sanction of the Revenue Commissioner.

§ Sections 38 and 39 of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act No. V of 1879):—

38. Subject to the general orders of Government, it shall be lawful for survey officers whilst survey operations are proceeding under Chap. VIII, and at any other time for the Commissioner, to set apart lands the property of Government and not in the lawful occupation of any person or aggregate of persons in unalienated villages or
Out of this [685] land about 2,600 acres was sold by Government to one Manchershia (defendant No. 2) in 1891. The extent of the area over which village cattle grazed before the sale being thus curtailed, the plaintiff for himself and on behalf of the other villagers brought this suit against the Secretary of State and Manchershia, alleging that the land left for grazing after the sale of 2,600 acres was insufficient for the pasturage of the village cattle and praying (in the alternative) that Government should set apart so much of land as might be necessary for free grazing, &c., and that until such land as was necessary had been set apart, the plaintiff might be declared to have the right of using the land comprised in the three survey numbers as heretofore, and that an injunction might be granted accordingly.

Government alleged that the land that was left after the sale to Manchershia was sufficient for the bona fide needs of the villagers, and contended (inter alia) that the suit was barred under s. 4, cl. (f), of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876).

Held, confirming the decree of the lower Court dismissing the suit, that while the Courts consistently with the course of legislation may have jurisdiction to declare that the villagers of a specified village are entitled to rights of free pasturage over Government waste lands within the limits of their village, still they can go no further and enjoin the Collector to pursue any particular course in connection with them while he is acting bona fide in pursuance of the power which the provisions of the statute confer upon him.

The claim being against Government respecting the occupation of waste land belonging to Government, the civil Courts are precluded from entertaining it under s. 4 of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876). A question relating to the discontinuous occupation of the village waste by the village cattle is as much a question of land-revenue as one relating to the permanent occupation of them or a portion of them by an individual.

APPEAL against the decision of J. J. Heaton, District Judge of Thana.

[686] Certain lands in the village of Mahim (viz., Survey Nos. 835, 836 and 837) had been set apart by Government as free grazing land for the cattle of the village.

In 1891 Government sold about 2,600 of this land to one Manchershia (defendant No. 2).

Thereupon the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and his co-villagers, brought this suit (No. 1 of 1892) against the Secretary of State for India and Manchershia, alleging that the land left for the village cattle was insufficient for pasturage, and praying that Government might be ordered to set apart so much land as was necessary for pasturage, and that until that was done, the plaintiff and his co-villagers should be declared to have the right of using the lands comprised in the three survey numbers as heretofore, &c.

The Government pleaded, in defence, that the land left after the sale to Manchershia was sufficient for the needs of the villages, and further contended that the suit was barred under the provisions of s. 4, cl. (f) of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876).

unalienated portions of villages for free pasturage for the village cattle, for forest reserves, or for any other public or municipal purpose; and lands assigned specially for any such purpose shall not be otherwise appropriated or assigned without the sanction of the Commissioner; and in the disposal of land under s. 37 due regard shall be had to all such special assignments.

39. The right of grazing on free pasturage lands shall extend only to the cattle of the village or villages to which such lands belong or have been assigned and shall be regulated by rules to be from time to time, either generally or in any particular instance prescribed by the Collector with the sanction of the Commissioner.

The Collector's decision in any case of dispute as to the said right of grazing shall be conclusive.
The Judge found that the suit was barred by the provisions of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876); that the plaintiff and other permanent residents of Mahim had not acquired any rights over the lands in question such as to prevent the Government from dealing with it at its pleasure; that the suit was not maintainable for the perpetual reservation of the lands for grazing and other purposes mentioned in the plaint; that the claim was not time-barred, and that the Court could not make a decree directing a perpetual reservation of any land whatever. He, therefore, dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed.

Scott (with Dayi A. Khare and Ganesh K. Deshmukh) appeared for the appellant (plaintiff).—We represent the rayats of the village of Mahim. They have a right of grazing their cattle over the land in dispute and of taking branches and leaves of trees therefrom. Our complaint is that Government has sold part of this land to defendant No. 2. There are three questions: there is one question of fact and the other two are points of law.

[687] The question of fact is whether the rayats have got land for grazing purposes. The points of law are whether the suit is barred under s. 39 of the Land Revenue Code (Bombay Act V of 1879) and whether the suit is maintainable under s. 4, cl. (f), of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act X of 1876).

The evidence establishes our prescriptive right, and it further shows that there is not now as much land available for grazing purposes as there was when Government made the grant. There are about 3,000 cattle in Mahim. This fact is admitted by the Collector in his written statement. Each animal requires about one acre and six gunthas of land for grazing purposes. The land is now quite insufficient.

The lower Court held that we cannot maintain the suit owing to s. 4, cl. (f), of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act and has relied on Shridhar v. The Secretary of State for India in Council (1). That ruling is not applicable. That was a case for declaration of ownership, while in this suit we ask a declaration that we have certain rights. We do not claim the right of occupation, which means the right to possession to the exclusion of others.

[PARSONS, J.—Is not the right of grazing a right of occupation?] We submit not. Government set apart land for grazing cattle and so long as the right of grazing cattle is not interfered with, we have got nothing to do with the occupation of the land. The term occupant is defined in the Land Revenue Code, and we submit that a person having only a right to land for grazing purposes cannot be called a holder of land under that definition. The Secretary of State v. Mathurabhai (2) shows that the present suit is maintainable.

Rao Saheb Vasudeo J. Kirtikar, Government Pleader, appeared for respondent No. 1 (defendant No. 1).—The Judge held, that the suit was one for occupation of land, and was, therefore, not maintainable. Grazing means occupation by cattle: therefore the claim is governed by cl. (f), s. 4, of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act. Civil Courts cannot take cognizance of such claims. [688] Under the Land Revenue Code such matters are left entirely to the Collector. Before the Survey and Settlement Act was passed, Government had framed certain rules for the guidance of their officers, and under those rules they were permitted to set apart reasonable areas of land for free pasturage. See Survey and Settlement Manual, 1882, pp. 36, 37. The mere setting apart of certain lands for the convenience of the villagers does not give them any rights against Government.

If it be held that the present suit is maintainable, then the case will have to go back to the Judge for inquiry as to whether the land which is now left for grazing purposes is sufficient for the present requirements of the villagers.

Lang (Advocate General with Manekshah J. Taleyar Khan) appeared for respondent No. 2 (defendant No. 2).—Section 4, cl. (f), of the Revenue Jurisdiction Act governs the present case. Villages may increase or decrease, and, therefore, constant supervision of revenue officers is necessary.

Scott, in reply, as to the meaning of occupancy or occupatio, cited Mayne's Ancient Law, p. 246; Pollock and Wright on Possession, p. 12.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the District Court of Thana dismissing a suit brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and the other villagers of Mahim in the Thana Collectorate against the Secretary of State and the defendant Manchersha Motabhai. The object of the suit was to preserve three Survey Nos. 835, 836 and 837 as free grazing land for the cattle of the villagers. In 1891, the Collector with the sanction of the Commissioner, Northern Division, sold about 2,600 acres out of the three numbers to the defendant Manchersha, and thus curtailed the extent of the area over which the village cattle had been before the alienation in the habit of grazing.

The plaint, as originally framed, alleging a customary or prescriptive right, prayed for a declaration that the plaintiff and the other villagers of Mahim had from time immemorial a right of grazing their cattle upon and taking leaves, sticks, loppings, &c., from the survey numbers in question, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from obstructing them in the enjoyment of such rights. [689] The amended plaint alleged that the land left for grazing after the sale of the 2,600 acres to the defendant Manchersha was insufficient for the pasturage of the village cattle; and that until sufficient land had been set apart for that purpose Government was not entitled to dispose of the residue, and prayed (in the alternative) that it might be declared that the plaintiff had the right to compel Government to set apart so much land as might be necessary for free grazing, &c., and that until so much as was necessary had been set apart, the plaintiff might be declared to have the right of using the three survey numbers as heretofore, and that an injunction might be granted accordingly.

The three Survey Nos. 835, 836 and 837 are admittedly unassessed Government waste land within the limits of Mahim and contain about 4,485 acres. There is not much other Government waste land within the limits of the village, but it is the case of Government that the Government waste land which is left (about 2,928 grazing acres) after the sale to the defendant Manchersha is sufficient for the bona fide needs of the villagers in the matter of free pasturage.

The legal contentions raised by the written statement of the Secretary of State are:—(1) That the claim of the plaintiff is barred by the last paragraph of cl. (f) of s. 4 of "the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act, 1876". (2) That the proprietary rights of Government over the land are not affected by reason of its having been reserved for grazing under s. 38.
of Bombay Act V of 1879, or s. 32 of Bombay Act I of 1865. (3) That under the above sections the right of disposing of the land vests in the Revenue Commissioner. (4) That the reservation of the land was permissive and temporary and not permanent. (5) That the enjoyment by the villagers was permissive and not as of right. (6) That if the villagers have acquired any rights, they are not rights over any particular land, but rights only to so much land for grazing as may be necessary for their cattle. (7) That the Revenue Commissioner is alone empowered to determine how much land is necessary, and the Court cannot interfere.

The issues raised were:

(1) Is the suit barred by anything in the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876)?

[690] (2) Have the plaintiff and the other permanent residents of Mahim acquired any right over the land in suit such as to prevent Government from dealing with it at their pleasure?

(3) Is a suit maintainable for the perpetual reservation of the land in suit for grazing and the other purposes mentioned in the plaint?

(4) Is plaintiff entitled to a perpetual reservation of so much land as may be necessary for the grazing of the village cattle?

There was also an issue as to limitation, but no argument has been addressed to us upon that subject, and it may be treated as abandoned.

The District Judge decided all the above issues in accordance with the defendant's contentions.

Though the evidence taken on commission which has been read to us (Ex. 108) shows that the villagers of Mahim for the last fifty or sixty years have grazed their cattle over the survey numbers in question, as well as over other Government waste land in the village, there is nothing in that evidence to indicate the nature of the right or supposed right under which they did so, nor is there anything in it to establish a distinction between the practice of the villagers of Mahim in respect of the grazing of their cattle over Government waste land and that of other villages where a similar practice prevails. Our decision must, therefore, rest upon the law generally applicable to Government waste land similarly circumstanced and not upon any special or peculiar custom prevailing in the village of Mahim.

Now it is found by the District Judge, and his finding has not been controverted in the arguments addressed to us, that prior to the survey settlement in 1862-63 the villagers of Mahim had free grazing land, forming part of the Government waste, attached to the village; but that the evidence did not show whether it consisted of the identical land comprised in the three survey numbers in suit or not. These numbers are partly salt marsh and partly grass land. At the survey in 1862-63 they were set apart for free grazing, being described in the survey register (Ex. 16) as "unassessed Government warkas lands allowed for free grazing." Until the sale to Mancher Shah in 1891 the villagers [691] continued to graze their cattle over them. These are the facts with which we have to deal in determining the questions of law raised by the defendants' contentions.

The judgment in the case of The Secretary of State v. Mathurabhai (1) lays down three propositions:

(1) 14 B. 213.
(1) That a right such as that of pasturage by the inhabitants of a village over Government waste lands could have been acquired by prescription against the East India Company and can be so acquired against the Secretary of State as representing the Crown.

(2) That a right of free pasturage over Government waste lands has been recognized by Government as a right belonging to some villages, and where it exists must have been acquired by custom or prescription.

(3) That in the absence of special circumstances the recognized custom of the country under which that right is enjoyed did not confer the right of pasturage on any particular piece of land.

The judgment further indicates that the extent of this right was to be measured by a consideration of how much grazing land was sufficient for the purposes of the village. This customary right, it is contended before us, is of too indefinite and varying a character to be in accordance with the rule laid down in the English authorities that customary easements must like all other customs be reasonable and certain. "That easements claimed by custom may be sustainable in point of law, they must be possessed of the same characteristics as those which are essential for the validity of custom generally. They must be reasonable and certain"—Goddard on Easements, p. 211 (edition, 1881). On this ground it is argued that the alleged right of varying from time to time with the extent of the village and the number of the cattle which it possesses cannot be a right which Courts of Law can recognize and enforce. Whether this argument be correct or not, it appears to us to afford a reason why the Legislature should leave in the hands of the revenue authorities, rather than with the civil Courts, the power to determine and regulate the extent of the right for the time being. Assuming, however, the right to [632] have existed in this form in the present case before the introduction of the survey settlement in the village, we have to consider whether it has been to any and what extent controlled or regulated by legislation. The judgment in The Secretary of State v. Mathurabhai does not deal with this subject.

Previous to the recent revenue legislation the Bombay Government had assumed that it possessed the inherent right to make rules for the regulation of the pasturage of its waste land and to control the use of it by the villagers. Rule 16 of the Rules made in 1845-49 by Government for the guidance of the revenue officers directs the grazing of unassessed Government land to be sold by auction annually, "a reasonable proportion being set aside for the free pasturage of such villages as have hitherto enjoyed the right." Government Resolution No. 1036 of 1853 directs that land assigned at the settlement as free common is not to be resumed without the sanction of the Revenue Commissioner—Survey and Settlement Manual, 1862, p. 36.

Bombay Act I of 1865, which gave legislative sanction to the introduction of the survey settlement, by s. 32 enacted as follows:—"A Survey or Settlement Officer may set apart unoccupied lands in unalienated villages for free pasturage of village cattle * * * and lands assigned specially for any such purpose shall not be otherwise appropriated or assigned without the sanction of the Revenue Commissioner." The Act thus recognizing the claims of certain villages to free pasturage over Government waste substituted for the undefined right previously existing a right to have a certain portion of such land set apart to meet it, leaving the amount of the land to be set apart to be determined by the Survey.
Officer, but liable to be subsequently varied by the Collector with the sanction of the Commissioner.

The Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, repeats the same provisions, s. 38 providing that it shall be lawful for the Survey Officer while survey operations are proceeding to set apart lands, the property of Government, for free pasturage for the village cattle, and that lands specially assigned for such purpose shall not be otherwise appropriated or assigned without the sanction of the Commissioner, while s. 39 enacts that "the right of grazing on free pasturage lands shall extend only to the cattle of the village or villages to which such lands belong or have been assigned, and shall be regulated by rules to be from time to time either generally or in any particular instance prescribed by the Collector with the sanction of the Commissioner. The Collector's decision in any case of dispute as to the said rights of grazing shall be conclusive. Although we see nothing in this course of legislation which excludes the jurisdiction of the civil Courts to declare the existence on the part of villagers of a right of free pasturage, yet ss. 38 and 39 give legislative sanction to the rules, which the Collector, with the sanction of the Commissioner, may frame for the regulation of such rights and with the like sanction to the alienation of the lands subject to the same.

While, therefore, the Courts consistently with this course of legislation may have jurisdiction to declare that the villagers of a specified village are entitled to rights of free pasturage over Government waste lands within the limits of their village, it is difficult to see how they can go further and enjoin the Collector to pursue any particular course in connection with them, while at all events he is acting bona fide in pursuance of the power which the provisions of the statute confer upon him. We have referred to this legislation in order to determine the present position of the villagers with reference to free pasturage.

It remains to consider whether Act X of 1876 deprives the civil Courts of the jurisdiction to deal with their claims against Government in respect of it. The only claim which, it appears to us, the plaintiff on behalf of the villagers of Mahim can now advance against Government is to have the Government waste land set apart at the survey settlement for free pasturage reserved for that purpose; any former indefinite rights which they may have been entitled to being now merged in the provisions which the statute has made to meet them or being lost by lapse of time. The question is whether that is "a claim against Government respecting the occupation of waste land belonging to Government." If it is, s. 4 of the Act precludes the civil Courts from entertaining it. We are of opinion that it is. It is contended for the appellant that occupation in that clause means exclusive occupation such as would, if continued, give a right to the land itself. Mr. Scott has pressed upon us the meaning of the word as it was used in the Roman Law, where "occupatio" is recognized as one of the means by which property is acquired in resbus nullius, and which Mr. Maine has treated of in his work on Ancient Law, Chap. VIII. That certainly is a legal and technical meaning of the word, but we think that in the Act which we are construing we ought not to give such a restricted meaning to it. In popular language it has a more extended sense. Webster gives "use" as one of its meanings. The Act treats questions, respecting the occupation of Government waste land as questions relating to the "land revenue," and the object of the Act is to exclude such questions from the jurisdiction of the civil Courts and to leave them to be dealt with by the revenue authorities except when they are of the definite nature described in the proviso to s. 4 and in s. 5. A question relating to the discontinuous occupation of the village wastes by the village cattle is as much a question relating to the land revenue as one relating to the permanent occupation of them or a portion of them by an individual. Claims to establish either right against Government appear to us to be claims respecting the occupation of waste lands. A claim to have lands set apart for free pasturage for the villagers appears to us to fall within the meaning of the clause. It can hardly be contended that the person to whom the grazing of the waste land is sold annually is not entitled to an occupation of it within the meaning of the clause. The land reserved for the villagers' pasture is in a position very clearly analogous to land so left for grazing. No outside cattle are allowed to pasture upon it. See The Collector of Thana v. Bal Patel (1). This case, we think, is governed by the ruling in Shridhar v. The Secretary of State for India in Council (2). The appeal will be dismissed, and the decree of the District Court confirmed with costs.

Decree confirmed.

[695] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

MADHAVRAO APFAJI SATHE (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. DEONAK AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents. [6th February, 1896.]

Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880), ss. 20 and 21 (1) Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 35—Decision of a Survey Officer as to tenure—Binding effect of the decision—Burden of proof.

Section 20 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880) throws upon the Survey Officer the duty of investigating and determining disputes as to any matter which he is bound to record. The tenure upon which any particular survey number is held is one of such matters which he has to determine between the khat and its holder. His decision is, under s. 21 of the Act, binding upon the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court. The burden of proof in such case lies upon the party seeking to vary the decision.

Statements of facts made by a Settlement Officer in the column of remarks in the dhareapatra, but not his remarks for the same even though they may consist of statements of collateral facts, which it was no part of his duty to inquire into, are admissible in evidence as being entries in a public record stating facts, and made by public servant in the discharge of his official duty, within the meaning of s. 35 of the Evidence Act (I of 1872).

[R., 35 M. 21 = 14 Ind. Cas. 401; 2 Ind. Cas. 628.]

(1) 2 B. 110. (2) P.J. (1893), p. 248.

* Second Appeal, No. 415 of 1894.

(1) Sections 20 and 21 of the Khoti Settlement Act (Bombay Act I of 1880):—

20. If it shall appear to the survey officer, who frames the said register or other record, that there exists any dispute as to any matter which he is bound to record, he may, either on the application of any of the disputant parties, or of his own motion, investigate and determine such dispute and frame the said register or other record accordingly.

21. In any such matter the decision of the said survey officer, when not final, shall be binding upon all the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court.
SECOND appeal from the decision of C. E. G. Crawford, District Judge of Ratnagiri, reversing the decree Rao Sahib K. N. Patankar; Subordinate Judge of Dapoli.

The plaintiff alleged that the lands in dispute were khoti lands and brought this suit to set aside the decision of the Survey Officer that they were dhara and not khoti. He also asked for thal rent (customary rent in kind).

The Subordinate Judge set aside the Survey Officer's decision and declared that the lands were plaintiff's khoti. He rejected the claim for rent.

[696] On appeal by the defendants the Judge reversed the decree and rejected the claim, holding that the lands were dhara. The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Robertson with Mahadeo V. Bhat, for the appellant (plaintiff).—
The question is whether the lands are the plaintiff's khoti or defendants' dhara. We contend that they are our khoti lands and the defendants are occupancy tenants. The Survey Officer wrongly decided in the year 1889 that the lands were defendants' dhara. The lands are situate in the village of Sushenri which is a khoti village, and, therefore, prima facie the presumption is that these lands are khoti. The burden of proof lay upon the defendants that they are not so. The Judge has wrongly placed upon us the burden of proving that the lands are khoti and not dhara—Muhammad Yakub v. Muhammad Ismail(1). A finding arrived at by a Settlement Officer under s. 21 of the Khoti Act (1 of 1880) can be inter-fused with a civil Court when there is a dispute as to the correctness of that finding. Where in a khoti village a tenant claims to hold lands as his dhara, the burden of proof is on him.

Assuming, however, that the burden of proof lay upon us, we submit that we have sufficiently discharged it by the production of the original sanad which was granted to our predecessor by the Peshwa in 1775. It shows that the whole village was khoti, and there was no dhara land in it at the time of the grant. The defendants ought, therefore, to show how they acquired dhara lands in the village.

He cited Kirp.1 Narain Tiwari v. Sukumoni (2).

Ganesh K Deshmukh, for the respondents (defendants).—The case of Muhammad Yakub v. Muhammad Ismail (1) cited as to the burden of proof was decided long before the Survey Act was passed. The burden of proof lies on the plaintiff. The Khoti Act clearly lays down that a person claiming land as khoti must prove that it is not dhara. The decision of the Settlement Officer being in our favour, the burden of proving that the lands are khoti lies on the plaintiff.

[697] Robertson, in reply.—The ruling in Muhammad Yakub v.
Muhammad Ismail (1) shows that the question of tenure was considered in that case, because specific issues on that point were raised.

The entry of 1862 is admissible in evidence under s. 35 of the Evidence Act.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—Upon the first point which has been argued before us in this second appeal we do not entertain any doubt. The Khoti Settlement Act by s. 20 throws upon the Survey Officer the duty of investigating and determining disputes as to any matter which he is bound

(1) 9 B. H. C. R. 278.
(2) 19 C. 91 (100).

468
to record. The tenure upon which any particular number is held is one of such matters. That he has to determine between the khot and its holder. When he has done so, his decision is, under s. 21 of the Act, binding upon the parties affected thereby until reversed or modified by a final decree of a competent Court. It is treated as decisive as to the matter recorded until the contrary is proved in a competent civil Court. The District Judge has rightly thrown the burden of proof upon the plaintiff who sought before him to vary the decision of the Settlement Officer.

The determination of this case rests almost altogether upon the inference to be drawn from the numerous documents which have been put in evidence and to the degree of weight which is to be attached to each. Upon a full, careful and exhaustive consideration of them the District Judge has come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has not succeeded in showing that the decision of the Survey Officer was erroneous. We are asked to review that conclusion and to hold that the plaintiff has established his case. It is not, we consider, competent for us sitting in second appeal to adopt that course. The lower appellate Court has decided a question of fact within its competence from which no appeal lies, and it is not the less binding upon us because the evidence adduced is chiefly of a documentary character.

It has, however, been argued that the lower appellate Court has committed an error of law in treating as irrelevant the reasons which the Assistant or Acting Superintendent, Revenue Settlement, has given in the column of remarks in the dharapatrk of [698] 1862 for his statement that "the tenant paid the assessment through the khot." Their admissibility depends upon whether they are entries in a public record stating facts and made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty within the meaning of s. 35 of the Evidence Act. The fact that the tenant paid the assessment through the khot has been treated by the District Court as admissible in evidence, but not the reasons which led him to say so. This view is in accordance with the dictum of West, J., in Govindrao v. Raghore(1). It is, in our opinion, correct. The Settlement Officer had to fix the assessment upon the land and to ascertain the name of the tenant "vahi-vatdar" and who paid assessment. Statements made by him as to these are statements of fact and relevant. The reasons which he assigns for making them are not, even though they consist of statements of collateral facts, but which it was no part of his duty to inquire into.

As to the opinion of the Survey Officer as evidenced by the effect of the dharapatrk and the place assigned to the defendants’ ancestor in it the Survey Officer at that time was not invested with authority to decide questions of tenure between the khot and his tenants, and his opinion upon such a subject, even if regularly recorded, would not have been admissible as evidence between the parties. This is the view taken by the District Judge. He has, however, contemplated the possibility (as in these cases of the doubtful relevancy of evidence it is safest to do) of the Survey Officer’s opinion being regarded as evidence, and has expressed his view as to its weight, and has come to the conclusion that, even if he were to take it into consideration, its effect is overborne by the other evidence in the case. We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

(1) 8 B. 543.
GANGAVA (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. SAYAVA AND OTHERS, (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [13th February, 1896.]

Registration—Suit for registration—Registration Act III of 1877, ss. 24 and 77.

No suit lies under s. 77 of the Registration Act (III of 1877), against an order made under s. 24 of that Act refusing to direct a document to be accepted for registration.

SECOND appeal from the decree of M. H. W. Hayward, Assistant Judge of Belgaum.

Rayappa, the husband of the first defendant, executed a certain document to the plaintiff on 16th November, 1890. He died on the 20th November. On the 11th April, 1891, plaintiff presented the document to the Sub-Registrar of Athni for registration (see s. 23 of the Registration Act III of 1877). The Sub-Registrar refused to accept it on the ground that it was not presented within four months from the date of execution, but be forwarded it to the District Registrar of Belgaum for his directions under s. 24. The District Registrar under s. 24 refused to direct the document to be accepted for registration.

The plaintiff then filed this suit under s. 77 of the Act, praying for a decree directing the document to be registered.

The Subordinate Judge of Athni and Gokak dismissed the suit on the ground that no suit lay on an order passed under s. 24 of the Registration Act.

In appeal the Assistant Judge of Belgaum confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge.

Plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Ghanasham Nilkanth, for the appellant (plaintiff).—The Registrar’s refusal to direct the document to be accepted for registration is equivalent to a refusal to register within the meaning of ss. 76 and 77; and this suit can be maintained—Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (1); Raya v. Anapurnabai (2); Abdullah Khan v. Janki (3).

[700] Hormusji C. Coyaji, for the respondent (defendant).—The order passed by the District Registrar under s. 24 was an order refusing to direct the document to be accepted for registration. Such an order is entirely different from an order refusing to register. An order under s. 24 excuses or refuses to excuse delay in presenting the document for registration, and the Registrar has an absolute discretion to pass such an order. Civil Courts do not interfere with such discretion. See Oojul Mundul v. Hesarutoollah (4).

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The applicant brought the document to the Sub-Registrar after the period of four months from the date of execution. Section 23 of Act III of 1877 declares that in such circumstances it shall not be accepted for registration. Under s. 24, the Sub-Registrar forwarded the application to the Registrar, who, under the words of that section, has discretion to remedy the effect of delay caused by urgent necessity or unavoidable accident. The Registrar may direct that the document shall be accepted for registration. This acceptance for registration is not the same as admitting to registration. The Registrar refused to make the above direction. Mr. Ghanasham argues that such refusal is a refusal to register within the meaning of ss. 76 and 77.

But the Act evidently means different things by the two phrases, refuse to register found in ss. 19 and 35, and refuse to accept for registration found in ss. 20 and 21. We are of opinion that the first thing to be done by the registering officer is to decide whether to accept or not accept. It is only after the acceptance for registration that he can consider the wider question which arises on admissions and denials and evidence, whether he should refuse to register.

We must hold, therefore, that what the Registrar did under s. 24 was not a refusal to register. So s. 76 (a) does not apply. Neither does s. 76 (b), as the direction was not concerned with the matters to which s. 72 or 75 apply.

We are of opinion, then, that the right to bring the present suit is not given by s. 77, as the condition with which that [701] section begins, viz., "where the Registrar refuses to order the document to be registered" is not one which attaches to a refusal to give the direction for which s. 24 makes provision at his discretion.

The Court confirms the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

WAMANRAO DAMODAR (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. RUSTOMJI EDALJI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.*

[17th February, 1896.]

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 42—Declaratory decree—Right to sue for declaration—Mortgage—Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882), s. 287.

Dinsha Edalji mortgaged certain property to plaintiff. After Dinsha's death, plaintiff obtained a decree for recovery of his debt by sale of the mortgaged property. Before the property was advertised for sale, the defendants, who were Dinsha's brothers, objected under s. 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act XIV of 1882), alleging that Dinsha was not the sole owner of the property; that they were joint owners with him; that they had set aside the property for religious purposes, and that Dinsha had no right to mortgage it.

The Court executing the decree thereupon ordered the applicant's (defendant's) claim should be notified in the proclamation of sale. Plaintiff then filed a suit against the defendants, praying for a declaration that the property belonged to Dinsha exclusively, and that the defendants had no right or interest in it.

Held, that under s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration prayed for.

* Second Appeal No. 300 of 1895.
Plaintiff having himself purchased the property after his claim for declaration had been allowed by the Subordinate Judge, it was contended that he was not entitled any longer to a declaratory decree.

Held, that the change of circumstances brought about by the plaintiff himself purchasing the property did not take away the right to sue which had already accrued to him.

Gotinda v. Perumdevi (1) referred to.

SECOND appeal from the decision of T. Hamilton, District Judge of Surat.

[702] One Dinsba Edalji mortgaged his property to the plaintiff. After Dinsba’s death the plaintiff obtained a decree for the sale of the property.

The defendants, who were Dinsba Edalji’s brothers, filed a claim under s. 287 of the Civil Procedure Code, alleging that the property belonged jointly to them and to Dinsba; that its income was dedicated to charity; and that Dinsba had no right to mortgage it. On the 9th September, 1891, the executing Court passed an order that the claim set up by the applicants (i.e., the defendants) should be notified in the sale-proclamation.

Plaintiff then filed this suit to obtain a declaration that the property belonged to his judgment-debtor Dinsba exclusively, and that the defendants had no right to it.

The Subordinate Judge found that Dinsba was the sole owner of the property, and granted the declaration sought for.

After this decree the plaintiff on the 17th June, 1894, put up the property to sale and himself purchased it.

The defendants appealed to the District Judge, who set aside the order of the 9th September, 1891, reversed the decree of the Subordinate Judge, and rejected the plaintiff’s claim for a declaration.

In his judgment he said:

“The cause of action is clearly the aforesaid order (i.e., of 9th September, 1891), as the suit was instituted on the 8th September, 1892, just within the period of limitation for a suit under art. 13.

“The original decree was for the sale of certain mortgaged property. As there was no attachment, the proceedings taken under s. 287 of the Civil Procedure Code must be held to have been ultra vires as described in Himatram v. Khushal (2), where the ruling in Deefholts v. Peters (3) has been followed.

“The property should have been sold without the notification of the claim of defendants. This has since been done in pursuance of the decree now under appeal. The sale was of the right, title and interest of the deceased Dinsba Edalji, and the decree-holder, the plaintiff himself, purchased the same for Rs. 1,500 on the 17th June, 1894.

“No cause of action for a declaration that defendants have no interest in the property has yet arisen to plaintiff. That may hereafter arise, as it is alleged that defendants are in actual possession.”

[703] Against this decision the plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Ganpatrao Sadasiv Rao, for the appellant-plaintiff.
Govardhanram M. Tripathi, for the respondents-defendants.

(1) 12 M. 136.
(2) 18 B. 99.
(3) 14 C. 631.
JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The decree of the District Judge setting aside the order of the 9th September, 1891, in suit No. 73 of 1891 is, in our opinion, of extremely doubtful legality; but as there is no appeal against that part of the decree we abstain from doing more than expressing our present opinion.

As to the declaration it appears that when the plaintiff sought to sell the property mortgaged to him by Dinsha, the defendants set up a claim to it which struck at the root of his mortgage, and, if sustained, would have rendered it practically valueless. It is to meet such cases as these that the Legislature inserted s. 42 in the Specific Relief Act, and the Subordinate Judge deeming the claim made by the defendants untenable rightly exercised his discretion and gave the plaintiff a declaratory decree.

We think that the District Judge wrongly reversed that decree without entering upon the merits of the case. The change of circumstances brought about by the plaintiff himself purchasing the property did not take away the right to sue which had already accrued to him—Govinda v. Perumadevi (1).

We reverse the decree and remand the appeal for disposal on the merits. Costs to be costs in the appeal.

Appeal remanded.

[704] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

PATEL RANCHOD MORAR (Original Defendant), Appellant v. BHIKABHAI IO DEVIDAS (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [17th February, 1896.]

Mortgage—Change of name in Government records—Mortgage or sale—Subsequent agreement to retransfer land in Government records on payment of debt—Document creating a right in land—Registration—Registration Act III of 1877, s. 17.

In 1877 the plaintiff being indebted to the defendant transferred certain land to the defendant’s name in the Government records. In July, 1879, the defendant executed the following document to the plaintiff reciting the previous transfer and agreeing to retransfer the land to the plaintiff’s name on the 12th July, 1880, if the debt which would then be due should be paid off:

“In the village of Beharpar is your (plaintiff’s) field, Survey No. 146, measuring 5 acres, 3 gunhas, bearing assessment Rs. 16. You (plaintiff) have got it transferred to our name. That field, therefore, stands in our defendant’s name in the Government records. You owe a debt to us. On account of that debt you have transferred it to our name * * *. The field shall be re-transferred to your name when you repay the said debt to me. You have cultivated the field for the produce of Samvat 1896, and a lease in respect thereof you have this day passed to me. And a stamp paper was purchased at the time of the transfer for the execution of this agreement, but no agreement was then passed. This agreement is, therefore, this day passed to you when the lease is executed. And you owe me (debt bearing interest. I will pay out of my pocket the expenses to be incurred at present in cultivating the field. The debt due to me would in all amount to Rs. 100. If you repay all these rupees due to me till the Vaishakh Shuddh 6th, Samvat 1896, I will take them and re-transfer the field to your name. And if you fail to pay (them) till Vaishakh Shuddh 4th, you will have no claim whatever to the said field. I shall not take the rupees after the 4th (chauth), nor shall I give (or transfer) the field to you......I shall lease the field to any one I like without keeping any claim of you as regards cultivation, manure and hedge. You have no claim or right whatever...."

This document was not registered. The plaintiff brought this suit to redeem the land, alleging that it had been mortgaged to the defendant and that the debt had been paid off. The defendant contended that the transaction in 1877 was not a mortgage but a sale of the land to him, and that the document of July, 1879, was an agreement to re-sell it to the plaintiff, which was not admissible in evidence as it was not registered.

Held, upon the evidence, that the transaction in 1877 was a mortgage to the defendant and not a sale.

Held, also, that the document of the 11th July, 1879, did not require registration. It created no rights in land, but only amounted to a personal covenant to effect a mutation of names in the Government books when the debt due by the plaintiff was satisfied.

[705] SECOND appeal from the decision of M. P. Khareghat, Joint Judge of Ahmedabad.

Suit for redemption and possession.

The plaintiff alleged that being indebted to the defendant, he mortgaged his field to the defendant and transferred it to his name in the Government records in July, 1877.

On the 11th July, 1879, the debt being then still due by the plaintiff, the defendant executed a document agreeing to re-transfer the land to the plaintiff's name in Vaishakh Shudh 6th, Samvat 1936, (12th July, 1880) if the debt should be then paid off. The document was in the following terms and was not registered:

"In the village of Behrampur is your (plaintiff's) field, Survey No. 146, measuring 5 acres, 3 gunthas, bearing assessment Rs. 16. You (plaintiff) have got it transferred to our name. That field, therefore, stands in our (defendant's) name in the Government records. You owe a debt to us. On account of that debt you have transferred it to our name. . The field shall be re-transferred to your name when you repay the said debt to me. You have cultivated the field for the produce of Samvat 1936, and a lease in respect thereof you have this day passed to me. And a stamp paper was purchased at the time of the transfer for the execution of this agreement but no agreement was then passed. This agreement is, therefore, this day passed to you when the lease is executed. And you owe me (a) debt bearing interest. I will pay out of my own pocket the expenses to be incurred at present in cultivating the field. The debt due to me would in all amount to Rs. 100. If you repay all these rupees due to me till the Vaishakh Shudh 6th, Samvat 1936, I will take them and re-transfer the field to your name. And if you fail to pay (them) till Vaishakh Shudh 4th, you will have no claim whatever to the said field. I shall not take the rupees after the 4th (chaub), nor shall I give (or transfer) the field to you......I shall lease the field to any one I like, without keeping any claim of you as regards cultivation, manure and hedge. You have no claim or right whatever...."

The plaintiff complained that the debt had been paid, but that the defendant had not re-transferred the land.

The defendant contended that the transaction in July, 1877, was not a mortgage but a sale, and he denied the execution of the above document of 11th July, 1879, and objected to its admission in evidence as it was not registered.

The Subordinate Judge of Ahmedabad dismissed the plaintiff's suit.
In appeal, the Joint Judge of Ahmedabad reversed the decree and ordered that plaintiff should recover the land on paying Rs. 100 within six months to the defendant. He held that the [705] above document was a personal covenant to re-transfer the land to the plaintiff’s name and did not require registration.

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

Goverdhanram Madhavram, for the appellant (defendant).—We contend that in 1877 the land in question was not mortgaged, but sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the document (Ex. 44) of the 11th July, 1879, is an agreement to sell it back again to the plaintiff. There is no document showing a mortgage in 1877, and this document does not recite any. The fact of the sale in 1877 is corroborated by the change of names in the Government records. By that sale the original debt due to the defendant was extinguished. A suit on the document of 1879 is now in any case barred by limitation, and, moreover, this document is not registered and is not admissible in evidence.

He cited the following cases:—Ranu v. Ramabai (1); Tilakchand v. Jitamal (2); Tarachand v. Lakshman (3); Subhabat v. Vasudevpat (4); Bapuji v. Senavaraji (5); Ayavoyyar v. Rahimnora (6); Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (7); Vani v. Bani (8); Baksu v. Govinda (9); Gopal v. Ganpatrao (10); Lakshmann a v. Kamleswara (11).

M. K. Mehta, for the respondent.—It is clear that there was a mortgage in 1877. The document of 1879 does not need registration. It does not create or modify any right in the property.

He cited Burjorji v. Muncherji (12); Rama v. Baburao (13).

JUDGMENT.

RANADE, J.—There are only two points raised in this appeal: one of these relates to the construction to be placed on Ex. 44, and the other relates to the necessity or otherwise of its registration. Taking the latter point first, we find that the Court of first instance was of opinion that Ex. 44 was an agreement to re-convey property valued at more than Rs. 100, and as such was compulsorily registrable under ss. 17 and [707] 49 of Act III of 1877. The Joint Judge in appeal held that it created no rights in land, but only amounted to a personal covenant to effect a mutation of names in the Government books when the debt was satisfied, and as such did not require registration. We are inclined to accept this latter view as correct.

The object of the instrument was evidently not to create or extinguish or modify rights in immoveable property. As will be seen from the translation of the document in the judgments of the lower Courts, the transfer of the khata in appellant’s name had been effected two years before. It was at that time arranged between the parties that the appellant should pass an agreement recognizing the true nature of this transfer of khata, namely, that it was not intended to be an absolute transfer. As no such agreement was then executed, the appellant agreed on certain conditions to effect the change of the khata into the plaintiff’s name after the debt was satisfied. The instrument was intended to serve as evidence, in the respondent’s hand, of this agreement of the appellant.

(7) 18 A. 827. (8) 2 B. 553. (9) 4 B. 594.
(13) P.J. (1874), p. 18.
The debt itself was not Rs. 100 at the time. It was expected with interest and further advances to amount to Rs. 100. By itself Ex. 44 created no right in land; it only recited the original understanding, and it was not produced in this case to prove any such right. The lower Court of appeal has, therefore, very properly held that Ex. 44 was admissible in evidence without registration—Raju v. Krishnaraj (1); Vani v. Bani (2); Burjorji v. Muncherji (3); Sakharam v. Madan (4); Chunilal v. Bomanji (5).

The next point for consideration is what was the true character of the transaction which was recited in this agreement. Both the lower Courts have held that when the khata of the land was transferred, the parties intended not to effect a sale of the property, but only a mortgage for the security of debts due by the transferor to the transferee. The fact that a debt was due by the one to the other is admitted by the appellant. It was contended, however, that this debt was the consideration for [708] a sale out and out of the transferor’s interest. There seems, however, in that case to have been no occasion for the subsequent personal covenant to re-convey on satisfaction of the debt at a given time. The translation furnished in the judgment of the first Court clearly sets forth the most important recital in the agreement, namely, that the debt was to carry interest till the time fixed for re-payment. This condition clearly shows that the transfer of khata was not intended to be in satisfaction of the pre-existing debt, which still continued to be a debt, and to carry interest also. The sum of Rs. 100 was fixed as the expected total of principal and interest and further advances. If the transfer of khata in the first instance did not thus operate to extinguish the debt, it is clear that the subsequent default of the transferor in making payment at the time fixed could not have that effect—Baksu v. Govinda (6). All the indications which have been recognized as distinguishing a mortgage from a sale transaction are present here. The existence of the debt, the agreement to pay interest on it, the continuance of the former owner in possession as tenant, the agreement to repay the debt with interest at a given time, and the agreement to re-convey, all go to show that both the lower Courts have properly construed the instrument and the transaction recited therein—Abulibhai v. Kashi (7). The cases of Subhabhat v. Vasudevbhat (8); Babuji v. Senavaraji (9); Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (10); Ayyavayyar v. Rahimnasa (11) are clearly distinguishable because there were sale-deeds of absolute conveyance in all these cases coupled with a covenant for re-purchase. There was no reservation of any liability for debt, no agreement to pay interest, and to repay the debt as in this case. We, accordingly, dismiss the appeal, and confirm the decree.

Bai Motivahu v. Bai Mamubai

21 Bom. 710

[709] PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRESENT:

Lords Watson, Hobhouse and Davey and Sir R. Couch.

[On appeal from the High Court at Bombay.]

Bai Motivahu (Appellant) v. Bai Mamubai and Another (Respondents). [7th February and 20th March, 1897.]

Will—Construction—Hindu Law—Gifts and Wills—Executor and bequest—Restriction to donees living at testator’s death—Limitation of the exercise of the power.

Even if Hindu wills are not to be regarded, in all respects, as gifts to take effect upon the death of the testator, they are generally to be regarded, as to the property which they can transfer and as to the persons to whom transfer can be made, as regulated by the Hindu Law of gift. The Tagore case (1) referred to and followed.

A Hindu testator devised his immovable property upon trust for the income to be appropriated to the maintenance of his widow and of his daughter, and of the children that might be born of her, the property to be divided among the heirs of such children. If there should not be any children born of his daughter, the property under the will should devolve upon those “to whom she might direct it to be delivered by making her will.”

The daughter having had no children, and questions having arisen between the daughter and the widow as to the administration of the estate according to the will.

Held, that there was not an absolute gift to the daughter, and that the persons to whom the property was given, though to be designated by her, did not take the gift from her, but from the testator. The judgment in Hixon v. Oliver (2) not applicable.

According to the already settled law, if the testator himself had designated the persons to take, in the event of his daughter having no child, the gift would have been valid as an executory bequest, supported by preceding life-interests, but valid only under the following restriction, viz., that to render the gift valid, the taker so designated must have been, either actually or in contemplation of law, in existence at the death of the testator.

In this case, no principle of Hindu law stood in the way to prevent the testator from substituting his daughter for himself as the person empowered to designate; but the same limitation held good as to the existence being requisits of the donee at the end of the donor’s life, in order that the power might be validly exercised.

There was no application of the English Law of “powers,” which was not fit to be applied generally to Hindu wills. Subject to the above restriction, the power in question was valid.

It was not decided upon whom the property would devolve, if the power should not be exercised.

[7-0] Appeal from a decree (15th March, 1895) of the appellate High Court affirming, with a verbal amendment, a decree (19th December, 1891) of the High Court in its original jurisdiction (3).

(3) Bai Mamubai v. Dossa Morarji in 10 B. 443.

477
The questions which were raised on this appeal between the widow and the daughter, by a former marriage, of the testator, Jetha Ladhani, lately a Hindu merchant in Bombay, as to the construction of the will and the validity of a clause in it, were entirely of law. The testator, who died in November, 1869, having made his will on the 18th October preceding, appointed his widow Motivahu to be executrix and Khimji Lakmidas, his former partner in business, to be executor of his will, with a third, Bussa Monarji, since deceased. Probate was obtained on the 1st November, 1870. Questions having arisen in carrying out the will, this suit was brought on February, 1878, by the daughter Mamubai against the executor and the executrix. On this appeal preferred by Motivahu from the decree of the High Court, the respondents were the daughter, Mamubai, and the executor Khimji Lakmidas. Trust estates for life having been given by the will out of the income of the testator’s immovable property to his widow and daughter, and then to the children that might be born of his daughter, with ultimate division of it among the heirs of those children, and a provision that, if there should be no children, his daughter should have power by her will to direct in whose favour an executory devise of the property should take effect;—the question was raised, on this appeal, whether the Courts below were right in holding it to be a valid provision that, in the event, which had happened, of no children having been born of the testator’s daughter, the property should go to the persons to whom that daughter should by her will direct it to be delivered.

After some bequests of money for charitable purposes and for legacies, the will directed that all the testator’s landed property should be held under a trust-deed to be executed by his executors and executrix and his friend Seth Thaker Khustav Makanji, who were out of the net income of the property to pay the personal expenses of his widow and daughter, and those of his daughter’s children, as the trustees might think proper. Afterwards the property to be apportioned among the heirs of the daughter’s children, with the conclusion, as follows:—“Should there be no children, then after death of the widow and the daughter the trust to become void, and this property to be delivered to such persons as my daughter may direct it to be delivered to, by making her will.”

Another clause after providing that any remaining cash should be divided among his daughter’s children, on their mother’s death, and that of his widow, made a further trust, if there should be no children, for dharma, or religious and charitable purposes. The will repeated, in case this should fail, the above power to be exercised by the daughter; and, as the trust for dharma was too vague to be carried out, and was so treated on all hands, this clause was practically a repetition of the power to the daughter.

The written statement to the plaint in this suit contained nothing as to the validity of the power, but related to the accounts of the estate.

No issues were raised. On the 26th August, 1878, the accounts were referred to the Commissioner, whose report was by consent confirmed on the 25th November, 1890. The Judge in the Court of original jurisdiction (Farran, J.) construing the 8th clause of the will, considered that the income was given to Bai Motivahu and to Bai Mamubai during their joint lives, and then to the survivor of them. As to the disposal of the property after the death of the daughter Mamubai, the Judge held that as she had no children born of her, or in legal existence at the date of the death of the testator, the gift to such children was invalid under the rule laid down in the Tagore case (1); but that the bequest that, failing any children born of her, the property should devolve upon those to whom she might by her will direct that it should be delivered was valid. This constituted, on failure of any children born of her, in effect an absolute gift to the daughter Mamubai, who, in that state of things, subject to the life-interest of Bai Motivahu, was at liberty to will the whole property to whosoever she might choose. It was also the Judge's opinion that any who might take the property under such a direction made by Mamubai would take it from her and by her gift, not the testator's, so that the will and the direction did not offend against the rules laid down in the Tagore case (1).

As to the gift to religious and charitable purposes made in the event of their being no children born of Mamubai, the Judge held it too vague to be upheld; so that under this clause, also, she could exercise a power of appointment, as given in a preceding part of the will.

Part of the judgment was as follows:—"The plaintiff has no children, and she is said to be about thirty. It is admitted that the provision for the future children of Mamu, if any, must fail under the ruling in the Tagore case (1). If any should be born, this admission would not be binding on them. I cannot now decide what would become of the property in that event. In the event of no children being born of Mamu, the testator has directed that the property is to be delivered to such persons as his daughter Mamu may direct it to be delivered to by making her will. The question arises whether that is a valid direction having regard to the ruling in the Tagore case (1).

"I endeavour to put myself in the position of the testator, a Hindu, to ascertain what he meant. He manifestly desired to make adequate provision for his wife Motivahu for her life, while keeping a watchful control over her: see clss. 13, 14, 17 and 7. He manifestly desired that she should not be his heiress. Mamu, subject to the provision for Motivahu and Mamu's children, he wished to inherit after him. He contemplates Mamu surviving Motivahu and the trust being kept up for her and her children, failing children of Mamu he wished that Mamu should do what she pleased with the property, and it is to emphasize that intention I think that he says she is to direct to whom it is to be given by making her will. Subject to Motivahu's interest, she is to enjoy it in her lifetime and after her death she is to will it away. This is to all intents and purposes an absolute gift to her. The intention of the testator is, I think, sufficiently plain, though it may fail if Mamu should not give [713] the requisite directions by her will. He has not contemplated her doing so. If I am correct in this view, the gift does not offend against the rule in the Tagore case. The persons to whom the property is given take it from Mamu and not from the testator. Mamu became the owner. Courts in England have viewed similar wills in this light. The cases are collected in Theobald on Wills, p. 352. Robinson v. Dusgate (2), Hixon v. Oliver (3) are cases very like the present. If I am in error in ascertaining the wishes of the testator from the words which he has used, I err in good company. When there is, as here, no gift over on failure to exercise the power, it is difficult to interpret the will in any other sense than this, that the testator when penning his intention expressed the incidents of an absolute gift.

instead of making an absolute gift in the more simple form, and omitted to specify some of them.

"The next clause to be considered is the 13th. The meaning of this clause is that Motivahu is to receive Rs. 750 per month to keep the house and to defray the worship of the Thakur. Mamu, no doubt the testator expected, would live with her, but if she withdraws herself the testator has made no provision for that. I should be making a new will for the testator and altering his expressed intention if I were to allocate any part of this sum to Mamu. If Mamu returns to the house, and Motivahu does not properly expend the money on the household expenses, the executors have the power themselves to expend them with their own hands.

"As to cl. 15, it is sufficient to say that only Rs. 50 per month are payable out of the income of the trust created by cl. 7 and 8. The other expenditure there directed is to be made out of the general fund. This general fund is that specified in cl. 16. The capital is not to be trench upon. Out of the balance of the income the executors can make payments for religious charities. The bequest is allowable as the translation runs, and even if the word dharam only is used in the original, the parties will hardly dispute it, as it is only the surplus income out of which the expenditure can be made. For the reason [714] already given I cannot positively decide on the invalidity of the provisions in cl. 18. If children should be born, my decision would not bind them. The 18th clause contains an alternative gift of the property there described to dharam, or failing that to such person as Mamu may direct by making her will. The whole gift, however, would fail on both branches if Mamu should have a child. Failing such child the alternative gift comes into play. The alternative gift to dharam fails for vagueness, but effect will be given to the valid one. See cases collected in Theobald p. 306 (3rd Ed.). My decision on cl. 8 governs the gift to Mamu expressed in the same words in cl. 18."

The decree declared that Bai Motivahu and Mamubai were, during their joint lives, entitled in equal shares to the net rents of the property, and that the survivor of them was entitled during her life to the entirety of the rents. That the gift, contained in paragraphs 8 and 28 of the will, to such person as Bai Mamubai might by her will direct, was valid.

A Division Bench of the High Court (Sir C. Sargent, C. J., and Bayley, J.) heard and decided an appeal from the above judgment and decree, raising the question of the validity of the power to appoint conferred upon Mamubai. The High Court gave no reasons for their judgment, a similar question having been disposed of in Javerbai v. Rukhibai (1), and the reasons given in their judgment in that case appearing to afford the statement of their opinion herein. The High Court affirmed the decree of the Court of first instance with a restriction, upon Mamubai’s power of selection, to persons in existence at the death of the testator.

Mr. J. D. Mayne and Mr. H. Cowell, for the appellant, relied on the following principal points. The amendment made by the High Court in the decree of the original Court showed that the High Court did not altogether concur in the view taken by Mr. Justice Farran to the effect that the provisions of the will created an absolute estate in Mamubai. The High Court must have been of opinion that effect could only be given to the testamentary appointments to be made by Mamubai by treating them [715] as estates conferred by the testator under the will of 1869. It was submitted that so much of that will as provided for the devolution of the estate after the death of Mamubai was invalid, being contrary to the principles of the Hindu law relating to wills, as laid down in the Tagore case (1).

(1) 16 B. 492.

A disposition in favour of such persons as Mamubai might appoint by will was invalid. A disposition, or power to direct a disposition, to take effect on failure of a previous invalid bequest, would be inoperative, as being itself invalid. Again, the Hindu law required that on a gift (and the law of gift governed such a bequest), an ascertained person in existence, and accepting the gift, must do so at the instant when the gift should take effect; and that would be at the time of the death of the donor. To allow such a disposition by will as the power in question, if exercised, would effect, would be to allow a bequest to operate in favour of a person who might, or might not, be in existence at the death of the donor. In view of this, the High Court had attempted to give validity to the power in question by restricting the phrase the exercise of that power to a class of persons who must have been in existence at the death of the testator. It was submitted that the High Court by its decree could not have thus given validity to what was invalid from the beginning, and, moreover, could not impose a limitation altogether beyond the contemplation of the testator himself. He had given an unrestricted power of selection of the taker of an executory devise. The Court had so far made a will for him as to confine that selection to a diminished, and diminishing, class. But as the provision was actually made, it, on the face of it, would have made the addition of another, younger, life than his own within which period the power might be exercised after his death. That was a provision conflicting with the Hindu law of wills, and it was, therefore, invalid. That law as explained in the Tagore case (1) required that a person must be specified as donee, that he must be capable of accepting, and accept at the time when the gift would be capable of taking effect. These restrictions on gift forbeade, virtually, powers of appointment, such as the one in question. They prevented a testator from delegating [716] his choice in this manner. No such powers were recognized in the Hindu system of wills, in which bequests were founded on the law of gift, a bequest being in its view a gift to take effect upon death. The following cases were cited:—Ramionoo Mullick v. Ramgopal Mullick (2); Nagatuchhee Ummal v. Gopoo Naduraja Chetty (3); Vallinayagam Pillai v. Pachche (4); Soorjeemoney Dasjee v. Denabundoo Mullick (5); Bhooobunmooyi Debia v. Ramkishore Acharj Chowdury (6); Ganendra Mohan Tagore v. Upendra Mohan Tagore (7); S. M. Krishnaramani Dasi v. Ananda Krishna Bose (8); Sonatun Bysakh v. S. M. Juggutsoonderi (9).

It was now too late to import a new principle into this part of the Hindu law, and the testamentary right should be taken to have been established in a way that could not admit it.

By the recognition of this power as given in the will there would be an intermediate time during which the estate might be in abeyance, contrary to the well-observed theory of the Hindu law which tended to the vesting of gift in the donee when the gift was effected. The exercise of the power might be contrary to the theory of the law of the Mitakshara, whereby the undivided owner could not devise his share by will without the consent of his co-sharers, and whereby the will of the undivided member of the family would be defeated by the right of survivorship among co-parceners. The undivided owner might obtain a partition, and could then devise. But, on his death his right to get partition ceased. A power, such as that now in question, would not accord with this. Reference was made to Laksman Dada Naik v. Ramchandra Dada Naik (1).

Mr. J. Jardine, Q.C. and Mr. J. H. A. Bramson, for the respondents, argued that there was no reason for holding invalid the power in question. It had long been settled law that a gift for life with a gift over on a contingency was good. Reference [717] was made to Tareckessur Roy v. Shoshi Shikharessur (2). The decree of the High Court was right in giving effect to the intention of the testator, construing the will according to its legal construction, and maintaining the power given by him, with a precaution against the power being wrongly exercised. The will was sufficiently right to enable the disposition to operate consistently with the rule laid down in the Tagore case (3) as to giving effect to a testator's intention. No principle of Hindu law had been shown to have been infringed. Reference was made to Theobald on Wills, 352; Robinson v. Dusgat (4); Hixon v. Oliver (5). The judgment of the Chief Justice in Javerbai v. Kablibai (6), had answered all the arguments brought against the validity of the power. It was not a fatal objection to the power that it could have been exercised, as it originally was given, in an invalid way. The power given to the daughter by this testator was capable of being validly exercised, and, far from being contrary to any principle of Hindu law, harmonized with it, inasmuch as that law, as was pointed out in the judgment referred to, recognized the exercise, in several instances, of powers over definite objects. As regarded the exercise of powers, reference was made to In re Maxwell's will (7); In re Capon's trusts (8). Other cases cited will be found in the report of Javerbai v. Kablibai (6).

JUDGMENT.

Afterwards, their Lordships' judgment was delivered on 20th March, 1897, by SIR R. COUCH.—The question in this appeal arises in a suit brought by the respondent Mamubai against the appellants and Dossa Morarji and Khimji Lakmudas, the other respondent, for the administration of the estate of Jetha Ladbani, a Hindu merchant of Bombay, and for the construction of his will. He died in November, 1869; the will is dated the 18th of October, 1869, and by it the [718] defendants are appointed his executors and executrix. Having in the previous clauses directed Rs. 35,000 to be expended on his funeral ceremonies, and given various legacies, the testator in the seventh and eighth clauses says:

"7. Agreeably to what is written above, the whole of the money which I have resolved to be paid or expended on account of the 'legacies' and for the expenses of my funeral ceremonies for 12 months and on account of the sadavart (a religious institution) and for other dharan (religious or charitable) purposes according to the above particulars is to be paid out of my funds in ready cash, but whatever my (landed) estate, that is, immovable property there is, is not to be touched by my vakils (executor or representative) or vakilatan (executor or representative) for these purposes, but after my death shall have taken place a trust deed is to be made as soon as practicable of my garden, dwelling-house, rope-walk, warehouses (or godowns), houses, stables, lands, and whatever other immovable property that is (landed) estate there is belonging to me in the island of Bombay, and the whole is to be invested in a trust. As to the trustees thereof, my two vakils and vakilatan, and in conjunction with them my friend Seth Thakar Khatav Makanji, four persons, jointly are duly to become trustees, and these trustees four in number are to collect the income of the whole property and, after deducting therefrom the expenses connected therewith, money is to be paid out of the net income, whatever it may amount to, for the personal expenses of my wife Motivahu and my daughter Mamu, and for the children of my daughter Mamu after her death, agreeably to the fourteenth and fifteenth clauses of this will, and after paying the same whatever income may remain is to be used for the purposes of my wife Motivahu and my daughter Mamu and her children in such manner as my trustees think proper.

8. In the seventh clause mentioned above, it is resolved to invest the whole of my immovable property in trust and to collect the income thereof, but the trustees are not to demand any rent for the place out of my property which may be used as a residence for my family, and should any of the trustees depart this life the surviving trustees are to appoint another trustee, and after the death of my daughter Mamu should there be any children born of the womb of my daughter the trust is to stand valid during the lifetime of such children. Afterwards the heirs of the said children are duly to apportion and receive this property. But should there be no children born of the womb of my daughter Mamu, then after the death of Mamu and of my wife Motivahu this trust is to become void, and this property is to be delivered to such persons as my daughter Mamu may direct it to be delivered by making her will.

The eighteenth clause relates to the movable property. After providing for the birth of a son or daughter of Mamu it says:

"According to the above particulars (and) agreeably to what is written above, my property is to be apportioned and distributed; and should no child be born of the womb of my daughter Mamu (which may God forbid), in that event, on the death of my wife Motivahu and of my daughter Bai Mamu taking place, my movable property is to be expended on such good dharam (religious or charitable works) in my name [719] as may continue as long as the moon lasts; and should it appear that any one would prevent this property from being given away for dharam (religious or charitable purposes) by reason of the rules of the Sarkar, the same is to be given to such person as my daughter Mamu may direct it to be given by making her will."

The nineteenth clause relates to the jewels of the testator and his wife, and is similar to the eighteenth.

After a reference to the Commissioner of the Court to take accounts and make inquiries, and his making his certificate and report, the suit was heard on the original side of the High Court by Mr. Justice Farran, who on the 19th December, 1891, made a decree declaring among other matters that the gift contained in paragraph eight of the said will to such person as the plaintiff Mamubai may direct by her will is valid, but this Court cannot and doth not determine upon whom the property referred to in the said eighth clause will devolve in case the plaintiff Mamubai shall die without making or leaving a will.” In his judgment the learned Judge says that to all intents and purposes there was an absolute gift to Mamubai; that the persons to whom the property was given took it from her and not from the testator; that Mamu became the owner. He refers to Theobald on Wills, p. 332, and says that Robinson v. Dugarte (1) and Hixon v. Oliver (2) were cases very like the present. Their Lordships are unable to agree with the learned Judge in holding that there was an absolute gift. The case in Vernon has been questioned by a great authority. (Sugden on Powers, 109, 8th Ed., referring in a note to Buckland v. Barton (3) and In re Mortlock’s trust (4). And in Hixon v. Oliver the gift was to the testator’s wife “to be disposed of as she thinks proper to be paid after her death.” It was not a power, but a disposition vesting the whole interest in the legatee, but deferring the payment, and is distinguishable from the present case. Further, it is to be observed that the declaration in the decree is not consistent with the judgment, which seems to require a declaration that Mamu was absolutely entitled. Motivahu appealed against the decree and the appeal was heard before Sir Charles Sargent, C. J., and Bayley, J., who on the 15th March, 1895, ordered the [720] decree to be amended by inserting the words “in existence at the date of the death of the said testator” in two clauses of the decree after the words “in paragraph eight of the said will to such person,” and confirmed the decree so amended. Their Lordships have not before them the reasons of the learned Judges for making this amendment. It is obviously made for the purpose of limiting the exercise of the power; but it is open to the objection that it inserts in the power words which are not in the will. Their Lordships propose to make a verbal variation in this part of the decree.

The question in the present appeal is whether such a power in the will of a Hindu is valid.

In Sreemutty Soorjeenonkey Dossee v. Denobundoo Mullick (5), Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in delivering the judgment of this Board, said: “Whatever may have formerly been considered the state of that (the Hindu) law as to the testamentary power of Hindus over their property, that power has now long been recognized and must be considered as completely established. This being so, we are to say whether there is anything against public convenience, anything generally mischievous, or anything against the general principles of Hindu law, in allowing a testator to give property whether by way of remainder or by way of executory bequest (to borrow terms from the law of England, upon an event which is to happen, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being). Their Lordships think that there is not; that there would be great general inconvenience and public mischief in denying such a power; and that it is their duty to advise Her Majesty that such a power does exist.” It appears from the report cited (p. 129) that this had also been held by the Supreme Court at Calcutta. In the previous part of the judgment of the Board, the gift over had been held to be on a failure of male issue of any of the testator’s five sons at the time of the death of that son. The property was first given to the sons as a joint Hindu family absolutely, and the question whether the first estate could be only an estate for life did not arise. Before this judgment it had been held by this Board (1), that the extent of the power of [721] testamentary disposition by Hindus must be regulated by the Hindu law, and subsequently, in the judgment in Beer Portab Sahuc v. Rajender Portab Sahuc (2) it is said (p. 37): "It is too late to contend that because the ancient Hindu treatises make no mention of wills, a Hindu cannot make a testamentary disposition of his property. Decided cases, too numerous to be now questioned, have determined that the testamentary power exists, and may be exercised, at least within the limits which the law prescribes to alienation by gift inter vivos."

The leading case on Hindu wills is the Tagore case (3). It is unnecessary to refer to the particulars of the will in that case. Two rules applicable to the will now under consideration are laid down in the judgment of the Committee: one is "that a person capable of taking under a will must be such a person as could take a gift inter vivos, and, therefore, must either in fact or in contemplation of law be in existence at the death of the testator" (p. 70). The other is that the first taker under the will may take for his lifetime (pp. 68, 80). And it is said (p. 69): "The analogous law in this case is to be found in that applicable to gifts, and even if wills were not universally to be regarded in all respects as gifts to take effect upon death, they are generally so to be regarded as to the property which they can transfer and the persons to whom it can be transferred." These appear to their Lordships to be the limits of the analogy between wills and gifts inter vivos which have been recognized. They are not aware of any authority in support of Mr. Mayne's contention, as they understood it, that in the present case there would not be such a transfer of possession to the person who would take by virtue of the power as is necessary to enable it to be validly exercised. It appears to them to follow, from the first taker being allowed to have only a life-interest, that his possession is sufficient to complete the executory bequest which follows the gift for life. The result of the decision is that, according to settled law, if the testator here had himself designated the person who was to take the property in the event of Mamu dying childless, the bequest would be good.

[722] The remaining question is whether his substituting Mamu, and giving her power to designate the person by her will is contrary to any principle of Hindu law. There is an analogy in it in the law of adoption.
A man may by will authorize his widow to adopt a son to him, to do what he had power to do himself, and although there is here a strong religious obligation, their Lordships think that the law as to adoption shows that such a power as that now in question is not contrary to any principle of Hindu law. Further, they think that the reasons which have led to a testamentary power becoming part of the Hindu law are applicable to this power, and that it is their duty to hold it to be valid. But whilst saying this they think they ought also to say that, in their opinion, the English law of powers is not fit to be applied generally to Hindu wills.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decree of the appellate Court with a merely verbal variation for the purpose of more clearly expressing the evident intention of the High Court. That variation is as follows. Instead of the declaration contained in the decree

(1) 8 M. I. A. 66 (65).

relating to para. 8 of the will and of the declaration relating to the testamentary power given to the plaintiff Mamubai by para. 18 of the will, insert a declaration that the gifts contained in these paragraphs respectively to such persons as Mamubai may direct by making her will are valid gifts so far as the same may be directed to be delivered to persons who were in existence, either actually or in contemplation of law at the death of the testator Jetha Ladhani and not further or otherwise, but that this Court cannot and doth not determine upon whom the property subject to such powers respectively will devolve if and so far as such powers are not validly exercised. The Courts below have ordered that the costs of all parties as between solicitor and client should be paid out of the estate of the testator, and their Lordships make a like order as to the costs of this appeal.

[723] PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRESENT:

Lords Watson, Hobhouse, and Davey, and Sir R. Couch.

[In the matter of an Appeal from the High Court at Bombay.]

RABIABAI AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. MAHOMED ISMAIL KHAN AND OTHERS (Objectors).
[7th April and 18th May, 1897.]

Privy Council—Practice—Petition to restore an appeal—Terms under which it was restored.

Under Rule 5 of the Orders in Council of 18th June, 1853, an appeal was dismissed for want of prosecution on the 8th October, 1896. The record had been received on the 15th January, 1896, and since then no steps had been taken. The delay having been explained, and the cause of it considered sufficient, the appeal was restored to the file, on conditions as to costs, and on security to be given in England.

THIS was a petition preferred by Rabiabai, widow of Amir Sahib Mahomed Ali, in which his sons joined, relating to an appeal between the petitioners and Mahomed Ismail and others. This appeal had been dismissed for want of prosecution.

The petition set forth that on the 7th March, 1893, the suit brought against the petitioners was dismissed by the decree of the High Court in its original jurisdiction, but on appeal decreed by the appellate High Court on the 13th October, 1893. An appeal to Her Majesty in Council was admitted on the 13th April, 1894. The record was received by the Registrar of the Judicial Committee on the 15th January, 1896. No steps having, after that, been taken, this appeal was, on the 8th October, 1896, dismissed for want of prosecution under the terms of Rule 5 of the Order in Council of the 13th June, 1853. The explanation of the petitioners was that the delay had taken place owing to the illness of Mahomed Ali Amir Sahib Kewal, the manager of the affairs of the family of which the appellants were members.

Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the petitioners, relied on this manager's affidavit, and referred to Rajah Deedar Hossein v. Ranee Zahooren Nissa (1), Ranee Birjusutee v. Pertaub Singh (2), and to the practice of the Judicial Committee by W. Macpherson, Esquire, p. 100.

Mr. T. Ribton was heard for Mahomed Ismael Khan, the first respondent on the appeal, on the objection to the petition.

ORDER.

[724] Their Lordships held that the appeal ought to be restored upon condition, (1) that the petitioners do deposit in the Registry of the Privy Council, within four months from the date of Her Majesty's order, £300 as security for costs; (2) that the petitioners pay the respondent his costs of opposing the petition incurred in India, his costs of the dismissal of the appeal, and his costs of opposing the petition in England.

An order in Council to the above effect was made on the 18th May, 1897.

Solicitors for the petitioners:—Messrs. Nichol, Manisty and Co.

Solicitors for the first respondent:—Messrs. Hughes and Sons.

TULLOCKCHAND HARNATH AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. GOKULBHOY MULCHAND (Original Plaintiff), Respondent. [*] [9th July, 1897.]

Registration—Suit to compel registration—Document referring to another document—Two documents when registrable as one—Duties of Registrar—Further period for presentation allowed by s. 34 of Registration Act—Registration Act (III of 1877), ss. 34, 34, 77.

The defendants executed and delivered two documents A and B to the plaintiff—A being an agreement of equitable mortgage and B an agreement that they (the defendants) would register A and do all things necessary thereafter, and, in case they failed to do so, to pay whatever the plaintiff could claim under A if it had been registered. The plaintiff obtained an order for the registration of A, but failed to present it for registration within thirty days after such order as required by s. 75 of the Registration Act (III of 1877), and, when he did present it, registration was consequently refused. He subsequently lodged B for registration, with A as an annexure to it and it was accepted on payment of a penalty under s. 94 of the Registration Act. The Registrar, however, refused to register B on the grounds (1) that without A there would be nothing to show to what property B referred, and (2) that to register A as an annexure to B would be contrary to the provisions of s. 75 which limited the time for registration to thirty days. The plaintiff then brought this suit under s. 77 praying for an order for the registration of B, with its accompaniment A, within thirty days from the decree. The Division Court made the order as prayed for. On appeal by the defendants,

[725] Held, that the decree ordering the registration of B was correct. That document was a mere personal covenant to do a certain act with reference to a particular document. There was nothing on the face of it to show that the accompanying document referred to it related to immovable property. The registering officer would travel out of his functions if he were to institute an enquiry as to what was the nature of the document referred to.

When a Registrar has directed under s. 34 that the document shall be accepted for registration, the Court cannot inquire under ss. 77 and 78 into the propriety of that direction.

Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (1) approved of and followed.

The proviso to s. 34 allows a further period of four months (in addition to the two months allowed by s. 24) within which to appear subject to the conditions set out in the proviso.

Held, also, (varying the decree of the lower Court) that document A should not be copied as an annexure to document B. If document A were in the nature of a schedule or appendix to document B, then the two documents could be registered as one; but as they appeared to be two distinct documents separately stamped and executed for different objects, they could not be so registered. The Registrar had no power to ensure what document was referred to in the document he was asked to register. If he could not register the two documents as one, neither could the Court do so under s. 77.

APPEAL from Fulton, J. (2).

Suit under s. 77 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) to compel registration. The plaintiff prayed for a direction that a certain document (Ex. B) with its accompaniment (Ex. A), both of which were annexed to the plaint, should be registered in the office of the Sub-Registrar within thirty days of the passing of the decree.

Exhibit A was dated the 11th January, 1895, and was an agreement of equitable mortgage of certain lands for Rs. 50,000 to the plaintiff signed by the first defendant for himself and as attorney for his father (defendant
No. 2), and by one Motichand Haranath.

Exhibit B, which was also signed by the first defendant for himself and as attorney for his father (defendant No. 2) and by the said Motichant Haranathji, was in the following form:—

"We, Haranathji Ranaji, of Marwar and Tullochchand Haranathji and Motichand Haranathji, of Bombay, agree with you, Goobbhoy Mulchand, of Bombay, that we will register the accompanying document as required by the Indian Registration Act, 1877, [726] and shall do all acts and things necessary or expedient therefor, and, in case we fail to do so, we shall pay whatever you can claim under the accompanying document if the same had been registered.—Dated 11th January, 1895."

Subsequently to the execution of these documents the plaintiff lodged Ex. A alone for registration, and after some difficulty in obtaining the necessary admission of execution from the defendants and Motichand he obtained an order from the Registrar for its registration. He, however, failing to present it again to the Sub-Registrar for registration within thirty days after that order (see s. 75 of the Registration Act), and the Sub Registrar accordingly refused to register it when it was presented.

On the 5th September, 1895, plaintiff lodged document B, with A as an annexure to it, in the office of the Sub-Registrar to be registered, and the Sub-Registrar, being authorized to exercise the powers of the Registrar in that behalf (Government Gazette, 1887, Part I, p. 980), accepted B for registration on payment of a penalty under s. 24 of the Registration Act III of 1877. After several attempts to procure the attendance of the executing parties before the Sub-Registrar the plaintiff finally got Motichand Har-ath to admit execution of document B before the Sub-Registrar, and it was registered as against him on 6th January, 1896. The first defendant.

Tullockhand appeared on the 7th January, 1896, before the Sub-Registrar, but declined to admit execution, and registration of B was, therefore, refused as against him on the 8th January, 1896.

The plaintiff appealed on 25th January, 1896, to the Registrar under s. 73 of the Registration Act III of 1877 against this refusal. The first defendant in answer to a summons issued by the Registrar appeared with his solicitor before the Registrar on 25th February, 1896, and admitted execution of document B, but raised objections to its registration, and on the 9th April, 1896, the Registrar refused to register it.

The following were the reasons entered by the Registrar for his refusal to register document B:

"The agreement is of the same date and refers to the same property as the mortgage. Under these circumstances is the agreement sufficiently distinct from the mortgage to constitute a separate document? I find the following objections to consider the agreement a separate document:

[727] 1. If the mortgage is treated as a separate document, there is in the agreement no evidence to show to what property the agreement refers.

2. If the mortgage is recorded in the registration book as an annexure to the agreement, such record will constitute a registration of the mortgage.

3. If by this means the mortgage is registered it will make of no force the stipulation contained in s. 75 of the Registration Act, that the period of presentation for registration shall be limited to 30 days."

The suit was heard as a short cause by Fulton, J., who held that B being a registrable document, and having been duly presented and accepted, ought to be registered, document A being copied as an annexure (1).

The defendants appealed.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an appeal from the decree of Mr. Justice Fulton passed under s. 77 of the Registration Act (III of 1877) directing the document marked Ex. B in the suit to be registered with the document marked Ex. A in the suit as annexure thereto.

The first question which we deal with is whether the decree directing Ex. B to be registered is correct. The direction that Ex. A shall be registered as an annexure to it, stands upon different grounds.

Exhibit B, which is written on eight annas' stamp paper, is in the following terms:—"We, Haranathji Rupaji, of Marwar, and Tullockhand Haranathji and Motiehband Haranathji, of Bombay, agree with you, Gokulbhoy Muleband, of Bombay, that we will [728] register the accompanying document as required by the Indian Registration Act, 1877, and shall do all acts necessary or expedient therefor, and in case we fail to do so we shall pay whatever you can claim under the accompanying document as if the same had been registered." This instrument bears date the 11th January, 1893. It is not disputed that the accompanying document referred to in Ex. B is the document Ex. A. The latter is an equitable mortgage by way of deposit of title-deeds of a piece of Fazaniumi land in Bombay. The boundaries and description of the land appear on its face.

Now with regard to the agreement (Ex. B) it appears to us to be a personal agreement on the part of the signatories to register a certain specified document, and in default of doing so to pay a specified sum. It cannot, in our opinion, be considered to be a document "relating to immovable property" within the meaning of s. 21 of the Registration Act. It is a mere personal covenant to do a particular act in reference to a particular document. It does not either itself create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish any right, title or interest in immovable property or purport to do so, nor does it create a right to obtain another document which will when executed have that effect. It would, we think, be going too far to hold that because the document which the signatories have covenanted to execute relates to immovable property, therefore the agreement which contains a covenant to register it relates to immovable property. If the covenant had been to copy or print the document, it could not have been argued that it related to land. A covenant to register it appears to us to stand upon the same footing. Therefore we come to the conclusion that the decree directing the registration of Ex. B is not erroneous because Ex. B does not contain the particulars prescribed by s. 21. There is nothing on the face of the document (Ex. B) which shows that the accompanying document referred to in it relates to immovable property. The registering officer would, we think, travel out of his functions if he were to institute an inquiry as to what the nature of Ex. A was.

It is, however, objected that the Sub-Registrar directed that on payment of a fine it (Ex. B) should be accepted for registration after the lapse of four months from its execution without inquiring whether the non-presentation of it for registration within the four months was owing to urgent necessity (whatever that may mean in this connection) or unavoidable accident. The defendant did not prove that the document was accepted without inquiry, but he tendered evidence which he alleged would have shown it, and such evidence was not allowed to be given. We agree, however, with the ruling in Durga Singh v. Mathura Das (1) that when a Registrar has made a direction under s. 24 that a document shall be accepted for registration, the Court cannot inquire, under ss. 77 and 74, into the propriety of that direction. If it finds that a direction has been given by the Registrar, it will assume that the Registrar gave the direction on grounds which seemed to him to be sufficient. When that direction has been given, and the fine has been paid, it appears to us that "the requirements of the law on the part of the applicant" have been complied with. No obligation is upon the applicant that the Registrar shall properly perform the duties of his office. If the Registrar is willing to direct the acceptance of the document without inquiry made of the applicant, it is not incumbent on the latter to assign the reasons for his delay. In this case, however, the written statement of the defendants alleges that the plaintiff did explain to the Registrar the reasons for the delay; though it goes on to allege that the reasons so assigned were false.

As to the objection that the plaintiff did not, as required by s. 34, appear before the registering officer within the extended time allowed by

(1) 6 A. 460.
s. 24, we think that the proviso to that section (34) allows the applicant a further period of four months within which to appear, subject to the conditions set out in the proviso. The section is not a lucid one, but that is the meaning which we gather from it. The imposition of a second fine appears to provide for a further delay over and above the delay condoned under s. 24. We think, therefore, that there is no ground of objection established to the decree so far as it directs the registration of exhibit.

[730] Whether the further direction that Ex. A is to be copied into the register as an annexure to Ex. B, gives rise to different considerations. The plaintiff owing to delay failed in getting Ex. A, when presented alone for registration, registered. That circumstance alone would not, we think, stand in the way of the plaintiff getting the combined document made up of Exs. A and B registered if the registration of it as a combined document is not open to objection upon other grounds. The question appears to us to be purely academical, as we do not think that it will make the slightest difference to the plaintiff’s rights, or the defendant’s obligation under Ex. B, whether Ex. A is made an annexure to it or not. Whatever rights the plaintiff can enforce under Ex. B he can enforce whether Ex. A is or is not copied out in the Registrar’s book. If Ex. A were in the nature of a schedule or Appendix to Ex. B, then we think that the two documents could be registered as one; but to us they appear to be too essentially distinct documents separately stamped and executed to effect different objects. If the Registrar could not register them as one document, neither can, we think, the Court do so under s. 77. Could the Registrar do so? We think not. Before the Registrar can register two documents as one, we think that they must be connected together by reference and thus incorporated into each other. We think the Registrar has no power to inquire into what is the separate document to which the document which he is asked to register refers. Thus for example if the agreement were to reprint the book or copy the picture now on the table, the Registrar could not register the book or the picture as part of the agreement, but if the agreement were to reprint the book annexed to the agreement, or to copy the picture of which a photo was annexed to the agreement, he could do so. If oral evidence has to be adduced under s. 99 of the Evidence Act to show what the agreement relates to, we think that the Registrar is not authorized to take it. Where the book to be reprinted is not sufficiently described, a dispute might arise as to what the book to be reprinted was. Surely the Registrar could not be called on to settle the dispute. His duty should be confined to ascertaining whether the agreement was executed or not, and should not [731] be extended to ascertaining what the subject-matter of the agreement consisted in. If he can make the inquiry when there is no dispute, we cannot see why he should not be at liberty to make it when there is a dispute. Neither duty is imposed upon him by the Act. Sections 34 and 35 define and limit the extent of his duties. It does not seem to us that it makes any difference that the subject-matter of the agreement is another document, and that the agreement is to register it. The only connection between them is that the one is the subject-matter of the other. They are in no sense one document. We think, therefore, that the decree ought not to have directed that Ex. A should be registered as an annexure to Ex. B, and that to that extent it should be varied.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

Kashinath Sakharam Kulkarni (Original Plaintiff), Applicant v. Nana and Another (Original Defendants), Opponents.*

[18th February, 1896.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s.622—High Court, interference by—Mamlatdar—Jurisdiction.

The plaintiff sued in a Mamlatdar’s Court for possession of certain land, alleging that the defendants held them under a lease, the time of which had expired. The Mamlatdar found the execution of the lease proved, but held it to be colourable, and that the defendants did not hold under it. He, therefore, rejected the plaintiff’s claim. The plaintiff applied to the High Court in its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule to set aside the order, contending that the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to decide that the lease was colourable, and that he ought not to have admitted evidence upon that point.

Held (discharging the rule) that the matter was not one for the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). The Mamlatdar had not declined jurisdiction. He had considered materials laid before him and had come to a conclusion. That conclusion, if erroneous, ought to be corrected in a regular suit and not by an application to the High Court under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

[732] APPLICATION under the High Court’s extraordinary jurisdiction (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code. Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Saheb Annaji Ganesh Tilak, Mamlatdar of Nipbad.

The plaintiff sued the defendants in the Mamlatdar’s Court to recover possession of certain land which (he alleged) the defendants held under a laun kabulayat (lease), the term of which had expired.

The Mamlatdar found the execution of the kabulayat proved, but rejected the claim, holding that the kabulayat was merely colourable, and that the defendants did not hold under it.

The plaintiff applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi to set aside the order of the Mamlatdar on the grounds (inter alia) that the execution of the kabulayat being admitted by the defendants, the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to try the question of its being colourable or otherwise; that he ought to have held that the defendants could not dispute the plaintiff’s title, and that he should not have admitted any oral evidence to contradict or vary the terms of the kabulayat.

Mahadeo B. Chakravart appeared for the applicant (plaintiff) in support of the rule:—The kabulayat sued on being admitted, and held proved by the Mamlatdar, it was not open to him to go into other questions—Patel Kilabhai v. Haroojan (1), nor could the defendants impugn the kabulayat as colourable. The Mamlatdar has considered points which can be determined only in a regular civil suit.

There was no appearance for the opponents (defendants).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—In this case the Mamlatdar has come to the conclusion that the defendant is not in possession of the land under the laun kabulayat upon which the plaintiff relies as proving the defendants’ tenancy and its termination within six months of suit. Upon this finding of the Mamladhar, his decision that he cannot dispossess the defendant is correct.

It has been argued before us that the Mamladhar has wrongly admitted evidence, and that upon the evidence and admissions [733] made before him he was bound to come to a different conclusion and to hold that the defendants did hold the land under the lāvni kabulayat or at all events that the defendant was estopped from saying that he did not. That is an argument which could properly be addressed to us, a Court of appeal, if an appeal lay to this Court; but we think that we ought not, when our extraordinary powers under s. 622 are invoked, to exercise them in such a case. The Mamladhar has not declined jurisdiction. He has considered the materials laid before him and has come to a conclusion adverse to the plaintiff's case. That conclusion, if erroneous, ought, we think, to be corrected in a regular suit and not by an application under s. 622 and especially so when no substantial injustice appears to result from the Mamladhar's decision. We discharge the rule.

Rule discharged.

YESU KOM KRISHNA SUTAR AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Appellants v. SITARAM, SON AND HEIR OF THE DECEASED GOVINDA SUTAR (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [18th February, 1896.]

Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bom. Act III of 1874), s. 4†—Amending Act (Bom. Act V of 1886)§—"Hereditary office"—Village sutar—Hindu law—Bombay Government Resolution No. 512 of 1892."

The duties with which s. 4 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bom. Act III of 1874) deals, are confined to duties in which Government as being responsible for the administration of the country is directly interested.

* Second Appeal No. 126 of 1896.
† Section 4 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bom. Act III of 1874) (IV) In this Act, unless there be something repugnant in the subject or context. "Watan property" means the moveable or immovable property held, acquired, or assigned for providing remuneration for the performance of the duty appertaining to an hereditary office:
- It includes a right to levy customary fees or perquisites, in money or in kind, whether at fixed times or otherwise;
- It includes cash payments in addition to the original watan property made voluntarily by Government and subject periodically to modification or withdrawal.
- "Hereditary office" means every office held hereditarily for the performance of duties connected with the administration or collection of the public revenue, or with the village police, or the settlement of boundaries or other matters of Civil administration;
- the expression includes such office even where the services originally appertaining to it have ceased to be demanded.

§ Amending Act (Bom. Act V of 1886) s. 2:
- Every female member of a watan family other than the widow of the last male owner, and every person claiming through a female, shall be postponed, in the order of succession to any watan, or part thereof, or interest therein, devolving by inheritance after the date when this Act comes into force, to every male member of the family qualified to inherit such watan, or part thereof, or interest therein.
- The interest of a widow in any watan or part thereof shall be for the term of her life or until her marriage only.

§ Bombay Government Resolution No. 512 of 1892:
- Bombay Act III of 1874 does not appear to be applicable to village servants useful to the community. All the sanads granted to village servants useful to the village [734] The definition of "hereditary office" does not extend to duties of a carpenter, which though useful to the village community are not matters with which Government has any direct concern.

Held, therefore, that the village sutar (carpenter) does not hold an "hereditary office" within the meaning of that section.

SECOND appeal from the decision of S. Tagore, District Judge of Sutara, confirming the decree of Rao Saheb S. S. Wagle, Subordinate Judge of Karad.

The plaintiff sued for possession of certain service inam land, alleging himself to be the nearest male heir of the last holder of the said land. The service for the performance of which the land was held was that of village carpenter.

The plaintiff alleged that the land in question had belonged to his cousin Yamaji bin Bapuji Sutar, who died in 1887 leaving only a daughter (defendant No. 1) who was in possession. He claimed as the nearest male member of the watan family to be entitled to the land.

The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to the land and passed a decree in his favour.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge confirmed the decree. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"With regard to issue No. 3 (is the plaintiff entitled to inherit in preference to defendant No. 1?) I find that under s. 2 of Act V of 1886, which amends Bombay Act III of 1874, females other than the widow of the last male owner are to be postponed to males in regard to succession to watan property. Plaintiff is admittedly the nearest male relative of the deceased Yamaji, and is, therefore, entitled to inherit the property in preference to defendant, the daughter of the deceased. On these grounds [735] the Collector has refused to register the name of defendant No. 1 in the watan register, and the plaintiff's name has been entered in place of the deceased watandar (Exs. 28, 29). It is contended that the death of Yamaji having occurred before the Amending Act came into force, the defendant's right of inheritance was not affected, but this contention is untenable. Act V of 1886 came into force in January, 1887, whereas the date assigned in the plaint of Yamaji's death is March, 1887. This statement is not traversed by the defendants, and the objection now taken was not raised in the Court below, nor is any such objection taken in the grounds of appeal. It cannot, therefore, be now entertained."

The defendants preferred a second appeal.

Sadashiv R. Bakhat (for Balaji A. Bakhat) appeared for the appellants (defendants):—We say that the land in question here which was granted for rendering service as village carpenter is not watan property, and the Watan Act is not applicable. Section 4 of the Act defines watan property. A carpenter's duty has no connection with the administration or collection of public revenue, &c.—Nairne's Hand-book, p. 525. Service inamars are divided into three classes—patels, kulkarnis and Mhars. Patels and kulkarnis are directly concerned with the administration or collection of public revenue. The Mhars are classed as watandars, because they have to fix boundaries of villages.

Sutars are called watandars, because they are useful to the village community and not to Government. Government Resolution No. 512 of community prohibit alienation of the property to which they relate. Under the terms of the settlement, land which ceases to be held as remuneration for service to the village community may be resumed. Venkatrao's Commentary to the Hereditary Offices Act, p. 106).

1882 (1) has laid down that the Watan Act is not applicable to persons who are useful to the community—Bala Kakaji Shet Shimpji v. Nasrud-din (2); Fatu valad Walibai v. Dhondi valad Babaji (3).

Vishnu K. Bhalekhkar appeared for the respondent (plaintiff).—The Watanars' Act makes no distinction between classes of watandars. All classes of watandars are governed by the Act. The watan in dispute would be included in Part X (Inferior village hereditary offices) of the Act. Section 64 of the Act invests the Collector with the power to register the names of the watandars and to determine their rights and duties, and in the present case the Collector has exercised this power as is shown by Exs. 28 and 29.

[736] [Farran, C. J.—You must bring the land in dispute within the terms of the Watan Act.]

Under the old system every village had balutedars, and a carpenter was one of them. Accoding to that system a carpenter was connected with a part of the civil administration, and, therefore, his service inam would fall under the definition given in the Act. Civil administration means civil administration in contrast with ecclesiastical administration—Grant Duff's History of the Marathas, Vol. I, p. 23.

Sadashiv B. Bakkhe in reply.—A carpenter has got nothing to do with civil administration. Part X of the Watan Act applies only to inferior classes of watandars such as Ramoshis, who are village watchmen. The Collector's order, Ex. 29, would have no binding effect if it be found that the Watan Act not applicable to the watan in dispute.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—The decision of this appeal turns upon the clause in s. 4 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act which interprets for the purposes of the Act the expression "hereditary office."

The defendant is the daughter of the deceased Yamaji Sutar, who was the last holder of the service inam land claimed in the plaint. The service, for the performance of which the land is held, is that of village carpenter. The plaintiff, who is the cousin of the deceased Yamaji, claims to recover the land from the defendant on the ground that he, and not the defendant, is the heir of the deceased in respect of this service inam property. No special custom is set up.

The ordinary Hindu law must govern the case, unless the provisions of Bombay Act 111 of 1874, as amended by Act V of 1886, by which females other than the widow of the last male holder are to be postponed to males in regard to succession to "watan property," are applicable to it. "Watan property" is defined to mean "property held for providing remuneration for the performance of the duty appertaining to an hereditary office." The question, therefore, is not as put by the lower [737] Courts whether a "sutar" is a village officer, but whether he holds an hereditary office as defined by the Act.

Now "hereditary office" means every office held hereditarily for the performance of duties connected (a) with the administration or collection of the public revenue, or (b) with the village police, or (c) with the settlement of boundaries, or (d) other matters of civil administration. It is clear that a carpenter does not perform duties connected with (a) or (b) or (c). Does he then perform duties connected with other matters of civil administration? Are the duties of a carpenter those of civil administration? We think not. The duties with which the section deals appear to be confined to duties in which Government as being responsible for the administration of the country is directly interested. The definition does not appear to us to extend to those duties, which, though useful to the village community, are not matters with which Government has any direct concern. This is the view which Government took of the question in 1882 (see Bombay Government Resolution No. 512 of 1882), and is, in our opinion, the correct one. As long as the duties of the village carpenter are performed, it is not material whether they are performed personally or by a deputy. Lands held for the performance of the duties of a Kazi have been held not to fall within the meaning of this Act, but for another reason—Baba Kakaji v. Nassarud-din (1). The precedent is, therefore, only valuable as showing that the scope of the Act is not to be extended beyond its apparent application. The orders passed by the Collector (Exs. 28 and 29) are not binding upon the Civil Courts. He has, as we think, unduly extended the meaning of the Act. We must, for these reasons, reverse the decrees of the lower Courts, and dismiss the suit with costs.

(1) See 21 B. 784. (4) 18 B. 103. (3) P. J. (1884), p. 182.

Decree reversed.

AMARCHAND HINDUMAL AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Applicants v. SAVALYA AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Opponents.* [18th February, 1896.]

Mamlatdar—Jurisdiction—Lease—Death of lessee during the term—Possessory suit against lessee's heirs after the determination of the term.

If heirs succeed to their father's rights under a lease, the jurisdiction of the Mamlatdar in a suit for possession arises on the determination of that lease against such heirs as though the original tenant were then alive.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act Xlv of 1882) against the decision of Rao Saboh G. L. Kiledar, Mamlatdar of Parner, in the Ahmednagar District.

The plaintiffs sued in the Mamlatdar's Court to recover possession of land which they alleged they had let to one Bhagu (father of defendants Nos. 1 and 2) and his brother Khandu (defendant No. 3) in lease for five years. Bhagu had died during the term, which expired on the 27th June, 1895. The defendants refused to vacate, and the plaintiff filed this suit on the 5th September, 1895.

The Mamlatdar ordered the plaint to be returned to the plaintiffs on the ground that the lease was not passed in the names of defendants Nos. 1 and 2, but in the name of their father and that of defendant No. 3; and that under the Mamlatdar's Act (Bombay Act III of 1876) he could not receive a suit against heirs.

* Application No. 210 of 1895 under Extraordinary Jurisdiction.

(1) 18 B. 103.
The plaintiffs applied to the High Court, and a rule nisi was issued, calling upon the defendants to show cause why the order of the Mamlatdar should not be set aside.

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni appeared for the applicants (plaintiffs) in support of the rule. — The Mamlatdar refused to entertain the plaint on the ground that a suit will not lie in his Court against the heirs of a deceased tenant. The Mamlatdar wrongly refused to exercise jurisdiction. Defendant Nos. 1 and 2 stood in the place of their father and were liable to be evicted after the expiration of the terms mentioned in the kabulayat.

[739] Mahadev B. Chavval for Dhondu M. Sanzgiri appeared for the opponents (defendants) to show cause. — Section 15, cl. (b), of the Mamlatdar’s Act is applicable to the present case. It shows that the plaintiff can succeed only if the defendant is in possession or enjoyment by a right derived from the plaintiff. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 derived their right from their father. Therefore the plaintiff cannot succeed against them in the present suit. The suit is wrongly framed. The plaintiffs ought to have proceeded against defendant No. 3 alone. Bhagu’s heirs, that is, defendants Nos. 1 and 2, are not plaintiffs’ tenants.

ORDER.

FARRAN, C. J.—The Mamlatdar is in error in supposing that he has no jurisdiction against heirs. If heirs succeed to their father’s rights under a lease, the jurisdiction of the Mamlatdar arises on the determination that lease against such heirs just as though the original tenant were then alive. The rule must be made absolute. Costs to be costs in the cause.

Rule made absolute.

MADHAVRAM MUGATRAM (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v.
DAVE TRAMBKAL BHAWANISHANKAR AND OTHERS
(Original Defendants), Respondents.* [20th February, 1896.]

Hindu law—Inheritance—Succession—Widow—Widow’s estate —Heirs after widow’s death—Female heirs—Widow of gotraja sapinda—Stridhan.

Narotam and Harjivan were divided brothers. Harjivan died first, leaving a son named Tuliseda. Narotam afterwards died childless, leaving his widow Jasoda, who took possession of Narotam’s property. Tuliseda died childless, leaving only his widow Bai Mani, who succeeded to the property on Jasoda’s death. After the death of Bai Mani the plaintiff, who was the son of Tuliseda’s sister, sued to recover the property from the defendants, who were distant samanodaka relations of Narotam. It was contended on the plaintiff’s behalf that, on Jasoda’s death, Bai Mani took the property as her stridhan acquired by inheritance, and that the plaintiff as bandhu of her husband Tuliseda was heir to Bai Mani, who died without issue.

Held (confirming the decree dismissing the suit), that on Jasoda’s death (Narotam and Harjivan being divided), Bai Mani succeeded to the property as a gotraja sapinda, being the widow of Tuliseda, the nephew of Narotam. As such she took only a life-interest in the property, and had no absolute interest in it as in her stridhan proper.

* Second Appeal No. 76 of 1895.
[740] In the Presidency of Bombay female heirs who by marriage enter into the gotra of the male whom they succeed (including widow, mother, grandmother, the widow of a gotraja saptad, &c.), take only a widow's estate in property which they inherit from the last male owner. Whether the estate inherited by these female heirs is called their stridad or not, their restricted rights over it are admitted by all schools.

SECOND appeal from the decision of R. S. Tipnis, Assistant Judge, F. P., of Surat, at Broach, in appeal No. 73 of 1891.

The following table shows the relationship of the parties:—

Narotam and Harjivan were divided brothers. Narotam was the owner of the immovable property in dispute.

Narotam, who survived Harjivan, died childless, leaving him surviving a widow named Jasoda, who succeeded to his property, and a nephew Tulsidas, the son of Harjivan. Tulsidas died, leaving him surviving his widow Bai Mani. To this Bai Mani Jasoda devised the property in suit. Bai Mani in turn by will bequeathed the property to defendants Nos. 5 and 6, who were the gotraja samanodaks, being descendents of an ancestor of Narotam several degrees removed.

The plaintiff was the son of Harjivan's daughter, Tulsidas' sister, and thus a bandhu of Narotam.

He brought this suit to recover possession of the property from defendants, alleging that it had belonged to Tulsidas Harjivandas; that on his death it came into the possession of his heiress and widow Bai Mani; that Bai Mani died on 3rd September, 1889; that he (plaintiff) being the son of Tulsidas' sister was the next heir according to the custom of the Bhargava Brahmin caste; that Bai Mani had only a life-interest in the property; that if Bai Mani had executed any will, it was invalid and illegal; and that he (plaintiff) was entitled to the property as heir.

Defendants replied that Tulsidas was never the owner of the property in dispute; that on the death of the original owner [741] Narotam, his widow Jasoda succeeded to his estate; that she made a will bequeathing the houses to Bai Mani; that Bai Mani thus became the owner; that Bai Mani by will appointed defendants Nos. 1 to 4 her trustees to dispose of her property; that by this will she had given the property to her pitrais, defendants Nos. 5 and 6; that according to custom and law the pitrais (paternal kindred) of Tulsidas were the heirs and not the plaintiff; and that Bai Mani being the absolute owner had a right to dispose of the property by will.

The Subordinate Judge of Broach found that Bai Mani had no authority to dispose by will of the property in dispute. He also found that the plaintiff was the heir of Tulsidas, observing:—

"Thus, it is satisfactorily proved that according to the prevailing custom of the Bhargava Brahmin caste the plaintiff Madhavram is the proper heir to inherit the property of his maternal uncle Tulsidas and his widow Bai Mani, after their death, in preference to their pitrais Tuljaram and Kakubhai, defendants Nos. 5 and 6."
He, therefore, passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff, awarding him possession of the property claimed.

In appeal the Assistant Judge, F. P., at Broach reversed this decree and dismissed the suit.

From this decision plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

RANADE, J.—The contest for succession to the two houses in dispute in this case lies between the appellant (plaintiff), who is a bandhu (sister’s son) of deceased Tulsidas, and respondents (defendants) Nos. 5, 6, who are distant samanodak agnate relations of the same Tulsidas, and of his uncle Narotumdas.

This Narotumdas was the original owner of the two houses. He had a brother named Harjivan, who died before Narotum, and Tulsidas was Harjivan’s son. Narotum’s widow Jasoda gave the two houses in dispute by her will to Tulsidas, and on Tulsidas’ death during Jasoda’s life-time, she made a second will in favour of Bai Mani, widow of Tulsidas. Bai Mani in her turn made a will in favour of respondents Nos. 5, 6, and appointed the other respondents as trustees.

Plaintiff was Harjivan’s daughter’s son, and as such, relying chiefly on a caste custom, he brought his suit to recover possession of the two houses in respondents' possession. In this suit, plaintiff claimed to be Tulsidas' heir as bandhu in preference to respondents [743] Nos. 5, 6, who were distant samanodaks agnates. The respondents denied the alleged custom, and claimed to be heirs under the general Hindu law, as also owners of the property under Bai Mani's will. The Court of first instance found that the alleged custom was proved. It also found that Narotum and Tulsidas were united in interests, and that, on Jasoda's death, Bai Mani was under the general law Narotum's heir, in right of being Tulsidas' wife, and finally that plaintiff was Tulsidas' heir. Setting aside Bai Mani's will in respondents' favour, it passed a decree affirming plaintiff appellant's rights.

In appeal, the Assistant Judge did not decide the issue about the alleged custom, but he held that Narotum and Tulsidas were separated in interests, and that Bai Jasoda and after her Bai Mani succeeded only to a widow's estate in the property which devolved on Bai Mani's death to the respondents as heirs of Narotum, the last male owner, both Jasoda's and Mani's wills being operative and invalid. Plaintiff was no way related to Narotum, and his claim was accordingly thrown out.

In the appeal before us, appellant's pleader gave up the original contention by which he sought to establish his right over the property under a special custom as bandhu and heir of Tulsidas. It was urged that Bai Mani was the last full owner, and the houses belonged to her as her stridhan acquired by inheritance, and as such the appellant as bandhu of Tulsidas was heir to Bai Mani, who died without issue. The ruling in Manilal v. Bai Rewa (1) was cited as the chief authority in support of this contention.

By reason of this change of front it becomes necessary to inquire whether the property in dispute was Bai Mani's stridhan in the sense that heirship would have to be traced to it through Bai Mani and her husband Tulsidas, and a special rule of succession would apply excluding the respondents Nos. 5, 6, and giving preference to the appellant as being Bai Mani's heir on account of his being Tulsidas' bandhu under the general law. On a careful consideration of the authorities cited on both sides, I feel satisfied that the appellant's contention cannot be upheld. [744]

Independently of the objection that this claim is opposed to the right set up in the plaint, and that on which the parties joined issue in the lower Courts, there is the consideration that it seeks to re-open a question which has been satisfactorily settled by a long course of decisions, solely on the authority of a ruling which has no direct application to the circumstances of the present case. Accepting the finding of the lower appeal Court on the point of the separation of interests, it is clear that Bai Mani succeeded to the property on Jasoda's death as a gotraja sapinda, being the widow of the nephew of Narotum. A gotraja sapinda widow succeeding to any property under the circumstances stated above takes only a widow's interest in the property and has no absolute interest in the same as in her stridhan property proper. As observed by Mr. Mayne in his work, paragraph 569. "In this Presidency the Courts divide female heirs into two classes: (1) those who by marriage enter into the gotra of the male whom they succeed, and (2) those who are of a different gotra or who upon marriage become of a different gotra." The difference between the two schools relates chiefly to the extent of the rights of this second class; among which may be mentioned the daughter, sister, niece, grand-niece.

(1) 17 B. 756.

As regards the first class, which includes widow, mother, grandmother, the widow of a gotraja sapinda, &c., they only take a widow’s estate in property which they take from the last male owner, husband, son, &c. Whether the estate inherited by these female heirs is called their stridhan or not, their restricted rights over it are admitted by all schools.

A long course of decisions has established this distinction. The earliest case where it was formally recognized and acted upon is Lalubhai v. Mankuvarbai (1), which ruled that in this Presidency the wife is a gotraja sapinda of her husband, and in the absence of specially designated heirs succeeds as heir to a separated sapinda in the same way as her husband would have done. The daughter-in-law’s right to succeed after the death of the widow without issue was upheld in Vithaldas v. Jeshubai (2). (See also Lakshimbai v. Jayram (3)). The distinction between the two classes of female heirs noticed above was solemnly affirmed in Babaji v. [745] Bulaji (4). As regards the daughters, their rights have all along been held to be absolute—Haribhut v. Damodarbhut (5); Bulakhidas v. Keshavlal (6); Jankibai v. Sundar (7). So also the sister’s absolute right has been upheld in Vinayak v. Lakshimbai (8); Dhondu v. Gangabai (9); Biru v. Khondu (10); Bhagirthribai v. Baya (11).

Some doubt has been thrown upon the correctness of these rulings, so far as parties subject to the Mitakshara law are concerned, in Dalpat v. Bhagvan (12), but it leaves the authority of the Mayukha untouched. The restricted character of the estate taken by a widow and a mother or grandmother or gotraja sapinda female heir, is best illustrated by the rulings in Pranivandans v. Devkuvarbai (13), Narsappa v. Sakharam (14) and Sakharam v. Sitabai (15).

The two classes of female heirs being thus distinctly marked, it is clear that Bai Mani as a widow of a gotraja sapinda could not take the inherited property in dispute as her stridhan in the full sense so as to devolve it on her as heir to the heirs in place of the last male owner. Both Courts have held that her alienation of it was invalid. This follows as a corollary from the rulings of the Privy Council in Mussammat Thakoor Deyhoo v. Rai Baluk Ram (16) referred to in Harilal v. Pranvaluandas (17), and Mutta Vadampramada Tevra v. Dorasinga Tevra (18) referred to in Dalpat v. Bhagvan (12).

The only authorities to the contrary are the ruling in Vijiaram v. Lakshman (19) and the ruling chiefly relied on by the appellant’s pleader in Manilal v. Bai Rewa (20). In this last case the property in dispute was arrears of maintenance due to a wife from her husband, while the authority of the ruling in Vijiaram’s case has been considerably modified by subsequent decisions. There was no dispute in the first case about inherited immovable [746] property, and the opposing claimants were the daughters and husband of a deceased woman. I do not think that this authority has any application to the circumstances of the present case. The Assistant Judge appears, therefore, to have correctly decided the present case when he rejected the appellant-plaintiff’s claim.

It is admitted now that no heirship can be traced through Tulsidas by reason of plaintiff’s being his bandhu, as Tulsidas was separated and never succeeded to the property. It, therefore, does not seem necessary to remand the case back to the lower Court for a finding on the issue about the alleged custom.

I would accordingly confirm the decree and reject the appeal with costs.

JARDINE, J.—The facts to which this Court has to apply the law are the following. Narotam and Harjivan were divided brothers, and Narotam was the owner of the houses, the property in suit. Narotam, who survived Harjivan, died childless, leaving him surviving a widow named Jasoda, and a nephew Tulsidas, the son of Harjivan. Tulsidas died, leaving him surviving a widow Bai Mani. To this Bai Mani Jasoda devised the property in suit. The defendants Nos. 5 and 6 are gotraja samanodakas, being descendants of an ancestor of Narotam several degrees removed. The plaintiff is the son of Harjivan’s daughter, Tulsidas’ sister, and thus a bandhu of Narotam. He sued for the houses, averring that they had belonged to Tulsidas. The Assistant Judge has found to the contrary that the last male owner was Narotam. The Assistant Judge dismissed the suit on the ground that at Hindu law the samanodakas and not the bandhu of Narotam are entitled.

Mr. Vasudev Gopal Bhandarkar argued here that the houses became the stridhan improper of the childless widow Mani, as would follow from the dicta of Telang, J., in Manilal v. Bai Rewa (1), and that the same dicta showed that in default of children the heirs would be the same as the heirs to stridhan proper among whom the husband’s sister’s son is placed in the Vyavahara Mayukha, for which we were referred to West and Bühler, 519.

I agree with Mr. Justice Ranade that we cannot treat those dicta as equal to a decision, and that we ought not to go contrary [747] to the decisions such as Harilal v. Pranvaladas (2), which restrict the widow’s dominion over immovable property inherited from a husband.

As the Assistant Judge has found as a fact that the houses never were the property of Tulsidas, there is no reason for requiring a finding on the issue as to the special custom of the Bhargava Brahman caste alleged by the plaintiff whereby he says a sister’s son is treated as a nearer heir than relatives connected by descent from a remote common ancestor such as the defendants Nos. 5 and 6. The Court confirms the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

GAMBHIRMAL AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiffs), Appellants v.
HAMIRMAL (Original Defendant), Respondent.* [20th February, 1896.]

Partition—Maintenance—Mortgage—Assignment of the mortgaged property as maintenance of a widow—Subsequent redemption of the mortgage—Widow entitled to the redemption money.

A field held in mortgage by the family of the parties was assigned to a widow in the family for her maintenance when the family divided. The mortgage money was subsequently paid into Court in pursuance of a decree for redemption.

Held, that it was clear on the assignment that the widow was entitled to the money just as she was entitled to the field, i.e., to the usufruct of it for her life.

SECOND appeal from the decision of A. Steward, District Judge of Ahmednagar, reversing the decree of Rao Saheb K. S. Ruvadkar, Subordinate Judge of Parner.

Three undivided brothers, Hamirmal, Gambhirmal and Gulabchand held certain land as mortgagees. One of them (Gulabchand) died, leaving a widow Rupabai, and on partition of the family property between the two surviving brothers, the mortgaged land was given to the widow Rupabai as her maintenance. In the year 1890 the mortgagor sued to redeem the mortgaged land and obtained a decree for redemption on payment of [748] Rs. 494.1-0. He accordingly paid this amount into Court.
Hamirmal having endeavoured to obtain it for himself, Gambhirmal and Rupabai filed the present suit, claiming that Rupabai only was entitled to it.

The Subordinate Judge allowed the claim, holding that plaintiff
Rupabai alone was entitled to the money.

On appeal by defendant the Judge reversed the decree.

The following is an extract from his judgment:

"I am of opinion that the accident of the mortgage being redeemed, renders it necessary for plaintiff No. 2 on the one hand to give up all claim to the redemption money which should be handed over in equal shares to defendant and plaintiff No. 1 if these two brothers have really become separate and divided in interest; and it renders it necessary for the two brothers on the other hand to make fresh arrangements for her maintenance. The survey number having been redeemed, the arrangements made for the maintenance of plaintiff No. 2 have been determined."

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal.

Govardhanram M. Tripathi, for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The field was given to plaintiff No. 2 (Rupabai) for her maintenance and she enjoyed the income of it. Now the field has been redeemed. The redemption money represents the field, and she is entitled as maintenance to the interest on the redemption money.

Mahadeo B. Chawlal, for the respondent.—The question is whether the arrangement with respect to the maintenance of the plaintiff No. 2 has fallen through owing to redemption by the mortgagor. The mortgaged property was, no doubt, charged with the plaintiff's maintenance, but now the question is whether she has a lien on the redemption money.

* Second Appeal No. 525 of 1895.
We submit that she has not. The mortgage was effected when the family was united: therefore the redemption money belongs to the whole family.

JUDGMENT.

Parsons, J.—A field that was held in mortgage by the family of the parties was assigned to the plaintiff No. 2 for her maintenance when the family divided. The mortgage money has now been paid into Court in pursuance of a decree for redemption, and the question is to whom the money is to be paid. The defendant, a male member of the family, claims one-half of it, it being, according to his contention, joint property divisible between himself and the plaintiff No. 1.

[749] The plaintiff No. 2 claims it as being assigned to her for her maintenance. The plaintiff No. 1 sides with her. We think it is clear on the assignment that the plaintiff No. 2 is entitled to the money just as she was entitled to the field, i.e., to the usufruct of it for her life.

We amend the decree and grant the plaintiff No. 2 a declaration that she is entitled to the usufruct of the money for her life. In the absence of any agreement between the parties the Subordinate Judge should see that the capital amount is secured, so that on plaintiff No. 2's death it may pass intact to those entitled thereto, plaintiff No. 2 being paid the interest only for the term of her natural life. We order the plaintiff No. 1 to bear his own costs and defendant to pay his own costs and to pay a moiety of plaintiff No. 2's costs throughout.

Decree amended.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Parsons.

Dattaji Sakharam Rajadhiksh (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. Kalba Yesse Parabhu and another (Original Defendants), Respondents. [24th February, 1896.]

Hindu law—Widow—Powers of management—Lease granted by the widow for long term of years—Lease voidable on the widow's death, but not ipso facto void—Sust by heir to recover property from lessee six years after widow's death—Compensation for tenants' improvements—Lying by—Landlord and tenant.

A Hindu widow adopted a son, but reserved to herself for life the right of managing her husband's property. The adopted son sold his interest in the property to the plaintiff. In 1885 the widow granted a lease of the property to defendants for fifty-nine years at a rent of Rs 50 a year. She died the following year (1886). The defendants continued in possession of the property under the lease and expended money in improvements. In 1892 the plaintiff as purchaser from the adopted son sued for possession.

Held, that he was entitled to recover and to have the lease set aside, but only on payment to the defendants of compensation for the sum properly expended by them in improving the land after the widow's death.

The lease granted by the widow Janahibai was not ipso facto void, but only voidable by the plaintiff on her death. It did not necessarily determine at her death. That being the legal position of the defendants, the plaintiff allowed the defendants to go on improving the property, and took no steps to warn the defendants until he brought [750] this suit to recover possession.

+ Second Appeal No. 308 of 1895.
His conduct was such as to induce a belief in the mind of the defendants that the lease would be treated as valid. There was not merely a lying by, but a lying by under such circumstances as to induce a belief that a voidable lease would be treated as valid.

SECOND appeal from the decision of H. L. Hervey, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri.

Plaintiff sued for possession of certain property, alleging that in 1875 he had purchased it from one Chitko, the adopted son of one Raghunath Rajadhyaksha, to whom it originally belonged. This suit was filed in 1892.

It appeared that Chitko had been adopted by Raghunath's widow Jankibai, who, at his adoption, had reserved to herself the right of managing her husband's property for her life. She died on the 13th October, 1886, and the plaintiff contended that he then became entitled to possession. He prayed for possession and for mesne profits for three years preceding suit.

The defendants pleaded that by a lease dated 18th June, 1885, Jankibai had let the lands in question to them for fifty-nine years at a rent of Rs. 50 per year, that they had expended a large sum of money in improving the property, and as to the claim for mesne profits they alleged that by Jankibai's directions they had paid the rent to one Vithal Atmaram. They contended that they had a right to retain possession for the period of the lease; but, if not, that the plaintiff should repay them the amount expended in improving the property.

The Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the land, and that he was not bound to recoup the defendants the sums expended in improving the property. He further held that the plaintiff could not recover the rent which the defendants had paid to Vithal Atmaram. He gave the plaintiff a decree for possession with mesne profits from the date of suit till delivery of possession.

On appeal the Judge held that the plaintiff should refund to the defendants the sums expended in improvement. He, therefore, amended the decree by directing "that plaintiff do recover possession from the defendants of the property, together with mesne profits (to be determined in execution) from the date of [751] suit till delivery, on payment to defendant No. 2 of the sum of Rs. 203-3-7" which the Subordinate Judge had found to have been spent by the defendant on the property. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"Nevertheless, defendant No. 2 at once proceeded to spend money in carrying out improvements on the property by planting trees, sinking a well, &c. If he had been conscious of fraud on his own part, or even if he had realized that the validity of his title was doubtful, it appears to me that he would have acted more cautiously. Further, it has been shown that plaintiff after Jankibai's death allowed defendant to go on for some years improving the property, and took no steps to obtain possession until he instituted the present suit. Under these circumstances, I see no injustice in ordering plaintiff to pay a fair sum as compensation for the improvements by which he will benefit, and I am of opinion that defendant No. 2 is in equity entitled to receive such compensation."

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Vasudev G. Bhandarkar, for the appellant (plaintiff).—We are entitled to recover the land without paying the defendants for the improvements. Jankibai had no right to grant the lease. She had only a life-interest. The plaintiff's right accrued at her death. She died in APPEL.

LATE CIVIL.

21 B. 752.

1886, a year after granting the lease, and the improvements were made after her death. The lower Court has made the plaintiff pay the costs of the improvements, because the defendants appear not to have been aware that Jankibai had no power to give the lease. They ought to have ascertained what her power was before taking it. Having failed to do so they cannot now claim the benefit of the lease or compensation for improvements—Act XI of 1855, s. 2; Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 51; Gourgopaul Dutt v. Bissonath Ghose (1); Shaik Husain v. Gowardhanda Parmanandas (2); Sadashiv Bhaskar Joshi v. Dhakubai (3); Radanath Doss v. Gisborne and Co. (4); Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 1032; Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, p. 747.

The defendants did not plead that the plaintiff stood by while the improvements were made. That point was suggested by the first Court, which, however, held that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the improvements. Further, it should be remembered that the defendants have enjoyed the profits of the land [752] which is a sufficient compensation for the improvements they have made.

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni, for the respondents (defendants).—Jankibai was full owner during her life, and the lease is good. She granted it as manager of the property. The plaintiff ought to have asserted his right immediately after her death. If he had done so, the defendants would not have spent money on improvements. But he did not bring this suit for six years, and during all that time allowed us to expend money in improving the land. The improvements made became remuneraive just at the time the suit was brought, and the plaintiff claims to have the benefit of them. He ought to pay for them—Navalchand v. Amichand (5). The defendants are entitled to get compensation—Kunhamed v. Naranjan (6); Yeshwadabai v. Ramchandra (7); Dattatraya v. Shridhar (8); Dunia Lal Seal v. Gopinath Khetry (9); In the matter of the petition of Thakoor Chunder Paramanick (10); Mudhoo Soodun Chatterjee v. Juddoputty Chukerbutty (11); Bai Keser v. Bai Ganga (12).

Vasudev G. Bhandarkar, in reply.—The rule to be applied is the rule in Ramsden v. Dyson (13), Shaik Husain v. Gowardhandas (2). The Judge has not found facts which would entitle the defendant to compensation. Further, there is no evidence in the case to show that we were aware that the improvements were being made. Excepting the circumstance that we did not take steps earlier, the Judge has not found any thing in favour of the defendant and against us. Mere delay in bringing the suit is not sufficient to entitle the defendant to claim compensation. In the pleadings in the Courts below the defendants did not rest their case on the delay in bringing the suit—Woo fall on Landlord and Tenant, p. 9; Premji Jivan Bhat v. Haji Cassum Jooma Ahmed (14). As to acquiescence by us, see Willmott v. Barber (15).

JUDGMENT.

or mesne profits to the plaintiff. The farm lease granted by Jankibai, while the manager of the estate, to Vithal had not been set aside, nor had the plaintiff given notice to the defendant Kalba not to pay his rent to Vithal. The lease granted by Jankibai to Vithal was voidable, not void, on the death of Jankibai, and the defendant Kalba was, therefore, justified in paying his rent to Vithal until he received notice not to do so.

We also agree with the Assistant Judge that equity requires that the plaintiff in setting aside the lease granted by Jankibai to the defendant Kalba should compensate the latter for the money properly expended by the defendant in improving the land after the death of Jankibai. The plaintiff failed to give the defendant notice of his intention to set the lease aside, and it, like that of Vithal, was voidable only by the plaintiff on the death of Jankibai, and was not ipso facto void.

A Hindu widow is not a mere tenant for life. She is invested with a fuller estate and more ample powers of management, and a lease granted by her at a fair rent, as in this case, though for a long term of years, does not necessarily determine at her death. The heir coming in abate her has to show that in granting it she has exceeded her power. That being the legal position of the defendant, the Assistant Judge has found that the plaintiff after Jankibai's death allowed the defendant to go on for some years improving the property and took no steps to warn the defendant or proceedings to obtain possession of the garden until he instituted the present suit. His conduct was such as to induce a belief in the mind of the defendant that his lease would be treated as valid. It is not, it is true, specifically found by the Assistant Judge that the plaintiff knew that the defendant was making these improvements, but he was the owner of the land on Jankibai's death, and there is no reason for believing that he did not keep himself aware of what was being done upon it. The case seems to us to fall within the principle laid down in Stiles v. Cowper (1), which is thus stated by Mr. Woodfall (p. 9) in his work on Landlord and Tenant. "But in a case where the remainderman lay by, and suffered an assignee of an invalid lease to lay out money in rebuilding and might be presumed to have had notice of the fact, Lord Hardwicke directed a new lease with proper covenants to be granted to the assignee for the remainder of the term." Here there is not merely a lying by, but a lying by under such circumstances as to induce the belief that a voidable lease will be treated as binding. We confirm the decree of the Assistant Judge with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPEAL from the decision of Jardine and Ranade, JJ., under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Suit for damages for trespass. The defendants were the Collector of Broach and the Mamladatar of Amod. The suit was filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, and the question raised was whether the acts complained of were done by the defendants in their private capacity or in their official capacity, in which latter case the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit under s. 32 of the Bombay Civil Courts' Act (XIV of 1869).

The plaintiff was the widow of the Talukdar of Kerwada. He died on the 20th October, 1891, leaving a widow (the plaintiff) and a minor son. The patil of the village forthwith reported the death to the Mamladatar (defendant No. 2), who in turn reported it to the Collector (defendant No. 1).

The Collector (defendant No. 1) thereupon issued an order to the Mamladatar (defendant No. 2) to make an inventory of the property of the deceased, and to take measures to secure its safety. In obedience to this order the Mamladatar went to the house of the deceased and made an

† Section 32 of Bombay Civil Courts' Act (Bom. Act XIV of 1869) as amended by Act X of 1876, s. 15, and Act XV of 1860, s. 3:—

32. No Subordinate Judge or Court of Small Causes shall receive or register a suit in which the Government or any officer of Government in his official capacity is a party, but in every such case such Judge or Court shall refer the plaintiff to the District Judge, in whose Court alone (subject to the provisions of s. 19) such suit shall be instituted:

Provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to apply to any suit, merely because—

(a) A Municipal Corporation constituted under Bombay Act No. VI of 1873, or any other enactment for the time being in force, is a party to such suit, and an officer of Government is, in his official capacity, a member of such corporation, or inventory, and locked up some of the rooms, and placed his seal upon certain boxes.

The plaintiff complained that some of her property was also seized and locked up, and she claimed damages for the trespass of the defendants.

The defendants (inter alia) pleaded that the acts complained of were done by them in their official capacity and that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to try the suit having regard to s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869. The Subordinate Judge found that the acts in question were not done by the defendants in their official capacity, and that the Court had jurisdiction to try the suit, and that notice of action was, therefore, not necessary under s. 424 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882). He passed a decree for the plaintiff for Rs. 500 damages. The following is an extract from his judgment:

[766] "The petitions A and B were indeed made to Mr. Allen as Collector of Broach. But it cannot be argued from the oppressed addressing the oppressor 'Oh! Collector Sahib, pray don't oppress me!' that the person addressed is acting in his official capacity. Whether he is acting so or not, is to be seen not from any such thing, but from the fact whether he was or not acting in the discharge of his duties; whether he had or not 'authority or power to act in the matter.' When the Government Pleader said that the Collector on hearing of the late Thakore's death required the Mamlatdar to make an inventory of his effects, and to put them under lock and seal, he was asked under what law or authority did he do so, but he gave no satisfactory answer to this. If the petitions A and B purport to be addressed to Mr. Allen as Collector of Broach, it is as clear from them as this fact that the petitioner spoke therein not only of the Mamlatdar acting unauthorized and in an arbitrary manner, but also of the Collector himself acting so. Petition B says: 'The reason is quite patent that, as stated in your petitioner's petition of 7th instant, neither your direction for an inventory of the property nor the actions under it are within the purview of the revenue administration, and as such, non-official and absolutely unlawful and arbitrary.' The defendants have as yet failed to show that their acts, even though they might not be under any particular law, are 'within the purview of the revenue administration.'

What made me hesitate in giving my findings at once in favour of the plaintiff was her allegations in para. 7 of her plaint. Therein she says that 'the defendant No. 2, as Mamlatdar of Amod, wrongfully seized the property of the plaintiff in pursuance of the absolutely unlawful direction of the defendant No. 1 as Collector of Broach mentioned above.' As said by the plaintiff's pleader and her counsel, the defendants are sued not in their official, but in their individual, capacity. But, as said by me, I am sure the plaint could not have been drawn up by such a skilful counsel in the way it appeared to have been drawn up. The official capacities, said they, were mentioned merely as descriptive of the defendants. And after reading the petitions A and B, attached to the plaint, I think that the explanation must be taken to be true. And supposing that I am not entitled to take into consideration the contents of the said petitions in judging of the matter, it cannot be gainsaid, that the matter must be judged of not from any isolated expressions in the plaint, but from the plaint taken as a whole. The plaint shows that the gist of the action is not that the defendants acting in their official capacity exceeded their powers, not that they had any authority or power to act in manner or form which they had no authority or power to act in, but that they had no authority or power to act at all in the matter."
The defendants appealed.

Rao Saheb Vasudeo J. Kirtikar (Government Pleader) appeared for the appellants (defendants).

Mainekshah J. Taleyarkhan appeared for the respondent (plaintiff).

JARDINE, J.—The plaint sets forth the circumstances under which this suit was brought after a letter of notice appended to the plaint, by the widow of the Talukdar of Kerwada, in the [757] Court of the Subordinate Judge of the First Class against the Collector of Broach and the Mamlatdar of Amod. The lady claims damages for a continuing trespass; and the Subordinate Judge has awarded to her Rs. 500. The facts are substantially undisputed; the pleader for the plaintiff has stated that she is content with the relief given, and has admitted that there was no improper animus on the part of either defendant, as has also been found by the Court below. It has not been contended that any serious pecuniary or other injury was done.

The facts are that the Talukdar of Kerwada died on the 20th October, 1891, leaving a widow (the plaintiff) and a minor son; and that on the 22nd October, 1891, the Mamlatdar, acting under the Collector’s order, accompanied with divers poons and others, entered the Talukdar’s mansion-house, made an inventory of the moveables, took possession of some belonging to the plaintiff, and locked them up in the premises, and also locked up some of the rooms of the house so as to deprive the plaintiff of her use and enjoyment of the moveables and the rooms. The suit was brought on refusal made to remove the locks and restore the property and rooms.

The main question argued here for the defendants in support of their appeal is whether the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge to try the suit is excluded by s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869. Two objections have been taken. First, it is said that the plaint is suicidal, in that the defendants are described in the heading as Collector and Mamlatdar and that in para. 7 the acts done are said to be done by them as such. The Subordinate Judge has dealt fully with this point, and I concur in his views. The plaint and its appendages are to be considered as a whole; and I am of opinion that the use of the official titles is by way of description only. It is perfectly clear that the intention of the plaint was to sue these public servants, on the allegation that their acts had no real official colour about them. She sought to make them liable in their private capacity; and applying this test to the words about suing in s. 32, and following Banakat v. Narayan(1), I hold that the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction.

[758] Any irregularity in description is immaterial under s. 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure and may be treated as superfluous—Rajah Pedda v. Aroovala (2). The rest of the plaint is not, in my opinion, suicidal—I mean in the sense that the Subordinate Judge was bound, on perusal of it or merely after defendants’ pleading, to refuse jurisdiction under s. 32. Prima facie the act complained of is a wrongful act; and it has been admitted at the hearing that no statute in existence or repealed ever conferred any jurisdiction on the Collector. It may be that on going to trial and proving that the act complained of was, whether tortious or not, done in the course of official duty, the proper course would be for the Subordinate Judge to dismiss the suit on the ground of want of jurisdiction. But this proof is matter of defence like justification under Act XVIII of 1860—Venkat v. Armstrong (1) or in cases about notice under s. 424 of the Civil Procedure Code—Shahebzadee v. Ferguson (2), and to be proved, not merely alleged. Gopi v. Sheso (3) is direct authority on the question of the forum under s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869. The Court there in dealing with the words "in his official capacity" say that "a prosecution by a functionary is official when in carrying it on he is discharging a duty expressly or impliedly assigned to him by law." And at p. 363: "The allegation of an official justification must be made out by the individual sued as a private person, and it must amount to more than a mere pretext or colour, as good faith is required in the discharge of all public functions that affect the persons or possessions of subjects of the Crown. For these reasons we must hold that the defendant, sued as a private person for an alleged wrong to the plaintiff, was rightly sued in the Court of the Subordinate Judge."

(1) 11 B. 370.

Now assuming, in the absence of any decision on the point, that the Subordinate Judge ought, on proof that the acts done by these officers of Government were done in an official capacity, to have dismissed the suit, we have to form an opinion on the evidence and cases as to whether they were acting in an official capacity. The cases I have quoted from Vols. 11 and 13 of our Bombay Law Reports show that mere allegation of a defendant, [760] or his proving the consent or the order of an official superior, does not satisfy s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869. In Gopi v. Sheso the test applied is whether the officer is discharging a duty expressly or impliedly assigned to him by law. This is the ratio decidendi of Waman v. Dip-chand (4) and apparently of Swamirayacharya v. The Collector of Dharwar (5). There must be good faith on the part of the officer as distinguished from mere pretext or colour. There are very few reported cases on s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869 on this point. But those just cited seem to recognize the same principles as have been applied by the Courts to protection by notice. Thus the wider words of s. 424 of the Civil Procedure Code "in respect of an act purporting to be done by him in his official capacity" have been interpreted by the light of the English decisions, Shahebzadee v. Ferguson (2), to some of which I will refer presently. The same introduction of the element of good faith governs the interpretation of s. 86 of the Bombay Municipal Act of 1873—Ranchhod v. The Municipality of Dakor (6) and the corresponding enactment in Bengal—Chunder v. Obhoy (7). Again, in Imperatrix v. Gau (8), we held, after considering many authorities in a case of notice turning on s. 42 of Bombay Act VIII of 1867, that "the protection extends to official acts done in good faith and which may reasonably be supposed to be done in pursuance of official duty, even though legal powers may be exceeded, but not to acts for which there is a total absence of authority." All these decisions show that the Courts will not treat an act as official merely because at the time of doing it, or when defending the suit, the officer asserts, however unreasonably, that his action was official. This view, which is very fully stated in the English cases, is that adopted by the Judge below, although pressed, as this Court has been, by arguments which ignored the decisions; he used more language of hyperbole than was wanted.

This is a convenient place to notice the motive of the defendants' action. It is undisputed that the Collector wished to [760] protect the interest of the minor by making an inventory of the moveable property, conduct which in the cases about the executor de son tort has been held to be friendly, similar to the feeding and caring for the children. All the placing of locks and keys was ancillary to the securing of the moveables, and there was no harshness used, but much respect paid to the feelings and position of the widowed lady. The learned Government Pleader declined to admit that there was any tort. His argument was that talukdars being a seigniorial class receive special treatment from the Government; and that as their minor sons require more instant protection of their pecuniary interest on the death of the father, the Collector has a right to act in the manner charged, as if, irrespective of statute, there was a prerogative of the Crown as pares patriae, which he may exercise under the authority of the Governor in Council. To this Mr. Maneksha replied that the Collector is the creature of statute law; and that the Legislature has made what it thinks sufficient provision by enacting Act XIX of 1841 and Act VIII of 1890. I am of opinion that Mr. Maneksha’s argument is sound; even a Governor’s powers about prerogative matters are limited—Rex v. Symons (1) mentioned in Forsyth’s Constitutional Law, 370. The function of protecting minors and their property has long been vested in the Adalats, and it is hard to understand how the Collector defendant could suppose that he had any authority in the matter except to move the Civil Court.

Some evidence has been given that former revenue officers have acted in the same way as regards the moveable property of deceased talukdars in the Collectorate of Broach and with the approval of the Governor-in-Council. These precedents are but feeble proof of legality, as is said by Lord Denman in Stockdale v. Hansard (2); and I come to the opinion that the acts done are not to be justified by earlier practice in the face of the provision made by the statutes.

The last question is whether the Collector and the Mamlatdar, though not justified by the law, though without authority to act as they did, had any colour or reasonable ground for supposing [761] that they had—Cook v. Leonard (3); Greenway v. Hurd (4); Cann v. Cipperston (5) and other cases collected in Addison on Torts in the Chapter on Notice. Most of these cases as well as those in the Indian books deal with suits about misuse or excess of powers conferred by statute. Here the defendants acted without statute at all. It is not a blunder of construction, as in R. Ragunada v. Nathamuni (6). The Government Pleader has urged that there was an honest belief and that this belief, even if erroneous, was justified by the former precedents. But there was a total absence of authority, which appears to me to bring this case outside the definition of official capacity as the phrase in s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869 is construed in Gopi v. Sheso.

In Spooner v. Juddow (7) the privilege conceded to a public officer of a special forum is treated as a protection. Lord Campbell observes: “Our books actually swarm with decisions * * and there can be no rule more firmly established than that if parties bona fide and not absurdly, believe that they are acting in pursuance of statutes, and according to law, they are entitled to the special protection which the Legislature intended for them, although they have done an illegal act.” The Judicial Committee here evidently apply the decisions about notice to the matter of an exception of jurisdiction. Following so high an authority I am willing, in the absence of reported decisions, to hold that they apply to the exception of jurisdiction made by s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869 and to extend its purview so as to exclude from the Court of the Subordinate Judge those cases of misuse, omission or excess of powers, which lie between a mere foolish imagination and a perfect observance of a statute—Conn v. Clipperton (1). But I do not think the Privy Council, in the language used by Lord Campbell in Spooner v. Judtow or Mr. Justice West in Gopi v. Sheso includes in the exception of jurisdiction cases like the present where there has never been any authority at all under the common law or any statute. Public officers must not be presumed wholly ignorant of such statutes as Act XIX of 1841 and Act VIII of 1890. The distinction of powers and [762] duties of the Collector and the Judge is ancient and well-known. It has been held in England that a mere general persuasion of an officer about his official powers is not enough to confer the protection of notice—Kine v. Evershed (2), and there appears to be no Indian decision which applies the doctrine of protection to a case like the present.

The Collector might under s. 8 of Act VIII of 1890 have moved the District Court for an order under s. 12 for temporary custody and protection of the property. It has been held that when appointed by the Court to take charge of the property of a minor, a Collector is an officer within the meaning of s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869—Narsingrao v. Luzumanrao (3), Mohan v. Haku (4). But the inference is that until appointed he cannot be so regarded. See, too, The Collector of Byinor v. Munwar (5) and Shakesadee v. Fergusson (6).

Owing to a mistake of law, the Collector and the other defendant have, in my opinion, acted wholly without authority. They might have used the power conferred by Act VIII of 1890 and possibly obtained an order. They are liable in damages—Sinclair v. Broughton (7). I would add that although the previous decisions on s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869 show that, if a plaintiff desires to sue a public official in his private capacity, he may bring the suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge or the Court of Small Causes, there will still be a tendency to sue in the District Court which has a plenary jurisdiction. Otherwise the plaintiff takes the risk of his plaint being rejected or a reference made to the High Court; and even if he succeeds in the original Court, the objection to the jurisdiction may have again to be faced in a Court of appeal.

Since the hearing I have considered the older law, s. 43 of Reg. II of 1827. The exception of jurisdiction was made where it appeared "that the defendant is a public servant, and that the suit is brought for acts done by him in his public capacity." Then the Native Commissioner had to send up the [763] suit to the Judge. The change of language made in 1869 does not appear to me to signify any change in the law. I would for these reasons confirm the decree, although I have the misfortune to differ with my brother Ranade on the interpretation of the law.

By operation of s. 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure the Court confirms the decree. Costs on the appellants.

B XI—E6
RanaDe, J.—The chief question that was argued before us by the appellants' pleader relates to the jurisdiction of the lower Court to entertain this suit under the bar created by s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869. The question is one of the proper forum, and not of the protection of the officer concerned. These two points do not appear to have been sufficiently distinguished by the learned Judge of the lower Court. He held that the question of his own jurisdiction to try the suit depended for its decision, on the question whether the Collector, Mr. Allen, had authority or power to act in the matter. If the act was done under no law or authority, it could not, in the Subordinate Judge's opinion, be said to have been done in the Collector's or Mamlatdar's official capacity as such Collector or Mamlatdar, and, therefore, it was their private act, and in respect of such an act the Collector and the Mamlatdar could be sued as defendants in the Subordinate Judge's Court. The Subordinate Judge held that defendants had failed not only to show that their act was supported by any particular law, but that it fell within the purview of the revenue, judicial, or any other administration.

I am unable to accept the correctness of this description of the defendants' conduct in the present case. The plaintiff herself in her plaint charged defendant No. 2, as Mamlatdar, with having seized her property in pursuance of the absolutely unlawful direction of the defendant No. 1, as Collector of Broach. It is true that in her petitions A and B, plaintiff gave an indication that she intended to sue the defendants in their private capacity. The first question, which the lower Court had to decide, was thus, whether, under the circumstances, this intimation could by itself change the character of the suit. This Court has held that even where an amendment had been made in the plaint itself to the effect that a certain [763] forest officer was sued in his private, and not in his official, capacity, such an amendment did not remedy the defect of jurisdiction. Such description by the plaintiff in his suit, (or as in this case in supplementary petitions), cannot alter the character of the suit "which must be determined from the contents of the plaint itself, and a consideration of the position occupied by the defendant"—Waman v. Dipchand (1). To the same effect are the decisions in Wamanji v. Balkrishn (2) and Martand v. Mahadji (3).

It is indeed suggested in the judgment of the lower Court that in all these cases the officers concerned were alleged to have misused the powers conferred upon them by law, whereas in the present case, there was no such law or authority which conferred any power on the defendants to interfere in the way they did. And in support of this view, reference was made by the respondent's pleader to Bankat v. Narayan (4) and Gopi v. Sheso (5) where this Court recognized a distinction between an officer's private and official acts. In one of these cases, the officer concerned was sued for defamation, and in the other for malicious prosecution. These acts were held by this Court to be private and personal acts of the officers concerned, and as such rendered them amenable to the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge's Courts.

Accepting the test laid down in Waman v. Dipchand, it must be seen whether the defendants' act in this case can be regarded as falling within the category of the acts complained of in that case, or in Wamanji v. Balkrishn and Martand v. Mahadji, or within the class of cases referred to in Bankat v. Narayan and Gopi v. Sheso. The question for consideration, it must be again noted, is not a question of the legality or otherwise of the act, but a question of the proper forum, the power of the Court to adjudicate upon the legality or otherwise of the act. The acts complained of are that the defendant No. 2, by the order of defendant No. 1, went to plaintiff's place soon after the death of her husband, the Thakore, and in [766] the presence of plaintiff's men made out lists or inventories of the deceased Thakore's property and the property in plaintiff's possession, both of which were admittedly mixed up together, professedly, in the interest of his minor son, and put locks and seals upon some room or rooms in plaintiff's occupation along with plaintiff's locks and seals. It is admitted that no undue severity was shown on the occasion, and that no pressure was put upon the plaintiff or her men in the performance of this process of temporary sequestration. It is admitted also that if the defendant No. 1 had first moved the District Court, and had then, under the powers conferred by Act XIX of 1851 and Act VIII of 1850, proceeded to make out the lists and place locks upon the boxes and rooms, defendants' acts would have been perfectly justified. The report of the defendant No. 1 to his official superior, the Revenue Commissioner, shows that an application to the District Court was contemplated as an accompaniment to the making of the inventory, and it further appears that the Revenue Commissioner and also the Government approved of the steps taken by the Collector. The proceeding in anticipation of the orders of the District Court was no doubt irregular and unusual, but the immediate question before us is whether the making of the inventory and the locking up of the rooms were, by reason of this omission, private and personal acts of the defendants, or whether they were performed by them as such officers in their official capacity. The Collector, when he is appointed to take charge of a minor's estate, is so appointed in his official capacity as Collector, and he cannot, as such, be sued in the Subordinate Judge's Court for acts done or omitted as guardian and administrator—Narsingh v. Luxumnara (1); Mohan Ishwar v. Hakku Rupa (2). The Collector's proceeding as Municipal Commissioner has been similarly held to be an act done by him in his official capacity—Gangadhar v. The Collector of Ahmednagar (3). To the same effect is the ruling in Swamirayacharya v. The Collector of Dharwar (4), where the Court held, without deciding whether the act complained of [766] (the destruction of certain testimonials) was right or wrong, that the District Court alone was the proper forum to inquire into the question of legality. The power of the lower Court to inquire into the question whether defendants' act was right or wrong, presupposes that it had jurisdiction to inquire into such a complaint against an officer for such an act committed by him.

All the cases decided under Act XVII of 1850 that have been reported, whether plaintiffs succeeded in establishing the illegality or abuse of power, or whether they failed to do so, appear to have been instituted in the District Courts, or on the Original Side of the High Courts. I have not come across a single case where officers have been sued for acts purporting to be done in their official capacity in the Subordinate Judges' Courts: see Amiappa v. Moulavi Mahomed (5); Shahebsadee

v. Fergusson (1); Sinclair v. Broughton (2); Spooner v. Juddow (3); Collector of Sea Customs, Madras v. Punniar Chithambaram (4); Seshaiyangar v. R. Raghuwatha Row (5); Vinayak v. Bai Itcha (6); Venkat Shrinivas v. Armstrong (7); Meghray v. Zakir Hussain (8).

I cannot bring myself to believe that if the question of the power of the Subordinate Judges’ Courts to entertain such suits depended entirely on the proof or otherwise of want of legal authority, no objection would have been taken to the institution of these suits in the District Courts in cases where the defendants were shown to have acted illegally and ultra vires.

The English decisions under local Acts, which require notice to be given to public servants when they are sued in respect of acts performed by them in pursuance of, or in execution of, their statutory powers, are very useful as guides in determining the principles on which protection to such officers may be granted or disallowed. They are not of such use when the question is one of the jurisdiction of Subordinate Courts over certain class of persons in respect of a certain class of acts. The Subordinate Judges’ Courts are not Courts of plenary jurisdiction. The English law recognizes a distinction between the Judges of Superior Courts and Judges of Inferior Courts of Record. In regard to this last order of Courts, it has been laid down that the Judge of such a Court must have before him some cause of action into which he has by law, authority to inquire, or his proceedings will be extra judicial—Addison on Torts, p. 654, 6th Ed. In regard to revenue officers and tax collectors, it has been held that if a tax is not legally payable, but is demanded bona fide by a tax collector who intends to act rightly, and has fair and reasonable ground for his belief that he has authority, such a Collector is entitled to the statutory protection (Addison on Torts, p. 779). It will be otherwise if the same Collector takes a bribe, or extorts money under colour of authority. The distinction here pointed out is really the same distinction which has been noticed above as having been made by this Court between private and official acts—Waman v. Dipchand, Wannaji v. Balkrishna, Bankat v. Narayan, and Gopi v. Sheso. The statutory notice referred to in these Acts corresponds to the provisions of s. 424 of the Civil Procedure Code. This provision does not furnish any clue to the order of Courts in which such suits must be brought. That is a separate question by itself, to be determined by a consideration of the class of persons and the acts of such persons complained of. The question of the legality or illegality or warrant of authority has to be raised and decided before a properly constituted Court, and it appears to me to be begging the question to make the Court’s jurisdiction depend upon its first assuming to itself and exercising the power of deciding the merits of the case, as has been illustrated in the present case. The English cases—Norris v. Smith (9), Cook v. Leonard (10), Kine v. Evershed (11)—only lay down the principle on which protection should or should not be given to a public officer sued in his official capacity for alleged irregularities or abuse of power. The common law on the subject has been enacted in Act XVIII of 1850 in this country, and [768] these decisions are of great value in interpreting the provisions of that enactment. There is no distinction between the English and Indian law on the subject of the protection to be given to Judicial and Revenue officers. But the provision which limits the jurisdiction of Subordinate Judges' Courts in respect of certain classes of persons and certain acts of such persons has nothing corresponding to it in English law. This limitation is of very old standing, and was obviously laid down for other reasons than those which regulate the limits of just protection. The test of the application of this limitation must be other than one which turns on illegality or want of authority. This test must depend upon the character of the person and the nature of the act, and its surrounding circumstances. Judged by this test, there is nothing in the order of defendant No. 1 to make an inventory of the minor's property which was in itself so completely beyond the limits of his official duties as to suggest that the act was, like a private assault or defamation, his own unofficial personal misconduct.

For all these reasons, I am satisfied that the lower Court was in error in assuming to itself a jurisdiction which did not belong to it. The conduct of the defendant No. 1 in subsequently filing a written statement in his private capacity, and raising the same defence again, did not confer on the lower Court a jurisdiction which it did not already possess.

I am of opinion accordingly that the decree of the lower Court must be reversed, and the plaint returned to the plaintiff to be filed in the proper Court.

The Judges having thus differed, and the decree of the Subordinate Court being confirmed under s. 375 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), the defendants preferred an appeal under the Letters Patent, and the case was argued before a Full Bench composed of Farran, C. J., and Parsons and Candy, JJ.

Rao Saheb Vasudeo J. Kirtikar (Government Pledger) appeared for the appellants (defendants).—The evidence shows that it has been the practice in the district for the Collector to take charge of the property of a minor Thakore on his father's death. That is what was done here. The defendants acted simply in their official capacity. The death of the Thakore was, according [769] to practice, reported by the Patel to the Mamlatdar, who in his turn made a report to the Collector. The Collector directed the Mamlatdar to make an inventory of the property and to take precautions for its safety. The Mamlatdar gave due notice to the plaintiff that he was going to make the inventory. He subsequently made the inventory and looked up the property. He gave to the plaintiff what she claimed to be hers. The matter was duly reported to Government, and it passed a resolution (Ex. 81) on the 14th November, 1891, approving of the action taken by the Collector. In all these proceedings the Collector acted in his official, and not in his private capacity. The plaint itself admits (paragraph 7) that the acts done by the defendants were done by them in their public capacity. Under these circumstances s. 32 of the Civil Courts' Jurisdiction Act (Bombay Act XIV of 1869) is applicable, and the suit ought to have been brought in the District Court. The expressions "public capacity" and "official capacity" are synonymous. The defendants acted as agents of Government, and, therefore, as public officers—Waman v. Dipchand (1); Wammaji v. Balkrishna (2); Martand v. Mahadi (3); Swamirayacharya v. The Collector of Dharwar (4).

(1) P. J. (1888), p. 121.
(3) P. J. (1888), p. 122.
(4) 15 B. 441.
Manekshah J. Talevarkhan appeared for the respondent (plaintiff).—The Mamlatdar took possession of the plaintiff's property as well as the minor's property. It is admitted that some of the plaintiff's property was taken and locked up, and notwithstanding our application to the Collector it was kept in attachment. We contend that neither the Collector nor the Mamlatdar had any authority to take possession of the property of the minor and much less to take the plaintiff's property. The defendants acted beyond the scope of their authority and, therefore, they are personally liable. No doubt when a Government officer is sued in his official capacity, the suit must be brought in the District Court. But the defendants here are not sued in their official capacity: therefore, the Subordinate Judge's Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The test is whether the Collector acted as the agent of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State would be liable only when the Collector does an act within the scope of his authority and not otherwise—Addison on Torts (7th Ed.), p. 95.

As to the allegation that it is the practice for the Collector to take possession of a minor Thakore's property, we contend that an illegal practice cannot authorize an act which itself is illegal. The petal no doubt reports the death in his official capacity, but that report does not justify the Collector in seizing the property. The power to take charge of a minor's property is given to the Court under special enactments, but the Collector cannot take any action in the matter on his own authority. It cannot be said that the Collector acted within the scope of his authority, though improperly. If a Court acts without jurisdiction, the order passed by it is an invalid order. But it is acting within its jurisdiction it may do an act which is wrongful and yet it may be protected—Wamnai v. Balkrishna (1); Gopi v. Sheso (2), Shahebzde v. Fergisson (3).

JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Full Bench was delivered by Parsons, J.—The decision of this appeal depends upon the meaning to be attached to the words "any officer of Government in his official capacity" which occur in s. 32 of the Bombay Civil Courts' Act, 1869, which enact that "No Subordinate Judge or Court of Small Causes shall receive or register a suit in which the Government or any officer of Government in his official capacity is a party." That section was founded upon a provision contained in the older legislation upon the same subject, which is to be found in s. 43 of Reg. II of 1837, which barred the Native Commissioner from taking cognisance of suits brought against a public servant for acts done by him in his public capacity.

These provisions are not exceptions or plea intended for the protection of officers of Government. They are limitations imposed for what may be styled reasons of public policy upon the jurisdiction of Courts of lower grade than the Court of the District Judge to whom such lower Courts are directed to refer the plaintiff in cases coming within the purview of the section. The [771] decisions, therefore, upon statutes which confer immunity on, or afford protection to, officers or public bodies acting or purporting to act in a certain capacity do not appear to us to afford assistance in dealing with questions which arise under the above section.

(1) P. J. (1888), p. 122. (2) 12 B. 358. (3) 7 C. 499.
Upon the construction of the section it has been ruled, and we agree with that ruling, that the question cannot be determined by the description given by the plaintiff himself of his suit. He cannot select the forum of jurisdiction by a statement that he sues the officer of Government not in his official capacity but as a private individual. This question of the Court in which the suit is to be tried must be determined from the contents of the plaint and a consideration of the position occupied by the defendant—Waman v. Dipchand (1). The same ratio decidenti was observed in Swamirayacharya v. The Collector of Dharwar (2), where the Court looked to see not whether the acts were legal or illegal, but whether the acts done by the Collector were done by him in his official capacity.

The substance of the plaint in the present case is this. The first defendant is described as the Collector of Broach, and the second defendant as the Mamlatdar of Amod. The plaintiff is the widow of the Thakore Raising. She says that, on the death of Raising, defendant No. 1 directed defendant No. 2 to make an inventory of the property left by the deceased, and that the defendant No. 2 came and took possession not only of the property of the deceased, but of the personal property of the plaintiff, viz., cash, clothes, ornaments, &c., of the value of Rs. 35,000. The cause of action is put down as accruing against both the defendants on or about the 22nd October, 1891, the date on which defendant No. 2 as Mamlatdar of Amod wrongly seized the property of the plaintiff in pursuance of the absolutely unlawful direction of the defendant No. 1 as Collector of Broach. Plaintiff prays for Rs. 5,250 damages for the wrongful seizure of her property and for its restoration.

From this it will be seen that the defendants are expressly sued for acts done by them in their capacity as officers of Government—the one as Collector, the other as Mamlatdar. The [772] evidence taken in the case also shows that the defendants acted throughout as officers of Government in their official capacity. The Thakore died on the 20th October, 1891. The pateel of the village reported his death officially to the Mamlatdar (defendant No. 2), and the Mamlatdar reported it officially to the Collector (defendant No. 1). The Collector issued an official order to the Mamlatdar to go and make an inventory of the property of the deceased Thakore and take precautions for its security. He also made an official report of what he had done to the Revenue Commissioner (Ex. 80, 26th October, 1891). The Revenue Commissioner sent on the report to Government, and Government passed a resolution on the 14th November, in which they approve of the action of the Collector. In obedience to the order of his official superior, the Mamlatdar went to the house of the deceased Thakore, and after giving due notice to the plaintiff made the inventory. It is said that he offered to allow the plaintiff to take what property she required, and he placed his seal of office on the boxes, &c., in which the rest of the property was locked up.

It has been argued before us that the acts of the defendants were wholly illegal and unjustified by any Act or Regulation, and that, therefore, they cannot be official acts. This argument, however, begs the whole question. An official act is not necessarily a legal act; it may be a most illegal one. The Legislature has not, as we have pointed out, in the section under discussion given any immunity or protection; all it has done is to provide a particular forum for the trial of suits against Government officers for acts done by them in their official capacity. The question then turns not on whether the acts were legal or illegal, right or wrong, justifiable or unjustifiable, but on whether the acts were or were not official acts: acts, that is to say, done by the officer acting and purporting to act in an official capacity. In the present case there can, we think, be no possible doubt that the defendants were acting officially.

We, therefore, reverse the decrees of the lower Courts and order the plaint to be returned to the plaint for presentation to a proper Court. We order the plaintiff to pay defendants’ costs throughout.

Decrees reversed.

[773] APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

BUDHO (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. KESO AND ANOTHER (Original Defendants), Respondents.* [25th February, 1896.]

The patel and kulkarini of a village having impressed a pair of bullocks belonging to the plaintiff for the use of an akbari inspector, the plaintiff sued them for damages in the Court of a Subordinate Judge. The defendants pleaded (inter alia) that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to try the suit under the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876).

Held, that the suit was properly instituted in the Court of the Subordinate Judge, as the defendants were sued in their private capacity.

It is not clear that the rules about impressment of carts found in Chap. I of Nairne’s Revenue Hand-book actually order the village patel to impress carts against the owner’s will: neither is it clear what officers are to be supplied. There is nothing to show that any law ever imposed this duty on a kulkarini, or that provision was made after the repeal of the Regulation of 1818 as regards patels except for military bodies.

SECOND APPEAL from the decision of G. C. Whitworth, District Judge of Khandesh. The defendants, who were the police patel and the Kulkarini of a village, impressed a pair of bullocks belonging to the plaintiff for the use of a district akbari inspector. The plaintiff sued them in the Court of the Subordinate Judge to recover damages for their wrongful act.

The defendants pleaded that under the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876) the Subordinate Judge’s Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit.

The Subordinate Judge held that he had jurisdiction and awarded the plaintiff’s claim.

In appeal the District Judge reversed the decree and referred the plaintiff to the District Court. In his judgment he said:—

“When this appeal was first argued before me, the question of jurisdiction was considered mainly with reference to the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act (X of 1876). I have had the point re-argued to-day with reference to the Bombay Civil Courts Act, 1869. Section 32 of this Act seems to me to bar the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge. It is argued that the defendants are not sued in their official capacity, because they were not legally entitled to do the act complained of. But there would... be no [774] occasion for this provision of law at all if it were not meant to cover the cases of acts which though not justifiable, are yet done in an official capacity. Besides, it seems to me clear that the patel and kulkarni were acting in their official capacity when they impressed carts for a Government officer’s use. And, indeed, it is a part of the complaint that they did the act by virtue of their official position (amalache balane). If they were actuated by spite or by any improper motive in impressing the plaintiff’s bullocks in particular, the case might be a proper one for damages. But still the cause of action would be an abuse of official power and not a private act.

From this decision the plaintiff preferred a second appeal to the High Court.

Shivarm Vishal Bhandarkar, for the appellant-plaintiff.—Defendants were not sued in their official capacity, and the Subordinate Judge has jurisdiction: see William Allen v. Bai Shri Dariaba (1), The defendants had no power to impress the bullocks—In re the petition of Rakhmaji (2); Bankat Hargovind v. Narayan (3); Gopi v. Shesho (4).

Balaji Abaji Bhagavat, for the respondents-defendants.—Officers, such as the patel and kulkarni, are required to render assistance to Government officers: see Act II of 1843, s. 2, and Bombay Act III of 1874, ss. 83 and 84. The acts of the defendant, therefore, were done in their official capacity.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—We do not think that the plaint shows on the face of it that the suit was one which under s. 32 of Act XIV of 1869 could only be instituted in the Court of the District Judge. The authorities show that the plaint suing an official in his private capacity is not bound in the first instance to go to that Court. It is open to the defendant official when sued in his private capacity to allege and prove as a defence that the act done, whether tortious or not, was done in the discharge of a duty expressly or impliedly assigned to him by law—Gopi v. Shesho (4). In that case also it is said that the allegation of an official justification must amount to something more than a mere pretext or colour.

We do not think it a justification that an abkari officer ordered the bullocks to be taken by force. We do not understand why the District Judge considered the act of impression official. [775] Regulation IV of 1818, s. 52, was repealed long ago. Regulation XXII of 1827, Chap. 7, only applies to military forces on the march. As remarked by the Subordinate Judge, the rules about impression of carts found in Chapter I of Nairne’s Revenue Hand-book were held in In re the petition of Rakhmaji (2) not to have the force of law. It is not clear that these rules actually order the village patel to impress carts against the owner’s will, neither is it clear what officers are to be supplied. There is nothing to show that any law ever imposed this duty on a kulkarni, or that provision was made after the repeal of the Reg. of 1818, as regards patels, except for military bodies. The decision in Rakhmaji’s case was passed in 1885; and we think we must treat the law as generally known, and hold that the defendants patel and kulkarni did not act with due care and attention or under colour of office in seizing the plaintiff’s bullocks. The Court reverses the decree of the District Judge and restores that of the Subordinate Judge, with costs of both appeals on the respondents.

Decree reversed.

CHINAYA (Original Applicant), Applicant v. GANGAVA AND ANOTHER (Original Plaintiff), Opponent.* [3rd March, 1896.]

Execution—Decree—Mamlatdar—Disposition of a third person not a party to suit—Jurisdiction of Mamlatdar—Remedy of a person so dispossessed—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 622—Practice—Procedure.

G. got a decree for possession against P. in a Mamlatdar’s Court. In execution the Mamlatdar directed the ouster of C., who was in possession and who was not a party to the decree.

Held, that the Mamlatdar’s order for the execution of the decree by the ouster of C. was without jurisdiction, and that it should be set aside under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the order of Rao Sabeb S.V. Menseenkai, Mamlatdar of Belgaun.

[776] Suit for possession. One Gangava kom Nagappa Pujari sued Parapa bin Irana for possession of certain land. At the hearing of the suit, the present applicant Chinaya bin Sidapa applied to be made a party on the ground that the suit was collusive and brought in order to deprive him of the land which was his and in his possession. The Mamlatdar rejected his application and on the same day (20th June, 1895), allowed the claim on the defendant’s admission and passed a decree for the plaintiff. On the 8th August the Mamlatdar issued an order to the village officers to execute the decree, but the applicant successfully resisted execution and informed the Mamlatdar to that effect on the 13th August, 1895, submitting that he was not liable to be dispossessed in execution of the decree. On the 31st August, 1895, the Mamlatdar again issued an order to the village officers to execute the decree, and they having proceeded to execute it, the applicant applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi to set aside the order of the Mamlatdar. The rule now came in for hearing.

Vasudeo G. Bhandarkar appeared for the applicant in support of the rule:—Wo ought not to be dispossessed. The decree was passed in a suit to which we were not a party. We are, therefore, not bound by it. The Mamlatdar made an order for delivery of possession by any person who might be in possession. He had no jurisdiction to pass such order (Nathekha v. Abdul Alli (1)), and the High Court may set the order aside under s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Balaji A. Bhagawat appeared for opponent No. 1 (plaintiff) to show cause:—This rule must be discharged. If the applicant has been wronged, his remedy is by suit, not by application under s. 622—Kasam Sabeb v. Maruti (2); Govinda v. Naiku (3).

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The order of the Mamlatdar of the 31st August, 1895, directing execution of the decree obtained by the opponent in a suit against his tenants by the ouster of the applicant who was no party to that suit, was beyond the jurisdiction of the Mamlatdar— Nathekha v. Abdul Alli (1).

[777] We reverse the order. If, however, the applicant has actually been dispossessed under that order, his remedy to recover possession is as pointed out in Kasam Saheb v. Maruti (2), by suit either before the Mamlatdar or in a Civil Court.

We give applicant his costs in this Court.

BHAI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Applicants v. DADE KRISHNAJI BHAGVI (Original Plaintiff), Opponent. *
[3rd March, 1896.]

Mamlatdar—Jurisdiction—Remedy as between joint owners.

In execution of the decree obtained in 1896 in a Civil Court the plaintiff and the defendants were put into joint possession of certain land. The plaintiff subsequently brought this suit in the Mamlatdar’s Court to recover possession of the said land, alleging that the defendants by taking copra from trees standing thereon had dispossessed him of the said land otherwise than by due course of law. The Mamlatdar held that the plaintiff had been thereby dispossessed, and passed a decree ordering the defendants to deliver up possession of the land to the plaintiff, together with the trees growing thereon.

Held, that the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to pass the decree. The Civil Court had passed a decree giving the parties joint possession of the land, and the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to override that decision and to place the plaintiff in exclusive possession. By the decree of the Civil Court they were determined to be joint owners, and the remedy in case of unequal possession or taking of produce was a suit for an account or for partition.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (s. 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Sahib M. S. Vinekar, Mamlatdar of Malwan in the Ratnagiri District, in a possessory suit under the Mamlatdar’s Act (Bombay Act III of 1876).

The plaintiff sued the defendants in the Mamlatdar’s Court to recover possession of certain land, alleging that the defendants had dispossessed him otherwise than by due course of law by taking copra from certain trees standing on the land on the 30th June, 1895.

[778] The defendants replied that under a decree in civil suit No. 571 of 1886, to which the plaintiff was a party, they were in the year 1888 put into possession of the land in suit jointly with the plaintiff, and that they had been in enjoyment of the said land and its produce ever since.

The Mamlatdar passed a decree directing the defendants to deliver up possession of the land together with trees standing thereon to the plaintiff, holding that the defendants had by taking the fruit of the trees dispossessed the plaintiff of the land.

* Application No. 248 of 1895 under the Extraordinary Jurisdiction.

(1) 18 B. 449.

(2) 13 B. 552.
The defendants applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi to set aside the decision of the Mamlatdar, contending (inter alia) that the Mamlatdar had no jurisdiction to make a decree against the applicants (defendants) contrary to the order of the Civil Court in the matter, and that joint possession of the whole thikan having been lawfully delivered to the applicants, they had as much right to enjoy the thikan and to take the fruit of the trees growing on it as the opponent (plaintiff) himself.

Manekshah J. Taleyarkhan appeared for the applicants (defendants) in support of the rule.—We rely on Magan Manikchand v. Vithal valad Hari (1); Mahadaji Karandikar v. Hari D. Chikna(2).

Ghanasham N. Nadkarni appeared for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause.—The Mamlatdar’s order is correct. Plaintiff and defendants are co-partners and they are in possession of different portions of the thikan.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—The effect of the decree in suit No. 571 of 1886 when executed, as it was on the 30th October, 1888, was to place the parties in joint possession of the property, the subject of that suit. The Mamlatdar has entirely overlooked this and has assumed to himself a jurisdiction to override that decree and to place the plaintiff in exclusive possession of the land in dispute, together with the trees standing thereon. This he had no jurisdiction to do. The rights of the parties must be held to be governed by the decree. By it they are determined to be joint owners, and the remedy in the case of unequal possession or [779] taking of produce must be remedied by a suit for account or a suit for partition. In such a case the Mamlatdar has no jurisdiction to interfere. The exercise by a joint owner of the right he has over the joint property is not a dispossession of the other joint owners.

We make the rule absolute, reverse the decree, and dismiss plaintiff’s suit with costs throughout.

Rule made absolute.

YONOSUKE MITSUE AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. OOKERDA KHETSU (Defendant).* [31st July, 1897.]

Costs—Right of successful plaintiff to costs—Plaintiff recovering less than Rs. 2,000—Presidency Small Cause Court Act (XV of 1882), s. 22—Amending Act (I of 1895), General Clauses Act (I of 1862), s. 6—Construction—Practice—Procedure.

In this suit the plaintiffs recovered a total sum of Rs. 1,907 from the defendant for breach of contract. The suit was brought in 1894. It was contended for the defendant that s. 22 of the Presidency Small Cause Court Act (XV of 1882), which was in force at the date of the institution of the suit, applied to the case, and that under that section the plaintiffs although successful were not entitled to their costs.

(1) P. J. (1890), p. 159.
(2) 7 B. 332.
* Suit No. 187 of 1894.
Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover costs. The power to award costs is derived entirely from Acts of the Legislature, and in making the award the Court cannot base its decision on provisions which have been repealed and are no longer effective at the time its order is passed.

Held, also, that s. 6 of the General Clauses Act (I of 1869) did not apply to this case.

Ismaiel v. Leslie (1) not followed.

[R., 6 Ind. Cas. 1015 = 13 O. C. 152.]

THE plaintiffs, who were residents of Tokio in Japan, sued by their agent in Bombay to recover from the defendant two sums, viz., Rs. 129-14-7 and Rs. 5,835-3-5.

The first sum (Rs. 129-14-7) was alleged to be due in respect of a consignment of cotton made by the defendant to the plaintiffs, the sale of which did not realize sufficient to cover the amount of the bill drawn by the defendant against it.

[780] The second sum (Rs. 5,385-3-5) was damages claimed by the plaintiffs in respect of another consignment of cotton made by the defendant not according to sample.

Starling and Russell, for plaintiffs.

Lang (Advocate General) and Macpherson, for defendant.

The Court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the said sum of Rs. 129-14-7 and also the sum of Rs. 1,778 as damages in respect of the second claim of the plaintiffs.

Lang (Advocate General) contended that, under s. 22 of Act XV of 1882, the plaintiffs were not entitled to their costs, having recovered less than Rs. 2,000; that the amending Act I of 1895 did not apply to this suit, which was instituted in 1894. He relied on s. 6 of the General Clauses Act (I of 1869).

Starling, contra.

On the question of costs the judgment was as follows:

JUDGMENT.

FULTON, J.—The question whether the plaintiffs are entitled to costs is one of considerable nicety. The learned Advocate General contended that they were not entitled, inasmuch as the suit having been instituted in 1894 was governed by s. 22 of Act XV of 1882 as it stood before its amendment by s. 11 of Act I of 1895. On the other hand, Mr. Starling urged that the question of costs being one of procedure must be determined by the law in force at the time of the decision.

The material part of s. 22 of Act XV of 1882 is as follows:—"If any suit cognizable by the Small Cause Court, other than a suit to which s. 21 applies, is instituted in the High Court, and if in such suit the plaintiff obtains, in the case of a suit founded on contract, a decree for any matter of an amount or value less than Rs. 2,000,......no costs shall be allowed to the plaintiff. The foregoing rules shall not apply to any suit in which the Judge who tries the same certifies that it was one fit to be brought in the High Court."

Section 11 of Act I of 1895 provides that in s. 22 of the said Act for the words "two thousand" the words "one thousand" shall be substituted.

It is not disputed that the case is one falling under s. 22. The plaintiff has got a decree for more than Rs. 1,000 and less [781] than

(1) 24 C. 399.
Rs. 2,000. And I do not think it is a case in which I could properly certify for costs if it were governed by the unamended section.

The question, then, to be decided is simply whether the law to be applied in this matter of costs is the law in force at the commencement or that in force at the termination of the suit.

In Ismail Ariff v. Leslie (1) the Calcutta High Court have lately decided in similar circumstances that the old law must be applied. Their Lordships' decision was based mainly on s. 6 of the General Clauses Act of 1868, which is as follows:—"The repeal of any Statute, Act, or Regulation shall not affect anything done or any offence committed or any fine or penalty incurred or any proceedings commenced before the repealing Act shall have come into operation."

Now it appears to me that it is impossible in this Presidency, having regard to the previous course of decisions, to adopt this ruling. It cannot, I think, be said, without using the language of the section in a sense not hitherto generally attributed to it in this Presidency, that the amendment of a section of an Act is the repeal of a Statute, Act, or Regulation. In one sense no doubt the alteration of a law always necessitates the repeal, pro tanto, of the older law. But in this Presidency it has, I believe, been the practice of this Court, in cases not expressly falling within the wording of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, to apply the principle that when new arrangements come into force for regulating procedure they operate on pending as well as on future suits. This principle was adopted in Pramji v. Hormasji (2) and has been followed in later cases since the passing of Act I of 1868; as for instance in Shivram v. Konidub (3); and in Jasraj v. Chudasama Vakhatsang (4), in which Sargent, C.J., said: "I cannot doubt that the general rule, as stated by Lord Blackburn in Gardner v. Lucas (5) that alterations in the form of procedure are always retrospective unless there is some good reason or other why they should not be, is applicable." In the case of Ratanchand v. Hanmantrao (6), it is true, when certain regulations (782) governing appeals from decrees of Subordinate Courts had been repealed by Act XIV of 1869, it was held that the case of pending suits was governed by s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, but in that case the language of the section was apparently applicable, and, besides, the new Act contained no provision for appeals from decrees already passed, and, therefore, left it to be inferred that they were to be treated under the old law. In Gangaram v. Punamchand (7) which came before Chief Justice Farran and myself, we held that the repeal in an amending Act of s. 73, of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act was not the repeal of a Statute, Act or Regulation within the meaning of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act and applied the principle above referred to, which it is obvious could have no effect whatever if every amendment of the law fell within the provisions of s. 6.

Possibly if the matter were res integra it might reasonably be urged that every amendment of the law of procedure falls within the spirit of the section, but it is too late, I think, in this Presidency to entertain any such argument. Hereafter in dealing with Acts affected by the new General Clauses Act (X of 1897), in which the word "enactment" is substituted in s. 6 for the words "Statute, Act or Regulation," and in which "enactment" is defined so as to include any provision in any Act or Regulation, a different course of interpretation may perhaps prevail. But even though the construction hitherto put in this Presidency on s. 6 of Act I of 1868 may seem somewhat narrow, consistency, I think, requires that it shall be followed when dealing with the few remaining cases in which the meaning of that section may come under consideration hereafter. However, attention must be called to the fact that when in s. 9 of Act I of 1887 the words "wholly or partially" were inserted before the word "repealed" in cl. (1) of s. 3 of the General Clauses Act, 1868, no similar amendment was made in s. 6. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to make the section applicable to all amendments of the law, it would have been very easy to say so.

(1) 24 C. 399.  (2) 3 B.H.C.R. O.C.J. 49.  (3) 8 B. 345.

In these circumstances I am not prepared to hold that this case is governed by s. 6.

[783] The only other question for determination is whether a question of costs is one of procedure or one affecting vested rights. The answer appears to be supplied by the cases of Freeman v. Moses (1); Grant v. Kemp (2); Wright v. Hale (3); Kimbray v. Draper (4). Of these Wright v. Hale is most frequently referred to. It has been doubted and questioned, but apparently never overruled, and I can see no good reason for not following it in this country. The Legislature when amending s. 22 of the Small Cause Court Act doubtless considered it more reasonable to reduce the limit below which costs in the High Court were not to be allowed, than to retain the former limit. It is difficult, then, to see on what principle the concession should be refused to litigants before the Court at the time it was made, and confined merely to future litigants. The policy of the law being to relieve from the restriction plaintiffs getting decrees for over Rs. 1,000, there seems, in the absence of any statutory bar like s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, no good reason for refusing the relief to persons whose suits were instituted before, but not decided till after the 1st April, 1895.

Moreover, it is difficult to see how it is possible to apply any but the existing law. The power to award costs is derived entirely from Acts of the Legislature, and in making the award the Court cannot base its decisions on provisions which have been repealed and are no longer effective at the time its order is passed. Of course, if pro hac vice the old provisions were kept in force by s. 6 of the General Clauses Act, the case would be otherwise, but in the absence of legislative authority for relying on the old law the Court must, I think, be guided entirely by the terms of the existing law. Its decision cannot be controlled by a law which no longer exists.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to their costs.

FERNANDEZ AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. RODRIGUES AND OTHERS (Defendants).† [20th August, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 30—Permission of Court—Leave of Court when to be given—Practice—Procedure.

In a suit brought under s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) the permission of the Court required by that section may be given subsequently to the filing of the suit.

[F., 22 A. 260; R., 25 M. 399.]

REFERENCE from chambers.

This suit was filed on the 17th December, 1896, by the plaintiffs, who described themselves in the title of the plaint as "the Fabriqueiro and Wardens of the property of the Church of N. S. de Salvacao, on behalf of themselves and all others the parishioners of the said church."

The suit was brought against the Vicar of the said church, the Bishop of Damao and others to have certain funds and properties declared to belong to the parishioners or congregation of the said church, &c., &c.

On the 14th June, 1897, the defendants filed their written statement in which they contended (inter alia) that the suit was not maintainable without permission of the Court under s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and that the requisite permission had not been obtained by the plaintiffs.

On the 29th July, 1897, the plaintiffs took out a summons calling on the defendants to show cause why the Court should not give permission to the plaintiffs (if such permission be necessary) under s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) to prosecute this suit, on behalf of all parties interested in the subject-matter of the suit, and why the Court should not give notice of the institution of this suit by advertisement as provided by the said section.

[785] At the hearing before the Judge in chamber it was contended on behalf of the defendants that under s. 30 the permission of the Court must be given before or at the filing of the plaint and could not be given subsequently, and that the Judge in chamber had no jurisdiction to make the summons in this case absolute.

Macpherson, for defendants showed cause:—The suit is brought under s. 30 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), but leave to sue should have been first obtained—Jan Ali v. Atawur Rahman (1); Jan Ali v. Ram Nath (2); Maharaja of Burdwan v. Tarasundari (3). Leave cannot be granted afterwards—Lutfunnissa v. Nasirun (4); Dhunput v. Paresh Nath (5); Chandulal v. Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882); Hira Lal v. Bhairon (1). The acceptance of the plaint was sufficient permission to sue.

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the Judge below had power to make this summons absolute. Under the old Chancery practice it was not necessary to obtain leave before the trial. The question was considered at the trial, and if the suit was not properly brought it was then dismissed.
That was the practice at first introduced and prevailing in these Courts and it was subsequently enacted in the Civil Procedure Code.

The question raises no point of jurisdiction, and there is nothing which makes it essential that leave should be given before the filing of the suit.
It is a point analogous to that of adding of parties. It is clear that where a suit is defective as to parties the requisite parties can be added after suit filed.

[786] No doubt the proper course is to obtain leave before suit filed, but there is nothing to show that, if this is not done, the omission cannot be supplied. The Civil Procedure Code itself does not make it necessary, and after all it is that which must be our guide.

STRAHEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the word
"sue" used in the section includes the whole suit and everything done in the suit, and, therefore, seems to imply that leave should be given before anything done in the suit. But there is nothing to indicate that when that is not done, the matter should not be set right on the earliest occasion afterwards.

Some sections in the Code which require leave to be given obviously imply that, if it is not given before suit, it cannot be given at all, and the suit must be dismissed. But I do not think that is the case in suits coming under s. 30. In such cases the defect may be remedied at the earliest moment.

B. TYABJI, J.—I have little to add. I have taken the same view from the first. It is really a question of adding parties. On a former occasion in a case of similar character I have added members of a caste both as plaintiffs and defendants. This case is not exactly the same, but I think the principle to be applied is the same.

In construing s. 30 we must look to see if the jurisdiction depends on permission only; clearly here it does not. In the case of Chandulal v.
Awad bin Umar Sultan (2) decided by Strachey, J., the suit was against a foreign prince. Such a case is on a different footing altogether. Prima facie the Court had no jurisdiction in that case. It had none at all, but for the permission given. This, however, is a provision dealing merely with the most convenient way of bringing the proper parties before the Court and has nothing to do with jurisdiction. The interests of justice require that the Court should have such a power as we are asked to exercise here.

Summons absolute.

Vatandar, who is a—Person having an hereditary interest.—Hereditary interest, what is, —Hereditary Offices Act (Bom. Act III of 1874), ss. 4 and 5 j—Amending Act (Bom. Act V of 1886), s. 2 i.

Giriapa by his will devised all his property, which was vatan property, to Venkangauda, a distant cousin. The plaintiff as the nearest heir of Giriapa [788] claimed the property, contending that Venkangauda had not an "hereditary interest" in the vatan within the meaning of s. 4 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (III of 1874), that he was not a "vatandar" capable of taking under the will of Giriapa within the meaning of s. 5, and that the will of Giriapa was, therefore, inoperative.

Held, that Venkangauda had not "an hereditary interest" in the vatan, and that the devise to him was, therefore, inoperative. The expression in s. 4, "persons having an hereditary interest in vatan," means persons having a present interest of a hereditary character in the vatan and does not include persons who may have an spec successionis however remote. "Hereditary interest" means an interest acquired by inheritance as distinguished from an interest acquired by purchase, gift or other modes of acquisition.

[F., 23 B. 715.]

* Second Appeal No. 157 of 1893.
+ Sections 4 and 5 of the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act (Bombay Act III of 1874):

4. "Hereditary office" means every office held hereditarily for the performance of duties connected with the administration or collection of the public revenue, or with the village police, or with the settlement of boundaries or other matters of civil administration;

the expression includes such office even where the services originally appertaining to it have ceased to be demanded;

the vatan property if any and the hereditary office and the rights and privileges attached to them together constitute the vatan.

"Vatandar" means a person having an hereditary interest in a vatan; it includes a person holding vatan property acquired by him before the introduction of the British Government into the locality of the vatan, or legally acquired subsequent to such introduction, and a person holding such property from him by inheritance; it includes a person adopted by an owner of a vatan or part of a vatan, subject to the conditions specified in ss. 33 to 35.

5. (1) Without the sanction of Government it shall not be competent:

(a) to a vatandar to mortgage, charge, alienate or lease, for a period beyond the term of his natural life, any vatan or any part thereof, or any interest therein, to or for the benefit of any person who is not a vatandar of the same vatan:

(b) to a representative vatandar, to mortgage, charge, lease or alienate any right with which he is invested, as such, under this Act.

In the case of any vatan in respect of which a service commutation settlement has been effected, either under s. 15 or before that section came into force, cl. (d) of this section shall apply to such vatan, unless the right of alienating the vatan without the sanction of Government is conferred upon the vatanars by the terms of such settlement or has been acquired by them under the said terms.

+ Section 2, Bombay Act V of 1886:—

2. Every female member of a vatan family other than the widows of the last male owner, and every person claiming through a female, shall be postponed, in the order of succession to any vatan, or part thereof, or interest therein, devolving by inheritance after the date when this Act comes into force, every male member of the family qualified to inherit such vatan, or part thereof, or interest therein.

The interest of a widow in any vatan or part thereof shall be for the term of her life or until her marriage only.
SECOND appeal from the decision of J. L. Johnston, District Judge of Dharwar.

The plaintiff, who claimed to be the heir of one Giripapa, the deceased husband of the first defendant (Chinava), sued for a declaration that the second defendant had been invalidly adopted by the first defendant (Chinava), she having no authority to make the adoption. The parties were Jains.

The defendants pleaded (inter alia) that plaintiff was not the heir of Giripapa, but that in any case he could not succeed, as the property was vatan property and he had forfeited his portion of the vatan, thereby ceasing to be a vatanad qualified to inherit.

At the hearing it was proved that Giripapa had left a will whereby he had devised all his property to one of his relations named Venkangauda, and had forbidden his widow (defendant No. 1) to adopt without Venkangauda's consent. The plaintiff contended that as to vatan property at all events the will was invalid.

The Subordinate Judge found that the adoption of the second defendant having been prohibited by Giripapa was invalid. He held also that, the plaintiff having forfeited his share of the vatan property was no longer a vatanad, and was, therefore, not entitled to succeed to Giripapa's vatan property.

[789] As, however, Giripapa had left other property (not vatan) to which the plaintiff might succeed after the death of the widow (defendant No. 1) the Subordinate Judge passed a decree declaring the adoption of defendant No. 2 null and void as against the plaintiff.

The District Judge confirmed the decree.

The defendants filed a second appeal in the High Court.

The High Court (Sargent, C. J., and Fulton, J.) held that, unless it was found that the plaintiff was entitled to some of the property left by Giripapa, the Court ought not (as there was no other special reason for making it) to make any declaration as to the validity or otherwise of the adoption of the second defendant. As to the plaintiff's claim to the property, Giripapa had left all his property to Venkangauda. As to such part of it as was not vatan, no question could arise between the parties to the suit. As to such part as was vatan, the validity of the devise would depend on whether Venkangauda was a vatanad at the time of the testator's death. If he was not, then the devise would be invalid, and the plaintiff would be entitled, unless he had ceased to be a vatanad at the time of the testator's death. The High Court, therefore, sent back issues on both these points. The following was the interlocutory judgment:

"It has been argued before us on this second appeal that a suit would lie for a declaratory decree setting aside the alleged adoption of the defendant No. 2 quite independently of any claim by the plaintiff to property. The case of Kalova v. Padapa (1) has been relied on by the plaintiff. There the son sought to impeach the adoption, and the Court held that he was entitled to do so, as it would enable him, if successful, to obtain an injunction against any intervention by the alleged adopted son in the performance of the Shrādh and other ceremonies. However, amongst Jains, to which caste the parties belong, there are no Shrādh or other religious ceremonies of any description, and as no other special reason has been assigned for seeking the declaration in the present suit, we do not think that in the absence of any property the Court in the exercise of its discretion ought to make a declaration.

As the testator gave all his property by his will to Venkangauda, no question could arise between the parties, at any rate in regard to property other than vatan property. As to the latter, the validity of the alienation by will to Venkangauda would depend under the Vatandar Act on his being a vatandar at the time of Giriapa's death.

Assuming that such devise would not pass the property to Venkangauda, there still remains the question whether the plaintiff would inherit such property in view of the defendants' contention that the plaintiff had forfeited his right of inheritance. We do not think that either of these questions has been satisfactorily dealt with by the Court below, and, therefore, it will be necessary to send down issues for that purpose.

As to the validity of defendant No. 2's adoption, assuming that plaintiff can impugn it by this suit, we think the decision of the District Court is correct. The law is well settled, as laid down by Sir M. Westropp in Bayabai v. Bala (1), that if the implied authority of the widow to adopt is rebutted by an express refusal on the part of the husband to allow his widow to adopt, the adoption by her is rendered invalid. In this case Giriapa by his will distinctly forbids his widow to adopt without the consent of Venkangauda, which has never been obtained. We must, therefore, send down the following issues:

1. Whether Venkangauda was not a vatandar of the vatan at the time of Giriapa's death?
2. If that is answered in plaintiff's favour, then, whether the plaintiff was precluded by the forfeiture of his share in 1834 or otherwise from inheriting the vatan from Giriapa?

The onus of proving that he was not a vatandar to lie on the plaintiff.

The onus of proving the second issue to be on the defendants.

If the findings on these issues determine that the plaintiff had a locus standi in respect of the vatan, then the decree should be confirmed; if not, the decree must be reversed, and the plaint stand dismissed with costs throughout on plaintiff. Fresh evidence may be taken.

On the first issue the District Judge found in plaintiff's favour, viz., that Venkangauda was not a vatandar, and on the second issue he found that the plaintiff was not precluded by forfeiture from inheriting the vatan property.

The defendants again appealed to the High Court, which again remanded the case to the District Court for a finding on the first of the issues, directing him to "consider whether Venkangauda is a member of this vatan family or not, and whether if he be, he has an hereditary interest in the vatan" so as to constitute him a vatandar within the meaning of the Act."

The District Judge found that Venkangauda was not a vatandar of the vatan at the time of Giriapa's death within the meaning of s. 4 of Bom. Act III of 1874.

The defendants appealed to the High Court.

Scott (with Shivram V. Bhandarkar) for the appellants (defendants).

—The Judge was wrong in holding that Venkangauda was not a vatandar under s. 4 of the Vatan Act. No doubt his relationship was distant, but we contend that any member of the vatan family who might, possibly at any future time, inherit a share of the vatan has an hereditary interest in the vatan and is, therefore, a vatandar within the meaning of s. 4. The term hereditary merely implies the death of a prior owner. It does not necessarily imply lineal descent. Collaterals can come in. The circumstance that Venkangauda's ancestor's share in the vatan was confiscated, would not bar him from inheriting Giriapagauda's share either under his will or independently of it. Section 56 of the Vatan Act is applicable to the present case.

(1) 7 B. H.C.R. App. 1.

Inverarity (with Narayan G. Chandavarkar), for the respondent (plaintiff).—It is only a person with a present interest in the property who can be regarded as having an "hereditary interest" in it, such as sons, grandsons, lineal descendants, &c. The meaning which the appellants seek to attach to the expression is too vague and broad, and it is not warranted having regard to the object with which the Vatan Act was passed.

JUDGMENT.

Farran, C. J.—As we substantially agree with the District Judge in regard to the meaning to be ascribed to the expression "vatandar" as used in the "Bombay Hereditary Offices Act" (III of 1874) the question raised by Mr. Inverarity as to Venkangauda not being entitled to succeed to the vatan under the will of Giriapa being res judicata will not arise.

Section 5 of the Act prohibits a vatandar without the sanction of Government from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise alienating, or assigning any "vatan or part thereof or interest therein" to any person not a vatandar of the same vatan. The will of Giriapa in favour of Venkangauda will, therefore, be ineffectual in so far as the vatan property is concerned, unless Venkangauda [792] is a vatandar of Giriapa's vatan within the meaning of the Act; and the plaintiff, as the nearest heir of Giriapa, will in that case succeed upon the death of Giriapa's widow.

"Vatandar" by s. 4 is defined to mean "a person having an hereditary interest in a vatan." It has not been contended before us that this definition does not apply to the alienee vatandar mentioned in the 5th section, or that a devise by will of the whole vatan does not fall within its scope. So the question for determination is, whether Venkangauda, who is now found to be a distant cousin of the late Giriapa, being descended in the male line from the same common ancestor Giriapa, (see Ex. 87) had when the will of Giriapa came into force by reason of his consanguinity to the deceased and his descent from a common ancestor "an hereditary interest" in Giriapa's vatan.

For the appellants it is argued that any one who is in the direct line of heirship to the original vatandar ancestor or can possibly be an heir to the last vatandar has an "hereditary interest"—and interest by way of heirship in the vatan. Hereditary interest according to this contention is equivalent to a spes successionis however remote. It would embrace heirs in the female as well as in the male line. This interpretation in our opinion gives far too wide a meaning to the expression, and one which, we think, the words do not legitimately bear. It is not correct either under English or Hindu law to speak of the remote expectation which a collateral kinsman has of succeeding to an estate as an interest in the estate. A collateral relation has no interest in the vatan of the present holder. Besides, although there is no preamble to the Act, it is impossible to read its several sections without seeing that one of its main objects is to keep the vatan property intact in the same family, an object which would be readily frustrated if alienation in favour of a person in the female line of heirship were permitted. A field mortgaged or sold to the son of a daughter passes as completely out of the vatan family as if it were alienated in favour of a complete stranger. The same grammatical objection and, though in a lesser degree, the same argument founded upon the object of the Act, exist against extending the expression to all members of the vatan “family” which (s. 2) includes each of the branches [793] of the family descended from an original vatanadar. If, too, “hereditary interest” is read as equivalent to “hope of succession” there would be no warrant for limiting its operation to the members of the vatan family.

The ordinary grammatical meaning of the phrase “persons having an hereditary interest in a vatan” is, we think, best observed, and the object of the Act is certainly advanced by confining it to persons having a present interest of an hereditary character in the vatan. In this sense it would include all the co-sharers for the time being in the vatan estate and probably also the sons of co-sharers, who, according to the principles of Hindu law, by birth acquire an interest in their fathers’ ancestral property. “Hereditary interest” will, thus interpreted, mean an “interest acquired by inheritance” as distinguished from an interest acquired by purchase, gift, or other modes of acquisition. In this sense, subject to the qualifications and explanations contained in the fifth clause of the fourth section, we are of opinion that it is used in the Act.

The result of these protracted proceedings will thus be to establish the title of the plaintiff in the event of his surviving the widow of Giriapa to succeed to the vatan in preference to the defendant. We confirm the decree with costs.

Decree confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Jardine and Mr. Justice Ranade.

PANDU LAKSHMAN MASURBARKAR (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v.
ANUPRANA AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.*

[3rd March, 1896.]

Mortgage—Redemption—Mortgagee purchasing equity of redemption from one without title to it—Adverse possession of mortgagee against true owner of equity of redemption—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), art. 149.

In the absence of any act showing that the mortgagee is asserting himself against the owner of the equity of redemption, his possession is not adverse against the latter as regards limitation. The mere assertion of his claim by the mortgagee would not affect the right of the real owner of the equity of [798] redemption where a person having no right in the property pretends to sell the equity of redemption to the mortgagee.

SECOND appeal from the decision of H. L. Hervey, Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri.

Suit for redemption. In 1863 one Ram Farzand mortgaged with possession the land in dispute to Zilla.

* Second Appeal No. 486 of 1895.
Subsequently Ram Farzand died without issue and his sister Yesu succeeded to his property. She died in 1873, leaving a son Hari and an unmarried daughter Avda.

In 1874 Hari purported to sell the equity of redemption in the land in question to the mortgagee Zilla.

In 1893 Avda sold her interest in the property to the plaintiff Pandu, who now sued to redeem the mortgage of 1863.

Zilla, the mortgagee, being dead, his widow Anpurna and nephew were defendants in the suit. They had been in possession of the mortgaged property since Zilla's death.

The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to obtain possession or redemption, inasmuch as at the date of the mortgage in 1863 Ram Farzand had executed a perpetual lease of the mortgaged property to Zilla. They also contended that Hari and not Avda inherited the property on Yesu's death; that Hari had sold the equity of redemption in 1874 to Zilla; that Zilla and the defendants had ever since been in possession as owners and not as mortgagees, and that the plaintiff's claim was barred by limitation.

The Subordinate Judge of Malvan held that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem on his paying to defendant No. 2 (Zilla's nephew) the sum of Rs. 91.

In appeal the Assistant Judge of Ratnagiri reversed the decree and dismissed the suit, holding that Avda, who was living with her brother Hari, had notice of the sale in 1874 by him to Zilla, and that the plaintiff's claim through her was barred by adverse possession for more than twelve years.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Manekshah, for the appellant (plaintiff).—Yesu took the property as her stridhan when she inherited from her brother the mortgagee Ram Farzand. On her death, therefore, it passed to her daughter Avda and not to her son Hari. Avda took it as full owner—Bulakhidas v. Keshavlal (1); and she has sold it to the plaintiff. No doubt Hari assumed to sell the property in 1874 to Zilla; but Hari had no title whatever, and the transaction did not in any way affect Avda's right. It could not make Zilla's subsequent possession adverse to her. It continued as before to be possession under the mortgage of 1863, which she had the right to redeem. That right would continue for sixty years—art. 148 of the Limitation Act (XV of 1877), and within that period she has sold it to the plaintiff, who now claims to exercise it—Pattappa v. Timmaji (2); Bhagvant v. Kondji (3); Mathurabai v. Gunaji (4); also Ali Muhammad v. Lalji Baksh (5); Tanji v. Nagamma (6); Bejoy Chunder Banerjee v. Kally Prosommo Mookerjee (7) Chinto v. Janki (8). As to the perpetual lease alleged by the defendants, it is a clog in the equity of redemption and the Court will not enforce it—Mahomed Muse v. Jijibhai Bhagwan (9).

Daji Abaji Khare, for the respondent (defendants Nos. 1 and 2).—Avda acquiesced in Hari's sale of the equity of redemption to Zilla in 1874 and was estopped from suing. That estoppel now binds the plaintiff, who claims through her.

JUDGMENT.

JARDINE, J.—The defendant did not plead that the plaintiff is estopped by any conduct of his assignor Avda: and there is no finding that he is. We must, therefore, consider the case as if there was no estoppel.

It has not been seriously disputed that when Yesu died in 1873 her unmarried daughter Avda became the owner of the equity of redemption. The period of limitation is under art. 148 sixty years. The Assistant Judge has held the suit barred by the adverse possession of more than twelve years of the mortgagee in possession.

The first question is whether that possession was adverse. In the absence of any act showing that the mortgagee was asserting himself against the owner of the equity of redemption as in Puttappa v. Timma (1) and in Mathurabai v. Gunaji (2), we are of opinion that it was not adverse. The present case resembles Bhagvant v. Kondi (3) and the two cases there followed, Ali Mohammad v. Lalta Baksh (4) and Tanji v. Nagamma (5). The mere assertion of his claim by the mortgagee would not affect the right of the real owner of the equity of redemption—Bajoy Chunder Banerjee v. Kaly Prosonnu Mookerji (6). It follows, then, that the mortgagee added nothing to what he took from Avda’s brother Hari, who, having no right in the property, and not being the heir of Yesu, pretended to sell to the mortgagee the equity of redemption. That transaction in no way affected the rights of Avda, who was not under any obligation to take any notice of it. The maxim caveat emptor applies. The verdict might have inquired what rights of heirship were conferred by the Indian law.

For these reasons we reverse the decree of the Assistant Judge. It is unnecessary to remand the appeal, as after argument we can decide the matters left undecided below. Whether proved or not, the perpetual lease, being a clog to the equity of redemption, cannot be enforced in equity—Mahomed v. Jibibai (7)—and is not binding on the plaintiff.

We now reverse the decree of the Assistant Judge and restore that of the Subordinate Judge: costs throughout on the respondents.

Decree reversed.

own position. The purchaser becomes a sort of tenant-in-common with the co-parceners, admissible, as such, to his distributive share upon a partition taking place.

2. Such an alienation before partition does not deprive the alienating co-parcener of his rights in the joint family.

3. As the purchaser does not by the death of the vendor lose his right to a partition, so his position is not improved by the death of the other co-parceners before partition.

4. The purchaser like his alienor is liable to have his share diminished upon partition by the birth of other co-parceners if he stands by and does not insist on an immediate partition.

Three undivided brothers, viz., Sidmalapa, Nijlingapa and Murgyapa, were the owners of a certain house which on the 1st August, 1845, Nijlingapa mortgaged with possession to one Shidlingapa. In 1878 the house was vested in the respective sons of the said three brothers viz., Basapa (son of Sidmalapa), Revapa (son of Nijlingapa), and Khubana (son of Murgyapa). In September 1878, in execution of a decree against Basapa alone, the house was sold de nonme (not merely Basapa's interest) to one Gurpadapa. Formal possession was given to the purchaser, but the actual possession remained with the mortgagee (Shidlingapa). After this sale took place no other family property remained in which Basapa had an interest.

Khubana died in 1880 and Revapa died in 1883, no partition having been made between them and Basapa. In March, 1891, Basapa sold his interest in the house to the plaintiff, who in 1892 filed this suit to redeem the mortgage of 1845. The lower appellate Court dismissed the suit, holding that when in 1878 Gurpadapa purchased Basapa's right and interest in the last remaining portion of the family property, Basapa ceased to be a co-parcener with Khubana and Revapa, and consequently took nothing by survivorship on their death, their shares going to Gurpadapa. On appeal to the High Court, [798] Held, that Basapa's rights to succeed to his brothers' shares were not affected by the sale of his interest in the last item of joint family property to Gurpadapa so long as the latter did not proceed to work out his rights by partition. Basapa became entitled on the death of Khubana and Revapa to their respective shares.

SECOND APPEAL from G. Jacob, District Judge of Belgum.

Suit for redemption. The house in question belonged to three undivided brothers, viz., Sidmalapa, Nijlingapa and Murgyapa. On the 1st August, 1845, Nijlingapa mortgaged the property with possession to one Shidlingapa.

In 1878 all three brothers were dead and the house was the property of their sons, viz., Basapa (the son of Sidmalapa), Revapa (the son of Nijlingapa) and Khubana (the son of Murgyapa).

On the 28th September, 1878, in execution of a decree obtained against Basapa alone, the house was sold de nonme (not merely the interest of Basapa therein) to one Gurpadapa. Formal possession was given to the purchaser, but the actual possession remained with the above-named mortgagee (Shidlingapa). After this sale took place no other family property remained in which Basapa had an interest.

Khubana died in 1880 or 1881 and Revapa died in 1883. No partition had previously been made between the cousins.

On the 21st March, 1891, Basapa sold his interest in the house to the plaintiff, and in 1892 the plaintiff filed this suit to redeem the mortgage of 1845. The defendants pleaded that the equity of redemption had been sold in 1878 to Gurpadapa, who had sold it to them.

The Subordinate Judge held that Basapa's original one-third share of the property had been sold in 1878 to Gurpadapa, but that the family being undivided, the shares of Khubana and Revapa had subsequently come to Basapa by survivorship on their respective deaths; that he had sold this two-third share of the property to the plaintiff, who was thereupon entitled to redeem the mortgage. He, therefore, passed a decree for the plaintiff for redemption.

[799] On appeal the Judge reversed the decree and dismissed the suit.

He held that when in 1878 Gurpadapa purchased Basapa's right, title and interest, Basapa ceased to be a co-parcener with Khubana and Revapa and was not in a position when they died to take their shares by survivorship, and that their shares would go not to him, but to Gurpadapa the purchaser.

The following are extracts from his judgment:

"The plaintiff claims through Basapa. The Subordinate Judge found that the house was purchased by Gurpadapa on 28th September, 1878 (Ex. 59), but held that as Basapa's cousins Revapa and Khubana, who were then alive, were not parties to the decree or to the execution proceedings, only Basapa's right, title and interest passed to the purchaser; and finding that Basapa on the subsequent death of his cousins became entitled by survivorship to their shares, he held that plaintiff had acquired from him a two-third share in the house, and was, therefore, as owner of a share of the equity of redemption entitled to redeem the whole.

"This decision cannot, I think, be supported. The purchaser affected to buy the whole house, and seems to have been put in possession by the Court. The possession was not apparently physical, as there was a mortgagee in possession, but the question would arise whether any title claimed through Basapa's cousins would not now be barred by limitation.

"However, that may be, the purchaser would have stepped into Basapa's shoes. If there were more undivided property, and if this house might on partition have fallen within Basapa's share, the purchaser might have been entitled to claim the whole house under his purchase.

"If there was no other undivided property, Basapa, from the date of Gurpadapa's purchase of his right, title and interest, ceased to be a co-parcener with his cousins, and was not in a position when they subsequently died to take their shares by survivorship. Their shares would have gone not to him but to Gurpadapa. The learned pleader for the respondents relies on the judgment in civil suit No. 761 of 1883, (Ex, 62), as showing that Basapa and his cousins were undivided, and that there was other property.

"It may be noted here that as the appellant claimed under Gurpadapa, whose title through Basapa came into existence some years before that decision, he could not be bound by the decision in that suit, as the Subordinate Judge seemed to suppose. It may be added that Chanbasapa and Basapa appear to have been merely formal parties to that suit; and again the decision could not be taken as establishing that Revapa and Chanbasapa were undivided up to the time of their death.

"Then again although the house involved in that suit would appear originally to have formed part of the joint family property, it seems that no contention was then raised that there was any other such property besides the house in dispute in their suit; and it appears that Basapa's interest in the other house had been sold under a decree in 1876, or two years before the purchase of this house by Gurpadapa.

"It is clear, therefore, that at the date of Gurpadapa's purchase, Basapa had no interest in any other joint family property, and there was therefore, no foundation upon which his right to take his cousins' shares, on their death, by survivorship would be based; and he had, therefore, no interest in the equity of redemption which he could convey to the plaintiff, who has thus no right to sue for redemption."

The plaintiff preferred a second appeal.

Dhondu P. Kirloskar, for the appellant (plaintiff).

Babaji A. Bhagvat, for the respondent (defendant No. 2).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The facts of this case, which appear to have been either assumed or found by the District Judge though he has not precisely stated them, are these. The property in suit (a house) originally belonged to Nijlingapa and his brothers Sidmalapa and Murgyapa. The plea for the respondent contends that the District Judge did not assume this original joint ownership though it was found by the Subordinate Judge, but we think that this is not so. If so, the Basapa, Nijlingapa's nephew, would have had no interest in the premises, and the District Judge certainly speaks of the family of Nijlingapa as joint and as owning joint family property.

On the 1st August, 1845, Nijlingapa mortgaged the house with possession to Shidlingapa whom the defendants or some of them now represent. In 1878 the interests of the three brothers, whom we have named, were vested in their respective sons, Basapa, son of Sidmalapa, Revapa, son of Nijlingapa, and Khubana, son of Murgyapa. On the 28th of September in that year in execution of a decree obtained against Basapa alone the house was sold ex nomine and not the mere interest of Basapa therein. Formal paper possession was given to the purchaser Gurpadapa, but actual possession continued with the mortgagee. This was the last item of family immovable property in which Basapa was interested, his interest in the other house which had been similarly mortgaged having been sold in execution of a decree against him in 1876. The District Judge expressly says that, at the date of the [801] sale in 1878, Basapa had no interest in any other joint family property. Khubana died in 1880 or 1881 and Revapa died in or after 1883. There is no evidence of any partition having, in fact, been come to between the cousins before the respective deaths of Khubana and Revapa.

On the 28th March, 1891, Basapa sold his interest in the house to the plaintiff, who in 1892 filed the present suit to redeem the mortgage upon it of 1845. The defendants set up a sale of the equity of redemption by Gurpadapa to them, but its execution has not been established, nor the factum of the sale to the satisfaction of the Subordinate Judge. The District Judge has not dealt with this part of the case. These are the facts.

The Subordinate Judge hold that the family being undivided, the shares of Khubana and Revapa in the equity of redemption in the house in suit vested in Basapa by survivorship on their respective deaths, and that the plaintiff as Basapa's vendee was entitled to redeem the house. He relied upon the judgment in a suit to which the three brothers were parties in 1882 as showing that they were joint at that date, but the District Judge points out that the judgment is not evidence against Gurpadapa or the defendants and this would seem to be so.

The District Judge has held, in the alternative, that if Basapa was separate from his cousins in 1878, the house in suit passed to Gurpadapa by his purchase at the execution sale in 1878, and that the claims of Revapa and Khubana to it have become time-barred. This alternative would, no doubt, defeat the plaintiff's claim through not by the operation of the law of limitation, as Basapa's interest in the house passed to the purchaser and the interest of Khubana and Revapa in it would have centred on the death of the latter in his mother who is still living, and nothing would have passed to the divided brother Basapa. There is, however, no evidence, as we have said, of an actual division between Basapa and his cousins, and the original state of union must be presumed to have continued until the death of Revapa, unless the other alternative, upon which the District Judge relies, bars the right of Basapa by survivorship. This is the main question in the case.

[802] It is argued by the pleader for the respondent that the interest of not only Basapa, but also that of Revapa and Khubana, passed by the execution sale in 1878, but that is not so. The decree was against Basapa alone. It is not suggested that he was the manager of the undivided family or that the decree was passed against him as such. Though the house was sold under the decree, the interest of Basapa alone in it passed to the purchaser and not that of his cousins who were not parties to the proceedings.

The District Judge is of opinion that as at the date of Gurpadapa's purchase Basapa had no interest in any other joint family property than the house in question there was no foundation upon which his right to take his cousins' shares on their deaths by survivorship could be based and so on their deaths their interests in the equity of redemption in the house did not pass to him by survivorship. We have to consider whether this is the correct interpretation of the law. The District Judge has not cited any authority in support of his view.

No express authority on the subject is found in the Hindu law books. It is questionable whether an alienation by a co-pareener of his undivided interest in the family property was recognized by Hindu jurists. The legal mode of breaking up the family union and joint ownership was by partition. Even now in Bengal a voluntary alienation by a co-pareener of his interest in joint family property is ineffectual—Sudaburt Pershad v. Foolbush (1); Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (2). An alienation for value is, however, allowed in Bombay as in Madras and a sale in execution of a decree of a co-pareener's interest in undivided family estate is valid in all the Presidencies—Deendyal Lal v. Jugdeep Narain (3); Suraj Bansi v. Sheo Proshad (4). “There can be little doubt that all such alienations, whether voluntary or compulsory, are inconsistent with the strict theory of a joint and undivided Hindu family; and the law as administered in Madras and Bombay has been one of gradual growth founded upon the equity which a purchaser for value has to be allowed to stand in his vendor's shoes and to work out his rights by means of a partition.” This is the view which the [803] Judicial Committee of the Privy Council took of the position of the purchaser of the property of a Hindu co-pareener. It seems to follow from it that the sale of a co-pareener's interest in joint family property cannot affect the position of such co-pareener in the joint family or alter the rights of the several co-pareeners inter se, though it confers upon the purchaser the equity by means of a partition to obtain the benefit of his purchase and thus wholly or in part to break up the family union and joint estate. Basapa's rights to succeed to his brother's shares by survivorship were not, therefore, we think, affected by the sale of his interest.

in the last item of joint family property to Gurpadapa so long as the purchaser did not proceed to work out his rights by partition.

It remains to consider whether the interests of Revapa and Khubana when they devolved upon Basapa devolved upon him for his own benefit or for the benefit of Gurpadapa. The sale being a compulsory sale by the Court and not a sale by Basapa himself, the principle laid down in Aluknnone Debac v. Banee Madhub Chuckerbutty (1) and recognized by s 43 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) does not apply to the case. Is then the purchaser, on general principles applicable to purchasers from a Hindu co-parcener, entitled to the share of his vendor as it existed at the date of his purchase or to that share as increased by subsequent accretions? The question has been dealt with by the Madras High Court in Rangasami v. Krishnayyan (2). The share purchased in that case had diminished by the birth of new co-parceners before partition took place, and it was held that the purchaser was only entitled to the diminished share ascertained at the time of partition. It was not necessary for the Full Bench to give an opinion upon the converse case and they gave none. The referring Bench seems to consider that both would be governed by the same rule. In Suraj Bansi v. Shoe Prashad (supra) the Privy Council have, in effect, held that if the undivided co-parcener, whose share has been sold in execution, dies before that share has been ascertained by partition, the right of the purchaser nevertheless will not be defeated. "Their Lordships * * * think that at the time of [804] Adit Sabai's death the execution proceedings under which the Mouzah has been attached and ordered to be sold had gone so far as to constitute in favour of the judgment-creditor a valid charge upon the land to the extent of Adit Sabai's undivided share and interest therein which could not be defeated by his death before the actual sale * * * If this be so, the effect of the execution sale was to transfer to the respondents the undivided share in 8 annas of Mouzah Bissumbhurpore which had formerly belonged to Adit Sabai in his lifetime, and their Lordships are of opinion that notwithstanding his death the respondents are entitled to work out the rights which they have thus acquired by means of a partition" (p. 109).

The principle upon which their Lordships proceeded was deduced from the analogous case of a share in a partnership sold by a creditor of one of the partners. "It seems to their Lordships that the same principle may and ought to be applied to shares in a joint and undivided Hindu estate; and that it may be so applied without unduly interfering with the peculiar status and rights of the co-parceners in such an estate, if the right of the purchaser at the execution sale be limited to that of compelling the partition, which his debtor might have compelled had he been so minded, before the alienation of his share took place" (p. 255).

The Madras Full Bench deals with this aspect of the case in the case above referred to in the following manner: — "As regards the contention that, if the vendor dies before the purchaser effects a partition, the purchaser will take nothing, it is also one which does not arise on the facts of the case before us. If it is necessary to notice it as an objection to the rule of decision indicated above, the answer is that the interests carved out by the sale vest in the purchaser at once and that—the vendor

(1) 4 C. 677 (682).
(2) 14 M. 408.
being competent to sell—his subsequent death is an event which cannot divest the interest which has once vested; and for the purpose of giving effect to his contract of sale, the purchase must be dealt with as if the seller were alive when the purchaser demands partition."

The result of that view applied to the facts of the present case would be that Gurnadana ran no risk of losing his purchase by the death of Basana, but gained the benefit which accrued to the survivors on the death of Khubana and again on the death of Revapa, a result which appears to us to be neither logical nor equitable.

The decision in Pandurang v. Bhaskar (1) points to the period of alienation by a Hindu co-parcener, whether voluntary or compulsory, as that at which the rights of the aliener are to be determined. That decision was approved in Mahabalaya v. Timaya (2).

During the course of the argument in Bangasami v. Krishnayan
Mr. Justice Muttusami Ayyar lays down two principles: "(1) A purchaser gets his vendor's right to a partition when the thing bought; (2) if he buys an exact share he cannot get more." When a Court in an execution sale sells the interest of the judgment-debtor it cannot, we imagine, vary that interest by the words which it uses. If it be a 3rd share it sells the 3rd share, if a half share the half. If it purports to sell the whole estate, only the share of the judgment-debtor in it, whatever it may be, can pass.

The conclusions to which we are led by the decisions and their results upon this branch of the law are these:—

(1) That the position of the purchaser of the interests of a Hindu coparcener in part or the whole of a joint estate are very anomalous.
It is impossible to work out his rights on an exact logical basis. As it is an equity it must be worked out upon equitable principles.

(2) That a Hindu co-parcener by an alienation of his rights in part or the whole of the joint family property does not place the purchaser of such rights in his own position—does not confer upon him the status of an undivided Hindu. See Ballabah Das v. Sunder Das (3). Such a purchaser is in Vasudev Bhat v. Venkatesh (4) spoken of as "becoming a sort of tenant-in-common with the co-parceners admissible as such to his distributive share upon a partition taking place" (p. 147).

[806] (3) That such an alienation before partition does not deprive the alienating co-parcener of his rights in the Hindu joint family. If the alienation of his rights in each individual portion of the joint family property has not that effect, the fact that it is the last item which is being alienated cannot alter the position. The purchaser of the last part of the property of the co-parcener cannot be in a better or worse position than the purchaser of the penultimate portion.

(4) That as the purchaser does not by the death of his vendor lose his right to a partition, so his position is not improved by the death of other co-parceners before partition.

(5) That he stands in no better position than his alienor and consesequently like the latter is liable to have his share diminished before partition by the birth of other co-parceners if he stands by and does not insist on an immediate partition.

The result is that, in our opinion, upon the death of Revapa, Basapa was entitled to $rd of the equity of redemption in the house in suit and he or his vendee is now entitled to redeem it.

We reverse the decree of the District Judge and remand the case for a retrial of the appeal. Cost, costs in the cause.

PANDU (Plaintiff) v. BHAVDU (Defendant).* [5th March, 1896.]

The High Court will not interfere on a reference by the Collector with a Mamladur’s Court’s decision in a possessory suit. The aggrieved party can himself apply to the Court.

Satu v. Shivrambhat (1) followed.

REFERENCE from A. Cumine, Acting Collector of Khandesh, in a case decided by Mr. Ganesh Kashinath Lele, Mahalkari of petha Bhadgaum, under Bombay Act III of 1876, (Mamladur’s Act).

[807] The reference was as follows:

"The plaintiff Pandu valued Malhari, of kasba Bhadgaum, laid a plaint under Bombay Act III of 1876, alleging that he has only one way of getting to and from his house, viz., along a lane 3 cubits broad, that the defendant had recently placed a pipe in his (defendant’s) house, that this pipe had never been there before, and that the water from the pipe fell on the plaintiff’s body whenever (he the plaintiff) went to and from his (plaintiff’s) house, and that great obstruction is thus caused to his (plaintiff’s) going into or coming out from his (plaintiff’s) house.

"The Mahalkari, Mr. Ganesh Kashinath Lele, who has powers of a Mamladur under the Act, found in favour of the plaintiff, and ordered injunction to issue to defendant ‘to abstain from allowing the water from his house to fall on the premises or street used by the plaintiff.’

"The order seems irregular, as the lane was not land in plaintiff’s possession, nor was it a road to a field; and even if it had been, it could hardly be said that water dropping from a pipe disturbed or obstructed plaintiff in using the lane.

"It is submitted, therefore, that the plaintiff might be called on to show cause why the Mahalkari’s order should not be quashed.”

There was no appearance for the parties.

ORDER.

FARRAN, C. J.—Following the practice of this Court as laid down in Satu v. Shivrambhat (1) we decline to interfere in this matter on the application of the Collector. The defendant, if he feels aggrieved, can himself apply to this Court.

Interference declined.

KRISHNA RAMAYA NAIK AND OTHERS (Original Defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4), Appellants v. VASUDEV VENKATESH PAI AND OTHERS (Original Plaintiffs and Defendants Nos. 1, 5 and 6), Respondents.*

VASUDEV VENKATESH PAI (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. MHASTI AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.† [9th March, 1896.]

Hindu law—Joint family—Manager—Loan—Family purposes—Evidence—Debt contracted for family purposes—Evidence required where there has been a series of transactions—Deed—Mortgage bond in satisfaction of decree—Sanction of mortgage by Court—Civil Procedure Code, s. 257-A.

Although there is no presumption that moneys borrowed by the manager of a Hindu family are borrowed for family purposes, and a plaintiff seeking to make the family property liable must prove that the loans were contracted for the family, it is not incumbent on the plaintiff to show, in respect of each item in a long series of borrowings, the particular purpose for which it was borrowed. It will be sufficient for him to show that the family was in chronic need of money for the current outgoings of the family life or its trade necessities, and that the moneys were advanced on the representation of the manager that they were needed for such objects. And if the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of the case leaves no doubt that the moneys were borrowed for family reasons, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, although he is not able to indicate the particular purpose for which each sum has been borrowed.

Where mortgage bonds were passed for debts due on decree, and the execution of the bonds (which had been sanctioned by the Court) and the amounts for which they were passed were certified to the Court, and the Court recorded the adjustment without objection, and the decrees by reason of such certified and recorded adjustment became incapable of execution.

Beld, that sufficient had been done by the Court to satisfy the requirements of s. 975-A of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), although no formal sanction had been recorded.

APPEAL from the decision of Rao Bahadur R. R. Gangolli, First Class Subordinate Judge of Karwar, and second appeal from the decision of E. H. Moscardi, Acting District Judge of Kasara, amending the decree of Rao Sahib H. S. Phadnis, Second Class Subordinate Judge of Kurna.

[809] The plaintiff's father Venkatesh Pai for many years was in the habit of lending money to the defendant's family. The ancestor of the defendant's family was one Thanna Naik, the elder, who had two sons, viz., Ramaya and Ballyappa. In the year 1845, Thanna Naik was the eldest male member in Ramaya's branch of the family. Ballyappa, however, was alive and he as well as Thanna Naik acted as manager of the joint family. Between 1845 and 1856 there were seven bonds executed to the plaintiff, all of which were duly satisfied. Some of these bonds were signed by Thanna Naik and Ballyappa, some by Ballyappa alone, and some by Thanna Naik alone. In 1857 or 1858 Ballyappa died and Thanna Naik became sole manager of the family. He passed a series of bonds in favour of the plaintiff from the year 1858 to 1873. These bonds were expressed to be for moneys borrowed "for my necessities."

* Appeal No. 101 of 1895.
† Second Appeal. No. 595 of 1894.

544
In 1873 two bonds, one for Rs. 1,000 and one for Rs. 2,000, were passed by Thanna Naik to the plaintiff, consolidating the earlier bonds which had been given by him for sums borrowed for family purposes.

In 1878 the plaintiff obtained decrees upon these two bonds, one for Rs. 1,473-12-0 and costs Rs. 154-3-4 and one for Rs. 2,431 and costs Rs. 230-9-11.

In execution of these decrees, some of the joint family property was attached, whereupon Thanna Naik applied for and obtained the permission of the Court to mortgage it, and on 14th July, 1880, he executed two mortgage bonds in favour of the plaintiff. In each bond it was recited that Thanna Naik’s borrowings had been for the use of the family. In them the amounts due under the above decrees were ascertained and stated and other loans were mentioned, and the total sum due to the plaintiff was stated to be Rs. 4,803-1-4. The two mortgage bonds were given to secure this sum. One was for Rs. 3,800 payable in nineteen instalments of Rs. 200 each. The other was for Rs. 1,000 payable in four months.

On obtaining these mortgage bonds the plaintiff passed a receipt to the Court for payment of the two decrees. It was duly recorded by the Court and the legal proceedings thus terminated.

[810] In 1886 the plaintiff sued (suit No. 560 of 1886 ; second appeal No. 595 of 1884) the defendants, who were the son, the brother and the nephews of Thanna Naik, upon the aforesaid bond for Rs. 1,000 to recover the said sum and Rs. 377-8-0 as interest, alleging that in executing the second bond Thanna Naik was acting as manager and that the joint family was liable.

Defendant No. 2, who was Thanna Naik’s brother, denied his liability. He alleged that Thanna Naik was not the manager of the family and that the bond was passed in satisfaction of judgment-debts of Thanna Naik alone. He further contended that the bond being an agreement to give time for the satisfaction of a judgment-debt, and not having been sanctioned by the Court, was void under s. 257-A of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The lower appellate Court held that Thanna Naik was the manager of the joint family and that the greater portion and not all of the debts had been incurred for family purposes. He, therefore, passed a decree for the former part against all the defendants payable within six months, and in default of payment directed a sale of the mortgaged property; and, in respect of the latter part of the debt, directed that the same should be recovered by attachment and sale of Thanna Naik’s interest in the property in the hands of his son (Defendant No. 1).

The plaintiff filed a second appeal to the High Court (No. 595 of 1894). While the above proceedings were pending, the plaintiff filed another suit against the defendants (son, brother and nephew) of Thanna Naik upon the other mortgage bond of the 14th July, 1880, for Rs. 3,800 together with Rs. 4,118-4-0 interest. The brother of Thanna Naik pleaded the same defence as in the former suit. The lower Court passed a decree for the plaintiff.

The brother and nephews of Thanna Naik (defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4) appealed to the High Court (No. 101 of 1895), Macpherson (with Shamraw Vitthal and Narayan G. Chandavarkar) appeared for the appellants (defendants Nos. 2, 3, and 4).

[811] Inverarity (with Ghanasham N. Nadkarni) appeared for the respondents (plaintiffs &c.).
In second appeal No. 595 of 1894:
Ghanasham N. Nadkarni, appeared for the appellant (plaintiff).
Dattatraya A. Idgunji, appeared for respondent No. 1 (defendant No. 1).
Narayan G. Chandavarkar, appeared for respondent No. 2 (defendant No. 2).

Macpherson.—The question is whether the debts in dispute were incurred by Thanna Naik for family purposes. If they were incurred for his private purposes the suit against us must fail. The burden of proving that the debt was a family debt lies on the plaintiff. Under the Hindu law there is no presumption that a debt was contracted for family purposes—Sairu v. Narayanruo (1). The oral as well as the documentary evidence in the case shows that the debt was not contracted for family purposes (Evidence referred to).

Another question also arises under s. 257-A of the Civil Procedure Code. The bonds in dispute were passed in adjustment of decrees, and they stipulate for the payment of larger amounts than the amounts of the decrees. The bonds were, no doubt, certified to the Court, but the sanction of the Court was not obtained for the larger sum. The bonds are, therefore, void.

Inverarity.—So far as the law is concerned, the Judge has looked at the case from a right point of view. There is no evidence in the case to show that the amounts borrowed from us by Thanna Naik on several occasions were ever used by him for his private purposes. Our family has been the savkar of defendants' family for many years. The dealings began in 1845. Ballyappa and Thanna Naik used to pass bonds to us. Subsequent to Ballyappa's death Thanna Naik alone executed the bonds. Another important circumstance is that no one has come forward to resist our claim except defendant No. 2.

The bond was passed for a larger sum than that of the decree. But the bond accounts for the excess amount. One hundred rupees were taken for the marriage of defendant No. 2 and two hundred rupees were taken for the payment of assessment. The bond was not a fraudulent arrangement between us and Thanna Naik. The whole of the money was borrowed for the purposes of the family. Under the circumstances of the case, Thanna Naik had a right to bind all defendants even without their consent.

Section 257-A of the Civil Procedure Code is not applicable. There were two decrees and the principal amount of each decree carried interest which was calculated up to the date of the bond. But the bond being an instalment bond, further interest was stopped until default was made in the payment of an instalment. Therefore, the bond provided for the payment of a sum smaller than the amount that would have actually become due under the decree, while s. 257-A contemplates payment in excess of the amount of the decree. Even supposing that s. 257-A is applicable, then we submit that we have sufficiently complied with its provisions, because the adjustment was certified to the Court and we got its permission for the bond. The permission is tantamount to sanction. What was necessary was to certify the adjustment and we had done it. The bond is, therefore, not void—Jhabar Mahomed v. Modan Sonahar (2);
JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—The able and careful argument which has been addressed to us by counsel for the appellant in this case has failed to convince us that the conclusion which the Subordinate Judge has arrived at upon the facts is incorrect. It will be, therefore, sufficient if we state broadly the grounds upon which our judgment is based without entering upon minute details.

The suit is upon a bond (Ex. 224) for Rs. 3,800 passed by one Thanna Naik, deceased, in favour of the father of the plaintiff. The subject of contest is whether it was given for family debts so as to bind the defendants collaterally related to Thanna Naik. His son, the defendant Mhasti, has not appeared [813] to dispute it, nor have the defendants Nos. 5 and 6, his somewhat distant cousins. The defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 respectively, the brother of Thanna Naik and his nephews, resist the plaintiffs' claim. We may for the sake of brevity refer to them as the defendants.

It is not now disputed that the family to which Thanna Naik belonged was joint in estate and continued so until 1882. The defendants originally alleged an earlier partition, but it was found against them by the Subordinate Judge upon such conclusive grounds that their counsel in appeal has felt himself unable to contest the finding. Two other Courts in a suit arising out of a bond, passed by Thanna Naik at the same time as that now sued upon, have also arrived at the same conclusion. We, upon the same grounds as the Subordinate Judge, consider the union to be an established fact and deal with the case upon that basis.

The ancestor of the family was one Thanna Naik the elder. He had two sons Ramaya and Ballyappa. The evidence in the case goes back to the year 1845. At that time Thanna Naik the younger was the eldest male member in Ramaya's branch of the family. Ballyappa, the brother of Ramaya, was alive. He was blind, but notwithstanding his blindness, he as well as Thanna acted as a manager of the joint family. Between 1845 and 1856 there is a series of bonds in favour of the plaintiff's father, Venktesh Pai (Exs. 181, 185, 186, 187, 188, 182 and 183), which were all satisfied. Some of these were signed by Thanna Naik and Ballyappa jointly; some by Ballyappa alone, and some by Thanna Naik alone. The joint signatures to some of the bonds and the mutual connection between others show that they all formed one connected series; and their terms and the fact that the two family managers of different branches joined in raising the loans established with a considerable degree of certainty that the bonds were executed for family purposes. This was indeed practically conceded in argument. The bonds show that the family was in the habit of borrowing money in comparatively small sums to meet family exigencies; and that it was not usually convenient to pay the sums so borrowed is proved by the execution of the instalment bond, Ex. 182, and by the sum [814] of Rs. 350 being borrowed on the same day (the 14th November, 1855) to pay the first instalment due under Ex. 182. Ballyappa died shortly after this time in 1857 or 1858. The evidence shows that Thanna Naik then became the sole manager of the family. He passed a series of bonds in favour of the plaintiff's father ranging from the year 1858 to the year 1873 (Exs. 178, 179, 181, 180, 177, 176, 174 and 173). The case hinges on the determination of the question whether these bonds were given for debts contracted by Thanna Naik for family or his own private purposes.

The bonds in this series, when not renewed bonds, for the most are expressed to have been passed to recover money borrowed "for my necessities." This change of phraseology has been much relied on by counsel for the appellant. It does not, when all the circumstances are taken into consideration, appear to us to necessarily indicate a change in the nature of the borrowings.

Coincident in point of time with the use of this expression the management had devolved upon Thanna Naik alone. This affords a reason for a change of language. The mention of "necessities" in the bonds indicates, we think, in the mind of the lender an intention to charge some one other than the borrower himself. It may be that the idea was to charge his son, but the other circumstances to which we now refer appear rather to negative that idea.

It is improbable that a family which had been regularly borrowing until 1855, and which in that year was involved in debt, should have suddenly ceased the practice altogether and needed no more advances coincidently with a time when its manager began to borrow on his own account. The terms of the bonds, Exs. 178, 179, 181 and of the endorsement on Exs. 182 and 177 show that the parties to these instruments treated the new series beginning in 1858 as a mere continuation of the old series ending about that time. There is nothing indeed to distinguish the two series except the change of language which may be otherwise accounted for. The accounts were all adjusted on 9th November, 1861, when a bond for Rs. 3,000 was given for the consolidated debt (Ex. 177).

[815] Again, Ex. 176, which is a bond for Rs. 1,650 borrowed for "the cloth trade," which is shown to be a family business, amalgamates that sum with the previous borrowings consolidated in Ex. 177. This does not, of course, show that the previous borrowings were for family purposes, but it proves that the parties dealt with the whole account on the same footing, not distinguishing the money borrowed "for my necessity" from those which must have been borrowed for family purposes. The whole series ultimately culminated in the bonds, Exs. 173 and 174, passed in 1873 for Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 2,000 respectively.

We think, therefore, that the whole series of bonds from 1845 to 1873, must be treated, notwithstanding the change of language in 1858, as one series, and that the fact that the earlier items in that series were borrowed for family purposes affords some inference that the whole series stands on the same footing.

Admitting, as laid down in Soira v. Narayan Rao (1), that there is no presumption that moneys borrowed by a manager are borrowed for family purposes, and that a plaintiff seeking to make the family property liable must prove that the loans were contracted for the family, we do not consider that it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show, in respect of each item in a long series of borrowings, the particular purpose for which it was borrowed. If it were, it would be impossible for a Hindu saukar keeping a running account with the manager of a family to succeed in proving his account against the family. It will, we apprehend, be sufficient for the creditor to show that the family was in chronic need of money for the current outgoings of the family life or its trade necessities, and that the moneys were advanced on the representation of the manager that they were needed for such objects. And if the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of the case leaves no doubt in the mind of the Court that the moneys were borrowed for family reasons, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, although he is not able to indicate the particular purpose for which each sum has been borrowed. This is the view adopted by the Subordinate Judge and it is in our opinion the correct one.

(1) 18 B. 620.

[816] Now it is clear that the family expenses and necessities down to 1858 were not met by their current income.

The oral evidence given for the plaintiffs is not of a conclusive character. The witnesses are Narayan Bab Shenvi (Ex. 33) Pursaya Bharmaya (Ex. 46), Krishna Bab Shambhog (Ex. 49), Narayan Nagappa (Ex. 52), Divapayya Thanlapayya (Ex. 54), and Timapa Govind (Ex. 121) who, however establish that during the management of Thanna Naik a new family house was built at considerable expense, the Ghasani land of the family was improved, and two or three marriages were performed, and that a family trade in betel-nuts and cloth was carried on. Lachmaya Devar Shambhog (Ex. 122) says that he knows that money was advanced by the plaintiff’s father to Thanna Naik on several occasions for the payment of assessment or family purposes including the cloth trade. There is no evidence on the other side to show that the moneys which formed the consideration for the consolidating bonds (Exs. 173 and 174), were borrowed for the private purposes of Thanna Naik. It was suggested that they may have been borrowed for the prostitute Jayu with whom Thanna Naik appears to have consorted, but there does not appear to be any real basis for that suggestion. The case really made by the defendants and their witnesses was that there had been a separation between Thanna Naik and the rest of the family, which, as we have said, is quite untenable. The evidence, we think, gives rise to an exceedingly strong inference or presumption that the bonds, Exs. 173 and 174, were passed to consolidate earlier bonds given to secure sums borrowed by Thanna Naik for family purposes.

We proceed to consider the subsequent occurrences in the life-time of Thanna Naik. He died about 1881. Nothing had been paid in respect of the bonds in 1878, and in that year the plaintiff’s father Venkatesh Pai filed two suits (being suits Nos. 373 and 374 of 1878,) upon them against Thanna Naik alone, and on the 10th December, 1878, he obtained decrees in these suits (Exs. 220 and 212): that in suit No. 373 of 1878 was for Rs. 1,473.12-0 and costs Rs. 154-3-4 with interest on the principal sum at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum: that in suit [817] No. 374 of 1878 was for Rs. 2,431 and costs Rs. 230-9-11 and interest on the principal amount at 5 per cent. per annum.

In execution of these decrees, Venkatesh Pai attached some property belonging to the joint family. On the 17th April, 1890, Krishna Ramaya made an application (Ex. 103) to raise the attachment, alleging that he and Thanna Naik and Subraya were joint owners of the attached property which was the self-acquisition of Ramaya, their father, and that the decree was against the defendant Thanna Naik alone, and that he (the applicant) was not liable nor was his share. A similar application (Ex. 104) was made by the other brother Subraya. Thanna Naik was arrested in execution of the decrees. On the 30th June 1880, Thanna Naik, stating that Venkatesh Pai’s attachment and that the auction sale of the property would deprive his family of support and that he had requested the plaintiff and had resolved to mortgage it with instalments, applied for permission to do so (Ex. 158). This was granted the same day, Venkatesh Pai consenting (Ex. 161). Similar applications were made in both suits. On the 3rd of July an order was passed upon the attachment application of Krishna Ramaya as follows:—"Plaintiff has given up the attachment. Therefore there is no occasion for this application. The application is struck off" (Ex. 103). A similar order was passed upon the application of Subraya, which was also struck off, but with costs (Ex. 104).

On the 14th July, 1880, Thanna Naik executed two mortgage bonds in favour of Venkatesh Pai. In each of these bonds it is recited that the borrowings of Thanna Naik had been for the use of the family. In them the accounts under the decrees are made up, the interest being calculated, and from the total amount Rs. 200 already paid by a transfer are deducted. To the balance Rs. 100, said to be borrowed for the expenses of the marriage of Krishna, and Rs. 200, said to be borrowed to pay assessment, are added and the total Rs. 4,803-1-4 is arrived at. Rupees 3-1-4 are given up. The mortgage bonds are passed to secure the balance. One is for Rs. 3,800 payable in 19 instalments of Rs. 200 each. In default of payment of the instalments this whole was made payable with interest at 9 per cent. per annum (Ex. 224). [518] The other bond is for Rs. 1,000 payable in four months with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The same lands are again mortgaged to secure payment of this sum (Ex. 170). Both mortgages are without possession.

On obtaining these mortgages, Venkatesh Pai on the same day passed a receipt to the Court for payment of the two decrees. It mentioned the fact of the mortgages and their amount and was recorded by the Court (Ex. 159). The legal proceedings thus came to an end. By the apellants we are asked to regard these two mortgages (Exs. 224 and 170) as frauds by Thanna Naik on his brothers Krishna and Subraya. Ballyappa's branch of the family does not appear to have taken any part in the matter; possibly they were not interested in the attached lands, as Krishna's application asserts that the lands were self-acquired by Ramaya. If we come, as we have done, to the conclusion that there is a strong presumption that the earlier bonds passed by Thanna Naik were for family purposes, there is no foundation for attributing any fraud to Thanna Naik in the transaction. If there was, in fact, no fraud there is no reason for believing that the younger brothers were not fully aware of what was being done by their elder brother Thanna Naik. Subraya was living with Thanna Naik, and the marriage of Krishna had just been arranged for by Thanna. It is difficult to believe that they did not, in fact, know of it. If they were prosecuting their attachment applications it is almost incredible that they were not made aware of the application of Thanna Naik to the Court to mortgage the attached lands, seeing that it was the granting of that application which put an end to the attachment and made their own applications unnecessary. It is asked why in that case they did not join in the mortgages. Venkatesh is dead and the reasons for their not doing so can only be conjectural. The inveterate practice of Venkatesh to deal only with the managing member of the family may possibly account for it. Even after its date, bonds continued to be passed by Thanna alone. See Exs. 165 to 169 and 241, which are the decrees passed against the whole family upon bonds signed in this manner between 1882 and 1884. On the whole we have come to the conclusion that the mortgages are sufficiently proved to have been given for family purposes and that they are binding upon the family.

In the suit filed upon the bond for Rs. 1,000 the District Judge of Kanara, upon a review of the evidence differing from the Subordinate Judge of Kumbte, come to a different conclusion except as to the bond for Rs. 1,650 (Ex. 176). His judgment is the subject of second appeal No. 595 of 1894. We must accept his finding, though it does not accord with our own view, as it is not open to us to deal with it upon the facts in second appeal. The arguments urged upon us by the appellants do not disclose any errors of law on the part of the District Judge which would warrant our interference with his decision upon the facts.

It remains to consider the objections to the mortgages founded upon the provisions of s. 257-A of the Civil Procedure Code which are common to both appeals. The adjustment of the decree by the bonds having been certified to the Court, no difficulty arises on that score, nor could any arise since the alteration in the wording of s. 258 of the Civil Procedure Code—Swamirao v. Kashinath (1). The provisions of s. 257-A occasion some difficulty. A long series of decisions in this Court has interpreted the section as applicable to agreements which operate to extinguish the original decree. They are all (except Vishnu v. Hur Patel (2)) mentioned in Swamirao v. Kashinath (supra) and are not dissented from in Bank of Bengal v. Vyaishy Gangji (3), though in the former of these cases, Sargent, C. J., speaks somewhat hesitatingly as to their binding force since the Legislature has declared its purpose by the alteration made in the 258th section of the Civil Procedure Code. The Calcutta High Court, on the other hand, in Jhabar Mahomed v. Modan Sonahar (4) after a consideration of the Bombay authorities has, agreeing with the Allahabad High Court, held that the provisions of s. 257-A are only intended to prevent any binding agreement between judgment-debtors and judgment-creditors for extending the time for enforcing decrees by execution without consideration and without the sanction of the Court, a ruling which would equally apply to agreements falling within the 2nd clause of the section and which has been so applied in Hukum Chand v. Taharunnessa Bibi (5). These rulings have been followed in the Madras High Court—Sellamayyan v. Muthan (6) and Jaji v. Annai (7). There is thus a consensus of opinion in all the other High Courts that the Legislature in framing the Code of Civil Procedure did not intend to affect, and did not, therefore, effect any change in the substantive law relating to the consideration for agreements, an opinion which by the alteration of s. 258 the Legislature would seem to countenance. When it again comes before this Court it may be proper to refer it for consideration to a Full Bench. The question is of the highest importance, and it is one upon which it is desirable that there should be uniformity in the law.

In the present case as the execution of the mortgages (which had been sanctioned by the Court) and the amounts for which they were passed, which in the aggregate exceeded the amount of the decrees, were certified to the Court, and the Court recorded the adjustment without objection, and as the decrees by reason of such certified and recorded adjustment have become incapable of execution, we think, as held by the lower Courts, that sufficient has been done by the Court to satisfy the requirements of s. 257-A. The bonds are so eminently reasonable that the recording of a formal sanction was possibly deemed unnecessary. We, for the reasons which we have given, confirm both decrees with costs.

MORO MAHADEV AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Appellants v. ANANT BHIMAJI (Original Plaintiff), Respondent.* [9th March, 1896.]

Vatan—Kulkarni vatan—Joshi vritti—Purchaser of share in—Obstruction in performance of duties—Injunction—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 54.

The plaintiff, who had bought a share in a kulkarni vatan and joshi vritti, was obstructed by the defendants in the performance of his duties.

Held, that he was entitled to an injunction against the defendants.

SECOND APPEAL, from the decision of A. Steward, District Judge of Ahmednagar, confirming the decree of Rao Bahadur G. A. Mankar, First Class Subordinate Judge.

The plaintiff sued for a declaration against the defendants that he was entitled to enjoy the profits every fourth year of a fourth share in the kulkarni vatan and joshi vritti of the village of Nimbolak which he alleged he had purchased from one Raingo Ganesh, and for a perpetual injunction against the defendants, alleging that he had been obstructed by them in officiating and receiving the fees at certain marriages, the consequence of which was that the yajamans paid the fees to neither but were deposited with third parties.

The Subordinate Judge granted the injunction prayed for.

On appeal by the defendants the Judge confirmed the decree.

The defendants preferred a second appeal.

Gangaram B. Rele, for the appellants (defendants).—This is not a case in which an injunction should be granted. If we have caused obstruction to the plaintiff’s enjoyment, he is, at most, entitled to recover damages from us. The plaintiff is not our co-sharer. He has purchased the right, title and interest of one of our co-sharers. Some of the yajamans may not wish that the plaintiff, who is not a member of our family, should officiate at ceremonies at their houses, but they would be compelled to accept him if an injunction be granted—Raja v. Krishnabhat (1).

[822] Babaji A. Bhagavat, for the respondent (plaintiff).—Under s. 54 (e) of the Specific Relief Act we are entitled to sue for an injunction. A vritti can be sold—Mancharam v. Pranshankar (2). There is nothing in the present case to show that the yajamans are unwilling to allow us to officiate.

JUDGMENT.

PARSONS, J.—This case is distinguishable from Raja v. Krishnabhat (1). There the Court would not force a joshi on unwilling yajamans.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir C. Farran, Kt., Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Fulton.

GANGARAM (Original Defendant), Applicant v. FUNAMCHAN NATHURAM (Original Plaintiff), Opponent.*

[24th March, 1896.]

Construction—Acts relating to procedure—Retrospective operation of—Practice—Procedure—Dekkhun Agriculturists' Relief Act (XVII of 1879), s. 73†—Act VI of 1895.

In this suit the Subordinate Judge of Karmala held that the defendant was an agriculturist, and that, therefore, the suit could not be maintained without a certificate under s. 47 of the Dekkhun Agriculturists' Relief Act (Act XVII of 1879). Under s. 73 of that Act the finding of the Subordinate Judge upon the point was final. The plaintiff appealed, the appeal including other points of objection to the decree as well as that with regard to the status of the defendant. Pending his appeal, Act VI of 1895 was passed, which repealed s. 73. At the hearing of the appeal the Judge considered the question of the status of the defendant, and held that he was not an agriculturist, overruling the decision of the Subordinate Judge upon that point.

[363] Held, that the Judge in appeal was right in entertaining the question. The provisions of Act VI of 1895 altered the procedure and were, therefore, applicable to proceedings already commenced at the time of their enactment.

Held, also, that even if the General Clauses Act (I of 1899), s. 6, applied to Acts not conferring rights, but simply concerning judicial procedure, it could not affect the present case, as the repeal is not one of the Act itself, but only of a section in the same relating to procedure.

APPLICATION under the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court (ss. 586 and 622 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882) against the decision of Rao Babadur Narhar Gadadhar Phadke, First Class Subordinate Judge of Sholapur with appellate powers.

The plaintiff sued to recover rupees one hundred and forty, the balance including interest due on a current account.

The defendant took a preliminary objection that he was an agriculturist and, therefore, the suit could not be maintained without a conciliator's certificate under s. 47 of the Dekkhun Agriculturists' Relief Act.

The Subordinate Judge allowed the defendant's plea and dismissed the suit. He rejected the plaintiff's application for time to produce a conciliator's certificate.

The plaintiff appealed, alleging (inter alia) that the defendant was not an agriculturist.

* Application No. 1 of 1896 under the Extraordinary Jurisdiction, † Section 73 of the Dekkhun Agriculturists' Relief Act (Act XVII of 1879)—
73. The decision of any Court of first instance, that any person is or is not an agriculturist, shall for the purposes of this Act be final.
† Amending Act VI of 1895—
Sections 8, 9, 14, 15, 19 and 73 are hereby repealed.
On the 29th August, 1895, the Judge reversed the decree. He held that the defendant was not an agriculturist, and partially allowed the plaintiff's claim. The following is an extract from his judgment:

"The present suit was filed on 14th December, 1893, and was disposed of on 8th March, 1894. The appeal under disposal was made on 10th April, 1894. The appeal embodies other grounds for it than that in respect of the status of the defendant as an agriculturist or otherwise. An appeal on these grounds evidently lay and lies even now. The Dekkan Agriculturists' Relief Acts, 1879, 1886, are amended by Act VI of 1895. This Act repeals s. 73 of the Act of 1879. The amending Act came into force on the 1st May last. Section 73 made the decision of any Court of first instance that any person is or is not an agriculturist final for the purposes of the Act. In the present case the Karmala Court has held the defendant to be an agriculturist and dismissed the suit for want of a conciliators' certificate. The claim here was for Rs. 140 [824] and was heard by a Subordinate Judge of the second class, and no consent of the parties was obtained by the lower Court for the application of the provisions of Chap. II of the Act to the same. An appeal, therefore, already lay from the decree of the lower Court on grounds other than that in respect of the status of the defendant, as I have said above.

"It is a general principle of law that an appeal newly given by law is made applicable to proceedings instituted before that change in procedure is made. The repeal of s. 73 deprives the decision of the lower Court in the matter of status of its finality from the 1st May last. The present suit was decided in the beginning of 1894, but it is not res judicata, since an appeal is made from the decree of the lower Court therein. When the judgment of the Court of first instance upon a particular issue is appealed against, that judgment ceases to be res judicata and becomes res sub judice."

The defendant applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction and obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the decision of the Judge should not be set aside on the ground (inter alia) that the Judge erred in holding that the finding of the first Court with respect to the status of the defendant as an agriculturist could be questioned in appeal.

Trimbak R. Kotwal, for the applicant (defendant), in support of the rule:—Under s. 73 of the Dekkan Agriculturists' Relief Act the finding of the first Court, that the defendant was an agriculturist, was final and could not be appealed against. The Judge was, therefore, wrong in entertaining the appeal. When the appeal was presented to the Judge, the Amending Act had not come into force. It was wrong to re-open the question of the defendant's status. The Amending Act came into force pending the appeal and before it was decided. The Act is not retrospective and does not apply to pending proceedings—s. 6 of the General Clauses Act (I of 1868). The principles on which a particular enactment should be considered as retrospective or otherwise are given in In Re Ratansi Kalianji (1).

Mahadeo B. Chauhal, for the opponent (plaintiff) to show cause.—The plaintiff had a right to appeal against the decree. The amount of his claim was more than one hundred rupees. The repeal of s. 73 by the Amending Act did not confer upon the appellate Court any special jurisdiction with respect to the present case. The appeal came on in ordinary course and the [825] Judge took into consideration the change then made by the repeal of s. 73. The repeal merely removed the restriction on the jurisdiction of the appellate Court. This is purely a matter of procedure and does not involve any question as to any substantial right—Maxwell on Statutes, pp. 269, 270; Shivram v. Kondiba (1); Shamlal v. Hirachand (2); Anand Chunder v. Nitai Bhookji (3); Kondi v. Gunda (4); Padgaya v. Baji Babaji (5); Framji v. Hormusji (6); Ratanchand v. Hanmantrao (7).

The order of the Subordinate Judge rejecting our application for time to produce a conciliator’s certificate was wrong. Thus on this ground also the decree was appealable. The Subordinate Judge ought to have adjourned the hearing for the production of a conciliator’s certificate—Sayad Nyamutla v. Nana (8); Vyankaji v. Sarjerav (9); Nawab Muhammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Mussumat Lalli Begum (10).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—We are of opinion that the rule in this case should be discharged.

It has been argued that the District Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal on the question whether the applicant, who was the defendant in the suit, was an agriculturist within the meaning of the Dekkhon Agriculturists’ Relief Act. When the appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge was filed in the Court of the District Judge, s. 73 of Act XVII of 1879 made the decision of the Subordinate Judge, that the defendant was an agriculturist for the purposes of the Act, final. Pending the appeal that section was repealed by Act VI of 1895, and when the appeal came on for hearing, there being no longer any restriction upon the jurisdiction of the District Court to enter into the question whether the defendant was an agriculturist or not, the District Court entertained it and came to the conclusion that he was not, thus overruling the decision of the Subordinate Judge upon that point. This course was in accordance with the [826] general rule of law that statutes which effect changes in procedure are in their operation, unless the contrary appears on the face of the enactment, retroactive in the sense that the provisions of such statutes are applicable to proceedings already commenced at the time of their enactment—In re Ratansi Kalianji (11). This rule has already been recognised by this Court in the case of earlier changes in the same Act. An instance will be found in Shivram v. Kondiba (1). And the same principle has been observed in the case of Anand Chunder v. Nitai Bhookji (3), recently decided in the High Court of Calcutta. There the circumstances were very similar to those in the present case. An order had been made on 7th July, 1888, from which no appeal lay. Act VII of 1888, which came into force on the 1st July, 1888, gave an appeal from the order. The Court held “the general principle of law to be applicable that an appeal newly given by law is made applicable to proceedings instituted before that change in procedure is made.” See Attorney General v. Silleem(12).

It is, however, argued that a different rule must be applied in this case by reason of the provisions of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act (Act I of 1865) which enacts that “the repeal of any Statute, Act or Regulation shall not affect anything done * * * or any proceedings commenced before the repealing Act shall have come into operation.” It may perhaps be doubted whether that section is not confined in its operation to proceedings commenced under an Act conferring a right which has been repealed pending the action to enforce it,—as for example an Act enabling an informant to sue for a penalty,—and whether it is intended to contravene or interfere with the long established principle of law that statutes concerned with judicial procedure, unless such operation be excluded, do affect judicial proceedings pending at the time such statutes come into force, but however that may be, the answer to the argument appears to us to be that the Dekkhari Agriculturists' Relief Act has not been repealed [827] by Act VI of 1895. It is still in full operation. An alteration only has by the latter Act been effected in the procedure under it by doing away with the finality which s. 73 imposed upon the finding of a Court of first instance as to the defendant being an agriculturist. The repeal of a section in an Act relating to procedure does not appear to us to be the repeal of an Act within the meaning of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act. If the change in procedure had been effected by substituting "open to appeal" for "final" in s. 73 the argument based on the General Clauses Act would have no application, but every substitution involves pro tanto a repeal. We think that the mode adopted by the Legislature in effecting the change of procedure does not affect the result. Rule discharged with costs.

Rule discharged.

APPELLATE CIVIL—FULL BENCH.

Mr. Justice Ranade.

IBRAHIMBAHRI (Original Plaintiff), Appellant v. FLETCHER
AND OTHERS (Original Defendants), Respondents.*

[31st March, 1896.]

Vendor and purchaser—Contract to purchase—Construction—Good title—Property in cantamontment—Rights of Government in such property—Contract making no mention of Government rights—Knowledge of purchaser—Suit by purchaser for specific performance or return of earnest-money—Earnest-money when repayable—Amendment of plaint so as to claim refund of earnest-money—Practice—Procedure.

On October 12th, 1897, the first defendant executed the following agreement in favour of plaintiff with respect to certain property situated in the Poona Cantonment:—"I have agreed to sell to you . . . both my bungalows described above, including the sites and buildings together with the compounds, rooms for servants, tables, out-houses . . . . and I have this day received from you Rs. 5,000 as earnest-money. After the sale-deed in regard to the said bungalow is executed I will get them transferred to your name in the Brigade-Major's office." On the same day the first defendant received from the plaintiff Rs. 5,000 as earnest-money. A notice of the proposed sale was published in the newspapers, upon which the Poona Cantonment Committee wrote to the plaintiff stating that Government possessed certain rights over the property.
Plaintiff then demanded that the first defendant should obtain from Government and transfer to him a full and complete title in the property. The defendant refused, and prepared a draft deed transferring the ordinary cantamontment tenure, which was a mere occupancy, and sent it to plaintiff. Plaintiff declined to accept it and brought this suit to compel the first defendant to execute a deed

* Appeal No. 26 of 1898 under s. 15 of the Amended Letters Patent. transferring to him a full and complete title for possession of the property and for rent and damages.

Although apparently not arising upon the pleadings, an issue was raised by the parties as to whether by his conduct the plaintiff had forfeited his right to have the earnest-money returned to him. This issue was, however, struck out at the trial by the Subordinate Judge, who also refused to allow the plaint to be amended by inserting a claim for the repayment of the earnest-money, on the ground that it would change the character of the suit from being one based on the contract of the 19th October, 1887, into a suit based on the fact that there had never been a contract at all between the parties. He dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appealed and contended that the contract was that the defendant should give an absolute title to the property, and that as he was unable to carry out this contract he should return the earnest-money to the plaintiff.

_Held_ (1), upon the evidence (Candy, J., dissentients) that the knowledge that the property in question was held upon cantonment tenure was not brought home to the plaintiff, and that the Court could not impute such knowledge to him; that the terms of the contract itself were calculated to induce the plaintiff to believe that the defendant was selling not a more revocable license to occupy the land, but the land itself. The defendant agreed to sell the land, and having done so the onus lay upon him to show not only that he intended to sell only cantonment occupancy rights, but also that the plaintiff understood that he was purchasing the same.

(2) That the defendant being in default, and being unable to give the title contracted for, should return the earnest-money to the plaintiff.

_Held_ by the Full Bench that the amendment of the plaint so as to make it include a claim for the refund of the earnest-money ought to have been allowed, although not asked for until a late stage of the case.

The right to specific performance of a contract, or, in the alternative, to a return of the earnest-money should be determined in one and the same suit. [837] and the plaintiff failing to obtain a decree for specific performance should not be driven to a separate suit to recover back his deposit, if he is entitled to relief in that form.

The circumstance that a purchaser is not entitled to specific performance is by no means conclusive against his right to a return of the deposit. If, having regard to the terms of the contract, he is justified in refusing to accept the title, which the vendor is able to give, he is entitled to a refund of the deposit.

APPEAL under s. 15 of the Amended Letters Patent against the decision of Candy and Fulton, JJ., confirming the decree of Rao Buhadur Chumilal M., First Class Subordinate Judge of Poona, under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

Suit by purchaser against vendor for specific performance of contract.

On the 12th October, 1887, the plaintiff contracted to purchase from the defendant two bungalows (Nos. 27 and 28), with the land attached thereto, situate in the cantonment at Poona. The contract after describing the situation of the houses was as follows:—

"I have agreed to sell to you * * both my bungalows described above, including the sites and buildings (jagia imlya sahit) together with the compounds, rooms for servants, stables, out-houses . . . and I have this day received from you Rs. 5,000 as earnest-money. You should put a notification regarding the above transaction in respect of the above said bungalows in Bombay or Poona newspapers, and after having satisfied yourself that nobody has right or claim over both the above mentioned bungalows and other things (saman) you should, at my expense, within one month get the deed of sale executed by me and registered, and pay me the balance. Should you fail to do so, you will have no claim whatever to the amount of the earnest-money which you paid me this day; but if I do not satisfy you within the aforesaid time that nobody has any right or claim over the above-mentioned estate, and if I object to executing to you the sale deed, I will continue to pay your fair rent for both houses until the sale deed is executed and the houses are put into your possession. After the sale-deed in regard to the said bungalows is executed I will get them transferred to your name in the Brigade-Major’s office."

On the same day the plaintiff paid the first defendant Rs. 5,000 earnest-money for which the latter duly executed a receipt.

The site and compounds of the bungalows in question were Government property and were situate, as above stated, within the [630] cantonment at Poona. The limits of this cantonment were fixed in March, 1827. By Regulation XXII of 1827 (s. 21) it was directed that private property was not to be included within cantonment limits, but the direction did not appear to have been practicable in all cases.
Bombay Act III of 1867, s. 11, recognises the fact that lands, which belong to private individuals, may be included within cantonments.
By rules framed under this latter Act, the Military authorities were prohibited from allowing other than permissive occupation of Government land within the said cantonments.

Permission to occupy the lands in question was granted by the Military authorities to Colonel Waddington (defendant No. 3), as to No. 27 in the year 1863, and as to No. 28 in 1871, the permission in each case bearing the following note, viz. "Permission to occupy ground in a military cantonment confers no proprietary right." Colonel Waddington erected the bungalows on the land and sold the land and bungalows with the furniture to the first defendant Fletcher in 1885.

This was the position when Fletcher entered into the above contract with the plaintiff, save that he had charged the property with the payment of certain sums to his wife (defendant No. 2) and to defendants Nos. 3 and 4. The contract was signed and the earnest-money paid to the first defendant at the office of the plaintiff’s pleader, who was present.

The contract provided that the plaintiff (purchaser) was to notify the contract in the public newspapers. A notice was accordingly drawn up by the plaintiff’s pleader and approved by Fletcher, dated 17th October, 1887, and was duly published. It described the property to be sold as "all that piece or parcel of land or ground with the messuage, tenements or dwelling-houses standing thereon, &c." The result of the publication of this notice was a letter from the Cantonment Committee to the plaintiff’s pleader pointing out that Government was the owner of the land and that it could not be sold by the first defendant, and that the plaintiff would purchase at his own risk.

The plaintiff’s pleader sent the defendant a copy of this letter whereupon the defendant wrote to him as follows:—

"[631] The letter contains nothing new, and does not seem to me to call for any action on my part or on yours. It is merely equivalent to reminding you that the houses are in cantonment, and that in common with all others so situated their site is held from Government, on the usual cantonment tenure. This of course you were well aware of before.
My title is exactly the same as that of other house owners in cantonment limits, and no one is better able than yourself to advice Mr. Ibrahimhrai Hasan as to the value."

The plaintiff’s pleader sent the following letter in reply:—

"In reply to your letter of the 26th instant, I have to inform you that I cannot ask Mr. Ibrahimhrai Hasan to accept your interpretation Subsequent correspondence took place with reference to the defendant's title. The plaintiff's pleader insisted that the defendants should give a good title by getting the notice of the Cantonment Committee cancelled or withdrawn. On the 11th November, 1887, the first defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff himself in which he explained his title at length and expressed his willingness to give plaintiff an undertaking that, if Government should resume the land and compel the plaintiff to remove the houses and accept as compensation a less sum than the price which the plaintiff was paying for the property under the contract, that he (the first defendant) would pay the plaintiff the difference, or if the plaintiff was not satisfied with the title and would not complete the sale, then he (defendant No. 1) was ready to return the earnest-money.

The time fixed in the contract for the completion of the sale was extended by the parties to the 12th December, 1887. On the 6th December, 1887, the defendant forwarded a draft deed to the plaintiff. Further correspondence took place, in which the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to an absolute conveyance, and that the defendant should obtain the withdrawal, by Government, of its rights over the land. On the 30th January, 1888, the solicitors of first defendant wrote repeating the willingness of the defendant either to complete the sale or to forego the agreement and return the deposit. After much further correspondence (set forth in the judgment of Candy, J., infra) the defendant's solicitor wrote on the 6th April, 1888, that, unless the draft conveyance [832] was returned at once duly approved, the defendant would consider the whole transaction at an end and retain the earnest-money which had long ago been forfeited by the plaintiff. This was repeated in a letter of the 17th April. On the 18th April, the plaintiff's solicitor returned the draft conveyance altered in red ink, the effect of the alterations being to assume that the defendant was conveying an absolute title in the land. To these alterations the defendant's solicitors did not agree, and as the plaintiff would not withdraw from his position, the defendant's solicitor on the 27th April, 1888, gave formal notice that the transaction was at an end.

In November, 1888, the plaintiff's pleader attempted to re-open the negotiations, the plaintiff being then willing to accept the terms offered by the defendant on the 11th November, 1897.

On the 2nd February, 1889, the plaintiff filed this suit.

The plaintiff stated the contract of the 12th October, 1887; that subsequently the plaintiff had come to know of the nature of the defendant's tenure and of the charges on the property; that in November, 1888, the plaintiff had informed the defendant that he was willing to accept such title as the defendant had, on the terms that the defendant should free the property from its incumbrances, and in case Government should resume the land and pay compensation less than the price stated in the contract of 12th October, 1887, then that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the difference, as he had offered to do in his letter of the 11th November, 1888. The plaintiff further stated that the defendant had refused these terms and it prayed.

(1) That the defendant should be ordered to execute a conveyance in the terms of a draft annexed to the plaint, and that the property should be entered in the plaintiff's name in the Government books, and that possession thereof should be given to the plaintiff.

(2) That the defendant should pay the plaintiff the rent that accrued due since the 12th October, 1887, at Rs. 340 a month, &c. &c.

(3) That the charges on the property, if not paid off by the defendant, might be paid out of the purchase-money.

The defendant pleaded (inter alia) that at the date of the contract for sale the plaintiff knew the tenure on which the property was held, and that the Government's rights in the said property were not a defect of title within the meaning of the contract; that it was always intended that the charges should be paid off out of the purchase-money; that he had made the offer contained in the letter of the 11th November, 1887, but the plaintiff had rejected it; that owing to the plaintiff's refusal to carry out the contract, he (the defendant) was entitled under the contract to retain the earnest-money.

The case came on before the First Class Subordinate Judge of Poona, who framed issues, the 7th and 10th of which were as follows:—

"7. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the agreement, dated the 12th October, 1887, with superadded conditions embodied in the notice, dated the 16th November, 1888.

"10. Whether the agreement, dated 13th October, 1887, has been cancelled by the plaintiff, and whether he has forfeited his right to the above earnest-money."

These issues, however, were struck out at the trial, and upon the other issues the Subordinate Judge found in favour of the defendant and dismissed the suit. The following are extracts from his judgment:—

"The present suit was brought by the plaintiff on the 1st February, 1889, and to the plaint has been annexed a draft of a deed of conveyance, and the plaintiff prays that defendant No. 1 be compelled to pass a deed of conveyance in the terms of that draft. The draft contains an indemnity clause providing that, in the event of Government resuming the grounds upon which the bungalows stand, defendant No. 1 shall be liable for the difference between the amount of the purchase-money and that of the compensation which the Government might pay. On 3rd January, 1891, Mr. Gangaram Bhau (plaintiff's pleader) applied that the indemnity clause be expunged and struck out from the draft. He also applied for leave to add an alternative prayer for damages. This application was refused. On the 5th January, 1891, the pleader put in another application, praying that the plaint be read as praying for the specific performance of a conveyance in the terms of the draft (Ex. No. 83) as altered in red ink."

"I, therefore, hold that Mr. Fletcher (defendant No. 1) did not intend to convey to the plaintiff anything more or less than his occupancy rights to the sites upon which the bungalows stand, and that being so he cannot possibly be charged with having refused to perform his part of the contract. The result, therefore, is that Mr. Fletcher having contracted to sell his occupancy rights to the sites upon which the bungalows stand, is not guilty of breach of contract and is not, therefore, liable to damages and this is the reason why I have refused permission to the plaintiff to amend his plaint by adding a prayer for the award of damages."

"Issue No. 10 (which was struck out at the trial) relates to the forfeiture of the earnest-money. I have already remarked that, if anybody is guilty of breach of contract, it is the plaintiff and not defendant No. 1, and surely it is not in the interests of the plaintiff to have that issue retained. His only possible remedy to get back his purchase-money is to sue on the ground that there has never been a contract between him and defendant No. 1. Be that as it may, so far as the present action is concerned, the plaintiff cannot recover back his earnest-money, because his suit, based as it is upon the contract of 12th October 1887, supposed by the plaintiff to have been modified by the subsequent correspondence, cannot be converted into a suit based upon the ground that there was never a contract between the parties."

The plaintiff appealed, contending that the contract was that the defendant should give an absolute title to the property and that the defendant being unable to carry out the contract should return the earnest-money to the plaintiff.

Jardine (with Ghanasham N. Nadkarni), for the appellant (plaintiff). Rivett-Carnac (with Crawford, Burder, Buckland and Bayley) appeared for the respondents (defendants).

June 13, 1893. CANDY, J.—The sums claimed by the plaintiff in this appeal are:

(a) Refund of the earnest-money...
   With interest at 9 per cent. for 3 years...
   ... 5,000

(b) Rent or damages, i.e., rent for 5 months at Rs. 300 per mensem...
   ... 1,350

   Item (b) was not pressed in the argument, nor was it mentioned why plaintiff having claimed in his plaint rent for 15 months at Rs. 310 per mensem, had now altered his claim on this account to the item as shown above.

Plaintiff has also appealed against the order of the lower Court as to costs.

The important question for consideration is as regards item (a). The contention of the plaintiff-appellant is that defendant No. 1 [833] contracted to give an absolute title to the land on which his houses stood, and that not being able to carry out that promise, defendant No. 1 was in default and therefore, plaintiff, the intending purchaser, was entitled to a refund of the earnest-money with interest. If plaintiff can establish the former part of his contention, then, in the absence of such conduct on his part as would deprive him of his rights, he might be entitled to the refund as claimed, even though this was not distinctly recited in the original plaint.

The reasons given by the Subordinate Judge for not allowing the plaintiff to amend his plaint, do not seem very cogent. That the legal advisers of defendant No. 1 understood the pleadings to raise the question as to the plaintiff’s right to a refund of the earnest-money is shown by the 10th issue, which distinctly raises the question whether the plaintiff had forfeited his right to the earnest-money. As was done in the well-known case of Howe v. Smith (1), the necessary amendment may be considered as made, and the question thus assumes this form, was there a valid contract which the plaintiff repudiated, so as to disentitle him to a refund of the earnest-money? To answer this question we must look at the terms of the contract and the conduct of the parties. The satekhat or agreement to sell, dated 12th October, 1887, after describing the situation of the houses in the Poona Cantonment proceeds:

"I have agreed to sell to you * * * both my bungalows described above, including the sites and buildings (jagia imiya sahit), together with the compounds, rooms for servants, stables, out-houses......and I have this day received from you Rs. 5,000 as earnest-money. You should put a notification regarding the above transaction in respect of the aforesaid bungalows in Bombay or Poona newspapers, and after having satisfied yourself that nobody has right or claim over both the above-mentioned bungalows and other things (saman) you should at my expense within one month get the deed of sale executed by me and registered and pay me the balance. Should you fail to do so, you will have no claim whatever to the amount of earnest-money which you paid me this day; but if I do not satisfy you within the aforesaid time that nobody has any right or claim over the above-mentioned estate, and if I object to executing to you the sale-deed, I will continue to pay you fair rent for both houses until the sale-deed is executed and the houses are put into your possession. After the sale-deed in regard to the said bungalows is executed I will get them transferred to your name in the Brigade-Major's office."

[836] On the same day defendant No. 1 wrote a receipt for the Rs. 5,000 received "as earnest-money for the sale of my two houses, &c., as per preliminary agreement." It is admitted that the plaintiff was present in person with his legal adviser, Mr. Gangaram Bhau Mhaske, when the satekh was executed, and conversation took place, showing that plaintiff's attention could not fail to have been drawn to the fact that the property sold was recited as being within the limits of the cantonment of Poona, and was possibly subject to certain interference on the part of the Military authorities. Mr. Gangaram Bhau was well aware that Government asserted the ultimate proprietary title in land within the cantonment; and that if these houses in question had been built on the ordinary terms, i.e., if the land had been granted by the Military authorities for building purposes subject to the right of Government to resume on payment of compensation, then the owner of the houses could not pretend to contract to give an absolute title to the land. Prima facie this would be the natural state of things. Mr. Gangaram Bhau, who was acting for the plaintiff and drew up the satekh, by not enquiring from defendant No. 1 must be taken to have had full knowledge that defendant No. 1 had nothing more than the ordinary title to land within cantonment.

According to the agreement that there should be an advertisement in the newspapers in order that the plaintiff should satisfy himself that nobody had "any right or claim over the above-mentioned estate", i.e., "over both the above-mentioned bungalows and other things (saman)", Mr. Gangaram Bhau drew up a notice, dated 17th October, 1887, which was initialed by defendant No. 1, in which the property to be sold was described as "all that piece or parcel of land or ground, with the messuage, tenement or dwelling-houses standing thereon, &c." It will be noticed that the property is not described as the houses with the other incidental rights, but the land with the houses. But this fact cannot be taken as showing that defendant No. 1 contracted to give an absolute title in the land. The property was fully described as situate within cantonment limits; nor is there anything to indicate that defendant No. 1 asserted himself to be the absolute owner of the soil, or that the plaintiff had contracted [837] with him under that impression. The result, however, of the notice was a letter from the Cantonment Committee to Mr. Gangaram Bhau, pointing out that Government was the owner of the land, which could not be sold by defendant No. 1, and that plaintiff would purchase at his own risk. As there were subsequent communications from the Cantonment authorities and Government, it may be mentioned here, that though at one time Government asserted a right to issue a direction that a particular clause should be inserted in the sale-deed, and made it a condition that the General Commanding should countereign the deed, these points have not been alleged by the plaintiff as preventing defendant No. 1 from completing the contract. It was explained on the part of Government that all that was intended was an express reservation of the ordinary rights of Government in land within cantonment limits, and as a fact the General raised no objection to the transfer, and no special clause was inserted in the draft sale-deeds proposed by either party. So, here, mention may be made of the mortgagor in favour of defendant No. 3 and in favour of defendants Nos. 4 and 5, trustees of the marriage settlement of defendant No. 2. It has never been asserted that these defendants ever raised any objection to the completion of the contract. They have always been willing to be paid off from the purchase-money and to join in conveying the estate to the plaintiff.

The question is, therefore, narrowed to this, was the plaintiff justified in insisting on defendant No. 1 giving him an absolute title to the land? On Mr. Gangaram Bhau sending to defendant No. 1 a copy of the letter from the Cantonment Committee, defendant No. 1 replied (26th October, 1887): "The letter contains nothing new and does not seem to me to call for any action on my part or on yours. It is merely equivalent to reminding you that the houses are in cantonment and that in common with all others situated on their site is held from Government on the usual cantonment tenure. This of course you were well aware of before." To this Mr. Gangaram replied (28th October) that he could not ask plaintiff to accept defendant's interpretation of tenures of land in cantonments, and that plaintiff never contracted to purchase the property under that understanding. A few days later (8th November) Mr. Gangaram insisted that defendant should give a [838] good title by getting the Quarter Master General of the Army to withdraw or cancel the notice received from the Cantonment Committee. Subsequently, defendant No. 1 addressed plaintiff himself (on 11th November, 1887), writing a letter in which he explained his title at length and expressed his willingness to give plaintiff an undertaking that if Government should take up the land, and compel plaintiff to remove the houses and accept as compensation a less sum than what plaintiff was paying defendant No. 1, then the latter would pay plaintiff the difference; or if plaintiff was not satisfied with the title, and was not content to complete the sale, then defendant No. 1 was ready to return the earnest-money. About the same time defendant No. 1 obtained plaintiff's consent to the period of one month in the sutekhat being extended to two months, i. e., to 12th December 1887. On 6th December defendant No. 1 forwarded a draft deed to plaintiff, and on 13th December he wrote at length offering further explanations. But Mr. Gangaram on behalf of plaintiff still insisted on the condition noted above as to the withdrawal of the assertion by Government regarding its rights over the land. On 5th January, 1888, the solicitors of defendant No. 1 wrote to the solicitors of the plaintiff, forwarding copies of the Cantonment Regulations. But the latter replied (14th January) insisting that plaintiff had agreed to pay such a large sum for the property on the understanding that he was buying the land, and, therefore, he was entitled to an absolute conveyance thereof. On 30th January, 1888, the same wrote to the same, repeating the willingness of defendant No. 1 either to complete the sale, or to forego the agreement and return the deposit. On 14th February, 1888, a reply was asked to the letter of 30th January; and so again on 5th March.

Eventually on 9th March the solicitors of defendant wrote giving plaintiffs 24 hours to complete the purchase or to take back the earnest-money. Plaintiff's solicitors replied (10th March) insisting on his interpretation of the agreement. Subsequently, negotiations were again entered into, and on 15th March a draft conveyance was forwarded to plaintiff's solicitors, and on 27th March it was proposed on defendant's behalf that he should pay rent on account of the time which would be taken in sending the conveyance to England for the signatures of the mortgagees and trustees. Further delay occurring, defendant's solicitors wrote on 6th April that, unless the draft conveyance was returned at once, duly approved, defendant would consider the whole transaction at an end and retain the earnest-money which had long ago been forfeited by the plaintiff. This was repeated in a letter dated 17th April. Then on 18th April plaintiff's solicitors returned the draft conveyance altered in red ink, the effect of the alterations being to ignore the rights of Government in the land, and to assume that defendant was conveying an absolute title in the same. To these alterations defendant's solicitors would not agree, and as plaintiff's solicitors said that plaintiff would not withdraw from his position, defendant's solicitors gave formal notice (27th April, 1888) that the transaction was at an end. After about seven months, in November, 1888, Mr. Gangaram Bhau for the plaintiff attempted to re-open negotiations for the sale afresh, plaintiff being then willing to accept the terms offered by defendant on 11th November, 1887, and rejected by the plaintiff; but this was declined on defendant's part; and on 2nd February, 1889, the present suit was filed.

On the above facts it seems to me impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the default has, all throughout the transaction, been on the plaintiff's part. I have had the advantage of reading a draft judgment prepared in this case by my learned colleague, and I have, therefore, paid special attention to the two English cases quoted by him; but in my opinion they afford no support to the contention now put forward on behalf of the plaintiff.

In Cato v. Thompson (1) T agreed to sell to C certain freehold houses, and to make a good marketable title. On investigation of the title it appeared that the houses were part of a property which had been sold by a building society in lots, subject to stringent restrictive covenants which were admitted to make the title not a marketable one. T having declined to procure a release of the covenants, C brought an action to recover back his deposit. Held, that, whether C knew of the restrictions at the time of the covenant or not, he was entitled to recover. He in fact said to T: "I know your title is defective, but I will buy if you make a marketable title by getting rid of the covenants." C's counsel admitted that "the case is not like that of property being subject to a liability which can, by no possibility, be got rid of. In such a case a purchaser who buys with knowledge must be supposed to have intended to buy subject to the liability, but restrictive covenants might be released." Jessel, M. R., said: "Here it was known that it was improbable that the restrictive covenant could be got rid of, yet there is an express contract to make a marketable title. It comes to this—'I know that there is a serious defect in your title, but I will buy if you can make it marketable.'"

(1) 9 Q. B. D. 616.

If the principle in the above case is to be applied to the facts in the present case, then we must suppose that defendant by agreeing to satisfy the plaintiff that "no one had any right or claim over the estate" in fact expressly contracted as follows:—"Though the estate is excised as being within cantonment limits, and thus asserted by Government (whether rightly or wrongly) to be subject to certain rights of Government, I undertake within a month to show that Government has no such rights over the land on which my houses stand, or to persuade Government to relinquish those rights." And the plaintiff must be taken to have said:—"I know that your houses are in cantonment limits in which Government claim certain rights, but I will buy if you can satisfy me that those rights of Government do not exist in your case." It seems to me that to attach such a sense to the words of the satekhah is to do violence to the language of the document and to the facts and conduct of the parties.

In the same way with In re Gloag Miller's Contract (1). There the contract was "I, Joseph Richardson Gloag, hereby agree to sell Athole Lodge, Enfield, with all out-houses thereto belonging, also the ground included in my titles thereto freehold for £2,400 subject to delivery of valid title to him;" and the purchaser accepted those terms. As a fact the vendor was the assignee of a lease of the property; but the lease gave the lessee an option of purchasing the fee simple, and it also contained restrictive covenants as to the use of the land. It was held that as the purchaser contracted for an absolute title to the fee, he was entitled to the same, even though he had notice of the restrictive conditions, because there was an express contract that a good title would be shown.

Here I fail to see any express contract that the vendor would show an absolute title to the land. On the contrary, if we construe the terms of the satekhah strictly and literally, we find that though he sold the two houses, including site and building, with compounds, furniture, gardens, &c., the express contract as to title related solely to the bungalows and furniture, &c., (saman). It was with regard to them that he was to satisfy the purchaser that no one had any claim. The words "above-mentioned estate" as the conclusion of the document clearly refer to the estate with regard to which the vendor agreed to satisfy the purchaser that he had a good title. But even if the land itself be included in the estate, it is evident that the vendor did not expressly contract to make an absolute title to the land. No doubt in England, when a man describes the property he is selling as so many acres of land, that means he is selling the fee simple. But it does not follow that the same rule holds good in India. If AB sells survey number so and so, and expressly contracts to show a good title thereto, that does not mean that he is selling the fee simple in the land. For instance, the owner of the survey number can never appropriate it to other than agricultural purposes without the permission of the collector. The vendor's contract does not mean that he will satisfy the purchaser that such restriction does not exist in his case. So here the rights of Government asserted over land within cantonment limits, though expressed at different times in different ways, simply amounts to this, that Government can, if necessary, resume the land, due compensation being given for all buildings, &c., without putting into force the requisitions of the Land

(1) 28 Ch. D. 320.
The title of the occupant as to proprietorship is fully recognized, (see the letter from the Acting Quarter Master General exhibited in this case, 10-120, dated 28th November [842] 1887—"The right of occupancy only is vested in you or future proprietors.") though no doubt it is a limited proprietorship. The occupancy is treated as a transferable, heritable property. There is nothing apparently in the Regulations which would enable the Military authorities to ignore any legal transfer or succession. In this case there is admittedly no objection on that account.

But the purchaser was persuaded to decline to complete the purchase until the vendor satisfied him that he had a good title by compelling the Quarter Master General of the Bombay Army to withdraw the letter from the Cantonment Committee, which asserted the rights of Government in the land. Unless that objection was reasonable, the purchaser is not entitled to a refund of his deposit. In my opinion it was unreasonable. The assertion of the rights of Government over land within cantonment limits was a liability which could by no possibility be got rid of. As was said in Cato v. Thompson (1), "In such a case a purchaser who buys with knowledge must be supposed to have intended to buy subject to the liability." The purchaser had full notice, on the face of the contract, that the land was within cantonment limits, and he was bound to know the legal incidents of such land. Not only did the plaintiff show his knowledge of the fact, as indicated by his conversation at the time when the satekhat was executed, but his legal adviser, Mr. Gangaram Bhau Mhaske, was specially affected by such knowledge. This gentleman had himself been plaintiff in the District Court of Poona against Government and the Cantonment Committee, and had succeeded in establishing his proprietorship against Government of a piece of land in the Sadar Bazar, of which his predecessors in title were apparently the owners before the demarcation of Poona Cantonment. He was thus able to successfully resist the claim of Government that the ordinary occupancy of land within cantonments rested on the occupant's application to be allowed to hold the land subject to the right of Government to resumption. He thus knew that the vendor could not contract to give an absolute title, if he (the vendor) or his predecessor in title had [843] acquired the land in the ordinary way by application to the Military authorities. The defendant has never concealed the fact that his title rested on such an application. Yet Mr. Gangaram Bhau Mhaske never made inquiries of plaintiff, and himself dictated the agreement of sale (satekhat). Assuming that this document contained an express contract on the part of the vendor to prove an absolute title to the land, (an assumption which is, in my opinion, unfounded) Mr. Gangaram Bhau Mhaske must be taken, in law, to have had full notice that this was an impossibility. He, however, inserted in the newspaper current in Poona Cantonment a notice in his own name, in which he pointedly called attention to the fact that defendant was selling certain land in Poona Cantonment. This, of course, as was no doubt intended, at once drew an assertion of the rights of Government from the Cantonment Committee. Then, as shown by defendant's deposition, Mr. Gangaram Bhau Mhaske tried to induce the vendor to employ him in order to file a suit against Government to establish his absolute title to the ground. The result would, of course, have been obvious. The vendor would have failed, and then the purchaser would have turned round, and said "Your vain attempt establishes what your contract was; now give me damages." Fortunately for defendant he refused to listen to Mr. Gangaram Bhan Mhaske. He said at once: "Both the purchaser and I were perfectly aware that these houses stood in cantonment and were subject to the ordinary legal incidents of such property. The purchaser is bound to complete the purchase; but rather than that there should be any dispute, I am willing to give him an indemnity, or I will cancel the contract and return his deposit." This offer he repeated over and over again. But it was finally rejected by the plaintiff. Then after the lapse of many months the plaintiff comes into Court and by his plaint (as allowed to be amended) says: "Specifically perform the contract (which is impossible) and give me damages, or in the alternative return my deposit." The alternative prayer is now the only question before us; and in my opinion the plaintiff is not entitled either in law or equity to such relief. He cannot get back his deposit, for it was owing to his default that the purchase was not completed; and he cannot [844] after this lapse of time, and considering the heavy expenses which the defendant must have incurred, put the vendor in the same situation as he would have been had the contract been performed at the time agreed upon. I would, therefore, confirm the decree of the Subordinate Judge rejecting the claim.

With regard to costs it is clear that defendant No. 2 ought never to have been made a party. Nor was it necessary to make defendant No. 3 and defendants Nos. 4 and 5 parties. It is unnecessary to say anything about incumbrances if they are to be paid off out of the purchase-money (see Torrance v. Bolton (1)). In the present case the mortgagees have always expressed their willingness to be paid off and to join in conveying the estate. It is not contended that the plaintiff was not satisfied in regard to defendant's title on account of these mortgages. Therefore, when defendants Nos. 2 to 5 filed their written statements and prayed to be dismissed from the suit, plaintiff should have made the necessary application to the Subordinate Judge and he would have saved a large sum in costs. He failed to do so, but kept these defendants on the record. He is, therefore, liable for their costs. But as the defence of defendant No. 2 and her trustees, defendants Nos. 4 and 5, was identical, and they had but one pleader, the Subordinate Judge should not, I think, have allowed a separate pleader's fee for defendants Nos. 4 and 5 apart from defendant No. 2. In this respect only would I vary the order as to costs.

In appeal no defendant has appeared but defendant No. 1, so there need be no order as to costs except that plaintiff must bear the costs of defendant No. 1.

I would confirm the decree of the Subordinate Judge on the merits and as to his order regarding costs, but vary it in taxation of the costs as shown above.

FULTON, J.—The facts of this case have been so fully explained in Mr. Justice Candy's judgment that it is unnecessary for me to recapitulate them. It appears to me that the agreement of the 12th October, 1887, (which has been officially translated by the Court Translator) purports to contain a covenant for title on [845] the part of the vendor. The effective part of the document is as follows:—

I have agreed to sell to you for Rs. 44,750 my two bungalows described above including the ground (or site—Marathi ‘jaga’) and the building and together with the compounds, rooms for servants, stables, &c.; out-houses, bricks, and stones, and earth, trees and shrubs, and together with the well which is in the compound of the bungalow No. 27, flower pots, and together with the furniture in the bungalows as per list furnished to you; and have this day received from you in full Rs. 5,000, namely, 5,000 of the Surat currency as earnest-money for which I have given you a separate receipt. You should put a notification regarding the above transaction in respect of the aforesaid bungalows in newspapers of Bombay or Poona, and after having satisfied yourself that nobody has any right or claim over both the bungalows and other things mentioned above you should at my expense, within one month, get the deed of sale executed by me and get the same registered and pay me the remaining amount. Should you fail to do so you will have no claim, whatever, to the amount of earnest-money which you have paid me this day but, if I do not satisfy you within the aforesaid period that nobody has any right or claim over the aforementioned estate, and if I object to executing to you the sale deed, I will continue to pay proper rent for both the bungalows until the sale deed is executed and the bungalows are put into your possession. After the sale in respect of the above bungalows is executed I will get the above bungalows transferred to your name in the office of the Brigade Major."

As stipulated, a notice was published in a Poona newspaper. Thereupon the Cantonment Magistrate wrote to the plaintiff’s pleader to inform him that the whole of the ground in compounds Nos. 27 and 28, Staff Lines, was the property of Government, and the pleader at once wrote to the first defendant on 24th October, 1887, as follows:

"I enclose for your perusal copy of a letter received from the Secretary to the Cantonment Committee and request that you will be pleased to settle the dispute raised by the Cantonment authorities as to ownership of the ground on which houses Nos. 27 and 28 stand, and which you contracted to sell to Mr. Ibrahimbhai Hasan together with the grounds, at an early date, otherwise Mr. Ibrahimbhai will hold you responsible for all damages on account of your inability to make good your title to the property you contracted to sell within a specified time."

The first defendant replied on the 26th idem:

"I am in receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, furnishing copy of one delivered to you from the Cantonment authorities. The letter contains nothing new and does not seem to me to call for any action on my part or on yours. [846] It is merely equivalent to reminding you that the houses are in cantonment, and that in common with all others so situated their site is held from Government on the usual cantonment tenure. This of course you were well aware of before. My title is exactly the same as that of other house owners in cantonment limits and no one is better able than yourself to advise Mr. Ibrahimbhai Hasan as to its value."

A long correspondence ensued, but from the positions thus taken up neither party has ever receded. Great efforts were made to compromise the matter, and at one time these seemed likely to be successful. On several occasions the first defendant offered to pay back the sum of Rs. 5,000, not by way of admission that he was in the wrong, but simply to terminate the difficulty. The plaintiff, however, refused to accept these offers and finally brought this suit.

The question we have now to decide is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the earnest-money. This was the only point (other than that of costs) argued by Mr. Jardine, and it is obvious that the plaintiff cannot recover both the earnest-money by terminating the contract and the rent secured in certain eventualities by the contract. Now on this question it appears to me that, unless it can be said that the plaintiff has broken his contract in refusing to accept a conveyance such as the first defendant was in a position to offer him, he is entitled to recover the earnest-money; for it could not, I think, be forfeited by his refusal to accept it in the course of negotiations, inasmuch as such refusal did not mean that he relinquished his claim to the money, but simply that he was endeavouring to insist on the first defendant's carrying out what he considered to be his contract. But, it seems to me impossible on the wording of the agreement to hold that the plaintiff has failed to carry out his contract. It cannot be said that the first defendant has satisfied him "that no one has any right or claim over the above mentioned estate" and, unless it can be held that the words "no one" mean "no one (excepting Government)", it is clear that he cannot possibly satisfy him. It may be that the plaintiff's pleader is very conversant with cantonment tenures, but assuming this to be the case I do not think the fact can alter the plain meaning of the terms of the agreement. Prior to the decision in appeal No. 103 of 1885 [847] (The Poona Cantonment Committee by Colonel C. D La Touche, Secretary, and others v. Dhondiram valad Lakshman (1) the subject of cantonment tenure was not so well understood as to justify us in making the assumption that when the words "no one" were used, the parties mutually intended to exclude Government from consideration. The case of Cato v. Thompson (2) seems to me very much in point, where it was held that the vendor having agreed to make a good marketable title, evidence could not be adduced to prove that the purchaser knew of certain restrictions. Again, in the case of In re Gloag and Miller's Contract (3), Fry, J., explained the law as follows:

"When the contract is silent as to the title which is to be shown by the vendor, and the purchaser's right to a good title is merely implied by law, that legal implication may be rebutted by showing that the purchaser had notice before the contract that the vendor could not give a good title. If the vendor before the execution of the contract said to the purchaser "I cannot make out a perfect title to the property," that notice would repel the purchaser's right to require a good title to be shown. But if the contract expressly provides that a good title shall be shown, then inasmuch as a notice by the vendor that he could not show a good title would be inconsistent with the contract, such a notice would be unavailing, and whatever notice of a defect in the title might have been given to the purchaser he would still be entitled to insist on a good title."

The last sentence seems to apply to this case. Admitting that Regulation XXII of 1827 informed the purchaser that ordinarily the land in cantonment was not private property, the fact would not alter the effect of the express agreement that the first defendant was to satisfy the plaintiff that no one had any right or claim over the estate. On the most favourable view for the first defendant the case would be very like that of Cato v. Thompson in which Jessel, M. R., remarked: "Here it was known that it was improbable that the restrictive covenant could be got rid of, yet there is an express contract to make a marketable title. It comes to

(2) 9 Q. B. D. 616.
(3) 23 Ch. D. 20.
"I know that there is a serious defect in your title, but I will buy if you can make it marketable." And Lindley, L. J., said:

"The contract expressly stipulates that the vendor shall make a good marketable title. Now it is beyond all question that owing to the existence of the restrictive covenants the title is not marketable. Why, then, cannot the purchaser throw it up? The reason given is that he knew of the covenants when he entered into the contract. Lopes, J., said that this would be contradicting a written contract by parol evidence and that the evidence was inadmissible. In this I think that he was right. Parol evidence is admissible where you have a case of specific performance with compensation, but an express bargain to make a good title cannot be modified by parol evidence. Such evidence would be admissible in an action to reform the contract, but is not admissible for the purpose of construing it."

Under these circumstances, in the absence of any allegation of fraud committed by the plaintiff in procuring the insertion of the words to which I have referred, I think the first defendant must be bound by them in their ordinary sense. Doubtless he signed the document incautiously without realising its full effect; for if he had considered it more carefully he would have insisted on a reservation of the claims of Government, but even though such may be the case I think he is bound to repay the earnest-money, for it seems to me that there has, on the plaintiff's part, been no breach of contract which could justify its forfeiture. Mr. Rivett Carnac referred to various cases to show that on breach of contract being established, earnest-money advanced by a purchaser would be forfeited. This proposition need not be disputed, and, indeed, such forfeiture was expressly provided for in the agreement. But in my opinion there was no breach of contract by the plaintiff.

As to interest, I do not think the plaintiff is entitled to any beyond the date of his first refusal to accept the first defendant's offer of Rs. 5,000. There was no agreement for payment of interest; and the offer ought in ordinary prudence to have been accepted, for by that time the plaintiff must have been aware that it was not in the power of the first defendant to satisfy him as to the title to the land. The plaintiff was then entitled to repayment, but he has not attempted to show that he has suffered any damage beyond loss of the use of his money. This loss, however, need not have been incurred by him after the date when he received the offer of repayment if he had taken a more reasonable view of his position.

The learned counsel for the first defendant urged that plaintiff could not be allowed to recover this money in the present suit as he had not claimed it and had merely tried to compel the defendants to execute a conveyance containing an indemnity clause. But I concur with Mr. Justice Cundy in thinking that the necessary amendment ought to be allowed, or considered to have been made, when the 10th issue was raised, for if the construction which I put on the agreement be correct, it would be inequitable now, when the claim for damages would be time-barred, to reject the suit without passing a decree for the money—Mohammad Zahoor Ali Khan v. Musumut Thakovanee Rutta Koer and others (1).

I would give a decree for the plaintiff for Rs. 5,000 with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 12th October to the 12th November, 1887, and costs on the aggregate amount in both Courts.

(1) 11 M.I.A. 468.
recoverable from defendant No. 1, and if he fail to pay by the sale of the property which formed the subject of the contract. The first defendant should pay his own costs in both Courts on the said amount and recover from the plaintiff all his other costs. I would not interfere with the principle on which the costs of the second, third, fourth and fifth defendants have been considered by the lower Court, both because it is unusual to interfere merely on a question of costs with the discretion of a Subordinate Court and because I think they were vexatiously made parties to a suit which the plaintiff ought to have known could not affect them in any way. It was out of their power to convey a good title to this property as against Government. Neither they nor the first defendant could compel Government to concur in the conveyance, and they were not bound by any agreement to execute an indemnity bond guaranteeing the plaintiff against possible loss if he persisted in taking a conveyance with a bad [850] title. The only claim which plaintiff could establish was one for compensation from the first defendant. But I agree with Mr. Justice Candy that defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were not entitled to separate costs, and consider that one set should be struck out. As the defendants Nos. 2 to 5 have not appeared in this Court, it is unnecessary to make any order about their costs of appeal.

Since the above judgment was written I have had the advantage of perusing the judgment of my learned colleague, and I wish to point out, in reference to his remarks on Cato v. Thompson, that I do not understand why it should be considered from a legal point of view more impossible to induce Government to surrender its right of resuming this land than to induce the persons entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenants therein referred to to give them up. In the one instance as in the other the completion of the title depended on the action of third persons over whom the vendor had no control. It still seems to me that the decision in Cato v. Thompson is applicable to the present case.

The Judges having differed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge was confirmed under s. 575 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882).

The plaintiff appealed under s. 15 of the Amended Letters Patent, and the case was argued before a Full Bench consisting of Farran, C.J., and Jardine and Ranade, J.J.

Lang (Advocate General with Ghanasham N. Nadkarni) appeared for the appellant (plaintiff).

Russell and Rivett-Carnac (with Crawford, Burder, Buckland and Bayley) appeared for respondents (defendants).

JUDGMENT.

FARRAN, C. J.—This is an appeal from the decree of the High Court dated the 13th of June, 1893, confirming the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Poona dismissing the plaintiff's suit. The learned Judges, who decided the original appeal, having differed in opinion, the present appeal is brought under cl. 15 of the Amended Letters Patent of the High Court.

In the suit as framed, the plaintiff sought specific performance of a contract, which had been entered into between him and the defendant Fletcher on the 12th October, 1887, for the purchase of two bungalows, Nos. 27 and 28, near the Sadar [851] Bazar, Camp, Poona, "including the ground and the buildings and together with the compounds, rooms for servants, stables, &c., out-houses, bricks and stones and earth, trees and shrubs, and together with the well which is in the compound of the bungalow No. 27 and the flower-pots and together with the furniture of the bungalows." The purchase-money for the whole was Rs. 44,750.

The plaint did not contain any alternative prayer for damages or for a return of the earnest-money (Rs. 5,000) which had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendant Fletcher at the time of executing the contract or satekhat (Ex. 39).

The Subordinate Judge, deeming that the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree for specific performance of the satekhah, dismissed the suit with costs on the ground that the defendant Fletcher could not give, and had not contracted to give, an absolute title to the land and the plaintiff was not willing to accept the title which the defendant Fletcher was ready and willing to convey to him. The plaint did not, in his memorandum of appeal, contest the correctness of the decree in so far as it refused his prayer for specific performance of the contract, but appealed on the ground that the Subordinate Judge ought to have decreed to him the refund of his earnest-money and awarded him damages. The claim for damages was rejected by both the Judges who heard the appeal, and there has been no objection taken to that part of the decree. The argument of the appeal before us was confined to the question of the refund of the earnest-money with interest.

The 10th issue, which was raised at the request of the pleader for the defendant Fletcher, was, "Whether the agreement dated the 12th October, 1887, has been cancelled by the plaintiff and whether he has forfeited his right to the earnest-money." The plaint at a somewhat late stage in the case asked to be allowed to amend his plaint so as to embrace a claim for the refund of the earnest-money which he had paid. This the Subordinate Judge refused, and he also cancelled the 10th issue. The learned Judges, who heard the appeal, were agreed in opinion that the amendment ought to have been allowed and that the 10th issue ought to have been retained and dealt with. We concur in that view. It is manifestly just and proper that the right to specific performance of a contract, or, in the alternative, to a return of earnest-money, should be determined in one and the same suit, and that the plaintiff failing to obtain a decree for specific performance should not be driven to a separate suit to recover back his deposit, if he is entitled to relief in that form. In the High Court in England both questions are usually determined in the same proceedings, and the same course of practice should, we think, prevail here—Scott v. Alvarez (1); Howe v. Smith (2).

Though the opinion of the Subordinate Judge was opposed to the right of the plaintiff to claim a return of his earnest-money, we have not, in consequence of the course which he adopted with reference to the 10th issue, the advantage of his reasoned conclusion upon that branch of the case. The matter has, however, been fully considered in the judgments now under appeal; and though we should have desired the evidence to have been more specifically directed to this aspect of the case, we have, I think, sufficient upon the record to enable us to dispose of it. The stipulation in the contract upon the subject of the earnest-money occurs towards its close. After the terms and subject-matter of the purchase are set out, and after the recital of the payment of the earnest-money, the contract proceeds:

"You (the purchaser) should put a notification regarding the above transaction in respect of the aforesaid Jungalows in newspapers of Bombay.

(1) [1895] 2 Ch. 603.
(2) 27 Ch. D. 89.
or Poona, and, after having satisfied yourself that nobody has right (hak) or claim (warasa) over both the bungalows and other things (saman) mentioned above, you should at my expense within one month get the deed of sale executed by me and get the same registered and pay me the remaining amount. Should you fail to do so, you will have no claim whatever to the amount of earnest money which you have paid me this day; but if I do not satisfy you within the aforesaid period that nobody has any right (hak) or claim (sambanda) over the above-mentioned estate, and if I object to execute to you the sale-deed, I will continue to pay you proper rent for both the above-mentioned bungalows until the sale-deed is executed and the bungalows are put into your possession.

The latter provision and the subsequent action of the parties in asking for, and consenting to, an enlargement of the time are [853] conclusive, I think, to show that time was not regarded by the parties as of the essence of the contract.

The question for determination is whether, having regard to the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff was justified in refusing to accept the title to the land under, and surrounding, the bungalows (for there is no real question about the title to the bungalows and the furniture) which the defendant Fletcher was able to give. If he was justified in refusing that title, he is in my opinion entitled to a refund of his deposit. If he was bound to accept it he cannot, I think, now claim to receive back that which, under the terms of the contract itself, he agreed to forfeit. The defendant Fletcher has always been willing to convey to the plaintiff such title as he possesses to the land and bungalows. The plaintiff has always been, and when this suit was brought was, unwilling, as he now is, to accept that title. The point is concisely put by Lindley, L. J., in Scott v. Alvarez (1). If he was bound to accept the title, "the legal answer" (to a demand for the deposit) "is this: There is no breach of contract at all; you have taken your chance with respect to your deposit; and unless you show a breach by the vendor of his bargain you are not entitled to have that deposit back." It is essentially a legal question and does not depend upon equitable considerations—Howe v. Smith. "According to the law of vendor and purchaser the inference is that such a deposit is paid as a guarantee for the performance of the contract, and where the contract goes off by default of the purchaser, the vendor is entitled to retain the deposit." Per Pollock, B., in Collins v. Stimson (2). The circumstance, however, that a purchaser is not entitled to specific performance is by no means conclusive against his right to return of his deposit—Howe v. Smith (at p. 95).

Now the subject-matters of the contract in this case are bungalows built upon land within the Poona Cantonment limits, the contract expressly including the land. For the purposes of this judgment the history of the tenure of land within cantonment limits at Poona, and of the land in question may be briefly [864] stated. The limits of the Poona Cantonment were fixed on 18th March, 1827. By Reg. XXII of 1827, which came into force on the 1st September, 1827, it was directed that private property was not to be included within cantonment limits (s. 21), but the direction does not appear to have been practicable in all cases. Bombay Act III of 1867, s. 11, recognizes the existence of land, which may belong to private individuals, being included within cantonments. Section 9 gives power to Government to make rules and regulations to provide for certain matters in cantonments, which (s. 11) may regulate cases in which the land within the limits of the cantonments is the property of Government the conditions under which its occupation and use, where these are only permissive, shall be allowed. The rules framed under this Act appear to have prohibited the Military authorities from allowing other than permissive occupation of Government land in Poona Cantonment. However it appears from the evidence before us that private individuals still own lands there, though doubtless for the most part the land is held upon what may be concisely styled cantonment tenure.

Permission to occupy the sites and compounds of the bungalows in question was granted to Colonel Waddington by the Military authorities, as to one in 1863, and as to the other in 1871—the permission in each case bearing a note to the effect that "permission to occupy ground in a military cantonment confers no proprietary right." Colonel Waddington erected bungalows on the sites and sold the lands and bungalows with the furniture as it stood to the defendant Fletcher in 1885 (Ex. 89). This was the position when the contract in question was entered into, save that Fletcher had charged the property with the payment of certain sums in favour of the defendant No. 3 and of the defendants Nos. 4 and 5 respectively.

The negotiations, which resulted in the contract, took place through a broker Tatyia. The evidence does not show by whom he was employed. On the morning of the day on which the contract was entered into, he came with two servants of the plaintiff to the defendant Fletcher and informed him that the plaintiff had offered Rs. 44,750 for the bungalows. This offer the defendant Fletcher expressed himself willing to accept. It was then arranged that the earnest-money (10 per cent.) should be paid at the office of the pleader Gangaram Bhau the same day and that the bargain should be closed. The defendant Fletcher accordingly attended at the pleader's office, as did also the plaintiff.

There can, I think, be no doubt that the defendant Fletcher at this time was aware of the nature of the tenure upon which he held the land. He swears that he knew it and that he did not mean to convey any thing more than his rights to the land such as they were under the cantonment regulations. In cross-examination he stated that he had lived in the Poona Cantonment during the rains for eighteen years and that he knew about the cantonment rules from the time he commenced to live in cantonments. The conveyance to Mr. Fletcher (Ex. 89), which is in the form of an agreement, it is true, describes the subject of the agreement as "the freehold bungalows, compounds and land described in the schedule," but this document was drawn in England, and Fletcher (we are told) did not personally execute it. Certainly he did not retain it in his possession (Ex. 90 and Ex. 91). In the draft mortgage, which was sent out for execution in India, and which contained a similar description of the land, the description of it as freehold was purposely struck out. In his letter of 9th November (Ex. 71) Fletcher speaks of giving a "good title," but this was written after an interview with the plaintiff's brother, at which it was handed to the latter and is explained by the letter of November 11 (Ex. 52) in which he sets out the exact state of the title. Those documents do not, I think, militate against the truth of Mr. Fletcher's oral evidence.

It is more difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to the knowledge which the plaintiff possessed of the tenure at the time when the agreement was made. Mr. Fletcher did not see the plaintiff to speak to before he met him at Gangaram's office. Tatya has given no evidence as to what took place during the negotiations. The plaintiff himself says that he did not know that the bungalows were in cantonments or that there was a cantonment at Poona, but this is hardly credible, as the agreement itself [856] describes them as being in the "Lascar" and both Fletcher and Tatya say that the plaintiff inquired whether the bungalows could be let to a native and whether civilians could be turned out to make room for military officers, which would be meaningless inquiries in the case of a bungalow not subject to cantonment regulations; but assuming that the plaintiff knew that the bungalows were in cantonments, there is no evidence to show that he knew any thing about the tenure upon which they were held. He is described as a Khoja carrying on agency business and residing at Bombay. Fletcher assumed that the pleader Gangaram Bhau was familiar with the tenure of lands in the Poona Cantonment, but that, even if the assumption is taken to be correct, is not proof that the plaintiff possessed similar knowledge. The general legal knowledge upon such a subject as cantonment tenures, of a pleader employed to draw up a provisional agreement, cannot, I think, be treated as the knowledge of the client, though the latter is, as a general rule, affected with notice of what comes to the knowledge of his pleader in the course of his employment. At the time of drawing up the agreement, it is admitted that the tenure of the land was not alluded to. In accordance with the agreement, a notice (Ex. 46) was drawn up by Gangaram Bhau for insertion in the Poona newspapers, which was so inserted after it had been approved by Fletcher. It describes the property to be sold as consisting of "all that piece or parcel of land or ground with the messuage, &c., thereon." In this nothing is said as to the tenure of the land; but when it elicited a notice from the Secretary of the Cantonment Committee (Ex. 47) that the compounds were the property of the Government, which notice was sent to the plaintiff's pleader, the latter at once called upon Fletcher to settle the dispute as to the ownership of the ground on which the houses stood and which he, Fletcher, had contracted to sell. To this Fletcher replied (Ex. 49) that the notice was merely equivalent to "reminding you that the houses are in cantonments and that in common with all others so situated their site is held from Government on the usual cantonment tenure. This of course you were well aware of before. My title is exactly the same as that of other house-owners in cantonment [857] limits, and no one is better able than yourself to advise Mr. Ibrahimbhai Hassan as to its value."

Gangaram's reply to this (Ex. 69) was as follows:—

"In reply to your letter of the 26th instant I have to inform you that I cannot ask Mr. Ibrahimbhai Hassan to accept your interpretation of tenures of land in cantonments, and be never contracted to purchase the property under that understanding. He agreed to pay you the large sum of Rs. 44,750 for the two houses with the ground attached, and not the buildings alone."

He then called on Fletcher to make a good title. It is unnecessary for the point I am now considering to go through the rest of the correspondence. Neither party ever receded from the position which they then took up, though at one time Fletcher was willing (Ex. 52) to give the plaintiff an indemnity against loss, should Government take up the land, and the plaintiff at one time was willing to accept that offer. The fair result of the evidence and correspondence appears to me to be that the knowledge that the sites of the bungalows with their compounds were held upon cantonment tenure is not brought home to the plaintiff, and there is no existing legislation upon the subject which would justify the Court in imputing such knowledge to him.

We must, therefore, I think, ascertain what effect the terms of the contract would produce upon the mind of a person universally in the peculiarities of cantonment tenure. It is unnecessary to read it again. Though I feel unable to construe the provision in the document as to the plaintiff satisfying himself by advertising the contract that no one had any right or claim to the bungalows as a covenant that the land was held absolutely or upon any particular tenure, I think that the description of the property as I have set it out, "both the bungalows described above and the building and together with the compounds, &c.," without any qualification as to the estate conveyed, was calculated to induce in the mind of the plaintiff the belief that Fletcher was selling, and that he was purchasing, something more than a mere revocable license to occupy the land. It is not like the case of Gangadhar v. Kasinath (1), where the vendor professed to sell merely "his right, title and interest" in the land and where the Court [855] says, "If persons, without satisfying themselves as to the real title to the property, choose to buy at sales where the party selling professes to sell merely his 'right, title and interest,' such as it is, they have no one but themselves to blame if they afterwards find they do not get such a title as they could have wished. At such a sale it is before he bids, and not afterwards, that an intending purchaser should inquire into the nature of the title which the vendor can make."

In the present case, the plaintiff was, I think, entitled to construe the expressions in the contract in the sense most advantageous to himself—Seaton v. Mapp (2). So construing them, he was entitled to say "you agreed to sell me the land and you do not satisfy that agreement by offering me land, which is admittedly the property of Government, but which you have permission to occupy." If the evidence clearly showed that the plaintiff was aware that he was purchasing merely the permission to occupy Government land, the case might be different, but in my opinion, as I have said, the evidence falls short of establishing that proposition;
see as to knowledge by the purchaser of the real state of the title, Ellis v.
Rogers (3), where the cases relied on by Fulton, J., are referred to. It does not appear to me to make any difference whether the expressions in the contract are taken to be those of the defendant Fletcher or of the pleader Gangaram Bhau. Fletcher had and used the opportunity of reading over the contract. He agreed to sell the land and having done so, the onus, I think, lay upon him to show not only that he intended to sell only cantonment occupancy rights, but also that the plaintiff understood that he was purchasing the same.

I agree, therefore, in the opinion of Fulton, J., and would allow the appeal. I would, therefore, pass a decree for the plaintiff for Rs. 5,000 with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the filing of the memorandum of appeal in this Court. That was the first time when the plaintiff demanded back his deposit from the defendant Fletcher.
Down to that period he was insisting on the specific performance of his contract.

[859] The plaintiff to pay the defendant Fletcher's costs on the difference between Rs. 49,860 and Rs. 5,000 in the lower Court and the defendant Fletcher to pay the costs of the plaintiff on Rs. 5,000 and the costs of the appeal on that sum. The plaintiff to pay the costs of the other defendants, one set between them.

JARDINE, J.—I concur on all points in the judgment of the Chief Justice.

RANADE, J. —The difference of opinion between the two Judges of the Division Bench, which decided this case under cl. 2 of s. 575, relates solely to the question whether the appellant plaintiff did or did not commit a breach of the contract entered into by him with respondent No. 1 on 12th October, 1887. Mr Justice Candy was of opinion that the plaintiff was not justified under the agreement of 12th October, 1887, in insisting on defendant No. 1's giving him an absolute title to the land, and that throughout this transaction the default has been on plaintiff's part, while Mr Justice Fulton thought that there was no default on plaintiff's part.
The claim to the refund of the earnest-money depends mainly upon the decision of the question of responsibility for default, and this last is thus the only material question we have to consider in the present case.

It is, however, to be noted that though this was an important question of mixed law and fact, the Court of first instance recorded no finding on it either way. In several places in his judgment, the Subordinate Judge has taken particular care not to commit himself beyond what may be implied by his statement that "if anybody is guilty of a breach of contract, it is the plaintiff, and not the defendant No. 1." The suit before him was, in the first instance, brought to enforce specific performance of the contract, and to recover possession of the property, and a claim was also made for rent and costs. The defendant No. 1's pleader did indeed suggest an issue
(No. 10) on the point of plaintiff's right to the refund of the earnest-money, and plaintiff's pleader at a late stage applied (Ex. 138) for permission to claim this refund by an amendment of the plaint. Not only was this permission refused, but the Subordinate Judge refuses also to decide the 10th issue, which had been raised. He seems to have thought [860] that this prayer could only follow a suit for the recovery of the contract. He admitted that "plaintiff's was a hard case, and that in a properly framed suit, plaintiff might claim damages and recover the earnest-money, but that he could not give him this relief in the present suit." As observed by Mr. Justice Candy, the reasons assigned for refusing this relief are not very cogent. The result, however, is that the Judges of the Division Bench had to decide the question of responsibility for default, which was the only material question raised before them, without the help of a clear finding of the Court of first instance on this most important point.

I have noticed this point in some detail, because the judgment of the Court of first instance shows, or rather suggests, that if it had felt itself called upon to record an express finding on the point, it might have been led to hold that this was one of those rare cases where there was no contract between the parties, or at least no contract which either party could call on the other to enforce, in which case the general rule of law is that the purchaser is entitled to have the deposit returned back to him—Dart, Vendors observed: "I do not say that in all cases where this Court would refuse specific performance, the vendor ought to be entitled to retain the deposit.
... In order to enable the vendor so to act, in my opinion there must be acts on the part of the purchaser which not only amount to delay sufficient to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance, but which would make his conduct amount to a repudiation on his part of the contract.
If he repudiates the contract, then according to Lord Justice James—Ex, parte Barrell (1)—the purchaser has no right to recover the deposit.

The mere rejection of plaintiff's claim for specific performance does not, therefore, by itself deprive him of the equitable relief of insisting on a refund of the deposit paid by him as earnest-money unless it can also be shown that there was a repudiation of the contract. In the present case there is indeed an express stipulation in the agreement itself, which provides that plaintiff should "put a notification in the newspapers, and after having [861] satisfied himself that nobody had any claim to the bungalows and other things mentioned above, you should at my expense get the deed of sale executed by me, and get the same registered, and pay me the remaining amount; should you fail to do so, you will have no right to the amount of the earnest-money." The only point to be inquired into in the present case is whether plaintiff failed to carry out his part of the contract so as to deprive him of his right to claim a refund of his earnest-money.

No time was fixed by the agreement within which plaintiff was to satisfy himself in regard to defendant No. 1's title to the property. One month's time was indeed fixed for completing the sale, but it is obvious from the fact that defendant No. 1 had not the title-deeds with him, and that he had to ask plaintiff to allow, and plaintiff allowed, him more time to bring over these deeds from England where they were in the hands of third parties, and that, as a matter of fact, defendant No. 1 did not send any draft conveyance for plaintiff's approval till 15th March, i.e., nearly five months after the agreement of sale was effected; it is obvious from all this that the period of one month was not of the essence of the contract.
During the course of the negotiations, defendant No. 1 on 11th November, 1887, offered to indemnify plaintiff against loss by reason of the possible assertion by Government of their rights to the land. This offer was kept open, because plaintiff did not accept it at once, till 27th April, 1888, when defendant No. 1 finally informed plaintiff that the negotiations were at an end, and he would resist plaintiff's claim. About seven months after this plaintiff wrote to defendant No. 1 that he was willing to accept the offer first made on 11th November, 1887, and kept open till 27th April, 1888.
As defendant No. 1 would not consent to re-open the negotiations, the plaintiff soon after brought his present suit. It has been urged that this seven months' delay was fatal to plaintiff's claim not only to insist on the specific performance of the contract, but also to claim a refund of the purchase-money. The English authorities on the subject of delay show that a delay of six years (Harrington v. Wheeler (2)), in another case of four years eight months (Alley v. Deschamps (3)), and in a third of three years has itself not been considered a [862] sufficient defence. The shortest period was fourteen months after correspondence had ceased—The Marquis of Hertford v. Hoore (4). As a general rule, equity relieves against conditions of time when they are not of the essence of the contract, and unless there is anything in the nature of the property or in the surrounding circumstances which would make it inequitable to interfere—Dart, Vendors and Purchasers, p. 384. Thus in Howe v. Smith (5) time was of the essence not of the essence of the contract, and there was nothing in the circumstances of the property which justified defendant No. 1 in refusing plaintiff's offer to accept the proposal made by defendant No. 1 himself. The seven months' delay under the circumstances did not, in my opinion, disentitle plaintiff from at least claiming back his earnest-money after defendant refused to abide by his own original offer.

The next question is, whether, independently of the delay, there were other circumstances which justified the defendant No. 1 not only in resisting specific performance, but in retaining the earnest-money also. This brings me at once to the consideration of the correspondence between the parties. It is not necessary to go over the whole of this correspondence, as it has been fully noticed in the judgments of the Judges, who came to opposite conclusions in regard to its general effect. It may, however, be stated with some confidence that that correspondence clearly brought out the fact that both the parties were not fully aware of the true nature of defendant No. 1's title to the property in so far as the land included in the compound of the bungalows was concerned. It was to some extent a case of misdescription due to mutual mistake. Defendant No. 1 in his agreement of 12th October, 1887, as also in the newspaper notice, of which he initialled the draft, clearly professed to sell the land with the buildings thereon. Defendant No. 1 had purchased himself both the land and buildings only two years before in 1885, and his own purchase-deed and the mortgage-deed effected by him clearly mention the land without any reservation as belonging to defendant No. 1 and his vendor. The bungalows are described to be freehold. No mention of Government right is made in these [863] earlier documents. Exhibit 89 describes defendant No. 1's vendor as registered proprietor and owner of bungalows, compound and lands. Colonel Waddington and the Trustees in their letters of assent to the intended sale mention the same fact, and make no distinction between the land and the buildings. The draft of the conveyance, Ex. 83, prepared for defendant No. 1 also grants bungalows together with compound, wells, &c., and the measurement of the land sold is stated to be more than two lakhs square feet. The agreement, Ex. 39, and notice, Ex. 46, must be read in connection with defendant No. 1's title-deeds, and when so read it is clear that defendant No. 1 had no misgivings that he was registered proprietor of the land and of the bungalows in the same right, and it was under that impression that he agreed to sell them both as one estate.

As a matter of fact defendant No. 1 would have made nearly 50 per cent. profit in this sale-transaction, as he had purchased the properties for Rs. 30,000 and the sale was to be for nearly Rs. 45,000. In offering such a large sum, it is not at all likely that the plaintiff should have left out of consideration the value of the land. When, therefore, the Secretary to the Cantonment Committee asserted the right of Government to the land as resumable at pleasure without compensation except for the buildings, plaintiff very properly required defendant No. 1 to remove the defect of title, and the defendant No. 1 at first admitted the justice of that demand. In his letters to the plaintiff the defendant No. 1 tried indeed to make out that the Government claim called for no action on his part and that his title was as good as of any other house-holder in the cantonment, but as a matter of fact he did take action, saw the authorities, and sought to remove the defect so unexpectedly disclosed. In his letter, dated 9th November, 1887, to plaintiff, he expressly undertook to make good his title, and complete the sale. The Government Resolution, while sanctioning the sale, did not give up the right of the State to the land, and in fact required the defendant No. 1 to expressly mention the existence of this Government right in the deed. This insertion was, however, subsequently dispensed with. If defendant No. 1 had from the first thought that he had no rights of registered proprietor to the land, he would not have moved Government and the Military authorities in the way he did, and he would not have written Ex. 71 undertaking to make a good title after plaintiff had expressly asked him to get the Cantonment Secretary's notice cancelled. The official notice and the Resolution left it beyond doubt that defendant No. 1 had not the rights of a registered proprietor in the land, and that defendant No. 1 could not make out the title he himself believed he possessed.

As plaintiff was not satisfied, defendant No. 1 on 11th November, 1887, offered to indemnify plaintiff against loss, if plaintiff suffered loss by reason of the exercise of its rights by Government. This offer was kept open by defendant No. 1 for several months; and if plaintiff had consented earlier to accept the defective title, defendant No. 1 would no doubt have executed the deed of which Ex. 83 was the draft. It was his consciousness of this defect in his title to the land that made defendant No. 1 retract the negotiations, and in spite of his notices to close them, kept open the offer of indemnity for five months with an expression of his willingness to return the earnest-money and rescind the contract—Exs. 92, 93, 100, 101, 102, 103.
