appointed him to take security or a pledge in opposition to the debt; whereas an agent for purchase, on the contrary, receives the price in virtue of his being a principal, and a party in the contract, and therefore the constituent cannot prevent him from performing these acts.

Section IV.

Miscellaneous Cases

Joint agents cannot act separately without a mutual concurrence.—If a person appoint two agents, it is not permitted to either of them to act in any matter relative to their agency, without the concurrence of the other. This is the law with respect to all transactions which require thought and judgment (such as sale, Khoola, and so forth, because the constituent, in those transactions, may have a confidence in the joint judgment of both the persons in question, although not in the single judgment of either of them.

Objection.—Where the price is fixed, there can be no need for thought and judgment; and therefore, in that case, the act of one of the parties ought to be valid; whereas it is held to be otherwise.

Reply.—Although the price be fixed, yet there may be occasion for judgment to increase it, and also to make a proper choice of a purchaser.

Except in the management of a suit.—The act of one of two agents without the concurrence of the other is not valid excepting in some particular cases:—as where, for instance, a person appoints two agents for the management of his suit, in which case either of these may lawfully act without the other; because their joint action is impracticable, as it would only create a noise and confusion in the assembly of the Kazee. Their judgment, moreover, is required to the exerted previous to the assembly of the Kazee: in other words, they ought previously to consult with each other, and then one of them ought to attend the meeting of the Kazee to manage the replies and interrogations; which may be more effectually executed by one than two, since in the latter case, much noise and confusion would ensue.

Gratuitous divorce of manumission, the restoration of a deposit, or the discharge of a debt.—In the same manner it is lawful for one of two agents to act singly in case of their having been jointly appointed agents by another to execute a divorce in his behalf without a compensation;—or to emancipate his slave without a consideration;—or to restore a deposit to the owner of it;—or, lastly, to discharge a debt due by him. The reason of this is, that in these cases there is no necessity for consultation and judgment, since in all of them explanation merely is required; and the speech of one man, in this respect, is equal to that of two.—It were otherwise if the constituent had said to the two agents, "divorce a particular wife of mine if you please," or "the business of such a wife is in your hands,"—for in this case it would not be permitted to one of the two agents to divorce the said wife; because the constituent has committed the divorce to the thought and judgment of both; and also, because he has suspended it upon a circumstance relative to both.—namely, their pleasure,—and as he has connected it with a circumstance relative to both, it becomes analogous to where a person connects the divorce with the arrival of two persons at a particular house; in which case the execution of it rests on the arrival of both these persons at the said house, and so also in the case in question, it depends on the joint wish of both the agents.

An agent cannot appoint a secondary agent.—An agent is not permitted to appoint another person an agent to execute a commission to which he himself was appointed, as the constituent, in committing the transaction to him, did not empower him to appoint an agent for the execution of it.—The reason of this is that although the constituent be satisfied with the judgment of his own agent, yet it does not follow that he is satisfied with the judgment of another person since mankind in this respect are different.

Unless by consent of his constituent; or, unless his powers be discretionary.—It is, therefore, not lawful for an agent to appoint an agent, unless with the consent of his constituent; or unless the constituent should have desired the agent to act according to his wisdom and judgment,—in the first of which cases the consent is express; and in the second, the constituent commits his business, in an absolute manner, to the agent's discretion.—As, in this case, however, the agency of the secondary agent is valid, he is the agent of the primary constituent; and hence the primary agent has not the power of dismissing him, nor would his power of agency cease in case of the death of the primary agent. The agencies of both, however, would terminate in the event of the death of the constituent. A case which exemplifies this has been already set forth in treating of the duties of the Kazee.

Contracts entered into by a secondary agent in the presence of the primary are, however, valid.—If an agent appoint an agent without the consent of his constituent, and the secondary agent conclude a contract of sale in the presence of the primary agent, the contract is in that case valid, because it has had the advantage of the thought and judgment of the primary agent, which is the very object of the constituent.—A disagreement, however, subsists with respect to the rights of this contract.—Some have said that they appertain to the primary agent as the constituent has not acquiesced in any other undertaking the fulfilment of the contract; whilst others maintain that they relate to the secondary agent, as being the actual framer of the contract. If, on the other hand, the secondary agent conclude a contract in the absence of the primary agent, it is not valid, as it has not the advantage of the wisdom and judgment of the primary agent.

And they are also valid, although made in his absence, provided he afterwards consent to them.—If, however, the primary agent, having received information of the contract, should express his assent in it, it is then valid: and so also, a contract becomes valid which, having been concluded by some other than the agent, afterwards receives his assent on his hearing of it; since it has thus the benefit of his judgment.

And the same of a contract engagement in by any stranger.—If, also, the primary agent first fix a price to be observed by the secondary agent, and the secondary agent then enter into a contract of purchase or sale, such contract is valid; because the exertion of the primary agent's judgment is evidently required only for the purpose of fixing the price, which has been already done.

Or that (in a case of purchase or sale) the constituent had previously fixed the rate.—It is otherwise, however, where the constituent appoints two agents, and fixes the price himself: for, in this case, notwithstanding the constituent's settlement of the price, the conclusion of the contract by one agent, although at the fixed price, would not be valid.

Joint agents must act together, although the constituent have fixed the rate.—Because where the constituent appoints two agents, notwithstanding his having fixed the price, it is evident that his object is a union of the judgments of both, in order either to increase the quantity of the goods (it they be agents for purchase), or to make a proper choice of purchase, because the exertion of the primary agent's judgment is evidently required only for the purpose of fixing the price, which has been already done.

A Mokatib, a slave, or a Zimmee cannot act on behalf of an infant daughter being a Mussulma—Is a Mokatib, an absolute slave, or a Zimmee, contract a marriage in behalf of a minor daughter who is free and a Mussulma,—or make a purchase or sale in behalf of a minor child under such description,—it is unlawful (and the same of every other transaction which they perform relative to the property of such a child); as a slave or an infidel are not endowed with authority, because of their slavery and infidelity; for as a slave has not the power to marry in his own behalf, it is evident that he cannot have that power with respect to others; and an infidel, on the other hand, has no power over Mussulmans; insomuch that his evidence with respect to them is not admitted.—Besides, the power in these cases (that is, the right of acting with regard to the property of an infant), is granted with a view to the infant's advantage, and out of regard to his interest; and hence it is necessary that this power be consigned to a person competent and affectionate, in order that the end may be answered: now competency is destroyed by slavery; and the existence of affection to a Mussulman is incompatible with infidelity; a right of action, therefore, with regard to the property of the infant in question, cannot be committed to a slave or an infidel.

And the same of an apostate, or infidel alien—Haneefa, Aboo Yoaaf and Mohammed, are of opinion that an apostate who suffers death on account of his apostacy, and an infidel alien, are with respect to an infant daughter who is a Musulima, in the same predicament with a Zimmee (that is to say, neither of these has a right to perform any act with regard to her property, such as purchase or sale, or the contracting of her in marriage with another);—because an infidel alien is endowed with still less power over a Mussulman than a Zimmee; and with respect to an apostate, although (in the opinion of the two disciples) he possesses power with regard to his own property, yet his power over his children, or over their property, remains suspended upon his repentance and return to the faith, according to all our doctors; because a power of action, with respect to the property of an infant, is founded on the infant's advantage, and a regard for his interest; and an apostate's regard for the interest of his child (being a Mussulman) must entirely depend on his return to the faith; now this is a circumstance of doubt; if he be put to death in his apostacy it is then evident that he has no power of action, and all such acts are consequently null:—if, on the other hand, he return to the faith, it becomes the same as if he had been always a Mussulman, and his acts of the nature in question are therefore valid.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE APPOINTMENT OF AGENTS FOR LITIGATION AND FOR SEISIN.—(KHARGOMAT, OR LITIGATION, MEANS A COVERSATION CARRIED ON BETWEEN TWO PERSONS IN THE WAY OF CONTENTION AND DISAGREEMENT.)

Agency for litigation implies and involves an agency for seisin.—If a person appoint another his agent to contend for something in his behalf, the person so appointed is held, in the opinion of all our doctors, to be also an agent for the seisin of that thing whether it be debt or substance.—Ziffer alleges that he cannot be considered as an agent for seisin, since his constituent acquires only in his agency for litigation in his behalf.—Litigation, moreover, is one concern, and seisin is another concern; and the constituent expresses his acquiescence in the litigation, but not in the seisin. The argument of our doctors is that when a person becomes empowered with respect to anything, he necessarily becomes empowered with respect to the consideration of that thing; and the end and completion of a contention for anything is the seisin of that thing.

But decrees are passed on the contrary principle in the present times.—In the present age decrees pass according to the opinion of Ziffer; because of the apparent want of probity of agents in this age; and also, because many men may be trustworthy in regard to the management of a contention, and not with respect to the seisin of property.

—It is to be observed that an agent for litigation is analogous to an agent for evacting the payment of a debt; because he also constitutes seisin of the thing; so much as the seisin of a debt is in effect included in the suit for the payment of it. The common acceptance of the word, however, is different, because from Takzya (extracting by means of a suit at law) seisin is not generally understood; and the common acceptance must be preferred to the virtual meaning—According to the decrees in this age therefore, he is not an agent for seisin.

If there be two agents for litigation, they are in that case required jointly to receive seisin of the thing which is the object of contention; because the constituent has expressed his acquiescence in the probity of them both jointly, and not in that of either of them singly; and as the conjunction of both, with respect to seisin, is practicable, they must therefore take possession together.

—It is otherwise with respect to the mere litigation, because their joint action is in that particular impracticable, as has been already demonstrated.

An agent empowered to take possession of a debt is also an agent for litigation.—Whoever is an agent in behalf of another for the seisin of a debt due to him, is also an agent for litigation in behalf of that person, according to Haneefa (since it is that if the other party bring evidence to prove that the constituent had received payment of his debt, or had given the creditor an acquittal, such evidence, in the opinion of Haneefa, would be admitted).—The two disciples maintain that the agent in question is not an agent for litigation (and such also is reported, by Hasan, from Haneefa): because seisin and litigation are different things; and it does not follow that a person, from being trustworthy with regard to propery, could also be skilled in the business of litigation. The acquiescence of the constituent therefore, in the agency for seisin, does not necessarily involve his acquiescence in the agency for litigation.—The argument of Haneefa is that an agent for the seisin of a debt is an agent for the substantiation of property (that is, he is an agent for the receipt of a consideration for a debt which is the right of the creditor, in order that such consideration may become the property of the creditor; because it is impossible to receive the actual substance of the debt; and hence whatever he receives in the discharge of the debt becomes the property of the creditor; and as this is a compensation, or contract of exchange, the agent is consequently the principal, he being so with respect to all such rights as a contract of exchange requires);—and such being the case, he is of course the plaintiff, and is entitled to carry on the suit in the same manner as an agent for litigating a right of pre-emption, or for purchase. He must resembles, however, an agent for litigating a right of pre-emption; because an agent for the receipt of a debt, institutes his suit prior to the seisin of it, in the same manner as an agent for maintaining a right of pre-emption institutes his suit prior to his taking the right whereas an agent for purchase cannot institute a suit, until he has completed the contract of purchase.

A commission to take possession of substance does not involve a commission to litigate.—An agent for the seisin of substance* is not an agent for litigation, according to all our doctors; because he is a mere trustee; and also, because the seisin of substance is not an exchange: he is, therefore, considered merely as a messenger.—Hence, if a person commission another to take possession of his slave, and the person in whose possession the slave is should prove by witnesses that the constituent had sold the slave to him, the Kazee must not decree the sale against the agent, until the constituent himself appear.

—This proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Analogia would suggest that the slave should be delivered to the agent, because, as his proof has been exhibited against a person who is not the adversary (since the agent is not the adversary), it cannot therefore be admitted. The reason for a more favourable construction; in this particular, is that the evidence goes to two points:—First; to prove the sale on the part of the constituent, and the consequent destruction of his property;—Secondly, to prove that the said agent has no right to make seisin of the said slave.—Now, although the evidence on the first point be not against a regular adversary, yet in regard to the second point it is against a regular adversary (for the agent is the adversary on the second point):—the evidence, therefore, is admitted with respect to the second point, but not with respect to the first point; whence, if the constituent were himself to appear, it would be necessary to exhibit the evidence de novo, to prove that he had sold the slav,—it is therefore the same as if evidence had been adduced to prove that the constituent had dismissed his agent, for that would be admitted so far as to prevent the agent from the seisin: and so also in the case in question. The effect is the same in cases of emancipation, divorce, and the like.

* Arab. Ain;—meaning some actually existant property (such, for instance; as an article borrowed under an arrear loan), in opposition to a debt in money, or to an article compensable by an equal quantity of the same article (such as grain, and the like).

Thus, if a person commission another to bring his wife from her present place of residence,—and the agent having arrived at the place of their residence, the wife should prove, by witnesses, that her husband had divorced her,—or the slave prove, by witnesses, that he or she had been emancipated, such evidence must be admitted, so far as to prevent the agent from carrying them until the constituent shall himself appear,—but not with respect to the divorce, or the emancipation.

An agent for litigation is empowered to make concessions on behalf of his constituent. If an agent for litigation make an acknowledgment, before the Kazee, of something affecting his constituent, such acknowledgment is valid with respect to the constituent. If, however, he should make the acknowledgment before any other than the Kazee, it is not valid (according to Haneefa and Mohammed, arguing on a favourable construction of the law)—but the agent, in consequence of making such acknowledgment before another than the Kazee, is dismissed from his appointment; and therefore, if he should afterwards claim his agency, and bring witnesses to prove his acknowledgment, it would not be admitted.—Aboo Yoosaf alleges that an acknowledgment made before any other than the Kazee is likewise valid with regard to the constituent. What is here said proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Ziffer and Shafei maintain that the acknowledgment is not in either case valid with respect to the constituent: and this (which was the first opinion of Aboo Yoosaf on the subject) is conformable to analogy; because the agent was directed to litigate; and by litigation is understood contention, since this is an essential property of litigation: now acknowledgment is the reverse of contention; and a direction to perform any act cannot extend to the reverse of that act: on which principle it is that (as contention is necessary to the existence of litigation) an agent for litigation is not competent to the acts of composition or exemption: and also, that a commission of agency is valid, where the agent's acknowledgment is expressly excepted from it, for if acknowledgment be comprehended under litigation, the exception of it would be invalid, in the same manner as the exception of the denial of the agent. A similar disagreement also subsists with respect to the case of appointing another his agent to give, in an absolute manner, an answer in his behalf; for this kind of agency is restricted to an answer that relates to litigation; because such is the common practice; and hence an agent to give an answer in an absolute manner is, in fact, an agent for contention. The reason for a more favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is that agency for litigation is indisputably valid; and the validity of it extends to every point in which the constituent is competent. Now the constituent is in an absolute manner competent with respect to an answer, whether it relates to denial or acknowledgment; for his power is not confined and determined to one of these only. The agent, therefore, is also competent to either of the these. Simple litigation, moreover figuratively signifies general reply; and as there is always an affinity between the figurative and the literal sense of a term (as will be hereafter demonstrated), the term must, in the present instance, be received in its figurative sense, so as to render the agency indisputably valid; for if the term be adopted in its literal sense (namely, that it would follow that the appointment is a commission to quarrel and contend: and quarrelling and contention are prohibited; and the appointment of an agent with respect to a prohibited thing is forbidden. It is therefore indispensable that the term be taken in its figurative sense (so as to render the agency valid), as this is most becoming the Mussulman character.

Case of an appointment of agency with an exception of acknowledgment. If a person appoint an agent for litigation, and except his acknowledgment, it is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the appointment is invalid, since after the exception of the acknowledgment there remains only the denial; and as the constituent is not empowered with respect to denial only, except where he knows the claim of the adversary to be unjust; he cannot limit the power of the agent to denial only. It is recorded from Mohammed (on the other hand), that this is valid; for the exception of acknowledgment by the constituent clearly indicates that he himself is empowered only with respect to denial because of his knowing the falsity of his adversary's plea. If, however, he should have expressed himself generally, the commission must be interpreted to convey a power of general reply, which is implied in the condition of Mussulman. It is also said that he should make distinction between the plaintiff and defendant, observing that if a defendant should appoint an agent for litigation and should except his acknowledgment, it is invalid; because a defendant is compelled to make an acknowledgment when put to his oath, and therefore he has not the power to establish agency for a purpose prejudicial to the plaintiff, that is for denial as to this re-his self is not competent. The plaintiff, on the contrary, is at liberty either to acknowledge or deny, as he pleases, and hence he is entitled to appoint an agent for these purposes, and to except the other. Aba Yousaf Argues that an agent is the substitute of his constituent: and as the acknowledgment of a constituent is not limited to the court of the Kazez, so neither ought that of his substitute to be so limited. Huma and Mohammed, on the other hand, argue that agency for litigation extends to a reply, which is termed litigation either in its literal or metaphorical sense. Now an acknowledgment in the assembly of the Kazez is metaphorically termed litigations either because it is an act done to the litigation that has issued, or because the litigation is the cause of the acknowledgment; the acknowledgment, therefore, is limited to the assembly of the Kazez, if, on the other hand, it be proved; by evidence, that such an agent had made an acknowledgment elsewhere than in the assembly of the Kazez, his agency determines: and consequently if he should make a claim with respect to the point concerning which he had before made acknowledgment and should adduce evidence to prove it, his claim would not be admitted, nor would the object of it be yielded to him, because the proof of action of which he has been guilty.

* "In the same manner as the exception of the denial of the agent:"—that is, in the same manner as if the agent's power of denying and rejoining, &c., were expressly excepted from his commission.

† Arab. Khasoomat.—The reasoning in this passage turns entirely upon the primitive sense and generally accepted meaning of the term.
The agent, in this instance, therefore, resembles a father or an ancestor who makes an acknowledgment prejudicial to the infant under his charge in the assembly of the Kazez, which is of no affect; whence if they should afterwards prefer a claim to the object of it, and adduce evidence to prove their right, it would not be admitted, nor would the article in dispute be given to them

Agency for the receipt of a debt, committed to the surety for the debt, is invalid.
If a person be surety for property in behalf of a debtor, and the creditor appoint the said surety his agent for the receipt of the debt, such agency is absolutely invalid for two reasons: First, the business of an agent is to act in behalf of another; and if the agency of the surety were supposed to be valid, it would necessarily follow that he acts as agent in behalf of his own person, in order to exempt himself from responsi-

* Arab. Ameen;—meaning a confident: one whose word must be relied upon.
the agent, had taken the agent himself as security for the restitution, in the event of the absent person's denial of the agency; in which case it would be lawful for him to retake whatever he may have paid, as the agent became surety, and is consequently liable for it.

Objection.—The security, in this case, ought not to be valid, since it is essential to the validity of bail or security that there be a debt due by the suretee; and the suretee, in the present instance, is the constituent, who does not owe any debt.

Reply.—The security is valid; because it is referred to the period when the constituent shall have received the second payment of the debt; in which case he is responsible in the conception of both the agent and the debtor; the security is therefore valid, in the present instance, in the same manner as in all other cases.

If, on the other hand, a person should plead his being the agent of a certain absentee for the receipt of a debt due to him, and the debtor, without either verifying or falsifying his claim, remain silent, and yet pay the debt, and the proprietor of the debt afterwards appear and exact payment of it from the debtor, he (the debtor) is in this case entitled to a repayment from the agent, because he did not verify the agency; for in fact he did nothing else than make a payment in the hope that it would be acquiesced in by the constituent; and, on his being disappointed in this hope, he is consequently entitled to an indemnification from the agent. —The law is also the same where the debtor pays the debt to the agent, after falsifying his claim; as is obvious from the reasons already stated.

—It is however to be observed that, in the several cases of verification, falsification, or silence, it is not permitted to the debtor to retake the article from the agent, after the delivery of it to him, until such time as the constituent appears; because the payment is a part of the constituent from probability (as in the case of his verification), or from construction (as in the case of his falsification or silence), since it is possible that the absentee may afterwards give his assent to it.

—It is, therefore, the same as if he had paid the debt to a Fazoolee, or unauthorized person, in the hope that the proprietor would confirm it; in which case it is not lawful to take back from the Fazoolee what he may have delivered to him; because there exists a possibility of a confirmation of it by the owner; and also, because it is a general rule that, when a person performs an act with any particular view or object he ought not to undo the same unless he be disappointed of the object which prompted it.

Case of a plea of agency urged for the receipt of a trust, in absence of the constituent.—If a person plead his being the agent of a certain person for the receipt of a deposit, and the trustee verify his assertion, yet the law does not award the delivery of the deposit by the trustee to this person, since (in opposition to the preceding case to a debtor) the trustee here makes an acknowledgment with respect to the property of another.—If, however, the person in question plead that "his father having died, the said deposit had devolved by inheritance to him, and that there were no other heirs," and the trustee verify this, he must be directed to deliver the deposit to this person; because the trust is no longer the father's property, after his decease; and the trustee and the person in question are both agreed in its being the property of the heir: —the trustee, therefore, must be directed to deliver his trust to this person as being the heir.

A person commissioned to receive a trust on the plea of having purchased it, is not entitled to receive it from the trustee.—If a person plead that he had purchased a deposit from the proprietor of it, and the trustee verify his assertion, yet the trustee is not entitled to deliver the deposit to him; because the verification of the trustee during the lifetime of the depositor is an acknowledgment with respect to the property of another; and hence their assertions (namely that of the trustee and of the person who performs the claim) are not valid, with regard to the establishment of proof of the sale on the part of the proprietor.

A person commissioned to receive a debt is entitled to receive it, although the debtor plead his having already paid it.—If a person appoint an agent for the receipt of a debt due to him and the debtor plead that he had acquitted himself of the debt to the proprietor, yet it is incumbent on him to pay the debt to the agent; because the agency is here clearly established; but the debtor's acquittance is not established by his assertion: he is therefore not permitted to delay the payment: —but after he has made the payment, he has a claim upon the creditor and may exact an oath from him: but an oath cannot be exacted from the agent, since he is only a substitut.

The seller of an article cannot be compelled to take back the article from the purchaser's agent, on a plea of defect, until the purchaser swears to the defect.—If a person purchase a female slave, and afterwards plead a defect in her, and appoint an agent to manage the litigation with the seller, on this account, and then disappear,—and the agent accordingly institute a suit against the seller for the defect, and the seller plead that the purchaser had knowingly acquiesced in that defect,—in this case the slave is not to be returned to the seller; but a suspension must take place until the appearance of the purchaser, who will then be required to declare upon oath that he did not acquiesce in the defect. If is other wise in the case of a debt (as before recited); for there the debt must be paid to the agent for seisin, in behalf of the creditor, notwithstanding the debtor may plead his having previously acquitted himself of it; because it is there practicable to make a repARATION, by enjoining restitution from the agent of the amount he may have received, on the error being made apparent by the constituent refusing to swear; whereas, in the case in question, if an annulment of the sale were decreed in consequence of the defect, it cannot afterwards be revoked, since a decree for dissolving a sale takes full effect, and continues in force, although an error should afterwards appear with respect to the defect pleaded. — This is the doctrine of Haneefah: according to whom, also, an oath cannot be tendered to the purchaser, after the annulment of the sale, and the return of the subject of it, since it is then to no purpose. — In the opinion of the two disciples, also, the sale ought in this case to be annulled, and the subject of it returned, without a suspension of it on the oath of the purchase, since (according to them) a repudiation is tractable, even in this case, because, if an error should appear in the decree of the Kazee, in consequence of the constituent’s refusal to swear, then the decree becomes null, and the subject of the sale is returned to the purchaser. Some have said that, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the most authentic doctrine is that in both cases a suspension should take place; — that is to say, in the case of the debt, the payment to the agent ought to be deferred, and in the case in question the return of the subject of the sale to the agent of the buyer ought also to be deferred; — because the direct interest of the agent (whence it is that if the purchaser should afterwards appear, an oath is exacted from him without the necessity of the seller preferring a formal plea for it) — the return, therefore, of the article sold, by the purchaser’s agent, is suspended, until the purchaser himself appear and make oath; — out of tenderness to the right of the seller.

A person receiving money, to appropriate to a particular purpose, may pay his own money in lieu of it. — If a person give another ten dirms, in order that he may give them to the family of this person for their maintenance, and the agent, instead of the specific dirms he had received, give ten dirms of his own, this is not a gratuitous payment; on the contrary, he is entitled to retain the specific dirms he received in lieu of those he gave; because an agent for the delivery of maintenance is like an agent for purchase; and such is the law, as has been already related, in treating of an agent for purchase.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE DISMISSAL OF AGENTS.

A constituent may dismiss his agent at pleasure; except where the right of another person is concerned. — It is lawful for a constituent to dismiss his agent, because the agency being his right, he may consequently, if he please, annul it: excepting, however, when the right of another is interwoven with it; as where the agent is an agent for litigation, appointed at the request of the plaintiff, in which case the constituent (who is the defendant) cannot dismiss the said agent, because of the constitution of the right of the plaintiff; since, if he should dismiss him, the right of the plaintiff would be set at nought.

The agency in this instance, therefore, resembles agency interwoven with a contract of pawnage, by the pawner, at the time of settling the contract of pawnage, appointing a person his agent for the purpose of selling the pledge, and with the price so obtained discharging the debt due to the pawnholder; in which case, as the right of the pawnholder is connected with the agency, it is in the power of the constituent to dismiss such an agent; and so also in the present instance.

An agency continues in force, until the agent receives due notice of his dismissal. — If a constituent dismiss his agent, and the agent should not receive any intelligence of it, his agency continues in force until he be apprised of his dismissal; and all his acts until then are binding, as his dismissal is a detriment to him; because it annuls his power of action; and also, because the rights of contracts of purchase and sale appertain and result to him; and accordingly, an agent for purchase does himself pay the price from the estate of the constituent, and an agent for sale delivers the subject of the sale to the purchaser; if, therefore, the dismissal were to operate instantaneously, without his intelligence, and he should, under these circumstances, either make a payment of the price, or delivery of the goods, he must, in such case, become responsible, which is an injury to him. — It is to be observed that agents for marriage, or the like, are in this respect considered in the same light. — A question has been started whether it is requisite that the notification of the dismissal of an agent be made by two men, or by one upright man; but as the law on this head, has already been laid down intreating of the duties of the Kazee (under the head to Decrees relative to Inheritance), it is here unnecessary to repeat it.

A commission of agency is annulled by the death, confirmed lunacy, or apostacy of the constituent. — If a constituent die, or becomes an absolute idiot, or having apostatized, he is united to a hostile country, in all these cases the commission of his agent becomes null; because a commission of agency is not a thing of an absolute or irrevocable nature, since it is in the power of the constituent, without the consent of the agent, to dismiss him; and such being the case, it necessarily follows that the existence of it must depend on the existence of the power which created it originally, as it is requisite that the constituent should, during every moment of its existence, continue to possess the same power or capacity with respect to its formation, as he did at the beginning; — and this power or capacity ceases in consequence of the above-mentioned accidents.—The absolute idiotism here mentioned is conditioned by Kadoore, as a small degree of it stands only as a temporary deprivation of sense.—The limit of absolute idiotism, according to Aboo Yoosaf, is fixed at one month, since by that space of lunacy the duty of fasting is remitted.—It is also related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that its limit is more than one month and one day, since by that space of idiotism the observance of the five stated prayers is remitted, whence it is that an idiot in that degree is considered as defunct.—Mohammed has said that the limit ought to be extended to a complete year, since in that space of time idiotism occasions the omission of all the religious duties prescribed to a Mussulman; and that, therefore, from a principle of caution, it ought to be extended to that period. With respect to the opinion of some of the pupils of the Kadi, it is suggested (on the supposition that an idiot is adjudged to be related to a hostile country) (as mentioned in this case), lawyers observe that it is the doctrine of Haneefa; because, according to him, all the acts of a person who simply apostatizes remain suspended; if, therefore, he afterwards repent, and return to the faith, his acts (and consequently his commission of agency) are confirmed; but if he be either put to death on account of his apostasy; or fly to the infidels his acts are rendered void, and his commission of agency is annulled. In the case of the other, the acts of an apostate are valid, and therefore his commission of agency is not annulled, unless in case of his dying, or being put to death, or being expatriated, by a decree of the Kazeel.

But not by apostasy if the constituent be a woman.—If the constituent be a woman; and apostatize, her constitution of agency nevertheless, remains binding until her death, or until her removal to an infidel country, because it has been determined that the apostasy of a woman has no effect on her contracts, such as sale, or the like.

Cases in which an appointment of agency by a Mokatib, a Muez, or a copiater, are annulled.—Is a Mokatib appoint an agent, and afterwards become incapable of discharging his ransom,—or, if a privileged slave appoint an agent, and afterwards be laid under restriction,—or, if one of two partners appoint an agent, and the partners should afterwards separate and dissolve their partnership, in all these cases the agency becomes null, whether the agent may or may not have received intelligence of these supervenient circumstances; (such as the incapacity of the Mokatib, and so forth), for the reason already assigned, that the continuance of agency depends on the continual existence of the power and capacity of the constituent to create it; which power discontinues in consequence of any of the above circumstances. Now this reason obtains in either case (that is, whether the agent be informed of these circumstances, or not): in either case, therefore, the agency is annulled.

The reason of this that the dismissal of the agents is a dismissal by effect and of necessity, and therefore does not rest upon his knowledge;—in the same manner (for instance) as an agent for sale is dismissed when the thing is sold by the constituent; in which manner is the subject of it no longer remains.

A commission of agency is annulled by the death or lunacy of the agent.—If an agent should die, or become an absolute idiot; the agency ceases; because the continuance of agency stands on the same ground as its commencement; and as, at the commencement, it is requisite that the agent be capable of executing the orders of his constituent, it follows that the continuance of the capacity is a condition of the continuance of his agency; and this capability ceases in the present instance, in consequence of the death or idiotism.

Or, by his apostasy and flight to a hostile country.—In the same manner also, if an agent apostatize and go to an infidel country, his acts are not binding; unless he again become a Mussulman, and return, in which case the agency reverts to him.—The author of this work observes that this is according to Mohammed; but that, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the agency does not revert, notwithstanding the agent's returning to the faith and to his country. The argument of Mohammed is that a commission of agency is a latitude, or endowment with power of action, as it is the renewal of the her to such power which would otherwise oppose itself. Now the agent's power of action, so far as merely regards himself, rests upon the existence in him of certain qualities, namely, rationality, freedom, and maturity of years; and he has been rendered incapable of exercising that power merely by a supervenient circumstance (namely, his desertion to a hostile country); when, therefore, the cause of this disability is removed, if the latitude still continue in force, he again becomes an agent, as before. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is that a commission of agency is an investiture with a power of passing;—in other words, the agent, in virtue of his commission, is possessed of a power of passing his acts, so that they shall be binding upon another, namely, his constituent: in short, in virtue of his appointment, he is invested with the power of passing his acts, but not with the power of performing those acts, as this power he possessed in virtue of his natural competency. Now the power of passing acts, or, in other words, agency, ceases on apostasy and desertion to a hostile territory, as these circumstances are held to be the same as the death of a Mussulman; and it does not afterwards revive on the agent's again becoming a Mussulman, and returning to the abode of the Mussulmans; in the same manner as (in such a case) the property in an Ami-Walid or a Modabbir does not revive; in other words; if a master apostatize and go to the abode of the infidels, his Modabbirs and Am-Walids become free, and his property in them does not revive in case of his returning to his faith and his country.

Agency is not renewed by the repentance and return of an apostate constituent. If a constituent forsakes a Mussulman, and return to the country of the Mussulmans, after having apostatized and gone off to a hostile country, the power of his agent, which had been annulled, does not in that case revive, according to the Zahir Rawayet. Mohammed is of opinion that the agency revive, in the same manner as in the preceding case of the apostasy of the agent.—The reason for the distinction (recorded) to be: Zahir Rawayet) between the case of an apostate constituent and an apostate agent is, that the foundation of agency, with respect to a constituent, is property, which becomes null in consequence of apostasy; but the foundation of it, with respect to an agent, is rationality, freedom, skill, and maturity of years, circumstances which are not extinguished by apostasy.

Agency for any particular act is annulled by the constituent himself performing that act.—If a person appoint another his agent for any particular concern, and afterwards execute that concern himself, the agency in such case becomes null.—This case admits of a variety of modes; as where, for instance, a person appoints an agent to emancipate his slave, or to make him a Mokatib, and he afterwards himself emancipates, or makes a Mokatib of, the slave.—or, where a person appoints an agent for the contracting of marriage between him and a particular woman, and he himself afterwards concludes the contract,—or, where a person appoints another his agent for the purchase of a specific article, and he himself afterwards purchases that article,—or, where a person appoints a person to divorce his wife, and he himself afterwards divorces her three times (or divorces her one time, and her edict expires),—or, where a person appoints an agent to conclude a Khoola with his wife, and he afterwards concludes the Khoola with her;—for in all these cases the agency (because of its impracticability in consequence of the anticipation of the constituent in the performance of these acts) is null; into much that, in the case of marriage, if the constituent should afterwards irrevocably divorce the woman he had so married, it would not then be lawful for the agent to contract a marriage with her in behalf of the constituent, because the object of the constituent, in the agency, had been already obtained, and the necessity of it, of consequence, no longer existed. (It is otherwise, however, where the agent contracts the woman, and afterwards divorces her in behalf of the constituent; because, in this instance, the constituent's object in the agency has not been obtained, and consequently the necessity for it still exists.)

An agency dissolved by any act of the constituent cannot afterwards revive.—If a person appoint another his agent for the sale of a slave, and afterwards sell that slave himself, and the purchaser return the slave to him, in consequence of a decree of the Kazee, founded on the proof of a defect, it is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the agent is not then entitled to sell the said slave, because the constituent in selling him himself, did virtually prohibit the agent from executing the deed, and it consequently becomes the same as if he had dismissed him.—Mohammed, on the other hand, alleges that the agent may in this case resign him, because the agency still exists, since (according to him) agency is the licensing of action.—It is otherwise where a person appoints an agent for executing a gift, and afterwards makes the gift himself, and again retracts it; for in this case it is not lawful for the agent to make the gift, since the voluntary retraction of it by the constituent did clearly indicate his wish that it should not take place: in opposition to the case of the return of the subject of a sale founded on a decree of the Kazee to the constituent, because there the constituent acts from necessity in the receiving of it; and there exists of course no argument to show that he does not wish the sale to take place: when, therefore, the subject of the sale, in consequence of being returned, becomes completely his property, the agent is entitled to resell it.

CHAPTER I.

Distinction between plaintiff and defendant.—The Moodaa, or plaintiff, is a person who, if he should voluntarily relinquish his claim, cannot be compelled to prosecute it; and the Moodaa-ali-hee, or defendant, as a person who, if he should wish to avoid the litigation, is compellable to sustain it. Some have defined a plaintiff, with respect to any article of property, to be a person who, from his being dispossessed of the said article, has no right to it but by the establishment of proof; and a defendant to be a person who has a plea of right to that article from his seisin or possession of it. Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, has said that a defendant is a person who denies. — This is correct: but it requires a skill and knowledge of jurisprudence to distinguish the denier in a suit; as the reality and not the appearance is efficient; and it frequently happens that a person is in appearance the plaintiff, whilst in reality he is the defendant. Thus a trustee, when he says to the owner of the deposit, "I have restored to you your deposit," appears to be plaintiff, insamuh as he pleads the return of the deposit; yet in reality he is the defendant, since he denies the obligation of responsibility; and hence his assertion, corroborated by an oath, must be cre.lite.

A plaintiff must particularly state the subject of his claim. — No claim is admissible unless the plaintiff explain the species and quantity of the article which is the object of it; because the end of a claim is, upon the establishment of the proof, a decree for delivery of the Kasheen, for ending the matter obligatory upon the defendant: but no obligation can take place with respect to a matter of uncertainty.

Which (if, be moveable property) must be produced in court. — Therefore, the article be still existing, and in the possession of the defendant, he is required to produce it in the court of the Kasheen, in order that the plaintiff may possibly refer to it in the exhibition of his claim. In the same manner, the production of it is necessary at the time of the delivery of testimony, or of the administration of an oath to the defendant; because on these occasions the greatest possible degree of certainty and knowledge is requisite; and this is best answered by a pointed reference with respect to moveable property, such as may be brought into the court of the Kasheen, since a pointed reference most completely ascertains and determines anything.

The defendant must appear to answer to a valid claim. — When the claim of the plaintiff is of a valid nature, the appearance of the defendant is necessary. This practice has been followed by Kasheen in all ages. — It is, moreover, incumbent on the defendant to give a reply to the plea, when he is present, in order that the object of his presence may be answered.

And must produce the subject of it. — It is also necessary to produce the subject of the claim, for the reason already stated — It is likewise incumbent on the defendant, in case of his denial, to take an oath, as shall be explained in the latter part of this chapter.

Or the value of it must be specified. — If the subject of the claim be not present, a bare explanation of the quality of it is not sufficient; for it is indispensable, in this case that the value be specified, in order that the subject of the claim may be fully ascertained; because the substance of an entity is known by an explanation of its value, and not by that of its quality, since many individuals of that genus may partake of the same qualities; and as an actual sight of the article is, in this instance, unattainable, an explanation of the value is accepted in the place of a pointed reference to it. — (The lawyer Aboo Leys has said that to an explanation of the value ought to be added that of the gender.)

Or (if the object consist of land) the plaintiff must define the boundaries, &c., and must make an explicit demand of it. — If the claim relate to land, or other immovable property, it is requisite that the plaintiff define the boundaries, and say "that land is in the possession of the defendant, and I claim it from him;" — because such property cannot be described by a pointed reference, as it is utterly impossible to produce it in the assembly of the Kasheen; a definition of the boundaries therefore suffices, as immovable property may be ascertained by such a definition. — It is necessary to define the four boundaries, and to specify the place of every boundary, and to explain, as has been said, the manner of its ascertained; or if the boundary be not ascertained, this is indispensable requisite; because the defendant is not liable to the suit, unless he be possessed of the land. As, however, the assertion of the plaintiff and the verification of the defendant is not alone sufficient to prove this, it is requisite that the plaintiff prove the possession of the defendant by the evidence of witnesses, or that the Kasheen be himself acquainted with the circumstance. This is approved: because in the assertion of the plaintiff and the verification of the defendant there is room for suspicion, since it is still possible that the land may be in the possession of another, and that they may have agreed in its being in the possession of the defendants, to induce the Kasheen to pass a decree. — It is otherwise with respect to moveable property, because the seisin of the possessor being, in that case, determinable by sight, there is no necessity for proof by means of witnesses.—With respect to the plaintiff’s saying, “I claim it from the defendant,” this is also indispensably requisite; because to demand it is his right, and the demand must therefore be made; and also because it is possible that the land may be in the possession of the defendant in virtue of a pawnage, or detention after a sale of it, to answer the price, and this apprehension is removed by the claim of it. —Lawyers have observed that because of the above possibility, it is requisite, in a case of moveable property, that the plaintiff declare that the thing is unjustly in the possession of the defendant.

A claim for debt requires only the claim. —If the claim relate to debt, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to say, “I claim it.” For as the person on whom the obligation rests is himself present, there remains only the claim of it; and this it is incumbent on the plaintiff to make, because it is his right, and also, because, until he himself claim it, the Kazee can take no notice of it.

And a description of the species and amount.—It is, however, necessary that he explain whether it consist of dirms or deenars, and whether it be gold or silver, as such explanation defines the debt.

Process to be observed by the Kazee.—What has now been mentioned is an explanation of the validity of claims. It is to be observed that the propriety of a plaintiff’s claim is valid, the Kazee must interrogate the defendant, and ask him “whether the plea be true or not?” If he acknowledge the truth of it, then the Kazee must pass a decree, founded upon his acknowledgment, because acknowledgment does in itself produce the effect; the Kazee must, therefore, order the defendant to give up the possession of the article concerning which he has made the acknowledgment, and to deliver it to the plaintiff. —If, on the other hand, the defendant deny the truth of the allegation, the Kazee must require the plaintiff to produce evidence, because the Prophet, in a case where a defendant objected to the allegation, said first to the plaintiff: “have you evidence?” and on his answering in the negative, he then said, “it belongs to you to demand an oath from the defendant.” Now it appears from this tradition, that the right of demanding an oath from the defendant rests upon the defect of evidence on the part of the plaintiff; and hence it is requisite first to demand the evidence of the plaintiff and on his making known his inability to produce it, to demand an oath from the defendant. —If, therefore, the plaintiff produce evidence in attestation of his case, the Kazee must pass a decree in his favour, as in that case there cannot be any suspicion of falsify. If, on the other hand, he be unable to produce evidence, and demand the defendant to be put to his oath, in that case the Kazee (because of the tradition above quoted) must administer an oath to him, the demand of the plaintiff, however, is requisite to the exaction of the oath, as it is high right.

CHAPTER II.

OF OATHS.

An oath must not be required of the defendant when the plaintiff’s witnesses (although not immediately present) are within call. —If a plaintiff declare that “his witnesses are present in the city, but not in the court of the Kazee,” and should nevertheless demand an oath from the defendant, in that case (according to Haneefa) the defendant must not be required to take the oath. Aboo Yosef alleges that an oath must, in this case, be exacted from the defendant; because it is established, by the tradition before cited, than an oath is the right of the plaintiff; and it must consequently be granted to him in case of his demanding it. The reasoning of Haneefa is that that the establishment of a right in the plaintiff to exact an oath from the defendant is founded on the supposition of his inability to produce evidence, as is expressly declared in the above mentioned tradition; hence until his inability to produce evidence be made apparent, his right does not take place, any more than if the witnesses were present in the court of the Kazee. The opinion of Mohammad (as reported by Khasaf) coincides with that of Aboo Yosef; acceding, however, to a report of Tahavee, it coincides with that of Haneefa.

An oath cannot be exacted from the plaintiff. —An oath cannot be exacted from the plaintiff, because of the saying recorded in the traditions of the Prophet, “evidence is incumbent on the part of the Applicant,” and an oath on that of the Respondent,” from which it is evident that an oath is not in any shape incumbent on the plaintiff, otherwise the necessity of it would not have been restricted to the respondent or defendant. —(Shafei, however, dissents from this doctrine).

The evidence adduced on the part of the plaintiff must be preferred to that adduced on the part of the defendant. —If both the actual possessor [of the property] and the plaintiff should adduce evidence in support of their absolute right of property, in that case the evidence of the person in possession must be rejected and that of the plaintiff admitted. Shafei maintains that the evidence of the possessor must be admitted, and a decree passed in his favour; because the evidence is corroborated by the possession, and is consequently strong and apparent. It ought therefore to be preferred in the same manner as evidence in favour of the possessor is preferred in cases of birth, marriage, or a claim to a slave that has been emancipated, or that has become an Am-Walid, or been constituted a Modabbir; in other words, if two persons should severally assert that a particular horse, in the possession of one of them, was the offspring of a horse belonging to him; and if each should bring evidence in support of his assertion, in that case the evidence of the possessor would be preferred; and so also in the case of a contested wife who in the possession of one of two claimants,—or in the case of a freedman, an Am-Walid, or Modabbar, who is in the possession of one of the two persons who claims the right of property. In reply to this reasoning of Saei, our doctors argue that it is not the evidence adduced by the possessor which proves the absolute right of property, because the possession of itself indicates the absolute right and consequently anticipates the proof, which would else have resulted from the evidence. It is otherwise with respect to the evidence adduced by the person not in possession, because by that absolute right of property is proved; and as the evidence on the part of the person not in possession occasions proof, it is therefore admitted, since as the purpose of evidence is to establish proof, the evidence which occasions proof must be preferred. It is to be observed that possession indicates a right of property absolutely, but not relatively, as in the cases adduced by Saei: and hence the analogy conceived by him between these cases and the case in question is not just.

The defendant refusing to swear, the Kazee must forthwith pass a decree against him.—If the defendant refuse to take an oath in a case where it is incumbent upon him the Kazee must then pass a decree against him because of his refusal, and must tender obligatory upon him the object of the claim on behalf of the plaintiff. Saei maintains that the Kazee must not pass a decree immediately on the refusal of the defendant, but must first administer an oath to the plaintiff and then pass a decree against the defendant; because the refusal to take an oath admits of three different constructions:—I. It may proceed from a desire to avoid a false oath;—II. It may proceed from an unwillingness to take an oath, although, in testimony of the truth, form an opinion of its being derogatory to the deponent’s character; and III. It may proceed from a doubt and uncertainty whether the matter be true or false;—and as the refusal to take an oath is a matter of uncertainty, it cannot amount to proof (since anything of an uncertain nature is incapable of constituting proof); and as the oath of the plaintiff manifests the right, recourse must therefore be had to that. The arguments of our doctors, on the other hand, are that the refusal of the plaintiff to take an oath, indicates either a concession of the thing claimed or an acknowledgment of the validity of the claim; since, if the case were otherwise, he could have no motive to refuse an oath when the maintenance of his right depended upon it. Besides, there are no grounds on which an oath can be tendered to a plaintiff, since the tradition before mentioned expressly evinces that an oath is restricted to the defendant.

The Kazee must give three separate noti- fications to the defendant.—It is incumbent on the Kazee to give three notifications to the defendant, by three times repeating to him, "I tender you an oath; which if you take it is well; if not, I will pass a decree in favour of the claimant,"—This threefold repetition is required because of the want of certainty in case of refusal to take an oath, since there subsists a disagreement with regard to the validity of passing a sentence upon it. The necessity of the repetition has been recited by Khasaf, as from a principle of caution, and to cut off the defendant from any further preference).—It is indeed, an established tenet, that if a decree be passed on one notification only, it is valid; and this is approved doctrine,—It is most laudable, however, to give three notifications.

Refusal to swear is of two kinds, real and virtual.—A refusal to take an oath is of two kinds: I. Real (where the defendant expressly says, "I will not take an oath") and, II virtual (where he remains silent).

The effect in this latter case is the same as in the former, provided it be known that the person refusing is neither deaf nor dumb. This is approved doctrine.

An oath cannot be exacted from the defendant in claims respecting marriage, divorce, Aila, bondage, Willa, punishment, or Laan. —If a man claim marriage with a woman, or a woman with a man, and the defendant in either case deny the claim, then (according to Haneefa) it is not necessary to exact an oath.—The law is the same (according to Haneefa) with respect to a claim of reversal [after divorce], or of resindment in a case of Aila,—or a claim of servitude, or a claim of offspring, or claim of lineage, Willa, punishment, and Laan. Thus if, in a case of divorce, the wife, after the expiration of her edit, were to advance a plea of reversal against her husband, or the husband to advance a plea of reversal against his wife, and the defendant should, in either case, deny the claim, or if, in a case of Aila, either of the parties were to plead a resindment from the vow, and the other to deny it,—or, if a person were to claim the right of slavery to another whose condition is unknown, or he whose condition is unknown claim his being the slave of that other, and the defendant in either case deny the claim. —or, if a female slave were to plead her being an Am-Walid to a particular man, and that a certain person is their offspring, and the man himself deny it,—or, if a person were to plead that another of unknown birth is his son, or that other plead that this person is his father, and the defendant in either case deny the claim,—or, if a person were to plead that another of known condition had been emancipated by him and that he therefore possesses the right of Willa over him, or that other plead that he had been emancipated by him and the defendant, in either case, deny the claim,—or, if a person were to plead that another had committed whoredom, and that other deny it—or, lastly, if a wife should plead that her husband had slandered her,—in all these cases it is not necessary (according to Haneefa) to exact an oath from the defendant. The two disciples maintain that it is requisite to exact an oath from the defendant in all these cases, excepting in the cases of punishment or of the Laan; for they argue that a refusal to take an oath amounts to an admission, on his part, that the refusal is an acknowledgment that the property is false in his denial: a refusal to take an oath is, therefore, an acknowledgment either in reality or in effect; and acknowledgments are admitted in all the above cases. This species of acknowledgment, however, is of a doubtful nature, as it is not a perfectly valid acknowledgment; and punishment is remitted in consequence of any doubt; and as Laan is also punishment in effect, they hold that, in that instance also, an oath cannot be imposed. The reasoning of Haneefa is that a refusal to take an oath amounts to a concession of the object to the plaintiff; after such refusal, therefore, it remains unnecessary to exact oath, because of the attainment of the object independent of it,—(it is most laudable to consider the refusal to swear in the light of a grant of concession, as it avoids the consequence of the defendant falsifying in his denial).—Now as a refusal to take an oath is shown to be a concession of the thing in dispute, it follows that such refusal can have no effect in the above cases, since they are not of such a nature as admit of concession: an oath, therefore, is not exacted from the defendant in such cases; because the advantage proposed, in exacting an oath, is to enable the Kazee to pass a decree in consequence of the refusal; and this advantage cannot be obtained in such cases.

* This case does not, like all the rest, hold true when the terms of its are reversed; for in case the claim should have been made on the part of the man, it is considered as an acknowledgment, and the denial of the woman is then of no effect.

Objection.—If a refusal to take an oath be equivalent to a concession, the refusal of a Maktib, or of a privileged slave, ought not to be admitted, since neither of these is competent to make a concession.

Reply.—A refusal to take an oath is considered as a concession, in order to remedy the evil of contention: the refusal of Mokatibs and privileged slaves is therefore admitted.

Objection.—If a refusal to take an oath be a concession, it ought not to be admitted in claims of debt, since the subject of a gift must necessarily be substance, whereas a debt relates only to quality.

Reply.—The validity of a concession of this nature, in cases of debt, is admitted in conformity with the conception of the plaintiff; for he conceives the thing he receives to be that actual thing to which he is entitled. Besides, concession, in this instance, merely means a cessation of obstruction; that is to say, the defendant does not obstruct the plaintiff if taking his property, and he accordingly takes it, as property is a matter of but light concern. It is otherwise with respect to the particulars before mentioned, as these are matters of light concern, and hence it is not lawful for the defendant to make a gift of them.

A thief refusing to swear, becomes liable for the property stolen.—An oath must be exacted from a thief; and if he should refuse to take it, he becomes liable for the property, but does not subject himself to the penalty of amputation before he becomes two consequences, namely, responsibility for the property, and the loss of his hand; and as his refusal establishes the first consequence, but not the second, it is therefore the same as if the fact had been proved by one man and two women, in which case a responsibility for the property takes place, but not a loss of the hand.

A claim founded on divorce before consummation entitles a wife to her half dower, where the husband declines swearing.—If a wife advance a claim against her husband, by asserting that he has divorced her previously to consummation, an oath must be tendered to the husband, and if he refuse to take it, he becomes responsible for her half dower, according to all our doctors, because (according to them), oaths are admitted in cases relative to divorce, and particularly where the object is property.—In the same manner also, oaths are admitted in cases of marriage, where the wife claims her dower, as this is claim relative to property, which is established by a refusal to take an oath, though the marriage be not thereby nullified. In the same manner also, oaths are administered in claims of parentage, where the claim relates to some right, such as inheritance or maintenance (as where a disabled person claims that he is the brother of another, and that his maintenance is incumbent upon that other, who denies the same).—In cases also of invalid recessions from gifts (as where, a person wishing to retract his gift, the grantee asserts that he is his brother, and that, on account of such relation he has no right to retract, and the granter denies the same), an oath is tendered to the defendant, as the objects of them are the rights alluded to.

Please of consanguinity admit of an oath being tendered to the defendant.—An oath is not tendered, according to the two disciples, in simple cases of consanguinity, unless where the relation is of such a nature as to be established by the acknowledgment of the defendant; as where a person, for instance asserts that another person is his father, o his son,—or a woman asserts that a certain person is her father,—or a man or woman claims a right of Willa, or a man or woman claims marriage,—in wh ch cases, if the defendant acknowledge the relationship, the Willa, or the marriage, they are established according to the second; and if the defendant deny to make oath, this (according to the two disciples) is equa lent to acknowledgment. It is otherwise where a woman alleges that a certain person is her son, because in that case the relationship depends on another, and therefore, as the acknowledgment of the defendant can have no effect, so neither will his refusal to take an oath.

Case of a claim of retaliation.—If a person claim a right of retaliation upon another, and the defendant deny it, in this case (in the opinion of all our doctors) an oath must be administered to him. If he refuse to take it, and the retaliation relate to the member of the body, he must in that case suffer retaliation; but if it relate to murder, he must be imprisoned until he either confess or take an oath of exculpation.—This is according to Haneefa.—The two disciples are of opinion that in either case a fine must be imposed because, although (according to their doctrine) a refusal to take an oath is an acknowledgment, yet it is attended with a degree of doubt (as has been already explained), and consequently cannot establish retaliation; a fine of fifteen dinars therefore does especially where the bar to the retaliation arises from a circumstance on the part of the person who is liable to the retaliation; as when the avenger of blood claims for wilful murder, and the defendant acknowledges erroneous murder. The argument of Haneefa is that the members of the body of a man are considered in the same light with property, and hence a concession with respect to them is admitted in the same manner as it is admitted in the case of property; for if a person should say to another, "cut off my hand," and that other accordingly cut it off, he would not be subject to any compensation, which clearly proves that the concession thereof is lawful, although it be not allowed to the man, in this instance, to cut off the hand, as it is attended with no advantage to him. In short, concessions are allowed with respect to parts of the body, but not with respect to the body itself; and as a refusal to swear, in cases of retaliation with respect to the parts of the body, is a concession of an advantageous nature (as being the means of terminating a contention), it follows that the cutting off the hand is advantageous; in this instance, in the same manner as it is advantageous to amputate a limb in a case of mortification, or to draw a tooth in case of excessive pain.

Where the plaintiff's witness are within call, the defendant must give bail for his appearance for three days.—If a plaintiff assert that "his witnesses are in the city, the defendant must, in that case, be required to give bail, answer for his appearance within the term of three days, lest he be destroyed in a second; and thus the right of the plaintiff be destroyed—and it is lawful for the defendant to take bail for his appearance (according to our doctors), as has been already explained.—

*The taking of bail from the defendant, in this instance, immediately on the prefer ment of the allegation by the plaintiff, proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, because of its being advantageous to the plaintiff, and not materially detrimental to the defendant: and the reason for taking it is that it is incumbent upon the defendant to make his appearance in court upon the instant of the claim (whence it is that a person is immediately despatched to summon him); and as this might prevent him from going on with any business in which he may be then employed, it is therefore lawful to take bail for his appearance.

The term of three days, as above mentioned, is recorded from Haneefa; and that term is approved.—In taking bail (according to the Zahir Raw.yi) there is no difference between an unknown person and one of established note; nor between the claim of a large and of a small sum.

But if the witness be not within call, bail cannot be required from the defendant.

—The declaration of the plaintiff however that "his witnesses are in the city," is indispensable towards the taking of bail for appearance; and hence, if the plaintiff should say, "I have no witnesses," or, "my witnesses are absent from the city," bail is not in that case to be required from the defendant, as it is of no use.† If, therefore, the defendant, in this instance, upon being applied to, give bail for his appearance, it is well: but if he refuse, the Kazee must then direct the plaintiff to attend and watch over him, in order that his own right may not be destroyed: excepting, however, where the defendant may happen to be a tra'eller, or about to travel. For then the plaintiff is to watch over him only whilst in the court of the Kazee; and if he should take bail for his appearance under these circumstances, it must be extended only to the breaking up of the court of the Kazee; because if either the bail or the watching over him were extended to a longer period, it would occasion a detriment to the defendant, in as much as he would be prevented, during that space, from pursuing his journey: but where it is limited to the time of the sitting of the court, he is not subjected to any apparent inconvenience.—The particulars of watching or attendance will be explained in treating of inhibition.

Section.

Of the Manner of Swearing, and requiring an Oath.

The oath must be taken in the name of God.—An oath is not worthy of credit unless it be taken in the name of God, because the Prophet has said "whoever takes an oath, let him take it in the name of God; otherwise let him omit the oath entirely."—and also, because he has declared "whoever takes an oath otherwise than in the name of God is most certainly an Associator."*

And the Kazee must dictate the terms of it.—It is incumbent upon the Kazee to desire the swearer to corroborate his oath by reciting the attributes of God.—Thus he must direct him, for instance, to say, "I swear by the God than whom there is no other righteous God, who is acquainted with that is hidden and apparent, that neither by me, nor on my behalf, is the amount due to Omar which he claims, nor any part of it."—The Kazee is at liberty either to add or diminish from this oath as he pleases; but he must not so far extend his caution as to repeat the oath, because it is not necessary to swear more than once.—If a person should swear "by God, by the merciful, by the most merciful"—it is considered as three oaths; but if the two last particles of swearing be omitted it is then only one.—It is to be observed that the Kazee has the option either of adding the corroboration to the oath, or of omitting it, and simply desiring the defendant to swear "by God."—Some have said that it is improper to prescribe the corroboration to such as are known to be virtuous, but that to all others it is necessary.—Others, again, have said that the corroboration is necessary in claim to a great amount, but not where the amount is small.

Swearing by divorce or emancipation must not be admitted.—A defendant must not swear by divorce or emancipation (as if he should say, "if the claim preferred against me be just, my wife is divorced," or "my slave is emancipated")—because of the tradition before quoted.—Some, however, have said that, if in our times, if the plaintiff should importunately require it, the Kazee may then administer to the defendant an oath by divorce or emancipation; since in this age there are many men who scruple not to swear by the name of God, but who are, nevertheless, averse from an oath by emancipation or divorce.

Jews must swear by the Pentateuch, and Christians by the Gospel.—The Kazee must administer an oath in a Jew, by directing him to say, "I swear by the God that revealed the Pentateuch to Moses;"—and to a Christian, by directing him to say, "I swear by the God that sent down the gospel of Jesus;"—because the Prophet, upon a certain occasion, administered an oath to a Jew, by saying to him, "I desire you to swear by the God that hath sent down the Pentateuch to Moses, that such is the law with regard to whoredom in your book;" and also, because the Jews believe in the divine mission of Moses, and the Christians in the divine mission of Jesus Christ.—In the administration of oaths to them, therefore, it is necessary to corroborate them, by a specification of the books which have been received through their respective prophets.

Pagans must swear by God.—The Kazee must administer an oath to a Majoosce by directing him to say "I swear by the God that created fire."—This is recorded, by Mohammed, in the Mahsoot; but it is related of Haneefa, in the Nawadir, that he never administered an oath otherwise than in the name of God.—Khasaf, moreover, reports that Haneefa never gave an oath to any excepting Christians and Jews, otherwise than in the name of God, because in confounding fire with the name of God, a reverence is shown to it to which it is not entitled: contrary to the Old or New Testament, as these are the books of God, and therefore entitled to reverence. This doctrine has been adopted by several of our modern doctors.

An oath cannot be administered to an idolator otherwise than in the name of God, because all infidels believe in God, as is evident from this sentence of the Koran, "If ye ask of them (the infidels) who hath created you, verily they will answer, GOD ALMIGHTY."

Oaths must not be administered in an infidel place of worship.—An oath must not be administered to infidels in their place of worship, because the Kazee is prohibited from entering such a place.

The oaths of Mussulmans need not be corroborated by swearing them at a particular time, or in a particular place.—It is not necessary, in administering an oath to Mussulmans, to corroborate it by means of the time or place (such as by the administration of it on a Friday, or in the mosque). because the object of an oath is a reverence to him in whose name it is taken, and this depends not on any particular time or place.

Besides, if the corroboration of oaths to Mussulmans, by a restriction to time and place, were necessary, it would subject the Kazee to an inconvenience, in the necessity he would be under of attending at the particular time and place; and the law admits not of inconvenience, more especially where the fulfilment of right, or the execution of justice, does not depend upon it.

Cases in which the oath of the defendant must relate to the cause; and cases in which it must relate to the object.—If a person allege that he has bought a slave from another for a thousand dirms, and the seller deny the fact; in this case the seller must be required to swear, in the following manner, "I swear by God that there does not absolutely at present exist any contract of sale between me and the plaintiff;" and not in this manner, "I swear by God that I have not sold, &c."—because it often happens that a sale is made, and afterwards an Akala, or dissolution of the contract, takes place.—In cases of usurpation it is necessary that the defendant swear, in the presence of the plaintiff, in this manner, "there is no part of that which you allege that I have usurped from you, due by me," and not "I have not usurped, &c."—because an usurpation is often done away by the proprietor selling or making a gift of the thing to the usurper.—In cases of marriage it is requisite that the defendant swear to this effect, no marriage does not take place between me and the plaintiff;"—because a marriage is sometimes dissolved by Khoola.—In cases of divorce the husband must swear "this woman is not at present finally separated from me, by the divorce which she pleads:"—and not, in an absolute manner, that "he has not divorced her;"—because a new marriage sometimes takes place after a Talak Bayeen; or complete divorce.—Thus, in all these cases, the Kazee must swear the defendant with respect to the object of the plea, and not with respect to the cause of it; since, if he were to admit between me and the plaintiff, he might be injurious to the defendant.—What is here advanced is conformable to the opinion of Hanefea and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that, in all these cases, the Kazee must swear the defendant with respect to the cause (except where the defendant particularly requests the contrary); because sales, for instance, are sometimes made, and afterwards dissolved, divorces sometimes executed and afterwards succeeded by a marriage de novo; and usurpation, sometimes done away by gift or sale by all these, therefore, the oath must be administered with respect to the object.—Some have said that the Kazee ought to be guided by the denial of the defendant:—in other words, if the defendant deny the cause, let the oath relate to the cause,—or, if he deny the effect, let the oath relate to the object.—It is to be observed that (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) the oath must in every instance relate to the object, where the cause is of such a nature as renders it liable to be done away by some other cause; excepting only where, in setting the oath upon the object, the tendency due to the plaintiff is likely to be destroyed; for, in this case, the oath (according to all our doctors) must be rested upon the cause. Thus, if a wife, having been completely divorced, should prefer a claim of maintenance against her husband, and the husband should not think himself bound to comply, because of his being of the sect of Shafei,—or, if a proprietor of a house, or of land, should prefer a claim of pre-emption against the purchaser of a contiguous property on a plea of Shaffa, and the purchaser, being of the sect of Shafei, should not admit his claim,—in these cases (according to all our doctors) the oath of the plaintiff must relate to the cause;—for, although the defendant could not deny, upon oath, the cause or circumstances of the case, still he might, upon oath, deny the object;—in other words, he might deny the validity of the claim as founded upon these circumstances; if, therefore, the oath were to relate to the object, it would evidently be injurious to the plaintiff.—If, on the other hand, the cause be of such a nature as cannot be removed or done away by some other cause, in that case the defendant's oath (according to all our doctors) must relate to the cause. Thus, if a Mussulman slave should plead having been emancipated, and his master deny this, in that case (as the law does not admit of a Mussulman becoming a slave after having been once free) the oath tendered to the master must relate to the cause;—in other words, he must be required positively to swear "whether he has ever emancipated this slave, or not?"—It is otherwise, however, with respect to a female Mussulman slave, or an infidel male slave; because both of these may be again subjected to slavery after having been rendered free;—the female slave, by being first emancipated, and then apostatizing and being united to a hostile country;—and the male slave, by being first emancipated, and then breaking his contract of fealty, and being united to a hostile country.

In a case of inheritance, the oath of the defendant must relate to his knowledge.—If a person acquire a right to a slave by inheritance, and another prefer a claim of right to the said slave, in that case the oath of the defendant must relate to his knowledge;—that is, he must be required to swear that he does not know the slave in question to be the property of the plaintiff;—because not being acquainted with the acts of the person from whom the inheritance descends, he cannot absolutely swear that the slave is not the property of the plaintiff;—whereas, if he had acquired the slave by a gift or purchase, he could swear positively as to his right of property, since purchase and gift are both causes of a right of property.

When a defendant enters into a composition with the plaintiff, an oath cannot afterwards be exacted from him.—If a person prefer a claim against another, and the defendant deny it, but should afterwards give the plaintiff ten dirms, either as an expiation for his oath, or as a composition for it, such expiation or composition is valid; because it has been so related by Omar; and the plaintiff cannot afterwards demand an oath from the defendant, as having himself destroyed this right.
CHAPTER III.

TARALIF; OR THE SWEARING OF BOTH THE PLAINTIFF AND THE DEFENDANT.

A seller and purchaser are mutually to swear where the buyer disagrees; and are destitute of evidence—If a seller and purchaser should disagree, the purchaser asserting that the price of the goods was an hundred dirhms, and the seller, that it was more,—or, if the seller should acknowledge the article sold to be so much, and the purchaser assert that it was more,—in this case, if either of them adduce evidence in support of his assertion, the Kazee must pass a decree in his favour; because attestation is stronger than simple assertion.—If, on the other hand, both of them should adduce evidence in support of their respective assertions, then the evidence of the party that attests most must be admitted; because the object of evidence is proof; and with respect to the excess, there is no opposition of evidence.—If the seller and purchaser should disagree with respect both to the price and the goods, then the evidence of the seller with respect to the price is preferable; and the evidence of the purchaser is preferable with respect to the goods. If, however, both parties be destitute of evidence, then the Kazee must say to the purchaser: "If you acquiesce in the price claimed by the seller, it is well: if not, I will dissolve the contract;"—and to the seller, "If you are contented to yield the quantity of goods claimed by the purchaser, it is well; if not, I will dissolve the contract;"—because the object is to terminate the contention; and it is probable that his thus addressing them may terminate the contention, since the parties may possibly be averse to breaking off the contract; when, therefore, they perceive that if they do not agree, the contract will be broken, they may be content to make up their difference.—If, nevertheless, they should not even then agree, the Kazee must make each of them swear to his denial of the claim of the other.—This mutual swearing, before seisin of the article of sale, if conformable to analogy; because the seller demands a large price, which the purchaser does not admit; whilst, on the other hand, the purchaser demands from the seller the delivery of the goods at the rate of purchase money he has paid which the seller refuses to execute. Each, therefore, is a defendant; and hence an oath must be required from each.—After the delivery of the goods to the purchaser, indeed, the mutual swearing would be contrary to analogy; because the purchaser having received the goods has no further claim; and as there remains only the claim of the seller for the excess of the price, an oath can only be exacted from the purchaser, who is the defendant. It appears, however, from an infallible guide, that an oath must, in this case also, be exacted from each, because the Prophet has said "Where a disagreement takes place between a buyer and seller, and the subject of the sale is extant and present, an oath must in that case be administered to each, and the purchaser must afterwards restore the goods to the seller, and the seller the price to the purchaser."—It is likewise necessary to administer an oath to both parties, when it is necessary to administer an oath to both parties, the purchaser must be first sworn.—This doctrine is conformable to the most recent opinion of the two disciples; and it is also agreeable to one report of Haneefa, It is also the most authentic doctrine; because the denial of the purchaser is of the greatest importance, since the price is first demanded from him; and also, because, in case of his refusal to take the oath, it would be attended with the immediate advantage of inducing the obligation upon him of the payment of the price; whereas, if the seller were first sworn, it would not be necessary to defer the demand upon him of a delivery of the goods until he had received payment of the price.—If the parties should disagree in a sale of goods for goods (that is to say, in a barter), or of price for price (that is, in a Sif sale), in this case the Kazee is at liberty either to swear the seller or the purchaser first; because in such a case the seller and purchaser are both upon an equal footing.

Formula of the oaths of a seller and purchaser.—The nature of the oaths, in a disagreement between buyer and seller, is this. The seller swears by God, I have not sold the thing in question for a thousand dirms; and the purchaser swears "by God, I have not bought it for two thousand dirms." Mohammad, in the Zedat, has said, "let the seller swear by God, I have not sold it for one thousand dirms, but for two thousand; and let the purchaser swear, by God, I have not bought it for two thousand dirms, but for one thousand."—In other words, the negotiation and affirmation ought to be coupled together for the greater caution—The most authentic doctrine, however, is that an oath of negation is sufficient; because oaths proceed upon denial, as appears from the tradition concerning Kissamit; for it is related that the Prophet desired the people of Kissamit to swear that "by God, they had not committed the murder, and did not know the murderer."

Where both parties swear, the sale must be dissolved, by an order of the Kazee.—If the seller and purchaser, in a disagreement, should both take an oath, the Kazee must in that case dissolve the sale.—This is the adjudication of Muhammad: and it evinces that the sale is not of itself dissolved by the mutual swearing of the parties, because, as the plea of neither party is established, a sale continues of an undefined nature; and hence the Kazee must dissolve it, as well to terminate their contention, as because that where the price is not established, a sale remains without a return; and this being an invalid sale most consequentiy be dissolved, since it is indispensably requisite that all invalid sales be dissolved.

A seller or purchaser, upon declining to swear, loses his cause.—If, in a disagreement between a purchaser and a seller, one of the two decline swearing, the claim of the other is in that case established against him; because by such refusal the party concedes to the other the article claimed by him;—for as his plea is thus rendered incapable of controverting the plea of the other, it follows that he accedes to that plea.

The parties are not to be sworn where their disagreement relates to something not essential to their contract.—If the parties should disagree with respect to the period fixed for the payment of the price, or with respect to the option of determination, or with respect to a partial payment that may have been made of the price,—in none of these cases are the parties to be sworn, because the disagreement, in this instance, relates to something not within the original scope of the contract. This disagreement, therefore, resembles a disagreement with respect to an abatement or remission of the price;—in other words, if a seller and purchaser should disagree with regard to a remission of part or the whole of the price, they would not in that case be sworn; and so also in the case in question.—The reason for what is here advanced is that the disagreement, in all of the supposed cases, relates to a thing which, if annihilated or done away, would not affect the existence of the contract of sale.—It is otherwise, however, where the disagreement relates to the species of the price (such as whether it is to consist of dirms or of Bagdad), or with respect to the genus of it (such as whether it is to consist of dirms or of deenars), for such a disagreement is the same as if it related to the amount of the price, in which case oaths are administered, for this reason, that the genus and species of the price are inseparable from the substance of it; because the price is a debt due by the purchaser; and a debt is only to be known and ascertained by a definition of its genus and species. The period fixed for the payment of the price, on the contrary, is not of this nature, as it is not a species of it, whence it is that the price continues extant and firm after the promised time of payment has elapsed.

In dispute respecting any superadded stipulation, the assertion of the respondent must be credited.—If a disagreement take place between a seller and purchaser with respect to the condition of option, or the period of payment, the assertion of the respondent* supported by an oath, must be credited; because optional conditions, and extensions of the period of payment, are accidents in a sale;* and with regard to accidents, the assertion of the respondent must be credited in preference.

The parties are not to be sworn, where the goods perish in the hands of the purchaser. —If, after the destruction of the subject of a sale, in the hands of the purchaser, a disagreement should take place between the purchaser and the seller respecting the amount of the price, the parties, in that case (according to Haneef and Aboo Yousaf), are not to be sworn; but the assertion of the purchaser must be credited.—Mohammed alleges that, in this case, the parties must be both sworn, and afterwards the sale dissolved, in return for the value of the subject of it which had been destroyed;—that is to say, the purchaser must pay the value of the goods to the seller, who must return to the purchaser the price of them.—Such, also, is the doctrine of Shafei.—The same difference of opinion obtains in cases where the subject of the sale has been removed from the property of the purchaser by gift or the like, or where it is in such a condition as would exclude the return of it in case of a defect.

The reasoning of Mohammed, accordingly, in support of their opinions, is that each party pleads the existence of a contract, different from what is claimed by the other; and each of them, consequently, denies the assertion of the other.

Objectors.—The advantage of administering an oath to each of the parties is that the sale is thereby dissolved, and the goods returned by the purchaser to the seller, and the price by the seller to the purchaser. Now this object cannot be obtained after the destruction of the subject of the sale, and therefore there can be no advantage in the doctrine of Mohammed, of swearing both parties under such circumstances.

Reply.—The advantage is that it relieves the purchaser from the excess of the price, in case the seller should refuse to take an oath, as, in the same manner, it obliges the purchaser to pay such excess, in case he himself should refuse to take an oath.

They must therefore both be sworn, in the same manner as when, after the destruction of the subject of the sale, they disagree with regard to the genus of the price (that is, whether it consist of dirms or deenars): and after swearing, the purchaser must give the value of the goods to the seller, and the seller must return the price to the purchaser. The arguments of Haneef and Aboo Yousaf, in support of their doctrine upon this point, are twofold.—First, the swearing of both parties, after delivery of the goods, is repugnant to analogy; because the purchaser has in this case, received whole and complete the thing which he claims: the swearing of both parties mor over is ordained by the law in cases only where the subject of the sale is extant and complete, to the end that the sale may be dissolved; but this cannot be conceived in a case where the subject of the sale has perished; swearing the parties, therefore, after a destruction of the object, is not that mutual swearing expressed in the law. Secondly, in the case in question the object of the sale (namely, the complete acquisition of the goods by the purchaser) is obtained; and after the completion of the object, a disagreement with respect to the instrument (that is, the contract of sale) is of no importance. Moreover, the advantage set forth by Mohammed is of no account; since no advantages are attended to excepting such as are occasioned by the contract of sale; and the advantage in question is not occasioned by the contract. All that is here advanced proceeds on a supposition that the price is a money-debt. If, however, it consists of any specific article, such as cloth for instance, both the parties are to be sworn, according to all our doctors; because, 'in this case, a subject of sale still exists (since the price, where it consists of any thing specific, may be considered as the subject); and upon both parties swearing, the sale must be dissolved; and the seller must return the price to the purchaser; and the purchaser must give a similar in lieu of the subject of the sale to the seller, provided it was of that kind of thing compensable by similars; or, if otherwise, he must pay the value.

* Arab. Moonkir,—meaning, the person who denies.

* That is, are superadded to the contract.

Case of a dispute concerning the price of two slaves, where one of them dies. If a person purchase two slaves by one contract, and one of them be afterwards destroyed, and a dispute arise between the parties concerning the amount of the price, the seller asserting that it was two thousand dirms, and the purchaser asserting that it was one thousand, in this case (according to Haneefa) the parties are not to be sworn; on the contrary, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited. This, however, proceeds on the supposition of the seller being unwilling to receive the price of the living slave only, and to relinquish the price of the slave that is dead. In the Jama Sagheer it is related that, according to Haneefa, the assertion of the purchaser is to be credited unless the seller be willing to accept of the price of the living slave only. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that both parties must be sworn with regard to the living slave; that the sale, so far as relates to him, must be dissolved; that the assertion of the purchaser must be credited with respect to the dead slave; and that, therefore, the purchaser is responsible for the proportion of the dead slave, and not for the whole price. Mohammed, on the other hand, maintains that both parties must be sworn with regard to both slaves; and that afterwards the purchaser must return the living slave and the value of the dead one; because, as (in his opinion) the destruction of the whole subject of sale does not prevent the swearing of both parties, it follows that the destruction of a part only does not prevent it, a fortiori. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is that as the obstacle to the swearing of both is grounded only on the destruction of the subject of the sale, it ought of course to operate only in the degree in which it may have been destroyed. The reasoning of Haneefa is that the swearing of both parties, although repugnant to analogy, is yet established by the law, in cases where the subject of the sale still completely exists: but where a part of the subject is destroyed, it does not completely exist; because the complete existence of it supposes the existence of the whole, and the whole cannot exist but by the preservation of all its parts. If, on the other hand, both parties should swear with respect to the living slave only, it is evident that this cannot be effected, but by a reference to his particular value. Now as both slaves are included under one price, the particular value of each cannot be known but by conjecture; and hence it appears that the swearing of both parties, under such circumstances, must be referred to something uncertain; and this is illegal. If, however, the seller be willing to relinquish his sight to the destroyed slave, and to consider him as having never existed, both parties may, in that case, be ascribed to their deaths on the claim of the other, respecting the whole price of both the slaves: because the whole of the price is then opposed to the living slave, from the concession of the seller to take the living slave only in lieu of the whole of the price, and to consider the dead slave as excluded from the contract. What is here advanced is agreeable to the exposition of several of our modine doctors. They have also explained the meaning of the sentence, in the Jama Sagheer, to be that the seller shall not absolutely receive anything for the dead slave; and they have connected the exception with the omission of swearing of the parties. Others of our modern expositors however, have explained it to mean that the seller, shall agree to take, as the price of the dead slave only, what the buyer may acknowledge, and nothing more; and they have connected the exception with the non-swearing of the buyer only. Thus they have explained it to mean that the seller may take the living slave, without the necessity of the purchaser's taking an oath; provided he be willing to take, for the dead slave, what the purchaser may of himself acknowledge to have been his value. Mode of swearing the parties in this instance. The mode of swearing the parties, in this instance (according to Mohammed) is the same as in a case of non-existence of the subject of the sale. If, therefore, both take an oath, and differ in their assertions, and if one or both should require the dissolution of the contract, the Kazee must, in that case, dissolve it, and command the purchaser to return the living slave, and the value of the dead one; and, in the determination of the value of the dead slave, the purchaser's assertion must be credited.—
There is, however, a difference of opinion among our modern commentators, in their exposition of the doctrine of Aboo Yoosaf, with regard to the mode of swearing the parties, in this instance.—The most approved mode is, to tender an oath to the purchaser that he had not purchased those two slaves for the price claimed by the seller;"—and in case of his refusal to take the oath, to confirm the claim of the seller: but if he swear accordingly, an oath must then be tendered to the seller, that "he did not sell these two slaves for the price claimed by the purchaser;" and if he should refuse to take it, the claim of the purchaser must be con-irmed: but if he swear accordingly, the sale (so far as it relates to the living slave) must then be dissolved, and the purchaser must be responsible for the price of the living slave.
—In proportioning the respective prices of the two slaves, regard must be had to the value they bore on the day in which the purchaser took possession of them. If the parties should disagree as to the value the dead slave bore on the day of delivery, the bare assertion of the seller is to be credited in preference to that of the purchaser. If, however, either of the parties produce evidence, it must be admitted in preference to the other's assertion; and if both should produce evidence, that of the seller must be admitted.—This is agreeable to the analogy set forth and exemplified in a case recited in the Mabsoot: and which is as follows:—If a person, having purchased two slaves by one contract, and taken possession of them both, should afterwards return one of them on account of a defect, and the other should die in his possession, in that case he must pay the price of the slave that died; and he becomes exempted from the price of the other that he returned:—and, in propor-tioning their respective prices, regard must be had to the value of each on the day in which the purchaser obtained possession of them.—If the parties should disagree concerning the value of the dead slave, the assertion of the seller must be credited, as he is the defendant or respondent, since both parties admit that a price is due, and the purchaser, proceeding on his assertion of the inferior value of the slave that is dead, pleads that he has only a small sum to pay, which the seller, asserting the superior value of the dead slave, denies.—If both parties adduce their evidence, the evidence of the seller must be credited, as it proves most, since it proves the superior value of the dead slave.
—The reason of this is that, in oaths, regard is had to the reality; because, as the oath of each opposes that of the other, and as they both know the real state of the case, it follows that the foundation of the oath rests upon the real state of the case; and as the seller is the real defendant, his oath must therefore be credited. In evidence, on the other hand, regard is had to appearance; because, as the witnesses are not acquainted with the real state of the case, with regard to them, that must be credited which is apparent; and the seller is apparently the plaintiff in this instance, since he claims a greater quantity of price for the dead slave.

The evidence, therefore, produced by him must also be admitted in preference, since it has a superiority, because of its excess of probability.—From this explanation we may collect the principle on which Aboo Yoosaf has grounded his doctrine, that "the assertion of the seller is to be admitted with respect to the amount of the price of the dead slave, and the evidence adduced by him must be preferred, in case of the parties continuing to disagree with respect to the price of the said slave after they have both been sworn."

Case of a disagreement concerning the price, in the dissolution of a contract of sale, after delivery of the subject of it.—If a person purchase a female slave, and take possession of her, and the parties afterwards agree to dissolve the sale, but disagree concerning the price in this case they must be both sworn; and after the swearing of them both, the original sale reverts, and the dissolution becomes void.—It is to be observed that the swearing of both parties, in the dissolution of a sale, is not founded on the sacred writings, since the ordinance there respects a case of absolute sale, and sale ceases to exist, in case of a dissolution, for the dissolution is a breaking off of the sale with respect to the parties.—The swearing of the parties, there fore, in this instance, proceeds upon analogy; because the example under consideration proceeds upon a supposition of the seller not having received back the article after the dissolution, in which case the swearing of the parties is not repugnant to analogy; but rather agreeable to it. It is on this ground that we determine upon a case of hire, from its analogy to a case of sale before seisin (as where, for instance, a lessor and lessee disagree with regard to the object of their contract prior to the expiration of the lease:—in which case both parties are sworn, because of the analogy this bears to a case of sale, prior to the receipt of the goods by the purchaser):— and also, that we determine with respect to the heir of a contracting party from the analogy his situation bears to that of the contracting party himself (as where the heir of a purchaser and the heir of a seller disagree —in case they must both be sworn, in the same manner as the purchaser, since the seller would have been). It is upon the same ground, also, that we determine the value of this article to be analogous to the substance of it, in case of the destruction of the subject of the sale whilst in the possession of the seller by some other person than the purchaser (as where, for instance, anoth-person kills the subject of the sale, whilst yet in the hands of the seller, delivery not having been made to the purchaser; in which case the slayer must pay the value, which then stands as a substitute for the substance of the articles sold);—whence, if the seller and the purchaser disagree concerning the price they must both be sworn, and the sale dissolved: and the value of the slave given to the seller; in the same manner as the substance would have been given, had it been extant.—It is to be observed, however, that if the seller receive the goods after a dissolution of the contract, and the parties then disagree concerning the price, they are not to be sworn according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed maintains that in this case also a Tahalif, or mutual oath, is tendered to the parties, because here also (according to his tenets) the swearing is agreeable to analogy.

Where the price has been paid in advance, and the parties agree to dissolve the contract, but disagree concerning the same advanced, the assertion of the seller must be credited—If a person sell a Koorf of wheat, by a Sillim contract, for ten dirms, and the parties afterwards agree to a dissolution of the contract of Sillim, but disagree concerning the price, in this case the assertion of the seller who has received the advance must be credited: and Sillim contract does not in this instance revert; the dissolution still continuing, but the price diminished, in a case of Sillim sale, is not merely a breach of the contract, but an abrogation of it, whence the Sillim contract cannot revert: (contrary to a dissolution of a simple contract of sale).—Hence, if the price advanced consist of goods, and the person who has received the advance wish to return them to the purchaser on account of a defect, and the Kazee pass a decree to that effect, with the consent of both parties,—in that case, if the goods be destroyed prior to the return of them to the purchaser, the contract of Sillim does not revert. A contract of actual sale would however revert under such circumstances; and this case plainly shows that there is a difference between contracts of sale and contracts of Sillim.

Cases of disagreement between a husband and wife respecting the dower.—If a husband and wife disagree concerning the dower or marriage settlement, the husband asserting that it was one thousand dirms, and the wife that it was two thousand, in this case the party that brings evidence must be credited, as this establishes the plea of that party upon proof: and if both bring evidence, that adduced by the woman must be preferred, as it proves most.—This is where the woman's Mihr Misl, or proportionable dower, falls short of what she claims—If however, neither of the parties produce evidence, they are to be sworn (according to Haneefa); but the contract is not dissolved; because the only effect of the swearing in this instance, is that it annuls the bargain with respect to the dower, in the same manner as if no bargain had ever existed; but this does not engender any doubt with respect to the marriage itself, since the dower is not an essential, but merely a dependant of the marriage:—It is otherwise in a case of sale for therein the annulment of the bargain, with respect to the price, destroys the contract (as was before observed), and the sale is consequently dissolved.—In the case in question, after the parties swearing, a proportionable dower must be adjudged to the woman.—If, on the other hand, the woman's proportionable dower, and the sum acknowledged by the husband, be equal, if her proportionable dower fall short of what she acknowledges, the Kazee must, in that case, pass a decree in favour of the husband, as apparent circumstances are on his side.—If the wife's proportionable dower be equal to what she claims: or if exceed her claim, the Kazee must, in that case, pass a decree in favour of her claim.—If the proportionable dower be greater than what is acknowledged by the husband, and less than what is claimed by the wife, the Kazee must, in that case, adjudge a proportionable dower to the wife; because, after the swearing of both parties, nothing is established either greater or less than the proportionate dower, which is therefore a mean.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that the doctrine here advanced, of first swearing both parties, and then adjudging the proportionable dower, is the doctrine of Koorokkee: and it proceeds on this principle, that under the existence of a stipulated dower, no attention is paid to a proper or proportionable dower, but the mutual swearing of the parties is the means by which that is to be set aside, the oaths are therefore tendered to the parties, in the first instance, in all the above cases; that is, whether the proportionable dower be equal to, or greater than, the claim of the wife; or whether it be equal to, or less than, that of the husband.—In the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed, the oath is first, to be administered to the husband, in order that the advantage arising from his declining to swear may be quickly obtained: for, as it is his business first to advance the dower, he must be first sworn. In the same manner as in a case of seller and purchaser, the purchaser is first sworn.—The exposition of Razee is, however, different; but as that as well as the disagreement of Aboo Yoosaf, have been particularly explained under the

If a husband and wife disagree concerning the dower,—the husband asserting that he had agreed to give a particular male slave, and the wife asserting that he had assigned a particular female slave,—in this case the rule holds the same as in that immediately preceding; that is, if the woman's proper dower be equal to, or greater than, the value of the male slave, the Kazee must adjudge in favour of the husband; but if it be equal to, or greater than, the value of the female slave, the Kazee must decree in favour of the wife.—The only difference between this case and the preceding, is that if the female slave and proportionable dower be equal in point of value, the wife is, in that case, entitled to the value, and not to the slave substantially; because she cannot possess the slave without the consent of her husband, which she is not, in the instance, supposed to have obtained.

Case of a dispute between a lessor and lessee, concerning the rent, or the extent of the lease, before delivery of the subject.—If a lessor and lessee, before enjoyment of the object of the contract (that is, before the usufruct of it), disagree concerning the amount of the rent, or the extent of the lease, they must in that case be both sworn; and after swearing, the contract must be dissolved, and each party must return to the other whatever he may have received.—The reason of this is that the swearing of both parties, with regard to sale, in case of a dis agreement prior to the purchaser's seisin of the goods, is conformable to analogy, as has been already demonstrated.—Now a lease prior to the enjoyment of the usufruct, similar to a sale prior to seisin of the subject (and such is the case here considered) —If, therefore, the parties disagree concerning the amount of the rent, the oath must be first administered to the lessee, as he denies the obligation of the rent.—If, on the other hand, they disagree concerning the extent of the subject of the lease, the oath must be first administered to the lessor.—If either of them refuse to take the oath, the claim of the other is thereby established.—If one of them produce evidence, his claim is established; but if both bring evidence, that adduced by the lessee must be preferred, in case of the disagreement relating to the quantity of the rent; and that of the lessee, in case of its relating to the extent of the lease.—If they disagree in both points, the evidence of each is in that case to be credited, in the excess which it may prove.—For instance, the lessor claims the lease to have been made for a period of one month, in exchange for ten dirms, and the lessee claims a period of two months in exchange for five dirms; in which case the Kazee must adjudge it to be for a period of two months in exchange for five dirms.

Case of the same nature, after delivery of the subject.—If a lessor and lessee disagree, after the receipt of the object of the lease the parties are not to be sworn, but the assertion of the lessee must be credited, according to all our doctors:—according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, evidently, because (in their opinion) the destruction of the object of the contract is a bar to the swearing of the parties;—and, in the same manner, according to Mohammed, because this is the tenet, that the destruction of the object is not a bar to the swearing of both parties, relates only to the object of a sale, and is founded on a principle that the object of a sale may be considered as price, and the swearing of both parties (that is, of the buyer and the seller) is with relation to the price;—if, therefore, the rule of swearing both parties were admitted in the case in question, and the contract were afterwards to be annulled, it must necessarily follow that the object of the lease could not be considered as price; because if the lease be ususfruct or advantage; and advantage is not in itself price, and cannot be considered as such but from the contract; and, in the case in question, it becomes evident that there is no contract.—Now since in this case it is impracticable to swear both parties the assertion of the lessee is therefore redited as he is the defendant and denier.—If, on the other hand, the lessor and lessee dispute after the receipt of part of the object of the lease, they must be both sworn, and the contract dissolved with regard to what remains.—With respect to what is past, in this instance, the assertion of the lessee must be credited; because a lease is contracted anew every moment, in proportion to the progress of the usufruct.

Thus a new contract is opposed to every individual particle of advantage or usufruct.

It is otherwise in a case of sale, as a contract of sale is opposed to the whole of the subject of it: for which reason a sale, whenever it becomes obstructed or impracticable in part, is held to be impracticable in the whole.

Case of a dispute concerning ransom.—If a master and his Mokatib disagree concerning the amount of the ransom, according to Haneefa they must not be sworn.—The two disciples are of opinion that they must be sworn, and that the contract of Kitabat must be afterwards dissolved (and such also is the opinion of Shafie); because the contract of Kitabat is a contract of mutual exchange, and is capable of dissolution,—the case in question, therefore, resembles as case of sale, since the master claims an excess of ransom, which the Mokatib denies: whilst, on the other hand, the Mokatib claims his title to freedom, on his payment of the ransom agreeable to his settlement of it; and this the master denies:—they are both therefore, in some measure plaintiffs, and also both defendants, as in a case of sale; and hence they must both be sworn, in the same manner as a purchaser and seller are both sworn when they differ concerning the price.—The argument of Haneefa is that the ransom is opposed to the removal of a restriction, which operates instantaneously with respect to the slave; but that it is not considered as opposed to the freedom until the Mokatib actually pay it.—Nothing remains, therefore, but a disagreement with respect to the amount of the ransom; and with respect to that the mast is a plaintiff only, and the Mokatib only a defendant (the plea and the defence not existing alike in both parties, as in some of the cases before recited):—the parties, therefore, are not sworn; but the assertion of the Mokatib, upon oath, must be credited.

In a dispute between a husband and wife concerning furniture, the article in dispute is adjudged to the party to whose use it is adapted—i.e., a husband and wife disagree concerning any article of furniture, such claiming a right in it in the first case, if the furniture is particularly adapted to the use of men, it is adjudged to the husband; and if particularly adapted for the use of women, is adjudged to the wife; because, in the former instance, probability is an argument in favour of the husband; and in the latter, in favour of the wife. If, however, the article be of such a nature as is common to the service of both (such as a pot, or other vessel), it is in that case adjudged to the husband; because the wife herself, and everything belonging to her, are in the possession of the husband; and, in claiming the possession of the possessor is preferred: This rule, indeed, does not hold good where the article in dispute is peculiarly adapted to the service of women, for, although such articles also are in the possession of the husband, yet the probability of their being the property of the wife, from the particular nature of them, is stronger than the argument derived from possession; and therefore supersedes it.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the actual existence of the marriage; or of a separation between the parties, in which case the law is exactly the same.

If the dispute be between the survivor and the heirs of the deceased, the article must be adjudged to the survivor—i.e., on the other hand, one of the parties should die, and the heirs of the deceased enter into a contention with the survivor concerning the family goods, in that case the goods in question are adjudged to the survivor, whether they be of a nature adapted to the service of a man or woman; since possession is clearly established in favour of the living party.—This is according to Haneefa.—Aboo Yoosaf maintains that every thing which partakes of the nature of furniture, whether it be restricted to the use of a man or woman, must be adjudged to the wife; and that all the rest must be adjudged to the husband upon his swearing to the property;—because, as every woman is supposed to have brought a paraphernalia along with her, there is a probability that the specified articles may have been included in it; and this probability destroys the argument in favour of the husband from possession; but with respect to the rest of the family goods, the husband's claim, from possession, holds good as there is nothing preventive or destructive of it.—Mohammed alleges that whatever is only fit for the use of a man ought to be adjudged to the husband; that whatever is only fit for women ought to be adjudged to the wife; and, that whatever is, in point of use, common to both, ought to be adjudged to the husband or his heirs, for the reason alleged by Haneefa.

If one of the parties be a slave, it must be adjudged to the party who is free.—i.e., in the case in question, one of the parties be a slave, and the contention concerning the property happen during the life of both, it must be adjudged in favour of the party who is free; because the seisin of a free person is in a superior degree valid;—but in case of the death of either, it must be adjudged to the living party, as the possession of the deceased exists no longer, and the possession of the living then remains unopposed.—This is according to Haneefa.—The disciples maintain that a privileged slave and a Mokatib are equivalent to free-men in this point, as their possession is valid in contested cases.

Section.

Of Persons who are not liable to Claims.

A person is not liable to a claim, who sets up a plea of deposit, pledge, or usurpation (in the article claimed), supported by the testimony of witnesses, unless he be a person of notoriously bad character.—If a defendant pleads that "a certain absent person had deposited with him the article in dispute," or "had pledged it to him," or that "he himself had usurped it from a particular absent person," and brings witnesses to prove his allegation, in that case no room for suit or contention exists between him and the plaintiff; and so also, if he plead that "a certain absent person had let the said thing to hi in lease," and produce evidence in proof of it;—because in all these cases it is clearly established by the evidence of the witnesses of the defendant that his tenure is not the subject of contention, since he is seised of the thing in the manner of a trust.—Ibn Shabirna maintains that the defendant is not exonerated from the suit in consequence of presenting by witnesses, the deposit or pledge, the usurpation, or the lease; because the proof of the absentee's right of property is impracticable, since there is no person in his behalf to appear as a party in the suit; and the exoneration of the defendant from the suit of the plaintiff depends on the proof of the absentee's right
Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the evidence here adduced has two objects in view:—First, the establishment of the absentee's right of property, concerning which there is no suitor on his behalf; and which consequently cannot be proved:—Secondly, a repulsion of the claim of the plaintiff; and as he is the immediate adversary in this concern, the repulsion is consequently established. The plaintiff in this instance, therefore, resembles a person commissioned by a husband to remove his wife:—that is to say, if a person appoint another his agent for the removing and conducting of his wife to him, and the wife prove, by witnesses, that her husband had divorced her, in this case the testimony of these witnesses must be admitted: merely so far, however, as to restrain the removal of her by the agent; but not with respect to the establishment of the proof of the divorce (as was formerly mentioned);* and so also in the case in question.—It is to be observed that the defendant, in this case, is not exonerated from the claim of the plaintiff upon his bare allegation of the dispossession of the absentee, or of his own possession. &c. nor until he produce evidence in support of his assertion; because the defendant is himself apparently an adversary† in contemplation of his being possessed of the subject of the claim, and is opposed by the suit of the plaintiff, which he means to repel by the declaration above mentioned;—his declaration, therefore, cannot be admitted, unless he adduce evidence in support of it; in the same manner as where a person says to his creditor, "I have transferred the debt I owe you upon another person," in which case his assertion is not believed unless supported by evidence.—Ibn Abee Leilee is of opinion that the defendant is exempted from the plea immediately upon his assertion. The last recorded opinion of Aboo Yoosaf is that if the defendant be virtuous and not noted for fraud, the plea obtains as above laid down. If, however, he be noted for fraud, he in that case is not exonerated from the claim, even on producing evidence in support of his allegation; for a fraudulent person sometimes gives property that he has usurped to a traveller (for instance) in order that the traveller may afterwards, in the presence of witnesses, resign it to him in trust; and this he does with a view of defrauding the original proprietor of his right. Where the defendant, therefore, is open to a suspicion of such frauds as these, the Kazee must not accept of his evidence.

suit, for two reasons,—First, there is a possibility that that person may be the plaintiff himself. Secondly, if they had specified the person, the plaintiff would then have it in his power to have traced him, and to have entered a suit against him; but as they have not specified him, he is deprived of the power of tracing him; and if, under such circumstances, the defendant were released from the claim, an injury is thereby occasioned to the plaintiff.—I, again, the witnesses should say, "we know the face of the man in question, but we are ignorant of his name and family," in that case the same rule obtains (according to M. Hammad), because of the second reason.—According to Haneefa, on the contrary the defendant in this case is released from the claim, as having proved that the thing in question came to him from another in trust; since, as the witnesses know the countenance of the man (contrary to the preceding case), the defendant's possession is consequently no longer a subject of litigation. In reply, also, to what is urged by Mohammed, it may be observed that either the plaintiff has been himself to the occasion of the injury he sustains, in forgetting the defendant; or, in the injury has been occasioned by the witnesses to the defendant; but not by the defendant himself.—(This case is termed the Makhmsa, of quingual, of the book of plea; because it has given rise to five different opinions, as here stated.)

He is liable, if he set up a plea of right of property.—If a defendant plead that he had purchased the article in dispute from a certain absentee, he is in that case a party, and liable to answer to the claim of the plaintiff; for in declaring that he was seized of the thing in virtue of a right of property, he acknowledged himself to be subject to the suit of the plaintiff.

Or, if the plaintiff sue him on a plea of theft, or usurpation, although he produce evidence to prove a trust—If, in a suit, the plaintiff should say to the defendant "you have usurped this thing from me," or "you have stolen thing from me," in this case the defendant is not released from the claim, although he produce witnesses in proof of the article in question having been committed to him by an absentee in trust; because here the plaintiff asserts the action of usurpation or of the theft against him, and in this respect (and not because he is seized of the property) he is subject to the plea. It is different where the plaintiff asserts absolutely his right of property; because in that case the defendant cannot be subjected to the claim otherwise than from his possession of the thing; whence it is that an absolute claim of property in an article is not admitted against any except the actual possessor of the article; whereas a plea for the act (of acquisition, such as usurpation, and so forth) lies against any other person.

And so also, if the plaintiff sue upon a plea of theft, without specifying the thief.—I in a suit, the plaintiff should say to the defendant, who is seised of the thing in dispute, "this thing which is in your possession is my property, and has been taken from me by theft;" and the defendant say "a certain absentee deposited this thing with me;" and bring evidence to prove his assertion, still he is not released from the claim. —This is the opinion of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf; and proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law. Mohammed holds the defendant, in this case, to be exempted from the claim, as the plaintiff has not exhibited the claim of theft against him, but against an unknown person; and as a claim of this nature against an unknown person is nugatory, it follows that the claim, with respect to the act, cannot stand:—nothing, therefore, remains except a claim with respect to the right of property; and as, in a claim concerning a right of property, the suit is set aside, by the defendant proving the article in dispute to have been committed to him in trust, the case is therefore the same as if the plaintiff had declared the thing to have been taken from him by usurpation, without naming the usurper. —The reasoning of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf is that the mention of the act involves a plea against the agent; and that the presumption is that the possesser is the agent, but that the plaintiff, from motives of tenderness, may not have specified him in order to screen him from blame. The reason, therefore, the same as if the plaintiff had said "you have stolen this thing." —It is otherwise where the plaintiff charges the defendant with usurpation, for in this case, although he make the charge in direct terms, still punishment is not incurred, notwithstanding it be evident that his design is to prove the usurpation. But not if the plaintiff sue him on a plea of purchase.—If the plaintiff should say to the defendant "I have bought this thing from a certain person," and the defendant reply "that person consigned the thing to me in trust. In this case the defendant is exempted from the claim without the necessity of producing evidence; because both the plaintiff and the defendant are agreed that the thing is, originally, the property of another man; and consequently the tenure of the person seised of it is not a matter of dispute between them. —If, however, the plaintiff say that "a certain person had appointed him an agent for seisin of the said thing," and produce evidence in proof of this, he is entitled to prosecute his suit against the possessor, as having established, by witnesses, a superior right to the possession of the article in question.

OF THINGS CLAIMED BY TWO PLAINTIFFS.

If the claim be laid to a thing of a divisible nature, and the proofs on each part be equal, the thing must be adjudged equally between both claimants.—If two men separately claim the property of an article in the possession of another, and each bring evidence in support of his claim, the Kazee must, in that case, adjudge the article to the joint property of both in an equal degree. —One opinion of Shafei, in this case, if that, as the evidence respectively adduced by the parties is contradictory of each other, they must both be rejected. —Another opinion of his is that the Kazee ought to throw the die to determine to whom the property belongs. —His reasoning in support of these opinions is that as it is an impossibility that two men can each have separately a complete right of property to one and the same thing, it follows that the evidence of one of the parties must be false; but as there is no criterion by which the truth can be determined, it is therefore proper either to reject both, or to have recourse to the die; more especially as the Prophet in a similar case caused the die to be thrown, and gave judgment accordingly. The arguments of our doctors on this joint are twofold. First, a tradition reported by Tameem Bin Tirsfa, that the Prophet, in a cause which was brought before him regarding a camel, in which both parties brought evidence in support of their claim, adjudged it to be the joint property of both (for, with respect to the tradition quoted by Shafei, it reduces to a decision of the Prophet in the infancy of the Mussulman religion which was afterwards disapproved of). —Secondly, it is possible to reconcile the evidence of both the parties, by supposing the evidence of the one party to allude to the cause of right of property in the possessors, and that of the other to the right of possession: and as, by this hypothesis, the evidence of each of the parties is reconcilable to truth, it is therefore incumbent to act according to it in the greatest possible degree,—namely, by adjudging each of them to have a right to the half of the property.

If it be to a wife the right must be adjudged according to her declaration.—If two men, severally, claim marriage with one woman, and each adduce evidence in support of his claim. Kazee must not, in that case, pass a decree upon these evidences; because, as the subject of dispute does not admit of divided property, it is consequently impracticable to adjudge the half to each. —He must therefore have recourse to the declaration of the wife, and adjudge her in marriage to that party whose claim she verifies. —Or (if the witnesses specify dates) according to the prior date. —This, however, proceeds upon a supposition of the witnesses not having mentioned any date; for if they should specify dates to the marriage, the evidence of that party which specifies the most ancient date must be preferred. —If, on the other hand, previous to the adduction of evidence by either party, the woman should make an acknowledgment in favour of one of the plaintiffs, she is judged to be the wife of the acknowledged:—but if the other party should afterwards produce evidence in support of his claim, the Kazee must adjudge her to be his wife, as evidence is stronger than acknowledgment. If the Kazee adjudging a wife to a single claimant cannot be reversed in favour of a subsequent claimant, unless his witnesses prove a priority of date,—If only one man claim marriage with a woman, and she deny it, and he produce evidence in support of his claim, and the Kazee having in consequence passed a decree in his favour, another person then appear and claim his marriage with the same woman, in this case the Kazee must not reverse his decree because, having been passed on good grounds, it cannot afterwards be affected by a circumstance of equal, and far less by one of inferior force.—If, however, the witnesses of the second plaintiff should attest the date of the marriage to have been prior to that mentioned by the witnesses of the first plaintiff, the evidence brought by the second plaintiff must in that case be preferred, as the error of the first witnesses has thereby been made apparent.—The law is the same in a case where a husband and wife living together, and their marriage being notorious, another person claims marriage with the woman, and brings evidence in support of his plea; for in this case his evidence is not admissible unless it proves marriage prior to that of the husband with whom the wife then lives.

Two claimants to a slave, on a plea of purchase, upon his being adjudged between them, are severally at liberty to pay half the price, or to relinquish the bargain. If two men severally claim a right of property in a slave in the possession of another (as if each were to assert that he had purchased him from that other), and each bring evidence in support of his claim, in that case (as the Kazee must adjudge him to be the joint property of both), they are severally at liberty either to take the half of the slave at the half of the price or relinquish the bargain. The case is therefore the same as where two unauthorized persons sell the same article belonging to a third person to two different men, and the proprietor confirms both sales, in which case each purchaser is at liberty to take the half of the article for half the stipulated price, or to reject the sale entirely and receive back his money; because, as he had before ascertained to the bargain, on the supposition of its extending to the whole of the article, it cannot be inferred that he sold the part of the article to the particular bargain. He is therefore at liberty either to accept or reject it as he pleases. If, however, in the case in question, after the Kazee adjudging the half to each, one of the parties should reject it, the other cannot take the whole, because that half was adjudged to the other in consequence of evidence he produced, and on his rejecting it the sale becomes, in that 'half, null and void.—It was otherwise, however, if one of the parties should intimate his rejection of the half prior to the adjudication of the Kazee, for in that case he would be entitled to take the whole, because he was entitled to the right to the whole from purchase, and as the bar to his obtaining the whole (namely, the plea of the other) is removed by the relinquishment of the co-plaintiff, prior to the virtual annulment of any part of the sale by the decree of the Kazee: he is consequently entitled to the whole of his claim. (Analogous to this is the resignation made, by one of two Shafees, of his right of pre-emption subsequent to the decree of the Kazee in favour of both.)

But if they specify and prove dates, the slave must be adjudged to the prior purchaser.—Ir is to be observed that if, in the case in question, the two plaintiffs should specify the dates of their purchase, the sale must be adjudged in favour of the prior purchaser; because it appears that he had established his right at a time when he had no opponent; and on this account the subsequent claim of the other is invalid.—If one of the parties should mention a date, and the other, the sale must in that case be adjudged in favour of the one who specifies the date; because he clearly establishes his claim at a particular time; and as the other does not specify any period, it becomes, of consequence, doubtful whether he purchased it prior or posterior to the particular time mentioned by the other; and the Kazee (because of this doubt) cannot pass a decree in his favour.—If neither of the parties specify a date, and one of them be in possession of the thing, the claim of the possessor is preferable; because it is probable that his right of possession was derived from prior purchase; and also, because both of their claims being established in an equal degree, the possession, which is undisputed, cannot be affected by a matter of doubt. The same rule obtains when one of the plaintiffs is seized of the thing and the witnesses of the other specify the date of his purchase. But it is to be observed that if the witnesses should expressly attest his purchase to have been prior to that of the purchase of the possessor, the sale must in this case be adjudged in his favour; as a certain knowledge of prior purchase establishes a positive right, whereas possession establishes only an implied right.

Where one party pleads purchase, and the other gift and seizes (without specifying dates), the article must be adjudged to the purchaser. If two men claim a particular article, one in virtue of purchase, and the other in virtue of gift and seisin, and each produce evidence in support of his claim, without, however, mentioning dates, in this case the evidence to the purchase must be admitted in preference; because purchase is stronger in its nature than gift, as it involves a mutual exchange; and also, because purchase is in itself a cause of a right of property; whereas the right of property in a gift rests upon the acceptance—if the claim of the one be founded upon purchase, and of the other upon charity and seisin, and all the other circumstances be the same as above stated, the same rule holds, because of the reasons, aforesaid. If, however, the claim of one be founded upon gift and seisin, and that of the other upon charity and seisin, the Kazee must in this case decide the thing to be in an equal degree the joint property of both; seeing that their claims are equal, and that neither has a preference over the other.

Opinion.—A preference ought to be given to the claim of charity over that of gift; because a gift is not binding, since the giver may retract the gift; whereas charity is binding, and cannot be retracted.

Reply.—No preference if given excepting for some effect immediately operating; and the legality of retracting a gift, and the illegality of retracting charity, relate to the future; but at the moment they are on a foot of equality. It is to be observed that this doctrine of the equality of claims of gift and of charity, and of the necessity for decreeing jointly to both, is when the thing in question is capable of division. But if the thing be incapable of division, there is a difference of opinion; some maintaining that the law in this case is the same; and others maintaining that the law in this case is different, as it induces a gift with respect to indefinite property, which is unlawful.

A claimant on a plea of purchase, and a claimant on a plea of marriage are upon an equal footing. If two persons lay claim to the same thing, one of them in virtue of purchase, and the other (being a woman) in virtue of the possessor's having married her, and having settled that article as her dower,—in this case both plaintiffs are upon an equal footing; because the claim of each in point of strength is equal, since a contract of purchase, and of marriage, are both contracts of exchange, and both equally occasion a right of property. This is according to Hanefas and Abou Yoosaf. Mohammed maintains that the plea of purchase is to be preferred, and that the husband must be made responsible to the woman for the value of the article in dispute; as by this means a preference is given to the plea of purchase, whilst at the same time the claims of both are attended to.

A plea of pawnage and seisin is preferable to a plea of gift and seisin. If one of two plaintiffs plead pawnage and seisin: and the other plead gift and seisin; and each prefers the plea of pawnage must be preferred,—This proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that the plea of gift ought to be preferred, because gifts occasion a right of property, whereas pawnage does not. The reason for a more favourable construction in this instance is that seisin in virtue of pawnage occasions responsibility, which is not the case with respect to seisin in consequence of gift; and a contract which occasions responsibility is stronger than one which does not occasion it. It is different, whereas the gift is made in exchange for some other thing; because such a gift is ultimately a sale; and sale is stronger than pawnage.

Two claims, equally supported, must be determined by the priority of date. If two men claim an absolute right of property, it is the same article, which is in the possession of a third person, and each mention the date of commencement of his right; it must in that case be adjudged in favour of him who pleads the oldest date;—because having established his prior right of property, it follows that no other can afterwards obtain that but from him; and the other plaintiff in this instance, has not obtained the right of property from him.

Two pleas of purchase, preferred against one person, must also be determined by his oldest date. If two men prefer a claim of purchase against another, who is not the possessor of the article in dispute, and each bring evidence of his purchase, specifying different dates, the person who proves the prior date must be preferred, as he proves his right at a period when he had no opponent.

If, against two different persons, the article is adjudged equally between both claimants. If two claimants prefer an allegation of purchase, the one bringing evidence in proof of his having bought the article in dispute from Zeyd, and the other bringing evidence in proof of his having bought it from Omar, and the witnesses of each specify the dates of these purchases, in this case both plaintiffs are on a footing of equity, as each of them has established the right of property of his respective seller, and hence the case is the same as if the two sellers were themselves present and claimed their respective rights. Each, plaintiff, therefore, is at liberty to take the half of the thing at half of the price, or the relinquish his purchase entirely, for the reason before explained. If the witnesses of one of the parties specify a determinate time of payment, and not the witnesses of the other, still the Kazee must adjudge one half to each; because a knowledge of the length of credit does not imply priority in point of purchase;—may, it is even probable that the other's right of property may have been of prior date, as the case supposes two different sellers. (It is otherwise where there is only one seller, as in that case both parties are agreed in the derivation of their right of property. No such cases are mentioned in the Shurah, which appear to be exceptional.)
Unless one only adduce evidence to a date, when it must be adjudged to him:—If, on the other hand, one of the plaintiffs prove a date of purchase, and the other, a decree must be passed in favour of the claimant whose date of purchase is ascertained, unless the purchase of the other can be proved to have preceded it.

Where four claimants plead a right in a thing, as derived from four different persons: the article is adjudged among them in equal lots:—If one plaintiff claim a right to an article from his having purchased it from Zeyd;—a second, from a gift of it to him by Omar;—a third, from inheritance from his father, and a fourth, from its having been bestowed upon him in charity by a particular person; and each of the four claimants adduce evidence in support of his claim in this case the Kāzī must adjudge the article among them, in four equal lots; because each of the four evidences his right as derived from a different person, and the case is therefore the same as if these four different persons had themselves appeared in court, and each proved his absolute right of property.

The evidence of the possessor must be preferred to that of the plaintiff, where it proves a prior date of right:—If a plaintiff adduce evidence to prove his right of property in a thing from a particular period, and the possessor of the thing adduce evidence to prove his right from a prior period, the evidence of the possessor must be preferred:—This is according to Ḥanefī and Abū Yoosaf:—It appears also (from one tradition) to be the opinion of Mohammad:—According however, to another tradition, Mohammad is of opinion that the evidence of the possessor ought not to be preferred (and this is the sentiment he adopted and acted upon); because, as each party produced evidence in support of his absolute right of property, without explaining the cause of that right, it follows that priority or posteriority of date is in this instance immaterial:—The reasoning of Ḥanefī and Abū Yoosaf is that where a person proves his right of property in a thing at a particular period the right of property of another in that thing at a subsequent period cannot otherwise be established than by its being derived from the former; but in the case in question, the plaintiff has not pleaded the derivation of his right of property from the possessor; and therefore the evidence of the possessor is preferred.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff is preferred, where the claim is laid absolutely in a plaintiff and possessor, respectively, bringing evidence to prove each his right of property, in an absolute manner (that is, without explaining the instrument or cause of it), and the witnesses of one of the parties declare the date of his right, and not those of the other, in this case (according to Ḥanefī and Mohammad) the evidence of the plaintiff must be preferred:—Abū Yoosaf alleges that the evidence of the claimant of known date must be preferred (and this, according to one tradition, is also the opinion of Haneefī); because the right of property of the claimant of known date is established in the past, whereas that of the other, in consequence of his evidence not mentioning any date, is only established in the present; and the past has precedence of the present;—in the same manner as where one of two claimants from purchase proves the date of his purchase, and the other does not; in which case the evidence of the former is preferred:—The reasoning of Ḥaneefī and Mohammad is that the evidence adduced by the possessor of an article in dispute is admitted only as it tends to repulsion;—but, in the case in question, no property of repulsion exists, because it is this instance doubtful whether the plaintiff may have derived his right in the article from the possessor or not, since it is possible that if the plaintiff's witnesses were true, the date that the plaintiff adduced by the evidence of his date might prove to be prior:—the evidence adduced by the plaintiff is therefore preferred.

And the same where the subject in dispute is immovable property.—A similar disagreement subsists with respect to a contested house in the possession of two plaintiffs: for, according to Ḥaneefī and Mohammad, the house must be left in their possession, as before, and no regard whatever paid to the evidence on either part: whereas, according to Abū Yoosaf, a decree must be passed in favour of him who proves a date.

—Supposing, however, the house to be in the possession of a third person; and all other circumstances to be the same, in that case according to Ḥaneefī, both the claimants are upon an equal footing; whereas, according to Abū Yoosaf the evidence on the part of him who proves the date must be preferred:—Mohammad, on the other hand, alleges that the evidence on the part of him who does not show any date must be preferred because he claims a prior right of property, on the ground that when a person claims property in an absolute manner, without specifying any date, and establishes his claim, he is entitled to more than one who specifies a date; as holds in a case of claim of acquisition by labour:—The argument of Abū Yoosaf is that the mention of a date is a certain corroboration of the claimant's right of property at that time; whereas, the omission of a date admits of two constructions, as it leaves it doubtful whether the right of the other had existed prior to that period; and as certainty is always a cause of preference, he whose evidence goes to establish a date is therefore preferred:—in the same manner as, where two persons claim the purchase, of the same thing, and one of them specifies the date, and not the other.—The argument of Ḥaneefī is that the date mentioned by the dating claimant bears the construction, either of priority or posteriority, in the same manner as the claim of the other, which is absolute.

It is otherwise in the case of two purchasers, where one specifies the date, and not the other: because purchase being a supervenient circumstance, is therefore, when doubtful, referred to the nearest period; and hence, in that case, the reason for preferring the known date.

Case of claims to animals, founded upon generation —If a plaintiff and possessor should both bring evidence to prove a generation, as if each should bring evidence to prove that "such a camel (for instance) is the offspring of a particular camel, which had brought it forth whilst in his possession,"—in this case the claim of the possessor must be preferred; because, as the evidence is adduced upon a point which derives no additional proof from actual possession, it follows that the plaintiff and the possessor are both upon a perfect equality with respect to plea and evidence; and the evidence on the part of the possessor afterwards acquires a superiority from the circumstance of his possession: the Kazee must therefore adjudge the camel to him—This is approved.

—Yessa Ibn Ayam, however, has asserted the contrary: for he maintains that as both evidences are in opposition to each other, they must both be rejected, and the camel left, as it was, in the hands of the possessor; but that it ought not to be decreed to him by the Kazee.

If, in a suit respecting a horse, the plaintiff assert that he had purchased it from Zeyd, and that it was the offspring of a horse of Zeyd, and the possessor assert that he had bought it from Omar, and that it was the offspring of a horse of Omar's, and each bring evidence in proof of the horse having been produced from a claim in the possession of the seller, it is the same as if each had adduced evidence in proof of the horse having been produced in his own possession.

If, on the other hand, one of the parties bring evidence in proof of his right of property, and the other in proof of the contrary, in this case the claim of the party proving the generation of the horse is preferred, whether he be the possessor or not; because, as the evidence adduced by him goes to prove his right of property ab initio, it follows that the right cannot afterwards exist in another, unless by a derivation of it from him.—In the same manner also, if, where neither of the parties is possessed of the horse, one proves that it was produced in his possession, and the other proves his right of property, a decree must pass in favour of him who proves the generation of the horse.

—It is to be observed that if the Kazee pass a decree in favour of the person who proves the production of the horse from one in his possession, and another person then prove, by evidence, the generation of it to have been from his property, the Kazee must, in that case, pass a decree in favour of that third person, unless the possessor again produce evidence in proof of the generation, in opposition to that person.

Or to any other property founded upon a cause of right equivalent to generation, the same rule holds with respect to materials for making cloth, where they have undergone only one operation (such as spinning, for instance)—Thus, if a plaintiff and a possessor, respectively, assert that "the yarn in dispute is his property, and he has spun it himself," and each bring evidence in support of his claim, in that case the Kazee must pass a decree in favour of the possessor, in the same manner as in a case of claim founded upon generation: and the same of every case relating to property which is simple and not complicated, such, for instance, as the extracting of milk from an animal the making of cheese, or of felts, the shearing of wool, and the like.—If, on the other hand, the cause of right of property be of a complicated nature, such as the wearing of cloth, the planting of trees, or the sowing of wheat, and a dispute arise between a plaintiff and possessor of any of these articles, the Kazee must pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff, and not of the possessor:—and so also, if a plaintiff and possessor, respectively, adduce evidence in proof of his absolute right of property, without explaining the cause,—if the cause be doubtful (that is, if it be unknown whether complicated or simple), recourse must be had to skilful persons; and if it appear doubtful to them also, the Kazee must in that case decree in favour of that plaintiff who is not the possessor; because the original principle is to pass the decree in conformity with the evidence adduced by the plaintiff; and although an exception be established in cases of claim founded upon generation (because: of a tradition of the Prophet, who, upon a certain occasion, decided, in such a case, in favour of the possessor), still; in a case where the cause is doubtful, and where of course it cannot be ascertained whether the article is comprehended within the exception, recourse must be had to the original principle of the law.

The possessor of an article, proving his having purchased it from the claimant, sets aside his plea.—If a plaintiff produce evidence in support of his absolute right of property in an article, and the possessor bring evidence to prove his having purchased the article from the plaintiff, the evidence of the possessor must be preferred; because, although the plaintiff pleads that his right of property was of prior date, yet the possessor appears to have afterwards purchased the article from him (which is in no respect repugnant thereto), and hence the case is the same as if the possessor were first to acknowledge that the article had formerly belonged to the plaintiff, and then to assert that he had purchased it from him.

If each party prove a purchase from the other (without specifying a date) no decree can take place.—If a plaintiff bring evidence to prove his purchase of the article in dispute from the possessor, and the possessor, on the other hand, bring evidence in proof of his having purchased it from the plaintiff, and neither party specify the date of his purchase, in this case the evidence of both falls to the ground, and the thing in dispute is left in the hands of the possessor.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this is according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf; but that Mohammed has said that the Kaeez must admit the evidence of both, and that then the thing goes to the plaintiff; because a conformity to the evidence of both is practicable, since it is possible that the possessor may have purchased the thing from the plaintiff, and having then received possession of it may have afterwards sold it to him again.—This construction ought therefore to be adopted; more especially as seisin implies that the possessor must have made the court to prove seisin; consequently, it is indeed, be supposed, because (according to Mohammed) a thing cannot be sold previous to the seller’s possession of it, although it be land.—The reasoning of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf is that each of the parties in pleading a purchase from the other, virtually makes an acknowledgment of the right of property in the other; and as, where each party makes an acknowledgment in favour of the other, the evidence of both must be set aside, according to all our doctors, so also in this case the question:—In reply to the assertion of Mohammed, it is to be observed that a conformity to the evidence of both is impracticable, in as much as the cause, namely, the purchase, is an object only as far as it is necessary to prove the existence of the effect, namely, right of property.—
Now in the case in question, it is impracticable to pass a decree in favour of the possessor’s right of property, but by previously admitting the plaintiff’s right; and hence if the Kaeez were to pass a decree in favour of the possessor, it is a decree upon the cause, namely, the purchase, which would be vain and useless.

And so also, if each prove payment of the price.—If, in the case now under consideration, the witnesses of each party should give evidence of the payment of the price (one thousand dirms, for instance), in that case (according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf) a Mokasa, or mutual liquidation, takes place with respect to both prices, provided the prices be on an equality either with regard to prompt payment, or to a payment at a limited period, because in this case the seisin of each party induces responsibility.—If no evidence be given of the payment of the price, in this case also, according to Mohammed, a mutual liquidation takes place, because the price is due from each party to the other respectively, provided the witnesses of each separately testify to the sale, and also to the seisin of the article sold.—
And here, in the opinion of all our doctors, the evidence of both parties falls to the ground; since, even according to Mohammed, a conformity to the evidence of both is impracticable in this instance; because both the sales are valid, as being both made after seisin; moreover, no date is specified, nor does any argument of a date exist by which a preference might be given to the one claim rather than to the other; they are a conflict of equal force, and the seisin is assigned to the one over the other: and the evidence of both parties consequently is accounted of no force.—It is otherwise in the preceding case, because, as no mention is there made of the seisin of either party, a conformity of the evidence of both is practicable, as has been already explained.

In disputes concerning land, a decree must be passed in favour of the last purchaser—
If the thing in dispute be land, and the witnesses of both parties specify the dates of purchase, without making any mention of the seisin of either party; in that case, where the date of the plaintiff’s purchase precedes that of the possessor, the Kaeez (according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf) must pass a decree in favour of the possessor; and the dispute is settled as if the plaintiff had first purchased the land, and then sold it to the possessor previous to his own seisin of it, which in their opinion is lawful. Mohammed, on the other hand, contends that the Kaeez ought to pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff; because, as (according to him) the sale of land previous to the seisin of it is not lawful; the land ought necessarily to remain with the plaintiff.—If, on the other hand, the witnesses of both parties give evidence also to the seisin, in that case the Kaeez must pass a decree in favour of the possessor, according to all our doctors; because both sales are in such an instance universally admitted to be valid. Thus, however, proceeds upon a supposition of the date of the plaintiff’s purchase being prior to that of the possessor’s; for if the date proved by the possessor be prior to that proved by the plaintiff, the Kaeez must pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff, whether the witnesses may or may not have specified the seisin; and the matter is adjusted as if the possessor had first purchased the thing from the plaintiff, and having received seisin of it, had afterwards sold it to the plaintiff, without having as yet delivered it to him;
or as if, having delivered it, it had reverted to him again from some other cause.

The production of any number of witnesses above the lawful number makes no difference with respect to the decree.—If one of two plaintiffs produce two, and the other plaintiff produce four witnesses still they are on an equal footing; because, as the testimony of each two of the four witnesses applies to the same cause, or ground of decision, it follows that the evidence of four witnesses amounts merely to two causes; and a multiplicity of causes is no argument of superiority, since it is in the strength of a cause, and not in the number, that a superiority lies.
Case of a claim made by two persons to a house; where one claims the half and the other the whole.—If a house in possession of any person be claimed by two other persons, of them alleging his right to the whole, and the other to the half, and each bring evidence in proof of his claim, in this case the Kazee must adjudge three-fourths to the claimant of the whole, and one-fourth to the claimant of the half, according to Haneefa, because (agreeable to his tenets) regard must be had to the nature of the dispute; and as, in the present instance, no dispute subsists with respect to one half, that half goes exclusively to the claimant of the whole; but as there is a dispute between the parties respecting the other half, and as they are both upon an equal footing with regard to the ground of their claim, that half therefore goes to them both in equal proportions.—The other disciples allege that the house must be divided between the claimants in three equal lots, two going to the plaintiff for the whole, and one to the plaintiff for the half; because, according to them, regard must be had to arithmetical proportion; in other words, the plaintiff for the whole, in consideration of his claim, which is to the two halves, is entitled to two lots, and the plaintiff for the half, in consideration of his claim, which is to one half, is entitled to one lot: the house, therefore, is divided between them in three lots.—If, on the other hand, the house in dispute be in the possession of the parties the whole of the house in that case goes to the claimant of the whole; for he receives the half possessed by the claimant of the half in consequence of a decree of the Kazee (which decree must necessarily be granted him, since in being a claimant for the whole, he is a claimant for that half, without having possession of it, and judgment must therefore be given according to his evidence); and he keeps the other half, of which he was himself possessed, as it is a necessary inference that the claim of the other claimant related only to that half of which he was in possession, since if he were to prefer a claim to the other half, it must follow that the half of which he is in possession is held by an unjust tenure:—and as no claim subsists with respect to the half in the hands of the claimant of the whole, it consequently remains with him.—In short, the whole house remains with him.

In claims founded upon generation regard must be paid to the date stated by the claimant.—If two persons lay claim to an animal, and each adduce evidence to prove its production, at the same time specifying the date, in this case the animal must be adjudged to the claimant whose witnesses specified a date apparently according with the age of the animal; because, as probability is an argument in his favour, he is therefore entitled to a preference.—If, however, the age of the animal be doubtful, and an agreement with the date on one side or the other not apparent, it must then be adjudged in an equal degree to both, and the specification of dates set aside: that is, the case must be considered in the same light as if no dates had been mentioned.—If, on the other hand, both the dates be repugnant to the apparent age of the animal, the evidence of each party is nugatory (and such also is reported from Hakim), because the falsity of the evidence on both parts is in such a case manifest:—the animal is therefore left with the person who may be in possession of it.

One party pleading a trust, and the other asserting an usurpation, each is upon an equal footing.—If two persons severally prefer a plea against other who is in possession of a slave; the one pleading that "the possessor has usurped the said slave from him," and the other, that "he has committed the said slave to him in trust;" in this case the Kazee must decree one half of the slave to each, as their claims are equally strong.

Of disputes concerning Possession.

The possession of an animal is ascertained by any act which implies a use of the animal. If two men dispute the possession of an animal, one of them being mounted upon it, and the other holding the bridle, in this case the claim of the rider is the strongest, since his act of riding upon it is an act in virtue of right of property. In the same manner, also, if one of them be riding on the saddle, and the other on the croup, the claim of the person seated upon the saddle is preferable. It is otherwise, however, if they be mounted upon an animal without a saddle; for this case the property of the animal is divided between them, as both are, with respect to the act of riding, upon an equal footing in such an instance.

If two men contend concerning a camel, the one having a burden, his own property, upon it, and the other having in his hand the Mohr or rope that guides it, the right of the person having the burden upon it is preferable, as the camel is employed in his service.

The right of one using a thing is preferable to that of one laying hold of it. If two men dispute respecting an under garment, the one wearing it, and the other holding the sleeve of it, the claim of the wearer is preferable, as his act is evident.

If two persons should dispute concerning a carpet, the one being seated upon it, and the other having hold of it with his hand, the Kazee must not pass a decree in favour of either.

If two persons dispute concerning a piece of cloth the one enclosing great part of it in his hand, and the other having hold of the border of it, in this case the cloth is equally parted between them, because the greater quantity held by the one than the other does not give a superiority of claim, as it goes only to diminish one argument or proof.
CLAIMS

Right of possession over a foundling is established by his own acknowledgment. — If a boy be in the possession of any person, and, being capable of explaining his own condition, declare that "he is free", his assertion must be credited, in as much as he is his own master. — If, on the other hand, he declare himself to be the slave of some other person than the possessor, he is adjudged to be the property, of the possessor, because, in declaring himself a slave, he acknowledges that he is not his own master. — If, also, a boy be not capable of explaining his own condition, he is adjudged to be the property of the possessor, because not being his own master he is considered in the same light as clothes or any similar article: — and if, after attaining maturity, he claim his freedom, his plea will not be admitted, because his slavery during his childhood became apparent; and no matter that becomes apparent can afterwards be set aside excepting upon proof †.

The court of a Serai is adjudged between the disputants. — If there be ten apartments of a Serai in the possession of one man, and one apartment in the possession of another, and they enter into a contention respecting the court of the Serai, in this case the claim of both must be adjudged to be equal, since both have an equal right to the use of it, and to pass through it.

A decree cannot be issued, respecting a claim to land, without the addition of evidence. — If two men claim a piece of ground, each, respectively, asserting it to be "in his possession," the Kazee in this case must not pass a decree in favour of the possession of either, until evidence be produced; since possession of land is not of a nature to be adjudged by the Kazee, because of the impracticability of producing it in court; and also, because it is necessary to prove by evidence whatever is concealed from the knowledge of the Kazee. — If, therefore, either of the parties produce evidence in support of his claim, the land must be adjudged to be in his possession; because of the establishment of proof, and also because possession is a right which is the object of desire. In the same manner as other rights. — If both parties produce evidence in support of their claims, the ground must in that case be adjudged to be jointly in possession of both. — If, however, one of the claimants should have built bricks upon the ground, or should have built upon it, or dug a well or a ditch in it, in all these cases the possession must be adjudged to him on account of those acts.

CHAPTER V.

OF CLAIM OF PARENTAGE.

A claim made by the seller of a female slave to a child born of her within less than six months after the sale, is established. — If a person sell a female slave, and she afterwards bring forth a child, and the seller claim it. — In that case, provided the birth take place in less than six months from the sale, the child is adjudged to the seller, and the mother is his Am-Walid. — This is according to a favourable construction of the law. In the opinion of Ziffer and Shafei the claim is null; and this is agreeable to analogy; because the seller, in making the sale, has virtually acknowledged the child to be a slave, which is inconsistent with his plea of its being his child. — The reason for a more favourable construction in this particular is, that as the birth happened in less than six months from the sale it is evident that the conception must have existed whilst the slave was in the possession of the seller; and this argues the conception to have proceeded from the seller, since there is no reason to suppose that the woman was guilty of whoredom. As pregnancy moreover, is a circumstance which may remain unknown for a time. the seller is on this account vindicated from the charge of previaration or inconsistency and his claim is consequently valid. — Now as his claim of parentage is valid, it is therefore referred to the period of conception; and hence it appears that the man has sold his Am-Walid; and as the sale of an Am-Walid is unlawful, it must therefore be annulled, and the price must be returned by the purchaser, as having been unjustly obtained.

And if the purchaser make the same claim, still the claim of the seller is preferred — If on the other hand, the purchaser should, either at the same time with, or posterior to, the claim of the seller, claim the parentage of the child, in that case, also, the claim of the seller is preferred, because of its having existed prior to that of the purchaser, as being referred to the period of conception.

If the birth happen within from six months to two years after the sale, his claim is not admitted without the verification of the purchaser. — Supposing, however, the child to be born two years after the sale, the seller's claim of parentage is not in that case valid; because the conception, in this instance, could not possibly have taken place during his possession of the slave, and this is the only idea under which a decision could pass in his favour: — his claim, therefore, cannot be admitted unless it be confirmed by the
If made by the seller, after the mother has been emancipated by the purchaser, it is valid: but if the child should have been emancipated by him it is null.—In this respect, related in the Jamə-Sagheer, that if a female slave, being pregnant, should be sold by her master, and having afterwards brought forth a child, the seller should claim the child after she had been emancipated by the purchaser; in this case the child is considered as the offspring of the seller, and he must return to the purchaser a part of the price proportionate to its value. This also accords with the opinion of the two disciples, Haneefa alleges that the seller must return the whole of the price, in the same manner as in case of the mother's death; and this is approved.

If, however, the purchaser should have emancipated the child only, in this case the claim of the seller is nul. The reason for the distinction between these two cases is as follows—In the former case, the child being the principal with regard to the claim, and the mother only a dependancy (as has been already explained), it follows that the bar to the claim of parentage and claim of offspring (namely, emancipation) exists in the dependant, that is, in the mother; and consequently cannot operate upon the child, who is a principal:—the claim to the child is therefore approved, and it is accordingly free; and the parentage is established in the seller. The freedom of the child, moreover, being the establishment of parentage, does not necessarily infer that the mother also is emancipated—(whence it is that the child of a Magroor is free, whilst the mother remains a slave:—and also; that if a person marry the female slave of another, and beget a child upon her, the parentage is established in him, whilst the mother continues the slave of her master).—In the second case, on the contrary, the bar exists in the child, who is the principal, and hence the claim cannot be made good either with respect to the principal or the dependancy. The freedom of the child is a bar to the validity of the claim, because, as emancipation is incapable of annulment, in the same manner as a claim of parentage or of offspring are incapable of it, they are therefore both of equal force. Now, in the case in question, an actual manumission has been established on the part of the purchaser, whilst on the part of the seller, on the other hand, is established a right of claim in regard to the child, and a right of emancipation in regard to the mother; but a mere right to a thing cannot be opposed to the actual thing itself.—It is also to be observed that the purchaser's creating the child a Moddbbir is, in this respect, equivalent to the complete emancipation of him, as that also is incapable of annulment, and is, moreover, followed by certain of the effects of emancipation,—such, for instance, as preventing sale.

—If a person sell a slave, that has been born... of a female slave, who was his property at the time of the birth,* and the purchaser afterwards sell him to another person, and the first seller then claim him, in that case, the slave in question is his child, and the sale in null; because sale is capable of annulment, whereas the right of this person to claim the parentage of the slave is incapable of it; therefore the sale is accordingly annulled. In the same manner, if the buyer, after the purchase of the mother and son, should make a Mokatib of the former, or pledge him, or let him out to hire —or, if he should make a Mokatiba of the mother, or pledge her, or give her in marriage to some person, and the seller afterwards claim the child,—in any of these cases his claim must be admitted; and all the several contracts mentioned are annulled, as they are all capable of annulment. It is otherwise where the purchaser emancipates or makes a Modabbir of the child. —as has been already explained:— and it is also otherwise where the purchaser first claim him as his child, and afterwards the seller.—because the parentage, after having been established in the purchaser, cannot again be established in the seller. As it is a right which is incapable of annulment, and hence the case is the same as if the purchaser had emancipated him.

A claim established with respect to one twin establishes it with respect to the other also. —If a female slave bring forth twins, and the proprietor claim the parentage of one of them, in this case the establishment of parentage in him, with respect to one of them, necessarily involves the same with respect to the other; because they must both have been conceived from one reed; for this reason, that by twins is understood two children born of the same mother, and between the birth of whom a period of less than six months has intervened,—and it is therefore impossible that the conception of the other child should have been supervenient and separate. Parentage cannot be short of six months.—It is related, in the Jama Sagheer, that if a person be possessed of two slaves, twins, who had been born his property, and he should sell one of them and the purchaser emancipate him, and the seller afterwards avow, as his issue, the one who remains in his hands; in this case both the twins are the children, and the emancipation of the purchaser is null; I because, upon the parentage being established of the one in his possession, by which he becomes free; the parentage and consequent freedom of the other are necessarily involved, as they are not

A claim of offspring cannot be established, after an acknowledgment in favour of another person. —If a person be possessed of a boy, and declare the boy to be the son of a certain absent slave, and afterwards declare him to be his son, at this case the parentage although the absent slave were to deny the boy to be his child. —This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that in case the denial of the slave, the parentage of the possessor is established. —A similar disagreement subsists where the possessor declares the boy in his possession to be the son of a particular person, and born of his wife, and the latter claims the parentage of him. —The reasoning of the two disciples is that the acknowledgment, by the master, of the boy being the son of his slave, is repelled by the denial of the slave, whereas the case becomes the same as if no such acknowledgment had ever been made. —Now, although parentage cannot be annulled after the establishment of it, yet acknowledgment of parentage is set aside by the denial of the person who is the object of it, and the acknowledgment is ascribed to levity or compulsion (as if a person, by way of levity, or under the influence of compulsion, should make an acknowledgment that his slave was his son, in which case his acknowledgment is not valid):— the case in question, therefore, becomes the same as if a purchaser of a slave should acknowledge that the “seller had emancipated him,” and the seller deny the same, and the purchaser then say that “he had himself emancipated him;” for in this case last assertion of the purchaser is credited, and the willa-right with respect to the slave thus emancipated rests with him; and his acknowledgment with regard to the seller is considered as never having existed; so also in the case in question. —It would be otherwise, if the purchaser and verify the first assertion of the possessor, that “he is the son of a certain absent slave,"

This case supposes the child and the mother to be sold together, as appears by the context a little further on.

One effect of which is to destroy his right of Willa, which he would otherwise have enjoyed.

This case has been somewhat abridged in the translation, and in particular, the matter part of it is entirely omitted as being a mere repetition.
and the possessor himself should then claim the issue; because the claim would in such a case be invalid, as having been preferred after the proof of parentage in another. It would also be otherwise if the slave should remain silent, without either confirming or denying the claim for, in this case also, the subsequent claim of the possessor would be invalid, because the right of the person acknowledged relates to the boy, and there is a possibility that he may verify the assertion of the possessor.—The boy, therefore, in this instance, stands in the same predicament with the son of a woman who has been required to make acknowledgment, and whose parentage cannot be proved by any other than the imprecator (namely, the husband of the woman), who has the power of afterwards contradicting himself, and declaring that the said son is his issue. —Hence, on the other hand, it is, that parentage is a matter which, after proof, cannot be set aside; nor can the acknowledgment of such a matter be undone by the rejection of the person who is the object of it; it therefore continues in force notwithstanding the rejection; and hence the claim of the master, subsequent to such acknowledgment, is invalid, although the slave should contradict the acknowledgment; in the same manner as if a person should bear testimony to the parentage of an infant, and his testimony being set aside from suspicion, he should then claim the said infant as his son; in which case his claim would not be valid; and so also in the case in question. The ground on which this proceeds is that the right of the person in question (namely, he slave) relates to the boy. Inasmuch that, if the slave should verify the assertion of the master subsequent to a contradiction, the parentage of the boy is established in the slave: and, in the same manner, the right of the boy is connected with the acknowledgment of the master; and hence the acknowledgment cannot be set aside by the contradiction of the slave. Therefore, with respect to the case of a purchaser acquiring the right of Willa, adduced by the two disciples as analogous to this, it may be replied that a disagreement subsists concerning this case also; as Haneefa does not admit the doctrine there advanced:—or, if it be admitted, still there subsists this difference between it and the case in question, that Willa is capable of annulment,—in other words, the right of Willa in one person is sometimes set aside in favour of another, when any supervenient circumstance occurs to strengthen the claims of that other. Thus, if Zeyd should contract his female slave in marriage with the slave of Khalid, and after their having issue should emancipate the mother, in this case the right of Willa, or patronage, over the child, belongs to Zeyd; but if afterwards Khalid should emancipate his slave, who is the father of the child, then the right of Willa over the child would be annulled in Zeyd, and would vest in Khalid, the emancipator of the father, since the right derived from the emancipation of the father is stronger than that derived from the emancipation of the mother:—whereas, in the case exemplified by the two disciples, the establishment of the right of Willa in the seller of the slave rests on the supposition of the seller, after having contradicted the purchase, again contradicting himself, and verifying the assertion of the purchaser: and when, in this state or suspended Willa, a circumstance intervenes which operates as a stronger cause for the establishment of the Willa in the purchaser, the suspended Willa in the seller becomes null. The circumstance here alluded to is the assertion of the purchaser that "he emancipated the slave;" and this operates as a stronger cause since it gives immediate freedom to the slave in consequence of his being the property of the purchaser, whereas the emancipation of the seller does not give immediate freedom, as it rests upon the verification of the purchaser, and hence becomes null on the supervision of a stronger cause; because Willa is capable of annulment; contrary to parentage, as has been already explained.—From this doctrine of Haneefa, that the possessor’s acknowledgment of the boy being the son of his slave cannot afterwards be set aside by the contradiction of the person who is the subject of that acknowledgment,—and that, consequently, and subsequent claim of the possessor to the parentage of the child will not be valid,—it follows that a decree may be founded upon it for establishing the validity of a father’s selling his son begotten upon his slave; for, in order to remove any apprehensions from the mind of the purchaser of his afterwards claiming his son, and thereby rendering the sale null, he must make an acknowledgment of the issue in favour of another, by which means he will effectually preclude the possibility of himself afterwards preferring a valid claim to him.

A claim of parentage made by a Christian is preferable to a claim of bondage advanced by a Mussulman.—If a boy be in the possession of two men, of whom one is a Mussulman and the other a Christian, and the Christian asserts that "he is his son," and the Mussulman that "he is his slave," he must in this case be decreed to be the son of the Christian, and free; because, although the religion of Islam has not yet that superiority is allowed to operate only in cases which are balanced against each other; but there is no balance between a claim of offspring and of bondage: the claim of the Christian is therefore admitted; because this is attended with a great benefit to the boy, since it procures him immediate freedom, and (as may also be expected) future faith, inasmuch as the arguments for the unity of the Godhead are evident and plain; whereas, if a contrary decree be passed (that is, if the boy should be decreed to be the slave of the Mussulman, and not the son of the Christian), in that case the true faith in the boy would be established merely from dependance, whilst he must be precluded from freedom, as not having the power himself to acquire it,—if, however both the Mussulman and the Christian claim the issue, the claim of the Mussulman must in that case be preferred, on account of the superiority due to the true faith, and because of the superior advantage that would result to the boy.

Or (if she be in her edit) one man and two women.—If however the woman in question be in her edit from a complete divorce, the testimony of the midwife alone does not suffice with respect to the birth;—on the contrary, that of two men, or of one man and two women, is requisite.—(This is the doctrine according to the opinion of Haneefah, as has been already mentioned in treating of divorce.)

If the woman be neither married, nor in her edit from divorce, in this case lawyers have asserted that the parentage of the child is established by herself; her own assertion on this head being admitted; since, in this case, it does not operate upon, or affect, any other person.—But if, being married, she should say, "this is my son, begotten by this my husband," and the husband verify the same, there is in this case no occasion for one witness to prove the birth, since the acknowledgment of the husband renders it sufficient. But if her husband verify her claim, there is no occasion for such evidence.—If the boy be in the joint possession of the wife and her husband, and the husband should say "this boy is my son, begotten not on this woman but on another," and the woman should say "this is my son, begotten by another husband," in this case the boy is decreed to be their son, because of the probability of the thing founded upon their joint possession of the boy, and their connection with each other as husband and wife. Besides, the assertion of each has a tendency to destroy the right of the other, and therefore that one only out to be adopted.—This case resembles that where each of two men, having jointly the possession of a piece of cloth, asserts that it is the joint property of himself and some other person, in which case the cloth is adjudged to be the property of the two possessors. There is, however, this difference between these two cases,—that in the case of the cloth, the other persons, in favour of whom the parties have respectively made an acknowledgment, are admitted to a participation in the shares of their respective acknowledgments, because of the subject of contention (namely, the cloth) being one of the cases of division;—whereas, in the case in question, the persons referred to are not admitted to a participation in the right of the acknowledge, since parentage (which is the subject of it) does not admit of participation.

Case of a person begetting a child upon a female slave, under an erroneous possession.

If a person purchase a female slave, and beget a child upon her, and claim it, after its birth, as his issue, and it afterwards appear that the slave had not been the property of the seller, in this case the purchaser must give, to the rightful master of the slave, the value which the child may bear at the time of contention,—and the child is free; first, because he is the offspring of a Magroor: for a Magroor is defined to be a person who begets a child upon a woman, on the belief of her being his property,—(or whom he has in that belief married),—and who afterwards proves to be the property of another; and this definition of a Magroor is exactly applicable to the person in question; the issue of a Magroor is therefore free for an equivalent, according to all the companions:—in the second place, a regard must be had to the right of both parties.—The said child is therefore completely free, in behalf of his father, and a slave in behalf of the plaintiff, namely, the proprietor of his mother. Now, since the child remains in the possession of the father without any transgression or unwarrantable act on the part of the father, the father is therefore not responsible for it unless he become a bar to the seisin of it by the proprietor (in the same manner as is decreed in the case of the child of an usurped female slave); and he is a bar only where, the plaintiff having demanded the child, [the father] refuses to surrender, where it appears that the value of the child is estimated from the day of contention, as it is then that the bar begins to operate. If, therefore, the child should die in the possession of the father, without any contention having happened, the father is in no degree responsible, since no bar had taken place; and hence, also, if the child should die possessed of property, the father inherits it, as the child was completely free in right of his father—
If, on the other hand, the father should kill the son, he must in this case make compensation for the value, since he himself operated as a bar the proprietor's right—In the same manner also, if any other than the father were to kill the child, and the father exact the fine of blood, he must pay the value to the proprietor; because, although the child be destroyed, yet the compensation remains whole and entire in the hands of the father (since the fine of blood is a compensation); and, as the existence of the compensation is equivalent to the existence of the thing itself, and the bar the compensation is equivalent to the bar to the thing itself, it follows that it is incumbent on him to give the value, in the same manner as it would have been incumbent on him in case of the existence of the child. —It is to be observed that the purchaser, after paying a compensation for the value of the child, is entitled to receive the said value from the seller, since the seller was responsible to him for the safety and preservation of it; he is therefore entitled to exact from the seller the value of the child, in the same manner as the price of the mother.—It is different, however, with respect to the Akir, or fine of trespass, as he is not entitled to exact that from the seller. —The purchaser, therefore, as having had carnal knowledge of a woman who was the property of another, although he be exempted from punishment for whoredom, because of the doubt which existed, is notwithstanding required to pay to the proprietor an Akir, or fine of trespass;—but he must not demand a reimbursement for the Akir from the seller, because he became liable to pay it for the commission of an act of which he himself reaped the sole benefit.

Definition of the term.—IKRAR, in the language of the law, means the notification or avowal of the right of another upon one's self.—The person making such acknowledgment is termed Mookir;—the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made is termed Mookir-lee-hoo and the thing which is the subject of the acknowledgment is termed Mookir-be-hoo.

CHAPTER I.

Acknowledgment, proceeding from a competent person, is binding upon the acknowledger. —When a person possessing sanity of mind, and arrived at the age of maturity, makes in acknowledgment of a right, such acknowledgment is binding upon him, whether the subject of it be known or unknown; because acknowledgment (as has been already explained) is an avowal of the right of another upon one's self: and by acknowledgment the right of another becomes binding:—and this argues the establishment of such right; because, property being desired by all men, it is not likely that any person would falsely establish the right of another to a part of his own. Besides, the Prophet ordered Maaz to be stoned in consequence of his acknowledgment of whoredom.

But not upon any other person.—It is proper, in this place, to observe that acknowledgment is a defective proof. In other words: it operates only upon the person of the acknowledger, and not upon that of another, since over that he has no power.

The points that establish competency are freedom.—Freedom is established as a necessary qualification in an acknowledgment, in order that his acknowledgment may be valid, absolutely—that is to say, with respect to property and the like: for although a privileged slave be, virtually, the same as a free-man with respect to acknowledgement, yet the acknowledgment of an inhibited slave is not valid with respect to property, but merely with respect to punishment or retaliation.—

The reason of this is that the acknowledgment of an inhibited slave induces the obligation of a debt upon himself; and his self being the property of his master, it is consequently the same as if he had made an acknowledgment in regard to another which is not lawful. —It is otherwise with respect to a privileged slave; for his acknowledgment is valid, as his master, in privileging him, does virtually assent to his contracting debts. —It is otherwise, also, with respect to the acknowledgment of inhibited slaves, in cases of punishment and retaliation; for if an inhibited slave should say "I have committed whoredom with a certain woman,"—or "I have killed a certain person,"—his acknowledgment would in these cases be valid; since a slave, in matters relative to punishment and retaliation, is allowed to assume his original condition of freedom (whence it is that the acknowledgment of his master with regard to him in these cases is invalid).

Sanity of mind, and maturity.—Sanity of mind, and maturity of years, are also necessary conditions in an acknowledgment, because the acknowledgment of an infant or an idiot is invalid, as neither has any power to assume an obligation upon himself. The acknowledgment of a privileged infant is, however, valid, as he virtually a major.

Acknowledgment is not invalidated by ignorance of the subject.—Ignorance, with
An acknowledgment, expressed under the general term property, must be received according to the explanation of the acknowledgment. If a person say "property" is due by me to a certain person," he must explain the amount; and his explanation must be credited, whether it be great or small, since great and small are alike applicable to property. If, however, he specify less than one dirm, it is not to be admitted, since, in common usage, any thing short of a dirm is not reckoned property.

But if made to a great property, it cannot mean less than what constitutes a Nisab in the property to which it relates. If he should say "a great property is due by me," then, provided he explain it to be less than two hundred dirms, it cannot be admitted according to the two disciples (and also according to one report from Haneefa); because, where he describes the property in question, as being considerable, his explanation to any amount short of two hundred dirms is not to be credited; for, if it were otherwise, his description of great would be void and nugatory, since the smallest sum which can properly be termed great is that which constitutes a Nisab in Zakat.

There is another opinion ascribed to Haneefa that the explanation, if it be less than ten dirms (which is the Nisab fixed for theft) must not be admitted; because ten dirms are what may property be termed a great property, whence it is that, for the theft of that quantity, the hand of man (which is otherwise sacred) is cut off.

What is here advanced respects an acknowledgment of great property in dirms. But if he should have said "I owe great property of deenars," then the amount due is fixed at twenty Miskals. In camels it is twenty-five; because the smallest Nisab of camels upon which a camel is due in Zakat is twenty-five. In all property not subject to Zakat, the explanation is required to amount to a Nisab with respect to the value; § that is to say, if the acknowledgment explain to the value of a Nisab his acknowledgment is to be credited; but if to less, it must be rejected. If the acknowledgment should say, "I owe large properties," the smallest specification that can in that case be admitted is three Nisabs, of that species of property to which the acknowledgment relates; because the word properties is

*Arab. Mal: meaning property in each, or in the precious metals, &c., in opposition to Rakht and Matta, which are particularly applied to goods and effects.

Upon which a Zakat is paid of a yearling camel's colt. (See Vol. I. p 5).

§ See Vol., pp. 9 and 10.
plural, and the smallest degree of plurality is three.

Cases of acknowledgment relating to many dirms—If a person should say "I owe many dirms," his explanation is not admitted to an amount short of ten dirms, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is not to be admitted to an amount short of two hundred; because a proprietor of a Nisab (namely, two hundred dirms) is held to be opulent—(not one who is possessed of a smaller number,) whence it is that the proprietor of a Nisab is required to aid and assist others, and not he who is possessed of a smaller number. The reasoning of Haneefa is founded upon principles peculiar to the Arabic language.

Or to dirms generally—If the acknowledger should say "I owe dirms," he is supposed to mean three; as that is the least number of plurality. But if he should himself explain a larger number, it must be admitted, as the word dirms may be applied to any number. The weight of the dirms must be estimated from what is customary.

Section

Acknowledgement made in favour of an embryo (in virtue of bequest or inheritance is valid.—If a person say "I am bound, for a thousand dirms, to the conception in the womb of a certain woman; and afterwards add that "the said sum is due in virtue of a bequest of a particular person"—or that "it is the right of the conception in virtue of inheritance from its parent"—the acknowledgment so made is valid. In as much as it relates (in these instances) to a cause which is fit and adequate to the establishment of a right to property in a conception.

Provided the birth take place within a probable period.—If, therefore, the woman should afterwards bring forth a living child within such a period as evinces the conception to have existed in the womb at the time of the acknowledgment, the acknowledger is bound to the child for a thousand dirms.

And if the embryo prove still born, the thing acknowledged must be divided among the heirs; or, if twins be born, it must be divided between them.—If, on the other hand, the woman should bring forth a dead child, the acknowledgment in that case relates to the testator or the inheritee, and the amount of it must accordingly be divided amongst their heirs; because the acknowledgment was in reality in favour of the testator, or the inheritee, and was to vest in the offspring only on condition of its being born alive, which did not afterwards take place.—If the woman should bring forth two living children, then the thing acknowledged must be divided equally between them.

But if such acknowledgment be ascribed to an impossible cause, it is null.—If a person say "I am bound to the conception of a certain woman for a thousand dirms, being the price of an article I purchased from the said conception," or "being money borrowed from it."—no obligation rests upon the acknowledger, as he explained it to arise from a cause which could not have happened, since a conception is incapable of either lending or selling.

And so also if it be made without specifying any cause.—If a person acknowledge his being bound to a conception, without specifying the cause, such acknowledgment (according to Aboo Yoosaf) is invalid.—Mohammed maintains that it is valid; for, as acknowledgment is proof, it is necessary to fulfil it as far as may be practicable; and it is practicable to fulfil it, in the present instance, by construing the cause to have been such as was competent to the establishment of a right of property in the conception. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that an acknowledgment, when absolute, is construed to be in virtue of traffic (whence it is that the acknowledgment of a privileged slave, or of one out of the two partners by reciprocity, is understood to be an acknowledgment founded upon traffic); the case, therefore, is the same as if the acknowledger had expressly specified the cause to be traffic; and as that would have been invalid, so also is it invalid where the cause is undersood to be such from implication.

Acknowledgment relating to a thing existing, but not yet produced, is valid.—If a person acknowledge the conception of a female slave, or the offspring of a goat, to be due to another, such acknowledgment is binding; since it would have been valid if he had bequeathed either of these, and his intention is it therefore construed to be such.

Acknowledgment of a debt, under a condition of option, is valid, and the condition becomes null—If a person should make acknowledgment that "he owes another a thousand dirms upon an optional condition" (in other words, if he should say "the said amount is due by me (or, from me), but I have an option of three days")—the condition of option is in this case null, since optional conditions are instituted with a view to annulment, whereas an acknowledgment is notification or avowal, which is binding; the acknowledgment, therefore, is in this case binding, and is not rendered null by the nullity of the condition.

*A considerable portion of the text which immediately follows has been omitted by the translator, as the cases which it contains, relating entirely to verbal criticism, cannot easily be translated, and are such as belong more properly to the province of grammarians than of lawyers.
The exception of a part of the thing acknowledged is valid, if immediately joined with the acknowledgment; but if the whole be excepted, the exception is not attended to. — If a person make an acknowledgment of a thing in favour of another, adding an exception of part of the thing so acknowledged, that exception is valid; and the acknowledgment becomes bound for the remainder, whether the exception be great or small; provided, however, that it be immediately joined to the acknowledgment.† If, on the contrary, he except the whole of the thing acknowledged, the acknowledgment is in that case binding, and the exception null; because this is in fact a retraction, not an exception; for exception supposes the remainder of a part after the deduction of the thing excepted from the whole; but after the deduction of the whole there is no remainder: it is therefore a retraction, and consequently null.

The exception must be homogeneous with the acknowledgment: otherwise it is invalid. — If a person say "I am bound to a certain person for a hundred dirms, with the exception of one deenar" (or "of one Kafeez of wheat"), then according to the two disciples, he is bound for a hundred dirms, with the exception of one deenar (or of one Kafeez of wheat) — If, on the contrary, he should say "I owe a hundred dirms, with the exception of one piece of cloth:" the exception so made is not valid. — Mohammed maintains that the exception is invalid in both cases. — Shafei, on the other hand, holds that in both cases it is valid. — The argument of Mohammed is that an exception means a deduction from the thing mentioned in the preceding part of the sentence, which cannot be established where the thing excepted is not of the same genus with the thing from which it is excepted. The argument of Shafei is that the thing excepted, and that from which the exception is made, are of one and the same genus, as being both valuables. — The argument of the two disciples is that in the former instance, the thing itself, and the exception from it, are of the same genus as they are both price: — deenars are evidently so: — and things estimable by weight, or by measurement of capacity, are so likewise, according to their qualities; — is other words they become so upon their qualities being explained. — In the second instance, on the contrary (where the exception is cloth), the thing excepted, and that from which the exception is made, are of different genus, as cloth is not price in any shape, neither in respect of itself, nor in respect of its description or quality; and accordingly, cloth is not due in any contract of exchange, excepting that of Sillim (that is, where the price is advanced to the seller beforehand) — Now whatever is price has this fitness, that it may be set in comparison with dirms or deenars, and may consequently, in a proportionate degree, be excepted from them; — whereas on the other hand, whatever cannot be stated as price has not a fitness of being compared with dirms and deenars, and consequently cannot be stated as an exception from them, since the proportion cannot be ascertained.

A reservation of the will of God renders the acknowledgment null. — If a person make an acknowledgment, with this proviso "if it please God," he is not then liable for any thing; because (according to Aboo Yousal), a reservation of the pleasure of God is either an annulment of the acknowledgment, or a suspension of it; and the acknowledgment is null on either supposition: — or, because (as Mohammed argues) it is equivalent to an acknowledgment suspended upon a condition, which is null, as an acknowledgment cannot admit of being suspended on a condition, since acknowledgment is an avowal, which cannot be made conditional; for if it be true it cannot be rendered false by a default of the condition; or on the contrary, if it be false it cannot be rendered true by the fulfilment of the condition: — or, lastly, because the acknowledgment is suspended on a circumstance which it is impossible to ascertain. — It is otherwise where a person says "I acknowledge a hundred dirms to be due by me to a particular person on my death," — "upon the arrival of a particular month," or "upon the festival of breaking Lent," — because in these cases the acknowledgment is not suspended upon a condition, as this is merely an explanation of the time and is therefore a postponement of the thing acknowledged, and not a suspension; whence it is that if the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made can prove the falsity of the postponement, the thing becomes due to him immediately.

In an acknowledgment regarding a house, an exception of the foundation is invalid. — If a person make an acknowledgment of a house in favour of another, and except the foundation, both the house and the foundation are the right of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made; because the foundation is included in the house from its dependancy, and not from its being comprehended in the word house: and an exception is valid only where it relates to something comprehended in the thing expressed, according to the meaning of the word. It is to be observed that the stone in a ring, or the trees of an orchard, stand, in the same relation to the ring or the orchard as the foundation does to a house, because neither the word ring nor orchard applies to the stone or the trees, but are both included merely as dependants. It is otherwise where a person makes an acknowledgment in favour of another, excepting from it an indefinite portion, or a specific apartment, as the exception in these cases relates to a thing which is comprehended in the word house.

An exception of the court-yard of a house is admitted.—If a person say "the foundation of this house belongs to me, and the Sīhn (meaning the court-yard) to a particular person," then the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made is entitled to the court-yard, and the foundation is the property of the acknowledged. It is therefore, in fact, the same as if the acknowledged had declared that "all the ground free of building is the property of such a person." It would be otherwise if, instead of Sīhn, he were to mention the word ṣān [earth], for in that case the foundation as well as the house would become the property of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made; because an acknowledgment of the ground is an acknowledgment of the foundation, as much as an acknowledgment of the house itself; for the ground is the original thing, and the foundation is included along with it as a dependant.—In an acknowledgment of the ground, therefore, the foundation is included as a dependant, in the same manner as it would be included in the house itself; and hence the exception is invalid.

A reservation of non-delivery of the article is done away by the delivery of it to the acknowledged.—If a person acknowledge a debt of a thousand dirms to another, as the price of a slave which he had purchased from that other, but which he had not received from him, in that case, if the slave be specific (as if he had said, "as the price of this slave"), the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made must be desired to deliver up the slave and receive a thousand dirms, on pain of forfeiting his claim.—The compiler of the Ḥedaya remarks that this case admits of several statements.—I. That which has been already made, and which proceeds on the supposition of the acknowledged's assertion of the purchase and the non-delivery being verified by the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made; and in which the law stands as above expounded, because the mutual agreement of the parties is equivalent to actual inspection.—II. Where the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made denies the sale of the particular slave alleged by the acknowledged, and declares that "the slave in question in his property and it is another slave he sold to him";—in which case the acknowledged is liable for the amount; since he acknowledges a sum due, on the supposition of the existence of a slave which he had purchased; and consequently upon the other person's declaration of the existence of the slave sold, he becomes liable for the amount.

Objection.—It would appear that the acknowledged is not responsible for the amount, since he acknowledges his debt of a thousand dirms for the purchase of a specific slave; whereas the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made claims the said debt for the sale of another slave.—Now as acknowledgment is binding only from the particular cause which is assigned for it and the cause in this case is contradicted by the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made it follows that the acknowledgment is not valid.

Reply.—The contradiction, with respect to the cause, after their mutual agreement as to the existence of the obligation, is of no effect. Thus if a person acknowledge his responsibility to another in favour of a thousand dirms, as "for goods purchased from him," and the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made assert the obligation in question to have arisen from usurpation or loan, still the acknowledged is responsible for the amount: and also in the case in question.—III. Where the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made declares the slave in question to be his own property, and denies his having sold him; in which case the acknowledged is exempted from any obligation, because he has acknowledged the property to be due only as in return for the slave, and consequently, without that, it is not due from him.

But in case of a disagreement with respect to the article, both parties must be sworn.—If, however, in this case, the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made should further declare that "he had sold another slave to him [the acknowledged]," both parties must be sworn: because they are both defendants, as they reciprocally deny the assertions of each other:—and upon each taking an oath, the obligation involved in the acknowledgment is annulled, and the slave remains with the person in whose favour the acknowledgment was made.

If the article be not specific, the reservation is not regarded.—What is here advanced proceeds on a supposition of the slave being specific: for if a person acknowledge a debt of a thousand dirms, due to another, for a slave that he had purchased from him, with out specifically describing the slave, the acknowledged is in that case responsible for a thousand dirms:—and his assertion, that "he had not received the slave," is not to be regarded, according to Ḥanifa, whether he connect such assertion with his acknowledgment, or make it separately: because such assertion is a retraction of his acknowledgment; for this reason, that in acknowledging a thousand dirms to be due from him, he assumes an obligation to that amount; and his denial of the receipt of the indefinite slave is repugnant to this obligation, as the price is not due for an indefinite slave, because of the uncertainty:—and this, whether the uncertainty be interwoven in the contract (as where a person purchases one of two slaves), or supervenient upon it (as where a person purchases a specific slave out of a great number, and afterwards both the buyer and the seller forget the slave that had been purchased); because the uncertainty is a bar to the delivery, since the purchaser may always deny whatever slave is produced by the seller to be the one purchased: the uncertainty, therefore, is a bar to the obligation of the price; and such being the case, the acknowledger, in denying the receipt of the slave, virtually retracts his acknowledgment, which is not allowed.—The two disciples allege that if the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made should verify the acknowledger's assertion by declaring the out of one thousand dirms to be due for the price of a slave, the acknowledger's declaration of his not having received the slave is in that case to be credited; nor is any thing whatever due from him, whether such declaration have been conjoined with the acknowledgment, or otherwise.—But if the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made contradict the acknowledger, with respect to the debt being for the price of a slave, asserting it to be due for some other goods, then the acknowledger's declaration of his not having received the slave is not to the creditor credited; if it be conjoined with the acknowledgment. Their reasoning in support of this opinion that the acknowledger having acknowledged the obligation of the debt upon himself, and having explained the cause of it (namely, sale), it follows that if the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made verify his declaration so far as relates to the cause of the obligation, the sale is fully proven and established; the obligation, however, towards the discharge of the debt, can be established only by the receipt of the subject of the sale; and as this is denied by the acknowledger, his assertion is therefore credited.—If, on the other hand, the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made should contradict the assertion of the acknowledger in regard to the cause of obligation, then the acknowledger's explanation of the cause may be regarded as a modification (that is, he by it modifies the tenor of the first part of his speech); because the tenor of the first part of his speech goes to show that an obligation is at present actually operating upon him; whereas the latter part, in denying the receipt, tends to prove that no obligation subsists, since the obligation to pay is not established till after the receipt: the last part of the speech, therefore, is an explanatory modification; and a modification is not admitted unless it be conjoined with the acknowledgment.

A reservation of non-receipt of the thing acknowledged must be credited.—If a person acknowledge the purchase of an article from another at the same time declaring that "has not yet received it," his assertion must in that case be credited, according to all our doctors: because he has merely acknowledged a contract of sale; and an acknowledgment of sale is not an acknowledgment of receipt; since a receipt does not necessarily follow a conclusion of sale.—It is otherwise where a person acknowledge the obligation of the price of an article purchased; for in that case his assertion of non-receipt is not approved, as payment of the price is not obligatory until after the receipt of the goods.

A reservation of non-receipt of the thing acknowledged being illegitimate does not annul the acknowledgment.—If a Mussulman declare that "he owes such a person a thousand dirms, on account of wine or pork," he is bound for the thousand dirms;—and his explanation of the cause is not admitted, according to Haneefa, whether it be conjoined with the acknowledgment, or otherwise; because it is a retraction of his acknowledgment as the price of wine or pork cannot be obligatory on a Mussulman; and in the preceding part of his speech he expressly declares the existence of an obligation upon him to the amount stated. The two disciples allege that if the explanation be conjoined with the acknowledgment, nothing is due from the acknowledger, since the latter part of his speech evidently shows this to have been his meaning, it being in the same as if he had added "he it pleases God." To this however, it may be replied, that there is no analogy between the two cases, as a reservation of the pleasure of God is a suspension of the matter upon a condition of which it is impossible to obtain a knowledge. Besides the suspension on a condition is a modification, and consequently admissible, provided it be conjoined with the speech: in opposition to an acknowledgment of the price of wine or pork, which is not a suspension, but an annulment of the acknowledgment, as has been already explained.

An exception with respect to the quality of money acknowledged to be due, is set aside by the counter assertion of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made.—If a person declare that "a thousand dirms are due from him to such a person, as the price of certain effects," or "on account of a loan," and afterwards allege the said thousand dirms to be Zeyf, or Binhirja, or Satooka, or Arzeez, and the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made allege them to be Jiud,* in that case, according to Haneefa, the acknowledger is responsible for Jiud dirms, whether his latter assertion be conjoined with his prior declaration, or otherwise.—The two disciples maintain that the latter assertion of the acknowledger is to be credited, in case only of its being con-

—The same difference of opinion obtains where a person declares that "he owes another a thousand dirms," adding, that "they are Zeyf," or that "another has lent him a thousand dirms, but that they are Zeyf," or, that "he owes another a thousand dirms for an account of certain goods, but that they are Zeyf."—Zeyf dirms are such as are not accepted at the public treasury, but which pass amongst merchants; the Binhirja is of a kind still worse, which does not pass amongst merchants; and the Satooka and Arzeez, are the worst of all, and in which the mixture of base metal preponderates. The argument of the two disciples is that the above explanation is a modification, and is consequently valid if conjoined, in the same manner as a condition, or an exception; for the word dirm is literally applicable to Zeyf and metaphorically to Satooka; the acknowledgment of declaration, therefore, of the use of the word Zeyf, or Satooka, is merely a modification, in the same manner as for a person should declare that "he owes a thousand dirms, but of such a kind that ten of them weigh five miskals. The reasoning of Haneefa is that his assertion of their being Zeyf or Satooka is equivalent to a retraction; for an absolute contract presupposes dirms free from defect; whereas Zeyf and Satooka are both defective. Now the plea of a defect is a retraction of part of the obligation involved in the acknowledgment; and the case is therefore the same as if the seller of a thing should say to the purchaser of it, "I have sold you a thing with a defect, of which you were apprised," and the purchaser deny his knowledge of the defect, in which case the denial of the purchaser is credited, as probability argues in his favour, since every absolute contract supposes a freedom from defect. Besides, Satooka dirms do not constitute price, and as a contract of sale is never concluded but for price, it follows that his explanation is, in effect, a retraction. (With respect to the case adduced by the two disciples of "an acknowledgment of a debt of a thousand dirms, accompanied with a declaration that the dirms due are of that kind of which ten are equivalent to five miskals,"—It is to be observed, in reply, that the reservation is admitted, for this reason, that the acknowledgment, in this instance, speaks with a reservation merely of the degree or proportion of the dirms, and to that the word dirms applies.—It is otherwise in a description of the goodness of the dirms, for as to this the term dirms does not properly apply, it is not considered as a reservation, any more than the exception of the foundation of a house.)

But note when the exception relates to the species and not to the quality.—The case is different where a person acknowledges that he is indebted to another a Koor of wheat, as the price of a slave, but that the wheat is of a coarse kind; because coarseness, with relation to wheat, is not a quality but a species, and an absolute contract does not necessarily require that the wheat be other than coarse.—It is related as an opinion of Haneefa, in other books than the Zahir Rawayet, that in a case of borrowing the acknowledgment's assertion of the dirms being Zeyf ought not to be credited, provided this assertion be conjoined with the acknowledgment: because the act of borrowing is not complete until after the seisin of the borrower; and it often happens that dirms are Zeyf in borrowing, in the same manner as in usurpation. The reasoning of the Zahir-Rawayet is that the common custom is to deal in good dirms, and therefore when the explanation is absolute, good dirms must be understood.

An exception with respect to the quality is admitted, if the case of the obligation be not mentioned by the acknowledgment.—It a person acknowledge that he owes another a thousand Zeyf dirms, but without reciting the case (such as sale or loan), some authorities say that this assertion with respect to the quality of the dirms is to be credited, according to all our doctors. Others, however, allege that, according to Haneefa, it is not to be admitted, because, as the acknowledgment is absolute, it may relate either to legal contracts, or to acts of violence, such as usurpation or destruction, which are illegal;—and the former supposition is adopted, as acknowledgment is rather to be attributed to a lawful than to an unlawful cause.

And also where it is mentioned, if it be either usurpation or trust.—It a person acknowledge his having usurped a thousand dirms from another, or his having received them in deposit; and afterwards assert that the said dirms were Zeyf or Binhirja; in that case his assertion must be credited, whether it be conjoined with or separate from the acknowledgment; because the kind are accustomed to usurp whatever they can find, and to place in deposit whatever they possess: and therefore neither of these acts necessarily infer the dirms to have been Zeyf (that is, good). The acknowledgment's assertion, therefore, of the dirms being either Zeyf or Binhirja is equivalent to an explanation of the species, and is consequently admitted, even though it should not have been conjunctively made.—For the same reason, also, if an usurer produce a defective article, as the thing he had usurped,—or a trustee produce a defective article, as the thing he had received in deposit,—the declaration so made must in either case be admitted.—It is reported, from in Aboo Yosaf, that in case of an acknowledgment of usurpation, the acknowledgment's assertion of the dirms being Zeyf ought not to be credited where it is made separately.

* Without any regard to the species or quality.
from the acknowledgment; because of the analogy of this case to that of a loan, on the principle of seizure, including responsibility in both cases, that is, in a case either of usurpation or of loan; for he holds that, in a case of loan, the acknowledger's assertion of the money borrowed being Zeyf cannot be credited, if separately made; and so also in the case in question.

Acknowledgment with respect to the deposit or usurpation of Satooka dirms.—In a person acknowledge his usurpation of a thousand dirms or his receipt of that sum in deposit, and assert that they were Satooka, in that case his assertion must be credited, if conjoined with the acknowledgment; but not otherwise; because although Satooka be not in reality a species of dirms, still it is customary to apply that word to them figuratively:—the mention of this term, therefore, is a modification, and must consequently be conjoined.

An exception of a part from the whole is not to be credited, if made separately.—In a person declare that "he owes such an one a thousand dirms," or that "he has borrowed a thousand dirms," or that "he has received a thousand dirms in deposit," or that "he owes a thousand Zeyf dirms," or that he has usurped a thousand dirms,"—and he afterwards except a particular number of dirms from the obligation,—in none of these cases is his assertion to be admitted, if made separately from the acknowledgment,—whereas if it be conjoined with the acknowledgment it must be admitted, as the assertion is in this case an exception, and an exception is valid when conjoined. It is otherwise if he assert the dirms to be Zeyf, as a reservation of this nature is not valid, since Zeyf relates to quality: but expression applies solely to quantity, not to quality; and exception is not admitted with respect to any matter but what may be precisely expressed.

Unless this arise from some unavoidable accident.—If it is to be observed, however, that if the exception should have been disjoined by necessity (as by a cough, or a shortness of breath), it is then considered as conjunct, because of the interruption being unavoidable.

In an acknowledgment of usurpation a damaged article must be accepted.—If a person acknowledge the usurpation of cloth, and then produce damaged cloth, it must nevertheless be admitted, as usurpation is not restricted to perfect things.

Where the property is lost, if the acknowledger allege a trust, and the other party asserts an usurpation, the acknowledger is responsible.—If Zeyd say to Omar, "I took from you a thousand dirms by way of trust, and they are lost," and Omar reply, "no; you took them by way of usurpation;" in that case Zeyd is responsible for the loss; if Zeyd, on the contrary, say, "you gave me a thousand dirms by way of deposit, and they are lost," and Omar reply, "no; you took them by way of usurpation;" in that case Zeyd is not responsible for the loss.

The difference between these two cases is, that Zeyd (in the former case) first acknowledges a thing which is a cause of responsibility, namely, taking, and afterward asserts an exemption from responsibility, by declaring that he held it as a deposit. Now a deposit implies the consent of Omar; but Omar denies his assent; and therefore, as defendant, his assertion supported by an oath must be credited. In the second case, on the contrary, Zeyd does not make any acknowledgment subjecting him to responsibility; because, in using the word given, he refers the action to Omar and not to himself: and no one is subject to responsibility for the actions of another. Omar, on the other hand, agrees against Zeyd, a cause of responsibility, namely, usurpation; which Zeyd denies; and consequently, as defendent, his word supported by an oath must be credited.—It is to be observed that the word receive, in this case, is equivalent to take; and the word remove to that of give. Thus, if the acknowledger, instead of taken, should say that he had received a thousand dirms, he is in that case subject to responsibility. If, on the contrary, he say, "you have removed to me," instead of "you have given me," he is not in that case subject to responsibility.

Objection.—Neither giving nor removing can be carried into execution without receipt on the part of the other party. An acknowledgment of giving or of removing, therefore, is virtually an acknowledgment of receiving; and consequently it would appear that, in either case, the acknowledger is subject to responsibility.

Reply.—The giving and removing of one thing to another is sometimes performed by a mere relinquishment of the right in an article (that is, by a non-prevention of the other from taking it); and sometimes by placing the article before the other. Giving and removing may therefore be carried into execution without a receipt or taking: and hence an acknowledgment of giving or removing does not involve an acknowledgment of receiving or taking. Besides, admitting that receipt is established from giving or removing, still it is established only by implication is adopted only in cases of necessity; but there exists no necessity, in the present instance, to establish responsibility for the loss.

But not if he assert a trust, and the other assert a loan.—If a person say to another, "I have taken a thousand dirms from you by way of deposit"—and the other reply, "no; you have taken them by way of loan,"

—in this case the assertion of the acknowledger, notwithstanding his use of the word taking, must be admitted: for both parties are agreed in the taking of the dirms with the consent of the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made; but he values a loan (which is a cause of responsibility), whereas the acknowledger asserts a deposit. —There is an evident difference between this case and that which has already been explained, in which the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made asserts usurpation; because that person stands as defendant, since he denies his consent.

Case of acknowledgment of the receipt of money, with a reservation of its being the property of the acknowledger.—If a person say, "this sum of a thousand dirms, my property, was in trust with such a person, and as such I have taken it from him," and the other deny this, and declare the said sum to be his own property; he is in that case entitled to take it from the acknowledger; because the acknowledger confesses that he took the sum in question from him on the claim of its being his own property, which the other denies; and hence his assertion, as a defendant, must be credited. —Case of acknowledgment of the receipt of specific property, with a reservation to the same effect.—If a person affirm that he had hired out an animal of carriage to another, who, after riding upon him, had returned it to him,—or, that he had hired out a garment to another, who, after wearing it, had returned it to him,—and the other contradict this, declaring the said animal or garment to be his own property, in that case, according to Hancefa, the assertion of the acknowledger must be admitted, upon a favourable construction —The two disciples maintain that the assertion of the other party must be credited; and this is agreeable to analogy. —(The same difference of opinion also obtains where, instead of hiring out, the acknowledger says that he had lent his horse to the other to ride on, or his house to reside in,—or, had given his garment to another to mend, or hire,—and had afterwards resumed the article, and the other declare it to be his property. —(Analogously, would suggest, as has been already mentioned in the example of deposit) that the acknowledger, in these cases, has confessed his having taken and possessed himself of things which, however, he asserts to be his own property; but which is denied by the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made; whose assertion, as defendant, must therefore be credited. —The reasons for a more favourable construction in particular are twofold. —First, the establishment of the cases of hire and of loan, is not admitted from itself, but from necessity (that is, from the necessity of answering the object of the contract, namely, the usufruct of the artic'e); and the effect is therefore restricted to the point of necessity. Hence the acknowledgment of hire or of loan does not involve the acknowledgment of receipt, as in the case of a deposit. —Secondly, as in the cases of hire, loan, and residence, the possession of the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made is established solely by the avowal of the acknowledger, his explanation of the nature of that possession must be admitted. It is otherwise in the example of deposit, since a deposit may be made without a delivery; as where, for instance, a person's gown is blown, by the wind, into another person's house, in which case the gown remains a deposit with the owner of the house, although not formal delivery have been made. The author of this work observes, that the point upon which the difference between the cases of hire, loan, or residence, and that of deposit (as before explained) turns, is not that the word take is recited in the latter and not in the former cases; because this word is used by Mohammed, in the case in question, in the Maboot, treating of acknowledgments;—but that it rests upon the two reasons for a favourable construction of the law in this particular, as recited above. —If a person says "I have received from such a person his acquaintance, a thousand dirms which he owed me,"—or, "I lent such a person a thousand dirms, and have received back the same,"—and the other deny the previous existence of the debt, our doctors are, in that case, unanimously of opinion that the assertion of the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made is to be credited: because a debt must be discharged by means of a similar; and this cannot otherwise be accomplished than by the creditor's receiving a portion of the debtor's property, equivalent to the debt, in such a manner as may induce responsibility. The acknowledger, therefore, in saying that he had received from the other an acquaintance of the debt with that other owed him, confesses a circumstance which is a cause of responsibility; and he afterwards claims the right of property in the same, in virtue of its having been given to him in exchange for his debt, which is denied by the other; he therefore stands as defendant, and his assertion must consequently be credited. It is otherwise in assertions of hire, loan, or residence, because the thing seized, in those instances, is an dentic article, for which the acknowledger claims the hire, or so forth: there is therefore an evident difference between the cases.

Case of dispute with respect to immovable property.—If a person acknowledge that another has cultivated a particular piece of land, or built a particular house, or planted grapes in a particular orchard, the said land, house, or orchard being in the possession of the acknowledges, and the person in whose favor he acknowledges claim the property of these things, and the acknowledger, on the other hand, declare them to be his own property, and that the other, in the cultivation, building, or planting, had only acted by his desire, as his assistant or as his hireling—in that case the assertion of the acknowledger must be credited, according to all our doctors; because he does not make an acknowledgment of the possession on behalf of the other, but merely of the above-mentioned acts as performed by that other, and these do not argue a right of possession, since the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made may have lawfully performed these acts upon things that were in the possession of the acknowledger. The case, therefore, is the same as if a person were to declare that a particular tailor had sewed his garment for half a dīrām, but that he had not received the garment from the tailor; and the tailor claim the property of the garment: for there the acknowledgment so made is not supposed to allude to the possession on the part of the tailor, and therefore the assertion of the acknowledger is credited; and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise if the acknowledger say that "he has received possession from the tailor!" for concerning that case there is a disagreement amongst our doctors, similar to what has been described.

OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT MADE BY SICK PERSONS.*

Debts acknowledged on a deathbed (without assigning the cause of them) are preceded by debts of every other description. If a person, in his last illness, acknowledges a debt, as being due to another and he also owe other debts contracted during health, or debts contracted during his sickness for known causes (such as the purchase or the destruction of property, and upon which proof may be obtained by other means than though his acknowledgment, or be indebted to his wife married during his sickness, for her Mihr-Mial (or proper dower),—all these debts so contracted during health or sickness have a preference to that other which he so acknowledges during his sickness, and of which the cause is unknown, Shafei maintains that the debts of the healthy and the sick are alike valid, since acknowledgment, which is the cause of both, is in both instances equal, inasmuch as it is derived from the understanding. Debt, moreover, and the responsibility of the person to which the obligation relates, are capable of comprehending the rights of a variety of persons. An acknowledgment of debt, therefore, resembles the settlement of a contract of purchase or of marriage;—that is to say, if a sick person purchase goods, and remain indebted for the price,—or marry on a proper dower, and remain indebted for the same,—debits so contracted are upon an equal footing with debts contracted during health; and so also in the case in question. The argument of our doctors is that acknowledgment is not valid when it tends to prejudice the right of another; and the acknowledgment of a sick person does induce this consequence, since the rights of the creditors of debts contracted during his health are connected with his property, inasmuch as they may seize it for the payment of what is owing to them;—whence it is that deeds of a gratuitous or benevolent nature are not allowed, in a sick man, beyond the extent of a third of his estate. It is otherwise with respect to marriage, on a proper dower,* as marriage is one of the most essential wants of a sick person, since in the same manner as man is impelled to his own preservation so also is he impelled to the propagation of his species. It is otherwise, also, with respect to the purchase of property for an equivalent price; because the right of the creditors is connected with the substance of the property and not with the form of it; and in an instance of purchase the substance is extent.

During health, moreover, the right of the creditors is connected with his person, not with his property, since whilst he is in a condition to acquire property, it is supposed that the property will increase:—a state of sickness, on the contrary, is a state of inability, and therefore the right of the creditors is then connected with his property.†

Objection.—If the connection of debts contracted during health, with the property of the sick person, be a bar to the obligation of other debts, because of the priority of the former, it follows that if a sick person, having made an acknowledgment in favour of a person, should afterwards make an acknowledgment in favour of another, it is not valid, because the first acknowledgment is preferable, as being connected with his property; whereas, according to law, they are both valid.

Reply.—The whole period of sickness is considered as one and the same, because the whole of it is a time of restriction, and therefore one part or period of it is the same as another. It is otherwise with respect to health, as health is not a period of restriction, and therefore deeds are then lawful.

*By sick persons, throughout the whole of this chapter, is meant such as are effected with a mortal disorder.—(The analytical principle on which the law upon this head proceeds is set forth in treating of the divorce of the sick. See Vol. I., p. 99.)

whereas, sickness being a time of restriction, many needs are then unlawful.

It is to be observed that debts contracted during sickness, of which the cause of the obligation is known, are preferable to debts of sickness which are supported merely upon acknowledgment; because the former are free from suspicion. It is also to be observed that debts of sickness, of which the cause is known, are upon a foot of equality with debts of health, neither having a preference over the other;—a debt of a proper dowry is because of the necessity for marriage; and debts contracted on account of purchase, or of a loan, because of the existence of an equivalent. The right of the creditors, moreover, is connected merely with the substance; and as, in the establishment of these debts, there is no doubt or suspicion, they are therefore on a foot of equality with debts of health.

A dying person cannot concede any specific property by acknowledgment.—If a sick person make an acknowledgment in favour of any person, of something he holds in his hand, such acknowledgment is not valid, because of the injury it induces to the creditors, whose right is connected with that thing.

Nor make a partial discharge of his debts (excepting those contracted during his illness).—It is not lawful for a sick person to discharge the debts of part of his creditors, because such partial discharge is a destruction of the right of the others; and in this respect the creditors of health and of sickness are upon an equality:—excepting, however, where the sick person restores something he may have borrowed during his sickness, or pays the price of something he may have purchased during his sickness; and the obligation admits of being proved by witnesses:—in other words, if a person borrow, during his last illness, a thousand dirms, and keep the same by him, or purchase anything with them to that value, and afterwards pay the loan, or pay the price of the purchase, it is lawful, where it admits of being proved by evidence, because these payments are attended with no injury to the creditors, as the acknowledger has obtained an equivalent for what he pays.

A debt acknowledged upon a death-bed is discharged after all other debts.—If, after the discharge of the whole of the preferable debts, there still remain some property of the sick man's estate, such residue must be applied to the discharge of the debts acknowledged during his sickness; because such acknowledgments were in themselves valid, and having been annulled merely from a regard to the rights of the creditors, they resume their original validity when the bar to their operation is removed.

If there be no other debts it is discharged pious to the distribution of the inheritance. The acknowledgments of debt, by a sick person who does not owe any debts of health, are valid, as they occasion no injury to others.—In such case, also, the said debts are preferable to the claims of the heirs; because Omar has said, "whenever a sick person acknowledges debts, they must be considered as obligatory, and discharged from his effects."—Besides, the discharge of his debts is a matter of necessity; and the right of the heirs is connected with his estate on the sole condition of its being free from incumbrance; whence, it is that the discharge of the funeral expenses precedes the right of the heirs, as that is also a matter of necessity.

An acknowledgment in favour of an heir is never valid, unless admitted by the co-heirs.—If a sick person make an acknowledgment in favour of any of his heirs, it is not valid, unless it be verified by the other heirs.—Sahai, in one report of his opinion upon this point, says that it is valid: because acknowledgment is the manifestation of an established right; and the probability is that the acknowledger has spoken truth, since reason forbids falsehood, more particularly in time of sickness.—Besi es, as religion and justice, when joined to reason, must restrain a man from falsehood, the acknowledgment of a sick person in favour of his heir is like an acknowledgment in favour of a stranger:—or, like an acknowledgment in favour of an additional heir: (as if a person should acknowledge that "a particular person is his son," which acknowledgment is valid, notwithstanding it diminishes the rights of the other heirs):—or, like an acknowledgment of the destruction of a deposit, the property of an heir (as where, for instance, a person lodges a deposit of one thousand dirms, during either health or sickness, with his father, in the presence of witnesses, and the father afterwards, whilst dying, acknowledges that he had destroyed the deposit of his son, in which case the acknowledgment is valid, and the person in whose favour it is made is entitled to a thousand dirms from the estate of the acknowledger, although it diminishes the right of the heirs: and so also in the case in question).—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are threefold.—First, the Prophet has said "there is no legacy to an heir, and no acknowledgment of a debt in favour of an heir."—Secondly, the right of the heirs is connected with the property of a person in his last sickness (on which account he is not permitted, at that period, to do any deed of mutuality or affection), an acknowledgment in favour of some of the heirs is invalid, as being prejudicial to the right of the others.—Thirdly, as the sick person, in his last illness, is above the want of his property, and as affinity is the cause of connection the right of the whole of the heirs with the property, when the want of it no longer exists in the sick person, it follows that at such period an acknowledgment in favour of a part of them must be an injury to the whole. This connection, however, does not operate with respect to strangers because of the necessity the sick man was under, during his life, of entering into concerns with them; for many of the concurs of the sick (such as purchase, sale, and the like) are entered into with strangers during health; and if their acknowledgment of these during th' sickness were not valid, people would be cautious of dealing with them during their health, and their affairs would of consequence suffer. — Such an acknowledgment, therefore, is preferable to the claims of the heirs. — It is to be observed that the connection here mentioned does not operate to the destruction of a sick man's acknowledgment of percentage, by which an additional heir is occasioned; because the sick man also is necessitous in this particular, as percentage exists after death, and a man is held to contract in both cases after death, in the person of his offspring: whence parentage is one of the wants of the dead.

And so also of an acknowledgment in favour of a part of the heirs. — If a sick man make an acknowledgment in favour of part of his heirs, and the others verify the same, such acknowledgment is valid, because of the removal of the only obstacle, namely, the connection of the right of the other heirs with his property, which they themselves relinquish.

The acknowledgment of a dying person in favour of a stranger is valid, to the amount of the whole estate. — If a sick person make an acknowledgment in favour of a stranger, it is valid, although it be tantamount to the whole of his property. — Because Omar has said "the acknowledgment of debt by a sick person is valid; and the debt is due from the whole of his estate." (as before quoted). — Analogy would suggest that the acknowledgment does not operate in a degree beyond the third of his property; as it is in that degree only that the Law admits of the deeds of a sick man with regard to his property. — Our doctors, however, remark upon this that as the acts of a sick person are valid with respect to a third of his property, it follows that the acknowledgment of a sick person is valid in the same proportion; and it then becomes valid with respect to the remaining thirds also; because, upon the sick person acknowledging one third of his property to belong to another, it becomes from that moment the property of that other; and as the remaining two thirds then from the whole of the property of the acknowledger are lawfully make an acknowledgment of one third of it, and so on, until nothing remain.

Objection. — It would hence appear that bequest to the extent of the whole property as also valid.

Reply. — In bequest, the third of the estate does not become the property of the legates until after the death of the testator; and accordingly, they cannot claim their legacies before that event. It is otherwise with respect to an acknowledgment of debt, as the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made becomes immediate proprietor. — There is therefore an evident distinction between the cases.

But it is annulled by a subsequent acknowledgment of the stranger being his son. — If a sick person make an acknowledgment in favour of a stranger, and afterwards declare that "he is his son," the parentage is established accordingly, and the acknowledgment is null. — If, on the contrary, a sick person make an acknowledgment in favour of a strange woman, and afterwards marry her, the acknowledgment does not become null. The difference between these two cases is that, in the former upon the sick person declaring the other to be his son; his parentage is established in the acknowledge from the instant of conception in the mother's womb; whence it is evident that the person in whose favour the acknowledgment was made was the heir of the acknowledge at the period of his acknowledgment; and consequently, that he has made an acknowledgment in favour of his own son, which is invalid of course. — It is otherwise with respect to marriage; for, as the relationship produced by that takes piece only from the time of contracting it, it follows that the woman was not the acknowledge's heir at the time of the acknowledgment; and consequently, that his acknowledgment in her favour remains valid.

Case of acknowledgment in favour of a repudiated wife. — If a sick person repudiate his wife by three divorces, and then make an acknowledgment of debt due to her, and die, she is in that case entitled to whichever of the two claims (namely, her portion of inheritance, or the amount of the debt acknowledged) may be the smallest. — The reason of this is that both the woman and the man are in this case liable to suspicion; for as the edit, or term of probation was not expired, the woman, after his death, is an heir, and an acknowledgment in favour of an heir is not valid. — Hence there is possibility that the woman may have requested her divorce as the means of her acquiring a right to the acknowledgment; and that the husband may have divorced her with the view of giving her more than she was entitled to as an heir. As, therefore, both husband and wife are liable to suspicion, the smallest of the two claims is decreed to the woman, since concerning that there can be no suspicion.

Acknowledgments of parentage with respect to infants.—If a person acknowledge the parentage of a child who is able to give an account of himself, saying, "this is my son," and the ages of the parties be such as to admit of the one being the child of the other, and the parentage of the child be not well known to any person, and the child himself verify the acknowledgment, his parentage is established in the acknowledgment, although he [the acknowledger] be sick; because the parentage in question is one of those things which affect the acknowledger himself, if only, and no other person: it is made a condition, in this case, that the ages of the parties be such as to admit of the relation of parentage; for if it were otherwise, it is evident that the acknowledgment has spoken falsely. It is also made a condition that the parentage of the boy be known; for if he be known to be the issue of some other than the acknowledger, it necessarily follows that the acknowledgment is null. It is also made a condition, that the boy verify the acknowledgment; because he is considered as his own master, as he is supposed able to give an account of himself. It was otherwise if the boy could not explain his condition; for then the acknowledgment would have operated without his verification. It is to be observed that the acknowledgment, in this instance, is not rendered null by sickness; because parentage is an original and not a supervenient want. By the establishment of the parentage, therefore, the boy becomes one of the acknowledger's heirs, in the same manner as any of his other heirs.

Acknowledgments with respect to parents, children, and patrons, are valid.—If a person acknowledge his parents or his son (as if he should declare that "a certain man is his father," or, that "a certain woman is his mother," or, that "a certain person is his son," and the ages of the parties admit of those relations), or, if a person acknowledge a particular woman to be his wife, or a particular person to be his Mawla (that is, either his emancipator, or his freedman),—in all these cases the acknowledgment is valid, as affecting only himself, and not any other. In the same manner, also, if a woman acknowledge her parents, or her husband, or her Mawla, it is valid, for the same reason. A woman's acknowledgment of a son, however, is not valid, as such acknowledgment affects her husband, in whom the parentage is established: her acknowledgment of a son, therefore, is not valid, unless the husband confirm her declaration (as the right appertains to him), or, that it is verified by the birth being proven by the evidence of the mother, which suffices in this particular.—(Concerning the acknowledgments made by women of their children, there are various distinctions, as set forth at large in treating of claims.)

If confirmed by the parties.—It is to be observed that in all these cases the confirmation of the party concerning whom the acknowledgment is made is requisite, excepting in the acknowledgment with respect to a child, when so young as not to be able to give any account of himself. It is also to be observed that the confirmation concerning parentage is valid, although made after the death of the acknowledger; because the relation of parentage exists after death. In the same manner, also, the confirmation of a wife after the death of her husband, is valid; because theedit is one of the effects of marriage; and that exists after the death of the husband, whence it may be said that the marriage itself endures in one shape; and therefore the confirmation of the wife after the death of her husband, is valid. So also (in the opinion of the two disciples) the confirmation of the husband is valid, after the death of the wife; because inheritance, which is one of the effects of marriage, exists after the death of the wife; whence the marriage itself endures, in one shape; for which reason his confirmation is valid.

According to Hanefi the confirmation of the husband is not valid, because the marriage expires upon the death of the wife; on which account it is not lawful for a husband to wash the body of his wife after her death. In regard to the assertion of the two disciples, that "the marriage endures in one shape, after the death of the wife, because of inheritance, it is not admitted, either for the inheritance, does not take place until after death, and was therefore a nonentity at the time of the acknowledgment. Now a confirmation, in order to be valid, must be directed to the period of the acknowledgment; and as, that period, the inheritance did not exist, it is therefore invalid.

The acknowledgment of a dying person with respect to an uncle or brother, entitles them to inherit (if he have no other heirs), but does not establish their parentage.—If a person acknowledge an uncle or a brother, such acknowledgment is not credited, either so far as relates to the establishment of the parentage, because of its operating upon another than the acknowledger. If, therefore, the acknowledger have a known heir, whether near or remote, the whole of the inheritance goes to him, and not to the person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made, since the parentage not having been established on the part of the acknowledger, no obstacle can thence arise to the inheritance of a known heir. If, however, the acknowledger have no other heir, the person in whose favor he makes acknowledgment is in that case clearly entitled to the inheritance, as every person has full power over his estate when he has no heirs; whence it is that a person may bequeath the whole of his property in legacy, provided he have no heirs. The person in whose favor the acknowledgment is made is therefore in this case entitled to the whole of the pro-property, although the parentage be not proven, (that is, although he be not admitted to be the brother or uncle of the acknowledger); as that would tend to affect another, namely, the father or grandfather of the acknowledger.*—It is to be observed that the acknowledgment, in this case is not in reality a legacy; because, if a man should acknowledge a particular person to be his brother, and afterwards bequeath the whole of his property to another, the legatee would in that case be entitled only to one third of the whole of the property; whereas, if the acknowledgment had been in reality a legacy, the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made, and the legatee, would in that case share the whole of the property equally between them. The acknowledgment, however, is equivalent to a legacy, on this consideration, that the person in whose favour it is made is entitled to the property merely because of the declaration of the acknowledgment, and not from any other cause whatever, as in bequest: for which reason, if a man should acknowledge a certain person to be his brother, and this person confirm the same; and the acknowledgment afterwards deny his right of inheritance, and bequeath the whole of his property to some other, the legatee is entitled to the whole of his estate; or, that, if he should not bequeath his property to another, the whole of his estate goes to the public treasury; because retraction is in this case valid, for this reason, that the parentage, which annuls the validity of the acknowledgment, is not established.

The acknowledgment of a brother, by the heir, entitles to inheritance, but does not establish parentage.—If a person die, and his son acknowledge another to be his brother, the parentage of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made is not established, but he is entitled to a share in the inheritance with the acknowledgment:—because the acknowledgment in question involves two consequences; namely, the establishment of the parentage, which, as affecting another, does not take place,—and the participation of the acknowledge in the property, which, being a power he possesses, as affecting himself only, does therefore take place. In the same manner as where a purchaser acknowledges that the slave he has bought had been emancipated by the seller, in which case the acknowledgment (so far as it relates to the seller) is not to be credited; and on this account the buyer is not entitled to retake the purchase-money from the seller:—the acknowledgment, however, is credited so far as it relates to himself, and the slave is free.

Case of acknowledgment, made by a co-heir, of the partial payment of a debt owing to the person from whom the inheritance descends.—If a person, to whom a debt is owing by another of one hundred dirms, should die, leaving two sons, and one of these acknowledge that his father had received payment of fifty dirms of the said debt, in that case the acknowledge is not entitled to any thing; and the other is entitled to the remaining fifty dirms; because, as the acknowledge has here made an avowal which operates upon himself, his brother, and the deceased, it is therefore valid only so far as it relates to himself, and not with respect to any other; for his acknowledge that the deceased had received fifty dirms of the debt, is equivalent to an acknowledgment that the deceased owed fifty dirms, since the receiving payment of a debt cannot be established but by the receipt of a thing involving responsibility—that is to say, by the receipt of a thing which induces responsibility on the receiver, so as that this responsibility may stand as a debt against him, and that then a mutual liquidation may take place, by the opposition of the debt of one to the debt of the other. Upon the other brother, therefore, contradicting the acknowledgment, the debt which it is in consequence established upon the deceased, is opposed to the share of the acknowledge, in conformity with the tenets of our doctors; for with them it is an established tenet that if one of the heirs acknowledge a debt due by the deceased, and the other heirs contradict the same, the debt is in that case charged to the share of the acknowledge. In short, both brothers agree in this, that the sum to be received by the brother who is not the acknowledge (namely, fifty dirms) appertains equally between them;—it is to be considered, however, that if the acknowledge were to take the half from his brother upon his receiving payment of these fifty, he would then take it from the debtor; and the debtor again, would take the same from the acknowledge; which revolution would be totally useless; and this is the true meaning of the Der, or revolution, as mentioned in the Hadaya.

BOOK XXVI.

OF SOOLH, OR COMPOSITION

Definition of the term.—SOOLH, in the language of the law, signifies a contract by means of which contention is prevented or set aside. The essentials (or pillars of it are declaration and acceptance; and the conditions of it, that the subject of the composition (that is, the thing with relation to which the contract is formed) be property; and also, that it be defined, provided there be a necessity for seision, but not otherwise.—

* Because, if he were admitted to be actually the uncle or the brother of the acknowledge, that would induce, in his favour, a claim of inheritance from them also.
Thus if a person claim some degree of right in a house belonging to another,—and that other claim some degree of right in a shop belonging, to this person, and they come to a compromise, by relinquishing their respective rights in favour of each other, such compromise or composition is valid, although they should not have explained the extent of their right, since ignorance with respect to a claim which is to be annulled is not a cause of contention.

Chap. I.—Introductory.

Chap. II.—Of gratuitous or voluntary Compositions; and of the appointment of Agents for Compositions.

Chap. III.—Of Compositions of Debt.

CHAPTER I.

Composition may be made in three modes—with acknowledgment, under silence, and after denial. Composition is of three kinds or description.
I. Composition by ACKNOWLEDGMENT (as where the defendant acknowledges the right of the plaintiff, and then comports it for some other thing): II. Composition under silence (as where the defendant neither acknowledges nor denies the claim): and III. Composition after DENIAL.—All these descriptions of composition are lawful; because God says, in the Koran, "COMPOSITION IS LAUDABLE;" and this ordinance being absolute, necessarily includes all these species of it;—and also, because the Prophet has said "every composition is lawful amongst MUSULMAN, excepting such as renders lawful what is unlawful, or renders unlawful what is lawful."—Shafei maintains that compositions after denial or under silence are unlawful, because of the above tradition; for in these two cases it necessarily follows that what is unlawful becomes lawful, and what is lawful becomes unlawful, since the thing given in composition was, previous to the conclusion of the contract, unlawful to the giver, and lawful to the receiver; but afterwards becomes the reverse. Besides, in both these cases, the defendant gives property for the removal of contention; and this is bribery.—The arguments of our doctors, in support of their opinion upon this point, are threefold. First, the texts of the Koran, as above quoted. Secondly, the first part of the above tradition concerning the Prophet, comprehends both the cases in question; whereas the latter part applies solely to a composition which renders lawful something in itself originally unlawful, such as wine;—or, which renders unlawful something that in itself was originally lawful; as where a man agrees with a wife, for a certain consideration, not to have carnal connexion with another of his wives. Thirdly, composition after denial, or under silence, is a composition in consequence of a valid claim, and is therefore effectual, since the claimant receives the thing given in composition in lieu of a right of his own which in his opinion was a just one; and this is lawful, and the defendant, on the other hand, pays to remove from himself a contention;—and this also is lawful; because the object of property is self preservation; not to giving of a bribe, with a view to remove oppression from himself, is lawful in the giver. Besides this cannot be strictly termed a bribe, as a bribe is what is taken by the receiver for the reason assigned by the giver, whereas here it is otherwise, for the giver gives it in order to prevent contention, and the receiver takes it because in his opinion it is his last right.

Composition by a concession of property for composition is equivalent to sale,—IN a composition made after acknowledgment, all the effects of sale take place, provided it be a composition of property for property; because it then corresponds, in its nature, with sale, which is an exchange of property for property by mutual consent of the parties;—whence it is that if it relate to land, it is unfitted of the right of Shafia; and also, that the consideration may be returned on account of a defect; and that the conditions of inspection and of option exist with respect to it.

And is rendered invalid by an ignorance of the thing to be given in composition.—This species of composition therefore, is rendered invalid by an ignorance of the consideration for the composition, as such ignorance may be a cause of contention, whereas an ignorance of the subject of the composition cannot afford any cause of contention, as that merely ceases (in consequence of the composition), whence there is no occasion for taking possession of it.—It is, moreover, a condition, that the defendant be competent to make good the amount of the consideration in question.

Composition by a concession of usufruct is equivalent to hire.—If, however, composition be a stipulation of usufruct in lieu of property, then the laws and rules incident to hire take place with regard to it; because the characteristic of hire (namely, an endowment with usufruct in exchange for property) exists in it.

But the term of usufruct must be specified.—And as, in contracts, regard is had to the spirit of the agreement, it is also requisite that the period of right to the usufruct be fixed.—The composition is also rendered null by the decease of any of the parties during that term, because a composition of this nature is a species of hire.

Compositions after denial are equivalent to an exchange with respect to the plaintiff, but not with respect to the defendant.—Compositions subsequent to denial are, with respect to the defendant, equivalent to an atonement.

for an oath—and subsequent to silence, they stand (with respect to him) merely as a removal of strife;—but they do not stand as a mutual exchange, with respect to him, in either case.—With respect to the plaintiff, on the contrary, they are in the nature of a mutual exchange; because the plaintiff accepts the composition in lieu of an article which in his belief was his right; and one contract may lawfully bear different interpretations with regard to the two parties, in the same manner as the dissolution of sale is an annulment of the contract with respect to the seller and purchaser, but with respect to others, a new sale. The reason of a composition after denial standing, with respect to the defendant, as an atonement for an oath is obvious;— and it stands after silence as a mere removal of strife. Because silence admits of two suppositions, namely, acknowledgment or denial, and hence, with respect to the composition in question being a contract of exchange, there is a doubt: and, as a consequence of this doubt it cannot be established as an exchange with respect to the defendant.

The concession of a house by a composition, does not induce a right of Shaffa.—If a person claim a house from another, and that other either deny the claim, or remain silent, but afterwards compound the matter with the claimant for a certain amount, in that case the right of Shaffa does not operate with respect to that house; because the defendant receives it as his original right, and not in virtue of exchange, since he gives the amount of the composition to the plaintiff merely to put an end to the contention.

Objection.—Although the defendant, in his own belief, receive the house as his original right, and pay the composition to put an end to the contention, yet the plaintiff believes that he receives the composition in lieu of the house, and therefore (on the grounds of the belief of the plaintiff) the right of Shaffa ought to operate.

Reply.—The belief of the plaintiff has no effect upon the defendant, since a man is judged by his own belief, and not by that of other.

But Shaffa is induced by the act of giving a house in composition.—It is otherwise where a house is given in composition (as where, for instance, a person claims some property from another, and that other, after denying the right, or remaining silent, compounds the claim by giving up a house); for in that case the right of Shaffa takes place, as the plaintiff receives the house in exchange for his property; and the composition is therefore, with respect to him, a contract of exchange (for which reason the right of Shaffa operates upon his own acknowledgments, notwithstanding the defendant contradicts him).—It is therefore the same as if he were to declare that "he has purchased the house from the defendant,"—and the defendant deny the same; in which case the right of Shaffa operates; and so also in the case in question.

Case in which part of the thing given in composition must be restored.—If a person claim something from another, and that other, having acknowledged the claim, compound it with the plaintiff for something else, and it afterwards appear that the thing claimed was in part the property of another,—in that case the defendant is entitled to take back from the plaintiff a part of the thing given in composition, proportionate to that part of the article claimed, which afterwards proved the property of another, because the composition in this case is, like sale, a contract of exchange with respect to both parties, and such is the law in s.a.l., when a part of a thing sold proves the property of another.

If the composition be after denial or silence and the thing compounded for prove the right of another, the considerations must be returned and the plaintiff must lay his claim against him who has the right.—If a person claim a thing from another, and that other either deny it or remain silent, and then compound with the plaintiff from some other article, and it afterwards appear that the thing claimed is the right of another and not of the plaintiff in that case the plaintiff must prefer his demand against the person who claims the right, and return to the defendant whatever he may have received from him in composition; because the defendant gave his property merely for the purpose of removing contention; but when afterwards it appear that the thing claimed is the property of another, it becomes evident that he was not liable to a contention with the plaintiff. Hence he is entitled to take back the article given in composition, as a condition on which he give it (namely, a right to detain in his possession the subject of the claim) is rendered void.

And the same proportionally, where any part of it proves the property of another.—If on the other hand, a part, only, of the thing claimed prove the right of another, the plaintiff must in that case return to the defendant a proportionate part of the thing given in composition and make a demand for the same upon the person possessing the right; because the intent of the defendant does not comprehend that proportion.

If the thing given in composition after acknowledgment, prove the right of another, it must be restored, and the plaintiff is entitled to an equivalent from the defendant.—If the thing given in composition prove the right of another, the plaintiff is in that case entitled to receive from the defendant the whole amount of the composition, provided it be

*Supposing him (as defendant) to have sworn to the fallacy of the plaintiff’s claim; in which case, if he afterwards enter into a composition with the plaintiff, it is evident that he swore falsely, and consequently, that atonement or expiation is due for his prejury.
after acknowledgment, as this species of composition is equivalent to sale (as was before explained).—If also, the right of another appear to part of the composition, the plaintiff is entitled to a proportionate part of it, for the same reason.

If this happen in composition after silence or denial, the plaintiff must claim from the defendant the article in dispute.—If in a case of composition after silence or denial, it appears that the whole or a part of the thing given in composition is the property of another, the plaintiff must prefer a claim against the defendant for the thing in dispute between them, either wholly, or in part, as the case may be.—It is otherwise in case of sale after denial; as where, for instance, a person lays claim to a house, and the person upon whom the claim is made denies his right, but afterwards compounds the matter by means of a slave, using, however, the word "sold" instead of "compounded,"" a person would say, "I have sold this slave for the said house." For in that case, if the house afterwards prove to be the property of another, the plaintiff, instead of claiming, is entitled actually to take the house from the defendant; because the defendant, in selling the slave for the house, does virtually acknowledge the house to be the property of the plaintiff:—contrary to a case of composition, as compositions are frequently made merely to remove contention.—It is to be observed, that in case the thing given in composition be either lost or destroyed in the hands of the defendant, previous to the delivery of it, the law is the same as where it proves the right of another;—that is, if the composition follow acknowledgment, the plaintiff is entitled to take the article claimed; or, if it follow denial or silence, he must prefer a claim for it against the defendant.

A composition for an undefined part of a thing is not affected by the right of another afterwards appearing to a part of that thing.—If a person claim a right in a house, without explaining the extent of it (such as a third, a forth, or the like), and the defendant under this state of uncertainty, give him something in composition for his claim, and the right of another afterwards appear to a part of the house, the plaintiff is not in that case obliged to return to the defendant any part of the thing received in composition, since it is possible that the right may relate to some other part of the house, and not to that part which the plaintiff had claimed. It is different when the whole of the house proves to be the property of another; for in that case the whole of the thing given in composition must be returned to the defendant; since it would otherwise necessarily follow that the defendant had received nothing in exchange for the thing he gave in composition; and this is unlawful; as has been already explained under the head of sale.

Composition in consideration of a part of the subject is invalid.—If a person claim a house, and the defendant compound the claim for a part of the house, composition is unlawful, because what the plaintiff receives is already his actual right, and the rest of his claim remains unsatisfied. There are two devices, however, by which this composition may be rendered lawful.—The one is, by the plaintiff adding a daim to the share of the house; in which case, the daim is considered as an equivalent for the remaining part of the claim;—the second is, by the plaintiff exempting the defendant from the remaining part of the claim.

Disputes concerning property may be compounded.—Compositions are lawful in claims of property; for a composition (as was before explained) being in the nature of a sale, it follows that whatever may be lawfully sold may also be lawfully compounded.

And also claims of usufruct.—Compositions are likewise lawful in claims of usufruct; as, for instance, where a person prefers a claim, against the heirs of a person deceased, to the usufruct of, or right to dwell in a particular house, in virtue of the bequest of the deceased; in which case, if the heirs, having either denied or acknowledged the claim, should compound it with the plaintiff for something else, such composition is valid. The reason of this is that usufruct is considered as a property, in a contract of hire, and so also in a case of composition—for it is a general rule, to consider the composition as partaking of the nature of that contract to which it bears the nearest resemblance, in order to render it valid.—Thus, if the composition be of property for property, it is considered as a sale, because of its near resemblance to that contract.—If on the other hand, it relate to usufruct, it is considered as a species of hire, because of its resemblance to it.

Compositions are lawful in homicide.—Compositions are lawful in case either of wilful or erroneous bloodshed. They are lawful in the former instance, because God has said, "IF A PORTION OF THE PROPERTY OF THE MURDERER, BEING A BELIEVER, BE OFFERED, BY WAY OF COMPOSITION, TO THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE MURDERER, LET HIM ACCEPT THE SAME,"—which passage Ibn Abbas reports to have been revealed upon the subject of compositions for wilful bloodshed.—It is to be observed, that composition for wilful bloodshed resembles marriage, because in both cases property is given without receiving property in return; accordingly, whatever is capable of constituting a specific dower, is also capable of being given in composition for wilful bloodshed.—There is this difference, however, between marriage and the composition in question, that whenever the recital of the thing to be given in composition is invalid (as where an animal is mentioned indefinitely, or cloths are recited without a specification of them), a Deyit of fine of blood must be paid;—because such is the rule in case of bloodshed; and an invalidity in the nomination does not prevent the remission of retaliation, in the same manner as it does not prevent the validity of marriage.

But if accession to an unlawful article, nothing is due—although, however, a composition of wine or pork is stipulated for wilful bloodshed, nothing whatever is due; because neither of these articles are valuable property; it is therefore understood that the avenger of blood, in agreeing to receive a composition which is not property, has, in effect, remitted the retaliation; and as, in a remission of the retaliation, no property is due, so neither is it in the case in question.—In marriage, on the contrary, a Mihr-Misl (or proper dower) is due in either case, (that is, in case of the invalidity of the recital,)—or, where the dower is stipulated to be paid in wine or pork; because the dower is one of the essential requisites of marriage, and is therefore due in law, although no property should have been made of it. It is to be observed that as the crime expressed in this case of composition is absolute, it relates both to the members of the body, and to the body itself that is to say, the life.—It is also proper to observe that, although compositions for wilful bloodshed be lawful, as above related, yet it is otherwise with respect to compositions of property for the right of Shaffa (by a person receiving property from a purchaser, in composition for his right of Shaffa, which is invalid, because the proprietor of the right of Shaffa has no absolute property from it, but merely a right to become proprietor if he please until, therefore, he become the proprietor, he has no right to compund for it. —Retaliation, on the other hand, means a right of property in the subject, with respect to the action: in other words, the heir or representative is proprietor of the subject so far as relates to the action, inasmuch as he has a right to take retaliation, and may consequently, if he choose, receive a composition for not taking of it; in opposition to the case of Shaffa.—Now, since a composition of property for the right of Shaffa is invalid, it follows that nothing is on that account due from the purchaser, and that he right of Shaffa is lost, in the same manner as in a case of non-opposition or silence.—Bail for the person is also like the right of Shaffa, and therefore nothing is due in case of a composition of property for it.—With respect, however, to the annulment of the bail, in such a case, there are two traditions, both of which have been already recited in their proper places.—Compositions are also lawful in the latter case (namely, erroneous bloodshed), because they in this instance relate to property, and therefore resemble sales. Still, however, they are not lawful when they exceed the amount of the fine of blood; because the rate of that as having been fixed by the law, cannot be set aside: anything, therefore, beyond the fine of blood, must be rejected.—It is otherwise in retaliation, for there the composition may exceed the fine of blood, as retaliation is not property, and therefore cannot be converted into it but by a special contract.—What is here advanced proceeds upon the supposition that the composition consists of one of the three species of Deyits namely, dirims, deemans, or camels. —If, however, it consist of any other species of property, it is lawful, because it is in that case an exchange for the Deyit, or ordained fine. But yet it is requisite that the delivery be made upon the spot where the contract is concluded, because it must otherwise follow that one debt (namely, the Deyit) remains opposed to another debt (namely, the composition), which is declared, in the sacred writings, to be illegal. If the Kazee should pass a decree directing the murderer to pay the Deyit is one of the three modes to the avenger of blood; and he the [the murderer] enter into a composition with him the avenger) for another species of property, in degree exceeding the Deyit, such composition is lawful, provided it be from hand to hand; because, after the decree of the Kazee, the right of the avenger of blood to the amount decreed by the Kazee becomes fixed and determined; and his composition of it in that case, is merely an exchange.—It is different where the parties themselves, in the beginning enter to a composition for one of the three kinds, exceeding the amount of the Deyit; because the consent of the parties to one of the three kinds is equivalent to the decree of the Kazee in respect of fixing it—(that is, in the same manner as it is fixed by the decree of the Kazee, so also is it fixed by their consent); and as the Kazee is not empowered to pass a decree exceeding the amount of the Deyit, so neither are they permitted to fix it at a superior rate. Hence it is not lawful to exceed the rate of a thing already fixed by the sacred writings.

There is no composition for punishment.—Composition for claim of Hidd, or stated punishment, is not lawful—Thus if a person should apprehend another in the act pf whoredom, or of sealing the goods of another or of drinking wine, or whilst in a state of intoxication; and, intending to carry the culprit before the Kazee, should notwithstanding accept something for suffering him to escape such composition is lawful, because punishment is a right of God, and it is not lawful to accept a composition for the right of another.

Claim of parentage.—For the same reason, also, it is not lawful to composition with a woman for a claim of parentage. For instance, a divorced woman, having brought forth a child, says to the divorcer, “this is your child,” and he denies the same, but compounds with the woman for withdrawing her claim; which composition is invalid, because the claim of parentage was the right, but that of the child; and the acceptance of a consideration for the right of another is not valid.
Or, for sufferance of a building on the highway.—In the same manner if a person erect a bathing-house, or a place for sitting in, on the high road, and another having required him to put it down, he compound with him to withdraw his claim, such composition is invalid, because, the high road being the right of the community, no individual is singly entitled to compound for it.—It is to be observed that the punishment mentioned on this occasion comprises punishment for slander, because in such punishment the right of God is predominant.

A claim of marriage may be compounded, whether the claim proceed from a man.—If a person claim marriage with a woman, and she deny the same but compound with the man for his claim, the composition in that case is valid, because there is a possibility of reconciling it to the law, by supposing that the man conceives the contract of composition to be in the nature of a Khoola; and, on the other hand, that the woman pays the money to remove strife.—Lawyers, however, have asserted that, in the sight of God, it is not lawful for the person, in this case, to take the composition, if his claim be unfounded.

Or a woman.—If a woman claim marriage with a man, it is lawful for him to compound the claim with her. The author of the Hedaya remarks, upon this, that although the law be thus stated in several copies of the compendium, yet is other copies such composition is declared to be illegal.—The legality of it is established by supposing that the thing given in composition is an increase of her dower; and that he afterwards sells her a divorce for the amount of her original dower so that the increase, or the amount of the composition, remains binding upon him. The reason of its illegality is, that the man having given something by way of composition to a woman, to induce her to retract her claim, it follows that this retraction must either be considered as equivalent to a separation between them, or as not equivalent to a separation: now, if it be equivalent to a separation, it is invalid, because no property is given for a separation, since it operates of itself upon the parties (as, for instance, where a woman admits the son of her husband to carnal connexion, in which case the law enjoins a separation between them):—if, however, on the other hand, the retraction from the claim be not considered as equivalent to a separation, then the case remains as before; and the composition is consequently invalid, as not being opposed to any advantage in exchange.

If a person claim another as his slave, and that other compound with him for his claim, by giving him some specific property, such composition is valid, as being, with respect to the plaintiff, an emancipation in exchange for property; because in his belief the defendant gives the composition in exchange for his freedom; and therefore considered in the light of a Moktib.—It is for this reason, also that the composition in question is valid, if made in consideration of an animal due, and to be delivered at a fined future period; because it would not be valid if it were considered as an exchange of property for property instead of an emancipation for property: for an animal cannot exist as a debt in exchange for property, as has been explained in treating of the Sillim sale of animals: but it may exist as a debt for something else than property, as in the case of marriage or a fine of blood. It is therefore requisite that the composition in question be considered as an emancipation, and not as an exchange.—With respect to the defendant, the composition, in this case, is merely a removal of contentation, a nce he believes himself to be originally free.

But it leave no right of Willa in the claimant.—It is to be observed that in this case no right of Willa over the defendant rests with the plaintiff, because of the denial of the former.—If, however, the plaintiff prove by witnesses that the defendant was his slave, such evidence is admitted, and the right of Willa then rests with him.

A privileged slave cannot compound for offences committed by himself; but he may for offences committed by his slave.—If a Maizoon or privileged slave, wilfully kill a person he is not of himself entitled to compound for the number: but if his slave should commit murder, he may then lawfully compound for it. The distinction between these two cases is that the person of a privileged slave not being a subject of traffic, he is not entitled to dispose of it in any manner (such as, for instance, to sell himself), and in the same manner he is not entitled to redeem his person by means of the property of his master, being considered with respect to his person as a stranger. His slave, on the contrary, is a subject of traffic, whence he is at liberty to sell, or otherwise to dispose of him, and consequently may also redeem him. The reason of this is that the slave, on committing the crime, ceases to be his property; whence the composition resembles a purchase of him; and this it is lawful for a privileged slave to make.

Case of composition for a property usurped; and which perishes in the usurper's hands. If a person usurp cloth from a Jew, of which the value was less than a hundred dirms, and having lost or destroyed the same, compound the matter with the Jew by agreeing to pay him a hundred dirms previous to any judicial decree upon the subject, in that case the composition is lawful, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that the composition, in the case, is not lawful in the degree in which it exceeds the appraised value of the cloth: be cause nothing was due from the usurper but the value; and the value of any article is to be known only by appraisement; anything beyond that must therefore be considered as usury.—It is otherwise, however, if the composition for the cloth be made in articles of furniture, or so forth, exceeding in value the article usurped; for such composition is valid, because the difference of the value not being obvious, from the articles being of a different genus, no usury can be inferred. It is otherwise also, if the difference of value be such as may come within the estimation of some of the appraisers, because the observance of an excessive degree of caution is impracticable. The reasoning of Haneefa is, in support of his opinion, that the right of the proprietor of an usurped article continues in it after its destruction, until his right to an equivalent be established; as is evident from this circumstance, that if an usurped slave should die, and the master refuse to accept an equivalent, he must in that case defray the expenses of his burial. Now from this it appears either that the right of the proprietor of an usurped article remains in it after its destruction,—or, that he has a right, if he choose, to a similar, both in appearance and in reality, because reparation for a transgression must be made in a similar.—But his right is not transferred to the value until such time as the Kazee pass a decree to that effect: any agreement, therefore, exceeding the value, which the parties themselves may conclude previous to such decree, being merely a compensation for the article destroyed, or for one similar to it in appearance and reality, cannot be considered as usurious.—It is otherwise if such agreement be made after the decree of the Kazee; for, in that case, according to all our doctors, the composition is nullified and extinguished as far as it exceeds the value; because, in this instance, the right of the proprietor to the value has become fixed and determined by the decree of the Kazee, and any thing beyond it is therefore usurious.

Case of composition for a share in a partnership slave.—If a man who is rich emancipates a slave held equally in partnership between himself and another, and compound with that other for a sum exceeding the value of his half such composition is invalid, according to all our doctors:—according to the two disciples, because (as they hold) nothing is due from the emancipator beyond half the value, which is to be ascertained by appraisement; whence any degree beyond that is usurious:—and, according to Haneefa, because the value, i.e., emancipation, is decreed by the law; now the rate fixed by the law is not short of the rate fixed by the Kazee; and as in a case where the Kazee passes a decree for the value, a composition for any thing beyond the value is null; it is in the present instance null a fortiori.—It is otherwise in the example concerning the cloth, as before recited, because the value of that if not decreed, by the law. It is to be observed that, in the case of a question as a composition exceeding the value of half the slave be made in specific goods or effects, it is valid, because the excess in the value is not obvious where the articles are of a different genus; and hence no usury can be inferred.

CHAPTER II

Of gratuitous or voluntary composition; and, of the appointment of agents for composition.

An agent for composition in a case of bloodshed or debt is not responsible for the consideration, unless he expressly agree to be so.—If a person appoint another his agent for composition, and the agent accordingly enter into a composition on his behalf, he [the agent] is not responsible for the thing to be given in composition, unless, in setting the contract, he stipulate it as a condition that "he himself shall be answerable for it."—This is where the composition is on account of willful blood shed, or of some claim in the nature of debt, in either of which case the composition is a mere annulment; and as the agent, in either case, is merely a messenger, he is therefore subject to no responsibility, any more than an agent for marriage;—unless he himself engage in the responsibility,—in which case he becomes answerable, because of his contract of security, but not from his contract of composition.

But he is responsible where the composition is of property.—Where, however, the composition is of property for property, it is equivalent to a sale, and the rights of it appertain to the agent.—In such a case therefore the claim for the property (that is: for the article to be given in composition) lies against the agent, not against the constituent.

Fazoolee composition are of four descriptions.—Fazoolee compositions (that is, such as are concluded by a stranger, in behalf of the defendant, without his desire) are of four kinds.

I. Of a debt by property (for which the compounder is responsible).—If a person compounds for a claim of debt by property, and makes himself responsible for the property,—in which case the composition is complete, because the defendant acquires nothing from it, but is merely exempted from a debt, and in this respect a stranger and the party that is the defendant are considered as the same.—It is also proper to remark further, that in the same manner as the condition of responsibility for the thing to be given in composition is lawful to the defendant, so also is it lawful to the stranger: a stranger, therefore, a capable of standing as the principal in composition, and in the obligations of the property, when he makes himself responsible for the thing to be given in composition; in the same manner as a Fazoolee who concludes a Khoola in behalf of a wife. In other words, if a person propose a Khoola to his wife, and another, without the desire of the wife, conclude the contract of Khoola with the husband on her behalf, making himself responsible for the consideration of Khoola, it is valid, and he is responsible for the consideration; and so also in the case in question, the Fazoolee is responsible for the thing to be given in composition. — He moreover, stands, with respect to the defendant, as one who acts gratuitously, in the same manner as a person who voluntarily pays the debts of another, in as much as he exempts the defendant from responsibility; he therefore is not entitled to any return from the defendant: but it is otherwise where the compounding acts by the desire of the defendant, for in that case he is not a voluntary agent. The compounding in question, moreover, is not entitled to any part of the debt; but that is cancelled with respect to the defendant; for the principle, with respect to the legality of the composition, in this case, is that the plaintiff annuls the operation of the debt upon the defendant, and not that he renders the compounder proprietor of it and this, whether the defendant acknowledge the debt, or deny it; in a case of denial, evidently, because the defendant does not in his own opinion owe any thing, and the opinion or belief of the plaintiff cannot operate upon him; — and in a case of acknowledgment, also, because the property of, or right to the debt, cannot be conveyed to another but by the person who is immediately indebted: it is therefore impossible, in this instance, to render the composition valid on any other principle than that of the annulment of the debt. — It is otherwise where the plaintiff claims some specific article in the possession of the defendant, who acknowledges the same. and another person, unauthorized, gives him something as a composition for his claim — because in this case the unauthorized person, in compounding for his claim with the plaintiff, does virtually purchase the article claimed; and his purchase of a thing from the proprietor is lawful, although it be not in his possession.

II. Of any thing for a specific property (which must be immediately delivered by the compounder.) — II. Where the compounder says, "I have compounded for these thousand dirms of my own," or "this slave of my own," in which case the composition is valid; and it is incumbent on the compounder to deliver over the article stipulated to the plaintiff; be cause, in referring the composition to his own property, he renders obligatory upon himself the delivery of it; on which account the composition so made is valid.

III. Of any thing for unspecified property (but which the compounder delivers.) — III Where the compounder says, "I have compounded for a thousand dirms," and immediately delivers a thousand dirms to the plaintiff; in which case the composition is valid; for on the delivery of the thousand dirms, the plaintiff obtains his object, and the contract of composition is thereby completely fulfilled.

IV. Of any thing for unspecified property (and which the compounder does not deliver) — IV. Where the compounder says, "I have compounded for a thousand dirms," but does not deliver them; in which case the composition remains suspended on the consent of the defendant. If he confirm it, he becomes responsible for the sum stipulated; or, if he withhold his consent, the composition is annulled. — The reason of this is that in composition of this nature, the defendant is a principal, because of their operating to free him from contention; but the compounder is also a principal, because of his charging himself with the consideration of composition, either expressly (as where he says, "I am responsible for the thousand dirms") or directly (as where he compounds for one thousand dirms, and delivers them). — Now, if he should not so have charged himself; if (as the present example supposes), the part of the defendant only; and the validity of it consequently rests upon his concurrence.

Case of a Fazoolee compounding for a specific article, without referring the same to his property. — The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that a fifth kind of composition may be added to the preceding; as, for instance, where a Fazoolee says, "I have compounded for this thousand dirms," or "for this slave," without referring these to his own property; — which sort of composition is valid, because, in specifying the thing to be delivered to the plaintiff, the compounder does, as it were, establish it as a condition that the said thing shall become the right of the plaintiff. If, however the slave should afterwards prove to be the property of another; or, if it should become known that he was free, or of a compounder, or Modabbir, or, if the plaintiff should return him, on account of a defect, to the compounder in none of these cases is the plaintiff entitled to take anything from the compounder, since he engaged for nothing further than the delivery of a specific article; if, therefore, that article remain safe for the plaintiff, the contract is valid; if otherwise he is not entitled to take any thing from the compounder, but must prefer his claim against the defendant. — It is otherwise

That is to say, he alone is concerned in it where the compounder stipulates dirms, and makes himself responsible for the same, and they afterwards prove the right of another, or of bad quality, and the plaintiff returns them; for in that case the plaintiff is entitled to take an equal number of good dirms from the compounder, because of his having made himself a principal with respect to security; and, accordingly, if the compounder refuse to comply, he must be compelled to make the delivery.

CHAPTER III.

OF COMPOSITIONS OF DEBT

A debt owing in consequence of any contract concluded upon credit may be compounded by payment of a part.—If the thing to be given in composition be of the same nature with the debt which is to be compounded for, and which is owing to the plaintiff under an Akid Moodainat, or contract concluded upon credit, the composition is not in that case construed to be an exchange, but the plaintiff is considered as taking a part of his right, and annulling or relinquishing the remainder. An Akid Moodainat, or contract concluded upon credit, is where a person purchases the goods of another, for a thousand good dirms (for instance), and then the parties separate, without the seller receiving the price, at a time of payment being agreed upon:—in which case, if the purchaser should compound the said thousand for five hundred good dirms (or five hundred bad dirms), and the seller agree to the same, such composition is valid; and it is thus construed, that he [the seller] agrees to accept a part of his right, and to relinquish the remainder;—not that he accepts the five hundred in exchange for the thousand. The reason of this is, that it is necessary, as far as possible to give validity to the acts of rational persons; and this may be done, in the former instance, by the claimant relinquishing a part of the dirms to which he is entitled,—or, in the latter instance, by conceding that and the goodness of them. Such also is the rule where the debt has been incurred, on the part of the defendant, by a usurpation or destruction of property.

The same of similar compositions of debt, owing in consequence of any act which subjects to responsibility.—The restriction to debts owing "in consequence of a contract concluded upon credit" (as here set forth), is for this reason, that it is originally requisite that debt be incurred in consequence of a contract agreeable to law.

Debt may be compounded by a forbearance, for the same sum.—If, in the case in question, the composition consist of a thousand dirms payable at a distant time, for a thousand dirms immediately payable, it is valid; because the construction then given to it is that the plaintiff agreed to postpone his claim,—not that he entered into an exchange; as a future period, is not lawful.

But not if the postponed payment be stipulated in money of a different denomination. If, on the other hand, the thousand dirms be compounded for a proportionable number of deenars, payable after the expiration of a month (for instance, it is unlawful; because it is impossible to consider it merely as a delay of the claim; since the claim related to dirms, not to deenars; nor is it possible to construe it into a sale, because a sale of dirms, for deenars payable at a future period, is unlawful. The composition, therefore, in this case, is invalid.

A postponed debt cannot be compounded by the immediate payment of a part.—If a person have a debt of one thousand dirms, payable at a future period, owing to him by another in consequence of a contract upon credit, and compounded the same for five hundred dirms payable immediately, such composition is invalid; because ready money is better than future payment; and ready money not being his right, the composition therefore takes place in a thing which is not his right, whence it is impossible to consider the composition as a delusion of part of the claim:—it must therefore be considered as an exchange (in this way, that the debtor gives up his right, namely, the delay of payment, in return for the five hundred remitted):—those five hundred, therefore, are in exchange for the forbearance; and the acceptance of any thing in consideration of forbearance is not lawful.

A debt of bad money cannot be compounded by the payment of a smaller sum in good money.—If a person have a debt owing to him by another, in consequence of a contract upon credit, of a thousand adulterated dirms; and compounded it for five hundred pure dirms, it is not valid; because pure dirms are not the right of the seller, as those exceed his right with respect to their quality, and it accordingly cannot be considered as a concession: it must therefore be construed into an exchange of one thousand for five hundred, superior with respect to quality.—and that is usurious, as quality is not regarded in transactions of exchange.

But a debt of good money may be compounded by bad, whether the sum be smaller than, or equal to the demand.—It is otherwise where a person compounds a debt of a thousand good dirms for five hundred bad dirms, because that is a concession with respect both to number and quality. It is otherwise, also, where a person compounds a debt due to him of a thousand bad dirms for a thousand good ones; because this is an exchange of like for like; and in that no regard is paid to quality.—It is, however, a condition, in this case, that the plaintiff take possession of the thing given in composition upon the spot, as this a Sif sa’a: *

*The commentators define Moodainat to signify "the act of selling to a person upon credit;" or "the act of granting credit."—The composers of the Persian version of the Hedaya have evidently mistaken the sense of the text in the beginning of this passage. The Arabic simply states it "in all compositions for a thing claimed under a contract upon credit, the transaction is not considered as an exchange, but as an acceptance of a part of the right, and a relinquishment of the remainder."

A debt in money of two denominations may be compounds by a smaller sum of either denomination.—If a person have a debt of a thousand dirms and a hundred deenars owing to him by another, in consequence of a contract upon credit, and compound the same for a hundred dirms, payable on or payable at the expiration of a month (for instance), such composition is lawful, as it is possible, in this instance, to give validity to the contract of composition, by supposing that the creditor remits the whole of the debt owing to him except one hundred dirms, payable immediately, or (as in the second case) within a month. It therefore is not to be regarded in the light of an exchange; for if it were so considered, the contract would not be valid, as it would be usurious. In compositions moreover, a concession is always understood; and as, in the case in question, concession is the pre-

Case of proposal from a creditor to grant his debtor a complete discharge, on condition of his paying one-half of the debt within a limited time.—If a person, having a debt due to him of a thousand dirms, payable at a future period, should say to the debtor, “pay me five hundred dirms tomorrow, upon this [condition], that you are exempted from the remainder of the debt;” and the debtor, accordingly, he is then exempted from the remainder. If, however, in such case, the debtor should not pay the five hundred dirms on the morrow, he remains responsible, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, for the thousand dirms. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that five hundred dirms are immediately remitted, and that the claim to them cannot afterwards be revived: for (in his opinion) the exemption here is absolute; because the plaintiff has established the payment of five hundred dirms as an exchange for the exemption of five hundred dirms; but the payment of these five hundred dirms cannot be considered as an exchange for the remainder, payment of which still continues incumbent upon the debtor and is not at all suspended upon the exemption. To make it an exchange, therefore is nugatory; consequently there remains only the absolute exemption; and hence the whole of the original debt cannot revive from a failure of the payment on the morrow any more than if the creditor had said, “I have exempted you from five hundred dirms out of one thousand dirms upon this [condition], that you pay me, tomorrow, five hundred dirms;” in which case the exemption is absolute, and so also in the case in question.—The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the exemption, in this case, is not absolute, but conditional. Upon failure of the condition, therefore, the exemption does not take place, for two reasons. First, because the creditor begins his speech with requiring the payment to morrow, and this may be considered in itself as an object, since it is possible that the creditor is afraid of losing the whole of the money in the event of the debtor’s becoming poor, which induces him to use expedient; and also, because he wants to get the money, in order that he may acquire profit from it in trade. The expression, moreover, bears the construction of being [conditional], and is therefore to be taken in that sense, in order to give validity to the contract.—Secondly, such conditions are common in compositions; and an exemption may be restricted to a condition, although it be not suspended upon it. Thus a transfer of debt (for instance) is restricted to the condition of safety; in so much that if the person who has agreed to accept the transfer should die insolvent, the debt reverts upon the person transferring it; the transfer, therefore is restricted, in this instance [to the condition of safety] and so also in the case in question. With respect to the reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf, an answer will soon be given to it.

Which admits of three different statements. I. Where the proposal has no condition annexed, that in failure of payment. II Where it is annexed that, in failure of payment the proposal still be void. II. Where the discharge is primarily stated.—

The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this case admits of three separate statements.—I. That which has been already explained.—II. Where the creditor says, “I have compounded with you the thousand dirms for five hundred dirms; which you must pay me to morrow, and then you shall be exempted from the remainder;” provided, however, that if you do not pay them to morrow, the thousand dirms shall remain due by you as before;”—in which case according to all our doctors, if the payment, be made on the next day, the exemption holds good; but if otherwise, it is void.— III. Where the creditor says, “I have exempted you from the payment of five hundred dirms out of a thousand, on this

*That is, to take upon him the responsibility for the debt (in the manner of an acceptor or endorser of a bill of exchange).
An acknowledgment may be stipulated for a composition.—If a person say to another, "I will not acknowledge your right of property until you first fix a distant time for the delivery, and promise me an indulgence in the payment,"—or, "until you first remit to me the whole (or a part) of the property,"—and the person so addressed act accordingly, his thus fixing a time, or remitting a part or the whole of the property is lawful, because he does this of his own accord, and not by compulsion.

But if the stipulation be publicly proposed the composition is of no effect.—This is where the acknowledgment addresses the other party, as above, secretly and in a covert manner. Where, however he addresses him publicly, he becomes liable nor the whole of the subject of acknowledgment upon the instant.

Section.

Of Participated Debt.

One of two partners compounding his share of a debt due to them jointly, the other partner may either take his proportion of the composition, or look to the debt for his share. If there be a debt owing to two men, jointly, from a third, and one of the two compound with the debtor his share of the debt for a piece of cloth, the fellow-creditor has it in his choice either to demand the other half of the debt, which is his due, from the debtor, or to take the half of the cloth from the compounder; unless, however, he [the compounder] pay him a quarter of the whole debt; for, in that case, he is not entitled to take the half of the cloth. In short, in all cases of the nature here exemplified, it is a rule that whatever, in a partnership debt, one of the partners receives a part of it, the other partner is entitled to an equal share in the part so seized; because although debt become a sort of increase from seisin (since debt is not considered as substantial property until it be taken possession of), still this increase has reference to the original right; and as the original right was equally divided, so also is the increase; in the same manner as offspring or fruit. The partner, therefore, has a right of participation in the part which is taken possession of. Still, however, previous to the operation of such right, the partner or thing taken is the sole property of the receiver, because substance is totally different from debt, and the receiver has taken the article in question in exchange for his right. He is consequently the proprietor: and accordingly all acts of his with regard to the substance in question are valid, and he remains responsible, in a proportionate degree, to his partner. It is to be observed that by a partnership debt is meant such a debt as becomes due to two or more persons from one case; such as the price of goods sold by two proprietors under one contract; or a debt inherited by two men; or the value, of a joint property destroyed by any person. Now such being the established rule, it follows that, in the case in question, the partner is at liberty either to demand his half of the debt from the debtor (since his share still remains due to him, in as much as the other partner has only received the amount of his own right), or to take the whole debt from the other partner; because of his right of participation in it. If, however, the other should give him a composition, by paying him the quarter of the debt, he then has no right to half of the cloth, as his right is only to quarter of the whole debt.

One of two partners receiving payment of his share in a debt due to them jointly, and paying the other his proportion of what is recovered, has still a claim upon the remainder.—If one of two partners in a debt should receive from the debtor, the half of his portion of the debt, the other partner is then at liberty either to participate in the half so received, or to look to the debtor for his full share, for the reasons recited in the preceding example. If, therefore, he should participate with the compounding partner, both partners are in that case entitled jointly to take from the debtor what remains due, because having shared equally in what was received, they are of consequence entitled to share equally in the remainder.

If the other prefers receiving payment of his part, solely, from the debtor and the property be lost, or the debtor prove insolvent, he has then a claim to his proportion of what has been received by this partner; but not where this partner has compounded for his share by a commutation. If, on the contrary, he should prefer demanding his share in full from the debtor, to an equal participation in the part received by the other creditor, and that part of the debt which has been received should remain safe, and that which remains due be lost, or destroyed, either by the debtor’s dying insolvent, or by his denial of the debt upon oath, he is in that case still entitled to a participation with the other creditor in what has been received; because he declined it before only on the supposition of the safety of the remaining part of the debt; and when the event proves otherwise, he of course becomes entitled to an equal participation. Supposing, however, that one of the joint creditors, instead of receiving his share of be debt, should commute it for a debt which he had previously contracted to the debtor,— then the other sharer, in case of the destruction of that portion of debt due to himself, is not entitled to any participation with him since he is in this instance, held to have paid a debt, not to have received payment of one. —The law is also the same, where one of the creditors exempts the debtor from that share of the debt which is due to him, because an exemption is a destruction and annulment, and not a receipt.

In a release from a part of his share, by one partner, the right of the creditors continues in proportion to their remaining claims.—If one of two partners in a debt release the debtor from a part of his proportion of the debt (such as an half, for instance), the remaining part of the debt is, in that case, due to the two creditors in degrees proportionate to their respective rights.—As, for instance, if the debt due to them were or gainly twenty dirms, and one of them afterwards release the debtor from the share of his share, the remaining part will then be fifteen dirms, of which five are due to the exempting partner, and ten to the other partner.

One of two partners may agree to a post ponement of payment.—If one of two partners should protract the period of payment of his share it is valid, according to Aboo Yoosaf, because of its analogy to an absolute exemption or release—in other words, as a suspension of the payment is equivalent to a restricted release, it is therefore valid, in the same manner as an absolute release.—According to Haneefa and Mohammed this is not valid:—as in such a case it must follow that a division of debt takes place prior to seisin,—since protracting the period of payment with respect to one share, and not to the other, is, as it were, a partition of the share; and a partition of debt previous to seisin is not lawful; because partition bears the sense of endowment with a right of property, and the endowment with a right in a debt, made to any other than the debtor himself, is not lawful.—Moreover, partition implies distinction: and as distinction cannot exist with respect to any obligation upon the person, it is therefore invalid.

One of two partners receives his share by usurping anything from the debtor; or by losing or destroying anything belonging to him; or, by accepting a lease in composition; or, by burning a piece of cloth, his property.—If one of two partners usurp some specific article from the debtor, or purchase something from him by an in invalid contract, and lose or destroy the same, these acts are considered as equivalent to a receipt of his debt.—So also if one of two partners accept a lease from the debtor in lieu of his debt, he is in that case held to have received his debt. If, also one out of two partners should burn a piece of cloth belonging to the debtor of equal value with his share of the debt, this is a receipt, according to Mohammed. but not according to Aboo Yoosaf. (Some, however, observe that this difference proceeds on the supposition of his having thrown fire on the cloth, without having previously laid hold of it; for if he should have first laid hold of the cloth, and then burned it, our doctors are of opinion that he has received his share, because he is considered first to have usurped the cloth, and then to have destroyed it.)

One of two partners annuls his share by marrying the debtor (being a female) and setting his share of the debt as her dower; or, by compounding with it for an offence.—If the debtor be a female, and one of two partners, in the debt should marry her, and stipulate his share of the debt as her dower, this, according to the Zahir Rawayet, is an annulment:—and so also if he compound with his share, for a wifful offence,—It is, however, to be observed, that if one of the partners in a debt should marry the woman whose debt is the debtor, without stipulating his share of the debt as her dower, in that case the other share has a claim upon him, as under such circumstances he is held to have made communion with his wife of his claim for hers. It is otherwise where he stipulates his share of the debt as her dower; for then he is held to have annulled, and not to have commuted his right, and on this account the other share can have no future claim upon him.—It is an inviable rule that, where a receipt has been made, by one partner, the other partner, in case of the destruction of his right, by the debtor's dying insolvent, or otherwise, is entitled to participate with the receiving partner:—but he has not such right in the case of an annulment.

One of the partners compounding his share of the debt by a purchase, the other may either take his share from the debtor, or on equivalent for his proportion in the receipt from the purchaser.—If one of two partners in a debt purchase something from the debtor (such as cloth, for instance) in lieu of his share of the debt, then the other partner is at liberty, either to require his share of the debt from the debtor (in which case all the effects take place, as described in the preceding example, where the partner requires payment from the debtor).—or to take an equivalent from the purchaser of a fourth part of the debt;—because he [the purchaser] has taken complete possession of his debt, since in paying and selling there is no degree of loss or disparity admitted in the things exchanged,—He, therefore, is responsible for a fourth part of the debt; and has no option of either giving a quarter of the debt, or a half of the cloth,—It is otherwise in a composition, because, as composition generally proceeds upon a principle of lenity and abatement, it would be an injury to the compounder to force him to give a fourth part of debt, and therefore an option is afforded him either to give a fourth part of the debt, or the half of the article received in composition.—The non-receiving partner, moreover, is not entitled to any part of the cloth purchased, as the purchasing partner has become proprietor or the same in virtue of contract of sale.

Objection.—The cloth in question ought to be divided between the two partners, as it has been acquired in exchange for a joint debt.

Reply.—The cloth in question has not been acquired in exchange for a joint debt, but merely in exchange for the share of the purchaser, in this way, that it produces a commutation of the price of the cloth for that part of the debt which is due to him.

Objection.—If the price of the cloth be a commutation of his share of the debt, it induces a partition of the debt prior to the seisin of it, which is unlawful.

Reply.—A wilful partition of debt, previous to the seisin, is unlawful, but an unintentional partition of it (by that being comprehended, for instance) is lawful: and, in the case in question, it is comprehended in the validity of the sale: in the same manner as (in the preceding case) the partition of the debt, previous to the seisin, is interwoven with the validity of the composition.

One of two partners in a sullm contract cannot compound for his share. If two persons conclude a Sullm contract (that is, advance money for goods, to be delivered at a future period), and one of them afterwards compound his share of the goods for his share of the stock advanced, it is not lawful, according to Haneefa and Mohammed—Aboo Yoosaf maintains that it is lawful, as he considers this to be analogous to any other debt; and also to a case where two persons purchase a slave, and one of them afterwards dissolves the contract with respect to his share, which is lawful; and so also in the present case.—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed, upon this point, are twofold.—First, if the composition in question be lawful with respect only to the share of one of the partners it must necessarily follow that a partition of the debt has been made prior to the seisin of it; which is unlawful: for as the debt, prior to the seisin, is not extant, it is impossible to discriminate part from part. If, on the other hand it be lawful with respect to the shares of both, then the consent of the other must be had.—It is otherwise where two persons purchase a slave, and one of them dissolves the contract with respect to his share, because the slave in question is extant, and the partition of an extant thing is not impracticable, since part can be discriminated from part, whether before seisin or after it.—Secondly, if the composition in question be valid, it must follow that the right of the purchaser to the goods for which the advance has been made is annulled, and established in the capital (that is, in the price advanced), and that it afterwards reverts with respect to the goods for which the advance has been made. For supposing the composition to be valid, and that one of the partners receives, in consequence, his share of the capital, the other partner has then a right to take from him his proportion of it; and the compounder again has a claim upon the other partner for a proportionate part of the goods. Hence it follows that the right of the compounder reverts, with respect to the goods of which the advance has been made, after annulment; but an annulment cannot take place without a dissolution: a dissolution, therefore, is primarily established.—Now, upon his right reverting, and annulment of the dissolution is induced; and this unlawful, as a dissolution in contracts of Sullim cannot be annul led.—Lawyers have observed that this case proceeds on a supposition of the purchasers having mixed together their capital: for, if their shares of the capital should not have been mixed or complicated, then (according to the first of the above arguments) the same disagreement must still subsist; since a division of the debt previous to the seisin must then also necessarily follow: but, according the second argument, the composition is valid in the opinion of all our doctors; for, in such a case, the non-compounding partner would not participate with the compounder in that part of the capital which he receives back, as they were not co-partners in the capital: and hence it does not follow that the right of the purchaser, to the goods for which the advance was made, reverts after annulment.—It is recited in the Auzih that this assertion concerning the unanimity of our doctors, as stated in the second argument, is not well founded: because a right to participate in the article received is founded on this circumstance, that the goods which the advance has been made constitute a joint debt, as it arises from one contract in which they are alike concerned; and hence the non-compounding share has a right to participate with the compounder in whatever he may have received in virtue of their partnership in the goods for which the advance was made, whether their shares of the capital have been complicated or not.

Section

Of Takharij.

Definition of the term.—Takharij, in the language of the law, signifies a composition entered into by some heirs with other heirs, for their share of the inheritance, in consideration of some specific thing, which excludes them from inheritance.

Heirs may compound with a co-heir for his share of inheritance, consisting of land or effects, by any equivalent.—If the estate of persons, consisting of land, or of goods and effects, be liable to be shared among several heirs; and the heirs compound with one amongst themselves for his share of the inheritance, by giving him some specific article, such composition is lawful, whether the thing given be superior or inferior to his right; because it is possible to legalize this composition, by construing it in the nature of a sale. and also, because it is related that, in the time of Osman, Tamazir, the wife of Abdul-Rihman, the son of Auf, who had been divorced by her husband in his last illness, compounded her share of the inheritance, which was a fourth of the eighth, for one half of the fourth of an eighth: as is evident from this circumstance, that Abdul-Rihman, who was his children, had four wives, left an estate of five millions of three hundred and twelve thousand deernars; and the share she received was eighty three thousand deernars, which is one half of the fourth of an eighth.

Or, by one precious metal, where the inheritance is in another precious metal. — In the same manner also, if the estate consist of silver, and gold be given to one of the heirs as a composition. — or, if it consist of gold, and a composition be given in silver, it is valid, whether the thing given is inferior or superior, because this is a sale of one species for another, and in it the condition of equality between the consideration and the return is not required. — It is requisite however, that the subjects of the composition be mutually interchanged and taken possession of by the parties at the place where the contract of composition is concluded: for this is a Sifir sale, and in it mutual seisin at the meeting is a necessary condition. — But if the heir, in whose possession the remainder of the estate it, should deny the possession then the former seisin suffices, because it is a seisin of responsibility (since it is in the nature of usurpation), and may therefore stand for a seisin of composition. — If, on the contrary, he should acknowledge the possession, then it is necessary that a new seisin be made; because the seisin, in that case, being in the nature of a trust, and consequently unattended with responsibility is weak in comparison with a seisin of composition, which is attended with responsibility, and therefore cannot be substituted in the place of it.

An inheritance of bullion and effects may be compounded for by gold or silver; but this gold or silver must exceed the share of the same metal inherited; and the heir must be put in possession of such excess at the time of adjusting the composition. — If the estate consist of gold, silver, goods, and effects, and the heirs compound the share of one amongst themselves for silver or for gold: it is in that case requisite that the gold or silver given in composition be somewhat greater than his share of the gold or silver by inheritance, in order that, after opposing an exact equality of the two similar species to each other, there may remain some excess to oppose as a composition to his share of the other articles, to the end that the imputation of usury may be avoided. — In this case, also, it is requisite that possession be taken, at the meeting, of the thing opposed to his share of the gold or the silver, because the composition to the extent is considered in the nature of a Sifir sale. — If, in the case in question, the composition be made for goods and effects, it is lawful, absolutely, — that is, whether seisin be made by the parties at the meeting, or otherwise, — and whether the thing given in composition be inferior or superior to the share of the inheritance.

An inheritance of money may be compounded for by money; each specie being opposed to the other respectively. — If the estate consist of dierms and deernars, and the composition also consist of dierms and deernars, it is lawful, whether the amount given in composition exceed or fall short of the share of inheritance compounded for, because each kind is opposed to its opposite, in the same manner as in sale. — It is a requisite, however, that the seisin be made at the meeting, because the composition in question is in the nature of a Sifir sale.

The inheritance of a debt cannot be compounded — if there be a debt due to the deceased, and it be included in the composition — by the condition of equality between the consideration and the return is not required. — It is requisite however, that the subjects of the composition be mutually interchanged and taken possession of by the parties at the place where the contract of composition is concluded: for this is a Sifir sale, and in it mutual seisin at the meeting is a necessary condition. — But if the heir, in whose possession the remainder of the estate it, should deny the possession then the former seisin suffices, because it is a seisin of responsibility (since it is in the nature of usurpation), and may therefore stand for a seisin of composition. — If, on the contrary, he should acknowledge the possession, then it is necessary that a new seisin be made; because the seisin, in that case, being in the nature of a trust, and consequently unattended with responsibility is weak in comparison with a seisin of composition, which is attended with responsibility, and therefore cannot be substituted in the place of it.

An inheritance of bullion and effects may be compounded for by gold or silver; but this gold or silver must exceed the share of the same metal inherited; and the heir must be put in possession of such excess at the time of adjusting the composition. — If the estate consist of gold, silver, goods, and effects, and the heirs compound the share of one amongst themselves for silver or for gold: it is in that case requisite that the gold or silver given in composition be somewhat greater than his share of the gold or silver by inheritance, in order that, after opposing an exact equality of the two similar species to each other, there may remain some excess to oppose as a composition to his share of the other articles, to the end that the imputation of usury may be avoided. — In this case, also, it is requisite that possession be taken, at the meeting, of the thing opposed to his share of the gold or the silver, because the composition to the extent is considered in the nature of a Sifir sale. — If, in the case in question, the composition be made for goods and effects, it is lawful, absolutely, — that is, whether seisin be made by the parties at the meeting, or otherwise, — and whether the thing given in composition be inferior or superior to the share of the inheritance.

An inheritance of money may be compounded for by money; each specie being opposed to the other respectively. — If the estate consist of dierms and deernars, and the composition also consist of dierms and deernars, it is lawful, whether the amount given in composition exceed or fall short of the share of inheritance compounded for, because each kind is opposed to its opposite, in the same manner as in sale. — It is a requisite, however, that the seisin be made at the meeting, because the composition in question is in the nature of a Sifir sale.
Case of composition of an inheritance where the particulars of the estate are not known.—If there be no debts due to the estate of the deceased, and it be not known of what species the articles of the estate consist, or if the heirs compound his share for articles of weight or measurement of capacity,—some have said that this composition is not lawful, because of the semblance it bears to usury.—Others, however, maintain that it is lawful, as the semblance to usury is dubious in this instance; for, in the first place, it is possible that the articles may consist of articles of weight and of measurement of capacity, and it is also possible that they may not; and, in the next place, if they do consist of such articles, it is possible that the quantity of the composition may be unequal to his right, and it is also possible that it may be equal to it.—The semblance to usury is therefore dubious; and regard is had to an actual semblance only, not to a dubious semblance.

Case of the same where the particulars are only known in part.—If the estate consist of something else than articles of weight or measurement of capacity, but of which the particular substances are unknown, and one of the heirs compound his share for articles of weight or measurement of capacity,—some have said that this is unlawful; because the composition, in this case, is in the nature of a sale, or an exchange of property for property; and this is not lawful when one of the articles opposed in exchange is uncertain. The most approved opinion, however, is, that it is lawful; since the uncertainty here cannot be productive of strife, inasmuch as the thing for which the composition is made, and which is the subject of the uncertainty, is in the hands of the rest of the heirs.

The inheritance of an insolvent estate can neither be compounded for nor distributed.—In the estate be completely overwhelmed with debt, neither composition nor division of it amongst the heirs is lawful; because the heirs are not, in this case, masters of the property, as inheritance takes place only with respect to such property as is unencumbered with some essential requisite of the deceased; and the payment of the debts of the deceased is one of his essential requisites. If, also, the estate be not completely overwhelmed with debt, it is not even then becoming to enter into any composition until the debts be discharged. Lawyers, however, have said that if, in such case, a composition or a division be made, prior to a discharge of the debts, it is valid.—Kookroohee. In treating of partition, observes that it is not valid according to a favourable construction of the law; but that it is valid upon the principle of analogy.

Definition of the term.—Mozaribat is derived from Zirrib, and means, in its literal sense, to walk on the ground. In the language of the law, Mozaribat signifies a contract of copartnership, of which the one party (namely, the proprietor) is entitled to profit on account of the stock, being denominated Rabbi Mal, proprietor of the stock (which is termed Ras Mal); and other party is entitled to a profit on account of his labour; and this last is denominated the Mozarib (or manager) inasmuch as he derives a benefit from his own labour and endeavours.

A participation in the profit is an essential of the contract.—A contract of Mozaribat, therefore, cannot be established without a participation in the profit; for if the whole of the profit be stipulated to the proprietor of the stock, then it is considered as a Bazat; or, if the whole be stipulated to the immediate manager, it is considered as a loan.

CHAPTER I.

Contracts of Mozaribat are lawful.—Contracts of Mozaribat are authorized by the law from necessity; since many people have property who are unskilled in the art of employing it; and others, again, possess that skill without having the property;—hence there is a necessity for authorizing these contracts, in order that the interests of the rich and poor, and of the skilful and unskilful, may be reconciled:—moreover, people entered into such contracts in the presence of the Prophet, who did not prohibit, but confirmed the same: several of the companions, also, entered into these contracts.

The stock is a trust in the manager's hands.—Whatever may be given by the proprietor of the stock to the manager is considered as a trust, because the manager takes possession of the same at the desire of the proprietor, and neither with a view to purchase nor to pawn. The manager is also an agent on the part of the proprietor in regard to the employment of the stock, as he acts in that respect by the orders of the proprietor.

Whenever, therefore, any profit is acquired, the proprietor and the manager are joint shares in it, inasmuch as it proceeds jointly from the stock of the one, and the labour of the other.
If the contract be of an invalid nature, the manager, in lieu of profit, receives an adequate hire.—When a contract of Mozaribat is invalid: it is, in effect, an invalid hire; because, as the manager acts for the proprietor, with regard to his stock, the profit which is stipulated to him is similar to hire for his labour. The contract of Mozaribat, therefore, where it is invalid, bears the construction of an invalid hire; and such being the case, the manager is entitled only to a hire adequate to his labour.

A manager opposing the proprietor, stands as an usurper.—If the manager should oppose the proprietor, he is then held to be an usurper, since he wilfully transgresses with respect to the property of another.

A Mozaribat holds only in such stock as admits of partnership.—Contracts of Mozaribat are valid only with respect to stock in which contracts of copartnership are valid; namely, dirms and donars (according to Haneefa) and also current Faloos (according to the two disciples), as has been already treated of at large, under the head of Partnership. Hence if a proprietor of stock should give goods or effects to another; and desire him "to sell them, and then to act as a Mozarib with regard to the price," the contract of Mozaribat would in such case be lawful, because it is not referred to the goods or effects, but to the price of these.

And this is a thing respecting which a contract of Mozaribat is valid.—In regard to his referring the contract to a price at a future period, it is lawful to do so in contracts of Mozaribat; because such contracts are either in the nature of a commission of agency, or of hire; and neither of these is preventive of the validity of a reference to a future period.—In the same manner, a's-, if the proprietor should say, "receive the debt due to me by a particular person, and act as manager with regard to it;" the contract of Mozaribat is then lawful. Because, by being referred to the period of seisin, it relates to substance and not to debt, and it is lawful to refer it to a future period. for the reason above mentioned.—It is otherwise, however, where the proprietor of the stock says, "act as a Mozarib with respect to the debt due by you;" for this is not lawful either according to Haneefa or the two disciples:—according to the former, because he holds an appointment of agency of this nature to be unlawful (as has been before explained in treating of agency and sale): and also according to the two disciples, because, although such an appointment of agency (as they hold) be lawful, yet as a thing purchased by a person so instructed is the property of the instructor, it follows that the contract of Mozaribat relates to goods and effects, and is accordingly unlawful.

It requires that the profit be determinate.—If is one of the conditions of a contract of Mozaribat, that the profit of the proprietor and the manager be indeterminate; that is to say: that neither of them be entitled to a specific number of dirms: for if the conditions of a specific number of dirms be stipulated with respect to one or other of the parties, the partnership between them with respect to the profit ceases to exist, since it is possible that the whole profit might not exceed the number fixed, and it is essential that they be partners in the profit. If, therefore, ten dirms (for instance) be fixed as the portion of one of the parties, the manager is entitled to an hire adequate to his labour, because the contract of Mozaribat has become invalid, since it is possible that the whole profit (as requisite) may not exceed the amount fixed, in which case there could be no copartnership with respect to it.—The manager is, in this case, entitled to an adequate hire, because his object in his labour was to receive a return, and he is prevented from receiving such return by the invalidity of the contract: it is therefore indispensable that he be paid an adequate hire.—In regard to the profit which in such case may be acquired, it goes to the proprietor, being considered as the offspring of his property.

This is the law in every case of an invalid contract of Mozaribat.—It is to be observed that an adequate hire, in the case of an invalid contract of Mozaribat, cannot, in the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, exceed the quantity stipulated. According to Mohammed, on the contrary, whatever may be adequate, without any regard to the quantity stipulated, must be given: as has been already explained in treating of partnership.—In a case where the contract proves invalid, an adequate hire is declared, in the Raweyet Aasil, to be due, although no profit should have been acquired, because the hire of a hireling is due upon the delivery either of profit or of labour, and the delivery of one or both of these here takes place.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that nothing in such case is due, because of its analogous resemblance to a valid contract of Mozaribat—that is to say, as in a valid contract of Mozaribat nothing is due to the manager in the event of there being no profit, so if the contract be invalid, nothing is due to him a fortiori.—It is further to be observed that the stock of an invalid contract of Mozaribat is not to be replaced or accounted for in case of its loss or destruction:—that is to say, indemnifica-

* To understand this it may be proper to remark, that where a contract of hire is rendered invalid by the invalidity of any of its conditions, the person hired is entitled only to a hire proportionable to the subject, and not to the hire stipulated in the contract.

Mozaribat. [Vol III.

condition is not incumbent upon the manager—because, as there is no responsibility for a loss of stock in a valid contract, so neither is there any in an invalid contract; and also, because, as the manager in the case of Mozaribat is only a hireling, and the stock remains in his possession merely that he may employ it, no indemnification is due from him on account of its destruction.

And not subjected to any uncertainty—Another requisite, in contracts of Mozaribat, is that there be no condition creative of an uncertainty with respect to the profit; for such a condition invalidates the contract, from its destruction of the object of it. Any other invalid condition, however, excepting this, or such as are opposite to the nature of the contract, do not invalidate the contract, but of themselves fail to the ground, as in the case of a condition of loss to the manager (where it is stipulated that "whatever profit may accrue shall be shared between the proprietor and the manager, according to their agreement; but that if any loss result, it shall fall entirely on the manager"). The contract of Mozaribat, therefore, is not annulled by the stipulation of conditions of this nature, but the condition itself is null; because, as the condition is merely redundant, and is neither productive of a dissolution of the partnership, nor of uncertainty with respect to the profit, the contract of Mozaribat is not thereby rendered invalid; in the same manner as agency does not become invalid from the invalidity of its conditions.

The stock be completely made over to the manager.—Another requisite in Mozaribat, is that the proprietor deliver over the stock to the manager, and retain no seisin of it, because it is in the manager's hands in the nature of a deposit, and must therefore be in his sole possession, and in no respect in possession of the proprietor. It is otherwise in a contract of partnership; because, in the contract of Mozaribat, the property is supplied by the one party, and the labour by the other; whence it is indispensable that the property remain entirely with the manager, in order that he may be competent to perform the necessary labour with regard to it; whereas, in partnership the labour is supplied by both parties: whence, if it were stipulated that the property shall remain entirely with one of the parties, a contract of partnership would not be established.

A condition of management by the proprietor invalidates the contract.—A condition of management by the proprietor of the stock invalidates a contract of Mozaribat; because where such a condition exists, the stock cannot be possessed solely by the manager, wherefore he cannot be competent to act with respect to it, and thus the object of the contract (namely, participation in the profit) cannot be effected;—and this, whether the proprietor be of sound understanding or otherwise (such as an infant), because, as the possession of the stock is established in the proprietor in virtue of his right of property, so long as it continues in his possession no delivery of it to the manager can be certified.—In the same manner, also, if one or two Mozaribat partners, or one of two claimant partners, deliver stock to any person in the way of a Mozaribat, and stipulate that the other partner shall also engage in the management of it, such contract of Mozaribat is null,—because the other partner is also a proprietor of the stock in question, although he be not a party to the Mozaribat agreement.

And so also, a condition of management by the contracting party, although he be not the proprietor.—If the contractor of a Mozaribat agreement be not the proprietor of the stock, and stipulate that he also shall unite with the Mozarib or manager, in the management of the stock, such agreement or contract is invalid, whenever the contractor happens to be incumbent,—that is, where he is a person who (like a privileged slave) cannot lawfully undertake the management of stock, in the way of Mozaribat.—Where, therefore, a privileged slave give stock to another to manage in the way of Mozaribat, stipulating that he shall, conjunctly with the manager, act with regard to the stock, for a proportion of the profit, the contract is invalid, because although the slave be not actual proprietor of the stock, yet as he has a possession of it, with the power of employment, he is held to be the same as the proprietor, and therefore his possession of it is destructive of the validity of the contract.

Unless he be competent to undertake it.—But if the party be competent to receive stock, and act as a manager then the contract in question would not be invalid;—as where, for instance a father, or a guardian, give the property of his infant charge to any person, to manage in the way of Mozaribat, stipulating that he himself, in exchange for a certain share of the profit, shall joint in the management of the stock;—in which case the contract is valid; because, such a person being himself entitled to undertake the management of the infant's property, in the way of Mozaribat, is equally entitled to join in the management of it in the way of Mozaribat, with others.

The manager is at liberty to act with the stock according to his own discretion.—As contracts of Mozaribat are absolute, that is to say, are not restricted to time, place, or other circumstances, It is therefore lawful for the manager to purchase or sell, or to eat of, or travel with, the stock; or to lodge it, either as a Bazat or a deposit; because the contract is unimpaired; and the object of it is the acquisition of profit; and this cannot be accomplished but by trade, the contract of course extends to every occurrence in commerce, and the appointment of an agent, or the giving property by way of Bazat, or the deposit of property are all occurrence of commerce;—and in the same manner, travelling is evidently so, because a trustee, who has no power of action with respect to his trust, has yet a power of travelling with it, and therefore a manager, who has the power of action with regard to the stock, entitled to travel with it a for-tiori;—besides, the word Mozaribat in itself implies this power, as it is derived from Zirrib, which signifies to walk on the ground, or, in other words, to travel.—It is recorded from Aboo Yooosaf that a manager is not at liberty to travel, and he has also related an opinion of Haneefa, that if the proprietor should give the stock to the manager in his own city, the manager is not in that case at liberty to travel, because to travel with property is an unnecessary endangerment of it; but that, if the proprietor give the stock to him in some other city than his own, he may then travel to his own city, because it is not likely that a man should continue always travelling; and as the proprietor knowingly gave him the stock in another city than his own, it may be presumed that he thereby consented to his travelling with the property to his own city.

But he cannot entrust it to another in the manner of Mozaribat without the proprietor's consent.—It is not lawful for a manager to make over the stock to another, in the way of Mozaribat, unless with the consent of the proprietor, or unless he should have been empowered him to act according to his own judgment and discretion; because a thing cannot include its like, since both being of equal force, one cannot yield to the other.—Hence it is necessary either that an express permission should have been given, or an absolute and discretionary power have been delegated.—This case, therefore, is similar to that of the appointment of an agent; for one agent has not the power of appointing another agent, unless the constituent should have said "act according to your own judgment and discretion."—It is different with respect to the depositing of property, or giving it by way of Bazat, because these acts are lawful to a manager, as they are of a nature inferior to a contract of Mozaribat, and a thing may include its inferior.

Nor lend it to another, although his powers be discretionary.—It is not lawful for a manager to grant a loan to any one out of the Mozaribat stock, although the proprietor may have said to him "act according to your own discretion;" because the proprietor of the stock, in giving this discretionary power, means to give a latitude with respect to such things only as are relative to trade; and loan is not connected with trade, but is a gratuitous deal, in the same manner as charity, or a gift; wherefore, by giving a loan, the object (namely, profit) cannot be obtained, since to receive back more than what is lent is not lawful.—

Giving property in the way of Mozaribat, on the other hand, is in the nature of trade, and therefore a manager in such a case may give the stock which is the subject of it, by way of Mozaribat, to another, provided the proprietor have empowered him to act according to his judgment and discretion.—The case is the same with respect to partnership and commixture of the stock with the manager's own property;—that is to say, if the manager should commix the stock with his own property and thus because a partner therein, it is lawful, provided the proprietor have empowered him to act according to his judgment and discretion, because mixture and copartnership are in the nature of trade, and the power so given is therefore held to extend to it.

The manager cannot deviate from any restrictions imposed upon him in the contract.—If a person give property to another by way of Mozaribat, and restrict his management of it to a particular city or to particular articles, it is not lawful for the manager to deviate therefrom; because this is in the nature of a commission of agency; and as restriction is attended with an advantage, it is therefore allowed to operate.—(An explanation will hearafter be given of the nature of restriction.) Neither is it lawful for the manager under such circumstances to give the stock by way of Bazat to another person, to be carried by him from that particular city: for it is not lawful for the manager himself to carry it from that city he therefore is not entitled to delegate such a power to another.

Upon violating the restriction, the manager becomes responsible for the stock.—If the proprietor restrict the management of the stock to a particular city, and the manager nevertheless carry it to another city; and there purchase something with it, he becomes in that case responsible for the stock; and whatever he may have purchased with it becomes his property, as well as the profit which may arise therefrom; because he stands as a usurper, since he has assumed a power of action with respect to the property of another without that other's consent.—If, however, the manager, having carried the stock out of the particular city, should not purchase anything with it until he had returned to the city to which the proprietor had restricted his power of action, he becomes freed from responsibility (in the same manner as a trustee who has opposed the depositor becomes freed from responsibility on the cessation of such opposition).—And the stock resumes its former nature of Mozaribat, in virtue of its continuance in the possession of the manager, under the original contract.—In the same manner; also, if the manager, having brought something with part of the stock in the city in question, should depart from it with the remaining part of the stock, and again return without having purchased anything with it, in that case both the purchase which was at first made, and the part which was afterwards brought back, are considered in the nature of Mozaribat, for the reason above-mentioned. — It is to be observed that what has been here related with respect to the manager’s becoming responsible upon carrying the stock to another city, and then making a purchase with it, is recited from the Jama Sagheer. — In the Mabsoot, treating of Mozaribat, it is related that the manager becomes responsible immediately on carrying the stock from the prescribed city. More approved of, however, is that the manager becomes responsible immediately on carrying away the stock from the prescribed city; and that upon his making a purchase with it in another city the responsibility becomes fixed and permanent, since there then exists no probability of his bringing it back to the prescribed city. — The condition stated in the Jama Sagheer, therefore, of the manager making a purchase out of the city, relates to the confirmation of the responsibility, and not to the original birth of it, which takes place immediately on carrying the property out of the city. A restriction to any particular part of a city is invalid — If a person give stock to another by way of Mozaribat, on condition of his making a purchase with the said stock in the market-place of a particular city, the condition is invalid; because a city, notwithstanding the distinction of its parts, is yet like one place and such a restriction is therefore useless. Unless stipulated under an express exception of any other place. — If, however, he expressly limit the purchase to the market-place, by saying, “Purchase with this stock in the market-place and nowhere else,” a purchase made out of the market-place is in that case unlawful, because the proprietor in this instance has expressly declared that he shall not make a purchase out of the market-place; — and the proprietor is authorized to lay this restriction. — The restriction here mentioned is to be understood in the proprietor saying to the manager, “I give this stock to you on condition that you act with it in such a manner” (”you purchase cotton with it,” for example); — or, on condition that “you employ it in such a place”; — and so also from his saying, “Take this stock and employ it in Koofa;” or, “Take this stock on condition of half the profit arising from it in Koofa.” — If, however, the proprietor were simply to say, “Employ this stock in Koofa,” the manager may then employ it in Koofa or out of Koofa. — He, proofs, upon these profits, are connected with Arabic grammar.

The manager may be restricted, in his transactions, to particular persons. — If the proprietor say to the manager, “Take this stock, on condition that you purchase and sell it with a particular person,” such restriction is valid, being founded on the particular credit in business of the person to whom it relates. — It is otherwise where the says “Take this stock on condition that you purchase with it from the people of Koofa,” or “sell it to them;”— or, “Take this stock for a Sirf-sale, on condition that you purchase with it from Sirrafa [bankers], or sell it to them;” — for if the manager (in the former instance) sell the stock in the city of Koofa, to a person who is not an inhabitant of that city, or (in the latter instance) sell it to some one who is not a Sirrafa, his act is lawful; — because the first of these restrictions is merely a restriction in point of place; for as the people of Koofa are all different in regard to their judgments and manner of transacting business, the restriction to them in general could be attended with no advantage, whereas the restriction to the place is advantageous in regard to the preservation of the stock; and the second of these restrictions is a restriction to a particular mode of sale; for as he did not confine the restriction to any one individual, but to a particular set of people who prosecute the business of Sirrafas, it is evident that the restriction was meant merely to a Sirf sale. — Such is the meaning in common acceptance, of the restriction in these two particular cases; but not in others.

The contract may be restricted, in its operation, to a particular period. — If the proprietor limit the Mozaribat to a particular period, the contract becomes null at the expiration of that period; because, as this is a commission of agency its continuance is therefore restricted to the period specified; and as the restriction of its duration may be advantageous, it therefore operates in the same manner as a restriction to a particular place, or to a particular mode of sale.

Nothing can be purchased, by the manager, which is not a subject or property, in virtue of seisin; with respect to the proprietor. — A manager is not at liberty to purchase, with the stock, a slave, who would become free by being transferred to the proprietor, whether from the circumstance of affinity, or from any other cause (as if the proprietor had already vowed to emancipate him), because the contract has been made with a view to the acquisition of profit, which can be obtained only by repeated acts such as previous purchase and subsequent sale; and to this last the freedom of the slave operates as a bar; — and for this reason the purchase of all such things as do not become property, in virtue of seisin (such as wine or carrion) is not comprehended in a Mozaribat contract. (It is otherwise with respect to the purchase of a thing under an invalid sale;)

Sirrafa is derived from Sirrif; which signifies pure sale or the act of exchanging one sort of specie for another: hence Sirrafa means not only a banker or money changer, but also any one whose dealing are of that nature, and consequently a negotiator of Sirf sales.
for this is comprehended in a Mozaribat contract, since the manager may lawfully sell that thing again after seizin: and consequently profit, which is the object of the contract, may in that case be obtained.)—If therefore, a manager purchase a slave who becomes free with respect to the proprietor of the stock, such purchase is not included in the Mozaribat stock, but is considered to have been made for the manager himself; for the bargain being valid with respect to the purchaser, is therefore effectual with respect to him, in the same manner as in the case of an agent for purchase who opposes his constituent.

The manager cannot purchase a slave free with respect to himself, where any profit has been previously acquired upon the stock.—It is not lawful for a manager to purchase a slave who is free with respect to the manager himself, where a profit has been gained upon the stock; because the slave of the manager (namely, in the profit) would in this case become emancipated from the whole stock, and consequently the share of the property would be valid,* according to Haneefa (The two disciples it would become emancipated, because of the known difference of their opinion from that of Haneefa concerning the divisibility or indivisibility of manumission)—Now, where a slave becomes emancipated, either wholly, or in part, he is no longer a lawful subject of sale; and consequently the end of the contract (namely, the acquisition of profit) cannot by this means be obtained. Hence it is not lawful for a manager, where a profit has been gained upon the stock, to purchase a slave who, with respect to himself, becomes free.—If, however, he should make this purchase, under such a circumstance, he becomes responsible for the amount of the Mozaribat stock so expended, because he is then held to have made the purchase for himself, and he has paid the price out of the stock.—But if there have been no accession of profit to the stock, the manager may lawfully purchase a slave that is free with respect to himself, because there exists no bar, in this case, since the manager has no share in the purchase, † so as to render his portion in the slave free.—And if, after the purchase, a profit should arise, from the slave increasing value, the manager's portion of the slave, involving his share of the profit, is emancipated; and he is not, in this case, in any respect responsible to the proprietor of the stock, because neither the increase of the value, not the share acquired by the manager, were effected by his means, but opetated of themselves independent of his will or endeavour. Hence this case is the same as where a person becomes heir to a relation, or to some one else; as if a wife should purchase the son of her husband, and should afterwards die, leaving behind her husband and brother; in which case the child becomes free, and the father is not in any degree responsible; and so also in the case in question.—(It is to be observed that the slave in question must perform emancipatory labour to the proprietor of the stock, to the amount of his share in him, as the proprietor's property is involved in his person; he must therefore perform emancipatory labour; in the same manner as in a case of inheritance.

Case of the manager purchasing a female slave, and begetting a child upon her.—If a person give one thousand dirms to be managed, in consideration of a moiety of the profit, in the way of Mozaribat, and the manager purchase, for the thousand dirms, a female slave of the value of these thousand, and afterwards have carnal connexion with her, and she in consequence produce a child also valued at one thousand dirms, and the manager claim the child, and the child afterwards increase in value to fifteen hundred dirms, in this case the proprietor of the stock has it at his option, either or claim emancipatory labour from the slave (the manager's child) to the amount of one thousand two hundred and fifty dirms: or to emancipate him: but the manager does not owe any indemnification to the proprietor for his share, though he be rich. The reason of this is that there is a presumption of the validity of the claim here made since it is possible that the female slave may be the wife of the manager, by her former proprietor having first contracted her in marriage to him, and afterwards sold her to him on behalf of the Mozaribat stock: and the child which she produced may have been the issue of his cohabitation with her:—but his claim to the child was not effectual (that is to say, the child was not emancipated), because of the condition of its emancipation (namely, his right of property in the slave) did not in any respect appear, as no profit had as yet arisen from her: for the value of each (namely, of the mother and child) was exactly equal to the amount of the stock, and consequently no profit existed in either of them; in the same manner as where the Mozaribat stock consists of different substances, and the value of each substance is equal to the stock,—in this way, that a person purchases, with a stock of one thousand dirms, two slaves, and each of them after-

* Because the slave, by becoming free in part, is rendered unsaleable; and obtains a claim to freedom.
† For, as no profit has been, as yet, gained upon the stock, and as the profit is the only thing in which the manager has any share, it follows that no part of the manager's property is expended in the purchase.

* That is, he owes him no indemnification for the vitiation of his property in the slave from this circumstance.
wards because worth one thousand dirms,— in which case no profit is held to exist in either of them; and so also in the case in question: and as no profit appears, it follow that the manager obtains no share whatever in the slave of the child, and consequently that his claim is invalid: but upon the child exceeding the stock in value, a profit then appears, and consequently the claim formerly made then becomes valid.—It were otherwise if the manner were first to emancipate the child, and afterwards the value of him to rise, for this emancipation would be altogether invalid (that is to say, would be ineffectual after the appearance of profit, as well as before). Because the libration is an indication of manumission, and the indication being null at the time, from non-existence of a present right of property; cannot afterwards become effectual in consequence of a supervenient right: whereas claim, on the other hand, is an express notification, and hence may lawfully be admitted as effectual, in consequence of a supervenient right (in the same manner as where a person, having declared the slave of another to be free, afterwards purchases him; in which case the slave, after the purchase, becomes free, in virtue of the previous declaration); —and the claim being effectual after the existence of profit, and the parentage, also, being established, it follows that the child is free in virtue of the manager’s right of proerty in a part of him: and no compensation for any part of his value is due from the manager to the proprietor of the stock, whether the manager be rich or poor because the freedom of the child is established in virtue of the parentage, and also in virtue of the manager’s right of property (that is to say, virtue of both):—but as the right of property is established subsequent to the parentage, the freedom is therefore referred to the right of property which takes place independent of the will and endeavour of the manager, and in which therefore he is guilty of no transgression; and as the indemnifica-tion for emancipating a slave is an indem-nification for damages, it is not due but in a case of transgression. —The proprietor of the stock is entitled, on this occasion, to demand emancipatory labour of the male slave, because the property which he had in him remains, as it were, detained in him; and he is also at liberty or emancipate him, because a slave who owes emancipatory labour is (according to Haneefa) like a Mokatib: and the proprietor is therefor empowered to e emancipate him. —If the proprietor require the labour, the slave must perform it to the amount of one thousand two hundred and fifty dirms: for the proprietor is entitled to one thousand on account of the stock; and the remaining five hundred. which is the profit, is equally shared between him and the manager; the labour, therefore, must be performed to the amount above stated; and upon the proprietor thus obtaining that amount, of him, he is then entitled to take an equivalent for half the value of the mother; because the proprietor being entitled to one thousand dirms out of the twelve hundred and fifty, on account of the stock (which claim must always be first satisfied), it follows that the female slave is altogether profit, and is therefore equally shared between the proprietor of the stock and the manager; and as the manager formerly preferred a claim that was valid (since there was a presumption that he might have cohabited with the female slave in virtue of marriage), and the efficiency of which remained suspended only on account of the defect in his right of property, and became effectual on the establishment of that right, by which means the female slave becomes his Am Wald,—he [the manager] is therefore so entitled, and the share of the proprietor, whether he be rich or poor, because the responsibility in this instance is responsibility for assumption of property, and a responsibility of the nature does not remain suspended on transgression; in the same manner as where a person, in virtue of marriage, cohabits with the female slave of another, and child is born of her, and this person afterwards obtains, by inheritance, a right of property in her, jointly with another person,—in which case the person in question is responsible to the other for his share; and would also in the case in question: contrary to responsibility for the child as before treated of.

CHAPTER II

OF A MANAGER ENTERING INTO A CONTRACT

OF MOZARIBAT WITH ANOTHER.

A manager entrusting the stock in his hand to a secondary manager, is responsible to the proprietor, upon any profit being acquired on it. —If a manager give stock to another person, in the way of Mozaribat, without authority from the proprietor of the stock, in that case the first or principal manager is not responsible [for the stock] either on account of having so given the stock to the other, or on account of that other’s employment of the same, until such time as profit shall have been acquired thereon: but whenever profit takes place, then the principal manager becomes responsible to the pro-manager’s claim (involving the emancipa-tion of the child) were first admitted, &c."

erty is in the child until such time as a profit be obtained upon it.

urses his share in a slave, which induces ultimate freedom in toto, and is therefore, consequence, destructive to the pro-e other partners.

pritor of the stock.—This is recorded by Hasan as an opinion of Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that the primary manager becomes responsible, immediately upon the action of the secondary manager, whether profit or loss have been acquired or not: and this is agreeable to the text. Rawzah and Ziffer holds that the primary manager is responsible for the giving of the stock to the other, whether that other may have acted with regard to it or not (and there is an opinion recorded from Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect); because it is lawful for a manager to give the stock by way of deposit, not by way of Mozaribat; and as, in the case in question, it was given by way of Mozaribat, the manager was therefore guilty of a trespass, and is consequently liable to responsibility.—The argument of the two disciples is that the stock is here in reality given as a deposit; and if it is only rendered Mozaribat by the action of the secondary manager;—therefore (say they) there are two circumstances in this case, and we pay attention to both circumstances, and determine, accordingly, that responsibility takes place in case of the action of the secondary manager: but if he do not act, and the property be lost in his possession without any transgression, responsibility is not in that case incumbent."—The reasoning of Haneefa is that the mere act of giving, previous to the action, is a deposit, and after the action it is an entrusting in the case of the Mozaribat; and as both these deeds are lawful to a manager, he is not consequently responsible for either of them:—but upon profit accruing, the first manager renders the secondary one a sharer with him in the stock, and is therefore responsible in the same manner as if he had mixed the stock with the property of another, in which case he would have become responsible in consequence of his having rendered that other a sharer in the stock; and so also in the case in question. All this proceeds on a supposition of both of the Mozaribats being valid: but if one or both of them be invalid, then the primary manager is not responsible, though the secondary manager should have acted with regard to the property; because, in such case, the secondary manager is considered as a hirer, entitled to an adequate hire, and not to any share in the profit. Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, observes that in case of the validity of the Mozaribat, the primary manager becomes responsible; but he has not stated the consequences with regard to the secondary manager. Some have said that he is not responsible, according to Haneefa, and that it is thus according to the two disciples; proceeding on the different opinions which they have maintained with regard to the trustee of a trustee,—Haneefa holding the principal and not the secondary trustee to be responsible; and the two disciples holding the proprietor to be at liberty to take the compensation from whichever he chooses; and so also in the case in ques-

- tion—others, again, have said that the proprietor, is at liberty, in the opinion of all our doctors, to take a compensation either from the principal or the secondary manager; and this is the common opinion. This is evidently the opinion of the two disciples on account of him, according to them, a secondary trustee is responsible;—and it is therefore agreeable to the opinion of Haneefa; because the principal manager was guilty of a transgression, in giving the stock to the secondary manager without the proprietor's permission; and the secondary manager was also guilty of a transgression, in taking possession of the property of another without his consent. Resorting the two cases of a manager and a trustee, the difference between them according to Haneefa, is that the secondary trustee takes possession of the stock with a view to the benefit of the principal trustee, and is therefore not responsible: whereas the secondary manager seizes the stock with a view to his own profit; on which account it is proper to make him responsible. It is to be observed that upon the primary manager becoming responsible for the stock, the contract of Mozaribat between him and the secondary becomes valid; and the profit is participated between them agreeably to their stipulation; because the primary manager becomes proprietor of the Mozaribat stock, in consequence of his responsibility, from the time that he exceeded his authority, by making it over to another without the owner's consent, while it is the same as if he had so given his own property. If the proprietor, on the other hand, should require the indemnification of the secondary manager, then the secondary must revert for satisfaction to the primary manager, because of their contract of Mozaribat, as he acts on behalf of the primary manager;—in the same manner as where a proprietor takes a compensation from the turstee of an usurper, in which case the trustee has recourse to the usurper; and so likewise in the case in question; and also, because the principal manager deceived him in the body of the contract. And in this case also the contract of Mozaribat between the primary and the secondary managers is valid, because responsibility ultimately falls upon the primary manager, and it is therefore the same as if the proprietor had taken a compensation from him first: but the profit, in this case, is fair and lawful to the secondary, and not to the primary manager: because the secondary is entitled to the profit on account of his management, in which there is no baseness; but the principal is entitled to profit merely from his right of property, which being for the payment of the compensation, is not altogether free from baseness, since a right of property merely constructive is in one shape established, but in another shape it is not established.

Case of manager entrusting the stock to a secondary manager, with the proprietor's concurrence.—If a person give property to another by way of Mozaribat, on condition of half the profit, and with permission to him to give the property to another in the way of Mozaribat, and the manager, accordingly, give the said property to another by way of Mozaribat, on condition of a third of the profit; and the secondary manager employ the said stock, and acquire profit upon it in that case, if the proprietor should have said to the first manager, "Whatever advantage God Almighty may grant upon it is between you and me in an equal degree," then a half of the whole profit is due to it the proprietor, one third to the secondary manager, and one sixth to the primary manager;—because the act of the primary manager, in giving the stock to the secondary manager by way of Mozaribat, was awful, as he had the consent of the proprietor there to; but as the proprietor stipulated to himself one half of the whole profit, he is therefore entitled to it, and the remaining half is all with which the manager may establish Mozaribat; and as agreed to give a third of the whole to the secondary manager, these will remain of course only one sixth of the whole to him. —One half of the profit is, in this instance fair and lawful to the two managers, although the primary manager has not employed himself [with regard to the stock], because the industry of the secondary manager is held to be that of the primary:—in the same manner as where a person hires another to make him a garment for one dirm; and the person hired hires another to do the work for half a dirm; in which case, although the principal hirer does no work, yet he is fairly and lawfully entitled to the profit of half a dirm, as the work of the secondary is considered as his work. But if, in the case in question, the proprietor should have said, "Whether advantage God Almighty gives to you, is between you and me in an equal degree;" then the secondary manager is entitled to one third, and the remainder is divided in an equal degree between the proprietor and the principal manager;—because, in this instance, the proprietor commits the disposal of the property to the first manager, stipulating for himself one half of the whole profit which accrue from it; and as, by this statement, two thirds of the profit accrue, those two thirds are equally divided between the proprietor and the manager. —It is otherwise in the preceding case, because there the proprietor had stipulated for himself one half of the whole profit; hence there is an evident difference between the two cases.

If the proprietor of the stock say to the manager, "I gave this stock in order that whatever profit may result to you therefore be fairly divided between us;" and, at the same time, give him permission to have it managed by Mozaribat, and if, accordingly, the manager entrust it to another manager with an agreement of half the profit to him, in this case one half of the profit goes to the secondary manager, and the other half is divided equally between the proprietor and the primary manager; because the primary manager has agreed to let the secondary manager have one half of the whole profit, and the proprietor of the stock having already agreed to this, the secondary manager is entitled to one half accordingly; and as the proprietor established for himself one half of the profit that might accrue to the primary manager, and one half only on the whole accrues to him (as the half which goes to the secondary must necessarily be deducted), it follows that this half is divided between them.

If a proprietor give stock to any person by way of Mozaribat, upon condition that, of whatever advantage may accrue thereon, one half shall come to him,—or that, one half of the increase, above the original amount, shall be divided equally between him and the managers;—and at the same time, permit the manager to entrust the stock to another by way of Mozaribat, and as the manager accordingly give it to another in the way of Mozaribat, with an agreement of one half of the profit to him,—in that case the proprietor is entitled to one half of the profit, and the secondary manager to the other half, whilst nothing whatever is due to the primary manager; for the stockholder having conditioned for himself one half of the property in an absolute manner, one half therefore goes to him; and as the principal manager agreed to give one half (which is the share that would be due to himself) to the secondary manager, the same must therefore be given to him; hence he himself is entitled to nothing;—in the same manner as where a person hires another to make him a garment for one dirm, and the person so hired again hires another to do the work for one dirm also,—in which case the secondary hirerling would be entitled to the dirm, and nothing whatever would be due to the principal; and so also in the case in question,—But if the primary manager to give the secondary one two thirds of the profit instead to one hal', then the proprietor is entitled to one half, and the secondary to the other; and the principal manager must make good of the secondary, from his own property, to the amount of one third of the profit, in order that a complete share of two thirds may be thus rendered to him: for the primary manager stipulated to the secondary a thing which was the right of the proprietor; and hence, in respect to the proprietor, his agreement is of no effect, since, if such were the case, it must necessarily follow that the condition he had himself established was null;—yet there is no illegality in referring the obligation of it to his own person, since it relates to a fixed and certain object, interred in a contract, to be made by the party to make. Hence he becomes responsible for the safe delivery of two thirds to the secondary, and consequently the discharge of the same is incumbent upon him. Besides, he deceived the secondary in the body on the contract, which a cause of recourse,—that is to say, entitles the secondary to revert and have recourse to the principal:—in the same manner as where a person has been hired to make a garment for one dirm, and be again hired another to do the work for one dirm and an half,—in which case the secondary hirerling is entitled to an half dirm from the property of the principal hirerling:—and so likewise in the present case.

Section.

The contract may stipulate a proportion of the profit to the slave of the proprietor.—If a manager stipulate to give one third of the profit to the proprietor of the stock, one third to the slave of the proprietor (on condition of assistance in the labour), and the remaining third to himself, it is lawful whether the slave be indebted or not: because the is in of slave is valid (especially where he is a Mazoon, or privileged slave; and in the present case the slave is privileged, inasmuch as the condition of his working with the manager endows him with a privilege; and) already to the rule of the seisin of a slave being valid, a master is not permitted to take from a trustee the deposit which may have been made by his slave, although the slave be not privileged; and on the same principal, also, a master may sell any thing to his slave, provided he be privileged:—and the seisin of the slave being valid, it follows that the condition of his uniting in the management is not repugnant either to the delivery of the stock, or to the distinction between the stock and the manager: the condition is therefore approved† (It is otherwise where it is made a condition that the proprietor of the stock shall himself work, because that is preventive of delivery,‡ and consequently invalid, as has been already explained.)—The contract of Mozaribat, therefore, being valid, one third of the profit goes to the manager and two thirds to proprietor of the stock: because the earnings of the slave are the property of the master, if he be not indebted; and if he be indebted they are the property of the creditors.—The doctrine here laid down proceeds on a supposition that the master, and not the slave, has concluded the contract of Mozaribat.

But if a slave engage in such a contract on behalf of his master it is invalid.—For if a privileged slave enter into a contract of Mozaribat with a stranger, stipulating that his master shall act with the manager in the management of the stock, the contract is invalid, provided the slave be free from debt: because in that case the Mozaribat stock is the property of the master:* and as it is stipulated that the master shall unite in the management, it is requisite that he make seisin of it for that purpose; but the seisin of the proprietor is repugnant to a due delivery.† If, however, the slave be insolvent, the contract is valid, as in that case the master stands in the same relation as a stranger, according to Haneefa.

OF THE DISMISSION OF MANAGER; AND OF THE DIVISION OF THE PROPERTY.

The contract is dissolved by the death of either party.—If either the proprietor of the stock or the manager should die, the contract becomes null; because a contract of Mozaribat (as has been already explained) is in the nature of an appointment of agency; and agency ceases by the death either of the constituent or of the agent; and inheritance does not take place with regard to agency, as has been already demonstrated.

Or by the apostacy and expatriation of the manager.—If the proprietor of the stock become an apostate, and be united to a foreign country, the contract of Mozaribat becomes null; because his being united to a foreign country is equivalent to his death (whence it is that his property is then divided amongst his heirs).—If, on the other hand he should not be united to a foreign country, the transactions of his manager remain suspended in their effect.—(that is to say, if he again becomes a Mussulman, they then take effect); but if he die in his apostacy, they then become null (according to Haneefa because his manager’s transaction [with the stock] is the same as his own transaction, since the manager acts on his own account: and as (according to Haneefa) the acts of an apostate are suspended in their effect, so, in the same manner the acts of his manager are suspended.

If the manager apostatize, without going to a foreign country the contract still continues

*To the slave, for the purpose of management.
†If a slave were incapable of making seisin, it would follow that a delivery of the stock to the slave (for the purpose of managing it) would, in fact, be a return of it to the proprietor, his master, and consequently the contract would be rendered nugatory.
‡Since such delivery would be return of it to the proprietor, which would invalidate in contract.

*Whereas, if the privileged slave were involved in debt, the stock entrusted by him to the manager would (in common with his other property) be the right of his creditors.
†Because, as the property of the slave is, in effect, the property of his master, it follows that a delivery to the master would be nugatory.
‡By a sentence of the Kazee.
If the manager become apostate, yet the contract still continues to exist in its original state, because the actions of a person are suspended in their effect, only on account of a suspension of his right property: but the apostate in question has no right of property in the Mozaribat-stock, as that belongs solely to the proprietor of the stock: and as the proprietor's right of property is not suspended, the contract of course still continues in force.

All acts of the manager are valid, until he be duly apprized of his dismission. — If the proprietor of the stock dismiss the manager, and he should not be acquainted with his dismission until after he had transacted by purchase and sale then those transactions are valid; because he acts as an agent on behalf of the proprietor; and the dismission of an agent, if it be voluntary and intended (as is to say, virtual, such as by death), remains suspended upon a knowledge of it; for dismission is a prohibition from action; and prohibition in injunctions respecting any matter, do not operate until after knowledge of them, as in the case of the commands and prohibition of the Law.

The manager, after being apprized of his dismission, may still convert what remains on his hands into money — If the proprietor of the stock dismiss the manager, and he be apprized thereof, he may nevertheless sell such of the Mozaribat-stock as consist of chattels and effects, because his dismission from the agency is not preventive of a sale of articles of that kind, since he has a right to profit, which cannot be obtained otherwise than by a division; and this can be effected only by turning the subject of the stock into species.—From this necessity, therefore he is at liberty to sell such stock: but after the sale, it is not lawful for him to make any purchase whatever with the price he procure for these effects; because there is no necessity for his doing so, and the sale is admitted only from necessity, as has been already explained.

But if it have been already converted into money, he cannot transact with it. — If the proprietor of a stock, which had originally consisted of dirms or deinars, dismiss the manager at a time when it has been reduced to species, and the manager be apprized thereof, in that case he is no longer entitled to act with regard to it, since there exists no further necessity for his so doing.

Unless this money be of a species different from the original stock,—in which case he may contract it into money of the same species. — The author of the Hedaya remarks that the law here proceed on the supposition that the stock was at first reduced into dirms, or deinars of the same kind with the original stock: but that, if it should have been converted into species of a different denomination (as if the stock had originally consisted of deinars, it be now converted into dirms, or vice versa), the manager, is, by the benevolence of the law, allowed the liberty of selling it for the same specie as the original stock; because it is incumbent upon the manager to return a similar to the original stock, which is impracticable otherwise than by selling what he has on hand for the same specie as the original stock; and also, because, as the profit cannot be obtained until the property on hand be converted into something of the very same nature as the original stock, the case becomes exactly the same as if the property consisted of goods and effects. — It is to be observed that all the rules here laid down with respect to the dismission of a manager are applicable to the case of the death of the proprietor of the stock. — Thus, if the proprietor should die, the manager is entitled to sell the Mozaribat stock, where it consists of goods and effects: but he is not allowed afterwards to purchase any thing whatever with the price so obtained. If, on the other hand, the stock has been turned into dirms or deinars, he is not entitled to act with respect to it, provided the money into which it is converted correspond with the specie of the original stock: but if it be different from the specie of the original stock he is at liberty to convert, by sale, into the same specie with the original.

If, at the dissolution of the contract, the stock consist of debt, the manner must be compelled to collect them where any profit has been acquired. — If the proprietor and the manager dissolved the contract, and the stock should at that time consist of debts due from other, in this case, where any profit has been acquired, the magistrate must compel the manager to possess himself of these debts; since he is held to be equivalent to a hireling, and his profit to be like hire. But if no profit have been acquired, it is not incumbent upon the manager to receive payment of these debts; since he is merely a voluntary agent, and no compulsion can be used for the fulfilment of a voluntary engagement (as where a person makes a grant to another without delivering the thing granted, in which case the donor cannot be compelled to make delivery of the grant). The manager, however, is in this case to be instructed to appoint the proprietor agent in his behalf for the receipt of these debts; for as the right of the contract appertain to the contractor, it is indispensably necessary that he thus appoint the proprietor his agent, to prevent the loss of his right. Mohammed, in the Jama Sagheer, observes that "the manager ought to be instructed to make a transfer of his claim upon the debtors to the proprietor;": the meaning of which also is, that he should appoint the proprietor his agent for the receipt of the money due from him. But if such transfer were sufficient, the proprietor must necessarily be injured in case of the debtors not acceding to the same. It is to be observed that this is the rule in all cases of agency. Thus, when an agent for sale (for instance) is dismissed, he must be told to appoint his constituent agent for the receipt of the debt, in the manner above mentioned. A broker, however, must himself be compelled to receive any debts that may be, due because with brokers the custom is to act for hire.

All lost upon the stock is placed against the profit—whatever may be lost or destroyed, of the Mozaribat stock, must be placed to the account of the profit, and not of the original stock, because the profit being a dependant, it is most eligible to refer the loss to it; in the same manner as a loss in property subject to Zakat is referred to what is exempt, and not to the actual Nisab, as the exempt property is a dependant of the Nisab.

If more than the profit be lost, the responsibility does not fall on the manager, as he is merely a trustee.

If the stock is divided previous to a restoration of the capital and any accident afterwards befall the stock, the manager must return the portion of profit he had received.

If the stockholder and the manager divide the profit between them, and continue the contract in existence as before, and the whole or part of the stock be afterwards lost, the manager must, in that case, return the profit to the stockholder, in order that he may appear to recover this capital; because a division of the profit previous to a restoration of the capital is not valid, since the profit cannot be ascertained until the proprietor shall have recorded his capital for the capital is the principal, and the profit the dependant; and hence, when what remained in the hands of the manager is lost or destroyed, as he is in this case subject to no responsibility (it being only a trust with him), it follows that what he and the proprietor had before taken possession of is capital, and consequently that he is responsible for the portion he had taken, and that the portion taken by the proprietor as also accounted as part of the capital.

The manager is not responsible for deficiency when the proprietor has received back the whole capital, any excess remain, such excess must be divided between him and the manager, as being profit: but if there be a deficiency, no compensation is due from the manager, as he is only a trustee.

The profit received by the manager is no way implicated, with respect to any new contract between the same parties. If the manager and the proprietor, having divided and taken the profit, and annulled the contract of Mozaribat, should again enter into a new contract of Mozaribat and the stock be afterwards lost, in this case the profit gained upon the first Mozaribat is not to be returned to the proprietor, because that Mozaribat was completed, and the second Mozaribat is a new contract; and the destruction of the stock of the second Mozaribat cannot affect the first; in the same manner as if the proprietor should have given some other property than that which was the subject of the former contract to the manager, in which case, if the said additional property should be lost, it does not affect the contract; and so also in the case in question.

CHAPTER IV.

OF SUCH ACTS AS MAY LAWFULLY BE PERFORMED BY A MANAGER.

A manager may sell the stock either for ready money, or upon trust. It is lawful for a manager to sell the stock either for ready money, or upon trust; because these acts are in the nature of traffic, and, as such, are included in an absolute contract.

The period of trust, however, must not be extended beyond what is customary amongst merchants (such, for instance, as a period of ten years); because he is only permitted to act according to the common practice, and custom of merchants; whence it is that he may lawfully purchase a quadraped for conveyance; but he can only hire a boat: for such is the custom amongst merchants.

According to the Rawayet Mubahor, a manager is at liberty to give the privilege to trading to slave whom he may have purchased with the stock, since this is in the nature of traffic.

Or entrust a slave with the management of it: or (having sold it for ready money) may grant a suspension of payment. If a manager should sell part of the stock for ready money, and afterwards admit of a suspension in the payment, it is lawful according to all our doctors: according to Haneefa and Mohammed, because, as an agent is permitted to grant a suspension of payment, a manager, as having a share in the profit, is entitled to do so a fortiori (the manager, however, is not responsible because, as he has a power of dissolving the sale, and afterwards selling the thing upon trust, the deferring of payment is accordingly lawful: contrary to an agent, as he is responsible to his constituent for the price of what he sells, because he is not at liberty to dissolve a sale and sell the article over again upon trust): and according to Aboo Yoosif, because a manager may, if he please, annul the sale, and sell the article over again: contrary to an agent, who has no power of dissolving a sale.

Or allow the purchaser to transfer the payment upon another person. If a manager should sell something to Zeyd upon trust, and Zeyd, with the consent of the manager, should transfer the payment of the price upon Omar, this is lawful, whether Omar be rich or poor, because transfer of debts is customary amongst merchants. It is other.

wise where a guardian assents to such a transfer with respect to the property of his orphan ward, as he cannot lawfully accept, in his ward's behalf, of a transfer upon a person that is poor; because the interest of the ward must be consulted (whence the power of a guardian is restricted to what may conduce to the interest of his ward); and as the acceptance of a transfer upon a person that is poor is destructive of the orphan's interest, it is therefore illegal.

The acts of manager are such as he is empowered to perform by the contract.—The acts of a Mozaribat, or manager, are of three kinds. I. Such as he is competent to perform in virtue of the absolute contract of Mozaribat; including all deeds partaking of the nature of Mozaribat, or of its dependences; such for example, as agency for purchase or sale, because of the necessity for those acts; and also pawn, as this is in the nature of a discharge or satisfaction; and like wise deposit, hire, entrusting in the manner of Bazat, and also travelling with the stock, as before mentioned.

Or in virtue of general and discretionary power vested in him by the proprietor.—II. Such deeds as he is not competent to perform in virtue of the absolute contract, but in virtue of a general power granted him by the proprietor, to act according to his own judgment and discretion; including all such deeds as may have a probable connexion with a contract of Mozaribat; and which are accordingly held to be connected with it, when there exists any argument for their being so;—such as the giving of the stock to another in the way either of Mozaribat, or of partnership, or the mixing of it with the manager's own property. or with that of another;—to which acts a manager is not competent, merely in virtue of the absolute contract, except where, something as a connexion between the act and the contract; because it is presumed that the proprietor of the stock intends that the manager alone should be his partner, and not any other person; and these acts are not in the nature of traffic (as traffic does not depend upon such acts); and consequently are not comprehended in the absolute contract; yet, as they are all instruments of an increase of profit, and are therefore admissible in a contract of Mozaribat, they are accordingly included in the contract, where an argument exists of their so being; and the power granted to the manager by the proprietor "to act according to his own discretion," clearly argues thus much.

Or such as he is not empowered to perform in either way.—III. Such deeds as the manager is not competent to perform, either in virtue of the absolute contract, or from the discretionary power granted him by the proprietor, being neither in the nature of traffic, nor having any probable connexion with the contract, but such as he may perform in case of an express power from the proprietor of the stock. These are termed istidanit *; such as where a manager purchases something in exchange for dirms and deenars, after having laid out the whole capital in the purchase of goods and effects in which case the transaction relates entirely to the manager, and he is entitled to all the profit as well as subject to the loss or debts that may result from it; or, where a manager lays out, in purchasing goods, more than the amount of the capital, in which case what is tantamount to the stock is considered as belonging to the Mozaribat; and the profit, loss, or debts resulting from the excess relate solely to the manager; or, where the stock consists of dirms and deenars, and the manager purchases something in exchange for articles of weight, measurement of capacity, or of such; for, in that case, as the manager makes the purchase with something else than the stock, it is considered as an Istidanit, and operates entirely with respect to the manager: that is to say, the profit, loss, and debts arising from it, relate entirely to him, and not to the proprietor of the stock; the reason of which is, that Istidanit is a transaction with respect to other property than the capital; and as the agency is confined to the capital, the manager is of course not competent to such transaction. Moreover, the property, in this case, exceeds the amount of that which was the subject of the contract, to which the proprietor has not assented; and although, in such excess of property, there be advantage: yet it is not free from the risk of loss, and of its producing debts. If, however the stockholder give his assent to the Istidanit, then the thing which the manager may have purchased is participated between him and the stockholder, in the manner of a Shirkat Wajooh, or partnership upon personal credit, † which signifies, where two persons are partners without either stock or labour, and purchase something upon credit, to be paid for at a future time, and so on.

Of the third species of acts in Mozaribat is also the taking of Sifatja, which is a species of Istidanit, and the giving of Sifatja, which resembles a loan.—Sifatja means the delivery of property to another by way of loan, and not by way of trust, in order that that other may deliver it to some friend of his, and the object of it is to avoid the dangers of the road. In the same manner also emancipation, either in exchange for property, or without property in exchange, and contracts of Kitabat, are of the third species of acts in Mozaribat, as not being in the nature of traffic; and the same of gifts, loans, and charities, which are mere gratuitous acts.

A manager is not allowed to contract male

* Anglize.—Desiring to borrow.—In its common acceptation, it signifies contracting debt, on behalf either of one's self or of another.

and female slaves (forming a part of the stock) in marriage to each other.—It is not permitted to a manager, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, to join in marriage male and female slaves which are of the stock of the contract.—It is recorded as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, the he may contract in marriage a female but not a male slave, because the bestowing of a female slave in marriage is in the nature of acquisition; since her dower is obtained from it, and her maintenance annulled.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is, that the bestowing of a female slave in marriage is not in the nature of traffic, and a contract of Mozaribat includes only agency in such things as relate to traffic, whence this is the same as the making a slave Mokatib; or the emancipating him in exchange for property; for in both these cases there is an acquisition of property; but as revealed to traffic relates to traffic, they are not included in a contract of Mozaribat; and so also in the case in question.

Any part of the stock delivered by the manager of the proprietor in the manner of a Bazat, still continues to appertain to the Mozaribat stock.—If the manager deliver any part of the Mozaribat stock to the proprietor as a Bazat, and he make purchase and sale with it, it continues to belong to the Mozaribat stock, in the same manner as before. Zisser says that the Mozaribat is annulled; because the proprietor, in this instance, acts as what is his own, and he is incapable of being the manager's agent in work which he performs with his own property; the proprietor, therefore, on this occasion, may be said to have taken back so much of the Mozaribat stock; whence it is that a contract of Mozaribat is not valid where the labour of the proprietor is stipulated for at the time of making the contract. The argument of our doctors is, that after the Mozaribat stock has been duly delivered to the manager, and taken possession of by him; and the manager has thus acquired a right of transacting with it, the proprietor is fully capable of acting as an agent on behalf of the manager, in transacting with the stock; and as making it over in the way of Bazat amounts to a commission of agency, it follows that (in this view) the proprietor cannot be considered merely as receiving back his stock. It is otherwise where the proprietor's uniting in the management is made a condition of the contract, originally, as this is repugnant to the delivery of the stock to him for the purpose of management, and also to his taking possession of it. It is also otherwise when another person owns the stock belonging to the proprietor in the way of Mozaribat, which is not lawful; because a contract of Mozaribat is a contract of partnership in the profit derived from the stock of the proprietor, and the labour of the manager; and, in the case in question, none of the stock appertains to the manager; whence if this were allowed, it would follow that both the stock and the labour proceed from one party, and this defeats the use of the contract.

Objection.—Making it over as Bazat also defeats the use of a contract of Bazat, as a contract of Bazat signifies the stock being found by one party, and the labour by another; and if, in the case in question, this were admitted, it would follow that both the stock and the labour proceed from one party.

Reply.—Bazat signifies, simply, agency; and as a manager is endowed with a power of transaction, it follows that his delivering the stock, as a Bazat, is a commission of agency, proceeding from him, in regard to a thing concerning which he is empowered.

It is to be observed that, the secondary Mozaribat not being valid, the proprietor's management with the property still remains subject to the orders of the manager; and hence the primary Mozaribat is not annulled.

No part of the stock delivered by the defrayer unless he travel.—If the manager transact his business in his own city, his maintenance does not fall upon the stock. If, however, he travel with it, his provisions and clothing are to be furnished out of the stock; and the same, also, of his conveyance (that is to say, it is also lawful for him to purchase or hire a quadruped to carry him from place to place in the course of stock), for this reason, that a subsistence is due to him on account of his confinement, in the same manner as the subsistence of a Kazee, who, as being in a state of confinement, in the exercise of his public duties, is entitled to a recompense from the public treasury,—or like a wife, who is entitled to subsistence from her husband, because of her being in his custody:—for the manager, so long as he remains in his own city, resides there merely as it is his home, and not on account of the Mozaribat in particular; but upon his traveling he becomes confined on behalf of the Mozaribat, and is therefore entitled to subsistence out of the Mozaribat stock.—It is otherwise with an hireling, who is not entitled to any subsistence although he travel because he is already entitled to a compensation, namely, his wages, which are certain, and for which, if he were subsisted out of the stock entrusted to his management, there would be no absolute necessity:—whereas a manager, on the contrary, is not entitled to anything but his share of the profit: but profit is uncertain (in other words, it is possible that no profit may be gained; and it is also possible that he profit may be gained); if, therefore, the manager were obliged to furnish his own maintenance, he might be a loser.—It is otherwise, also, in a case of invalid Mozaribat, because the manager, in such case, is entitled to wages: and it is likewise different from a case of Bazat, since a person who undertakes the management of a bazat gives his labour gratuitously, and is therefore not entitled to a subsistence.—It is to be observed that if, on the manager's return into his own city, there remain any victuals or clothing in his hands, he must return them into the Mozaribat stock, since his right to those articles no longer remains, because he has returned into his own city.

To a distance beyond a day's journey from the usual place of his abode.—If a manager go forth from his place of residence to a distance short of what constitutes a journey, his maintenance does not fall upon the stock; for where he goes only to such a distance as that, if he set off in the morning, he may be the evening return and pass the night at home with his family, he is as any other merchant of the place.—If however, he go to such a distance as not to be able to return home the same evening, his maintenance is due from the stock, since he is absent upon the business of the Mozaribat.—Nifka, or subsistence, signifies such things as are expended in the supply of our daily wants, such as meet, drink, and clothing; and among these things, also, is the hire of a washerman, and other servants, and the maintenance of a quadruped for riding; and oil for anointing, where that is commonly used, as in Mecca.—It behoves the manager not to expend any of those articles of subsistence in a degree beyond what is customary; insomuch that, if he exceed in his expenses what is customary among merchants, he is responsible for the excess. Medicine is furnished by a manager, however he must be furnished at his own cost, according to the Zahir Rawayet. It is recorded from Haneefa, that medicine is included in the subsistence: because this is taken for the preservation of health; and as it is impossible that he should engage in commercial transactions unless he be in health, it consequently partakes of the nature of subsistence.—The reason for what is said in the Zahir Rawayet upon this point is, that the necessity of subsistence is known and certain. Medicine, on the contrary, is necessary only in case of supernumerary sickness; and as sickness sometimes occurs, and sometimes does not occur, it follows that medicine is not part of maintenance; and hence it is that, although a wife's maintenance must be furnished by her husband, yet she finds herself in medicine at her own expense.

And it is defrayed out of the profit, not out of the stock.—When a profit is gained, the proprietor first takes the whole capital stock, and then the remainder is divided between both the parties according to stipulation; the subsistence of the manager, therefore, is taken from the profit, and not from the capital, although the manager should have expended out of the capital for his subsistence.

All expenses incident to the sale of stock must be defrayed out of that.—If the manager sell goods and effects in the way of traffic, he must charge the expense attending those goods and effects (such as portage and brokerage) to the account of the capital stock;—but he is not to charge the capital with what he expends upon himself for subsistence; for this reason, that it is the custom of merchants to charge the former to the account of their capital, but not the latter; and also, because the former enhances the value of the goods, but not the latter.

All expenses upon articles purchased which do not substantially add to the article, are voluntary on the part of the manager.—If a manager have in his hands one thousand dirms, and lay them all out in the purchase of cloth, and expend one hundred dirms of his own property in bleeding and porterage and the proprietor of the stock had desired him to act according to his own discretion, in this case the manager is accounted to have acted voluntarily, because as he hereby subjects the proprietor of the stock to a debt, it follows that the proprietor's instruction to him to act according to his own discretion does not include a transaction of this nature, as was formerly explained.—If, on the other hand, the manager, in the case in question, expend one hundred dirms of his own in dying the cloth red, he is a partner in the excess occasioned by the dying, because the colour is a substantial property existing in the cloth: hence, when the cloth is sold, the manager receives his share in respect to the colour; and also his proportion of the cloth, as undyed, according to the contract of Mozaribat: better therefore is it to dye the cloth and porterage, as that does not occasion any additional substantial property to exist in the cloth;—whence it is that if any usurper bleach cloth which he has seized, without the consent of the owner, and the value be enhanced by the bleaching, yet the proprietor is at liberty to take back the cloth without making him any compensation;—whereas, if the usurper dye the cloth red or yellow, the owner is not at liberty to take it back without making a compensation, but has it at his option either to take the cloth, allowing the usurper the difference occasioned in the value by dying,—or to take an indemnification for the value of the cloth as it stood at the time of dying, and suffer it to remain with the usurper. It is to be observed that, on the manager becoming a partner in the cloth in consequence of the dying, he is not responsible for any things, because the proprietor's direction to him, "to act according to his own discretion," comprehends a liberty to manager to mix his own property with the Mozaribat stock; as was before mentioned.

Case of loss of the stock after a profit having been acquired and a debt incurred upon it.—If a manager, having one thousand dirms in his hands, under an agreement of half the profit, purchase linen (for instance) to the amount of one thousand dirms, and sell the same for two thousand dirms, and again purchase a slave for two thousand,—and should n't pay the price of either article (that is, of the cloth, or of the slave) until such time as these two thousand dirms perish in his hands, in this case the proprietor of the stock must make satisfaction to the amount of fifteen hundred dirms, and the manager to the amount of five hundred; and one fourth of the slave appertains to the manager, three fourths to the Mozaribat stock.—The compiler of the Hidayat remarks that what is here said is the necessary result of the case; for the whole of the price is incumbent upon the manager (since he is the contracting party in the purchase); but yet he is entitled to call upon the proprietor of the stock for fifteen hundred dirms; the proprietor, therefore, is responsible for fifteen hundred (at the end of the transaction, not at the beginning of it), for this reason, that when the Mozaribat stock was converted into cash, a profit appeared upon it, of which five hundred dirms go to the manager; consequently, upon his purchasing the slave for two thousand he purchases one fourth of the slave on his own account, and three fourths on account of the Mozaribat (according to the division of the two thousand); and upon the two thousand perish, the price of the slave is due from him, as it is he who made the bargain for him; but he is entitled to call upon the proprietor for three fourths of the price, because he acts as his agent in the purchase thereof. The manager's share, which is one fourth, is detached from the Mozaribat stock for that is secured (that is to say, is incumbent upon the manager to give one fourth of the price to the sellers [of the slave and cloth] after the destruction of the stock); but the Mozaribat stock is a trust; and a property secured is inconsistent with a property in trust: it is therefore indispensable that the manager's share be so detached; and three fourths of the slave continue in the Mozaribat stock, for in that there is nothing inconsistent with Mozaribat; consequently the capital then becomes two thousand, because the proprietor of the stock has given to the manager, in the first instance, one thousand dirms, and fifteen hundred in the second instance.—The slave, however, cannot be sold, so as to make any profit of him, for less than two thousand because he has been bought for two thousand. —With respect to what is above said, that 'the fourth of the slave is detached, and the other three fourths continue in the Mozaribat stock,'—the use of this appears where the manager sells the slave (suppose) for four thousand dirms,—for in this case the capital, which is two thousand five hundred dirms, must be deducted from that proportion which appertains to the Mozaribat, which is three thousand dirms,—and consequently a profit of five hundred remains to be shared between the parties.

Cases of sale by the employer to the

manager.—If the manager be possessed of one thousand dirms, and the proprietor of the stock purchase a slave for five hundred dirms, and sell him to the manager in return for the capital stock (namely, one thousand dirms) he [the manager] is considered as selling him [the slave] by a Morabihat sale at the rate of five hundred dirms:* for such sale is lawful, because of the difference of views in it,—since the view of the proprietor of the stock is to obtain one thousand dirms, at the same time securing the continuance of the Mozaribat contract; and the view of the manager is to obtain possession of the slave.—The sale, therefore is lawful, that the ends of both parties may be answered, although it be a sale of property belonging to the party for property belonging to the party.—There is however, in this sale, a semblance of illegality; since the slave does not, in fact, pass out of the property of the proprietor of the stock; and a semblance is connected with a reality in any matter concerning which caution is requisite. —Now caution is requisite in a Morabihat sale, since the points on which it turns are confidence, and a caution against the semblance of deceit: and accordingly in the Morabihat sale, regard is had to the lowest price, which is five hundred dirms.

Or by the manager to the employer.—If a manager, possessed of stock to the amount of one thousand dirms purchase a slave for those thousand, and sell him to his employer for two hundred, he is considered as selling him, by a Morabihat sale, for eleven hundred, since the contract in question is considered, with respect to one half of the profit (which is the proprietor's share) as non-existent:—as was formerly explained in treating of Morabihat sales.

Cases of a slave purchased by the manager and who is afterwards quality of homicide.—If a manager be possessed of one thousand dirms, under a condition of half the profit, and with these thousand purchase a slave valued at two thousand, and the said one thousand is afterwards paid to the person, three fourths of the atonement rest upon the proprietor of the stock and one fourth upon the manager;—because, at the atonement is an expense attendant upon the right of property, the proportions of it are, consequently, according to the proportions of right of property. Now the property is here held between the parties in four lots, three of which appertain to the proprietor of the stock, and one to the manager; because, upon the capital being resolved into one specific article, the profit (namely, one thousand dirms) becomes evident; and that is between two in equal shares; and one thousand (the original capital) appertains to the proprietor of the stock, as the value of the slave is two thousand. Upon each party paying his proportion of the atonement the slave becomes excluded from the Mozaribat stock:—

In disputes respecting the acquisition of profit upon the existing stock, the assertion of the manager is to be credited.—If the manager have two thousand dirms in his hands, and say to the stock-proprietor, "You entrusted me with one thousand, and one thousand has accrued as profit," and the proprietor reply, "I entrusted you with two thousand,"—the assertion of the manager is to be credited.—Haneefa was at first of opinion that the assertion of the proprietor should be regarded: and such is the doctrine of Ziffer; because the manager here appears as a plaintiff, claiming a partnership in the profit,—and the proprietor as a defendant, denying his claim; and the assertion of the defendant is to be credited.—Haneefa, however, afterwards retracted, this opinion, and admitted that the assertion of the manager

the manager's share in him; because, in the present instance, his responsibility with respect to that share operates upon him, and hence that share is no longer as a deposit with him; and Mozaribat stock is a deposit, as was formerly explained:—and the proprietor's share; because, upon the magistrate decreeing the atonement to be divided between both, the slave also becomes divided between them; and a contract of Mozaribat is dissolved by a participation in the stock:—it is otherwise in the case exemplified in the beginning of this section (where two thousand dirms perish in the manager's hands), for three the three fourths which form the share of the proprietor of the stock do not become excluded from the Mozaribat contract.—The difference between that case and the case now under consideration, exists in three shapes. I. In the former case the responsibility of traffic only is incumbent; and responsibility of traffic is not repugnant to Mozaribat, since Mozaribat itself is a branch of traffic:—whereas, in the case in question, responsibility for offence is incumbent; and responsibility for offence is not a branch of traffic.—II. In the former case the whole price is incumbent upon the manager, although he have a right to revert upon the proprietor of the stock;—in that instance, therefore, there is no necessity for division.—III. The slave, in the instance of offence, escapes, as it were, from the property of both parties, in consequence his offence, and their paying an atonement for him, is, as it were, a purchase of him de novo. He, therefore, no longer appertains to the Mozaribat stock, but is held between the parties in four lots, performing service to the manager one day, and to the stock proprietor three days, alternately—contrary to the former case.

The manager bargaining for an article, and then losing the stock, must have recourse to his employer for another stock, to enable him to fulfil his engagement.—Is a manager be possessed of a thousand dirms, and thence purchase a slave, but neglect paying the price to the seller, and the thousand dirms perish in his hands, the proprietor of the stock must, in this case, make over another thousand to the manager, and the Mozaribat stock is then two thousand dirms.—The reason of this is, that as the stock is merely a deposit with the manager, he therefore cannot be considered as having duly received the price in virtue of his seisin [of the one thousand dirms], since a receipt in virtue of seisin is not established unless it involve responsibility—Now, as a due receipt of the price, by the manager, is not established, it follows that he is entitled, even repeatedly, to take the price from the stock proprietor, that is to say, if he take the price from the proprietor, and it be again lost in his hand, he may again take the price from him; and so on, repeatedly, until the seller's demand be satisfied;—and the whole of what the proprietor thus makes over to the manager becomes stock.—It is otherwise in the case of
must be credited; because the dispute here turns upon the amount received; and concerning that the assertion of the receiver must be credited, whether he be merely a trustee, or otherwise, since he best knows what he was received.

But in disputes concerning the proportions of profit, that of the proprietor.—If the parties dispute, not only concerning the amount of the stock, but also concerning the proportion of the profit,—the manager affirming it to be: between them in equal shares, and the proprietor asserting it to be in three lots, two for himself and one for the manager, the assertion of the proprietor is to be credited; because the manager here claims profit in virtue of a condition, which condition operates to the prejudice of the proprietor; his assertion, therefore, is to be credited.—But if either of the two produce evidence, his declaration must be admitted as evidence of his positive profit.

As also in disputes concerning the nature of the agreement under which the stock was entrusted to the manager,—If a person, having one thousand dirms in his hand, say,
"such a person entrusted me with these in the way of Mozaribat, under a condition of half the profit,"—and the person alluded to say, "I gave him the one thousand dirms as Bazat," the declaration of the proprietor is to be credited; because the manager is plaintiff in this instance since he either claims from the proprietor a recompense for his service, or alleges a condition to his prejudice, or a partnership in the profit,—all of which the proprietor denies.

If a person, having in his hands one thousand dirms, the property of another, asserts that "those thousand had been lost to him by that other," and the other asserts that "he entrusted them with these in the manner of Bazat, deposit or Mozaribat." the assertion of the proprietor is to be credited on the one hand, or evidence adduced by the person in question on the other;—because he asserts his having obtained possession of the sum in dispute, by a loan; which the proprietor denies.

If the proprietor assert a restriction, the denial of the manager is credited.—If the proprietor of the stock advance an allegation, against the manager, of restriction to one mode of traffic. affirming, for instance, that "he had directed him to trade in cloth and in no other article,"—the assertion of the manager, upon oath, must be credited,— for, as universality is the original thing in a contract of Mozaribat, and restriction cannot be imposed in it but by particular stipulation, it follows that the assertion of the proprietor, however, upon the original thing must be credited. It is otherwise in agency, for in that restriction is the original thing.

But if each allege a different restriction, the allegation of the proprietor is credited.—
If the proprietor alleges a restriction to one particular mode of traffic, and the manager allege a restriction to another particular mode, the assertion of the proprietor must be credited; for here both parties agree in the contract being restricted, and the propriator's admission, in this particular, is pleaded against him.—His assertion, therefore, is to be credited on the one hand; or evidence adduced by the manager, on the other;—for the manager stands in need of evidence to disprove his responsibility; but the proprietor does not stand in need of evidence.

In disputes concerning restriction to time,
The evidence which proves the latest date is preferred — If the proprietor allege a restriction in point of time, and produce evidence thereof, and the manager allege a restriction to another time, and produce evidence therefore,—the proprietor, on his part, asserting that "he entrusted him [the manager] with one thousand dirms, in the manner of Mozaribat, for the purpose of purchasing what in the month of Ramzan" (producing evidence in support of his allegation),—and the manager, that "he [the proprietor] gave him one thousand dirms for the purpose of purchasing wheat in the month of Shawal" (producing evidence in support of his allegation),—the evidence which tends to prove the latest date must be preferred; because the condition last stipulated annuls the condition first stipulated.

BOOK XXVIII,

OF WIDDA, OR DEPOSITS.

Definition of the terms used in deposit.—
Widda, in the language of the law, signifies a person empowering another to keep his property. — The proprietor of the thing is styled Modee, or the depositor;—the person so empowered, the Moda or trustee;—and the property so left with another, for the purpose of keeping it, is styled Widdieeyat, because Widda literally means to leave, and the thing in question is left with the Moda or trustee.

A trustee is not responsible for a deposit unless the transgress with respect to it.—A deposit remains in the hands of the person who receive charge of it, as a trust,—that is to say, he is not answerable for it. If, therefore, a deposit be lost or destroyed in the trustee's hands, without any transgression on his part, he is not in that case responsible for it; because the prophet has said, 'an honest trustee is not responsible';—and also, because there is a nece-sity, amongst mankind. for deposits; and this necessity could not be answered in case of making trustees responsible, as no one would then accept the

He may keep it himself, or commit the care of it to and of this family.—A trustee may either keep the deposit himself, or commit for that purpose to some one of his family such as his wife his son, his mother, or his father; because it is evident that a trustee does not engage to keep the property of another with more care than he does his own; and he sometimes keeps his own himself, and sometimes commits it to one of his family. Besides, there exists an absolute necessity for committing the trust to his family, since it is neither possible for him to remain always in the house, nor, when he goes out, to carry the deposit with him.—For all those reasons, therefore, the consent of the proprietor is understood to extend to the trustee's committing the deposit to the care of his family.

But if he give charge of it to a stronger he becomes responsible.—But if the trustee should commit the deposit to the charge of any other than a member of his family (as if he were either to hire some person out of his family, for the purpose of keeping it,—or to give it in deposit to some one out of his family), he is then responsible, in as much as there is a difference between the care of different people, and it was his own care, and not that of another, to which the proprietor assented. Besides, a thing does not involve its similar; and hence a trustee is not empowered to constitute another the trustee of the same thing; in the same manner as an agent is not permitted to constitute another agent. (By the term family, in this place, is to be understood all such as live with the trustee, or whose maintenance is incumbent upon him, or his upon them, as a wife or adult son.)

And so also, if he lodge it in a place of custody belonging to another.—If a trustee lodge the deposit in a place of custody belonging to another, he becomes responsible for it; becomes the lodging it in another's place of custody is, in effect, depositing it with that other.—It is otherwise, however, if he hire the said place; for in that instance his lodging it there is considered in the same light with his keeping it himself, and therefore does not induce responsibility.

He is not made responsible by putting it out of his own possession with a view to the immediate preservation of it.—If the house of a trustee take fire; and he deliver the deposit to his neighbour,—or if, being in a boat on the point of sinking, he throw the deposit into another boat,—and it in either case be lost he is not responsible, since he acted only for the preservation of it, and consequently according to the consent of the proprietor. But the assertion of the trustee, in such cases, is not to be credited unless supported by witnesses, since, upon the establishment of a cause of responsibility, he pleads the existence of a necessity, which invalidates the responsibility, and the case is therefore the same as if he were to plead that the proprietor had empowered him to consign the deposit to another.

He becomes responsible on neglecting to deliver it on demand.—If the proprietor of the deposit demands it from the trustee, and he neglect delivering it to him, being at the same time capable of such delivery, he becomes in that case responsible for it, since his neglecting or refusing to deliver it, under a capacity to do so, is a transgression.—The ground of this is, that the demand of the proprietor clearly indicates his dissent from the trustee's retaining possession any longer, and is therefore a dismissal of him from the trust.—Hence the trustee is responsible, because of his retaining possession after such dissent.

If he mix it inseparably with his own property, he must make the proprietor a compensation.—If the trustee mix the deposit with his own property, in such a manner that a separation becomes difficult, he must in that case make an adequate compensation, and the proprietor (according to HanEEee) has not the option of sharing the mixed property, whether the mixture be of a homogenous nature (such as milk with milk, what with wheat, or white dirms with white dirms), or of a heterogeneous nature (such as oil of sesame with oil of olives, or wheat with barley). The two disciples allege that where the mixture is of homogenous articles not of a liquid nature (such as white dirms with white dirms, or wheat with wheat), the proprietor of the deposit has the option either of becoming a sharer with the trustee, or of taking a compensation for the value; because although it be impossible in such a case, for the proprietor to receive his right with respect to appearance; still it is possible for him to receive it with respect to reality (that is in effect), by making a division, since, in a mixture of weight, or measurement, capacity, a delivery by division is equivalent to a delivery of the actual article, according to all authorities.—Such, therefore, being the case, it appears that mixture, in the instance in question, is a destruction in anther respect; and consequently, that the proprietor of the articles placed in deposit has the option either of taking a compensation on the principle of the mixture being a destruction, or of becoming a sharer (if he please) on the principle of its not being a destruction.—The argument of HanEEee is that mixture is in every respect a destruction, because of its being an action which occasions an impossibility of returning the thing to the proprietor in its original substance.—In regard to what the two disciples advance, that "it is possible for the proprietor to receive his right with respect to reality, by means of a division," it is answered that the proprietor cannot attain his actual right by means of division.

Besides, division has been instituted.

*Arab, Makan Mohirrez; meaning a hest, or other place of security. (See Hirz,) from necessity, merely as a mode of advantage in cases of partnership. Division, therefore, is merely an effect of partnership, and is incapable of being a cause of it, for otherwise the principal would become secondary, and the secondary principal. As a result of this disagreement it is that, if the proprietor should except the trustee, where he makes the mixture, by saying to him "I exempt you from the compensation due by you on account of the mixture;" in that case, according to Haneefa, his right becomes entirely cancelled, since (agreeably to his tenets) the proprietor's right is limited to the compensation, which he expressly forgave; where as, according to the two disciples, the proprietor's right of option to a compensation ceases in consequence of such exemption, and resolves itself into a share in the mixed property; because although by the option the right of option be destroyed, still his actual property is not destroyed.—It is to be observed that the mixture of one liquid with a different liquid (such as of oil of Sesame with oil of olives) destroys the right of the proprietor to a participation in the mixed property, and fixes and determines it to a compensation, according to all our doctors, as such a mixture is a destruction with respect both to appearance and reality; since a division is in this instance impracticable, because of the difference of species. Of the same class, according to the Rawayet Sahib, are all cases of an admixture of different articles, wherein the separation is difficult, as in the mixture of wheat with barley. In cases where the separation requires a process, or is attended with some difficulty (such as if dirms should be melted and incorporated with others), the depositor's right to the substance ceases, and he is entitled to a compensation, according to Haneefa, as before stated. Aboo Yoosaf holds that in this case the smaller is subordinate to the greater (for, according to his tenets, superiority must be regarded), and that therefore, the person who possessed the largest share of the property becomes proprietor of the whole, and liable to compensate to the other for the value of his quantum. Mohammed, on the other hand, maintains that the proprietor of the deposit becomes a sharer with the other in either case, because according to his tenets, species cannot acquire a superiority over the same species, as has been already explained in treating of forage.

If the mixture be occasioned by accident, the proprietor becomes a proportionate sharer in the whole. If a deposit be mixed with the property of the trustee, not by any act of the latter, but by accident (as if a bag containing the deposit, and another containing property of the trustee, should both be torn, and the contents mingled together), in that case the trustee becomes a sharer in the property with the depositor, and is not responsible for a compensation, since he did not commit any act inducing responsibility —They therefore become partners in the whole according to all our doctors.

If the trustee expend a part, and supply the deficiency, by mixture, from his own property, he is responsible for the whole. If a trustee expend part of the deposit, and that produce a similar to what he had expended, and mix it with the remaining part, in such a manner that a separation is difficult, he is, in that case, responsible for the whole of the deposit; because the part expended is a debt due by him, which he cannot otherwise discharge than in the presence of the owner. When, therefore, he mixes his own property with the remainder of the deposit, he in fact destroys that remainder; as was before explained.

In cases of transgression respect to the deposit, the trustee is responsible so long as the transgression continues. If a trustee transgress with respect to the deposit, by converting it to his own use (as if, being a quadruped, he should ride upon it), or, being a gown, he should wear it, or, being a slave, he should use his services), or by committing it to the care of a stranger, and he afterwards refrain from the use of it, or receive it back from the stranger, its responsibility thereupon ceases. Shafei maintains that he does not become exempted from responsibility; because the contract of deposit ceases and determines immediately on the extenuation of responsibility, since responsibility and deposit are irreconcilable. If the trustee, therefore, in such a case, cannot be exempted until he made actual restitution to the proprietor. The argument of our doctors is, that the order of the depositor to preserve the property continued to operate, as it was absolute, and not restricted to any particular time; it being understood, in this case, that the proprietor had generally desired him to preserve the property, without restricting such desire to any particular time. As, therefore, the order is still in force, it follows that the trustee, after abstaining from the transgression, becomes again trustee, because the object of the contract was preserved. The contract, moreover, was suspended in its effect merely from the necessity of establishing a branch of it: when, therefore, the branch is removed, the contract becomes revived in its effect; in the same manner as where a person hires another to guard his property for a month, and the person so hired remits his guard for part of the month. In which case he is entitled to wages in proportion to the number of days he did watch. In answer to Shafei's assertion, that "the trustee cannot be exempted from responsibility until he made actual restitution to the proprietor," it is to be observed, that, as the original order still continues in force, and the trustee ceases from his transgression, a recovery of the deposit is obtained into the possession of the trustee, who is the substitute or confidant of the proprietor; and as this recovery is equivalent to a restitution of it to the proprietor.
If the trustee deny the deposit, upon demand, he is responsible in case of the loss of it.—If the proprietor of the deposit demand it of the trustee, and the trustee deny the deposit, and it be afterwards lost, the trustee is in that case responsible; because, as the depositor, in making the demand, dismisses the trustee from his charge, if follows that the trustee, in retaining the deposit after such demand, is an usurper, and is consequently responsible.—If, also, after the denial, the trustee should acknowledge the deposit, still he does not thereby become exempted from responsibility, because the contract had been previously done away, inasmuch as the demand of restitution by the depositor was a dissolution on his part, and the denial of the deposit was a dissolution on the part of the trustee; in the same manner as the denial of agency by the agent, or of sale either by the buyer or seller, is a dissolution on their part.—Now when a dissolution takes place on both sides, the contract to which it relates is done away; and cannot afterwards be revived, unless by a new formation, which does not appear in the case in question.—In this case, therefore, a recovery into the possession of the proprietor's substitute cannot be understood.

But not if the denial be made to a stranger.—If the trustee deny the deposit to some other than the proprietor, he is not responsible, according to Aboo Yoosaf (contrary to the opinion of Ziffer), because denial to any other than the proprietor may be for the sake of preservation. The trustee, moreover, is not competent to his own disposal, unless in the presence of the depositor, or unless the depositor claim his property from him. The order for keeping the property, therefore, still continues in force —contrary to where the denial is made to the depositor.

A trustee is at liberty to carry the deposit with him upon a journey.—A TRUSTEE is at liberty, according to Haneefa, to carry the deposit with him when he travels, although carriage and other expenses be thereby incurred.—The two disciples maintain that that is not permitted to him where carriage or other expense is incurred. Shafei, on the other hand, maintains that it is not allowable in either case, because he considers an order to keep the article in the common acceptance of keeping, namely, keeping in cities; in the same manner as where a person hires another for the preservation of his goods for a stated time, in which case the person hired is not at liberty to travel with the goods,—or, if he should do so, becomes responsible for them. The argument of Haneefa is, that the proprietor's commission for preservation is absolute and unconfined; and that a plain is a place of preservation, provided the road be secured; on which principle it is permitted to a father or guardian to travel with the property of their ward. The reasoning of the two disciples is that, in case of travelling, where carriage for the deposit is necessary, the expense of it must fall on the depositor; and as it is probable he may not assent to this, his commission for keeping the article must, in such a case, be considered as limited to a city.—The answer to this is that the circumstance of the expense of removal falling upon the proprietor is of no moment, as it may be a consequence of an attention to the preservation of his property, and the fulfilment of his commission.—The answer to Shafei is that although are articles chi fly abound in cities, still the keeping or preserving of them is not particularly confined to cities, but extends alike to cities and to plains; since the inhabitants of plains must necessarily keep their property in plains.—Besides, a removal of the deposit may sometimes be a desirable object to the proprietor: as where it is made from a city in danger to one in security; or to the particular city in which the proprietor dwells,—Now as the keeping of an article is not, in its common acceptance, limited to cities, it follows that a commission for keeping is not limited to any particular city. It is otherwise in a case of hire for keeping, as hire is a contract of exchange, which requires a delivery of the subject of the contract (namely, keeping or safeguarding) in the place where the contract is executed.

Provided the contract be absolute, the road safe, and the journey necessary.—It is to be observed that this case proceeds on a supposition of the contract being absolute, the road which the trustee travels safe, and the journey necessary: for, if the road be dangerous, or the journey not necessary, the trustee is responsible, according to all our doctors.

If, also, the journey be not necessary, and the trustee travel with all his family, he is not responsible: but if the journey not being necessary, he should leave his family behind, he becomes responsible, as in that case it was his duty to have left the deposit with his family.

Unless this be expressly prohibited.—If the proprietor expressly prohibit the trustee from carrying the deposit out of the city, and he nevertheless carry it out, he becomes in that case responsible for it, as the restriction so imposed is a valid one sitce keeping the article in a city is a most of our doctors.

In case of a deposit by two persons, the trustee cannot deliver to either his share, but in presence of the other.—In two men deposit something jointly with another, and one of them afterwards appear, and demand his share of the deposit, the trustee must not give it, unless in the presence of the other depositor, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that the trustee must deliver the claimant his share;—and the same is also said in Kadooree's compendium.
In the Jama Sagheer is said that if three men deposit one thousand dirms with a particular person, and two of them afterwards disappear, the third is not entitled to take his share, according to Haneefa; but, according to the two disciples, he is entitled to take it. (It is to be observed that this difference of opinion relate solely to articles of weight, or measurement of capacity.)
The argument of the two disciples is this, the depositor claims his own share only, and is therefore entitled to receive it, where it is attainable, in the same manner as a copartner in a debt. The argument of Haneefa is that the person present, in claiming his share, necessarily claim half of the absentee's since he claim a separate and determinate portion, whereas his right is indeed with another, it is to be rendered separate and determinate only by means of division; but the trustee has no power to make a division; and accordingly, if he were to deliver the present claimant his share, it is not account a division by any of our doctors.—It is otherwise in a case of a participated debt, because, in that instance, the present creditor claims from the debtor a delivery of his right, which may be made without a division, since debt is discharged by means of similars.—With respect to what is advance by the two disciples that 'the depositor is entitled to receive his share where it is attainable,' it may be answered, that it does not from hence follow that the trustee is liable to any corpulsion on that head:—in the same manner as where, for instance, a person deposits one thousand dirms with another, who is indebted in one thousand dirms to a third person; in which case, although it be lawful for the creditor to take his due wherever it be attainable, still it is not lawful for the trustee to pay him with the said deposit.

Two persons receiving a divisible article in trust, must each keep on half.—If a person deposit, with two men, an article capable of division, it is not lawful for either of these trustees to commit such article entirely to the other, but they must divide it, and retain each an half; whereas, if the article were incapable of division, either might lawfully keep it entirely with the consent of the other. This is the doctrine of Haneefa; and such also is the law, according to him, in a case of two pawnees, to whom a thing incapable or a division is jointly pledged; for in that case either of them, with the consent of the other, may retain sole possession of it;—and so likewise, in any case of two agents empowered to buy anything, and entrusted jointly with the purchase money, for in that case, also, one of the parties may retain the whole of the money with the consent of the other.—The two disciples allege that it is lawful for one of the parties to take entire charge, with the consent of the other, in either case; for as the proprietor has manifested his confidence in the integrity of both, it, is therefore lawful for either to deliver the deposit to the other without being responsible, in the same manner as where the deposit is incapable of division.—The argument of Haneefa is, that the proprietor has given his approbation to the charge being united in two, but not to its being vested entirely in one; because the act of keeping, where it relates to a divisible article applies only to a part of the article, not to the whole.
—The delivery therefore, of the whole by either party to the other is without the proprietor's consent; and the party who makes such delivery is accordingly responsible.—
But the receiver is not responsible, since (according to his tenets) the trustee of a trustee is not subject to responsibility. It is otherwise where the deposit is incapable of division; for then, if the deposit is deposited with two persons, it is impossible for them jointly to be concerned in the case of it every hour of the day and night, unless by turns; and the approbation of the propriety, with respect to the whole, is therefore of necessity construed to extend to either of them in particular.

Restrictions are not regarded where they are repugnant to custom or convenience.—If the proprietor of a deposit say to the trustee 'deliver not the deposit to your wife,' and he nevertheless deliver it to his wife, he becomes in that case responsible. It is, recorded, in the Jama Sagheer, that if the proprietor prohibit the trustee from delivering the deposit to any one of his family and he nevertheless deliver it to one of his family from any unavoidable necessity, he is not made responsible by having so delivered it;
—as if, for instance, the deposit be an animal, and the proprietor prohibit the trustee from giving charge of it to his slave;—or if, being of the description of things usually committed to the care of women, he should prohibit him from delivering it to any of his wives. The compiler of the Hidayah remarks, that as the former of these reports is absolute, and that quoted from the Jama Sagheer restricted, the first ought also to be understood as restricted; for this reason, that it is impossible to manage the conservation with an observance of the condition, which is therefore nugatory. But if the trustee should not act from necessity, as if, having two wives, or two slaves, the proprietor should prohibit the delivery to one particular wife, or to one particular slave, and the trustee nevertheless commit the deposit to the particular wife or slave, so prohibited, he becomes responsible, since the condition in this case is useful, as same of the family may not be trustworthy: and, as the conservation of the deposit is not incompatible with the observance of the condition, it is therefore valid.

Or where they relate to the particular apartment in a house.—If the proprietor say to the trustee. "Keep the deposit in this apartment of the Sarai," and he keep it in another apartment of the same Sarai, in that case he is not responsible for it; because the condition was useless, inasmuch as there is no difference with respect to keeping in different apartments of the same Sarai:—(If, on the contrary, he were to keep it in a different Serai, he is responsible; because, as a difference of Serais occasions a difference in the keeping, the condition is therefore of use, and the restriction is consequently valid.)—If, however, there be an evident difference between two different apartments of the same Serai (as if, the Serai being extensive, the apartment prohibited should be full of holes and crevices), the condition so made is valid, and the trustee becomes responsible in case of preserving it in that apartment.

Where the deposit is transferred to a second trustee, and lost, the proprietor receives his composition from the original trustee.—If a person deposit something with another, and that other again deposit it with a third person, and it be lost in this person's hands, in that case the proprietor of the deposit, according to Haneefa, must take a compensation from the first trustee, not from the second. The two disciples allege that the proprietor is at liberty to take the compensation either from the first or second trustee; and that, in case he should take it from the first, he [the first] is not empowered to take an indemnification from the second; but that, in case of his taking it from the second, the second is then entitled to take an indemnification from the first.—The reasoning of the two disciples is that the second trustee has received the deposit from the hands of a person who has himself become responsible, and is therefore responsible;—in the same manner as the trustee of an usurper;—that is to say, if an usurper delivers any goods to any person, the goods he has usurped, and they be lost in the trustee's hands, the proprietor is at liberty to take a compensation either from the usurper or the trustee; and so also in the case in question.—The ground of this is, that the proprietor of the deposit not having given his approbation to the second deposit; the first trustee was guilty of a transgression; and the second trustee was also guilty of a transgression in having received it without the consent of the proprietor. The proprietor, therefore, has the option of taking a compensation from either.—If, however, he take the compensation from the first trustee, he [the first trustee] is not in that case entitled to indemnify himself from the second; because, upon paying the compensation, he becomes proprietor, which constitutes the second a legal trustee; and a legal trustee is not responsible for the deposit.—If, on the contrary, the proprietor take the compensation from the second trustee, he [the second] is in that case entitled to an indemnification from the first; because, as not being a legal trustee, he must be considered merely as an agent for conservation on behalf of the original trustee; and as such he is entitled to an indemnification for whatever losses he may sustain, connected with the agency.—The reasoning of Haneefa is, that the second trustee received the article from the hands of a trustee, and not of a responsible person; because the first trustee does not become responsible until the thing be separated from the second trustee; since so long as it is in existence with him, the wisdom and judgment of the first trustee are considered to be, as it were, extant and at hand with regard to it.—The proprietor, moreover, is supposed assenting to any mode of keeping his property which may be agreeable to the second trustee; and as that still continues to be exerted, it follows that no transgression whatever has as yet taken place.—But, upon the article being lost by the second trustee, the first trustee it held to abandon the charge he had undertaken, and is therefore responsible. The second trustee, on the other hand, continues in his original predicament; that is, his seisin is a seisin of trust in the end, in the same manner as it was at the beginning; and as he is not found in any transgression, he therefore is not responsible for the deposit;—in the same manner as where the wind blows a gown near to any person, and it is after yards destroyed,—in which case that person is not responsible.

Case of claim advanced by two persons to a sum of money in the possession of a third.—If two persons should separately claim a thousand dirms in the possession of a third; each asserting that he had deposited them with him; and the possessor deny their claims, but refuse to take an oath to that effect, the thousand dirms must, in that case, be divided between the two claimants, and the defendant remains answerable to them for one thousand more.—The reason of this is, that the claim of each several claimant is valid, as the claim of each has the probability of truth.—Hence each is entitled to exact an oath from the defendant, who, on his part, is required to make a separate deposition with respect to each, as the right of each is distinct. The Kazee, in administering the oaths, may lawfully being with either, since it is impossible to administer both at the same time, and neither has ground of preference over the other.—If, however, a contention should take place between the claimants on this point, the die must be thrown in order to satisfy them, and to remove any suspicion of partiality on the part of the Kazee.—If he then take an oath in denial of the claim of one, let another oath be administered to him in denial of the second's claim; and if he thus made oath, denying the claims of both, nothing is due

from him, for want of proof. — If he should refuse to take the second oath, a decree must be passed in favour of the second claimant, since the proof is established. — If, on the contrary, he refuse to take the first oath, a decree must be passed in favour of the first claimant, but an oath must be tendered to him with regard to the claim of the second. — It were otherwise if, at the time of refusing, he were to make an acknowledgment in favour of the first; for in that case a decree would immediately pass; since acknowledgment is proof and a cause of property in itself; whereas a refusal to take an oath is neither proof: nor a cause of property, unless in conjunction with the decree of the Kazee. It is therefore lawful for the Kazee, in such a case, to suspend his decree until he shall have tendered the second oath, that he may have appraisement of the full extent to which his decree is to go: and if the defendant refuse to take the second oath also, the Kazee must then pass a decree equally in favour of both; because neither party has a superiority over the other in point of proof; and no regard whatever is paid to priority of refusal [to swear], since the two refusals do not constitute proof separately, but together and at one period, namely, at the period of the decree of the Kazee; — and as, if both had adduced evidence, no superiority would have been given to either evidence on the ground or priority, the defendant must give acknowledgment, and the defendant must also give a compensation of another thousand dirms to the claimants, since in paying them the one thousand which was present he only pays each half his due. — supposing that the Kazee, in consequence of a refusal to take the first oath, should immediately pass a decree in favour of the first claimant, without waiting to tender an oath with respect to the claim of the other, in this case Imam Alee Yzadee, in this commentary, upon the Jama Sagheer, says that an oath must be tendered with regard to the second; — and if the defendant refuse to take it, a decree must then be passed jointly, in favour of both claimants, in an equal degree; because the decree in favour of the first claimant was not destructive of the right of the second, since the precedence, in the administration of the oath, was determined either by the will of the Kazee, or the chance of the die; and neither of these have power to destroy the second’s right. — Khasaf has substituted a slave in this case; that is, instead of one thousand dirms, he has supposed the dispute to relate to a slave, and he maintains that the sentence ought to be executed in favour of the first claimant, since the matter is uncertain, in as much as several of the learned have given it as their opinion, that a decree should be passed in favour of the first without waiting for the second, as a denial to take an oath is equivalent, by implication, to an acknowledgment. — He, moreover, remarks, that the oath with respect to the second claimant must not be administered to this effect, “this slave is not the slave of such as one,” because a refusal on the part of the defendant to take such an oath is of no consequence, after the slave in question had been proved to be the slave of the first claimant, and the decree of the second decree, therefore, must be “there is nothing due from me to this man; not this slave, nor the value of him (which is so much), nor less than the said value.” — He also observes, that it is requisite this oath be administered, according to Mohammed; but not according to Aboo Yoosaf; because if a trustee should make an acknowledgment of the deposit in favour of a certain person, and the thing acknowledged should by a decree of the Kazee be given to another, then, according to Mohammed, the acknowledgment is respon- sible, but not according to Aboo Yoosaf. — Now the case in question is a branch of the case relative to the acknowledgment of a deposit, and consequently the law in the one case is the same as in the other. — The case of acknowledgment here alluded to, is where a person first acknowledges a particular slave to be the property of a particular person, and afterwards denies it, averring that another person had deposited the slave with him, and a decree is passed in favour of the first acknowledge, because of the second acknowledgment being a retraction of the first; — in which case, if he should have given the slave to the first without a decree, he and the Kazee is responsible, because of all our doctors; or if he should have given the slave by the decree of the Kazee, in that case also, according to Mohammed, he is responsible, because he acknowledges his obligation to keep the slave on account of the second and yet he destroys the said slave (that is, so far as relates to the claim of the second), by means of his acknowledgment, and is consequently responsible. — According to Aboo Yoosaf he is not responsible in this instance, because he holds, it is not the immediate act of acknowledgment that destroys the slave, so far as relates to the right of the other, but the giving of him to the other, which is the necessary consequence of the order of the Kazee. Mohammed, on the other hand, maintains that it was he who urged the Kazee to pass that decree; whence he is responsible. Now the reason for assimilating the case in question with this one is, that the acknowledgment in favour of the second claimant, after the first had acquired a right to the thing, is useful to the second claimant, in as much as (the opinion of Mohammed), it induces a responsibility in his favour. Hence in this case, it is requisite, according to Mohammed, to administer an oath to the second claimant, notwithstanding the slave have been proved to be the right of the first, because the object from it is to obtain a refusal to take the oath, which is equivalent to an acknowledgment; and an acknowledgment, even in that case, is useful, as it induces responsibility. According to Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, an oath is not to be administered; because, in this same manner as the defendant is not made responsible by an acknowledgment, so neither is he by a refusal to swear, and hence the tendering of an oath is useless.

BOOK XXIX.

OF AREEAT OR LOANS.

Definition of Areeat, and the nature of the use granted in a loan.—Areeaat, according to our doctors, signifies an investiture with the use of a thing without a return.—The person who so grants the use is termed Mooyer, or the lender; the person receiving it, Moostayir, or the borrower; and the article of which the use is granted, Areeat, or the loan—Koorokhee and Shafei define Areeat to signify, simply, a license to use the property of another because it is settled by the world Ibahit, signifying license or permission. Besides, a specification of the period is not a necessary condition in a loan: but if a loan were an investiture, it would not be valid without such specification, since without a specification of the period the full extent of the use cannot be ascertained, and an investiture with anything uncertain is invalid. A loan, moreover, is rendered null by a recall, whereas if it were an investiture with the use, it could not be rendered null by a recall, in the same manner as a lease cannot be annulled by a recall. Further, the borrowers is not entitled to hire the loan; whereas, if it were an investiture, he might let it out to hire, because whoever is himself proprietor of a thing may constitute another proprietor of it. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the word Areeat indicates an investiture, since it is derived from Areeya, which signifies a grant; and that, accordingly, in forming the contract the expression investiture is used. The use of a thing, moreover, is capable of being property, in the same manner as the actual thing itself; and as investiture with the latter may take place either with or without a return, so also with respect to the former.—With respect to what Koorokhee urges concerning term Ibahit, it may be replied that this term is not uncommonly used to express investiture, since it is used in setting contracts of lease, which are an investiture with respect to the use of the thing hired.—With respect to his conclusion, that "If a loan were an investiture it would not be valid without a specification of its period, because of uncertainty."—it may be replied that uncertainty, in loans, is of no consequence, as if cannot be productive of strife, inasmuch as loans are not binding, whereas the uncertainty cannot be injurious, until it is to be observed that a recall operates in a loan, because a recall is a prohibition with respect to the enjoyment of the use, and after such prohibition the use, of consequence, ceases to be the property of the borrower. The borrower, moreover, is not competent to let out to hire the thing borrowed, since that is attended with an injury to the lender, as will be hereafter explained—It is also to be observed that investiture is made in four different shapes. I. By sale, which is an investiture with substance, for a return.—II. By gift, which is an investiture with substance, without a return.—III. By lease or hire, which is an investiture with the use of a thing for a return.—IV. By loan, which is an investiture with the use of a thing without a return, as before explained; and which is lawful, as being a species of kindness; because God has said "No kindness to each other." and also, because the prophet borrowed a suit of armour from Sifwan.

Forms under which it is granted.—A deed of loan is rendered valid by the lender saying "I have lent you this," as there the purpose is expressly mentioned; or, by his saying, "I have given you to eat of this earth, because such an expression is used to denote a loan metaphorically; for as it is impossible to eat of the earth itself, the meaning is therefore construed "to eat of the produce of it." The lender may resume it at pleasure.—The lender is at liberty to resume the loan whenever he pleases; because the prophet has said "Moonha is liable to be recalled, and a loan must be returned to the proprietor (Moonha is a species of loan, where a person lends another a goat, a cow, or a she-camel, for instance), that he may use their milk;—and also, because the produce, or use of the thing lent, becomes property, particle by particle, merely according as it is brought into being; hence, with respect to such part of the produce as is not yet brought into being, there is merely an investiture, but no seisin; retraction with respect to such part is therefore valid.

The borrower is not responsible for the loss of it, unless he transgress respecting it.—A loan is a trust. If, therefore, it be lost in the hands of the borrower, without any transgression on his part, he is not answerable for it, whether the loss happen at the period of his using it, or otherwise.—Shafei maintains that he is responsible for it in case the loss should take place at a time when he is not using it; because he has taken possession of the property another without a right in it; and also, because as the borrower is liable to the charges of removal, in case of the existence of the substance, so also he is answerable for the value, in case of its

*That is, may be retracted at pleasure.

*Some cases are here omitted, as they turn entirely upon different modes of expression, in the original idiom.
in the same manner as an usurper the article standing in the same predicament with merchandise detained with a view to purchase.—With respect to the permission of seisin, established on the borrower's behalf that was granted merely with a view to enable him to enjoy the use; and hence, where the use ceases it no longer operates; in other words, where the loan is destroyed during his enjoyment of the use; he is not responsible, because of the existence of the necessity; whereas, if it be lost at a time when he is not using it, he is responsible, because of the non-existence of the necessity at the time. The argument of our doctors is, that the term Arcate does not indicate responsibility; for (according to their exposition) it is an investiture with the use without a return or (according to Shafei and Koobokee) a permission of the use; and the seisin of it is not a transgression on the part of the borrower, since it was made with the consent of the lender; and although that consent was merely with a view to enable the lender to use the article, still to borrower did not make the seisin with any other intention; he therefore, is not guilty of any transgression; and consequently is not responsible.—In reply to what Shafei urges it may be observed, that the expense attending a removal of the article is incumbent on the borrower, merely on account of the advantage he derives from it, and not on account of any defect in his tenure. It is otherwise in the case of an usurper, where the charges of removal are due merely because of the defect in his tenure.—With respect to seisin with a view to purchase, the responsibility in that instance does not arise from the seisin, but from the design with which it was made; for as seisin in virtue of a contract of sale induces responsibility, so also seisin with a view to purchase induces responsibility, since seisin with a view to any contract is subject to the same laws with that contract, as has been explained in its proper place.

He cannot let it out to hire.—It is not lawful for a borrower to let out a loan. If, therefore, he should let it out, and it be afterwards lost, he is in that case responsible for it; because a loan is inferior to a lease, and an inferior cannot comprehend his superior; and also, because if the hire be valid, it can only be so on the supposition of its being binding; and that cannot be supposed otherwise than with the consent of the lender; for if it were binding without his consent, it would be a great injury to him, as it would deprive him of the power of resuming the loan, until the expiration of the lease.—The lease of a loan is therefore invalid.

Or, if he let it, he becomes responsible.—It is to be observed that, in case of letting out the loan, the borrower becomes responsible for it immediately upon the delivery to the lessee; for as the act of lending does not comprehend hire, it follows that such delivery is an usurpation. The lender is in this case at liberty to take the compensation, if he please, from the lessee, because of his having taken the property of another without his consent. If, however, he take it from the borrower, he is not then entitled to any indemnification from the lessee, since, in consequence of his receiving a compensation from the borrower, it becomes evident that the borrower only let his own property.—If he take the compensation from the lessee, the lessee is in that case entitled to an indemnification from the borrower, who is the lessor, provided he [the lessee] had not known that the lease was a loan, as in that case he suffers an imposition. It is otherwise where he takes the lease knowing it to be a loan, as there he suffers no imposition.

He may lend it to another person, unless this subject it to be differently affected.—It is lawful for a borrower to lend the thing borrowed, provided it be of such a nature I may not subject is to be differently affected by different uses.—Shafei is of opinion that the borrower is not entitled to lend the loan to another, because (according to him) a loan is merely a permission of the use, and a person to whom the use of a thing is permitted is not entitled to communicate that use to another, for this reason, that the use of a thing is not capable of being property, as it is a non entity, the use being considered an entity in the case of a lease merely from necessity, which in a loan may be completely answered by permission.—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that as loan is an investiture with the use of a thing, the borrower may therefore lend the loan, in the same manner as a person to whom the use of a thing devolved by request. Besides, in the same manner as the use is made property in the case of a lease, so also is it from a principle of necessity, in the case of a loan.

Objection.—If a loan signify an investiture with the use, it would necessarily follow that the borrower is at liberty to lend the loan even where a difference of use may occasion a different affection in the thing; whereas the law is otherwise.

Reply.—It is not permitted to the borrower to lend the thing borrowed when of a nature to be differently affected by different use, because of the possibility of the use of the second borrower being more injurious to the borrower.

*Thus if the loan be a cow or a goat, as the object from these is milk, it matters not whether for this purpose they remain with Zeyd or Omar.—But if the loan be a riding-horse, it may be consequence that Zeyd be should not lend it to Omar, for if Zeyd be thin and Omar fat, Omar's use of the horse would in that case affect it more than the use of it by Zeyd.
the thing than that of the first; and the consent and approbation of the first lender is given to the use of the first borrower, but not that of the second. The compiler of the "Hedaya" remarks that what is here related proceeds on the supposition of the loan being absolute; for that loans are of four kinds. I. Loans that are absolute with respect both to the period and the use; in which case the borrower is entitled to take the use in any manner and at any time he pleases because of the loan being absolute.

II. Loans that are restricted both as to the use and the time, in which case the borrower is not allowed to depart from these restrictions, excepting where the deviation is in an instance that is similar to the one prescribed, or of a better kind; as where a person borrows a quadruped in order to load it on a particular day with ten measures of a particular kind of wheat; and he loads it on that day, with ten measures of a different kind of wheat, or with less than ten measures of the same or a different kind of wheat.—III. Loans that are restricted in point of time but absolute with respect to the use; and IV. Loans that are restricted with respect to the use, but absolute with respect to time; in either of which it is not lawful for the borrower to depart from the restrictions. If therefore, a person borrow a quadruped without any conditions whatever, he is in that case entitled either to load it on his own account, or to lend it to another for the purpose of landing, as in landing there is no difference; and, in the same manner, he may either ride upon it himself, or lend it to another for that purpose; but as riding is supposed to be of different kinds, he is not entitled to more than one loan, which his own act must fix and determine; and hence, if he should lend it upon it himself, he is not afterwards at liberty to lend it to another to ride; or, if he should lend it to another to ride upon, he is not afterwards entitled to ride upon it himself.

Loans of money, &c., as opposed to loans of specific property.—The loan of dirms and deenars, and of articles estimated by measurement of capacity, by weight, or by tale, is considered in the light of Karz.—The principle on which this proceeds is that Areat is an investiture with the use of [of the property lent]; and as this cannot be obtained, with regard to these articles, without destruction of the substance, it must, with respect to him, be necessarily considered as an investiture with the substance. Now an investiture of this nature is to be considered in two lights,—a gift or a loan;*—the act is, however, regarded as a loan in this instance, either because loan is more probable than gift, or because the objects of a loan are two-fold,—namely, the use of the article, and the restitution of the substance: and in the loan of the articles in question, a restitution of an equivalent is admitted in place of the identical substance. Lawyers, however, have observed that at this doctrine proceeds on the supposition of the loan being absolute: for if it be limited (as if a person should lend another a quantity of dirms merely to place in his shop and attract customers from the persuasion of his being rich), it is not in this case a Karz-loan, but an Areat-loan, whence he is not entitled to derive any other use from it then what was specified: the case, therefore, becomes the same as if he had borrowed a vessel or a sword to decorate his shop.

Land may be borrowed for the purpose of building or plantations, but the lender is at liberty to resume it.—If a person borrow land, with a view to build upon it, or plant trees in it, it is lawful; because the use to which the loan is to be applied is here ascertained; and as such use is the subject of the property in leases, so also in loans. But in this case it is permitted to the lender to resume the land; and as he is to receive it back in the state in which he lent it, he is therefore empowered to compel the borrower to remove his houses or trees. It is to be considered, however, whether or not any period was fixed for the loan. If no period was fixed, then no compensation is due by the lender for the loan he may have occasioned to the borrower by the destruction of his buildings or trees, since no deceit was practised on the borrower, but rather he deceived himself, in trusting to a contract which was absolute and unaccompanied with any condition. If, on the other hand, a period was fixed for the loan, and it be resumed before the expiration of that period, the resumption so made is valid, since a lender (as was before explained) may resume a loan when he pleases: but it is nevertheless abominable in this instance, as it involves a breach of promise, and the lender is responsible to the borrower for the loss he sustains.

*Arab. Karz.—As the English language makes no distinction between the terms Karz and Areat (although essentially different in their effect), the translator is under the necessity of adopting the term loan in both instances; leaving it to the reader to conceive the original term from the context.
in the removal of his trees and buildings, in as much as he deceived the borrower in fixing a period which it was natural to suppose he would adhere to:—the borrower, therefore, is entitled to a compensation from the lender, in the event of the damage he suffers, and the same is mentioned by Kadoree in his compendium.—Hakim Shahedd maintains that the borrower is at liberty either to take from the lender the value of the trees and buildings (in which case they become the property of the lender), or to take a compensation for his loss (in which case he is at liberty to carry away the trees and buildings). Lawyers have observed that if the removal of the trees and buildings be detrimental to the ground, the choice of the alternative rests with the proprietor of the ground, as he is the principal, and the borrower the secondary, and a preference is always given to the principal.

Land borrowed for the purpose of tillage cannot be resumed until the crop be reaped from it.—If a person borrow a piece of land for the cultivation of grain, the lender has not the power of resuming the loan until the gathering in of the grain, whether a period has been fixed or not: because the gathering of the crop comes within a certain and known period; and in suffering it to remain on the ground, an observance of the right of both the lender and borrower is maintained in the same manner as under similar circumstances in the case of a lease. It is otherwise with respect to trees; because, as the period of their existence is uncertain, the suffering them to remain would be an injury to the lender.

The borrower must defray the charges attending the restoration of a loan.—The charges of returning the loan must be defrayed by the borrower; because, as the restitution is incumbent on him (since he took it with a view to his own benefit), he is consequently liable to the expenses attendant on such restitution.—It is to be observed that the expenses attending the return of the property constiuted on the lessor, because the rent being a return for the benefit arising from the tenure of the article, let, all that is required from the lessee is merely to put it in the power of the lessor to recover it, by divesting himself of it, and not that he should return it to him.—The expense of returning the subject of an usurpation, on the contrary, must be defrayed by the usurper: for as the return of the article to the proprietor is incumbent on the usurper of it in order to remedy the injury he occasioned, as the expense attendant on such return must of consequence be borne by him, in returning an animal borrowed it suffices that it be returning to the owner's stable.

If a person, having borrowed a quadruped from another, should restore it to the stable of the proprietor, and it be afterwards lost, in that case he is not responsible for it, on a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that he is responsible, since he has neither restored it to the proprietor nor his agent, but merely to his ground.—The reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this instance, is, that a restitution has been made according to general custom, since it is customary to return to the house of the proprietor; as where, for instance, vessels or utensils belonging to a house are borrowed, in which case it is usual to return them, not into the proprietor's hands, but merely to his house.—Besides, if he had returned the quadruped to the proprietor, he [the proprietor] would have sent it to the stable and therefore his doing so at once is considered a valid return.

And, in restoring a slave, that he be returned to his master's house.—If a person borrow a slave, and afterwards return him to the house of his master without delivering him to the master himself, he is not in that case responsible for him for the reasons above mentioned.—Is, on the contrary, an usurper or a trustee return the subject of the usurpation or the trust to the house of the proprietor, without delivering it to the proprietor, they are in that case responsible for the eventual loss of it:—the usurper, because it was incumbent on him to undo his act, and his act cannot be undone but by a delivery to the proprietor himself; and the trustee, because the proprietor did not wish that he should deliver the deposit merely to his house or his family, for it it had been the case, he would not have deposited it with him.—It is otherwise with respect to loans, as these are commonly returned to the house: excepting, however, where they consist of jewels, for in that case they must be returned to the proprietor, and not to the house or family.

It suffices to return the loan by a slave or servant either of the borrower.—If the borrower send the quadruped he had borrowed to the proprietor of it; by his own slave or his hireling, and it be lost in the way, in that case he is not responsible for it. (By hireling is here to be understood a servant who receives yearly wages.)—The reason of this is that a loan is in the nature of a trust; and the borrower may commit it, for the sake of preservation, into the hands of any of his family, in which relation a slave and a yearly servant stand. It is otherwise with respect to a daily servant, as he is not held to be one of the family.

Or lender.—If a borrower should send back the horse or other animal he had borrowed to the proprietor, by the slave or the hireling of the proprietor, and it be lost or destroyed on the way, he is not responsible for it, since the proprietor is virtually supposed to have approved of this, in as much as he himself, if a delivery had been made to him, would have consigned the horse to one of these:—Some have said that the law here proceeds on the supposition of the slave or hireling, to whom the quadruped is consigned, being the one to whom the care and management of it is always given. Others, again, have said that it matters not whether it be consigned to such a slave, or to any other slave of the proprietor; and the latter is the most approved doctrine.

If it be returned by a stranger, the borrower is responsible.—If a borrower should send the quardruped to the proprietor by the hands of a stranger, he becomes in that case responsible for it, and must make good the value in the event of its loss.—It is to be observed that the case seems to imply the illegality of a borrower’s depositing a loan with a stranger; since, if that were lawful, he would not, in the present instance, be responsible.—Such also is the opinion of some of our modern doctors.—Others of them have said that it is lawful for a borrower to deposit the loan, because the contract of deposit is inferior to that of loan; and they have reconciled the doctrine, in the present case, by observing that the borrower does necessarily become responsible on sending the loan by a stranger, since from the moment of his consigning it to a stranger the loan determines, and being no longer a borrower, he becomes of consequence responsible.—Our doctors, however, do not admit the legality of a borrower’s deposit, unless he be the borrower of a borrower, which in fact is not a borrower.

If a person lend a piece of fallow ground to another, that he may cultivate it, the borrower must insert, in the contract of loan, the words, “You have given me to eat of this land.”—This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that the term Areeat or loan must be inserted; because the term Areeat is particularly used to express a loan; and it is preferable that a contract of loan be expressed in terms particularly appropriated to loans; as in the loan of a house, for instance. But in the borrower expresses the contract, “You have lent me this house.”

The argument of Haneefa is, that the words “You have given me to eat of this land,” are more expressive of the fact, since the term Itam [giving to eat] is particularly restricted to the produce of land; whereas the words “You have lent me this ground,” may apply to any other object, such as building, or the like. —The use of the former, therefore, in the case in question, is by much the most advisable. —It is otherwise with respect to a house, because the loan of it is given for no other purpose than that of residence.

BOOK XXX.

OF HIBBA, OR GIFTS.

Definition of the terms used in gift.—HIBBA, in its literal sense, signifies the donation of a thing from which the donee may derive a benefit: in the language of the LAW it means a transfer of property, made immediately, and without any exchange. —The person making the transfer is termed the Wahib, or donor:—the person to whom it is made the Mohooob-le-hoo; or donee;—and the thing itself the Moohooob, or gift.

Chap. I —Introduction.

Chap. II —Of Retraction of a Gift.

CHAPTER I.

Gifts are lawful.—Deeds OF GIFT are lawful; because the Prophet has said “Send ye presents to each other for the increase of your love,” which implies the legality of gifts, as by presents is meant gifts. All our doctors, moreover, concur in the validity of them.

And rendered valid by tender, acceptance, and seisin.—Gifts are rendered valid by tender, acceptance, and seisin—Tender and acceptance are necessary, because a gift is a contract, and tender and acceptance are requisite in the formation of all contracts; and seisin is necessary in order to establish a right of property in the gift, b: cause a right of property, according to our doctors, is not established in the thing given merely by means of the contract, without seisin. —Malik alleges that right of property is established in a gift antecedent to seisin, because of its analogous resemblance to sale: and the same difference of opinion obtains with respect to alma-gift. —The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.

Firstly, the Prophet has said, “A gift is act valid without seisin” (meaning that the right of property is not established in a gift until after seisin). —Secondly, gifts are voluntary deeds; and if the right of property was established in them previous to the seisin, it would follow that the delivery would be incumbent on the voluntary agent before he had voluntarily engaged for it; —It is otherwise with respect to wills; because the time of establishment of a right of property in a legacy is at the death of the testator: and he is then in a situation which precludes the possibility of rendering any thing binding upon himself.

Objection.—Although a dead person be not capable of being bound, still an obligation may he against his heir, who is his successor and representative.

Reply.—The heir is not proprietor of the legacy, and cannot therefore be subjected to obligation on account of it.

A gift may be taken possession of on the spot where it is tendered, without the express order of the donor: but not afterwards. —If the donee take possession of the gift, in the meeting of the deed of gift, * without the order of the giver, it is lawful, upon a favourable construction. —If, on the contrary, he should take possession of the gift after the breaking up of the meeting, it is not lawful, unless he have had the consent of the giver so to do. —Analogical would suggest that the seisin is not valid in either case as it is an act with respect to what is still the property of the giver; for as his right of property continues in force until seisin that is consequentially invalid without his consent. The reason for a more favourable construction of the law, in the instance in question, is that seisin, in a case of gift, is similar to acceptance in sale, on this consideration, that in the one the effect of the deed (that is, the establishment of a right of property) rests upon the seisin, and in the other upon the acceptance.—As, moreover, the object of a gift is the establishment of a right of property, it follows that the tender of the giver is, virtually, an empowerment of the donee to take possession.—It is otherwise where the seisin is made after the breaking up of the meeting; because our doctors do not admit of the establishment of the power over the thing but when seisin is immediately conjoined with acceptance; and as the validity of acceptance is particularly restricted to the place of the meeting, so also is the gift in conjunction with it.

—It is also otherwise where the giver prohibits the donee from taking possession in the place of meeting, for in that case the seisin of the donee in the place of the meeting would be invalid, as arguments of implied intention cannot be put in competition with express declaration.

A gift made from divisible property must be divided off;—but not a gift made from indivisible property.—A gift of part of a thing which is capable of division is not valid unless the said part be divided off and separated from the property of the donor; but a gift of part of an indivisible thing is valid. Shafei maintains that the gift is valid in either case; because a gift is a deed conveying property, and valid, as such, with regard either to things that are connected or separated: in the same manner as in sale.—The ground of this is that as an indefinite share has the capacity to constitute property, it is consequently a fit subject of gift: nor is a voluntary deed rendered null by the indefiniteness of the subject of it: as in a Karz-loan, for the subject of person gives another one thousand dirhms, of which one half is to be in the nature of a loan, and the other of copartnership: or as in bequest; or in the gift of indivisible things.—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, seisin in cases of gift is expressly ordained, and consequently a complete seisin is a necessary condition: but a complete seisin is impracticable with respect to an indefinite part of divisible things, as it is impossible, in such, to make seisin of the thing given without its conjunction with something that is not given; and that is a defective seisin.—Secondly, if the gift of part of a divisible thing, without separation, were lawful, it must necessarily follow that a thing is incumbent upon the giver which he has not engaged for;—namely, a division which may possibly be injurious to him (whence it that a gift is not complete and valid until it be taken possession of: and since if it were valid before seisin, a thing would be incumbent upon the donor who has not engaged for,—namely, delivery).—It is otherwise with respect to articles or an indivisible nature; because in those a complete seisin is altogether impracticable, and hence an incomplete seisin must necessarily suffice, since this is all that the article admits of;—and also, because in this instance the donor does not incur the inconvenience of a division.

Objection.—Analogy would suggest that the gift of a part of an indivisible article is invalid: because, although the donor do not in such a case, incur the inconvenience of a division, still he incurs a participation in the property; and this also is a sort of inconvenience.

Reply.—The donor is subjected to a participation in a thing which is not the subject of his grant, namely, the use of [of the whole indivisible article], for his gift related to the substance of the article, not to the use of it;—hence the necessity of a participation is not incurred by him with respect to the thing which is properly the subject of his grant.

With respect to the analogy advanced by Shafei between the case in question and that of Karz-loan, or bequest, it is totally unfounded; because in bequests the seisin [of the legatee] is not a necessary condition; neither is it so in a valid sale;—and although seisin be requisite in Sillim and Sirf sales, still is not ordained with respect to them and hence is not required to be complete in those instances. Besides, as all those contracts [of sale] are contracts of responsibility, the obligation of a division is agreeable to them.—With respect to a Karz-loan, it is a voluntary contract in the beginning, but a contract of responsibility in the end (since it involves responsibility for a similar); and hence, in consideration of its resemblance to both, an incomplete seisin is made a condition in it, not a division: besides, seisin is not especially ordained in this instance.

If a person make a gift to his partner, of his share in the partnership-stock, capable of division, it is invalid, because of the invalidity of the gift of an undefined part of a divisible subject, as before explained.

If a person make a gift, to another, of an undefined portion of land: (such as an half, or a fourth), such gift is null, for the reasons already set forth.—If, however, he afterwards divide it off, and make delivery of it, the gift becomes valid: because a gift is rendered complete by seisin; and in this case nothing else remains indefinitely involved with the gift at the time of seisin.
A gift of an article implicated in another article is utterly invalid.—If a person make a gift of the flour of Sesame which is yet in grain, or of oil of Sesame which is not yet expressed from the seeds, such gift is invalid; and if he afterwards grind the wheat into flour, or extract the oil from the Sesame seeds, and so deliver them to the donee, still the gift is not thereby rendered valid. The same rule also holds with respect to butter which is yet in milk. The reason of this is that the thing given, in all these cases, is a nonentity (whence it is that if an usurper of wheat, or of seeds, should either grind the one into flour, or press the other into oil, he then becomes proprietor of them); and as a nonentity cannot be a subject of property, the deeds in question are therefore null, and cannot afterwards be rendered valid otherwise than by being executed de novo.—It is different in the preceding case, because an undefined portion of any thing is nevertheless capable of being transferred.

The gift of milk in the udder, of wool upon the back of a goat, of grain or trees upon the ground, or of fruit upon trees, is in the nature of the gift of an undefined part of a thing, because in these instances the cause of invalidity is the conjunction of the thing given with what is not given, which is a bar to the seisin, in the same manner as in the case of undivided things.

The gift of a deposit to the trustee is valid without a formal delivery and seisin. If the thing given be in the hands of the donee, in virtue of a trust, the gift is in that case complete, although there be no formal seisin since the actual article is already in the donee's hands, whence his seisin is not requisite. It is otherwise where a depositor sells the deposit to his trustee, for in this case the original seisin does not suffice, because seisin in virtue of purchase is a seisin inducing responsibility, and therefore cannot be substituted by a seisin in virtue of a trust; but seisin in virtue of gift, on the contrary, as not being a seisin inducing responsibility, may be substituted by a seisin in virtue of a trust.

The gift, by a father to his infant son, of any thing rather actually or virtually in his possession, is valid in virtue of his [the father's] seisin. If a father make a gift of something to his infant son, the infant, in virtue of the gift, becomes proprietor of the same, provided the thing given be, at the time, in the possession either of the father or of his trustee; because the possession of the father is capable of becoming possession in virtue of gift and the possession of the trustee is equivalent to that of the father. (It were otherwise if the thing given have been pawned or usurped by another, or sold by an invalid sale: because when pawn and an usurpation are in the possession of another, and the subject of an invalid sale is the property of another.) The same rule holds when a mother gives something to her infant son whom she maintains, and of whom the father is dead, and no guardian provided; and so also, with respect to the gift of and other person maintaining a child under these circumstances. It is to be observed that the law with respect to seisin in cases of almsgift is similar to that in gifts. Thus if a person should bestow in alms, upon a pauper, any thing of which the pauper has possession at the time, he [the pauper] in that case becomes proprietor of the same, without the necessity of a new seisin; and so also, if a father should bestow in alms, upon his infant son. something of which he himself or his trustee has the possession, the infant becomes proprietor thereof;—contrary to where the thing so bestowed has been pawned, lost by usurpation, or sold by an invalid sale.

And so also, a gift to an infant by a stranger.—If stranger make a gift of a thing to an infant, the gift is rendered complete by the seisin of the father of the infant: for as he if master of deeds with respect to the child liable to both good and evil (such as sale) he is consequently, in a superior degree, master of gift, which is purely advantageous.

Gift to an orphan is rendered valid by the seisin of his guardian.—If a person make a gift of a thing to an orphan, and it be seised in his behalf by his guardian,—being either the executor appointed by his father,—or his grandfather, or the executor appointed by his grandfather, it is valid; because all these relatives have an authority over the orphan, as they stand in the place of his father.

And, to a fatherless infant, by the seisin of his mother.—If a fatherless child be under charge of his mother, and she take possession of a gift made to him, it is valid; because she has an authority for the preservation of him and his property; and the seisin of a gift made to him is in the nature of a preservation of himself, since a child could not be subsisted without property.

The same rule also holds with respect to a stranger who has the charge of an orphan:—because as his seisin is of legal force (whence it is that another stranger has not a right to take the orphan from him), he is consequently competent to all such things as are purely for the advantage of the orphan.

Gift to a rational infant is rendered valid by the seisin of the infant himself. If an infant should himself take possession of a thing given to him, it is valid, provided he be endowed with reason; because such an act is for his advantage; and he has a capability of performing it, as capability depends on reason and understanding, which he possesses.

It is lawful for a husband to take possession of any thing given to his wife, being an infant, provided she have been sent from her father's house to his; and this, though the father be present; because she is held, by implication, to have resigned the management of her concern to the husband. It is otherwise where she has not been sent from her father's house because then the father is not held to have resigned the management of her concerns. It is also otherwise with respect to a mother, or any others having charge of her; because they are not entitled to possess themselves of a gift in her behalf, unless the father be dead, or absent, and his place of residence unknown; for their power is in virtue of necessity, and not from any such evident authority; and this necessity cannot exist whilst the father is present.

A house may be conveyed in gift by two persons to one.—If two persons, jointly, make a gift of a house to one man, it is valid: because, as they deliver it over to him wholly, and he receives it wholly, no mixture of seisin.

But not by one person to two.—If one man make a gift of a house to two men, the deed is invalid, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold it to be valid, because as the donor gives the whole of his house to each of the donees (as in - such as there is only one conveyance) there is consequently no mixture of property; in the same manner as where one man pawns a house to two men.

The arguments of Haneefa upon this point are twofold. First, the gift, in this case, is a gift of half the house to each of the donees (as is evident from this, that if one man give to two men something incapable of division, and one of them accept the same, the gift becomes valid with respect to his share); and such being the case, it follows that, at the time of seisin by each of the donees, a mixture of property take place. Secondly, as a right of property is established in each of the donees, in the extent of one half, it follows that the conveyance or investiture must also be in the same proportions, since the right of property is an effect of the conveyance: on this consideration, therefore, the right of property is established in each with his half, an indefinite mixture of their respective share in the gift is fully established. It is otherwise in a case of pawn, because the effect of that is detention, not right of property, and the right of detention is wholly and completely established in each of the pawn holders, respectively, insomuch that if the pawnner should discharge the debt of one of them, still the right of the other to a complete detention remains unimpaired.

Distinction between joint gift or alms to the rich and to the poor.—It is recorded, in the Jama Sagheer, that if a rich man bestow ten dirms, in alms, upon two poor men, or make a gift of that sum to them, it is valid, but that if the said charity or gift be made to two rich men it is invalid. (The two disciples maintain that in this last instance both gift and alms are valid). From this it appears that Haneefa has construed a gift into alms, when the object is a poor man; and alms into a gift, when the object is a rich man, because of the similarity between these deeds, as each is a conveyance of property without an exchange. Hence Haneefa has made a difference with respect to them, as appears by the case recited in the Jama Sagheer, since he has admitted of charity to two poor men, but not of a gift to two rich men; whilst in the Mabsoot he has made no difference between them, but on the contrary has declared them to be equal, as he there declares "neither a gift nor alms to two men is valid, because the mixture of property is a bar in both cases, as both are dependant on a perfect seisin."—The reason of the distinction in the Jama Sagheer is that the end of alms is to give to God, who is one: and the alms comes not to the poor men, but as their daily food from God Almighty; whereas the gift goes directly to the object of it, namely, the two men. Some have said that the recital in the Jama Sagheer is the most approved doctrine; and that the meaning of the doctrine in the Mabsoot is that charity to two rich men is invalid; in the same manner as a gift to two men or any description.

Case of the gift of a house inseparable lots.—If a person make a gift to two men of one third of his house to one of them, and of one third to the other, it is invalid according to the two disciples, and according to Mohammed it is valid. If, however, he make a gift of one half to one, and one half to the other, there are in that case two reports with respect to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf. According to the two principles maintained by Haneefa, the gift in that case is invalid; whereas, according to the principles of Mohammed, it is valid. The reason of the distinction, in the latter instance, as maintained by Aboo Yoosaf, is that because of the express apportioning of the gift, it becomes evident that the object of the giver was to establish a part of the property in each, by which means a mixture of the property must inevitably take place; whence it is that it is not lawful for a person to pawn a thing into the hands of two, by apportioning an half of it separately to each.

CHAPTER II.

OF RETRACTATION OF GIFTS.

The donor may retract his gift to stranger.—It is lawful for a donor to retract the gift he may have made to a stranger: Shafei maintains that this is not lawful; because the Prophet has said, "Let not a donor retract his gift; but let a father, if he please, retract a gift he may have made to his son," and also; because retraction is the very opposite to conveyance,—and as a deed of gift is a deed of conveyance, it consequently cannot be admitted as its opposite. It is otherwise with respect to a gift made by a father to his son, because (according to his tenets) the conveyance of property from a father to the son can never be complete; for it is a rule with him that a father has a power over the property of his son. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has said, "A donor preserves a right to his gift, so long as he does not obtain a return for it."—Secondly, the object of a gift to a stranger is a return;—for it is a custom to send presents to a person of high rank that he may protect the donor; to a person of inferior rank that the donor may obtain his advice; and to a person of equal rank that he may obtain an equivalent;—and such being the case, it follows that the donor has a power of annulment, so long as the object of the deed is not answered, since a gift is capable of annulment. With respect to the tradition of the Prophet quoted by Shafei, the meaning of it is that the donor is not himself empowered to retract his gift, as that must be done by a decree of the Kazee, with the consent of the donee,—excepting in the case of a father, who is himself competent to retract a gift to his son, when he wants it for the maintenance of the son; and this is metaphorically termed a retractation.—It is to be observed, however, that although a retractation of a gift be agreeable to the letter of the law, still it induce abomination; for the Prophet has said, "The retractation of a gift is like eating one's spittle."

But there are various circumstances which bar the retractation.—It is further to be observed, that the bars to a retractation of a gift are many,—amongst which are the following:—I. The donee giving the donor a return of consideration; because this fulfills the donor's object.—II. The corroboration of the gift, because in that instance a retractation cannot take place without including the increase, as that is implicated; and it cannot take place so as to include the increase, since that was not included in the deed of gift.—III. The death of one of the parties; for if the donee should die, his property shifts to his heir, and becomes the same as if it had shifted during his lifetime; and if the donor should die, his heirs are strangers with respect to the contract, since they made no tender of the thing given.—IV. The alienation of the gift from the donor prior to the gift, because in that respect and in consequence of the power vested in him by the gift, which power therefore, cannot then be retracted; and also because the right of property has regenerated in another person, in virtue of a fresh cause, namely, conveyance to a second donee; and as a regeneration of the right of property is equivalent to an essential change in the thing, the case is therefore the same as if the gift were to become, in effect, a different thing from what it was, and consequently not liable to retractation.

A gift of land cannot be retracted after the donee has built or planted on it.—If a person make a gift to another of a piece of land destitute of buildings or plantations, and the donee plant trees in it, or build a house, a stable, or a shop of such a size as to be deemed an increase, in that case the donor is not entitled to retract the gift, because of the increase which it has received.—The restriction is stated with respect to the shop, because shops are sometimes so small as not to be deemed an increase, and sometimes the land is very extensive, the shop occupying only one particular part of it; in which case the bar operates only with respect to that part.

After the sale of a part of the land by the donee, the donor may resume the remainder.—If the donee sell one half of granted land undivided. The donor may in that case resume the other half, as to the resumption of that no bar exists. If, on the other hand, the donee should not have sold any part of the land, the donor may resume one half of it, for as he is entitled to resume the whole, it follows that he is entitled to resume the half, a fortiori.

A gift to a kinsman cannot be resumed.—If a person make a gift of anything to his relation within the prohibited degrees, it is not lawful for him to resume it, because the Prophet has said, "When a gift is made to a prohibited relation, it must not be resumed;"—and also because the object of the gift is an increase of the ties of affinity, which is thereby obtained.

Nor a gift to a husband or wife during marriage.—If a husband make a gift of any thing to his wife, or a wife to her husband, it cannot be retracted, because the object of the gift is an improvement of affection (in the same manner as in the case of presents to relations); and as the object is obtained, the gift cannot be retracted.* This object, however, is to be regarded only during the existent period of the contract; insomuch that if a person give something to a strange woman, and afterwards marry her, he may retract the gift;—whereas, if a man give something to his wife, and afterwards divorce her three times, he is not entitled to retract the gift.

The receipt of a return prohibits retractation.—If the donor say to the donor, "Take this thing in exchange for your gift," and he accept it, the right of retractation is annulled, because of the donor having obtained the object of his gift.

Although the return be given by a stranger, —If a stranger, on behalf of a donee, give something gratuitously to the donor in exchange for his gift, and the donor accept the same, the right of retractation then ceases; because a stranger may lawfully give a compensation for the relinquishment of a right, in the same manner as in cases of Khoola or composition.

If a part of the gift prove the property of another, a proportionable part of the return may be resumed.—If the half of a gift proves

*Because of the existence of the first bar before mentioned: for the increase of affection excited in the wife by the gift is supposed, by the law, to be a return which she pays for it, and which consequently deprives the donor of the power of retractation.

the property of some other than the donor, the donee is in that case entitled to take back from the donor half of return he may have made him for the gift, since the thing opposed to that half was not secured and rendered safe to him. If, on the contrary, half the return prove the property of some other than donee, the donor is not in that case entitled to take back from the donee a particular part of the gift; but he may restore the remaining part of the return, and then resume the whole of the gift from the donee. Ziffer maintains that the donor may take back half of the gift, as he considers this case to be analogous to that of the gift proving the property of another.—The reasoning of our doctors, in support of the their opinion, is that the remaining part of the return has a fitness to be considered as a return for the whole of the gift from the beginning; as, moreover, in consequence of half the return proving the right of another, it becomes apparent that there is no other return for the gift than the remaining part, it follows that the donor is not entitled to resume an equivalent from the gift.—He is, however, allowed an option in this instance, with respect to the whole gift, because he did not relinquish his right of retractation on any other condition than that of the security of the whole of the return; and as that does not prove completely secure to him, he is therefore at liberty to restore the remaining half of the return, and to take back the whole of the gift.

When the return is opposed only to a part the remainder of the gift may be resumed.—If a person make a gift of a house to another, and the donee give a return to the donor for a half only of the house so given, the donor may in that case resume the half of the house for which he received no exchange, since a bar to his retractation existed only with respect to the other half.

Retractation requires mutual consent, or decree.—A gift cannot lawfully be retracted but with the consent of both parties, or by a decree of the Kazee, because the retractation of a gift is a disputed point amongst the learned. There is, moreover, a degree of weakness in a retraction, because the admission of it contrary to analogy, since it is a power over the property of another, as the right of property in a gift is established in the donee. Besides, as there may arise contention with respect to the object in lieu of it (since the donor may claim something which the donee may refuse), the contention, therefore, cannot possibly be settled but by the consent of the parties, or by a decree of the Kazee;—inasmuch that if the gift be a slave, and the donee should have emancipated him previous to the decree of the Kazee, the emancipation holds good. If the donor should prohibit the donee from keeping possession of the gift, and he nevertheless retain possession of it, and it be lost or destroyed in his hands, he is not responsible for it, because his right of property in it is held still to continue in force.—The same rule also holds where the gift is lost or destroyed in the possession of the donee, subsequent to the decree of the Kazee, but prior to the demand of it by the donor, because the original tenure by which he held it was not a tenure of responsibility, and that tenure still exists.—But if the donor demand the article, and prohibit the donee from keeping possession of it, subsequent to a decree of the Kazee, and the donee nevertheless continues to retain it, he is responsible for it, as he is then guilty of a transgression.

The donor's re-possession of the gift is not requisite to the validity of retractation.—When a person retracts his gift, either in virtue of a decree of the Kazee, or of the mutual consent of the parties, it is an annulment of the original gift, and not a gift, de novo on the part of the donee, and therefore seizin by the donor is not in such case a requisite condition. Retractation, moreover, is lawful with respect to an undivided portion; but if a retractation were a gift de novo seizin would be a requisite condition, and consequently retractation with respect to an undivided portion would not be lawful. The reason of this is that a deed of gift is valid under the reservation of a right of annulment. The donor, therefore, in annulling the deed, does no more than possess himself of his own established right: and hence a retractation is an annulment in all cases, that is, whether it take place in virtue of a decree of the Kazee, or by the consent of both parties.—It is otherwise with respect to a buyer's return of goods on account of a defect without a decree of the Kazee; for that with respect to a third person, is considered as a contract de novo, since the purchaser has not a power of annulment but has merely a right to the quality of safety in the goods; and in defect of that quality, he is, from a principle of necessity, allowed to annul the contract.—Its being an annulment, therefore, with respect to any third person, must depend upon the Kazee's decree.—Hence there is an essential difference between the retractation of a gift, and the return of goods on account of a defect.

The donee, incurring any responsibility in consequence of a gift, receives no compensation from the donor.—If the substance of a gift prove the property of another after it has been destroyed, and the donee make good the loss to the proprietor, in that case he is not entitled to receive anything in compensation from the donor; because a gift is a gratuitous contract, and a donee has no right to the security or safety of the gift, nor is he entitled to act in behalf of the donor.—Hence he is not entitled to any thing from the donor, notwithstanding the fraud that has been practised upon him; for although fraud be a cause of resumption in a contract of mutual exchange, it is not so in contract not of mutual exchange.
A mutual gift requires mutual seisin.—If a person give something to another on condition of that other giving something to him in exchange for it, the mutual seisin of the respective returns is regarded; that is to say, the contract is nothing until the two seisins take place, and is made null by the subject of it, on either side, being mixed with other property.—The reason of this is, that a deed of this nature is in its original a gift; but when the two seisins take place, it becomes, in effect, a sale; and, as such, return may be made on account of a defect, or from an option of inspection; and the right of Shaaffa is also connected with it.—Ziffir and Shafei maintain that this is a sale both original and ultimately, in as much as the characteristic of sale, namely, a conveyance of property for a return, exists in it; and in all contracts regard must be paid to the spirit of them, insomuch that if a master should sell his own slave to the slave himself, he [the slave] is in that case free.

The arguments of our doctors are, that the contract comprehends two different shapes or descriptions.—I. It is a gift with respect to the letter.—II. It is a sale with respect to the spirit. It is therefore requisite to pay attention to both in the utmost possible degree.

Now, in the deed at present under consideration, an observance of both is practicable; because, in a gift, the right of property is suspended till seisin; and, in a sale, the right of property is undone in case of any invalidity. The effect of sale moreover is obligation: and a gift also becomes obligatory upon giving a return for it.—Out of attention, therefore, to both shapes, the contract is considered as being originally a gift, and ultimately a sale. It is otherwise with respect to the sale of the person of a slave to the slave himself; for it is impossible in any respect to consider this as a sale, since a slave cannot possibly be master of himself.

Section

The gift of a pregnant slave includes a gift of her fetus.—If a person make a gift to another of a female slave, and except the child in her womb, the gift is valid:—but the exception is null; because an exception is never valid unless it relate to such a thing as might have been the subject of the deed; and a child in the womb cannot be the subject of gift, because it is equivalent to a constituent part, like the members of the body, as has been already shown in treating of sale;—such, therefore, being the case, the exception is in effect the same as an invalid condition: hence the gift remains in force; and the exception is null.—The same rule also holds in cases of marriage, Khool, and composition for wilful bloodshed:—that is to say, if a person assign a female slave (for instance) as the dower, in marriage, or as the consideration for Khool, or as the composition for wilful bloodshed, and except the child in her womb, the deed is valid, but the exception is null; because none of these contracts are invalidated by the insertion of an invalid condition.—It is otherwise in cases of seisin, lease, or rawnage; for these are all rendered invalid by involving an invalid condition.

Unless that have been previously emancipated.—If a master emancipate the fetus in the womb of his female slave, and afterwards make a gift of the slave to some person it is valid; because as the fetus is not, in this instance, the property of the donor, it therefore is not dependant on the gift, in the manner that an exception is.

If the fetus have been previously created a Modabir, the gift is null.—If a master create the fetus in the womb of his female slave a Modabir, and afterwards make a gift of the slave to some person, the gift is not valid: because the child of the said slave still remains his property, and therefore his act of making it Modabir does not resemble an exception, but rather operates as a total bar to the legality of the gift: for as it is impossible to render the gift valid with respect to the child, because of his being a Modabir it becomes the same as the gift of an undivided portion, or as the gift of a thing involved with the property of the donor.

The gift of a thing renders all provisional conditions respecting it nugatory.—If a person make a gift of his female slave to another, on condition that he restore her to him, or that he emancipate her, or create her an Am-Walid, or, if a percent make a gift of a house to another, on condition that the donee give back a part of it,—or, if a person make a gift of his house in charity to another on condition that the receiver of the charity give him something in exchange for part of the house,—such gift or charity is valid; but the condition annexed is invalid, because it is contrary to the spirit or intention of the contract; and neither gifts nor charities are affected by being accompanied with an invalid condition, because the Prophet approved of Amees [gifts for life], but held the condition annexed to them by the granter* to be void. It is otherwise in sale; because the Prophet has prohibited sale with an invalid condition; and also because invalid conditions, as being in the nature of usury manifest their effects in contracts of exchange, but not in such as are not of the description of exchange.

The gift of a debt, by a conditional exemption from it, is null.—If a person, having a debt due to him of one thousand dirms, should say to the debtor "when to-morrow arrives the said thousand dirms are your property,"—or, "you are exempted from the debt,"—or, if he should say whenever your pay me one half of the said thousand the other half is your property," or "you are exempted from the debt of the other half,"—the gift so make is null. The reason of this is that the gift of a debt to a debtor is an exemption: but an exemption has two meanings:—I. It is a conveyance of property, on the principle of debts being property, on which account lawyers have held that "an exemption may be undue by a rejection:"—II. It is an annulment, since debt is in the nature of a quality, on which account an exemption does not rest upon acceptance.—Now nothing can be suspended on a condition excepting an utter annulment, such as a divorce or an emancipation;—and an exemption (as has been already said) is not an utter annulment, and therefore cannot be suspended on a condition, but on the contrary is perfectly nugatory.

*Namely, the condition of restoration upon the demise of the grantee.
BOOK XXXI.

Case of life-grants.—An Amree: or life-grant, is lawful to the grantee during his life, and descends to his heirs, because of the tradition before quoted.—Besides, the meaning of a gift of a house (example) during the life of the donee, on condition of its being returned upon his death.—The conveyance of the house, therefore, is valid without any return; and the condition annexed is null, because the Prophet has sanctioned the gift in this instance, and annulled the condition, as before mentioned. An Amree, moreover, is nothing but a gift and a condition; and the condition is invalid; but a gift is not rendered null by involving an invalid condition, as has been already demonstrated.

In one person say to another, "my house is yours by way of Rikba," it is null, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf has said that it is valid, because his declaration "my house is yours," is a conveyance of the house; and the condition of Rikba is invalid; because the meaning of this phrase is "if I die before you then my house is yours,"—that is to say, he waits in expectation of the other's death, that the house may revert to himself:—Rikba, therefore, resembles Amree.—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed upon this point are twofold:—First, the Prophet has legalized Amree and annulled Rikba. Secondly, the meaning of "my house is yours by way of Rikba," is "if I die before you, my house is yours," which is a suspension of the conveyance of property upon the decease of the donor previous to that of the donee: and this is a matter of doubt and uncertainty, and consequently null.—It is to be observed that Rikba is derived from In tikab, which means expectation; for the donor is, as it were, an expectant of the death of the donee.

Section.

Of Sadka, or Alms-deed.

Alms-deed requires seizin of the subject—Alms-deed, like gift, is not valid unless attended with seizin, as it is gratuitous, in the same manner as a gift. Neither is an alms lawful, where it consists of an undivided part of a thing capable of division, for the reasons already explained in the case of a gift under these circumstances.

And cannot be retracted.—Retraction of alms is not lawful; because the object, in alms, is merit in the sight of GOD, and that has been obtained. If, after person has bestowed alms upon a rich man it is not lawful to retract therefrom, on a favourable construction of the law, because to acquire merit in the sight of GOD may sometimes be the object in bestowing alms upon the rich.—In the same manner also, if a person make a gift of any thing to a poor man, it is not lawful to retract it, because the object in such gift is merit, and that has been obtained.

Distinction between votive vows of Mal-And Milk, in alms.—If a person vow to devote his property [Mal] in charity, let him give of that kind on which it is incumbent upon him to pay Zakat:—If, on the other hand, he vow to devote his possessions [Milk], he must give the whole of his property.—It is related that there is no difference between these two cases. We have, however, in treating of the duties of the Kazee, shown the difference between Mal and Milk; and also the principles on which both these traditions proceed.—It is to be observed that, in this case, the person that made the vow must be told to reserve for himself and his family as much of his property as may suffice for their maintenance until he able to acquire more. The remainder, after such reservation, must be bestowed in charity; and after he has acquired more, he must then give in charity a portion equal to what he had reserved for the subsistence of himself and family.—An explanation of this has already been given in treating of inheritance, under the head of duties of the Kazee.

BOOK XXXI.

OF IJARA, OR HIRE.

Definition of the terms used in hire.—Ijara, in its primitive sense, signifies a sale of usufruct; namely, a sale of certain usufruct for a certain hire, such as rent or wages. In the language of the law it signifies a contract of usufruct for a return. (Analogy is repugnant to the validity of hire, as the thing contracted for, namely, the usufruct, is a nonentity; and the referring an investment to a thing which is forthcoming is in valid. The contract in question is however valid: because mankind stand in need of such contract; and also, because the Prophet has said, "Pay the hireling his wages before the sweat has dried from his brow;" and also, "If a person hire another, let him inform him of the wages he is to receive."—The hirer or the lessee is termed Ajir, or Mawjr; and the lessor, or the person who receives the wages or rent, is denominated the Moostajir.
The usuftract and the hire must be particularly specified.—A contract of hire is not valid unless both the usuftract and the hire is particularly known and specified, because of the saying of the Prophet, “If a person hire another, let him inform him of the wages he is to receive.”

Objection.—It would appear, from that saying, that a knowledge of the hire alone is requisite, not a knowledge of the usuftract.

Reply.—The usuftract is the subject of the contract, and the hire the thing contracted for. Now the subject is the principal in a contract, and the thing contracted for the dependant; as therefore a knowledge of the dependant (namely the hire) is requisite, it follows that a knowledge of the principal is requisite a fortiori: consequently a knowledge of the usuftract is established, from the tradition in question by inference.—And also, because ignorance with respect to the subject of the contract, and the return, tends to excite contention, in the same manner as ignorance with respect to the price and the article in a contract of sale.

The hire (or recompense) may consist of anything capable of being price.—Whatever is lawful as a price, is also lawful as a recompense in hire: because the recompense is a price paid for the usuftract, and is therefore analogous to the price of an article purchased. All articles, moreover, which are incapable of constituting price (like things not of the description of similars, such as a slave, or cloth), are nevertheless a fit recompense in hire, since those constitute a return consisting of property.

* The former of these terms is remarkably ambiguous in our language. It sometimes serves to express the person who lets to hire, as we speak of a man who hires horses. For the sake of accuracy, however, the translator has uniformly, in this treatise, employed the word “hirer,” to express the person who engages the service of another, or the use of any article, as we commonly mean when we speak of a person who hires a servant, &c.

The extent of the usuftract may be defined by fixing a term. The extent of usuftract may be defined by fixing a term; as in the hire of a house for the purpose of residence, or the hire of land for the purpose of cultivation. A contract of hire, therefore, stipulated for a certain term, to whatever extent, is valid: because, upon the term being known, the extent of the usuftract for that term is also known. This proceeds on a supposition of the use not being various.—Where, however, the use to which the article is to be applied are various, the usuftract cannot be ascertained by the mere declaration of a term: as in the case, for instance, of hiring ground, for a certain term, for the purpose of cultivation, which contract is invalid unless it express the particular species of cultivation, since some modes of tillage are injurious to the land, and others are not so.—It is to be observed that the expression of our author “for whatever term” denotes that hire is valid, whether it be for a long or a short term, as the term is ascertained, and mon, moreover, frequently require a long term. If, however, the Mootwalee (procurator) of a charitable appropriation let out the appropriated article, the hire of it for any long term is made unlawful. lest the lessee might be enabled to advance a claim of right to it.—Hire for a long term, signifies for any term beyond three years. This is approved.

Or (in hiring servants, &c.) by specifying the work to be performed. Usuftract may also be ascertained by a specification of work, as where a person hires another to dye or sew cloth for him, or an animal for the purpose of carrying a certain burden, or of riding upon it a certain distance,—because, upon showing the cloth, and mentioning a particular colour, and the degree of the dyeing (such as dipping once or twice, of instance) in the first case, or explaining the nature of the needlework (such as whether it is to be after the Persian or Turkish fashion) in the second case, or explaining the weight and nature of the load in the third case, or the length of the journey in the fourth case, the usuftract is fully ascertained; and the contract is consequently valid. It moreover frequently happens that a contract of hire is a contract for work, as in the case of hiring a fuller or a tailor, where it is requisite that the work be particularly specified. It is also sometimes a contract for usuftract, as in the case of hiring a domestic servant; and in this case a specification of the term is requisite.

Or by specification and pointed reference.—Usuftract may also be ascertained by specification and pointed reference; as where a person hires another to carry such a particular load to such a particular place; because, upon seeing the load and the place to which it is to be carried, the service to be performed is precisely ascertained; and the contract is consequently valid.
CHAPTER II.

OF THE TIME WHEN THE HIRE MAY BE CLAIMED.

Hire can only be claimed in virtue of an agreement, or in consequence of the end of the contract being obtained.—Hire is not due immediately on concluding the contract, but becomes claimable on one of three grounds: for it is claimable in advance, in virtue of a previous agreement—or in advance, independent of such agreement,—or, in consequence of the hirer obtaining the thing contracted for.* Shafei maintain that it becomes a property immediately upon the conclusion of the contract; because a non-existent usufruct is accounted existent from the necessity of giving validity to the contract. Consequently the effect (which is right of property) is established with respect to the thing opposed to the usufruct, namely, the consideration or recompense.—The argument of our doctors is that a contract of hire is renewed every instant according to the occurrence of the usufruct, as has been already explained.—Now the contract in question is a contract of exchange, which requires that the consideration and the return be equal. Hence, because of the unavoidable delay attending the usufruct, there must also be a delay with respect to the return for it, namely, the hire; but upon the usufruct being obtained, a right of property takes place with respect to the hire, in order that equality may be established;—and so also, where it is stipulated that the hire shall be in advance, or where it is paid in advance; because equality was required on account of the right of the hirer, who, in this instance, foregoes his right.

The tenant becomes bound for the rent by a delivery of the house, &c., to him.—Upon a tenant taking possession of a house, he becomes bound for the rent, although he should not reside therein; because as it is impossible to make delivery of the usufruct, the delivery of the subject from which the usufruct is derived it a substitute for it; since in delivering the article an ability to enjoy the usufruct is established.

So long as it is not usurped from him—If, therefore, any person were to usurp the house from the tenant he [the tenant] is no longer responsible for the rent; because a delivery of the article was admitted to be a substitute for a delivery of the usufruct only, as this enabled the tenant to enjoy the usufruct; but when the one no longer remains, the other ceases of course; and as the contract is thereby broken. the rent consequently ceases.—If, also, a person usurp the house at any time before the expiration of the term of the lease, the agent drops in proportion, since the contract is broken in that proportion.

If it be not otherwise specified in the contract, rent may be demanded from day to day.—If a person hire a house, the lessee is at liberty to demand the rent from the tenant from day to day, because the object was daily use, and that has been obtained; the lessee may therefore insist upon his rent from day to day, unless the time for claiming the rent be specified in the contract, as if that were express that "the rent shall be paid at such a time."—or, "at the expiration of such a month."—since this amounts to a stipulation of ready payment.—The same rule also obtains with respect to a lease of land, for the same reason.

Or the hire of an animal [upon a journey] from stage to stage.—In the same manner also, if a person hire a camel to Mecca (for instance) the owner is at liberty to insist upon the hire stage by stage, because the object was to travel by stages.—What is here advanced is an opinion which was subsequently adopted by Haneefa. He was at first of opinion that the rent is not due, in the former instance, until the expiration of the term; nor the hire, in the latter, until the end of the journey (and such is the doctrine of Ziffer); because, as the object of the contract is the whole of the usufruct within the time or journey specified, it follows that the hire cannot be separately applied to separate portions of it:—in the same manner as where the object of the contract is labour, by a person hiring a tailor (for instance) to sew his garment.—The reason for the last opinion of Haneefa is that analogy requires that the hire be demanded from instant to instant; in order that equally may be established. If, however, the demand were admitted every instant, it would follow that the hirer or lessee would be perpetually employed in paying the hire, without leisure to attend to any thing else, which would be highly inconvenient and injurious to him.—For this reason: therefore, the proportion is determined at the rate of one day, in the hire of a house or land,—and at one stage, in the hire of a quadruped.

A workman is not entitled to any thing until his work be finished.—A workman is not at liberty to demand his hire until his work be finished, unless an advance of payment were stipulated; because some of the work still remains unobtained, whence he is not entitled to his hire.—The same rule also holds if the workman perform his business in the house of his employer; for in this instance he is not entitled to his hire before his work is finished, since same of his work still remains unobtained, us has been mentioned above—This is what occurs in the Hedaya upon this subject; and the same is also to be found in the Tijreed.—The compiler of the Mahuet and Kadooree likewise mention the same.—It is, however, contrary to the Mabsoot, for there it is mentioned that "hire is due in proportion to labour;" and Timoor Taeree, and others, have thus expounded the law in this particular.—Concerning this case, therefore, there are two opinions, as is mentioned in the Jama Ramooz.—If an advance of hire be stipulated in the agreement, the workman is in such case at liberty to require his pay before his work be finished, as a stipulation of this nature, in a contract of hire, is binding,

Case of a baker hired to bake bread.—If a person hire a baker to bake bread in his [the hirer's] house, at the rate of one Kafeez of flour for a dirm, the baker so hired is not entitled to his wages until he draw the bread out of the oven, since until this be done his work is not completed. If, therefore, the bread be burnt, or fall out of his hands, and thus be spoiled, he is not entitled to his hire, because of the destruction of the bread before delivery of it to the hirer.—If, on the other hand, he draw the bread out of the oven and it be afterwards burnt or otherwise destroyed, without his act, he is entitled to his hire, because he has made a due delivery or it to the hirer, in virtue of the building the same in his house; neither is he, in this instance, liable to make any compensation, as he has not been guilty of any transgression.—The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this is according to Haneefa, proceeding on the idea that the bread is a trust in the baker's hands;—but that the two disciples maintain that the hirer has it in his option to exact a compensation for the value of the flour only; and that in this case he is not to pay the baker any part of his hire, since (as they hold) the bread is insured with the baker, whence he is not exempted from responsibility until he duly deliver it to the hirer:—or, if he please, he may exact a compensation for the bread, paying the hire for the baking.

And of a cook.—If a person hire a cook to prepare an entertainment, he [the cook] must also dish the meat, as this is customary.

And of a brickmaker.—If a person hire another to make him a certain quantity of bricks, he [the brickmaker] is entitled to his hire when he sets up the bricks, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples hold that he is not entitled to his hire until he collect the bricks together and build them up, because it is this which completes his work, since bricks are not secured from injury until they be so collected and built up—the collecting them together, therefore, is analogous to drawing bread out of the oven.—Besides, this is what is always customary with persons hired for such work; and custom is regarded in every matter concerning which we have no express ordinance.—The argument of Haneefa is that the work is completely finished by setting up the bricks; the collecting them together and stacking them being an extra business, in the same manner as removal from one place to another; and accordingly people take bricks, to build with, from the place where they have been set up, without waiting for thestacking of them—It is otherwise before they are set up, since the clay is not then hardened: and it is also otherwise with bread, as the use of that can not be obtained until it be drawn out of the oven.

The article wrought upon may be detained by the workman until he be paid his hire.

—Every artificer whose work produce a visible effect upon an article (such as a dyer or fuller) is at liberty to detain such article until he receive his hire; because in this instance the subject of the contract is descriptively existent in the article, whence he is allowed to detain it with a view to receiving the return for such subject, in the same manner as it that was sold or set aside; in other words, as the seller is allowed to detain the article sole until he receive the price, so also in the case in question.

And he is not responsible, in case of accidents, during such detention.—If, therefore, a dyer or fuller detain cloth for the purpose of being paid his hire and the cloth perish in his hands he is not responsible, according to Haneefa, inasmuch as he has not transgressed in so detaining it, the cloth remaining as a deposit with him after detention, in the same manner as before. He is not, however, in this case entitled to any hire, because of the subject of the contract perishing before delivery: The two disciples hold that the cloth is a subject of responsibility before detention, and so also after detention; but that the owner of the cloth has it at his option either to take a compensation for the value of the cloth as it stood before the fulling or dyeing,—in which case the workman is not entitled to any pay—or to take a compensation for the value of it as it stood after the work,—in which case the workman is entitled to his hire. This shall be more fully explained hereafter.

If the work be of a nature not to produce any visible effect in the article, it cannot be detained—A workman, the effect of whose labour is not visibly extant in an article (such as a boatman, or a porter), is not at liberty to detain the article with a view to receiving the hire; because, in this instance, the subject of the contract is merely labour, which in no manner existent in the article conveyed or carried:—and the washing or bleaching of cloth is analogous to the porterage of it in this particular. From this analogy in regard to washing or bleaching it may be inferred that the term fuller (mirr) in the preceding example, applies solely to one who uses the use of some other material; but, that where such a person, in cleaning cloth, makes use of things of no estimable value, such as water and sunshine, he has no right of detention, since in such case nothing remains that can be termed an effect from his labour, the whiteness being an original quality inherent in the cloth. Kazee Khan says, that if a fuller wash cloth, and an effect be produced from his work by means of starch (for instance), he has a right of detention; but that if he merely whiten the cloth, there is in that case a difference of opinion. The approved doctrine, however; is that he has a right of detention in either case; because the whiteness was a quality concealed in the cloth, and brought forth by his labour. This is different from the case of a fugitive slave; for the restorer is entitled to detain a fugitive slave with a view to his reward, notwithstanding there be no visible effect produced in the slave; the reason of which is, that the slave was in danger of being altogether lost, and was preserved only by the restorer bringing him back; whence he may be said to sell the slave to his owner, and consequently, that he has a right of detention. What is here advanced is according to our three doctors. Ziffer maintains the workman possesses no right of detention in either case; that is, whether the effect be existent in the article, or otherwise;—because, where his work is attended with an effect existent in the article he has already made a delivery of the same to the hirer, as having blended it with his property; and a right of detention necessarily ceases upon delivery. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the workman, in blending the effect of his work with the hirer's property, has acted merely from necessity, since unless he were so to do it would be impossible to perform the work. This implication, therefore, does not imply that the workman intends or designs a delivery; and since his right to detention does not cease, in the same manner as where, in a sale, the purchaser takes possession of the merchandise without the seller's consent; in which case the seller's right of detention with a view to receiving the price, does not ceases; and so also in the case in question.

A workman, if the contract be restricted to his work, cannot employ any other person. If the hirer stipulate with the workman that he shall himself perform the work, he [the workman] is not at liberty to employ any other person; because the subject of the contract is the work of this person and not of any other, and therefore the right of the hirer is connected with his work in particular, in the same manner as the right of the person who hires a place or an article is connected with the use of that particular place or article. If, on the other hand, the work be absolute, without any stipulation that the workman shall himself perform it (as if a person were to say to a tailor 'Make up this garment') the workman is at liberty to hire any other person to perform the work, as the right of the hirer, in this instance, is merely to tailor's work, which may be performed either by this or by any other tailor: in the same manner as the payment of a debt, which may be made either by the debtor himself, or by any other person.

Cases in which (from an unavoidable accident) the contract cannot be completely fulfilled.—If a person hire another to go to Basra, and bring his family thence, and this person accordingly go to Ba-ra, and there find some of the family dead, and bring away the remainder, he is entitled to his whole hire for the journey to Basra, and to a hire for returning back in proportion to the number he brings with him; because, as he has performed a part of his contract, and not the whole, it follows that what he is entitled to is an equivalent for what he performs, and that his right is unannulled in proportion to what he does not perform. The compiler of the Hedayat remarks that this proceeds upon a supposition of the number of the family being gievously ascertained, so as to oppose the hire agreed upon to the whole; for otherwise the whole hire is due. This rule, moreover, obtains only where the expenses of the remainder are materially lessened by the death of some; for if the expense of the whole be not thereby diminished (as where the children died were not grown up, but yet able to travel on foot), the person in question is still entitled to his whole hire.

If a person hire another to carry a letter to Basra and bring back an answer, and he accordingly go to Basra, and there find the person dead, to whom the letter is addressed, and come back and return the letter, he is not entitled to any wages whatever. This is according to the two disciples. Mohammed maintains, that he is to receive the usual hire for going to Basra, since in so doing he has performed a part of the contract, namely, the journey; the reason of which is that the hire or recompense is in lieu of the journey, as it is that which is attended with labour, not the carriage of the letter. The argument of the two disciples is, that the carriage of the letter is the thing contracted for; either because that is the design (the letter being intended as a compliment to the person to whom it is addressed), or because the carriage of the letter is a mean of accomplishing the design of it, namely, a communication of its contents. The title to wages, therefore, depends upon the carriage of the letter; but, upon the messenger returning the letter; the contract is broken, and his claim to wages consequently ceases; in the same manner as in the next following example concerning wheat. If, however, in the case in question, the messenger leave the letter at Basra, and return, he is entitled to a hire for the journey thither, according to all our doctors, since what was contracted for has been in part performed in this instance.

If a person hire another to carry wheat to a certain person at Basra, and he accordingly carry the wheat to Basra, and then find the person dead to whom it was consigned, and he bring back and return the wheat to the hirer, he is not entitled to any thing whatever, according to all our doctors, as he has failed in the performance of what he had contracted for. It is otherwise (according to Mohammed) in the case of the letter, because in that case (agreedly to his tenets) the journey was the thing contracted for, as has been already explained.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE HIRE OF WHICH IS UNLAWFUL OR OTHERWISE; AND OF DISPUTED HIRE.

A house or shop may be hired without specifying the particular business to be carried on in it. It is lawful to hire a house or shop for the purpose of residence, although no mention be made of the business to be followed in it; because, as the ostensible purpose to which it is to be applied is residence, this must be taken for granted; and residence does not admit of various descriptions. The contract in question is therefore valid; and the lessee is at liberty to carry on in the place any business he pleases, as the case is absolute.

Unless it be of a nature injurious to the building. A blacksmith, however, or fuller or miller must not reside in the house, as this would be evidently injurious, since the exercise of those trades would shake the building. Although, therefore, the contract in question be absolute, still it is virtually restricted to what may not be injurious to the building.

In a lease of land, the renter is entitled to the use of road and water. It is lawful to hire land for the purpose of cultivation, as this is the use to which land is commonly applied. In this case also, the hirer is entitled to the use of the road leading to the land, and likewise to the water (that is, to his turn of watering) although no mention of these be made in the contract; because land is hired with a view to the use of it, which cannot be obtained without a right to road and water;—both are therefore included, although no mention of them be made at the time of concluding the contract;—in opposition to a case of sale; for in that instance a right to road and water is not included unless particularly specified, the land of sale being appropriated, not present use; whence it is that it is lawful to sell an ass's colt, or saltpetre grounds, but not to hire them.

But the lease is not valid, unless the use to which it is to be applied be specified. A lease of land is not valid unless mention be made of the article to be raised in it, because land is hired, not only with a view to cultivation, but also for other purposes, such as building, and so forth; moreover, the articles grown in the land may be of different qualities since some vegetables come quickly to maturity, whilst others are slower of growth. It is therefore requisite that the article be specified, to avoid disputes between the lessor and lessee; or, that the lessor declare "I let the land on this condition, that the lessee shall raise whatever he pleases in it," in which case, as the lessee expressly leaves the lessee at full liberty, the uncertainty which might occasion a dispute is removed.

At the expiration of the lease, the land must be restored in its original state. If a person hire unoccupied land, for the purpose of building or planting, it is lawful, since these are purpose to which land is applied. Afterwards, however, upon the term of the lease expiring, it is incumbent on the lessee to remove his buildings of trees, and to restore the land to the lessor in such a state as may leave him no claim upon it, because houses or trees have no specific limit of existence, and if they were left upon the land it might be injurious to the proprietor. It is otherwise where land is hired for the purpose of tillage, and the term of the lease expires at a time when the grain is yet unripened; for in such case the grain must be suffered to remain upon the land, at a proportionable rent, until it be fit for reap ing; because, as the time that may require is limited and ascertainable, it is possible to attend to the right of both parties. In the case, on the contrary, of trees or buildings, it is impossible to pay attention to the right of both parties; and it is therefore incumbent on the lessee to remove his trees or houses from the land:—unless the proprietor of the soil agree to pay him an equivalent, in which case the right of property in them devolves to him (still, however, this cannot be, without the consent of the owner of the houses or trees; except where the land is liable to sustain an injury from the removal, in which case the proprietor of the land is at liberty to give an equivalent, and appropriate the trees or houses without the lessee's consent);—unless the proprietor of the land assent to the tenant or his house remaining there, in which case they continue to appertain to the lessee, and the land to the landlord; for as the right of removing them belongs to the landlord he is at liberty to forego that right. It is written in the Jama Sagheer that if the term of the lease be expired and the land be occupied by pulse or other garden stuffs, those must be removed; because as those have no fixed term of existence, they are therefore analogous to trees.

An absolute contract leave the hirer at liberty to give the use to any person. The hire of an animal is lawful, either for carriage or for riding, as to those uses animals are applied. If, therefore, the riding be absolutely expressed, the hirer is at liberty to permit any person he pleases to ride upon the animal, because of the riding being contracted for in an absolute manner. Upon the hirer, however, either mounting the animal himself, or admitted another to ride on it, he is not at liberty to use any person on it besides, because the actual object of the contract is then ascertained and determined. Men, moreover, differ in their mode of riding, whence it in fact becomes the case if the particular person of the riding had been expressly stipulated in the contract. In the same manner also, if a person hire a dress for the purpose of wearing it unrestrictedly, and in an absolute manner, he is at liberty either to wear it himself, or to give it to any other person to wear: but upon putting it on himself, or permitting another so to do, he is not at liberty to clothe any one in it besides.

But in a restricted contract, any deviation with respect to the use renders the hirer responsible for the article hired:—If a person let a quadruped to hire, on condition that a particular person shall ride upon it, or let a dress to hire, on condition that a particular person shall wear it,—and the hirer set upon the quadruped some other than the person specified, or give the dress to some other person to wear, and the quadruped or dress be destroyed, he [the hirer] is responsible; because, as men differ in their manner of riding, and of wearing clothes, the specification of a particular person is valid, and consequently it is not lawful for the hirer to swerve therefrom. The same rule also obtains with respect to every thing liable to be differently affected by a different occupant: in other words, if the person who lets to hire restrict the use, it is restricted accordingly; and if the hirer swerve therefrom, he is responsible in case of the destruction of the article, for the reason above stated.

Unless that be of a nature not liable to injury from such deviation.—LAND, however, and every other article not liable to be differently affected by a different occupant (such as a tent or pavilion), is not restricted in point of use by the mention of a particular person; and consequently, the hirer is at liberty to set upon the land one to whom he is not responsible, since the exclusive restriction is of use only because of its preventing a difference of effect. But the residence of persons whose business is of injurious tendency to a building (such as blacksmiths, and so forth), is always excepted from the contract, as was before explained.

Or, unless the deviation be not of a nature to injure the article.—If a person hire an animal to carry a burden, and the person who lets it to hire specify the nature and quantity of the article with which the hirer is to load the animal,—as if he were to say, for instance, “You shall load it with five Kafeezs of wheat”—the hirer is in this case at liberty to load the animal with an equal quantity of any article not more troublesome or prejudicial in the carriage than wheat, such as barley, or ape-seed, as all articles of that description are included in the permission contained in the contract, because of their not occasioning and difference, or because they may be even preferable to what was specified in it, as being less prejudicial. The hirer, however, is not at liberty to load the animal with any article of a more prejudicial nature, in the carriage, than wheat (such as salt, for instance), since to this the lessor had not assented.

If a person hire an animal th carry a certain quantity of cotton, he is not at liberty to load the animal with a similar quantity of iron, since it is highly probable that the carriage of the iron may be more prejudicial to the animal than the carriage of the cotton, for this reason, that the iron presses chiefly on one spot of the creature's back, whereas the cotton presses on it equally in all parts.

An excess in the use induces a proportionable responsibility in case of accident.—If a person hire an animal to carry a certain quantity of wheat, and load it with a greater quantity, and the animal perish, he is responsible in the proportion of the excess load. Thus a person, for instance, hires an animal to carry ten Kafeezs of wheat, and loads him with fifteen Kafeezs, and the animal perishes:—in which case he is responsible for one third of the value of the animal. The reason of this is that the animal in question has perished in consequence both of what has been permitted to the hirer, and also, of what has not been permitted; as, however, the destruction has been occasioned by the whole burden, it is divided between both parties respectively; and accordingly, nothing is accounted upon the proportion allowed, but an indemnification is due upon the proportion unallowed. If, however, the hirer had overloaded the animal to a degree beyond what it was able to bear, he is, in this case, responsible for the whole of the value, since he was utterly unauthorized to act thus, as it is altogether unusual to do so.

A rider, taking up an additional rider, incurs responsibility for half the value of the animal.—If a person hire an animal for his own riding, and he take up another person with him upon the animal, and the animal perish, he is responsible for one half of the value.—No regard is paid to the load in this instance, because a person who does not understand riding will hurt an animal’s back, although he be of light weight, as, on the contrary, a complete rider sits right on horse-back, although his person be heavy.—Besides, a man is not an article of weight, whence his weight cannot be ascertained; and accordingly regard must be paid to the number of the riders, in the same manner as, in offences against the person, regard is paid to the number of the offenders;—in other words; if one person accidentally give another ten wounds, and a second person give him one wound, and the wounded person die, the fine of blood is due from both in equal shares.

What is here advanced proceeds on a supposition of the animal in question being capable of carrying double: for if it be incapable of carrying double, the hirer is responsible for the whole value, in the same manner as in the case of wheat.—It is also to be observed that, in the same manner as this rule applies to adults, so does it likewise to infants capable of riding alone upon an animal: but if the hirer place behind him an infant incapable of riding alone, it is the same as goods or effects, and he is, in such case, responsible only in proportion to the additional load.

An hired animal perishing from ill usage subjects the hirer to responsibility.—If a person hire an animal for riding, and pull the halter, or beat the animal, so as to occasion its death, he is responsible for the whole value, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that he is not responsible where he only pull the halter or beats the animal in such a degree as is customary, since every thing customary is included in the contract, and therefore the case is the same as if he were to perform those acts by express permission of the owner, whence he is not responsible.—The argument of Haneefa is that the owner's permission is restricted to the condition of safety, since an animal may be driven without either pulling the halter or beating it, both of these being an excessive and unnecessary exertion: the use, therefore, is restricted to the condition of safety, in the same manner as the travelling upon the public highway.

In the hire or loan of animals, responsibility is induced by any deviation from the prescribed journey.—If a person hire an animal to carry him to a particular place (Medina, for instance), and he go out of his way, and proceed to another place, and then return with the animal to Medina, and it die, he is responsible for it. The same rule also holds with respect to an animal lent.—Some have said that this example proceeds upon a supposition of the animal being hired merely to go to Medina (not to go and return), in which case the hirer is not, in fact, required to restore it to the owner: but that where it is hired for the purpose both of going and coming, the hirer is in the same predicament with a trustee who first swerves from the terms of his trust, and afterwards accords to them, in which case he is not responsible for the deposit in his hands.—Others, again, say that the rule is absolute; and consequently that responsibility attaches in either case: for there is an essential difference between a hirer or borrower, and a trustee; because the trustee is directed to keep the deposit, independently, and consequently the order of conservation still remains in force after the trustee ceases from his deviation and reconsents to the terms of trust, whence he reverts to his situation of representative of the owner, or vice versa. In a case of hire or loan, the hirer or borrower are directed to keep the article dependently of the use, and not independently; and consequently, upon the use ceasing, they no longer continue representatives of the owner: whence they are not discharged from responsibility by their return to Medina.—This is approved.

The change of a saddle for another of the same sort does not induce responsibility.—If a person hire an ass with its saddle, and fasten upon it another saddle, of the same sort as is commonly used upon such an ass, he is not responsible if the ass perish; because where the saddle is proportionate to the animal, the owner's assent to it, as the restriction is advantageous only in case of the other saddle being heavier than the one specified in the contract, when, if the ass were to perish, the hirer would be responsible in proportion to the difference.

Unless the weight be different, when responsibility attaches in proportion to the excess.—If, on the contrary, the hires were to fasten upon the ass a saddle of a sort not commonly used upon such an ass, he is responsible for the whole value; for as this is not included in the lessor's assent, it follows that the hirer, in so doing, acts contrary to engagement.

If the nature of the saddle be different, responsibility attaches in toto.—If a person hire an ass with its saddle, and fasten upon the ass a pack-saddle, of a sort not commonly put upon such an ass, he is in this case responsible for the whole value of the animal for the reason alleged in the example of the saddle; nay, the obligation rests upon him in this case, a fortiori, since a pack-saddle or panniers are not of the same nature as a riding-saddle, and are, moreover, heavier. If, also, he fasten upon the ass a pack-saddle of a sort commonly used upon such an ass, he is responsible for the whole value, according to Haneefa.

The two disciples allege that, in this instance, he is responsible only in proportion as the load of the pack-saddle exceeds that of the riding-saddle; because, where the pack-saddle is of a sort commonly put upon such an ass, it follows that the riding-saddle and the pack-saddle are equal, and consequently that the owner of the ass assents, except the latter exceed the former in weight, in which case the hirer is responsible in proportion to the excess of weight, as to that the owner is not assenting.—The excess, therefore, in this instance, is analogous to a case where the person who lets out an animal to hire specifies the quantity of wheat he is to carry, and the hirer loads it with a larger quantity.—The argument of Haneefa is that a pack-saddle is not in the nature of a common saddle:—it is not so in appearance, since it is more spread upon the animal on one side than on the other; nor is it so in reality, since a pack-saddle is for carrying burdens, whereas a common saddle is for riding. The hirer, therefore, in fastening a pack-saddle upon the ass, acts contrary to his engagement with the owner, in the same manner as a

HIRE

This is according to the Zahir Rawayet. Some have said that the Peerahin is merely a Kabba, or vest, of one fold. Others, again, say that the Peerahin is not particularly restricted to vest of one fold, as both are used indiscriminately at all seasons. It is reported from Haneefa, that the proprietor of the cloth is to take a compensation from the tailor, and that he has no option of any thing else because the Kabba is a species of apparel totally different from the Peerahin, the tailor stands in the predicament of an usurper. The reasons of the doctrine, as reported from the Zahir Rawayet, is that the Kabba is in one shape a Peerahin, as it is occasionally used instead of the Peerahin, and in another view it is not so. Hence there is both a similitude and a dissimilitude; and accordingly the proprietor of the cloth has it at his option to take a compensation for the value (in which case the cloth becomes the property of the tailor), or, to take the Kabba, paying an adequate hire:—an adequate hire only is due, because the tailor has not completely fulfilled his agreement; and it must not exceed what was at first agreed upon, as obtains in all cases of invalid hire.

If a person deliver a piece of cloth to a tailor, directing him to make it into a Kabba, and he make it into a Shilvar, or drawers, some allege that the proprietor must accept a compensation; and that he has no other option because of the different uses to which those two sorts of apparel are applied. It is certain, however, that the proprietor has it at his option, in this instance, either to take a compensation for the value of his cloth, or to take the Shilvar, paying an adequate hire; because the use, namely, clothing and covering nakedness, is the same in both; and the case is therefore analogous to where a person orders a brazer to make him a dish of this brass, and the brazer makes him a brazen plate, in which instance the proprietor of the brass has an option, and so also in the case in question.

CHAPTER IV.

OF INVALID HIRE,

In invalid condition invalidates hire—Hire is rendered invalid by involving an invalid condition, in the same manner as sale, for hire stands in the place of sale, whence it is that a contract of hire may be dissolved in the same manner as a contract of sale.

But a proportionate hire is in much case due, to the extent of the hire specified. In a case of hire rendered invalid by involving an invalid condition, a proportionate hire is due where that does not exceed the hire, specified in the contract; in other words, of the specified hire and the proportionate hire, the smallest is due. Ziffer maintains that person who hires an animal to carry wheat, and loads it with iron.

A porter is not made responsible by any immaterial deviation from the prescribed road. If a person hire a porter to carry a load of wheat to a certain place, by a particular road, and he take another frequented road, and the wheat be lost, he is not responsible; and if he carry the wheat safe to the place, he is entitled to his hire. This proceeds upon the supposition that the roads are not widely different, for in this case the restriction to either in particular is useless.

Where, however, the roads are widely different, that taken by the porter being dangerous or round about, or of difficult passage, the porter is responsible in case of the wheat being lost, since the restriction is of use in this instance, and therefore, valid. It is to be observed that Mohammed does not make this distinction, but alleges that the porter is not responsible if he carry his load by any other than the road specified, provided it be one commonly used; because, where it is a beaten path, there is no apparent difference between the two. If, on the contrary, he carry the load by an unfrequented road, and it be lost, he is responsible for the value, as the restriction is valid, and the porter acted contrary to his instructions.

If, however, in this case, he carry the wheat safe to the place, he is entitled to his hire; because upon so doing his deviation from his orders is rectified, and the end is obtained.

Any injurious deviation from the prescribed culture of hired land induces a proportionable responsibility. If a person hire land for the cultivation of wheat, and sow therein trefoils or clover, he is responsible in proportion to the damage the land sustains, because the cultivation of any species of grain is more injurious to the land than the cultivation of wheat, as those require more water, and their roots spread more in the ground. In this instance, therefore, the lessee has acted contrary to his agreement with the lessor, inasmuch as he had done a thing more injurious to the land than what the lessor had specified. But if the lessor require this compensation, he is not entitled to any rent, as the lessee in that case stands as an usurper, because of his acting contrary to engagement, as before explained.

A porter is responsible for deviating from his orders. If a person deliver a piece of cloth to a tailor, directing him to make it into a Peerahin, or shirt, for a particular hire and he make it into a Kabba, or short vest, the person has it in his option either to take a compensation from the tailor for his cloth, or to receive the Kabba, paying him an adequate hire, which, however, is not to exceed what had been at first agreed upon.

a proportionate hire is due, to whatever amount it may extend; for he conceives an analogy between the case in question and a case of invalid sale, in which the value of the article is due, to whatever amount. The argument of our doctors is that usufruct cannot be appreciated but in a contract entered into to answer the necessity of mankind, whence, in valid hire, the degree is measured by the necessity. As, however, invalid hire is a dependant of a contract of valid hire, it has a relation to a valid contract, and consequently regard is paid in it to what may be the customary recompense in valid hire, which is a proportionate hire. Now the parties, in a case of invalid hire, having agreed upon a specific amount, it follows that both, in making such specification agreed to remit whatever may be beyond the specified hire, where that is exceeded by the proportionate hire; in this case, therefore, the specified hire is due—but if, on the other hand, the proportionate hire fall short of the specified hire, the excess of the specified hire is not due, as the specification itself was invalid. It is otherwise in an invalid sale, for as an article of sale is appreciable to its extent, there is no necessity for a regard to the contract in order to manifest its value. Now this value is the original thing; if, therefore, the specification of a price be valid (as in a case of valid sale), the effect passes from the price stated, to the said price; but if, on the contrary, the specification of price be invalid (as in a case of invalid sale), the effect does not pass from the original thing to the price.

A contract indefinitely expressed closes at the expiration of the first term. If a person hire a house, on a condition thus expressed, that "he shall pay one dirh every month," such contract is valid for one month, but invalid for every subsequent month, unless the whole of the months for which it is to be hired be specified, in which case it continues valid. The arguments on which this is founded are to be found in the words in the Arabic idiom—it is to be observed that as the contract in question is valid for one month only, it belongs to both the lesser and lessee, respectively, to dissolve the contract at the end of the month, as the valid contract is then complete and finished. If, therefore, in this instance, the lessee, after the expiration of the said month, continue in the house for a single instant of the second, the contract remains in force for the second month, nor is the lessee at liberty to put out the lessee until the end of this month (and the same rule holds with respect to one month from the beginning of which the lessee continues to occupy the house); because the contract appears to be renewed, with the consent of both parties, in virtue of the lessee still continuing to occupy the house in the succeeding month. This, however, proceeds merely upon analogy; and has been adopted by some of our modern doctors. According to the Zahir Rawayat, an option of dissolution remains in the next month, to either party, to the end of the first day of the month; for in having regard to the very first instant only of that month, a restriction is induced so narrow as not to admit the exercise of an option.

Rules with respect to annual leases. If a person hire a house for a year, at the rate of twelve dirhms, it is lawful, although no mention is made of the rent of each month respectively; because, as the whole term of the lease is known without division, it is therefore the same as hiring for a single month, which is lawful, although no mention be made of the rent of each day respectively—it is to be observed that if the day of the year's commencement be specified (as if the lessee were to say, "I take this house, for a year, from the first of the month Rajab"), the lease contract from the date. If, on the contrary, no date of commencement be specified, the lease commences from the date of the deed itself; because all dates are equal with respect to hire, and therefore a lease in this particular resembles a vow; in other words, if a person make a vow that "he will not speak (for instance) to a particular person for one month," the observance of his vow commences upon the instant of expressing it, all dates being equal with respect to vows; and so also in the case in question. It is also to be observed, that if in this invalid hire the contract be concluded on the first day of the month, all the succeeding months of the year are counted from the appearance of the new moon as this is the original standard of calculation. If, on the contrary, the contract be concluded after the lapse of some days from the commencement of a month, the lease is in that case for three hundred and sixty days, according to Haneefa; and there is one report from Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect. According to Mohammed, and another report of Aboo Yoosaf, the first month is to be counted by days, to be commenced from the next new moon; and the other months must be counted from the appearance of each new moon; because a calculation by the number of days is admitted purely from necessity which exists in the first month only. The argument of Haneefa is that upon the first month being completed by the deduction of a certain number of days from the second, that also must, from necessity, be counted by days; and so of the rest to the end of the year; in the same manner as obtains with respect to the Eid—that is to say, if a divorce take place in the middle of a month, it must be counted by days, and so also in the present instance.

Wages are due to keepers of baths and cuppers. Keepers of baths and cuppers are lawfully entitled to wages—the former because it is an invariable custom, among all Mussulmans, to pay them wages, and the Prophet has said, Whatever seems good unto the body of the Mussulmans is also Hire of Indefinite articles.—The hire of any thing indefinite is invalid, according to Haneefa, unless from a partner.—The two disciples maintain that such hire is valid;—and decrees pass accordingly.—(This rule chiefly applies to such cases as where, for instance, a person lets a share or portion of his house to another, or lets his own share in a partnership-house to any other than his partner).—The argument of the two disciples is that an indefinite part is capable of being used (whence a proportionate hire is due), and the delivery of it is practicable, either by the lessor vacating his share to the lessee, or by agreeing to hold it with him alternately.—The case is therefore the same as if he were to let it to a partner, or between two, which would be valid: consequently this resembles a case of sale.—The argument of Haneefa is that as the lessor, in this instance, lets to hire an article which both incapable of delivering, the deed is consequently invalid.—The ground of this is that the delivery of an indefinite part of any thing is inconceivable; because delivery cannot be completely executed on one part without seisin on the other; and seisin, as being a perceptible act, cannot take place but upon a specific subject.—With respect to execution, it is regarded as a delivery, because it amounts to investiture, an act through which occupancy, or, in other words, a power of seisin, is obtained. With respect to alternate occupancy, on the other hand, that cannot be established but in virtue of a right of property in the use, which is an effect of the contract of hire. Now as the effect of any thing must be subsequent to that thing, it follows that the alternate occupancy is subsequent to the execution of the contract of hire: but ability to make delivery is one condition of the contract; and as the condition to a thing must precede that thing, it follows that the ability to make a delivery must precede the contract of hire. A thing, however, which is subsequent cannot be considered as antecedent; and hence the alternate occupancy, which is subsequent, is incapable of being accounted a delivery.—Where, on the contrary, the lease is to a partner, the whole use arising from the article become the property of the lessee, and consequently no part of what he holds can be termed indefinite: neither is the difference in the nature of the usufruct (from part of it being in virtue of right of property, and part of it in virtue of a lease) injurious to the lessee in this instance.—Besides, the hire of an indefinite subject is unlawful from a partner also (according to an opinion of Haneefa, as reported by Hasan).—It is otherwise in a case of supervenient indefiniteness, as that does not occasion contention. (A supervenient indefiniteness is where a person lets an article to two persons, and one of the lessors dies, or where two persons let an article to one person, and one of the lessors dies, in which case the lease continues in force with respect to the other's share, indefinitely, and does not become invalid, according to the Zahir Rawayet, for this reason, that ability to make delivery is not a condition merely because of the contract, but because of the obligation of delivery,—which obligation exists in the beginning; not afterwards whence the ability of delivery is not a condition in the continuance. It is also otherwise where an article is let to two persons, because in this instance a delivery of the whole is established, after which an infinite division supervenes, because of the right of property of each party being separate.

_Hire of a nurse._—It is lawful to hire a nurse to suckle a child, at a certain rate of wages: because God has said in the Koran, "If they suckle your children, pay them their hire," and also, because, in the time of the Prophets, such was the practice, and likewise both before and since his time.—Some have said that the contract of hire, in the case in question, is a contract for serving the infant, the particulars of such service (namely, attendance and milk) following as dependants, in the same manner as the colour in a contract for dyeing cloth (Others maintain that the contract is a contract for the milk, the attendance following as a dependant: and accordingly, if a goat be hired to give milk to an infant, no recompense is due.—The former opinion, however, is the more forcible, and so are the contracts of hire not conclusively for destruction or expenditure of an actually existing article; as where, for instance, a person hires a cow for the purpose of using her milk, which is invalid, as shall be shortly shown to its proper place.)—Such, therefore, being the case, the contract in question is valid, provided the rate of hire be specified, considering it as hiring a person for the sake of her attendance.

It is lawful to hire a nurse to suckle an infant in return for meat and clothing, on a favourable construction, according to Haneef.—The two disciples maintain that this is not lawful, because as the recompense is indeterminate and unknown, the case is therefore the same as if a woman were hired to bake bread, or so forth, in return for her meat and clothing.—The argument of Haneef is that the indeterminateness in question is not likely to engender strife, since it is customary to feed nurses in a liberal manner, with a view to render them kind and tender to the children under their care.—This case; therefore, resembles the selling of a measure of wheat out of a heap, which is lawful, although the seller be at liberty to give the wheat from whatever part of the heap he pleases, as an ignorance in that particular does not engender strife.—It is otherwise in the case of hiring a woman to bake bread, or the like, because an ignorance in that instance is calculated to occasion contention.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that no explana-person hires an ass, to carry wheat, in consideration of a measure of such wheat, or an ox, to grind grain; the hire allowed must not exceed the value of what has been specified, because, as the hire is invalid, the least only of the two (the hire named, or an adequate hire) is due, since the person who lets the animal has agreed to remit any thing beyond. It is otherwise where two men enter into a partnership in collecting wood, and one of them says to the other, "I will take the whole wood; and pay you a remuneration for your share in the collecting of it," for in this case an adequate remuneration is due, to whatever amount (according to Mohammed), inasmuch as no sum has been specified in this instance, whence no remission of any excess can be inferred.

Partners do not owe hire to each other with respect to their stock.—If a person hire another to carry wheat which is in partnership between them, no remuneration is due; for in all grain so carried the porter works on his own account, whence a complete delivery is not made of the thing contracted for.

Any uncertainty in the terms invalidates the contract.—If a person hire another to back ten particular saas of wheat into bread, "this day," for a dirm, it is invalid, according to Haneefa. The two disciples in the Mabsoot, article Hire, maintain that the contract in question is valid; because in this instance the performance of the task [of baking the bread] is the thing really contracted for, the mention of a time being considered merely as for the purpose of expenditure, in order that the contract may be valid; and consequently the objection of uncertainty is removed. The argument of Haneefa is that the thing contracted for is uncertain; because the specification of a time argues that the thing contracted for is general usufruct, or, in other words, the hireling's surrender of himself [to service]; and, on the other hand, the specification of a particular act argues that such act is the thing contracted for. Now general usufruct and a particular act cannot be united; for where a particular act is the thing contracted for, no hire is due for the labourer's surrender of himself. As, moreover, neither of these has a preference over the other, and the advantage is to the hirer, in the latter instance, and to the hireling in the former, it follows that a contract of this nature would lay a foundation for strife. It is reported, from Haneefa, that where the hirer, instead of "this day" says "within this day," the hire is valid, as in such case the thing contracted for is the particular act or task specified: contrary to where he says "this day." These arguments upon this point are connected with Arabic grammar, and have already been stated in treating of Divorce.

A child (such as washing its linen, preparing its victuals, and so forth) is incumbent upon the nurse. The victuals, however, must be provided by the father. With respect to what has been observed by Mohammed, that, "it is incumbent upon the nurse to provide oils and perfumes," this is according to the custom of Koofa.

If the nurse above mentioned feed the child with goat's milk, during the term of hire, she is not entitled to any wages, as not having performed what was her duty, namely, fosterage, or, in other words the feeding the feeding the child with milk from her own breasts; for feeding it with milk from a goat is not fosterage, but merely feeding it with milk. Wages, therefore, are not due to her in this instance, as she has not performed what she had contracted for.

A contract of hire, stipulating that the recompense shall be paid from the article manufactured or wrought upon is invalid—If a person deliver thread to a weaver, to make it into cloth, in consideration of an half thereof to himself, he is to receive a recompense proportionate to his work; and the same rule also holds if a person hire an ass to carry wheat, paying, in consideration a measure of such wheat. The contract, therefore, is invalid in both these instances, because the recompense is made to consist of a thing obtained by the labour of the person or animal hired, and hence the case is analogous to that of an allowance made for grinding, which has been prohibited by the Prophet. (The case of allowance for grinding is where a person hires an ox to grind grain in consideration of a proportion from the flour or meal; and this case is the grand criterion by which a judgment is formed of the invalidity in various instances of hire, more especially in our country.) The reason of the prohibition, in this instance, is that the hirer is incapable of delivering the recompense (namely, a part of the woven cloth, or a part of the carried grain); for as the obtaining of it depends upon the act of the person or animal hired, the hirer cannot be accounted capable of making delivery merely in virtue of the capacity of that person or animal. The contract is therefore invalid and an adequate hire is due. It is otherwise where a person hires an ass to carry one half of a parcel of wheat, in consideration of the other half; for in this instance no hire is due on account of the animal hired, as the hirer has constituted the owner of the ass proprietor of half of the grain upon the instant, in the manner of a prompt or advanced payment, and consequently the wheat is in partnership between them, for reasons which will be explained in a future example. It is to be observed that where a person hires an ass, to carry wheat, in consideration of a measure of such wheat, or an ox, to grind grain; the hire allowed must not exceed the value of what has been specified, because, as the hire is invalid, the least only of the two (the hire named, or an adequate hire) is due, since the person who lets the animal has agreed to remit any thing beyond. It is otherwise where two men enter into a partnership in collecting wood, and one of them says to the other, "I will take the whole wood; and pay you a remuneration for your share in the collecting of it," for in this case an adequate remuneration is due, to whatever amount (according to Mohammed), inasmuch as no sum has been specified in this instance, whence no remission of any excess can be inferred.

These arguments upon this point are connected with Arabic grammar, and have already been stated in treating of Divorce.

*Expressed by an Arabic phrase (Kafeez Tehan), which will not bear a literal translation. It is more fully explained in Vol. IV, in treating of Compacts of Cultivation.

*The arguments in this example turn upon the distinction between the performance of a thing by general service, and the
A lease of lands is not invalidated by stipulating a right to perform any act which does and leave lasting effects.—If a person hires land, stipulating that he shall be at liberty to plough and cultivate it or to water and cultivate it, such contract is invalid because he is entitled to cultivate the land in virtue of the contract; and as this is impracticable unless he plough and water it, he is consequently entitled to perform these acts upon it likewise; and every other act of this nature in the same manner a requisite of the contract; nor does the mention of it cause invalidity. If, on the contrary, he stipulate that he shall be at liberty to plough the land twice, or to dig trenches in it, or to dung it, the contract is invalid; because, in this instance, an effect remains after the expiration of the term of hire, which is not a requisite of the contract. This condition, moreover, is disadvantageous to one of the contracting parties; and every stipulation of that nature invalidates a contract. Besides, in this instance, the lessor becomes, in fact, a tenant of the lessee with respect to such advantage as may remain to the land after the expiration of the lease; and consequently the contract involves one bargain within another, which is not lawful. Some explain ploughing twice to signify ploughing the land a second time, after having reaped a crop from it, and then returning it in that state to the owner; and concerning the invalidity in this instance no doubt can be entertained. Others, again, explain it to mean ploughing the land twice, and then sowing the grain in it. What is here advanced (with respect to the invalidity occasioned by stipulating a right of ploughing twice) applies solely to cases where the land is of a nature to be productive from once ploughing, and the term of hire only one year; for if the term of hire be three years (for instance), the advantage derived from ploughing twice remains; but the term trenches, as here used, small temporary trenches are not to be understood, but watercourses, such as are calculated to last, and yield an advantage the year ensuing.

A contract stipulating the recompense to consist of a similar usufruit is nugatory.—If a person hires land to cultivate, in return for the right [on the part of the lessor] of cultivating other land, it is nugatory; in other words, it is utterly invalid. Shafei maintains that it is valid. Analogous to this is the hire of a dwelling-house, in return for residence in another house; the hire of apparel in return for the use of other apparel; or the hire of a quadruped for riding, in return for a right of riding upon another quadruped. The argument of Shafei, is that the advantage is the same as actual substance; and it is on this idea that hire is valid in return for a debt of wages; * for if those were not the same as actual substance, it would follow that the transaction is the exchange of one debt for another debt, which is null. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, contracts upon credit are rendered invalid by an unity of species alone; and as an unity of weight or measure is not essential (according to our doctors, as has been already explained in treating of sale), the contract in question, therefore, resembles the sale, upon credit, of cloth of a particular description in return for cloth of the same description.—Secondly, the validity of hire is admitted (in opposition to what analogy would suggest) from convenience and necessity; but no convenience or necessity whatever exists where the advantage is exactly the same on both sides, contrary to where the advantage derived on each part is different.

Objection. Where hire of one kind is in return for hire of another kind, although it be not rendered invalid by a non-existence of necessity or convenience, still it would follow that it is invalid, as being the sale of a debt for a debt.

Reply.—In this instance the subject from which the advantage accrues is made a substitute for the advantage, from necessity: the recompense, therefore, is as a price; and accordingly, the transaction is a sale of substance for something else than substance; which is lawful.

Case of two partners.—If a quantity of wheat be between two men in partnership, and one of them hire the other, or his ass, to carry his share to a certain place, and he, or his ass, carry the whole of the wheat thither, he is not entitled either to the recompense specified, or to a proportionate recompense. Shafei maintains that he is entitled to the specified recompense; because, according to his tenets, advantage is the same as actual substance; and as the sale of an undefined substance is lawful, it follows that it is also lawful to receive a recompense in return for an undefined advantage. The case in question, therefore, is similar to where a person hires a building; held in partnership between himself and another, for the purpose of keeping grain,—or, a slave held in partnership between him and another, for the pur-

*That is, wages owing from the person hired to the hirer (as where the hirer had previously performed service to the person whom he now hires, and for which this person still owes him wages.
The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold —
First, the person in question here hires another for the performance of a matter the existence of which cannot be conceived; because the carriage or portage of anything is a corporeal or perceptible act, which is impossible with respect to a thing invisible — and as the performance of the thing contracted for is impossible, it follows that no recompense is due. Secondly, the person hired is a partner of the hirer with respect to every particle he carries. Whence he carries on his own account also, and consequently does not perform what he had contracted for. It is otherwise where the thing contracted for is a partnership house, for keeping grain, for in this instance the thing contracted for is the use of the house and a delivery of that may be effected, without the person depositing his grain therein, by the other evacuating it to him.

A lease of land is invalid unless it specify the purpose to which the land is to be applied. — If a person hire land, without mentioning that it is for the purpose of cultivation, or, without mentioning what species of cultivation he means to employ it in, the contract is invalid: because land is hired for tillage, and also for other purposes; and, in the same manner, it is cultivated for various uses, some more and some less injurious to the soil. The thing contracted for is therefore uncertain; and accordingly the contract as is not lawful. Notwithstanding this, however, if the person who hires the land should cultivate it, and the term of the lease expire, he is entitled to the specified rent, on a favourable construction. According to analogy he is not so entitled (and such is the opinion of Ziffer), because the contract, as being once invalid, cannot afterwards become valid. — The reason for a more favourable construction, in this particular, is that, before the complete fulfilment of the contract, the uncertainty has been done away; and it therefore becomes valid, in the same manner as where the uncertainty is done away before the contract has been yet concluded; — the case being analogous to where a seller and purchaser do away an undefined time of promise for payment or delivery, in sale, before the usual term of credit expires, or do away a right of option extended beyond the term of three days, before the expiration of those three days. — If, in this case, the lessor and lessee dispute before cultivation, the lessee being desirous of cultivating the land, and the lessor forbidding him, the contract becomes dissolved, in order that strife may be prevented.

Responsibility does not attach, from the customary use of an article, under an indefinite contract. — If a person hire an ass to Bagdad (for instance) for one dirm, without specifying what it is to carry, and load upon it such a burden as men usually put upon that animal, and it die before it has proceeded more than half way, he is not responsible; because the article hired is as a trust in the hands of the hirer; although the contract be invalid. If, on the other hand, the ass arrive at Bagdad, the owner is entitled to the hire as stipulated, upon a favourable construction; because in this instance the uncertainty has been done away, in the same manner as in the preceding example. — If, also, a dispute arise between the hirer and the owner of the ass, before it be loaded, the contract is dissolved, in order that strife may be prevented.

CHAPTER V.

Difference between common and particular hirings. — Hirelings are of two description common and particular. — A common hireling is one with whom a contract of hire is concluded for work of such a nature as may be perceived by examining the subject: — and in this instance there is no occasion for any mention of a term; nor is he entitled to his hire or recompense until the work he has engaged for (such as dying or fulling) be executed, because the work is the only thing contracted for, where he engages to perform it in person, or the effect of such work, where he has not particularly engaged to perform it in person. — It is therefore lawful for him to work for the public at large, since no particular person has any exclusive claim to his service; and accordingly, he is termed Ajser Mooshtarik, that is, a general or common hireling. — (The rules with respect to particular hirelings shall be discussed in their proper place.)

The article committed to a common hireling is deposit. — An article delivered to common hirelings is a deposit in his hands. If, therefore, it perish whilst in his possession he is not in any degree responsible for it, according to Haneefa, and such also is the opinion of Ziffer. — The two disciples maintain that he is responsible, except where the article is lost or destroyed by any irremediable and irresistible accident, such as a fire burning down his house, or robbers, in such force as not to be repelled: because it is recorded of Alee and Omar that they understood a common hireling to be responsible; and also, because the care of the article is incumbent on him; as without such care he cannot perform his work upon it. When, therefore, the article is lost from any cause which might have been avoided, such as usurpation or theft, this proves him to have been negligent, and he is consequently responsible in the same manner as a trustee who lets to hire the deposit in his hands. — It is otherwise.

* Arab. Mooshtarik, literally held in common, meaning one whose services are open to all (such as a tradesman), in opposition to a particular servant.

where the article is lost from some unavoidable cause, such as fire, sudden death, and so forth, since in this case he cannot be accused of negligence.—The argument of Haneefa is that the article is merely a deposit in the workman’s hands, the possession of which does not involve responsibility, inasmuch as he took possession with consent of the proprietor; and accordingly, if it were lost from any unavoidable cause, he is not responsible.—whereas, if his possession of it involved responsibility, he would owe a compensation for it at all events, in the same manner as in a case of usurped property.—The case; moreover, of the article is incumbent upon the proprietor dependently and not essentially, and accordingly no hire is due for such case. This case is different from that of an hired trustee; for the care of the deposit is essentially incumbent upon a trustee who acts for hire, because of the wages he receives.

But he is responsible if it be destroyed in the course of his work.—A COMMON hireling is responsible in case of the loss or destruction of any article in the course of his work: as where a dyer or fuller tears the cloth entrusted to him, or a porter stumbles, or the girth of a camel breaks, and thus the goods with which he is loaded fall to the ground, or a boat sinks from the mismanagement of the boatman.—Ziffer maintains that the hireling is not responsible in those cases, because the hireling ordered him to work in an absolute manner, and hence his order extends as well to dangerous as to safe operations,—in other words, to operations which subject his property to damage, and also to operations under which it continues uninjured.—The hireling in question, therefore, is in the same predicament with a particular hireling, or any assistant of a workman.* The argument of our doctors is that the orders of the hirel do not extend to any operations but what are mentioned in the contract; and those are to be supposed of a safe nature, since in virtue of them is obtained the thing contracted for, namely, the effect of them,—whence it is that if this effect be obtained through the work of any other than the hireling, still the recompense is due. The orders of the hirel, therefore, do not comprehend any operations that may be injurious, since through such the thing contracted for, namely, the effect, cannot be produced. It is otherwise with respect to the assistant of a workman; because, as he works gratuitously, his work cannot be restricted to the condition of safety, for if it were so restricted, he would decline working gratuitously. It is also otherwise with respect to a particular hireling, as shall be hereafter explained.—(It is to be observed that the breaking of a camel’s girth, or so forth, is supposed to originate with the hireling, inasmuch as the accident may be attributed to his want of care.)—A common hireling, therefore, is responsible for any thing which may be destroyed in the course of his work; excepting, however, where a MAN is destroyed, either by the sinking of a boat, or by falling from a camel or other animal (although those accidents should have been occasioned by the driving of the camel or the navigating of the boat); for in this instance the hireling is not responsible, as responsibility for a MAN cannot be incurred in virtue of a contract, or in virtue of any thing but a Janayat, or of less against the person, whence it would be due, in this instance, not from the hireling, but from his Akila, who, however, cannot be made responsible by a contract.

If a person hire a porter to bring an earthen jar from the banks of the Euphrates (for instance), and he falls down upon the water and break the jar, the hireling is responsible to either to take the value which the jar bore at the place where it was taken up (in which case the porter is not entitled to any recompense), or to take a compensation for the value it bore at the place where it was broken, paying the porter a proportionate hire.—Responsibility is incurred in this instance, because (as was before said) the falling of the jar was either owing to the porter stumbling, or his rope breaking, which is attributed to him; and an option is allowed to the hireling; because, where the jar is broken upon the road, the circumstances admits of two constructions: for the hireling is in one shape guilty of a transgression from the beginning, inasmuch as the carriage of the jar from the place where it was taken up to the place directed is one act; and in another shape he is not guilty from the beginning, since the carriage was undertaken with the consent of the owner, and consequently no transgression took place until the breaking of the jar: the owner, therefore, has it at his option to proceed upon either ground; if he proceed upon the second ground, the hireling is to receive a recompense in proportion to the work he has rendered to the hireling: but it upon the first ground, he is not to receive anything, since in this view he has not rendered the hireling any service whatever.

* Meaning a person who assists the workman gratuitously (as will be perceived by the context a little further on).

A surgeon, or farrier, acting agreeably to customary practice, is not responsible in case of accidents.—If a surgeon perform the operation of phlebotomy in any customary part he is not responsible in case of the person dying in consequence of such operation,—This is according to the Mabsoot.—It is written, in the Jama Sagheer, that if: farrier bleed an animal for a dink, and the animal die in consequence, or if a cupper perform the operation of cupping upon a slave by direction of his master, and the slave die in consequence, no responsibility is incurred.—It is to be observed that the doctrine of the Mabsoot, in this particular proceeds upon the idea of a restriction t
the performance of the operation in some customary part; but it is unrestricted with respect to the assent of the party or otherwise; whereas the doctrine in the Jama Sagheer proceeds upon the idea of a restriction with respect to the assent [of the owner of the slave or animal], but is unrestricted with respect to the person with whom the operation is performed. Each of these reports, therefore, affords an argument with respect to the other; and consequently the cases in both are restricted to this, that the operation be performed in the usual part, and with consent of the party.—The ground on which the law proceeds in this particular is, that it is impossible for the operators to guard against consequences, as those must depend upon the strength or weakness of the constitution in bearing any disorder or pain; and as this is unknown, it is therefore impossible to restrict the work to the condition of safety either with respect to the cloth, as before treated of, because the strength or weakness of cloth may be known by skill and attention, whence it is possible in that instance to restrict the work to safety. Thus much with respect to common or general hirelings.

A particular hireling.—A particular hireling signifies one who is entitled to his hire in virtue of a surrender of himself during the term of hire, although he do no work; as, for instance, a person who is hired as a servant for a month, or to take care of flocks for a month, a certain rate, under a condition that he shall not serve or tend the flocks of any other person during that term.—An hireling of this description is denominated an Ajser Wahid, or singular hireling, because the advantage of his service belongs exclusively to a single person during the term of his engagement, and the wages he receives are opposed to such advantage;—and as the hireling, in this instance, is entitled to his hire in virtue of his surrender of himself, for the term of hire, he is entitled to his wages although he do no work, or although his work be afterwards undone; as where, for instance, a person is hired to make up a dress, and he sew it accordingly, and the sewing be afterwards ripped out, in which case he is nevertheless entitled to his hire.

Is not responsible for any thing he loses or destroys.—If an article be lost whilst in the hands of a particular hireling, without his act; by a thief stealing it (for instance), or, an usurer carrying it away,—or, if it be lost by his act, he is not responsible for it.—He is not responsible in the former instance, because the article is a deposit in his hands, since he took possession of it with the owner's consent; (this, according to Hanеefa, is evident:)—and it is also evident according to the two disciples, because they hold that the obligation of responsibility upon a common hireling proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, in order that men's property may be in security; but as a particular hireling does not engage to work for every person, it is still more likely that property is safe with such an hireling: and therefore, in this case, the law proceeds upon analogy.)—He is also not responsible in the second instance, because, as the advantage of this hireling's service is the property of the hirer, it follows that, where he directs him to act with his property, such direction is valid: consequently the hireling is his deputy; his acts, therefore, are the same as the acts of his principal, the hirer, and of course he is not responsible.

CHAPTER VI.

OF HIRE ON ONE OF TWO CONDITIONS.

The hire is valid, of a traderman, under an alternative with respect to work.—If the owner of cloth say to the tailor whom he has engaged, "If you make up this cloth in the Persian fashion, you shall have one dirm. and if in the Turkish fashion, you shall have two,"—it is valid, and the tailor is entitled to a recompense according to whichever of the two fashions he makes up the cloth in. In the same manner, also, if he say to a dyer, "If you dye this cloth purple, you shall have one dirm, and is yellow, you shall have two," the dyer is entitled to a recompense, according as he dyes the cloth purple or yellow.

Or of an article under an alternative of another article.—The same rule also holds if the proprietor of the article hired leave two things at the option of him who hires it;—as if he were to say to him "I let to you this house, for one month, for five dirms. or this other house, for one moth, for two dirms."

Or with respect to the use.—And so likewise if he leave at his option two different distances; as if he were to say "I hire to you this camel, to Koofa, for five dirms; or this, to the half-way station, for so much:"—and the same, also, if the proprietor give an option of three things: but if he give an option of four things, it is invalid.—In all these cases regard is had to sale; in other words, they are judged of by sale; for if in person agree to sell cloth, under this condition, that the purchaser shall take either of two particular pieces, as he pleases, it is valid (and so likewise, if he allow the purchaser an option of one out of three pieces): but it is not valid if he allow him an option of one out of four pieces.—The reason of this is that as cloth is of three descriptions, a good sort, a bad sort, and a middling sort, an option of three is of use, and necessity is thereby answered; but as, in a case of four pieces necessity is answered by a choice from a smaller number, so an option out of four is useless.—In the same manner, also, in hire, necessity is answered by an option from three things, as those comprehend a good, a bad, and a middling sort: and there is no occasion for four, as necessity is answered by fewer. —There is, however, this difference between sale and hire, that sale is not valid unless an option of determination be stipulated for; or if a person sell one of two slaves, it is valid only in virtue of stipulating an option of determination. —A contract of hire, on the contrary, is valid, for one of two advantages, without stipulating an option of determination, because the recompense is not due in virtue of the contract, but in virtue of the usufruct or work; and consequently, when the party commences the enjoyment of one of the advantages, the thing contracted for becomes known: but as, in a case of sale; the price of the article is due in virtue of the contract, uncertainty consequently exists in that instance to such a degree as leaves room for strife, unless the purchaser possesses an option of determination.

Case of a tradesman hired under an alternative with respect to time. —If a person say to a tailor whom he hires, "If you make up this garment this day you shall have one dirm; and if to-morrow, you shall have half a dirm." in this case, provided the tailor finish the garment within the day, he gets a dirm, or if he finish it the next day, he receives a proportionate hire (according to Haneefa) where that does not exceed half a dirm: in other words, he gets the least of the two, between a half dirm and his proportionate hire. —It is written, in the Jama Saeheer, that he is entitled to his proportionate hire, not being less than half a dirm, not more than one dirm. —The two disciples allege that both conditions are valid, and consequently, that if he perform his work on the morrow he gets an half dirm. —Ziffer maintains that both the conditions in question are invalid; because sewing, or tailor’s work, is one thing to which the hirer, in this instance, opposes two returns (namely, one dirm, and half a dirm), in the manner of a consideration: the recompense, therefore, is unequal. —It is written, in the Jama Saeheer, that “if he load it with a Koor of barley he shall pay one dirm, or if with a less, the ground on which it proceeds is, that the first specification does not become extinct on the second day, because then both specifications unite: regard, therefore, is had to it, with respect to preventing any excess beyond it; and to the second specification, with respect to preventing any deficiency: —If, in the case in question, the tailor finish the garment on the third day, he gets whatever is least of the two, his proportionate hire, to half a dirm.

This is approved; because, as the hirer was unwilling to have the work delayed for one day, it follows that he was unwilling to have it delayed longer than one day.

Case of hire of a shop, under an alternative with respect to the business to be carried on in it —If the lessee of a shop say to a person about to hire it "If you place a perfumer in this shop the rent is one dirm, or if a blacksmith, it is two," the contract is valid, and the lessee is entitled to one or other of the rents specified according to which of the two trades may be exercised in the shop. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that a contract thus expressed is invalid. —In the same manner, also, if a person hire a house, under this condition, that “if he reside in it himself, the rent shall be one dirm, or if he place a blacksmith in it the rent shall be two dirms," it is valid, according to Haneefa, whereas the two disciples deem it invalid.

And of an animal, under a condition with respect to the journey it is to perform. —If a person hire an animal of Heera for one dirm; under a condition that if he proceed on to Kadseea he shall pay two dirms, it is valid: and in this instance, also, the above difference of opinion may be inferred: that is to say, this example is stated in theMetric of [Hardee] generally, without mentioning any difference of opinion; but it bears the construction of a difference of opinion, and also of an agreement of opinion.

Or the load it is to carry. —If a person hire an animal to Heera, under this condition, that "if he load it with a Koor of barley he shall pay one dirm, or if with a Koor of wheat he shall pay two dirms," it is valid according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain it to be invalid.—The ground on which the two disciples proceed is, that in all the instances here recited the thing contracted for is uncertain; and in the same manner, the hire, as being one of two things, is also uncertain; and uncertainty occasion invalidity.—It is otherwise in the example of making up apparel after the Persian or the Turkish fashion, because the hire is due on account of the work, and in his instance the uncertainty is removed as soon as the work is begun; whereas in the examples in question the hire is due on account of the relinquishment and delivery of the house or animal, whence the uncertainty still continues, because after delivery, in case of no use being made of the article, it is not known which of the two hires specified is due (for it is a principle, with the two disciples, that hire is due on account of relinquishment and delivery.)—The argument of Haneefa is that the lessee, in the case in question, gives the lessee an option of either of two valid contracts of different descriptions; for the hirer himself residing in the house is different from his placing a blacksmith to reside in it; and such being the case, the contract is valid, in the same manner as in the example of making up apparel after the Persian or the Turkish fashion.—With respect to what is advanced by the two disciples, that the hire is due on account of relinquishment and delivery, whereas the uncertainty still continues, it may be replied that the design of the contract of hire is advantage or usufruct; because, as such contracts are legalized to answer the necessity of mankind, it is evident that they are never entered into but with a view to such advantage; and the uncertainty is removed upon the advantage commencing. —As, moreover, the relinquishment and delivery, without any enjoyment of the use (which alone constitute endowment), are not principles, but rather mere accidents, there is no necessity to guard against uncertainty at the period of delivery. —Besides, if it be required, in a contract of hire, that the hire be due on the instant of delivery, it follows that the smallest of the two hires specified is due, as that is undoubted: the hire, therefore, is not uncertain.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE HIRE OF SLAVES.*

An hired servant cannot be taken upon a journey, unless it be so stipulated in the contract. —If a person hire a slave, as a servant, he is not at liberty to carry such slave along with upon a journey, unless this be a condition of the contract; because, as travelling is attended with additional trouble, a contract in general terms is not held to extend to it; whereas it is that travelling is a sufficient plea for breaking off a contract of hire. It is therefore requisite that, in the the contract in question, travelling be particularly stipulated, in the same manner as the residence of a blacksmith or fuller in a dwelling-house.—Besides, the difference between stationary service and travelling service is evident; and consequently, upon stationary service being ascertained or specified, the other description (namely, travelling service) cannot be included; —in the same manner as riding upon an animal; as, for instance, where a person in general terms hires an animal to ride, if the rider is afterwards ascertained, the hirer is not at liberty to set any other person upon the animal; and so likewise in the present case.

Wages paid to an inhibited slave, hired without the consent of his owner, cannot be resumed.—If a person hire an inhibited [absolute] slave for the term of one month, and pay him his wages after the performance of service, he is not at liberty to resume such wages. The ground of this is that the hire in question is valid, on a favourable construction, where a slave is not otherwise occupied. Analogously, in case of the validity of the inhibited, as the proprietor of the slave has not given his consent, and the slave is a Mahjoor, or inhibited:—in the same manner as if the slave were to die before the completion of the service; in which case the hirer would be responsible for his value; but he would not be responsible for any wages on account of the service performed, since in employing the slave he becomes an usurper, —whence he is, in case of the slave's death, required to pay a compensation for his value; and as, upon so doing, he becomes proprietor of the slave, the act of employing him, he thus appears to have derived an advantage from his own slave: wherefore, in such case, no wages are due. —The reason for a more favourable construction, in this instance, is that the transaction in question may be considered in two shapes: for first, it may be regarded as advantageous on the idea of the slave being unoccupied by any other business, and remaining in safety; and secondly, it may be regarded as injurious, on the idea of the slave dying before he finishes his service. —Now, on the idea of the transaction being advantageous, the slave is licensed therein, in a manner analogous to the acceptance of a gift. The contract of hire therefore is valid; and such being the case, it follows that the hirer is not at liberty to take back the wages.

The usurper of a slave is not responsible for what the slave earns during the term of usuraption.—If a person usurp a slave, and the slave afterwards let himself to hire, and the usurper receive his wages, and expend the same, he is not responsible for them, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples allege that he is responsible for the wages, because he has acted with the property of the master without his consent (for the contract of hire is valid, on the grounds stated in the preceding paragraph). The argument of Haneefa is that responsibility does not attach except in the case of destruction of protected property* (for the fixing of a price upon property is for the purpose of protecting it). Now the wages in question are not in a state of protection or custody in regard to the master, although they be so with respect to another, because the protection or custody of property is established only by actual possession, such as may admit of the care of it, like the possession of the proprietor, or his deputy; and the seizin of the slave is not the seizin of his master, since the slave hires itself in the possession of the usurper, and being thus incapacitated from protecting his own person, is therefore incapable of protecting his wages from the usurper.—If, however, the master finds the wages in the usurper’s possession, he is entitled to take them from him as in this case discovers his own property.—In the case in question, also, it is lawful for the slave to take possession of his wages from the usurper, according to the opinion of our three doctors, since, if not otherwise employed, and remaining safe, he is licensed with respect to the transaction, because of its being advantageous, as was before mentioned.—It is different where a master lets his slave to hire; for in this case the slave is not at liberty to take possession of his wages unless his master constitute him his agent for that purpose, because receiving the wages is one of the rights of the contract.

Case of a slave hired for different terms—If a person hire a slave for two months, with this distinction, that he shall serve one month for four dirms, and one month for five dirms, it is lawful; and the hire is for four dirms in the first month; because the month first mentioned must be construed to mean the month immediately succeeding the execution of the contract, in order to its validity; for otherwise the contract would be invalid, since in this case a month would appear included in it which is not specified, and this would be invalid.—Besides, the act of hiring infers that the hiree has immediate occasion for the service of the slave, whence the month in question must necessarily be construed to mean the month immediately succeeding the execution of the contract, in order that the hiree’s necessity may be answered: and besides, in the case, the second month must in the same manner be necessarily construed to mean the month immediately succeeding the first month.

Arab, Mal Mohirrez.—The meaning of this has been fully explained elsewhere. (See Hirz, and Mohirrez.)

---

Case of hired slave absconding before the expiration of the term.—If a person hire a slave for one month, at the rate of one dirm, and take possession of the slave in the beginning of the month, and at the end of the month, the slave having absconded or fallen sick, the hiree and the owner or master dispute.—the hiree asserting that the slave had absconded or fallen sick in the beginning of the month, and the master, that he had not fallen sick or absconded until within a short time,—the assertion of the hiree must be credited —If, on the other hand, the hiree produce the slave, he being then present and in good health, the assertion of the master must be credited; because, as the parties differ upon a point which is of a problematical nature, a preference must be given to the side of the question which is best supported by apparent circumstances. The principle upon which the law in this instance proceeds is to be found in the case of the running or stopping of a mill-stream; for if the hiree of a mill dispute with the proprietor concerning the running of the stream during the term of hire,* in this case the assertion of that party is credited on whose behalf apparent circumstances bear testimony.†—If, on the contrary, they dispute concerning the deficiency in the running of the stream,—as if the lessee were to say that it had not run for ten days, and the lessor that it had not run for five days, in this case the assertion of the tenant must be credited, or evidence on the part of the lessor.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF DISPUTES BETWEEN THE HIREE AND THE HIRELING.

In cases of dispute with a tradesman concerning the orders he has received, the assertion of the employer must be credited.—If a dispute arise between the tailor and the owner of cloth,—the owner asserting that “he had directed the tailor to make the cloth into a vest,” and the tailor that “the owner had directed him to make it into drawers,”—or if a similar dispute happen with a dyer, the owner of the cloth affirming that he had directed him [the dyer] “to colour the cl.th yellow,” and the dyer that he [the owner] “had directed him to dye it red,”—in either case the declaration of the owner of the cloth must be credited, since it is from him that the orders proceed.—The ground of this is, that as, if the owner of the cloth were to

* He asserting that the stream had not run at all, and consequently that the mill stood still during the whole term.

dony the original order,* by disavowing the contract of hire, his word would be credited—so, in the same manner, his word must be credited where he denies the description or qualification of the order.—He must, however, be sworn, because if in this instance denials were given which, if he were free to affirm, or to repel, it would be binding upon him. Upon the owner of the cloth swearing, the tailor becomes responsible; that is, the owner of the cloth has at his option either to take the value of the cloth.—or to take the drawers, paying the tailor an adequate hire.

And so also, if the dispute be with regard to wages.—If a dispute arise between the owner of cloth and the dyer, tailor, or other workman,—the owner asserting that "he [the workman] had agreed to execute the work without hire," and the workman that "he wrought for hire," the assertion of the owner must be credited, inasmuch as he both denies any price having been put upon the workman's labour (which can only be effected by a contract), and also avers responsibility. On the other words, unless being due, which the claim owner; and the ascription of the defendant [upon oath] must be credited. Abū Yoosaf maintains that if the workman be one commonly employed by the owner of the cloth, and with whom it has been usual for the owner to fix a hire for his work, he is entitled to a hire proportionate to what he performs; but that, if he was not commonly employed by the owner he gets nothing whatever; and the reason is, that it is only former practice which can furnish a ground of recovery for wages, and establish the rate at which they are to be fixed in the present instance. Mohammed says that if it have been a general and known practice of the workman to work for hire, his word must be credited, because whenever he opens a workshop for the purpose of carrying on his business, this stands in place of an express declaration that he works for hire, as apparent circumstances signify thus much. It is to be observed that the opinion of Hannefa, as here stated, proceeds upon analogy, the owner of the cloth standing as the denier, or defendant. The opinion of the two disciples, on the other hand, proceeds upon a favourable construction, in order to what they consider an advantage in this particular it may be observed that apparent circumstances may suffice to repel, but are not sufficient to establish to claim; in other words, if a person advance a claim, such claim may be set aside by apparent circumstances, but apparent circumstances are incapable of constituting proof of or of establishing anything in his behalf; and, in the present instance, it is required that a claim be established. Sheikh-ul-Islam remarks that decrees pass according to the opinion of Mohammed,—as is also mentioned in the Kafees.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE DISSOLUTION* OF CONTRACTS OF HIRE.

A contract for the hire of a house is dissolved by a defect in it.—If a person hire a house, and then discover a defect in it, such as renders it uninhabitable, he is at liberty to dissolve the contract: because the contract was executed with a view to advantage; and as that continually, from time to time, is the object of the hire, it is obvious that the defect discovered in the house had existence previous to his obtaining possession of the thing actually contracted for, although it had occurred subsequent to taking possession of the house, in the same manner as where a defect has taken place in merchandise before the purchaser obtains possession of it. If, however, the hirer derive the advantage [that is make use of the house], he assests to the defect; and in such case the whole consideration (namely, the rent) is incumbent upon him, in the same manner as in sale. If, also, the lessee perform what is requisite to remedy the defect, the hirer is in that case without an option, as the reason for such option is then done away.

Or by its falling to decay; and the hire of land, by its wells being dried up,—or of a mill, by the mill-stream stopping.—If a house fail to decay, or the wells for watering land dry up, or a mill-stream cease to run, the contract of hire is dissolved, because in such case the thing contracted for (namely, exclusive advantage) is defeated before possession; and the case is therefore the same as where merchandise perishes before possession, or where a hired slave dies.—Some of our modern doctors hold that the contract of hire is not dissolved in this instance, because the advantage has been defeated in a manner which admits a recovery of it. The case is therefore the same as where a slave dies after purchase, but before delivery; and as, in that case, the contract [of sale] is not dissolved, so likewise, in the present instance, the contract [of hire] is not dissolved.—It is recorded, from Mohammed, that if, in the case is question, the lessor remove the defect by repairing the house, the hirer must abide by the contract, and also the lessor.—From this it is to be inferred that the contract is not dissolved.—It is, however, dissolved.

*That is, were to deny his ever having given any order (with respect to dyeing or making up the cloth).

But if the mill-house be used, a proportionate rent is due.—If a mill-stream cease from running, and the mill-house be applicable to any other use than that of grinding grain, the hirer must pay a rent proportionate to the use derived from such house, as that is a part of what was contracted for.

A contract of hire is dissolved by the death of one of the contracting parties, being a principal. Is one of the contracting parties die, and the hirer had entered into the contract of hire on his own account, it [the contract of hire] is dissolved; because if the contract were still to remain in force, it would follow that the usufruct, or rent, then becomes the right of a person who was not party to the contract, namely, the heir (since it would shift from the deceased to his heir), which is unlawful. Besides, with respect to the lessor, it is the use of his property which forms the subject of the contract; and in consequence of his decease, this property changes to his heir. it follows that the contract of hire becomes null, because of the subject being lost; for a change in the right of property is the same as a change in the thing itself.—With respect to the hirer, or renter on the contrary, if the contract were to remain in force after his decease, it can only do so upon the principle that his heir is his substitute. But the use of a house cannot be a heritage without the house itself, because inheritance is a succession, which is impossible except with respect to a thing which endures at both times, so as to be at first the right of the person through whom inheritance descends, and at last to be succeeded to by his heir.

As, therefore, inheritance cannot hold with respect to the use, the contract of hire is necessarily annulled. It is otherwise where a person enters into a contract of hire on behalf of any other than himself, such as an agent, an executor, or the procuration of a Wakf: for in that case the contract is not annulled, since if the contracting party die, the contract is then transferred to him in whose behalf it was executed, and he consequently becomes, by construction of law, the contractor.

It admits a reserve of option—A reserve of option is valid in hire. Shafei maintains that it is invalid; because if a right of option be reserved to the hirer, it is impossible for him to reject, that is, to return the thing contracted for complete, since in such case some part of that thing is lost: or if, on the other hand, a right of option be reserved to the lessor, it is impossible for him to make a complete delivery; and either circumstance is repugnant to the validity of option. The argument of our doctors is that a contract of hire is a contract of possession, which it is not required that possession be taken at the meeting of the contract; and a condition of option may therefore be lawfully inserted in it, in the same manner as in a contract of sale.—The cause, moreover, of the validity of option, in a contract of sale (namely, convenience), is also to be found in a contract of hire.—In answer to the arguments advanced by Shafei, it may be observed that the circumstance of the part of the subject of the contract being lost is not repugnant to a rejection: in opposition to sale, as in that instance the circumstance of any part of the subject of the contract being lost is not repugnant to a rejection under conditional option; or option from defect.—The reason of this is that, in sale, a complete return of the article is practicable, under conditional option, or option from defect, whereas in hire this is impracticable; a complete return of the subject of the contract is therefore required in the one case, but not in the other. As, moreover, a complete delivery is impracticable in hire, the hirer may be compelled to take possession, in case of the lessor making delivery of it at a time when part of the term has elapsed: in other words, where a person takes a house (for instance) for a year, and the lessor does not deliver it until after the lapse of a month, the lessee is not at liberty to decline taking possession of it for the rest of the year.

It is dissolved by the occurrence of any sufficient pretext for dissolution.—A contract of hire is dissolved by a pretext,* according to our doctors. Shafei maintains that it is not dissolved but by a defect or failure, because as (agreeably to his tenets) the advantage stands in place of actual substance (whence it is that a contract holds with respect to it) the case therefore bears a resemblance to sale. The argument of our doctors is that advantage is the thing contracted for; and as that is not a subject of seisin, a pretext is hire resembles a failure or defect in merchandise existing before it be taken possession of,—in which case the contract of sale is annulled, as the seller cannot carry it into execution without bearing, or occasioning an injury, not incurred by it: and the same reason holds in hire also, as this is the meaning of an Oozir, or pretext, according to our doctors.

Circumstances which from a pretext for dissolving contracts of hire.—If a person, being afflicted with the toothache, hire a surgeon to draw one of his teeth, and the pain afterwards cease,—or hire a cook to prepare a marriage-feast, and afterwards repudiate the bride by her own desire,† the contract of hire is dissolved, because if it were to continue in force, the hirer would suffer a superinduced injury not incurred by the contract:—and the same rule also holds, if a person hire a shop for traffic, and his property be all afterwards disposed of.

*Meaning (in this place) any circumstance which would render it impossible to carry the contract into execution without inducing, to one or other of the parties, an injury not provided for mentioned in the contract. It is more fully explained a little farther on.

If a person let to hire a house or shop, and afterwards become poor and involved in debt to degree which he is unable to discharge but by the price of the house or shop, the Kazee must in this case dissolve the contract of hire, and sell the place for payment of the debt: because in the endurance of the contract the lessor sustains a superinduced injury not incurred by the contract,—which superinduced injury, in this instance, is that the Kazee will otherwise seize and imprison him on account of the debts, as he cannot be certain whether the debtor speaks truly in declaring that "this is his only property." From the expression "the Kazee must in this case dissolve the contract," it may be inferred that a decree of the Kazee is requisite to the dissolution; and the same is mentioned in the Zeeadath, treating of a pretext of debt. Mohammed, on the other hand, in the Jami Saghner, says "Whatever I have described to be a pretext, is competent to the annulling of hire;"—whence it may be inferred that there is no occasion for a decree of the Kazee: because, as a pretext, in hire, is the same as a defect in merchandise before seizin (as in the case before considered), it follows that the contracting party may of himself dissolve the contract.—The ground of the opinion in the Zeeadat is that as, concerning the dissolution of hire on account of a pretext, there is a difference of opinion, it is therefore requisite that the Kazee issue a decree and render it obligatory. Some of the Haneefite doctors endeavour to reconcile both opinions, by explaining that if the pretext be not of an evident nature (such as debt), there is no occasion for a decree of the Kazee: but if it be not evident, a decree of the Kazee is requisite to render it so.

If a person hire an animal to carry him upon a journey, and something afterwards occur to prevent his proceeding, this is a pretext; for if the contract were put in force, he might be subjected to injury,—as a person may go upon a pilgrimage, and the proper season for it may in the meanwhile pass away,—or he may go in search of a person who is indebted to him, and that person in the mean time may appear,—or he may proceed upon a trading excursion, and may in the mean time become poor.—If, on the contrary, the obstacle to the journey occur to the Kazee after the hire is taken upon the animal to hire, it is not admitted as a pretext because it is in his power, if he do not choose to go himself, to send the animal under the care of one of his servants or apprentices.—If, also, the Makar fall sick, so as to be incapable of proceeding upon the journey, this is not a pretext, according to the Mabsoot.—Koorokee is of opinion that it is a pretext, since sending his animal under the care of another person is not altogether void of injury:—the contract, therefore, is set aside in a case of unavoidable necessity, as in sickness, but not in a case of mere option, as in health.

If a tailor hire a servant to saw for him, and he afterwards become bankrupt, and quit his business of tailor, this is a pretext; for if the contract were to continue in force, he would sustain injury because of his means (namely, his capital) being lost.—It is proper to remark, that by the tailor mentioned in this example is to be understood one who carries on business on his own account: for with respect to a tailor who works for hire, his only capital is needle, thread, and scissors, whence he cannot be considered as becoming bankrupt. If a tailor, who has hired an assistant as above, be desirous to quit his business of tailor and to pursue the business of money-changer, this is not a pretext, as it is in his power to place the hireling in a particular part of his shop for the purpose of exercising the business of a tailor, whilst he himself pursues the business of a money-changer in another part.—It is otherwise where a person hires a shop to carry on the business of a tailor, and is afterwards desirous to exercise some other trade, for this is not a pretext; the reason of which (as mentioned in the Mabsoot) is that one person cannot exercise two different professions.—In the instance, however, of a tailor hiring a servant to sew, the persons are two, and consequently may exercise two different trades.

If a person hire a servant to attend him in a city, and afterwards travel, this is a pretext, as not being altogether void of injury; for the trouble of attendance is greater in travelling; whence if the servant were to go upon the journey, he would sustain an injury; or if, on the other hand, the hirer were prevented from undertaking the journey; he on his part would be injured; and as neither is to incur an injury by the contract, it follows that the circumstance in question forms a pretext.—The same rule also holds if the servant be hired in an absolute manner, by the hirer saying to him (or to his master, supposing the hireling to be a slave) "I hire you" (or "I hire your slave") "to wait upon me," without restricting the service either to a stationary or a travelling description, because it has been already mentioned that the hire is in such case restricted to stationary service.

Miscellaneous Cases

A hirer or borrower of land is not responsible for accidents in burning off the stubble. &c. — If a person either hire or borrow land, and in burning the Hassayed, or stubble and roots of the soil, happen to burn anything upon the neighbouring lands, he is not responsible; because, as, in exciting the cause to the destruction, he was not only of any transgression or trespass, he therefore stands in the same predicament with a person who digs a well in his own house. —

—Some say that this holds only where he sets fire to the stubble during a calm; the wind rising afterwards; for if he set fire to it whilst the wind is blowing, he is responsible, as he must in such case be sensible that the fire will extend beyond his land.

A tradesman may unite with another, for a moiety of the hire acquired upon the work. — If a fuller, tailor, or dyer who keeps a public shop, and is possessed of credit, but unskilled in his trade, place any person in his shop who is skilled in the business, with a view that he shall himself procure cloth to be wrought upon, and the person in question work with it, under a condition that a moiety of the recompense or hire shall go to him, this is lawful and valid, as being a Shirkat Wadjooh, or partnership upon credit; because, as the shop keeper procures the cloth to be wrought with upon his own credit, and the person in question works upon it, the ends of both parties are thus completely answered: — neither is the uncertainty with respect to the amount of the time injurious, since that must be in proportion to what is acquired.

Hire of a camel to carry a litter with two persons. — If a man hire a camel to carry a litter with two persons to Mecca, it is valid, on a favourable construction, and he is at liberty to put upon the camel a litter of the usual dimensions. — Analogy would suggest that a contract of this nature is invalid (and such is the doctrine of Shafei), because the quality of a litter, with respect to its length, breadth, and weight, is uncertain, and may possible occasion disputes. The reason for a more favourable construction of the Law, in this instance, is that the intent of the rider is merely the conveyance of his person upon the animal, the litter being a subordinate consideration. Besides, as any uncertainty is removed by supposing the litter to be such as is commonly used, there can be no occasion for contention. — The same rule holds, although the owner of the camel should not have seen the carpet and other appurtenances. — It is, however, preferable that he view the litter, &c., as thus uncertainty is removed, and his assent indubitably established.

* A person digging a well on the public highway, or in any other place of general access, is responsible for the fine in case of any person being killed by falling into it; but a person digging a well in his own house or land is not responsible.

A sumpter camel may be loaded with other articles in proportion as the provisions he carries are consumed. — If a person hire a camel to carry provisions upon a journey, he is entitled to load the camel with other articles during the journey, in proportion as the provisions are consumed, because, as being entitled to the carriage of a specific load for the whole journey, he is therefore entitled to exact such carriage complete. —

The same rule also holds with respect to any thing else besides provision, provided it be an article of weight, or measurement of capacity. —

Objection. — It is not customary for travellers to impose any additional load upon an animal in lieu of the provision they consume upon the way; — and as absolute contracts must be construed agreeably to custom, it would follow that it is not lawful to load the animal with other articles in lieu of the consumed provisions.

Reply — Custom admits of either construction, since in some instances it is usual to supply the defect in the article consumed, as in the case of water, for instance; — and where custom is various, it is agreeably, in absolute contracts, to act agreeably to the requisites of them.

OF MOKATIBS.

Definition of the terms — Kitabat, in its literal sense, signifies a slave purchasing his own person from his master, in return for a sum to be paid out of his earnings, — according to the exposition in the Jama Ramoos. — (From what occurs in the course of the present work it appears that the literal meaning of Kitabat is junction, or union.) — In the language of the Law it signifies the emancipation of a slave, — with respect to the rights of possession and action (in other words, the conveyance and appropriation of property) at the time of the contract, and with respect to his person at the time of his paying the consideration of Kitabat.

Chapter III.

Definition of the term.—Willa literally means assistance and friendship. In the language of the law it signifies (according to the exposition in the Inayat) that mutual assistance which is a cause of inheritance. Willa is of two descriptions, Ittakit and Mawalat. Willa is of two species or descriptions. I. Willa Ittakit (which is also termed Willa Niamit), the occasion of which is manumission from right of property (according to the Rawayet-Saheeh), whence it is that if a person become proprietor of his kinsman by inheritance, such kinsman is free, and his Willa goes to that person. II. Willa Mawalat, § the occasion of which is a contract of Mawalat [mutual amity— or patronage and clientage], as shall be explained in its proper place. The occasion of the first species, therefore, being manumission, and of the second, a contract of mutual amity, they are termed the Willa of manumission, or the Willa of mutual amity, by a reference to the cause of each species. Both species, however, bear the characteristic of assistance: and as the Arabs were accustomed to assist each other in various ways, and the Prophet interpreted such mutual assistance into Willa of both species, he used to say of them, indiscriminately, “They have Willa people among them,” and also, “They have Haleefs [sworn confederates] among them;” by which last is understood the relation of Mala Mawalat; as the Arabs were accus-

*The passage between the crochets is in some places rather obscure; and affords an instance of the great liberty occasionally taken by the Molooees employed in the composition of the Persian Hedaya, for which indeed they have endeavoured to apologize, by alleging the excessive closeness and obscurity of the original text. (See introductory address.) The whole passage, in the Arabic, stands verbatim thus,—“because he assists him thereby, and consequently attaches him; and he, likewise, in his bondage, whence he inherits of him; and his Willa, with respect to him, resembles relationship; and also, because [there must be] an acquisition for a surrender.” What mentioned of “the liability to the fine of blood being induced by manumission” is because an emancipator is the Akila of his freed-man. (See Meakli.)
WILLA

It is to be observed that a woman is entitled to the Willa of her emancipated slave in the same manner as a man;—because of the tradition before quoted;—and also because it is recorded the upon a freed-man of Hamaza dying, and leaving a daughter (Hamza also being dead and having left a daughter), the Prophet divided his effects equally between this daughter and the daughter of Hamaza. It is also proper to observe that manumission for a compensation, and manumission, without a compensation, are alike with respect to this rule, as the tradition above mentioned is absolute.

A stipulation of waving the claim to inheritance is invalid. If a person emancipate his slave, engaging, at the same time that "he will not claim the right from him," such engagement in null, and the Willa appertains to the emancipator notwithstanding; because the condition here mentioned is contrary to the text [of the Koran], and is consequently invalid.

The Willa of a slave emancipated by Kitabat appertains to his master. Upon a Mokatib paying his ransom he is free, and the Willa of his master, although he become free after his [the master's] decease:—because he becomes free in consequence of a contract of Kitabat to which his master was a party; and as a Mokatib, like a Modabbir, is not a subject of inheritance, he is consequently emancipated while the master's right of property continues. The same rule also holds with respect to a slave whose master has bequeathed him manumission, or a slave whom a person directs, in his will, to be purchased and set free upon his decease—for the act of the executor, after the testator's death, is equivalent to the act of the testator.

Objection. The slave in question cannot be considered as emancipated from the testator, except where he is his actual property; and he discharges from being his property because of his death.

Reply.—The whole estate of the testator is regarded as his property as long as there is occasion—that is, until his will be executed.

And the same of the Willa of Modabbirs, Am-Walids.—If a master of slaves die his Modabbirs and Am-Walids are free (as has been explained in treating of manumission), and the Willa of them belongs to him, as he emancipated them by making them Modabbirs and Am-Walids.

And slaves emancipated by affinity.—If a person become proprietor of a relation within the prohibited degrees such relation is free (as has been explained under the head of manumission) and the Willa of him belongs to his person, as he is emancipated from his property.

*In which case the Willa appertains to his heirs.
†Descending, as a heritage, to his heirs.

In the emancipation of a pregnant female slave, the Willa of the foetus belongs to her emancipator. If a slave marry the female slave of a y, person, and she become pregnant, and her master then emancipates her, it is accordingly from himself with the foetus in her womb; and the Willa of the foetus belongs to her master, and never can shift from him; because he has emancipated it, not as a dependant of the mother, but independently; and of itself, as being a portion of the mother, and it is capable of being so emancipated. The Willa of the child, therefore, cannot shift from him, because the Prophet has said. "The Willa belongs to the person who emancipates."—The same rule holds if the female slave is delivered of a child at any time short of six months from the death of her manumission, because in this case the existence of the foetus at the time of manumission is certified. The same rule also holds if she be delivered of two children, one within the six months, and the other after they have expired; because those are twins, as having been begotten from one seed. It is otherwise where a female slave, being pregnant, enters into a contract of Mawalat with any person, and her husband also enters into a similar contract with any other person; for in this case the Willa of the child belongs to the master of the father, because an embryo cannot of itself be a party to a Mawalat contract, as that is concluded by proposal and acceptance, of which an embryo is incapable.

But if she be not delivered within six months from the date of her manumission, it may gift from him to the father's emancipator. If the female slave mentioned above be delivered of a child after six months from the date of manumission, the Willa belongs to the mother's because the child is in this case free as a dependant of the mother, and is therefore a dependant of her with respect to the Willa. As, however, in this case, it is not certain that the child existed at the time of manumission so as that it should be emancipated independently and of itself, if the father be afterwards emancipated the Willa shifts from the master of the mother to the master of the father, because of the child having become free, not of itself, but dependently. It is otherwise where produces a child within six months, for in that case the Willa would not shift from the one master to the other. The ground of this is, that Willa stands in the same predicament with parentage; for the Prophet has said, Willa is a relationship as much as the relationship of parentage; and can neither be given away, or inherited. In the same manner, moreover, as parentage is established on the part of the father, so also is Willa. Besides, the Willa was referred to the mother's master, of necessity, merely because of the father's incapacity: but upon the father becoming capable, the Willa reverts to his master;—in the same manner as the child of an asswvering woman* is of necessity referred to her family; but if her husband afterwards retract his assertion, the parentage of it is then established in him--it is otherwise where a female slave is emancipated during her life from the death of her husband, who was a Mokatib, and who has left his suffrave to discharge his ransom, and she brings forth a child at any time within two years from the time of his decease; because in this case, the Willa of the child appertains to the master of the mother; for as it is here impossible to refer the conception to a period subsequent to the father's decease, it must therefore be referred to some time during his life; and as the foetus existed at the time of her manumission, the Willa of it therefore belongs to the mother's master, since he emancipated the child by itself and independently. It is also the case where a female slave is emancipated whilst in her Edad from divorce, and brings forth a child within less than two years from the date of her manumission; for in this case, also, notwithstanding her husband be emancipated, the Willa of the child belongs to the mother's master, whether the divorce she was under be reversible or irrecoverable. It belongs to him in the case of irreversible divorce; because after such divorce the begetting of the child cannot be attributed to the father, as his having connexion with the female slave in question after he had been irreversibly divorced would be unlawful, and we must always, as far as possible, put a fair construction on the acts of a Mussulman. The begetting of it is therefore referred to him antecedent to divorce; and as the foetus exists at the time of emancipation, the Willa of it consequently belongs to the mother's master, as he has emancipated it of itself and independently. In the same manner also, it belongs to him in the case of reversible divorce; because the child being born of the slave in question within less than two years, it is possible that the foetus may have existed during divorce, in which case there is no occasion for a reversal of the divorce in order to the establishment of the parentage; or, on the other hand, it is possible that the foetus may not have existed during divorce, in which case a rever-al of the divorce is essential to the establishment of the parentage; now such reversal is doubtful: no regard, therefore, is paid to that, but the conception is referred to the time of the marriage; and as the foetus exists at the time of manumission, the child is therefore emancipated independently and of itself. It is written in the Jama Sagheer, that if a slave marry a freed-woman, and they have children, and those children commit any offences, the fine falls upon the Mawlas of the mother; because they have become free as dependants of their mother. Their father, moreover, is not possessed either of Akiats or of Mawlas by manumission. Consequently, they are of necessity attached to the Mawlas of the mother, in the same manner as in the case of a woman who is emancipated whilst in her Edad from divorce; but if, afterwards, the father be emancipated, the Willa of them shifts to the Mawlas of the father, as was before explained. The Mawlas of the mother, however, are not in this case entitled to recover, from the Mawlas of the father, the fine they have paid on account of the children's offence, because at the time they paid it the Willa of the children appertained to them; and the Willa is not established to the master of the father until he [the master] emancipate him [the father]; because the occasion of Willa, namely manumission, cannot be referred to an antecedent time, but is restricted to the time of emancipation. It is otherwise with respect to the child of an asswvering woman, where the mother's tribe pay the fine on account of any offence committed by such child, and the husband afterwards retracts his imputation against her: for in this case the parentage is established by referring it to the conception of that child: and as the mother's Mawlas have not paid the fine willingly, but per force, they are accordingly entitled to recover it.

Case of a Persian marrying a freed-woman.---If a Persian* marry a freed-woman, and they have children, the Willa of those children rests with the Mawlas of the mother, whether she was emancipated by an Arab or a Persian. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this is the opinion of Mohamme; but that Aboo Yoosaf maintains that the child is in this case subject to the same rule with the father, insomuch as its parentage is established in the father, in the same manner as if the person who married the slave in question were an Arab. It is otherwise, however, where the person who marries her is a slave; for as a slave is, constructively, a mere dead matter, the case is therefore the same as if those children had no father whatever. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the Willa of manumission is strong, and worthy of regard with respect to its effects, whence equality is attended to in it, insomuch that a Persian emancipator is not equal to an Arab emancipator. The parentage of a Persian, moreover, is weak, as they pay no regard to genealogy (whence no attention is paid to them to equality in point of family); and that which is weak cannot oppose that which is strong. It is otherwise where the father is an Arab, because the parentage of an Arab is strong, and is regarded with respect to equality and the payment of fines; for as the assistance they afford to each other is an account of a affinity or genealogy, there is therefore no necessity, in the case of an Arab, to have regard to the Willa—It is related, in the Juma Sagheer, that if a Nabatean inebil marry a freed-woman who is a Christian, and become a Mussulman, and enter into a contract of Mawalat with any person, and they afterwards have children, the Willa of those children (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) appertains to the Mawlas of the mother. Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, maintains that their Willa appertains to the Mawlas of the father (namely, his Mawla Mawalat); because, although the contract of Mawalat be weak, still it is on the part of the father: and hence the children in question resemble the child of a Persian man and an Arab woman;—in other words, as, if a Persian marry an Arab woman, and she bring forth a child, it is referred to the father's tribe, so also in the present case—(The ground on which this proceeds is that the parentage of a child is weaker on the part of the mother than on the part of the father.) The argument of Haneefa is that the Willa of Mawalat is weak (whence it is capable of dissolution), whereas the Willa of manumission is strong (whence it is incapable of dissolution); and the weak cannot oppose the strong.

If the father and mother are both freed persons, the Willa of their children belongs to the father's tribe—if the father be a freed-man, and the mother a freed woman, the parentage of their children is referred to the father's tribe; because in this instance the parents are both upon an equality: and the father's side has the preference, as protection is on his side more effectual.

Heirisip is established by the Willa of manumission—by the Willa of manumission Asoobat* is established;—in other words; where a person emancipates his slave he is Assaba; to such slave, and is entitled to inherit of him in preference to his maternal uncles or aunts, or other uterine kindred; because the Prophet said to a person who had purchased a slave and afterwards emancipated him, "He whom you have thus emancipated is your brother; and if he manifest his gratitude, it is the better for him, but the worse for you;—or, if he do not manifest his gratitude, it is the worse for him, but for you; and if he die without leaving heirs, you are his Assaba."—The daughter of Hamaza, moreover, emancipated her slave; and the slave died, leaving a daughter; and the Prophet constituted the daughter of Hamaza her heir in the manner of an Assaba, that is, notwithstanding there was a daughter.—Where, therefore. Asoobat is established on the part of the emancipator, he precedes the relations (and such is the opinion of Alee). If, however, the emancipated have any Assabas by blood, they precedent the slave, as the emancipator comes after the paternalkindred.—The ground of this is that, in the saying of the Prophet above quoted, "if he die without leaving heirs," by the term heirs is to be understood those descendants of Assaba, as may be inferred from the tradition concerning the daughter of Hamaza. The emancipator, therefore, follows after the Assabas, but not after the maternalkindred.* If, on the contrary, the emancipated have no Assabas by blood, the whole inheritance belongs to the emancipator. This is where the weakness of the heir. But where there is a sharer the emancipator is entitled to what remains after paying the sharer; he is entitled to what remains after paying the soverign; because the emancipator is the Assaba, agreeably to the tradition before quoted. The ground of this is, that the Assaba is one who protects and assists his family;—and as a matricile and assists his freedman (according to what has been already stated), he is therefore his Assaba. Now an Assaba takes what remains after paying the portions.—hence the person in question takes what thus remains. If, therefore, the emancipator were first to die, and then his freed-man, the estate of the latter would go to the sons of the emancipator, not to his daughters.

An emancipatees is entitled to the Willa of her freed-men, &c., but not of their children—A woman is entitled only to the Willa of the person whom she has herself emancipated, or of the person whom she (again) has emancipated, or of the person whom she has created a Mokatib, or whom her Mokatib has created a Mokatib, or of the person whose Willa has been transferred to her by her freed-man; because

* That is, he precedes the maternal kindred.

† Arab. Jurra, literally "drawn over."—A case of transferring or drawing over the Willa, is where (for example) the male slave of a woman marries a female slave,
The recorded opinion of the Prophet upon this subject; and also because, as power, and the right of possessing property, are established in the person emancipated by the act of the emancipatrix; this person is accordingly referred (in regard to Willa) to her; and in the same manner is referred to the person who is referred to her freed-man. It is otherwise with respect to parentage (that is, the Willa of manumission may be established on the part of a woman, but parentage cannot be established); because Willa is established in consequence of the occurrence of a power to possess property, occasioned by and arising from the emancipation which may proceed from a woman in the same manner as from a man; whereas parentage is established by regular cohabitation [Firash], and it is the husband that possesses the right of cohabitation, not the wife; for she is the appropriator, not the appropriator—hence parentage cannot be established in a woman.

The estate of a freed-man descends to the lineal heirs of the emancipator, and not to his heirs generally. It is to be observed that the estate of a freed-man goes to the Assaba [lineal heir] of the emancipator, to the nearest, and after him to the next of kin, and not solely to his children; because inheritance does not hold with respect to Willa, for if such were the case, the property of the freed-man would at all events descend to the sons and daughters of the emancipator (the sons receiving two shares each, and the daughters one)—whereas it is not so. Hence it is evident that inheritance does not hold in Willa—Succession, however, holds with respect to it—but succession cannot be established with regard to any except a person from whom proceeds protection and aid, and protection and aid are afforded by men only, not by women. Now it being proved that the estate of a freed-man goes to the emancipator’s Assaba, to the nearest, and after him to the next of kin, it follows that if a freed-man die, leaving the father and the son of his emancipator, the right of Willa descends to the son, not to the father (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), because the son is the nearest Assaba [lineal heir]; and, in the same manner, it would go to the master’s grandfather, not to his brother (according to Haneefa), since (as he holds) the grandfather is the nearest of the two. In the same manner also, the Willa of her freed-man descends to the son of his emancipatrix, not to her brother, for her son is the nearest in lineal succession. If, however, the freed-man were to commit an offence, the fine for it would fall upon her brother because the offence of the freed-man is the offence of the emancipatrice, and her brother is of her paternal kindred, whereas her son is not so. If, also, a freed-man die, leaving a son of his master, and the children of another son, his estate goes to the son, not to the grand-children, because the Willa descends to the nearest. This is recorded from several of the companions; and among the rest from Amroo, Alee, and Ibn Masaood.

Of the Willa Mawlat, or Willa of Mutual Amity.

Nature and effect of a contract of Mutual lat. The case of Willa Mawlat is where (for instance) a stranger* says to the person whose proselyte he is,† or to any other person, “I enter into a contract of Mawlat with you, so that if I die my property shall go to you, or if (on the other hand) I commit an offence, the fine is upon you or your Akila," and the person thus addressed accepts accordingly, in consequence of which he becomes the Mawla of the stranger, and upon his decease without heirs inherits his property. The stranger is termed the Mawla Asfal, ‡ and the person who thus accedes to the contract the Mawla Aaila. §—Shafei maintains that a contract of Mawlat does not occasion inheritance in any respect, and is of no force whatever, as it tends to annul the right of the public treasury—I, whence the invalidity of it with respect to any other heir: for if it were valid with respect to such, his right of heritage would be annulled; and on this ground also it is, (according to Shafei) a man’s being the heir of his whole property is invalid although the testator be destitute of heirs; for still, (according to him) such bequest holds good to the amount.

*Arab Ajimee. This term (as has been already remarked) signifies, generally, any person not an Arab. It is also used in the same sense among the Arabs as Barbarian with the Greeks, or Gentile among the Jews. The case here stated applies to any infidel alien coming into a Mussulman territory under protection, and there embracing the faith, in which case it was customary for some Mussulman to adopt him as his proselyte.

‡Literally, “in whose hands he has embraced the faith.”

†Literally, “the inferior Mawla,” or the client.

only of a third of his property, since if it were effectual to the amount of the who's, the right of the public treasury would be annulled.*—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, God has said, in the Koran, “Allow to those who enter into contracts, their share of inheritance,” which text related to contracts of Mawalat; and it is also recorded that the Prophet, upon being questioned concerning a client, to whom he had become the proselyte of another, and entered into a contract of Mawalat with that other, replied, “This person is endowed with a right with regard to that man, superior to all others, both during life and in death.”—from which it may be inferred, that during his proselyte’s life he is subject to fines on his account, and upon his decease is his heir.—Secondly; the property of the proselyte is this person’s right, whence he is at liberty to make use of it in any manner he pleased: for the property would fail to the public treasury only from this necessity, that there are no claims to make, not by it, of the public treasury has any right in it—If, however, the proselyte leave any natural heir, such heir precedes the Mawla Mawalat, notwithstanding he be of the uterine kinred (such as a maternal uncle for instance); because the two person in question are the only parties to the contract, whence it is not binding upon any other; and an uterine relation is entitled to inheritance.—It is to be observed, that in the contract in question the parties must particularly mention and stipulate fine and inheritance, as has been explained in the exemplification of the case. If, therefore, the stipulation of inheritance be made on both parts, whoever dies first inherits of the other; but if on one part only, heritage holds agreeably to stipulation. In the same manner also, if responsibility for fines be stipulated on both parts, each is responsible for the fines incurred by the other; but on one part only, responsibility holds accordingly: for a thing is rendered obligatory only by undertaking for it; and it cannot be undertaken for by stipulation. It is also to be observed, that it is essential in contracts of Mawalat, that the Mawla, Asfal, or, client, be a stranger; and not an Arab; because among the Arabs aid and patronage run in families or tribes; (that is, one Arab aids or patronizes another; where they are both of the same tribe or family); whence they have no occasion for engaging in contracts of Mawalat.

Either party may dissolve the contract in presence of the other.—The Mawla Asfal, or client, is at full liberty to desert from his Mawla Aaila, or patron, and to enter into a contract of Mawalat with some other person, so long as the first shall not have paid any fine of its incurring; because a contract of Mawalat is, like bequest, a reversable deed.—In the same manner; also, the M. Aaila, or patron, is at liberty to relinquish his right of Willa, and to break off the contract of Mawalat, because such a contract is not binding.—It is requisite, in case of either party dissolving the contract, that it be dissolved in the presence of the other, in the same manner as in the case of disannulling an agent, where the dismission is express, and not implied, or virtually induced.

Or the inferior party may breach it off in the superior’s absence, by engaging in a Mawalat with some other person.—It is otherwise, however, where the client enters into a contract of Mawalat with a person in the absence of the former patron; for in this case the first contract of Mawalat is dissolved without the presence of the party, this being a dissolution by effect, and necessarily resulting:—in other words, the dissolution of the first contract is a necessary consequence of the formation of the second.—In this case, therefore, the presence of the other party is not requisite; in the same manner as the presence of an agent is not requisite where he is virtually dismissed from his employment, by the constituent (for instance) himself selling the article concerning which he had constituted him his agent for sale.

But he cannot do so after the other has paid a fine incurred by him.—Where the patron pays the fine incurred for an offence committed by his client, the latter is incapacitated from quitting him and engaging in a contract of Mawalat with any other person;—because the right of another then becomes implicated; and also, because the fine was decreed by the Koran:—Besides, the fine paid by the patron on his account stands as a valuable consideration, in the same manner as the return for a gift; whence he has it not in his power to turn from his patron, in the same manner as a donor, after receiving a return, cannot recede from his gift.—In the same manner also, the child of the client cannot turn from the patron who has paid a fine on account of its father; and so likewise, if the patron pay a fine on account of the child of his client, neither the client nor his child can afterwards turn from the patron, because with regard to the Willa Mawalat they are as one person.

A freed man cannot engage in a contract of Mawalat.—An emancipated slave, as having a Mawla in his emancipator, is not at liberty to enter into a contract of Mawalat with any person; because the Willa of Manumission is binding, whereas the Willa of Mawalat is not so; and during the existence of a thing which is forcible and binding, a thing which is not so cannot take place.

*He holding that, in case of a person dying without heirs, two thirds of his property must go to the public treasury at all events.
The nature of compulsion defined — Ikrah, or compulsion, applies to case where the compeller has in his power to execute what he threatens, — whether he [the compeller] be the Sultan, or any other person, as a thief (for instance). — The reason of this is, that compulsion implies an act which men exert, upon others, and in consequence of which the will of the other is set at nought, at the same time that his power of action still remains. Now this characteristic does not exist unless the other (namely, the person compelled) be put in fear, and apprehend that if he do not perform what the compeller desires, the threatened evil will fall upon him; and this fear and apprehension cannot take place unless the compeller be possessed of power to carry his menace into execution; but provided this power does exist, it is of no importance whether it exist in the Sultan, or in any other person. With respect to what is recorded from Haneifa, that “compulsion cannot proceed from any except the Sultan,” the learned remark that this difference originates merely in the difference of times, and not in any difference of argument; for in his time none possessed power except the Sultan, but afterwards changes took place with respect to the customs of mankind. — It is to be observed that, in the same manner as it is essential, to the establishment of compulsion, that the compeller be able to carry his menace into execution, so likewise it is requisite that the person compelled be in fear that the thing threatened will actually take place; and this fear is not supposed except it appear most probable to the person compelled that the compeller will execute what he has threatened, so as to force and constrain him to the performance of the act which the compeller requires of him.

A person forced into a contract may afterwards dissolve it — If a person exercise compulsion upon another, by cutting, beating or imprisonment, with a view to make him sell his property, or purchase merchandise, or acknowledge a debt of one thousand dirhams to a particular person, or let his house to hire, and this other accordingly sells his property, purchase merchandise or so forth, he has it afterwards at his option either to adhere to the contract into which he has been so compelled or to dissolve it, and take back or restore the article purchased or sold; because one essential to the validity of any of these contracts is that it have the consent of both parties, which is not the case here, as the compulsion by blows or other means rather compels than dissuad; and the contract is therefore invalid.

Unless the means of compulsion be trifling. — (This rule, however, does not hold where the compulsion consists only of a single blow, or of imprisonment for a single day, since fear is not usually excited by this degree of beating or confinement. Compulsion, therefore, is not established by a single blow, or a single day’s imprisonment; — unless the compelled be a person of rank, to whom such a degree of beating or imprisonment would appear detrimental or disgraceful; for with respect to such a person compulsion is established by this degree of violence, as by his volition is destroyed.)

The purchaser becomes proprietor of goods sold upon compulsion — In the same manner, also, an acknowledgment extorted by any of the aforesaid modes of compulsion is invalid; because acknowledgment is a species of proof, inasmuch as truth is more probable, in acknowledgment, than falsehood; but in a case of compulsion fals-ehood is most probable as a man will acknowledge falsely where, by so doing he may avoid injury.

An acknowledgment extorted by compulsion is invalid. Where a person sells goods by compulsion, as above stated; and makes delivery of them under the influence of such compulsion, the purchaser becomes proprietor of them, according to our doctors — Zisser maintains that he does not become proprietor, because a sale by compulsion depends, for its validity, upon the assent of the seller, and a sale so circumstanced cannot endow with a right of property until such assent be signified. The argument of our doctors is that, in the case in question, the pillar of sale (signified by proposal and acceptance) has proceeded from fit persons with respect to a fit subject; the sale being merely invalid, from a want of one of the essentials of sale, namely, the mutual consent of the parties; and the purchaser, in an invalid sale, becomes proprietor of the article upon obtaining possession of it: whence it is that if a person take possession of a slave purchased under an invalid contract, and then emancipate him, or perform such other act with respect to him as can afterwards be nullified, it is valid, and he must pay the seller the value, as is the rule in all cases of an invalid sale. — After the compulsion has ceased, however, if the seller signify his assent, the sale then becomes lawful and valid, because by such assent the causes of invalidity (namely, compulsion and unwillingness) are removed.

But the seller may resume the article, provided he does not signify his assent to the sale — Where a person thus sells his property by compulsion, he has still a right, as long as he does not signify his assent to the sale, to take back the article, although the purchaser should have sold it into the hands of another person. — It is otherwise in all other cases of invalid sale; for in those, after the purchaser has sold the article; the seller has no right to take it back; because the invalidity of sale in those cases is on account of the right of the law; and when the purchaser sells the article to any third person, the right of that person becomes involved in this second contract; and his right precedes the right of the law, as the individual is necessitous, whereas the law is not so.—In a case of compulsion, on the contrary, the invalidity of the sale is on account of the right of the seller; and as he is an individual, it follows that, in this case, notwithstanding the right of the second purchaser be involved in the second contract, still both rights are upon a par, as being both rights of the individual; and consequently, the right of the first cannot be annulled by the right of the second.

Case of a Waffa sale.—It is to be observed that some consider a Waffa sale* to be invalid, in the same manner as a compelled sale, and apply to it the rules of sale by compulsion; whence (according to them) if the purchaser in a Waffa sale sell the article purchased, the sale made by him may be broken through, as to the invalidity of the sale; in this case on account of the non-consent of the seller, in the same manner as in a case of compulsion.Waffa sale is where the seller says to the purchaser, "I sell you this article in lieu of the debt I owe you, in this way, that upon paying the debt the article is mine"—Some determine this to be, in fact, a contract of pawn; for between it and pawn there is no manner of difference, as; although the parties denominate it a sale, still the intention is, in effect, a pawn. Now in all acts regards as paid to the spirit and intention; and the spirit and intention of pawn exist in this instance,—whence it is that the seller is at liberty to resume the article from the purchaser upon paying his debt to him.—Some, again, consider a Waffa sale to be utterly null, as the purchaser, in the case in question, resembles a person in jest since he (like a jester) repeats the words of sale, at the same time that the effect and purpose of sale are not within his design. Such sale is therefore utterly null and void, in the same manner as a sale made in jest. The Hanefites, doctors of Samarcand, on the other hand, insist that a Waffa sale is to be both valid and useful, as it is a species of sale commonly practised from necessity and convenience; and is attended with advantage in regard to some effects of sale, such as the use of the article, although the purchaser cannot lawfully dispose of it.

A compelled sale is rendered valid if the seller willingly receive the price.—If, in a case of compulsion, the seller take possession of the price readily and willingly, the sale is valid, as his trust taking possession of the price is an argument of its validity; in the same manner as where, in a suspended sale, the seller receive the price and willingly receive price of the article, such receipt argues the validity of the sale.—So, likewise, if a person advancing part of the price conclude a Sillim contract by compulsion, and the party who received the advance should afterwards readily and willingly deliver the article for which the advance had been paid, his so doing is an argument of the validity of the transaction. It is otherwise where one person compels another to make a contract, saying to him, "Take the use of this article to such a person,"—but without adding to the word gift "and delivery," and the person thus compelled make gift and delivery of the article to the person named; for such gift is utterly null, because the design of the compeller is that the donee shall be endowed with a right in the article upon the instant of donation; and this design cannot be obtained, in a case of gift, but by delivery of the article to the person specified. In a case of sale by compulsion, on the other hand, the end of the compeller is obtained on the instant of compelling the party to accede to the contract of sale. Gift upon compulsion, therefore, comprehends a delivery of the article to the donee; whereas sale upon compulsion does not comprehend a delivery of the article sold to the purchaser,—whence it is that if the seller, after acceding to the contract from compulsion, make delivery of the article without compulsion, the sale is rendered valid by such delivery,—whereas the gift in question is not rendered valid by a delivery of the article to the donee.

But it is not valid if he be compelled to receive it.—If, in a case of compulsion, the seller take possession of the price by compulsion, such receipt does not render the sale valid; and it is accordingly incumbent on him to return the price to the purchaser, if it remain in his hands, because of the contract being invalid. If, however, the price have been lost, or have perished in his hands, nothing can be taken from him in lieu of it, because it was merely a trust with him, inasmuch as he took possession of it by consent of the proprietor, namely, the purchase.

A sale in which the seller is compelled, but not the purchaser, leaves the latter responsible for the article. In case it be lost in his hands.—If one person compel an other to sell an article to a third person, but do not compel this person to purchase the article, and it afterwards perish in the purchaser's hands he [the purchaser] is responsible to the seller for the value, as the article is insured in his hands, such being the law of invalid sale. It is to be observed, however, that in this case the seller is at liberty to take the compensation from the compeller; because as it was (in a manner) he who gave the article to the purchaser, it may be said that it is he who has lost or destroyed the seller's property. In short, the seller, in that case in question, is at full liberty to take the compensation from either of the two; in the same manner as the proprietor of an usurped article is at liberty to take his compensation from either party, where the article has first been usurped from him, and then usurped by some other from the first usurper.

* Literally, "a security sale," so termed because, by it, the seller insures to the purchaser the debt he owes him.
If, however the seller take his compensation from the compeller, he [the compeller] is entitled to recover the value from the purchaser, since, in consequence of paying the compensation for the article, he stands as substitute to the seller.—It is to be observed that, in a case of usurpation, if the usurper sell the article to Amroo, and he (again) sell it to Khalid, and he (again) sell it to Bikroo, and so on, from hand to hand, and the proprietor take his compensation from Khalid (for instance), in the case every purchase subsequent to that of Khalid is legal and valid; because as Khalid, in consequence of paying the compensation, becomes proprietor of the usurped article, he then appears to have sold his own property; where as every purchase made before, and even the purchase of Khalid himself, is invalid: because the article usurped becomes the property of Khalid, by retrospect. from the time only that he took possession of it. It is otherwise where similar circumstances follow a compulsory sale; for if, in such case, the party compelled (namely, the first seller) signify his assent to any one of the subsequent contracts, every other contract antecedent to that one is valid, and so likewise every subsequent contract; because the invalidity of these contracts was on account of the right of the proprietor, as he had sold his property upon compulsion; and he therefore possess a right to resume the property, until he signify his assent: but upon his assenting to any of these contracts, he relinquishes this right: and all the contracts become valid of course.

A person may lawfully eat or drink a prohibited article, upon a compulsion which threatens life or limb.—If one person use compulsion towards another, by imprisonment or blows; with a view to make him eat carrion or drink wine, still it is not lawful for the person thus compelled to eat or drink of his own accord; unless he be threatened with something dangerous to life or limb, in which case he may lawfully do so and the same rule obtains if compulsion be used to make a person eat blood or pork;—because the eating of such prohibited articles is not permitted except in cases of extremity, such as famine, since in any other case the argument of illegality still endures. Now extremity, or unavoidable necessity, do not exist, to require the eating or drinking of the article, except the not eating it be attended with danger to life or limb; but as the eating or drinking is in such case permitted, it follows that it is so permitted where this danger is to be apprehended from imprisonment or blows. Neither is the person, who is thus put in fear, under any obligation to suffer the thing menaced; but rather, if he do suffer it, and refrain from eating or drinking the prohibited article until he die, or lose any of his limbs, he is an offender; because as, under such circumstance, the eating or drinking is permitted to him, it follows that, if he refuse, he is an accessory with another to his own destruction, and is consequently an offender, in the same manner as if he were himself to eat the carrion when perishing for hunger. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that he would not be an offender from persisting, unto death or dismemberment, in his refusal; because the eating or drinking, in the case in question is merely licensed (since the articles still continue prohibited).—whereas the refrain ing from them is an observance of the LAW; and consequently, in persisting to refuse, he acts in obedience to the LAW.—To this, however, it may be replied, that in the case in question the illegality no longer remains; because, as a situation of compulsion or indispensible necessity is particularly excepted in the KORAN, it follows that under the circumstances here described the argument of illegality does not exist: hence the eating is positively lawful, and not merely lincensed. It is to be remarked, however, that in the case in question the compelled person is an offender only where he knows the eating to be lawful and nevertheless refrains: because as its legality is a matter of a concealed nature, it follows that he stands excused, from ignorance.

—in the same manner as men are excused for omissions or neglects, from ignorance, in the beginning of their conversion to the faith, or during their residence in a hostile country.

A person must not declare himself an infidel, or revile the Prophet, upon compulsion, unless he be in danger of otherwise losing life or limb. —If one person compel another to turn infidel, or to revile the Prophet, by imprisonment of blows, still compulsion [in its legal and exculpatory sense] is not established; but if he menace him with something which puts him in fear, and gives room to apprehend danger to life or limb, in this case compulsion is established.—The reason of this is; that as by mere blows or imprisonment compulsion is not established with regard to eating prohibited meats (as has before explained), it follows that it is not established with regard to infidelity a fortiori, since the illegality of infidelity is much greater. When, therefore; a person is put in fear for his life or limbs, so as that compulsion is established, it is lawful for him to make an exhibition of infidelity (that is, to repeat infidel expressions) and if he merely exhibit this with his lips, but keep his heart steady in the faith, he is not an offender; because when Amar had fallen into the hands of the infidels and they had compelled him to revile the Prophet, he said to him, “If you find your heart still firm in the faith, your uttering infidel expression is immaterial;—nay, if they again should compel you, you may again repeat such infidel expressions;”—and a passage in the KORAN was also revealed to the same effect. Another reason is that by uttering infidel expressions faith is not destroyed, since the actual faith
COMPULSION
(by which it is understood rectitude of heart) still continues unaffected, and if he were to refuse uttering such infidel expressions he would incur actual destruction, as the infidels would in that case dismember or put him to death. Yet if he persists in refusing unto death, he has a claim to merit, and is entitled to his reward; because Jeeb persevered in refusing, and suffered death in consequence; and the Prophet gave him the name of Seyd al Shaheed [the martyr], and declared, in afterwards speaking of him, "he is my friend in heaven;" and also because, in thus acting, his honour is effectually preserved. A refusal, moreover, for the sake of religion, to utter any infidel expressions, is an observance of the LAW: in opposition to the case before stated, as there the eating of carrion, or so forth, is positively lawful, because of the exception cited on that subject.

A person destroying the property of another upon compulsion is not responsible; but the compeller is so.—If one person compel another to destroy the property of a Mussulman, by menacing him with something dangerous to life or limb, it is lawful for the person so compelled to destroy that property: because the property of another is made lawful to us in all cases of necessity (such as in a situation of famine for instance), and in the case in question this necessity is established.—The owner of the property must in this instance take the compensation from the compeller: because the compeller is merely the instrument of the compeller in any point where he is capable of being so; and the destruction of property is of that nature.

A person murdering another upon compulsion is an offender; but the compeller is liable to retaliation.—If one person compel another, by menacing him with death, to murder a third person, still it is not lawful for the person so menaced to commit the murder, but he must rather refuse, even unto death.—If therefore, he not withstanding commit the murder, he is an offender, since the slaying of a Mussulman is not permitted under any necessity whatever.—In this case, however, the retaliation is upon the compeller, if the murder be wilful.—The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this is according to Haneefa and Mohammed; and that Ziffer, on the contrary, maintains that the retaliation, is upon the compelled person; whereas Aboo Yoosaf holds that there is no retaliation upon either party, and Shafei (on the contrary) contends that it is incurred by both.—The argument of Ziffer is, that the act of murder has proceeded from the compelled person, both de facto and de animo, and the LAW, also, has attached to him the effect of it, namely, criminality: consequently he incurs retaliation.—(It is otherwise in the case of destroying the property of another upon compulsion; since as the LAW has not attached the effect thereof, namely, the criminality, to him, it is consequently referred to another, namely the compeller) Such also is the argument of Shafei for awarding retaliation upon the compelled person; and his argument for awarding it upon the compeller is, that person proceeded the moving cause of the murder, as the compulsion was the cause of it; and the moving cause in murder stands (according to him) subject to the same rule with the actual perpetration;—as in the case of witnesses whose evidence induces retaliation; in other words, if two witnesses give evidence of a wilful murder, and in conformity with their testimony retaliation be executed upon the accused, and the person to whose murder they had borne testimony afterwards prove to be still living, those witnesses are then put to death in retaliation. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that concerning the propriety of awarding retaliation upon the compelled person there is a doubt; and, in the same manner, there is also a doubt concerning the propriety of awarding it upon the compeller; for in one way the view is to fix the murder upon the compelled, because of his being an offender, and it is also fixed upon the compeller, because of his being the mover:—thus a doubt opposes itself with respect to each; and hence neither of them is liable to retaliation. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammad is that the compelled person is in this instance, forced to the commission of the murder by a natural instinct, which leads a man to prefer his own life to that of another; and he must therefore, as far as is possible, be regarded as the instrument of the compeller. He is accordingly considered as his instrument in the commission of the murder, in the manner of a weapon. He cannot, however, be his instrument with regard to the criminality of the deed, in such a way as that no part of the criminality would attach to himself, but the whole be imputable to the compeller; and hence the murder, with regard to its criminality, is restricted to the person compelled.—This is therefore in some measure analogous to a case of compulsive manumission,—or of a person compelling a Magian to slaughter a goat: that is to say, if one person compel another to emancipate his slave, and he emancipate him accordingly, in this case the emancipation is referred and imputed to the compeller, whereas he is answerable for the value of the slave,—but the emancipation is imputed to the compelled with regard to the execution of it, for if it were in this respect also imputed to the compeller, the slave would not become free;—and, in the same manner, if a person compel a Magian, or other idolator, to slaughter the goat of another: his act is referred and imputed to the compeller, with regard to the destruction of the property, but not with regard to a lawful Zabbah, whence the goat is prohibited and carrion:—and so likewise, in the case in question, the act of the compelled person is imputed to the compeller with respect to the destruction, not with regard to the criminality.

Case of compelled divorce or emancipation.—If one person compel another to divorce his wife, or to emancipate his slave, and this person accordingly divorce his wife or emancipate his slave, such divorce or emancipation takes effect, according to our doctors; in opposition to the opinion of Shafei as has been already stated under the head of Divorce.—In the case of compulsive manumission, the person compelled is entitled to take the value of the slave from the compeller, because as in this case the compelled admits of being considered as the instrument of the compeller with regard to the destruction of property; to him such destruction is accordingly referred and imputed. Hence he is at liberty to seek a compensation from the compeller, whether rich or poor; and the slave is not liable to emancipatory labour, as that could only be due from him either with a view to his emancipation, or on account of the right of some other person being involved in him, neither of which motives exist in the present instance.—It is also to be observed that the compeller, in this case, is not entitled to take from the slave his value as said to his prorietor; because as he [the compeller] is sued on the score of a destruction of the slave, it may therefore be said that he has (as it were) murdered or made away with the slave; and he [the slave] consequently cannot be responsible.—In the case of compelled divorce, also, the person compelled is entitled to take from the compeller half the dower, provided the divorce be before consummation;—or, if no dower was mentioned in the marriage contract, he may take from him that for which he is himself in such case responsible, namely, a Miatat, or present, as that is what he incurs by the divorce.—It is likewise where the compelled divorce is pronounced after consummation; for in that case the dower has been already made due by the consummation, and is not made so by the divorce.

Case of a compelled appointment of agency for divorce or emancipation.—If a person, upon compulsion, create another his agent for divorce or emancipation, and the agent divorce the wife, or emancipate the slave, of the person thus compelled to authorize him, such divorce or manumission is valid, on a favourable construction; because a compelled contract or commission, provided it be such as is rendered invalid by involving an invalid condition; is invalidated by the compulsion; but a commission of agency is not rendered invalid by involving an invalid condition.—In the case of divorce, the compelled constituent is entitled to take half the dower from the compeller.—and, in the case of manumission, to take from the compeller the value of the slave; because in both cases the end and design of the compeller was to destroy the constituent’s right of property, in performing the act for which he appointed him agent.

No deed, in itself irrevocable, can be extracted after being executed by compulsion.—It is to be observed, as a rule, that in all deeds or contracts which, after engagement, do not admit of reversal or dissolution, compulsion has no effect whatever, but they are equally obligatory and under compulsion as otherwise Hence compulsion has no operation upon a vow, since this (unless it be of a suspended nature) incapable of dissolution; and accordingly, the person compelled into such a vow is not entitled to take any thing whatever from the compeller, in consideration of the loss he incurs by such vow.—In the same manner, also, compulsion is attended with no effect in oaths, or in Zihar, as those do not admit of retraction; and reversal of divorce and Aila are also subject to the same rule, as well as a recantation of an Aila oath at the time of making the assertion. In Khoola, also, as being a suspension of divorce on the part of the husband (for he suspends it on the payment of the consideration), compulsion is attended with no effect, since it is incapable of reversal or dissolution; and accordingly, if the husband be compelled into it, not the wife, she is answerable for the consideration, since she assents to it, as having undertaken for it without compulsion.

Whoredom by compulsion inures punishment.—If a person upon compulsion, commit whoredom, he is liable to punishment, according to Haneefa,—except where the compeller is a Sultan.—The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that he is not liable to punishment in either case.

Case of apostacy upon compulsion.—If a person, upon compulsion, become an apostate by pronouncing a renunciation of the faith, yet his wife is not separated from him, because apostacy has a connexion with belief, whence if his mental faith continue firm, he does not become an infidel by the mere verbal renunciation.—In the case in question, moreover, his infidelity is dubious, and consequently his wife is not separated from him, because of the doubt.—If, therefore, the husband and wife differ, she insisting that she has been separated, and he that his renunciation was only pronounced outwardly, but that this faith still remains firm, his declaration must be credited; because a declaration of apostacy is never used with a view to effect a matrimonial separation, but merely signifies a change of belief: and the compulsion, on the other hand, affords an argument that the belief has not been altered:—consequently his declaration must be credited.—It is otherwise with respect to a man turning Mussulman upon compulsion; as a man who embraces the faith upon compulsion is nevertheless admitted to be a Mussulman, because of the possibility that his faith accords with his words.—In short, in both cases (namely, compulsion to apostacy, and compulsion to Islam) a preference is given to Islam, as it is the superior, and cannot be overcome.—What is here advanced relates merely to the award of the Kazee; "for with God, if the person do not believe in his heart, he is not a Mussulman.

Case of Islam upon compulsion.—If a person become a Mussulman upon compulsion, so as to decreed a Mussulman, and afterwards apostatize, still he is not worthy of death, since his Islam is doubtful, and doubt prevents the execution of death upon him.

Case of a husband acknowledging his having apostatized upon compulsion.—If a person, after having made, upon compulsion, a declaration of infidelity, should say to his wife, who claims a separation, "I said a thing in which I was not serious" in other words, ("I spoke falsely"), in this case his wife is separated from him in the conception of the Kazee, † and he [the Kazee] must issue a decree accordingly, although there be no separation before God.—The reason of this is, that from his acknowledgment it is established that he was not compelled into his declaration, but made it without compulsion, as the compeller used compulsion towards him not with a view to extort the declaration from him, but with a view to make him change his faith; and as he, of his own choice, made the declaration of infidelity, and his wife claims a separation, his allegation that "he intended nothing" cannot be credited with the Kazee, who must therefore issue a decree of separation, although there be no separation in the sight of God.—If, on the other hand, he allege that "he intended merely to fulfill the design of the compeller, namely, to make a declaration of infidelity, at the same time that he spoke under a mental reservation," in this case his wife is separated from him both with the Kazee, and also in the sight of God; because in this case he appears to have made a serious declaration of infidelity, notwithstanding he may have screened himself under the mental reservation.—In the same manner: if a person compel another to worship a cross, or to revile the holy person of the Prophet, and he do so accordingly, and afterwards plead that "his design in worshipping was the worship of God,"—or "by Mohammed he meant some other than the Prophet," his wife, claiming separation, is separated from him with the Kazee, and also in the sight of God; whereas if he were thus to worship a cross, or to revile the Prophet, under a mere mental reservation his wife would be separated from him both with the Kazee, and also in the sight of God, for the reasons above stated.

† That is, "in the eye of the law."
control and suspension as to the acts of an infant or a lunatic are with a view to the security of their interest, their guardians are therefore to examine and attend to what may be good for them in their acts. It is requisite, moreover, that the persons here described know the nature of sale, in order that the pillar of the contract may exist, and the sale be concluded so far as to remain suspended upon the guardian's consent;—and a lunatic sometimes knows the nature of sale, and designs it, although he be incapable of distinguishing between the profit and loss attending it.—(A lunatic of this description is termed a Matooa;—and his agency is likewise valid,—as has been already mentioned in treating of agency.)

Objection.—Suspense obtains only in sale; the original rule in purchase being that it takes effect upon the agent:* but in the present instance, purchase by an infant or a lunatic depends upon the ascent of the guardian, in the same manner as sale by them.

Reply.—The non-suspense of purchase is only where its taking effect upon the agent is possible, as in the case of purchase by a Fazoolee, or unauthorized person; but in the case in question it is impossible that the purchase should take effect upon the agent, because of his incompetency where he is an infant or a lunatic, and because of the injury to the master where he is slave.—Purchase by the guardian, is also suspended.

But it operates upon them with respect to words only, not with respect to acts.—It is to be observed that the three disqualifications in question, namely, infancy, insanity, and servitude, occasion inhibition with respect to words, but not with respect to acts;† because acts, upon proceeding from the actor, are existent and perceptible, whereas mere words, such as purchase, sale, and so forth, are accounted existent only where they are of lawful force and authority, which depends upon the design of them, a thing which, in the case of infants and lunatics, is not regarded, because of their want of understanding; or in the case of slaves, because of the injury to their master.—In short, the disqualifications here considered occasion inhibition with respect to speech, but not with respect to actions;—unless, however, those be of such nature as to induce an effect liable to prevention from the existence of a doubt, such as punishment or retaliation, in which case infancy or lunacy occasion inhibition; whence it is that infants or lunatics are not liable to punishment or retaliation, since no regard is paid to their design.

* Arab. Mobashir: meaning the actor or performer of any thing; whence, in treating of crimes, it is translated the perpetrator. (The translator thinks it is proper to explain this distinction. because of the equivocal nature of the term agent.) † Arab. Ifyal. Meaning overt acts, such as a destruction of property, and so forth.

All contracts or acknowledgments by an infant or lunatic are invalid; and so likewise divorce or manumission pronounced by them.—No contract entered into, nor acknowledgment made by an infant or lunatic is valid, for the reason before assigned;—and, in the same manner, divorce or manumission pronounced by them does not take place, the Prophet having said, "every divorce takes place except that pronounced by an infant."—It is to be observed, moreover, that manumission is peculiarly prejudicial:—and an infant does not understand the nature of divorce, as not being capable of desire; and his guardian cannot possibly know whether the infant and his wife may not agree together after he attains maturity.

Hence the divorce or manumission pronounced by an infant are not suspended, in their effect, upon the consent of the guardian.

Or by their guardians on their behalf.—If, also, the guardian himself pronounce a divorce upon the infant's wife, or grant manumission to his slave, it does not take place:—in opposition to other acts, such as purchase, sale, and so forth.

They are responsible for destruction of property.—If an infant or a lunatic destroy anything, they are liable to make a recompense, in order that the right of the owner may be preserved. The ground of this is that destruction occasions responsibility, independent of the intention or design:—as where, for instance, a man's property is destroyed, from being fallen upon by a person walking in his sleep, or from the falling of an inclined wall, after due warning; in which cases the sleeper or the owner of the wall are responsible, although they did not design the destruction.

Acknowledgment by a slave affects himself, not his master; and takes effect upon him on his becoming free—An acknowledgment made by a slave is efficient with respect to the slave himself, because of his competency; but it is inefficient with respect to his master, from tenderness to his right; for if he were liable to be affected by it, the debt or obligation contracted by the slave's acknowledgment would attach to his [the slave's] person or to his acquisitions, which would be destructive of his [the master's] property.—If, therefore, a slave make an acknowledgment concerning property such property is obligatory upon him after he shall become free; because a slave is in himself competent to make a valid acknowledgment, the validity of which is however obstructed by the right of his master; but that right is extinguished upon his becoming free, and consequently the obstruction then ceases to exist.

Or on the instant, if it induce punishment or retaliation.—If a slave make an acknowledgment inducing punishment or retaliation, those are executed upon him on the instant, since he is accounted free with respect to his blood, whence it is that his master's acknowledgment affecting his blood is not admitted.

Divorce pronounced by him is valid.—Divorce pronounced by a slave is valid and efficient; because of the saving [of the Prophet] before quoted; and also because the Prophet has said, "a slave and a Mokatib are not masters of any thing except divorce."

—Besides, as a slave knows what is advisable for him with regard to divorcing his wife, he is therefore competent to that act. His master's right of property in him, moreover, or the advantage he derives from his services, are not liable to be thereby lost or defeated. — Divorce by a slave is therefore lawful and effectual.

ON INHIBITION FROM WEAKNESS OF MIND."

Inhibition with respect to a prodigal.—Hanerfa has declared it as his opinion that there is no inhibition upon a free man who is sane and adult notwithstanding he be a prodigal; and also, that the acts of such a person, with regard to his property, are valid, although he be one of an extravagant and careless disposition, who throws away his property on objects in which neither his interest nor his inclination are concerned. A prodigal [Safeeya] signifies one who in consequence of a levity of understanding acts merely from the impulse of the moment, in opposition to the dictates of the Law and of common sense.—Aboo Yoosaf, Mohammed, and Shafei maintain that a prodigal is under inhibition, and is interdicted from acting with his own property, as he spends his substance idly, and in a manner repugnant to the dictates of reason. Hence he is placed under inhibition for his own advantage, because of the analogy between him and an infant: —nay, he is to be inhibited rather than an infant since in an infant carelessness and extravagance are only to be apprehended, whereas in him they are certain. —whence it is that he is not entrusted with the care of his own property. Besides, if he were not under inhibition, there would be no advantage in withholding his property, since in such case he might still destroy what is kept from him by his words or declarations. The argument of Hanefa is that, as a prodigal is still supposed to be a person naturally endowed with sense and understanding, as much as one who acts discreetly, he therefore is not subject to inhibition any more than a prudent person. The ground of this is, that if the prodigal were subject to inhibition (that is, if his power of acting were doubted), he would be excluded from humanitv and connected with brutes, an exclusion still more injurious to him than any extravagance of which he could be guilty; and to remedy the smaller evil by the greater would be absurd. If, however, in laying an inhibition upon a free man who is sane and adult any general evil be remedied (such as in disqualifying an unskilful physician, or a prodigate magistrate, or a mendicant imposter), the inhibition is lawful (according to what is reported from Hanefa), since in this instance the smaller evil is used to remedy the greater, which is just and reasonable. With respect to the argument for inhibition upon a prodigal, from the circumstance of his not being entrusted with his own property, it is not admitted, since inhibition is a still greater hardship upon him than withholding his property; for the legality of the smaller hardship does not prove the greater hardship to be legal. In the same manner, also, the analogy adduced between a prodigal and an infant is not admitted, since an infant is incapable of pursuing his own advantage, whereas a prodigal is capable of so doing. Besides, although in subjecting the prodigal to inhibition his interest and advantage be consulted, still, however, the Law exhibits in one particular a tenderness towards him, by enabling him to pursue his own advantage, which he acts contrary to only from the vice or folly of his disposition. In withholding his property from him, moreover, there is one particular advantage: for the dissipation of property by extravagance chiefly consists in making idle and unnecessary donations; and as his making these must depend upon the property being in his hands, there is therefore an evident advantage in detaining it from him.

* Arab. Fixad; meaning (in this place) any species of mental depravity (not occasioned by a defect of understanding), or the practice of any folly, such as extravagance, or so forth.

† Arab. Safeeya. According to the lexicons it signifies light-minded. Prodigal may appear, in many places, to be rather too harsh a term. The word might more literally be rendered indiscreet, it being frequently opposed, in the sequel, to Rasheed, a discreet person. As, however, the translator does not recollect any sustantive in our language perfectly correspondent with this idea, he has thought it advisable to adopt that term which most nearly answers to the definition of the Mussulman doctors, although it be not precisely what he could wish.

May be imposed by one magistrate and removed by another. — If a magistrate lay an inhibition upon a prodigal, and the matter be referred to another magistrate, and he annul the inhibition, and leave the prodigal at full liberty, it is lawful for the inhibition imposed by the former magistrate is merely an opinion [Fitwa], not a decree, since to a judicial decree a plaintiff and a defendant are requisite, and those do not exist in the present instance. Besides, if the act of the magistrate, in thus imposing an inhibition, be considered as a decree, there is a difference concerning its being actually such, as Haneefa is not of this opinion. It is, however, incumbent upon the second magistrate, in this instance, to maintain the virtue of the decree, and inhibition. But if the decree may continue in force:—and accordingly, if the prodigal perform any act after inhibition, and the act in question be referred to the magistrate who imposed the inhibition (or to any other), and this magistrate issue a decree annulling such act, and again the matter be referred to another magistrate, he is bound to uphold and adhere to the sentence of the first magistrate, and not to annul it; for as the first or other magistrate, upon the matter being referred to them, had confirmed and subscribed to the sentence of inhibition, it cannot afterwards be reversed.

The property of a prodigal youth must be withheld from him until he attain twenty-five years of age.—Haneefa has delivered it as his opinion, that if an infant be a prodigal at the time of his attaining maturity, his property must not be delivered to him until he be twenty-five years of age (still, however, if he should perform any act with respect to his property prior to that period, it takes effect, since, according to Haneefa, prodigals are not liable to inhibition):—but upon completing his twenty-fifth year, his property must be delivered to him, although his discretion should not be ascertained. The two disciples maintain that his property must not be delivered to him until such time as his discretion be fully known; and that in the interim all acts performed by him are invalid; for as mental imbecility is the occasion of the obstacle to his power of action, it follows that the obstacle continues as long as the occasion of it remains;—as in the case of an infant, who remains subject to inhibition during the continuance of his infancy. The argument of Haneefa is that, withholding to property from the person in question would be mere unadvised instruction, or as a species of discipline; and it is most probable that a person, after attaining the age mentioned, will not be disposed to receive instruction, since it frequently happens, that a man arrived at those years is a grandfather, his son having a son born to him: hence in withholding his property there is no advantage whatever, since the view in withholding it is to make him submit to instruction, which upon his attaining the age mentioned can no longer be answered;—and it is therefore indispensable that his property be delivered to him. Besides, the reason for withholding his property from the person in question is, that after attaining maturity, in consideration of the vestiges or remaining impressions of infancy:—and as these continue only in the beginning of maturity, and are terminated by time, it follows that upon a time passing sufficient for this purpose, his property must be delivered to him;—whence Haneefa maintains that if an infant be discreet at the time of his majority, and afterwards become prodigal, still his property must be delivered to him, since the prodigality, in this instance, cannot be regarded as a vestige of infancy. It is to be observed that as according to the tenets of the two disciples, an inhibition, upon the prodigal in question is valid, it follows that a sale concluded by him is of no effect, in order that the advantage proposed in the inhibition may be obtained. If, however, the sale be deemed advisable, the magistrate must give his assent to it; because here the sale possesses all the essentials of sale, being suspended in its effect merely for the advantage of the prodigal, and from a regard to his interest, and as the magistrate is appointed his office for the purpose of watching over and consulting the interest of the individual, it is therefore requisite that he examine whether the sale be advisable, in the same manner as it is his duty to investigate into a sale made by an infant who intends and is acquainted with the nature of sale.

But a sale concluded by him after maturity, and before inhibition, is valid.—If the prodigal, considered in the preceding example, conclude a sale before any inhibition has been laid upon him by the magistrate such sale is valid, according to Abou Yoosaf, since (agreeably to his tenets) to render the acts of the prodigal invalid, it is requisite that the magistrate lay an inhibition upon him, in order that inhibition may be fully established. According to Mohammed, on the contrary, the sale in question is lawful, since (agreeably to his tenets) the prodigal is in fact under inhibition after majority, as the cause of inhibition, namely prodigality, stands in the place of infancy. The same difference of opinion obtains concerning an infant who if discreet at the time of attaining majority and afterwards becomes prodigal.

And he may grant manumission.—If the prodigal in question emancipate his slave, it is valid and effectual, and the slave becomes free, according to the two disciples; whereas according to Shafei it is not effectual. In short, it is a rule with the two disciples that every act liable to be affected by jesting is also liable to be affected by inhibition, as (on the contrary) any act not affected by jesting is not affected by inhibition; for a prodigal is, in effect, a jester, inasmuch as the words of a jester, spoken to an unwise or absurd effect, proceed from mere passion or waywardness, not from a want of understanding, and the same also with a prodigal; and as manumission is one of those things not affected by jesting, but valid even when spoken in jest, so in the same manner manumission pronounced but a prodigal is valid. With Shafei, on the contrary, it is a rule that inhibition in consequence of prodigality is in effect the same as inhibition in consequence of servitude (whence it is that after inhibition in consequence of prodigality no act whatever of the prodigal is valid except divorce, which is effectual in the same manner as divorce pronounced by a slave; and as manumission by a slave is invalid, so in the same manner is manumission by a prodigal. It is to be observed that as, according to the two disciples, a manumission pronounced by the prodigal is valid, the slave therefore owes to his master (the prodigal) emancipatory labour the amount of his whole value; because inhibition is laid upon the master with a view to his interest and advantage; and the preservation of his interest by a rejection of the manumission itself is impossible it must therefore be rejected so far as to subject the slave to emancipatory labour for his full value; in the same manner as holds in the case of inhibition with respect to a dying person for if a dying person emancipate his slave, he [the slave] must perform emancipatory labour on behalf of the creditors, where the person was involved in debt: or on behalf of the heirs, for two thirds of his value, where he died free from debt. It is elsewhere recorded, from Mohammed, that emancipatory labour is not incumbent upon the slave thus emancipated by his master, being a prodigal; for, if it were due from him, it could only be so on behalf of the emancipator; and the law does not authorize the obligation of emancipatory labour on behalf of the emancipator, but of others.

Or Tadbeer.—Ir the prodigal in question constitute his slave a Modabbir, it is lawful; because Tadbeer gives a title to manumission: and as actual manumission, proceeding from a prodigal, is valid, that which merely entitles to it is certainly valid.—Emancipatory labour, however, is not incumbent upon the Modabbir during the prodigal’s life, since he still continue his property. But if the prodigal die, without discretion having been ascertained in him, the Modabbir is in that case to perform emancipatory labour [to the prodigal’s heirs or creditors, as the case may be], for the value he bore as a Modabbir: because he becomes free upon his master’s decease, at which time he is a Modabbir, and the case is therefore the same as if the master had first constituted him a Modabbir, and then emancipated him.

Or claim a child born if his female slave.—Ir the prodigal’s female slave bring forth a child and he claim it, the parentage is established in him, and the child is free, and the mother becomes his Am-Walid; for as the prodigal has occasion to make the claim in question, with a view to posterity, he is therefore accounted a discreet person with respect to the claim offspring advanced by him.

Or create his female slave Am-Walid, independent of such claim.—Ir the prodigal’s female slave be not in possession of any child, and the prodigal avow her to be his Am-Walid, she accordingly becomes his Am-Walid, to this effect that he has it not in his power to sell her. If, however, the prodigal die, she must perform emancipatory labour [to his heirs or creditor] for her whole value; because his avowal of her being Am-Walid is the same as his acknowledgment of her being free, since the child, which would be an evidence of her freedom, does not exist in this case; and as, if he had declared her to be free, she would owe emancipatory labour, so likewise in the present instance. It is otherwise, in the example before stated (where the child is supposed to be existing), since in that case an evidence exists of the slave being free. Analogous to this example is the instance of a dying person laying claim to a child born of his female slave: for in that case also the same rules prevail.

He may also marry.—Ir the prodigal here treated of marry any woman, such marriage is legal and valid; because jesting has no effect in materimony; and also, because marriage is one of his original indispensable wants: If, also, he specify any dowry, it is paid to the amount of the woman’s proper dower, as that is one of the pertinents of marriage; but any thing beyond the proper dower is null, since for that there is no occasion, it being binding only in consequence of specification, which in this instance is no way advantageous to the prodigal:—the excess, therefore, is invalid, in the same manner as where person affected with a mortal disease marries, and specifies a dower greater than the proper dower. If, also, he divorce his wife before consummation an half dower is due to the woman from his property, as his specification of a dower is valid to the amount of the proper dower. In the same manner also, if he marry four wives, or a new wife every day, it is valid, for the reasons above specified.

Out of his property is paid Zakat; and also maintenance to his parents, children, &c.—Zakat is levied upon the property of the prodigal in question, as Zakat is incumbent upon him. In the same manner also, substance is provided to his parents and children, his wife or wives, and all relations who have a claim upon him for maintenance; because the preservation of his wife and children is among his essential wants, and maintenance is due to his relations by right of affinity; and no person’s right is annulled by his prodigality. It is to be observed that it is the Kazee’s duty to give the amount or proportion of Zakat into the prodigal’s hands, in order to his expending it upon the proper objects of Zakat; for as Zakat is a matter of piety, intention is therefore requisite in the payment of it. The Kazee must, however, depute one of his Ameens to see that the Zakat be applied to its proper objects:—and in the case of maintenance to relations, he must pay the necessary sum into the Ameen’s hands, that he may distribute the same among those entitled to maintenance; for as this duty is not a matter of piety, the intention of the donor is not requisite in the fulfilment of it.
It is otherwise where the prodigal swears, or makes a vovte engagement, or pronounces a Zihar upon his wife; for in these cases he does not forfeit any property, but has only to perform an expiation for his oath, vow, or Zihar, by fasting, this expiation being incurred by his own act; and therefore if his performance of expiation by a payment of property were required, he would be allowed himself to expend his property to the degree necessary:—but it is not so where any thing is due from him not incurred by his own act, such as Zakat, and so forth.

He cannot be prevented from performing pilgrimage.—If the prodigal be desirous of performing the ordained pilgrimage, he must not be prevented, since this is a matter rendered incumbent upon him by a commandment of God, in lependerit of an act on his part. The Kaza must not, however, expend it upon this, but the subject requisite for his travelling expenses, but must lodge it in the hands of some trusty person among the pilgrims, to provide him a maintenance out of it upon the journey; for otherwise he would throw it away, or expend it on some thing not relating to pilgrimage. In the same manner also, if the prodigal be desirous of performing the Amrit, he must not be prevented; for as concerning the obligation of that there is a difference of opinion, caution dictates that no obstruction be offered to the observance of it. In the same manner also, if he be desirous of performing a Kiran, he must not be prevented since by Kiran is understood the performance of Amrit and pilgrimage in one journey; and as he is not prevented from performing those separately, it follows that he is not to be prevented from performing the whole in one journey.

His bequests (to pious purposes) hold good.—If the prodigal fall sick, and make a variety of bequests to pious and charitable purposes, they hold good to the amount of a third of his whole property; for rendering them valid is advantageous to him, since when the bequests take effect he has no longer any occasion for the property; and those bequests are used as a mean either of manifesting the testator’s gratitude to God, or of acquiring merit in his sight.

There is no inhibition upon a Fasik.—Our doctors are of opinion that no inhibition is to be imposed on a repudiate (Fasik) with respect to his property, provided he be endowed with discretion:—and original or supervenient depravity of manners are alike as far as regards this rule. Shafeei maintains that inhibition is to be imposed upon a person of this description as a punishment, in the same manner as on a prolixal; whence it is that (according to him) an unjust person is incapable of exercising jurisdiction or bearing evidence. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. First the word of God in the Koran, says, Whenever ye perceive them to be Despisest, Deliver to them their Property;” and the repudiate, in the case in question, is supposed to be discreet with regard to the expenditure of his property. Secondly, a repudiate (according to our doctors) is competent to exercise authority, as being a Mussulman, and is consequently empowered to act with regard to his own property.

People are liable to inhibition from carelessness in their affairs. The two disciples allege that the Kaza is at liberty to lay an inhibition upon persons on account of carelessness or neglect in their concerns, although they be not prodigal. Their argument is that an inhibition imposed upon a person of this description is advantageous to him. Shafeei concurs with the two disciples in this opinion.

Of the Time of attaining Puberty

The puberty of a boy is established by circumstances, or upon his attaining eighteen years of age:—and that of a girl, by circumstances, or upon her attaining seventeen years of age. The puberty of a boy is established by his becoming subject to nocturnal emission, his impregnating a woman, or emitting in the act of coition; and if none of these be known to exist, his puberty is not established, until he have completed his eighteenth year. The puberty of a girl is established by menstruation, nocturnal emission, or pregnancy; and if none of these have taken place, her puberty is established on the completion of her seventeenth year. What is here advanced is according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that upon either a boy or girl completing the fifteenth year they are to be declared adult; there is also one report of Haneefa to the same effect; and Shafeei concurs in this opinion. It is also reported, from Haneefa, that to establish the puberty of a boy nineteen years are required. Some, however, observe that by this is to be understood merely the completion of eighteen years and the commencement of the nineteenth; and consequently, that this report perfectly accords with the other. Some, again, affirm that this is not the sense in which the last report is to be received; for there have been other opinions reported from Haneefa on this point, different from that first recited as above; because some authorities expressly say that (according to him) the puberty of a boy is not counted by years until he shall have completed his nineteenth year. It is to be observed that the earliest period of puberty, with respect to a boy, is twelve years, and with respect to a girl, nine years.

Their declaration of their own puberty, at a probable season, must be credited—When a boy or girl approaches the age of puberty, and they declare themselves adult, their declaration must be credited, and they become subject to all the rules affecting adults; because the attainment of puberty is a matter which can only be ascertained by their testimony; and consequently, when they notify it, their notification must be credited, in the same manner as the declaration of a woman with respect to her courses.

CHAPTER III.

OF INHIBITION ON ACCOUNT OF DEBT.

A debtor is not liable to inhibition—Haneefa is of opinion that no person can be laid under inhibition on account of debt. If, therefore, a debt be proved against any person, and the creditors require the Kazee to imprison him and lay him under inhibition, still the Kazee must not do the latter; because as laying him under inhibition is a destruction or suspension of his competency, it is not therefore allowable for the remedy or removal of a particular injury.

Nor can his property be made the subject of any transaction.—If, also, the debtor be possessed of property, still the Kazee is not at liberty to perform any act with it,¹ as this would be a species of inhibition, and his thus acting with the property would, moreover, be an act of conversion without the assent of the proprietor, and consequently null, according to both the Koran and the Sonna.

But he may be imprisoned.—It is, however, requisite that the magistrate imprison the debtor, and hold him in durance, until such time as he sell his property for the discharge of his debts, and the rendering of justice. The two disciples say, that if the creditors require the Kazee to impose an inhibition upon their insolvent debtor, it is requisite that he impose an inhibition upon him accordingly, and prevent him from selling, or transacting, or making acknowledgments, in order that his creditors may not sustain an injury; because restriction is imposed upon a prodigal only out of a regard for his interest; and in imposing the same upon a debtor a regard is manifested to the interest of his creditors; for if an inhibition upon him were not authorized, it is not improbable that he might act collusively, or, in other words, might declare that "the property in his possession belong to a particular person," notwithstanding it actually belongs to himself and not to the other, his declaration being made merely with a view that the property might not go to his creditors,—whence the sight of the creditors would be defeated.—(It is to be remarked, that what the two disciples say of an inhibition being laid upon the debtor with respect to sale, applies only to the sale of anything for a price short of its real value; as the right of the creditors is not injured by his selling an article for an adequate price. Besides, the prohibition of the sale exists only on account of the creditors right; and as their right is not annulled by such a sale, he need not be prohibited from concluding it)—It is also lawful (according to the two disciples) for the Kazee to sell the debtor's property, where he himself declines so doing, and to divide the price of it among the creditors in proportion to their respective claims; because it is incumbent upon the debtor to sell his property for the payment of his debt; and consequently, upon his declining so to do, the Kazee is his substitute for that purpose, in the same manner as a Kazee is the substitute of the husband for pronouncing a separation between him and his wife, where he is an eunuch, or impotent. The argument adduced by our doctors on behalf of Haneefa, and in reply to the two disciples, that the allusion is a matter of uncertainty. And with respect to sale, it is not to be particularly appointed for the payment of debts, since it is in the debtor's power to discharge what he owes by various other means, such as borrowing or begging; whence it is not lawful for the Kazee to appoint a sale. It is otherwise in the case of a husband who is an eunuch or impotent, as in that instance separation is the appointed remedy. The debtor, moreover, is not imprisoned with a view to sale (as alleged by the two disciples), but with a view to the payment of his debts, and to constrain him to adopt some method for the discharge of them.—Besides, if it were lawful for the Kazee to set up the debtor's property to sale, he could not lawfully have recourse to imprisonment, since that would be injurious both to the debtor and the creditors, as being vexatious to the former, and creating a delay in the discharge of the latter's right, whence the imprisonment would not be sanctioned by the law; whereas it is in fact strictly lawful.

If he be possessed of money, of the same denomination as his debt, the Kazee may make payment with it; or, if the species be different, he may sell it for this purpose.—If the debts owing by the debtor in question consist of dirms, and the property possessed by the debtor also consist of dirms, the Kazee may in this case discharge the demands upon him without his consent. This is a point in which all our doctors coincide; for as the creditor is here at liberty to take his right without the debtor’s consent, it follows that the debtor is at liberty to assist him in the recovery of it. If, on the contrary, the debt consist of dirms; and the property in the debtor’s hands be deenars, or vice versa, the Kazee is in this case empowered to sell such property for payment of the debt. This is according to Hanefa, and proceeds upon a favourable construction—Analogy would suggest that the Kazee is not at liberty to sell the property in this instance, in the same manner as he is not at liberty to sell the debtor’s household goods, or other effects. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is that dirms are both alike in regard to their constituting price and representing property, as, on the other hand, they differ from each other with regard to appearance: hence, because of their similarity in the one shape, the Kazee is empowered to act with respect to them; and because of their dissimilarity in the other shape, the creditor is not at liberty to take them without the debtor’s consent. It is otherwise with respect to goods and effects, since those are objects of desire and use, both in appearance and reality, whereas dirms and deenars are merely a means of obtaining such objects.

Rule in selling off a debtor’s property.—In discharging debts, that part of the debtor’s property which consists of money is first disposed of, then his effects and household furniture; and last of all his houses and lands; for in this mode of adjustment a regard is paid to the ease and convenience of both parties. The debtor’s clothes, also, must be sold, excepting only one suit, which is sufficient to answer necessity. Some, however, say that two suits must be left with the debtor, one suit being in use whilst the other is washing.

Acknowledgments by a debtor are not binding on him until his debts be paid.—If a debtor make an acknowledgment whilst under inhibition, such acknowledgment is not binding upon him until he shall have satisfied his creditors; for as their right was first connected with his property, he is therefore not at liberty to annul it by an acknowledgment in behalf of any other person. It would be otherwise supposing the debtor to destroy a person’s property; for in that case he would be responsible; and the owner of the property so destroyed would come in upon an equal footing with the other creditors, as the destruction of property is a sensible and perceptible circumstance, and therefore cannot possibly be set aside. If, also, the debtor acquire or obtain property after inhibition, his acknowledgment, as above, takes effect with respect to such property; because the right of the former creditors is not connected with this property, it not existing at the time of inhibition.

A debtor (being poor) gets a subsistence out of his property; and also his wives, children, and uterine kindred.—A subsistence must be paid to the debtor out of his property (provided he be in poverty), and also to his wives, infant children, and uterine kindred; because his indispensible wants precede the right of his creditors; and also because it is the maintenance of his wife, &c., in their right, it cannot be annulled by inhibition, whence it is that if he were to marry, his wife comes in upon an equal footing with his other creditors, to the amount of her proper dower.

A debtor, on pleading poverty, is imprisoned.—If the debtor be not possessed of any known property, and the creditors require the Kazee to imprison him, he at the same time declaring that he has nothing, the Kazee must in this case imprison him on account of such debts as he may have incurred by contracts such as a dower, or an obligation undertaken by his becoming bail for property.—(Those cases have been already discussed at large in treating of the duties of the Kazee, and therefore a repetition in this place is unnecessary.)

General rules with respect to him whilst in prison.—If the debtor who pleads poverty, as above, fall sick in prison, he is nevertheless continued in durance, provided he have an attendant to wait upon him and administer medicine to him—but if he have no such attendant he must in that case be liberated from confinement, lest he perish. If he be an artisan, he must be prevented from following his trade and must not be suffered to do any work, in order that, from distress, he may be compelled to pay his debts.—This is approved. If he be possessed of a female slave, under such circumstances as that he may cohabit with her; he must not be prevented from so doing; since carna connexion is required to satisfy a man’s appetite in the same manner as eating or drinking; and he therefore must not be pre-

After liberating, the creditors are at liberty to pursue him. — Upon his being liberated from prison,* the creditors must not be obstructed in enforcing their claims against him, but are at liberty to pursue him † They must not, however, prevent him from transacting business or travelling. The reason of this is that the Prophet has said, "the pro-prior of a right has a hand and a tongue," meaning, by the hand, the power of pursuing, and by the tongue, the power of demanding the right. The creditors are also at liberty, in this case, to take the excess† of the debtor's earnings, and divide it among themdebtor from transaction business; or travelling," it is an argument that the creditor is at liberty to pursue the debtor by accompanying him wherever he goes, but not by fixing him in any particular place; for this would be imprisonment. If, also, the debtor go-into his house upon any business, the creditor is not at liberty to enter with him, but must stand at the door until he come forth; because men stand in need of some private and secluded place.

And have an option, if he prefer continuing in prison — If a debtor be desirous of continuing in prison, and his creditor be rather desirous of holding him in pursuit, regard is paid to the option of the creditor, as that is the most effectual towards obtaining the desired end since he, it is to be supposed, will adopt such measures as may distress the debtor, and thus compel him to do justice. If, however, the Kazee perceive that the debtor is subjected to any particular injury (from the creditor in the exercise of the right of pursuing, as, for instance, not permitting him to enter his own house), in this case he [kazee] must imprison him [the debtor] in order to repel such injury.

A mala creditor cannot pursue his female debtor. — If the debtor be a woman, and the creditor a man, the creditor must not be suff ered to pursue her, since if this were admitted, it would induce the retirement of a man with a strange woman. The creditor, however, is at liberty to depute a confidential female to attend the debtor in the exercise of his right.

Case of a purchased article being in the debtor's hands upon his failure. — If a debtor become poor* having at the same time in his hands effects purchased from a particular person, this person, in recovering the price of such effects, is upon an equal footing with the other creditors. Shafei maintains that in this case it is the duty of the Kazee to lay an inhibition upon the purchaser, provided the seller require him so to do; and then that the seller has it at his option to dissolve the sale; for the purchaser has become incapable of paying the price; and this occasions a right of dissolution, in the same manner as the inability of the seller to deliver the article sold. The ground of this is that sale is a contract of exchange, which requires perfect equality; in the same manner as a contract of Sillim; in other words, if the person who receives the advances in a contract of Sillim, be incapabe of delivering the article advanced for (from its not being procurable, for instance), the advancer has it at his option either to wait until the other may procure the article, or to dissolve the contract and take back what he had advanced; and so likewise in the present instance. The argument of our doctors is that poverty occasions an inability to make a specific delivery. In the case in question, however, the purchaser is not under any obligation to make a specific delivery, but merely to make a delivery of the price [of the article purchased], which is a debt upon him. Hence the seller is not endowed with a right of dissolution in consequence of the purchaser's inability to make such specific delivery.

Objection.—If debt in general be obligatory upon the purchaser, and not a particular substance, it would follow that the purchaser is not discharged of the demand by his giving money, and the seller taking possession of it, since substance is different from debt.

Reply.—By the seller taking possession of the particular money, a substitution is established between this substance and the debt owing by the purchaser; and as this is the original object in paying debts, regard must therefore be had to it, unless that be impossible, which however is not the case in the example here considered.—It is otherwise in a contract of Sillim; for there no regard can be paid to substitution, as it cannot there be admitted;—whence it is that, in contracts of Sillim, the substance, or particular sum taken possession of, is accounted to be, in effect, the thing for which the advance is made, and which remains a debt upon the person who receives such sum.

OF GHAZB, OR USURPATION.

Definition of the term.—Ghazb, in its literal sense, means the forcibly taking a thing from another. In the language of the law it signifies the taking of the property of another, which is valuable and sacred, without the consent of the proprietor, in such a manner as to destroy the proprietor's possession of it.

Acts by which usurpation is established.—WHENCE it is that usurpation is established by exacting service from the slave of another, or by putting a burden upon the quadruped of another; but not by sitting upon the carpet of another; because by the use of the slave of another, and by loading the quadruped of another, the possession of the proprietor is destroyed; whereas by sitting upon the carpet of another the possession of the proprietor is not destroyed.

A wilful usurper is an offender.—It is to be observed that if any person knowingly and wilfully usurp the property of another, he is held in law to be an offender, and becomes responsible for a compensation. If on the contrary, he should not have made the usurpation knowingly and wilfully (as where a person destroys property on the supposition of its belonging to himself, and it afterwards proves the right of another), he is in that case also liable for a compensation, because a compensation is the right of man; but he is not an offender, as his erroneous offence is cancelled.

The usurper of an article of the class of similars is responsible for a similar, if it be destroyed in his possession.—If a person usurp any thing of the class of similars, such as articles estimable by weight, or by measurement of capacity, and of which the particulars are nearly equal, and it be afterwards destroyed in his possession, he is in that case responsible to the proprietor for a similar; because God has so ordained in the Koran; and also, because the giving of a similar in return is the justest method, since a regard is thereby shown both to the genus and the substance; and consequently the injury to the proprietor is thereby removed in the most eligible manner. If, however, the usurper be not able to give a similar, because of no similar being to be found, he in that case becomes responsible for the value which the article bears at the time of the suit or contention. This is according to Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that he becomes responsible for the value the thing bore upon the day of usurpation; Mohammed, on the other hand, has said that he becomes responsible for the value it bore upon the day when the similar was not to be found or procured. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is, that whenever a similar became unattainable, the thing then became the same as if it was not of the class of similars. Hence it is necessary to have regard to the value on the day of usurpation; because usurpation being the cause which induces responsibility, it follows that the value on the day of the establishment of the cause ought to be regarded. The reasoning of Mohammed is, that the usurper is responsible for a similar; and that, as this responsibility is afterwards referred to the value, for no other reason than that a similar is not to be found, it follows that regard is to be had to the value the article bore on that day. The *Arab. Ain, meaning (in this place) the particular sum of money owing to the seller. It is proper here to observe that the Arabian lawyers make an essential distinction between debt and substance, the former being considered as merely ideal, until it be realized.

* Arab Yawm-al-Inkatta—Literally, the day of termination; meaning, the day on which the power of returning a compensation by a similar terminated.
reasoning of Haneef is, that the responsibility is not referred to the value immediately upon the extinction of a similar, since the proprietor may, if he please, delay until a similar shall be found: but that the responsibility is referred to the value merely on account of the decree of the Kazee; and that therefore the verbal dissertation (which is the day of the decree of the Kazee) ought to be regarded. It is otherwise with respect to a thing which is not of the class of similars; because in such case the value is demanded from the usurper in virtue of the original cause, namely, the usurpation; and therefore the value it bore on the day of usurpation is to be regarded.

If the article be of the class of similars, he is responsible for the value. — If a person usurp any article of the class of non-similars (such as where the particulars are different, like household goods), he is in that case responsible for the value of the article itself, on the day of usurpation; for as it is here impossible to preserve the right of the proprietor with respect to quality, it is therefore necessary to preserve that right with respect to substance only, in order that the injury to him may be done away in the utmost possible degree. (It is to be observed, that if a person usurp wheat in which there is a mixture of barley, he becomes than responsible for the value, as that is of the class of non-similars.)

The actual article usurped must be restored to the proprietor, if it be extant. — It is incumbent upon an usurper to restore the identical article usurped to the proprietor of it provided it be extant in his possession; because the Prophet has said, "It is incumbent upon a person who takes a thing from another to restore it to him;" and also, "It is not lawful for a person to take the goods of his brother in any manner" (that is, neither in a familiar easy way, nor by violence and contention); "and therefore, if a person do take any thing, he must restore it to its owner." — and also, because the proprietor’s seizure or possession of his property be this shown right, which the usurper has destroyed, it is therefore incumbent on the usurper to restore the right the actual thing that is to say, to give back that is originally taken. This, moreover, is what is originally incumbent, agreeable to the opinion of most of the learned; and the giving of the value to the proprietor is merely a cause of release from strife, insomuch as it is defective; whereas the perfection lies in the restoration of the actual thing. Some of the learned, however, (such as) have said that the original obligations of that of giving the value; and that the restitution of the actual article is merely a cause of release. A result of this discussion appears in the different deductions arising from it; as where, for instance the proprietor exempts the usurper from the value, at a time when the actual thing is extant in his possession; in which case, according to the latter opinion (above mentioned, of some of the learned), the exemption is valid; whereas if the article be destroyed in the possession of the usurper subsequent to the exemption, he does not (according to their tenets) become responsible for a compensation: whereas, in the opinion of most of the learned, he becomes responsible.

In the case where the article is extant. — It is to be observed that, according to the opinion of most of the learned, it is incumbent upon the usurper to restore the thing to the proprietor in the place where he had usurped it, because the value of things varies in different places.

And failing of this, the usurper must be imprisoned until he make satisfaction. — If the usurper plead that he has lost the article, the magistrate must cause him to be imprisoned for a length of time sufficient to ascertain whether or not he has the thing in his possession, and must then enjoin him to restore it. This is because the original obligation is the restoration of the actual thing, and the circumstance of the loss of it being merely an accident, is not credited, as it is contradicted by appearances: in the same manner as where a person who owes the price of goods pleads poverty, in which case he must be confined until the truth of his plea be ascertained. — Whenever, therefore, it becomes known that the article usurped has really been lost in the possession of the usurper, the obligation to restore the actual thing is nullified, and a compensation (that is, the value of the thing) becomes obligatory.

Usurpation (so as to occasion responsibility) cannot take place but in moveable property. — It is further to be observed, that usurpation (so as to occasion responsibility)—takes place only with respect to moveables such as a garment, or the like: for the destruction of the proprietor’s possession cannot otherwise be effected than by removal. If, therefore, a person should usurp land, and the land be destroyed in his possession (that is, be rendered useless by an inundation, or the like), the usurper is not responsible for it. This is the opinion of Haneef and Aboo Yoosuf. Mohammed alleges that the usurper is responsible for the land; and this is the first opinion of Aboo Yousuf, which has likewise been adopted by Shafeii. The arguments in favour of the latter opinion are, that the possession of the usurper is established with respect to the land usurped, which occasions a destruction of the proprietor’s possession, since it is impossible that one thing can be in the possession of two people at one and the same time.

Usurpation, therefore, which means the annihilation of the proprietor’s possession, and the establishment of the usurper exists in the case of land: hence land in this respect the same as moveable property and therefore the usurper of it is responsible for it; in the same manner as a denying trustee; that is, if a person deposit land in the hands of another, and that other afterwards deny the deposit, in that case he becomes responsible for the land, and so also in the case in question. The arguments of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf are, that usurpation is the establishment of the usurper’s possession by a destruction of that of the proprietor, in such a manner that the cause of the establishment of the possession, and of the destruction of it, is the action of the usurper with respect to the thing usurped, such as the removal of it from one place to another. Now this is impracticable with respect to land or houses, because the proprietor’s possession of these cannot otherwise be destroyed than by driving him from them. But the driving away of the proprietor from his house (for instance) is not an action of the usurper with respect to the thing but with respect to the person of the proprietor, and therefore amounts to the same as if he were to remove the proprietor from his cattle. In the usurpation of moveables, on the contrary, the removal is the action of the usurper operating with respect to the article; and this is usurpation. With respect to the case of a trustee who denies the deposit (adduced by Mohammed as being analogous to the case in question), it is not admitted to be such; but allowing that it were, it is answered that the necessity for a compensation in that instance arises from the want of care which is manifested by the denial of the trustee.

The usurper of a moveable is responsible for the furniture. — An usurper is responsible, according to all our doctors, for whatever he breaks of a house, either by his residence in it, or by his pulling it down, because that is wilful destruction, and compensation for fixed property is incurred by wilful destruction, — as where, for instance, a person removes the manure or water from land that being an act with respect to the substance of the land.

But if he sell the house, and the proprietor have no witnesses, he is not responsible. — If a person usurp a house, sell it, and deliver it to the purchaser, and afterwards acknowledge the usurpation, and the purchaser deny it; and there be no witnesses on the part of the proprietor to prove it, in this case there is a disagreement between Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf on one side, and Mohammed on the other; for, according to the two disciples the seller of the house is not responsible on account of the sale and delivery of it to the purchaser (contrary to the opinion of Mohammed); because sale and delivery to the purchaser is merely an usurpation on the part of the seller; and usurpation of moveable property (according to the two disciples) does not induce compensation.

A usurper of land is responsible for any damage occasioned by the cultivation of it. — If usurped land be damaged by the cultivation of it, the usurper must compensate for the damage, since he has destroyed part of the land. — He must, moreover, deduct from the produce of the land the amount of his stock, that is to say, the quantity of the seed sown, and also the amount he may have paid for the damage; and if any surplus should then remain, he must bestow it in charity. — The compiler of the Hedayat remarks that this is according to Haneefa and Mohammed; but that Aboo Yoosaf has said that it is not necessary to bestow the surplus in charity. Their arguments shall be recited at large hereafter.

The usurper of a moveable is responsible for the value in case of its destruction. — When an article of usurped moveable property is destroyed in the possession of the usurper, whether by his act, or by the act of another, in either case he is responsible for the value of it; — according to those who hold that the giving of the value is originally incumbent, and the restitution of the actual thing a release, because the release, when not being done impracticable, the giving of the value which was originally due is therefore established; — and also according to those who hold that the restitution of the actual thing is originally due and that the giving of the value is merely subordinate thereto, because the fulfilment of what is originally due being impracticable, in consequence of the destruction of the actual thing, the value of it is therefore due.

If he himself render it defective he is responsible for such defect. — If an usurper should, with his own hands, render defective the thing he had usurped, he is in that case responsible for such deficiency; for, as in consequence of the usurpation, he is responsible for the thing usurped, in all its parts, it follows that whenever the restitution of any part of it becomes impracticable, the value of that part is due from him.

But not for any depreciation it may have sustained in his hands. — It is otherwise with respect to a diminution of the value by depreciation; since for that the usurper is not responsible, provided he restore the thing in the place of usurpation; because a diminution of the price arises from the diminution of desire on the part of the purchaser, and not from the ruin or destruction of any of the parts of the thing. — It is also otherwise with respect to things sold which become defective in the possession of the seller prior to his delivery of them; for he is not in that case under a necessity of compensation to the purchaser; because responsibility for the article of sale is a responsibility involved in the contract; and the subject of the contract is the actual wares, and not the qualities of them. With respect to usurpation, on the contrary, that is an act, and qualities are liable to be compensated for by an act, but not by a contract, as has been already demonstrated. The author of the Hedayat has said that this case alludes to usurped articles which are not of an increasing nature; but that with respect to things of an increasing nature, a compensation for the damage must not be taken along with the actual restitution, as that would necessarily induce usury.

The usurper of a slave, hiring him out to service, is responsible for any damage he may sustain, must and bestow the wages in charity.—If a person usurp a slave and hire him out to work, and receive his wages, and the slave be thereby affected in his value, in that case (upon the principle laid down in the preceding example) the usurper must compensate for the damage, and must bestow the whole of the wages in charity. The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this is according to Haneefa and Mohammed; but that according to Aboo Yoosaf there is no necessity for his bestowing the wages in charity: and that the same disagreement subsists with respect to the case of a borrower hiring out the subject borrowed. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is, that the profit in question has been acquired by the usurper upon his responsibility with respect to the slave, and not upon his own property; the former of which two responsibilities is evident; and so likewise his right of property; because whatever is a subject of responsibility becomes the property of the usurper, in consequence of his making compensation, by the way of transition. The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the profit in question has been acquired by a cause in which baseness exists, namely, by an exertion over the property of another; and that such profit ought to be bestowed in charity; because the cause (that is, the exertion over the property of another) is the trunk, and the profit so acquired is a branch from it; and the qualities of the trunk, or original, communicate with the branches spring from it; whence a baseness exists in the profit also, as well as in the original.

With regard to what Aboo Yoosaf alleges, that "whatever is a subject of responsibility becomes the property of the usurper. In consequence of his making compensation, by the way of transition," it is answered that a right of property established merely by the way of transition is a defective right of property and therefore baseness is not removed by it.

But if the slave be destroyed, the wages may be given in part of the compensation.—If, however, the slave be destroyed in the possession of the usurper, so as to make him liable for his complete value, he may in that case give the wages in payment of the compensation, because the baseness which exists with regard to such wages is only on account of the right of the proprietor (whence, if they were paid to the proprietor, it would be lawful for him to receive and convert them to his own use): they may therefore be paid to him; and, in consequence of such payment, the baseness which is attached to them is removed. It is different where the usurper sells the slave, who is afterwards destroyed in the possession of the purchaser, and is then proven to be the right of another, for which the purchaser pays a compensation, because in such case it is not lawful for the usurper to give the wages to the purchaser in payment of the price, since the baseness which exists in the wages is not on account of the right of the purchaser. Still, however, if the usurper in this case, be not possessed of any other property than the wages, he may then lawfully give that to the purchaser in return for the property which he had taken from him, because under these circumstances the usurper stands in need of it, and he is therefore permitted to apply it to the answering of his necessities. If, however, he should afterwards acquire other property, he must bestow it from in charity an amount equal to the wages, provided he was rich at the time he made use of the price he received from the purchaser; but if, on the contrary, he was at that time poor, he is not required to bestow any thing in charity.

All monied profits acquired by means of usurped money must be bestowed in charity.—If a person has in his thousand dirms, and with those thousand purchase a female slave, whom he afterwards sells for two thousand, and then with these two thousand purchase another female slave, whom he again sells for three thousand, in that case the usurper must bestow in charity the whole of the profit namely, two thousand dirms. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed; and the principle of it is, that whenever, either an usurper or a trustee perform any act with respect to the thing usurped, or the deposit, and thereby acquire profit, such profit (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) is not lawful and sanctified to them; in opposition to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

The opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed, in this particular, with regard to a deposit, is evident, since the property of it is not referred to a period antecedent to the act of the trustee; for, as the property cannot be proven from responsibility at that time it follows that the act of the trustee was not exerted upon his own property. It is to be observed, however, that what is here mentioned of the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed being evident with regard to a deposit, alludes to such deposits only as consist of goods, and not of money; for if the deposit consist of money, and the trustee, at the time of purchasing the female slave say "I purchase her with this money" (pointing to the identical money in deposit), and he accordingly discharge the price with that very money, in that case the profit must be bestowed in charity; whereas if, on the contrary, at the time of making the bargain, he point to the money in deposit, and pay the price with other money, or point to other money, and pay the price with the deposited money, or point to any money; but express himself in an absolute manner, saying "I purchase this slave for one thousand dirms" (not "for these thousand dirms") and he pay the price with the thousand dirms in deposit,— in all these cases the profit acquired is free and lawful to the trustee. Such also is the opinion of Koorokhee: and the reason of it is, that by pointing to specific reins at the time of purchasing, the reins are not thereby rendered fixed and specific, but that, on the contrary, it is lawful for the purchaser to give such a description as he refers to; and that, therefore, in such case, the profit acquired is not base; excepting when, in purchasing the said slave with the thousand reins in deposit, he points to these very reins, and pays the price with the same. —

The Haneefite doctors; on the contrary, allege that the profit is not lawful to the trustee, neither before the giving of compensation, nor after it: and this is approved; because this law has been recited in an absolute manner, both in the Jamad Nageer and the Jaama Kabeer, in treating of Messirah. —

But the specific description is different. — If a person purchase with one thousand usurped reins a female slave worth two thousand, and make a gift of her to any person; or purchase wheat with the said thousand, and eat the same; he is not, under such circumstances, required to bestow any thing in charity. This is a case in which all are agreed; and the principal of it is that although the female slave be worth two thousand reins, yet she is not of the species of reins, so as to occasion usury: for usury does not take place excepting when the profit is of the same description as the principal.

Of usurped Articles altered by Acts of the Usurper

An alteration wrought upon the article usurped vests the property of it in the usurper; who remains responsible to the original owner for the value of it; and cannot lawfully derive any advantage from it, until such compensation be paid. — Whenever an article usurped is altered in consequence of an act of the usurper, in such a manner that it loses both its name and its original purpose, it is then separated from the right of the proprietor, and becomes the property of the usurper and the usurper becomes responsible for it: but he is not entitled to derive any advantage from it until he pay the compensation. An example of this occurs where a person usurps a goat, kills it, and afterwards roasts or boils it; or usurps wheat, and afterwards grinds it into flour; or usurps iron, and makes a sword from it; or usurps clay, and makes a vessel from it. What is here advanced is according to our doctors. Shafei maintains that, after the alteration in the article, the right of the proprietor to it is not extinguished, but he is entitled to take from the usurper the flour of his wheat. There is also a report from Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect. He, however, maintains that in case the proprietor choose to take the flour of the wheat, he is not entitled to a compensation for the damage, as that would induce usury; whereas Shafei holds that he is entitled to a compensation from the usurper for the damage. It is also related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the right of property with respect to an usurped article which has been altered in the usurer, but which may be sold to another, shall vest in him (namely, the compensation), and that, in case of the death of the usurer, he has a preferable claim to the other creditors with respect to the article in question. The reasoning of Shafei is, that the substance of the thing being extant, notwithstanding it have undergone an alteration, it follows that the right of property still remains in the proprietor, since the quality is merely a dependant on the substance:—as where, for instance, the wind blows wheat into the mill of another person, and it is ground into flour; in which case it continues that of the usurer and proprietor of the wheat; and so also in the case in question. With respect to the act of the usurper by which the thing is altered, it is not to be regarded, since it is an underact, and consequently incapable of becoming the cause of property, as has been explained in its proper place. The case is therefore the same as if the act had never existed,—in the same manner as holds where an usurper kills an usurped goat, and tears the skin of it in pieces. The argument of our doctors is, that in the case in question the usurper has performed an operation which bears a value, and has therefore destroyed the right of the proprietor in one respect, inasmuch as the appearance is no longer the same, whence it is that the name is changed and many of the original purposes of the article defeated; as grains of wheat, for instance, which are fit for being sown or roasted, but after being converted into flour are no longer fit for these purposes. In short, by the alteration of an article usurped the right of the proprietor is destroyed in one shape, and that of the usurper with respect to the qualities is established in every shape; and hence the right of the usurper has a superiority with respect to the original of that thing which has been in one shape destroyed. (With respect to the act of the usurper, it is not made the occasion of property because of its illegality, but because of its being the performance of a valuable operation. It is otherwise with regard to a goat slain by the usurper, and the skin of it torn to pieces; for, after the killing of a goat, and the destruction of its skin, the name of goat is still retained, since it is common to say "a slaughtered goat." With respect to what has been recited, that the usurper is not entitled to derive any profit from the article, unless he pay the compensation, it is according to a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would lead us to conclude that it is lawful to derive a profit from the article before the payment of a compensation. This is the opinion of Hassan and Ziffer, and there is also a report to that effect from Haneefa, of which the relater is the lawyer Aboo Lays. The reason derived from analogy is because, after the alteration, the usurper becomes the proprietor of the thing, and may therefore perform any act with respect to it, or derive profit from it, in the same manner as he might lawfully give it away or sell it. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction is, that in the days of the Prophet a goat having been killed and roasted without the consent of the proprietor, the Prophet ordered that the prisoners should be fed with it, meaning, that it should be bestowed in charity upon them. Now this order of the Prophet evinces that upon an alteration in the state of an article usurped, it is separated from the property of the proprietor, and that it is unlawful for the usurper to derive a profit from it until he has satisfied the proprietor. Moreover, if it were lawful to the usurper under these circumstances to take a profit, a door would be opened for usurpation; and, therefore, to prevent such mischiefful consequences, the acquisition of a profit before satisfaction being made is not permitted. With respect to the assertions of Hassen and Ziffer adduced in support of their opinion, that "the gift or the sale of the thing is lawful;" it is answered, that notwithstanding the illegality of deriving profit from the article usurped, still the sale or gift of it is lawful, because the article in question is the property of the proprietor, and the gift or sale of property held under an invalid right is lawful. Where, however, the usurper makes a compensation for the thing usurped, he is entitled to derive an advantage from it, because the right of the proprietor has been transferred to him in consequence of his making compensation; and it becomes the same as an exchange between the usurper and the proprietor with their mutual consent. In the same manner, also, he is entitled to derive profit from the thing in question when the proprietor exempts him from responsibility for it; because in consequence of such exemption the proprietor ceases: and so likewise where the proprietor takes the compensation from the usurper, or where he demands it and the usurper assents thereto, as in that case the consent of the proprietor is obtained; and so also where the Kazee passes a decree directing the usurper to pay a compensation to the proprietor,—or where the usurper pays the compensation upon the decree of the Kazee, because in that case likewise the consent of the proprietor is obtained, since the Kazee passe the decree at his suit. It is to be observed, that the same manner of disagreement subsists between our doctors and Shafei concerning these cases, so likewise with respect to the case of a person usurping wheat and sowing it, or usurping the stones of dates and planting them. In the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, however, it is lawful even in these cases for an usurper to enjoy, profit before the payment of compensation, because in both these cases the usurper has destroyed the substance of the thing usurped in every respect. It is otherwise in the cases before recited: for in those instances the usurper is not entitled to derive profit, since there the substance of the article is removed, not respect extant. In the case, therefore, of sowing usurped wheat, it is not necessary (according to Aboo Yoosaf) to bestow in charity such part of the produce of it as exceeds the quantity sown and the expense of the labour; contrary to the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed, as has been already explained.

Any alteration wrought upon gold or silver does not transfer the property of it,—If a person usurp gold or silver, and convert it into dinars or decinars, or make a vessel from it, such silver or gold does not separate from the property of the proprietor, according to Haneefa: whence he is entitled to take it from the usurper without giving him any compensation. The two disciples maintain that the usurper, in such case, acquires a property in the metal, and owes a compensation of a similar quantity; of gold or silver to the original proprietor; because he has performed a valuable operation upon the metal, which in one shape destroys the right of the proprietor, since in so doing he has broken it down so as to destroy its original purposes, inasmuch as bullion is unfit to become the usurper, contrary to its nature or of partnership, whereas coined money has this fitness. The reasoning of Haneefa is, that in the case in question the substance of the thing usurped is extant in every respect, inasmuch that it still preserves its name; and the purposes to which gold and silver relate, such as price and weight, are also extant, inasmuch that usury by weight takes place in them when coined, in the same manner as before coignage.--With regard, moreover, to the fitness of them (when coined) for constituting stock, it is an effect of the workmanship, and not a quality inherent in the substance of the thing. Besides, the workmanship in question does not always increase the value, but is sometimes attended with value, and sometimes not; as where, for instance, genius is opposed to genus—in which case workmanship is of no value.

The construction of a a building upon an usurped beam transfers the property of the beam to the usurper,—If a person usurp a beam, and build a house upon it, the beam is, in that case separated from the property of the proprietor, and the usurper must give a compensation to the proprietor for the substance of it. Shafei maintains that the proprietor is entitled to take it. The arguments of the two parties on this point have been already recited; but in this case there is another reason in addition to those of our doctors, namely, that if (according to the opinion of Shafei) the proprietor were to take the beam, an injury would result to the usurper, as his house would thereby be demolished without his receiving any compensation.—Where, on the contrary (according to the opinion of our doctor), the beam is separated from the property of the proprietor, and becomes the property of the usurper, although an injury be thereby occasioned to the proprietor, yet that is done away by the usurper making compensation. The case is, therefore, analogous to one where an usurper sows the belly of his male or female slave with an usurped thread,* or invests an usurped plank into his own boat; for in these cases the proprietor is not permitted to take away the thread or the plank, but is entitled to a compensation for their value.

In the case of stealing an usurped animal, the proprietor has an option of taking the caucave (receiving a compensation for the damage), or making it over to the usurper for the value. If a person usurp and slay the goat, giving the owner the option either to take the compensation for the value from the usurper, making over the goat to him, or to keep the goat, receiving from the usurper a compensation for the damage done by slaying it. Such also is the law with respect to a camel; or where a person cuts off one of the legs of a goat or camel belonging to another. This is according to the Zahir Rawayet; and the reason of it is, that a destruction of the animal is occasioned in one respect a termination of many of its uses, such as milk, and dung, and also the transportation of burdens, whilst some of its uses still continue, such as that of the flesh, for instance; whence the case is similar to that of a large rent in cloth. If, however, a person cut off the leg of a quadruped, of which the flesh is not edible, the proprietor is entitled to take from him a compensation for the whole of the value; for in such case the slaying or maiming is in every respect a destruction. It is otherwise where an usurper cuts off the hand or foot of a male or female slave; for in that case the proprietor must receive back the slave, together with the fine, since the capability of yielding profit still exists in man after the loss of a foot or a hand.

A small damage committed upon usurped cloth does not transfer the property of it; but a considerable damage gives the proprietor an option of taking it back (with a compensation for the damage), or making it over to the usurper for the value.—If a person tear a piece of cloth the property of another so as to occasion a small rent in it, he is in that case responsible for the damage, and the cloth remains with the proprietor, since the substance of it is extant in every respect, nothing more having happened to it than a defect; whereas if the rent were large, so as to destroy many of its uses, the proprietor would in that case have it in his option either to take the whole of the value from the usurper and give him the cloth (since he has destroyed it in every respect, even as much as if he had burnt it), or to keep the cloth and take a compensation for the damage, because a large rent is in one respect merely a defect, inasmuch as the substance of the cloth is still extant, as well as some of its uses likewise. It is to be observed that what is recited by Kadoorée up; this subject, implies that a large rent is such as occasions a destruction of many of the advantages. In fact a large rent is such as occasions a destruction of some parts of the cloth, and also of some of its uses; some of the parts and some of the uses still remaining (as where, for instance, before the accident of the rent, the cloth was capable of being made into any other useful article, and afterwards loses that capability); whereas a small rent is such as does not induce a destruction of any of the uses, but merely occasions a damage; for Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, has said, "the cutting of a garment is a great damage, notwithstanding it occasion only a destruction of some of the uses."

Case of planting or building up an usurped land.—If a person usurp land, and plant trees in it, or erect a building upon it, he must in that case be directed to remove the trees and clear the land, and to restore it to the proprietor; because the Prophet has said: "there is no right over the seed of the oppressor" (alluding to the planting of trees; and also, because the property of the proprietor still exists as it did before, since the land has not been de troyned, nor has the usurper become proprietor, inasmuch as he cannot become the proprietor but by some one of the causes which establish property, of which none here exist. In this case, moreover, usurpation is not established, and therefore the person who has so employed the land of another is ordered to clear and restore it to the owner, in the same manner as in the case of his putting his food into the vessel of another. If, however, the removal of the trees or the building he injurious to the land, the proprietor of the land has, in that case, the option of paying to the proprietor of the trees or the building a compensation equal to the value they would bear when removed from the ground, and thus

*This is the literal meaning in both the Arabic and Persian version; but what custom or particular operation it alludes to the translator has not been able to discover.

*There appears, at first sight, a sort of incongruity in opening the case. If a person usurp, &c., and then saving "usurpation is not established." The expression, however, means that "usurpation, in the sense of the law, as requiring atonement, is not established," the reason of which is, that usurpation cannot take place with respect to fixed property, as has been already explained—See p 534.
possessing himself of them; because in this there is an advantage to both, and the injury to both is obviated. By the expression "paying a compensation equal to the value they would bear when removed," is to be understood paying the value which the trees or house bear upon the proprietor being directed to remove them; because his right exists only with respect to the value of the building "as required to be removed." Therefore he is not at liberty to leave them upon the ground. It is therefore requisite to appropriate the land without the trees or the building, and afterwards to appropriate it with the trees or building (as removable at the landholder's desire); and whatever may be the excess of the second appropriation over the first is the amount of the compensation which the proprietor of the land is required to pay to the proprietor of the trees or building.

(To be observed that the value of trees or of a building which are liable or required to be removed is less than that of the building which are permitted to stand, since the expense of removal must be deducted from the value of trees or buildings which are removable.)

Case of dyeing usurped cloth, or grinding usurped wheat into flour. In a person usurp a cloth of another and then dye it red, or the flour of another and then mix it with oil; in that case the proprietor has the option of taking from the usurper a compensation equal to the value of the white cloth, or an equal quantity of flour; giving the red cloth or the mixed flour to the usurper; or, of taking the red cloth or the mixed flour, giving to the usurper a compensation equal to the additional value these articles may have acquired from the red dye, or the mixture of oil. Shafee maintains that in the case of dyed cloth the proprietor of it has a right to take it, and then to tell the usurper to separate and take, to the utmost of his power, his dye from it; for he holds this case to be analogous to that of a plot of ground; in other words, if a person usurp a piece of ground belonging to another, and afterwards erect a building upon it, the proprietor is entitled to take the ground, desiring the usurper to dig up and carry away his building; because the separation of a dye from stained cloth is equally practicable with the removal of a building from the ground on which it stands. It is otherwise in the case of oil mixed in flour, because the separation of the oil is then impracticable. The argument of our doctors in that, in what they have advanced on this point, an attention is shown to the interests of both parties, an option, however, being allowed to the proprietor of the cloth, as he is the original. It is otherwise in the case of a plot to ground; for in that instance the usurer is entitled to the fragments of the house after its being pulled down (that is, to the bricks, wood, &c.); whereas a dye, when separated from cloth, is lost, and cannot be collected by the usurper of the cloth. It is also other-entitled to a compensation of ten dirms from the usurper for the amount of the damage occasioned to his cloth; and the usurper is entitled to five dirms from the proprietor as the value of his dye, having operated that increase upon another piece of cloth. Hence the proprietor is entitled to take five dirms from the usurper, and the remaining five is cancelled by the value of the dye thus estimated at five dirms.

Section.

An usurper, damaging the article usurped, becomes proprietor of it upon the owner demanding the value. If a person usurps any article of goods or furniture, and damage it, and the proprietor demand a compensation for the value from the usurper, he the usurper in that case becomes the proprietor of such article, according to our doctors. Shafei maintains that the usurper does not become proprietor, because the act of usurpation, as being oppressive and illegal, is therefore incapable of occasioning a right of property; in the same manner as where a person usurps a Modabbir, and injures him, and the proprietor takes from him the value of the Modabbir as a compensation for the injury. --in which case he the usurper does not hence become proprietor of the Modabbir. The reasoning of our doctors is, that in the case in question the proprietor of the article obtains a return for it, and as the article usurped is fit to be shifted from the property of one person to that of another, the usurper becomes the proprietor of it, in order to remove the injury he would otherwise sustain. It is different with respect to a Modabbir, as he is not fit to be removed from the property of one person to that of another. (The contract of Tadbeer, however, is sometimes annulled by order of the Kazee; in which case the sale of the Modabbir is lawful, as it then is the sale of mere property, since it becomes such by the annulment of the contract.)

The amount of which is ascertained by the declaration of the usurper upon oath, or by evidence adduced by the proprietor. If it is to be observed that, in ascertaining the value of the article usurped the assertion of the usurper, confirmed by an oath, is to be credited, since the usurper is the claimant of a large value, and the usurper is the definer of the same, and the assertion of the definer upon oath must be admitted; unless, however, the proprietor bring evidence in support of his claim; for then the assertion of the proprietor must be credited, as being supported by evidence, which is convincing proof.

And after accepting this, the proprietor cannot demand the article, if the compensation be given in conformity with his claim.

---If, therefore, the substance of the article usurped appear or be found at a period when the value of it is greater than the compensation given by the usurper, and such compensation has been given in consequence of the claim of the proprietor, or of evidence adduced by him, or of the non-denial of the usurper, the proprietor, in that case, has not the option of taking the substance of the thing usurped: on the contrary, it remains the property of the usurper, since his property in it has been rendered complete in consequence of a cause confining with the consent of the proprietor, maxmum as he claimed that extent of value. whereas if, on the contrary, the proprietor have taken a compensation in consequence of the assertion of the usurper, corroborated by an oath, he has in that case the option either to adhere to the compensation he has taken, or to take the substance of the article usurped, and restore to the usurper the compensation he may have taken, for under such circumstances the consent of the proprietor was not complete with respect to the quantity, since he claimed a larger quantity, but was obliged to take the quantity in question from his want of proof to establish the other. If on the other hand, the substance of the article usurped be found at a period when its value is equal, or less than, the compensation taken, and the proprietor should have taken the compensation in conformity with the assertion or oath of the usurper, the law (according to the Zahir Rawayet) is the same as already recited; that is, the proprietor has the option of either adhering to the compensation he had taken, or of taking back from the usurper the substance of the article, and restoring to him the amount of the compensation. This is approved; because the consent of the proprietor to take the compensation in question was not complete, insomuch as he claimed a larger sum: which he did not get, and hence he has the option, because of the non-existence of his consent.

The sale of an usurped slave by the usurper is valid upon the owner receiving the value as a compensation; but the emancipation of him would be invalid.---If a person usurps a slave, and sell him, and the proprietor take the value of him from the usurper as a compensation, the sale is in that case valid. If, on the contrary, the usurper emancipate the slave, and the proprietor afterwards take a compensation, the emancipation is not valid; because the right of property established in the usurper by his paying the compensation is defective, as being established by a retrospective reference, from a principle of necessity (whence it is that the right of property in an usurper takes place with respect to earnings of labour, but not with respect to progeny); in other words, if a person usurp a female slave, and take to himself the earnings of her labour, and afterwards pay a compensation to the proprietor, the earnings are in that case his property; but if she should bear children whilst in his posses-tion, and he afterwards pay a compensation to the proprietor, the children are not his property. In short, the right of property established in an usurper in virtue of his payment of compensation is defective; and a defective right of property is sufficient to legalize sale, but not emancipation; in the same manner as the right of property established in a Mukatib with respect to the earning of his labour is defective: yet if he should sell a slave whom he may have earned by his labour it is valid: whereas if he were to emancipate him the emancipation would be invalid.

The produce of an usurped property is a trust in the usurper's hands—The fruit of an usurped orchard, and the children of an usurped female slave, together with their produce (such as their increase of stature and beauty), are a trust in the hands of the usurper. If, therefore, they be destroyed, he is not responsible for them; unless, however, he should have committed a trespass with regard to them, or refused to answer the demand of the proprietor to deliver them up to him: for in these cases he is responsible. Shafer maintains that the increase of an article usurped, whether it be conjured (such as increase of stature or of beauty) or separated (such as progeny), is a subject of responsibility; because usurpation is established by respect to it; therefore usurpation means the establishment of possession over the property of another without the consent of that other: and as this definition applies equally to any increase which may accrue upon such property, it is therefore a subject of responsibility, although the usurper have not dispossessed the proprietor of it; in the same manner as the fawn is a subject of responsibility, in a case where a person takes a deer out of an inclosure, and it afterwards brings forth whilst in his possession, notwithstanding that it [the fawn] had not before been in the possession of any one. And this is established by the following of our doctors is, that usurpation means "the establishment of possession over the property of another, so as to destroy the possession of the proprietor" (as has been already explained). Now the possession of the proprietor had not been established, with respect to the increase, so as to admit the destruction of it. Besides, if the possession of the proprietor with regard to the increase be admitted by way of dependancy on his property, till his possession continues, and the usurper has not destroyed it; for it is apparent that the usurper has not hindered him from taking his increase:—yet it he refuses to give it to him upon his demand, he is then responsible to him for it; in the same manner as where he commits a trespass with regard to it, by destroying it, or killing and eating it, or selling it and delivering it to the buyer. With respect to the fawn before mentioned, it is not a subject of responsibility when destroyed prior to the ability of the trespasser to place it in the inclosure, because he is not, before that, guilty of any obstruction or hindrance; in short, he is liable to responsibility only where he destroys the fawn after his ability to place it in the inclosure; and this because he is then guilty of an obstruction after the establishment of the claimant's right.

The usurper of a female slave is not liable for any damage she may receive by bearing a child, provided the value of the child be adequate to such damage—If a female slave be injured by bearing a child whilst in the possession of the usurper, and the value of the child be equal to the damage sustained, the usurper is not liable for a compensation. Shafei and Ziffer maintain that the value of the child be equal to the damage sustained, injury: because the child is the property of the proprietor of the slave; and consequently cannot be applied to remedy the damage sustained by her;—in the same manner as in the case of the fawn above related: that is to say, if a usurper drive a deer out of an inclosure, and she then bring forth a young one, and be injured by such delivery, and the value of the young be adequate to the damage, in that case the person is not only obliged to restore the deer and its young one to the inclosure, but must also make good the damage sustained. It is also the same where the child dies prior to the usurper's restoration of the mother; or where the mother dies in consequence of the delivery of the child, and the value of the child is adequate to remedy the loss: or where a person seizes the wool of a sheep belonging to another, or casts off the branches of a tree belonging to another, or castrates the slave of another, or teaches him the knowledge of some art in consequence of which he is rendered in any respect defective;—for in all these cases the person so acting is responsible for the injury, notwithstanding the value of the article he increased in consequence. The arguments of our doctors are that, in the instance in question, the cause of the increase and of the injury is the same: namely, childbirth:—and such being the case, the injury is not taken into the account, because, in opposition to it, an increase has been obtained. Hence an injury of this nature does not occasion responsibility; it being, in fact, analogous to where a person usurps a fat female slave, whereftiords here taken, and then grows fat again; or who loses two of her fore teeth, and is not only cultivated by Zisser and Shafei, it is not admitted as applicable. — With respect, moreover, to the death of the mother, in consequence of her being cast as is adduced by them. There are two opinions on record. — The first is, that if the value of the child is adequate to remedy the injury, it is then taken as such; and the second (which is according to the Zahir Rawayet) is, that the value of the child cannot be taken as a compensation for the injury, for this reason, that the delivery is not to be considered as the cause of the mother's death since delivery is not necessarily connected with death, being more frequently attended with safety. Where, on the other hand, the child dies prior to the restoration of the mother the injury is not remedied; because there was and is no possession of the owner (namely, the mother) in the condition in which she was at the period of usurpation: and as she afterwards sustained an injury by the birth of a child, and the fruit of the injury (namely, the child) cannot, because of its death; be given along with the mother, it follows that the mother is not restored in the condition in which she was at the period of usurpation. With respect to the castration of a slave, it is not an increase, being an object only with some loose people; and as to the other instances adduced by Zisser and Shafei, the case in them of the increase and the damage is not one and the same thing: for the cause of damage in a tree is the cutting off its branch, whilst the cause of increase is the growth; the cause of damage in a sheep is the shearing of its wool, whilst the cause of increase is the growth of the animal; and the cause of damage in the slave is the teaching or instructing him, whilst the cause of increase is the intellect of the slave.

*In the text the case is supposed that of a pilgrim driving a deer out of the sacred territory round Mecca—The translator has hazarded a small deviation from the original in this instance, merely with a view to familiarize the allusion in the mind of an European reader.

†That is, defective in regard to the purpose for which his master had intended him; as by a loss of health, or any accident sustained in the course of his learning the art.

The usurer of a female slave, impregnating her, is responsible for her value, in case she die of childbirth after restoration. — If a person usurps a female slave, and cohabits with her, and she becomes pregnant, and he restores her in that state to the proprietor, and she thus bears the child, the usurer must in that case pay a compensation equal to the value which she bore on the day of her impregnation; whereas, if she were free, no compensation would be required, according to Haneefi. The two disciples maintain that neither is any compensation due in the case of her being a slave. The argument of the two disciples are, that in the case in question, upon the usurer restoring the slave to the proprietor, and the restoration, being made valid and complete, the proprietor is held to have received by its property; and as, afterwards, the disorder of which she dies, namely, childbirth, is thus considered to have happened to her whilst in the possession of the proprietor, the usurer is, therefore, not liable for her; in the same manner as where an usurped female slave, having been seized with some disorder, such as a fever, the usurer restores her in that condition to the proprietor, and she afterwards dies in his possession; or where an usurped female slave commits whoredom with some person whilst in the usurer's possession, and he restores her to the proprietor, and she afterwards suffers punishment for whoredom and dies of the same; in neither of which cases is the usurer responsible, any more than the seller, in the case of his selling a pregnant female slave, who afterwards dies of childbirth in the possession of the purchaser. The arguments of Haneefi are, that as the usurer, in the case in question, usurps the female slave at a time when the cause of destruction did not exist in her and restored her at a period when such cause did exist in her, he therefore has not restored her in the state in which she was by cause of the restoration he took her. Consequently the restoration of the usurer does not render her liable as her husband and consequently the same as if an usurped female slave, having committed a crime in the usurer's possession, should afterwards, on account of such crime, be put to death whilst in the possession of the proprietor, or be given up to the avenger of the offence, in consequence of her having committed the crime inadvertently, instead of wilfully, in either of which cases the proprietor is entitled to take the whole of the value from the usurer, and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise, where the value of the usurer is free; because the responsibility takes place from the usurpation of a free woman, and consequently the usurer is not responsible after the restoration, although such restoration were invalid. With respect to what has been alleged of the purchase of a pregnant female slave, it is answered, that the delivery not having been incumbent upon the seller on account of his having before taken her, so as to require a delivery in the state in which he had taken her (which is a condition of validity in the case of usurpation), it follows that the analogy here does not hold good. With respect, also, to the case of an usurped female slave committing whoredom, and dying in consequence of the punishment on that account inflicted upon her, the answer is, that whoredom merely occasions scourging, which is a case of pain, but not of death, and therefore, in this case, a cause of destruction did not take place whilst the slave was in the possession of the usurer.
There is no hire for the use of an usurped article: but the usurper is responsible for any damage it may sustain—An usurper is not responsible for the use of the article unless he be injured by it; but if it be injured, he is responsible for the injury. The argument of Shafee maintains that an usurper is liable for the use of a thing usurped, and consequently, that he owes an adequate rent of hire for it. It is to be observed that there is no difference between the doctrine of Shafee and that of our doctors, in the case where a person usurps a house and leaves it unoccupied, or occupies it himself; for in such case, according to both doctrines, the usurper is not liable for the use of it.—Malik maintains that if the usurper himself occupy the house he is responsible for an adequate rent; but not in case of his leaving it unoccupied. The argument of Shafee is that the use of property is estimable (whence it is a subject of responsibility from contracts and agreements), and consequently is a subject of responsibility from usurpation. Th: arguments of our doctors on this point are twofold—

First, the use of an article usurped is obtained by the usurper in consequence of its occurring during his occupancy (for it had not existed in the hands of the proprietor, as use is a passing accident which does not endure); and such being the case, he is not entitled to the property; consequently he is not responsible for it, as no man is responsible for that to which he is entitled.—Secondly, there is no similarity between use and property, such as dirms and deenas; for use is an accident, whereas property is a substance. Use therefore, cannot be a subject of responsibility in substantial property; because a similarity is requisite between the compensation and the thing for which the compensation is given.—With respect to the assertion of Shafee, that "the use of property is estimable," it is not admitted use being considered as estimable only in the case of contracts of hire, from necessity; but in the case of usury or usurpation, there exists no contract whatever.—Where however, the article usurped is damaged, whilst in the possession of the usurper, in consequence of his use of it, a compensation for the damage is incumbent upon him, because of his having destroyed part of the substance of the thing usurped.

Of the usurpation of things which are of no value.

A Mussulman is responsible for destroying the wine or pork of a Zimmee.—If a Mussulman destroys wine or pork belonging to a Zimmee, he must compensate for the value of the same; whereas, if he destroy wine or pork belonging to a Mussulman, no compensation is due.—Shafee maintains that in the former case also no compensation is due. A similar disagreement subsists with respect to the case of a Zimmee destroying wine or pork belonging to a Zimmee; or of one Zimmee selling either of these articles to another; for such sale is lawful, according to our doctors, in opposition to the doctrine of Shafee. The argument of Shafee is that wine and pork are not articles of value with respect to Mussulmans,—nor with respect to Zimmees, as these are dependant of the Mussulmans with regard to the precepts of the law. A compensation of property, therefore, for the destruction of these articles is not due. The arguments of our doctors are that wine and pork are valuable property with respect to Zimmees; for with them wine is the same as vinegar with the Mussulmans, and pork the same as mutton; and we, who are Mussulmans, being commanded to leave them in the practice of their religion, have consequently no right to impose a rule upon them.—As, therefore, wine and pork are with them property of value, it follows that whoever destroys these articles belonging to them does, in fact, destroy their property of value; in opposition to the case of carrion or blood, because these are not considered as property according to any religion, or with any sect.

And must compensate for it by a payment of the value.—Hence it appears that if a Mussulman destroy the wine or pork of a Zimmee, he must compensate for the value of the pork—and also of the wine, notwithstanding that be of the class of similar; because it is not lawful for Mussulmans to transfer the property of wine, as that would be to honour and respect it. It is otherwise where a Zimmee sells wine to a Zimmee, or destroys the wine of a Zimmee; for in these case it is incumbent upon the seller to deliver over the wine to the purchase, and also upon the destroyer to give as a compensation a similar quantity of wine to the proprietor, since the transfer of the property of wine is not prohibited to Zimmees; contrary to usurers, as that is excepted from the contracts of Zimmes;—or to the case of the slave of a Zimmee, who having been a Mussulman becomes an apostate; for if any Mussulman kill this slave, he is not in that case responsible to the Zimmee, notwithstanding the Zimmee consider the slave as valuable property, since we Mussulmans are commanded to show our abhorrence of apostates. It is also otherwise with respect to the wilful omission of the Tasmeea, or invocation, in the slaying of an animal, where the proprietor considers such omission as lawful, being, for instance, of the sect of Shafee;—in other words, if a person of the sect of Haneefa destroy the flesh of an animal so slain by a person of the sect of Shafee, the Haneefite is not in that case responsible to the Shafeyite, notwithstanding the latter did, according to his tenets, believe the slain animal to have been valuable property; because the authority to convince the Shafeyite of the illegality of his practice is vested in the Haneefite, in—

as much as it is permitted to him to establish the illegality of it by reason and argument.

A change wrought upon an usurped article by any unexpensive process does not alter the property; but if the process be expensive, the property devolves to the usurper, who, must make a compensation.—If a person usurp wine belonging to a Musulman, and convert it into vinegar by placing it alternately in the sun and in the shade, or the skin of a verson, and tan or dress it by the application of some valuable article,—the proprietor of the wine is entitled to take the vinegar, without giving anything to the usurper, and the proprietor of the skin is entitled to take it, upon paying to the usurper the increase it may have received from the dressing; for, in the former case, the conversion of the wine into vinegar is merely a purification of it, in the same manner as the bleaching of unclean cloth; and hence the property of the vinegar continues vested in the proprietor, since a property is not created in the liquor by the operation of making it into vinegar; whereas, in the second case, a valuable article belonging to the usurper is united to the skin, in the same manner as a dye in cloth, and this case is therefore the same as the dyeing of a garment.—Accordingly, the proprietor of the wine is entitled to take the vinegar from the usurper without making him any compensation: and, on the other hand, the proprietor of the skin is entitled to take it from the usurper, upon making a compensation to him for the increase which it may have received from the dressing. The mode of ascertaining the amount of this increase, is by first estimating the value of the skin supposing it undressed, and then the value which it bears dressed; when the difference must be paid to the usurper. In this case, also, the usurper is entitled to detain the article adopted until he obtains his right, in the same manner as a seller is entitled to detain the goods sold as a security for the price.—If, in the cases here considered, the usurper should destroy the vinegar, or the dressed skin, he is responsible for the vinegar,—but, not for the skin, according to Hanefi. The two disciples maintain that he is responsible for the skin also,—being entitled, however, to the increase of value from the dressing. The reason of responsibility for the vinegar is, that as it still continues in the property of the first proprietor, being, at the same time, an article of value, it follows that the usurper is liable for the destruction of it; and as vinegar is of the class of similars, he must compensate for it by a similar quantity.—With respect to the skin, the reasons of responsibility for it (as maintained by the two disciples) are twofold.—First, it still continues the property of the proprietor, inasmuch as he is entitled to take it back from the usurper; and as it is an article of value, it follows that, in consequence of the destruction of it by the usurper, he [the proprietor] is entitled to take from him [the usurper] a compensation adequate to the value of the dressed skin; paying him afterwards the increase of value it has received from the dressing; in the same manner as where a person usurps the cloth of another, and dyes it, and then destroys it,—in which case he is responsible for it to the proprietor, receiving from him, at the same time, the difference occasioned in the value of the cloth by the dyeing.—Secondly, the restoration of the skin dressed was incumbent on the usurper; whence, upon his destroying it, he is bound to give a consideration for it, namely, the value,—in the same manner as where a borrower destroys the article borrowed; in which case he is responsible for the value.—It is to be observed, however, that if the destruction of the skin take place whilst in the possession of the usurper, without his being the occasion of it, in that case, according to all our doctors, he is not responsible for it, whether he have dressed it or not, and the application of something valuable, or otherwise. (With respect to what is advanced by the two disciples "that the proprietor must take the value of the dressed skin from the usurper paying him afterward's the increase of value it has received from the dressing."—it proceeds on the supposition that the value of the skin and of the operation of dressing is of different kinds,—as if the skin should be valued in dears, and the workmanship in dirms; for if both be estimated in the same species, the proprietor must at once deduct from the value of the skin the value the workmanship, and take the difference from the usurper; as it would be needless first to receive the whole from him, and then to pay back a part of it.)—The reasoning of Hanefi is, that the skin in question has been rendered valuable by the workmanship of the usurper: namely, the dressing which is of a valuable nature, as he mixed with it valuable property (whence his right to detain it until he receive the increase of value from the dressing).—The workmanship, therefore, is his right; and the skin is, with respect to its being valuable, a dependant of the workmanship, that being the original; and as the usurper is not responsible for the original, namely, the workmanship, so neither is he responsible for the dependant, namely, the skin: in the same manner as he is not responsible where the skin is destroyed in his possession without his act. It is otherwise where the skin is extent; for in such case it is incumbent upon the usurper to restore it to the proprietor, because the restoration of it is a consequent of the proprietor's right of property, and the skin is not a dependent of the operation of dressing it, with respect to right of property, since the property of the proprietor is established in it prior to the dressing, although, whilst in that condition, it was not an article of value:—in opposition to the case of cloth, or the skin of an animal killed according to the prescribed forms; for the proprietor of thees is entitled to a compensation from the usurper, as both are articles of value prior to the dressing or dyeing, and consequently not dependent upon the workmanship with respect to their being valuable. It is to be observed that, in the case in question (that is, where the usurper has dressed the skin with something of value and thereby has increased its property), if the proprietor be inclined to leave it in the possession of the usurper, and take from him a compensation for the value, some have said that it is not permitted to him so to do, because of the skin being of no value.—(It is otherwise in the case of dyeing cloth, the dye being an article of value).—Some, again, have said that this is not permitted to him according to Haneefa;—but that according to the two disciples it is permitted to him; because when the proprietor refuses to take back the dressed skin, and, leaving it in the possession of the usurper, demands from him a compensation, the usurper has it not then in his power to restore it; and the case is, therefore, the same as if it had been destroyed, concerning which the two disciples and Haneefa have disagreed.—Some have said that, according to the doctrine of the two disciples, the proprietor is to take from the usurper the value of the dressed skin, and return to him whatever increase it may have received from the dressing, in the same manner as in the case of a destruction; whilst others have said that the proprietor is entitled only to the value of the dressed skin of an animal killed according to the prescribed form.—All that has been advanced on this topic proceeds on the supposition of the usurper having dressed the skin with something of value; for if he should have dressed it with something of no value, such as by means of moisture, or the heat of the sun, the proprietor is then entitled to take it from him without making him any return since a dressing of that nature is equivalent to the washing of cloths. If, also, in this case, the usurper destroy the skin, he is responsible for the value of it in its dressed state. Some, on the contrary, have said that he is responsible for the value of it in its undressed state, because the dressing, as being an acquisition of his own, ought not to subject him to responsibility. The first opinion is adopted by most of the modern lawyers; and the reason of it is, that the quality of dressing, as being a dependent of the skin, cannot be separated from it; and consequently, when responsibility takes place with respect to the original [the skin] it must also operate with respect to the dependent, namely, the quality [of dressing].

Case of converting usurped wine into vinegar, by means of mixing in it some valuable ingredient.—Is an usurper of wine entitled to convert it into vinegar by throwing salt into it? lawyers have said that, according to Haneefa, the vinegar becomes the property of the usurper without any thing being due from him; whereas, according to the two disciples, the proprietor is entitled to take the vinegar, making a compensation to the usurper for the increase of the article by means of the salt (that is to say, he must give him a quantity of vinegar equal to the weight of the salt). If, on the contrary, the proprietor wishes to leave the vinegar with the usurper, and take a compensation from him for its value: the same two opinions that have been given with regard to the case above recited of the dressing of a skin, prevail with regard to this case If, also, the usurper destroy the wine, he is no ways responsible, according to Haneefa,—in opposition to the opinion of the two disciples, as has been already recited in the case of dressing a skin.—If the usurper convert the wine into vinegar by means of pouring vinegar into it, in that case it is related as an opinion of Mohammed that, provided the wine be turned into vinegar within the hour in which the usurper poured the vinegar into it, it is his property, without his being subject to any compensation; because the pouring of the vinegar, in such case, is equivalent to a destruction of the wine; and wine is not an article of value. If, on the other hand, the wine because of the quantity of vinegar poured into it being small, should not become vinegar until after the lapse of a considerable period, it must in that case be divided between the usurper and the proprietor, according to its measure; that is, the usurper is entitled to a part of it in proportion to the quantity poured in, and the proprietor to a part of it in proportion to the quantity of wine; because in this case the usurper has mixed his vinegar with what eventually became the vinegar of the proprietor; and this (in the opinion of Mohammed) is not a destruction. In the opinion of Haneefa, however, the vinegar, in both cases, becomes the property of the usurper; because the immediate act of his pouring vinegar into the wine is (according to him) a destruction of it; and this destruction does not, on any supposition, occasion responsibility, because if considered as a destruction of wine, it is a destruction of a thing that bears no value, or if considered as the destruction of vinegar, it is a destruction of his own property, inasmuch as the vinegar becomes the property of the usurper. According to Mohammed the usurper is not responsible where he destroys the liquor after its having become vinegar on the hour in which he put the other vinegar into it; for as, in this case, he acquires a right in the whole, he of course merely destroys his own property; whereas if he destroy it where it has become vinegar after a length of time, he is responsible, since in this case he destroys the property of another. With respect to what has been recited in Kadoree, some of our modern lawyers have said that it is absolute; that is that in all conversions of usurped wine into vinegar, the proprietor is entitled to take it without making any compensation to the usurper; because the thing thrown into the wine by the usurper is of no value, inasmuch as, by the mixture of it with wine, it becomes virtually wine, which is a thing of no value. There are a variety of opinions concerning this case, which the author of this work has recited in the Kafayat al Mowsilhee.

A person is responsible for destroying the musical instruments, &c, or the prepared drink of a Mussulman—if a person break the lute, the tabor, the pipe, or the cymbal of a Mussulman, or spill his Sikker,* or Monissaf; he is responsible, the sale of such articles being lawful according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that he is not responsible, they holding such article to be unsaleable. Some say that this difference of opinion obtains only concerning such musical instruments as are merely used for amusement; but that if a person break a drum such as are allowed to be used in celebrating a marriage, he is responsible, according to all the disciples. Some also say that in decreasing responsibility, opinions are given according to the doctrine of the two disciples. By Sikker is understood the juice of unripe dates, which is suffered to ferment and acquire a spirit without boiling; and by Monissaf, the juice of unripe grapes, boiled until only one half remain. Concerning liquor boiled in the smallest degree, which is termed Bazik, there are two opinions reported from Haneefa,—one, that it is a lawful subject both of sale and responsibility,—and another, that it is not so. The arguments of the two disciples on this point are,—First, that these articles are all made for the purpose of doing that which is offensive to the law; and therefore are not valuable property. Secondly, what the person in question has done was in reformation of an abuse; and as we are directed to reform abuses wherever they occur, he therefore is not responsible, in the same manner as he would not be responsible, if he were to destroy those articles by order of the magistrate. The argument of Haneefa is that the articles in question are property, as being capable of yielding a lawful advantage, although they be also capable of being used unlawfully, and therefore resemble a female singer—whence there is no reason why they should not be considered as valuable property. As, therefore, those articles are (according to Haneefa) of a valuable nature, a reparation is due from the destroyer of them; and if a person were to sell them, the sale is lawful; for the obligation of reparation, and the legality of sale, depend upon an article being property, and capable of valuation, circumstances which exist with respect to the articles in question. The reformation of abuses, moreover, is committed to the hands of magistrates; as they are entailed, by the nature of their office, to carry it into effect: but it is not entrusted to others, excepting merely to the extent of verbal instruction and advice.

And must compensate for them by paying their intrinsic value—proceeding upon the doctrine of Haneefa, the destroyer in the case here considered, is responsible for the value the articles bear in themselves, independent of the particular amusement to which they contribute. Thus if a female singer (for instance) be destroyed, she must be valued merely as a slave girl; and the same of fighting rams, tumbling pigeons, game cocks, or eunuch slaves; in the other words, if any of these be destroyed, they must be valued and accounted for at the rate they would have borne if unfit for the light and evil purposes to which such articles are commonly applied; and in likewise of pipes, tabors, and other musical instruments. It is to be observed that, in the case of spilling Sikker or Monissaf, the destroyer is responsible for the value of the article, and not for a similar, because it does not become a Mussulman to be proprietor of such articles. If, on the contrary, a person destroy a crucifix belonging to a Christian, he is responsible for the value it bears as a crucifix; because Christians are left to the practice of their own religious worship. The usurper of a Modabbira is responsible for her value if she die in his possession; but not the usurper of a Mokattha.—If a person usurp the Modabbira of another, and she die in his possession, he is responsible for her value; whereas, if a person usurp the Am-Walid of another, and she die in his possession, he is not responsible. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that the usurper is responsible for the value in either instance. The reason of this difference of opinion is, that a Modabbira is universally admitted to be valuable property; and an Am-Walid is not valuable, according to Haneefa; whereas the two disciples hold an Am-Walid to be valuable. The arguments on both sides have been already detailed at length in treating of Manumission.

BOOK XXXVIII.

OF SHAFFA.

Definition of Shaffa.—Shaffa, in the language of the law, signifies the becoming proprietor of lands sold for the price at which the purchaser has bought them, although he be not consenting thereunto. This is termed Shaffa, because the root from which Shaffa is derived signifies conjunction, and the lands sold are here conjoined to the land of the Shafee, or person claiming the right of pre-emption.
Chap. I.—Of the Person to whom the Right of Shaffa appertains.

Chap. IV.—Of circumstances which invalidate the Right of Shaffa.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE PERSONS TO WHOM THE RIGHT OF SHAFFA APPERTAINS.

The right of Shaffa appertains to a partner in the property, a participant in the immunities of the property, and a neighbour.

—The right of Shaffa appertains—1 to a partner in the property of the land sold,—II. to a partner in the immunities and appendages of the land (such as the right to water and to roads); and III, to a neighbour.—The right of Shaffa in a partner, is founded on a precept of the Prophet, who has said, "The right of Shaffa holds in a partner who has not divided off and taken separately his share."—The establishment of it in a neighbour is also founded on a saying of the Prophet, "The neighbour of a house has a superior right to that house; and the neighbour of lands has a superior right to those lands and, if he be absent, the seller must wait his return; provided, however, that they both participate in the same road;"—and also, "A neighbour has a right, superior to that of stranger, in the lands adjacent to his own."—Shafei is of opinion that a neighbour is not a Shafee;* because the Prophet has said, Shaffa relates to a thing held in joint property, and which has not been divided off:* when, therefore, the property has undergone a division, and the boundary of each partner is particularly discriminated and a separate road assigned to each, the right of Shaffa can no longer exist. Besides, the right of the right of Shaffa is repugnant to analogy, as it involves the taking possession of another's property contrary to his inclination; whence it must be confided solely to those to whom it is particularly granted by the Law. Now, it is granted particularly to a partner; but a neighbour cannot be considered as such; for the intention of the Law, in granting to it a partner is merely to prevent the inconveniences arising from a division; since if the partner were not to get that share which is the subject of the claim of Shaffa; a new purchaser might insist upon a division, and thereby occasion to him a great deal of unnecessary vexation;—but this argument does not hold good in behalf of a neighbour, he therefore is not entitled to the privilege of shaffa.—We,* on the contrary, allege that the precept of the Prophet, already quoted, is a sufficient ground for establishing the right of Shaffa in a neighbour.—Besides the reason for establishing this right in a partner is, the circumstance of his right being continually and inseparably connected with that of a stranger† (namely, the purchaser), which is injurious to him, because of the difference of a stranger's disposition, and so forth; and certainly a greater regard is due to the partner than to the stranger who may have made the purchase, since the vexation that would ensue to the partner from forcing him to abandon a place which, from long residence, may have acquired his affections, would doubtless be greater than that to which the stranger is subjected; for, although he may thus be dispossessed, contrary to his inclination, of a property over which he has acquired a right by purchase, yet still the grievance is but inconsiderable, since he is not dispossessed without receiving a due consideration:—and as all these reasons equally hold in behalf of the neighbour, he is therefore entitled to the privilege of Shaffa as well as a partner.—The reasons, moreover, on which Shafei grounds the right of a partner, and the distinction he makes between a partner and a neighbour, can by no means be admitted: since the inconveniences attending a division of property are allowed by the Law; and are not of such a nature that the preventing of them should justify the injury which must be committed in depriving another of his property contrary to his inclinations.—The order in which we have classed the persons entitled to the privilege of Shaffa is founded on a precept of the Prophet, who has said, "A partner in the thing itself has a superior right to one who is only a partner in its appendages; and a partner in the appendages of the property precedes a neighbour." Besides, the conjunction occasioned by a partnership in the property itself is of all others the strongest; and next to it is that occasioned by a partnership in the appendages (since here the party participates in the immunities of the property, which is not the case with a neighbour): and a superiority of right in every instance, depends on the strength, in the case, or fundamental principle.—The vexations, moreover, and inconvenience arising from a division may be admitted as an additional argument, although it be not of such weight as to form a ground for injury to another.

No person can claim it during the existence of one who has a superior right.—A partner merely in the road or in the appurtenances of a neighbour, cannot be entitled to the privilege of Shaffa during the existence of one who is a partner in the property of the land; for his is the superior right, as has been already shown.

* In other words, "is entitled to the right of Shaffa;"—Shaffa being the term used to express the person endowed with that right.

Unless he first relinquish it, when the title devolves to the next in succession.—If a partner in the property of the land relinquish his right of Shaffa, it devolves next to him who is a partner with him; and if he also relinquish his right, it falls to the Jar Molasick, or person whose house is situated at the back of that which is the object of Shaffa, having the entry to it by another road. Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that during the existence of partner in the ground, whether he resign or insist upon his right, no other person is entitled to the privilege of Shaffa; for by his existence all others are excluded; and whilst the excluder remains the excluded have no right; as holds in inheritance. The ground on which the Zahir Rawayat (first quoted above) proceeds is, that the cause of the privilege of Shaffa exists with respect to each of the above-mentioned persons. The partner, however, has the superior right. Upon his relinquishing it, therefore, the one who is next to him in order of precedence will assume it; in the same manner as holds with respect to debts contracted during health, when they came in competition with debts contracted in sickness; that is the former are first discharged; but if the creditor whose debt was contracted in health relinquish his claim, the estate of the deceased is then appropriated to discharge the claim of him whose debt was contracted under sickness.

A person who is a joint proprietor of only a part of the article has a title superior to a neighbour.—A person who is a joint proprietor of only a part of the property sold (such as a partner in a particular room or wall of a house), as he has a right superior to one who is neighbour to that particular part, so likewise has he a right superior to one who is a neighbour to the rest of the house. This is an approved maxim of Aboo Yoosaf; for the conjunction holds stronger in the case of a person who is a joint proprietor of only a part of the house, than in that of one who is merely a neighbour. It is necessary that the road or rivulet, the joint participation in which gives a claim to the privilege of Shaffa, be private. By a private road is understood a road shut up at one end; and by a private rivulet we understand a stream of water in which boats cannot pass and repass; for otherwise it is a public river. (This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed. It is reported from Aboo Yoosaf, that a private rivulet is a stream which affords water to two or three pieces of ground; but if it exceed that, it is a public one.)

The relative situation of the property determines the right, when claimed on the plea of neighbourhood.—If a house be sold, situated in a short lane, shut up at one end, communicating through another lane, shut up also at one end, but of greater extent, in this case the inhabitants of the short lane only are entitled to the privilege of Shaffa; whereas, if a house situated in the long lane be sold, the inhabitants of both lanes are so entitled. The reason of this is, that the right of egress and regress in the short lane is participated only by its own inhabitants, whereas the right in the long lane appertains equally to the inhabitants of both; as appears more explained under the head of "Duties of the Kazer." The same rule also holds good in the case of a small rivulet issuing out of another.

The laying of beams on the wall of a house gives a right of Shaffa from neighbourhood but not from partnership, since this act does not constitute a partnership in the property of the house. In the same manner, a person who is a partner in a beam laid on the top of the wall is only held in the light of a neighbour.

The right of all the Shafees (claiming upon equal ground) is equal, without any regard to the extent of their properties.—When there is a plurality of persons entitled to the privilege of Shaffa, the right of all is equal, and no regard is paid to the extent of their several properties. Shafei maintains that the right of Shaffa in this case is possessed by the parties in proportion to their several properties; because Shaffa is one of the immunities of their property, and must therefore be held, like the profits of trade, the produce of lands, the offspring of slaves, or the fruit of trees, in proportion to their respective shares in the joint property. The argument of our doctors is, that the parties being all equal with respect to the principle on which their right of Shaffa is grounded (namely, a conjunction with the lands sold) they are all consequently equal in the right itself, whence if only one partner were present, however inconsiderable his share might be, he would be entitled to the whole of the Shaffa.—In reply, moreover, to the arguments used by Shafei, it is to be observed that the dispossessing another of his property, contrary to his inclination, is not one of the immunities of property, and is very different from the profits of trade, the fruits of trees, or the like, which are produced absolutely from the property itself.

If one of the parties relinquish his right it devolves to the others, and is participated equally amongst them; for although the grounds of their right were complete, yet they were obstructed from enjoying the entire privilege by the intervention of his right; but that right being resigned, the obstruction consequently no longer remains.

If some be absent, the Shaffa is adjudged equally amongst those who are present, but the absentee appearing receive their shares—if some of the partners happen to be absent, the whole of the Shaffa is to be decreed equally amongst those who are present; for it is a matter of uncertainty whether those who are absent would be inclined to demand their right; and the rights of those who are present must not be prejudged on a mere uncertainty.—If, however, the Kazee should have decreed the whole of the Shaffa to one who is present, and an absentee afterwards appear and claim his right, the Kazee must decree him the half; and so likewise if a third appear, he must decree him one-third of the shares remaining after the other two in order that thus an equality may be established amongst them.

If the person present should relinquish his Shaffa after the whole has been decreed to him by the Kazee, and the absentee afterwards appear, he is in this case entitled to claim only one half because the decree which the Kazee has passed, awarding the whole to the other, absolutely extinguished one held of the absentee’s right—it were otherwise if the person present relinquish his right previous to any decree being passed by the Kazee, and afterwards the absentee appear; for in this case he [the absentee] is entitled to the whole of the Shaffa.

The right does not operate until after the sale of the property.—The privilege of Shaffa is established after the sale; for it cannot take place until it be manifested that the proprietor is no longer inclined to keep his house; and this is manifested by the sale of it. It is therefore sufficient, in order to prove the sale and establish the privilege of Shaffa, that the seller acknowledge the sale, although the person said to be the buyer deny it.

Now until it be regularly demanded.—The right of Shaffa is not established until the demand be regularly made in the presence of witnesses; and it is requisite that it be made as soon as possible after the sale is known; for the right of Shaffa is but a feeble right, as it is the disseising another of his property merely in order to prevent apprehended inconveniences.—It is therefore requisite that the Shafee without delay discover his intentions, by making the demand; which must be done in the presence of witnesses, otherwise it cannot be afterwards proved before the Kazee.

Neither does the property go to the Shafee but by the surrender of the purchaser, or a decree of the magistrate.—When the demand has been regularly made in the presence of witnesses, still the Shafee does not become proprietor of the house until the purchaser surrender it to him, or until the magistrate pass a decree; because the purchaser’s property was complete, and cannot be transferred to the Shafee but by his own consent, or by a decree of a magistrate; in the same manner as in the case of a retraction of a grant, where the property of the grantee being completely established by the grant it cannot be transferred to the grantor, but by the surrender of the grantee, or by a decree of a magistrate. The use of this law appears in a case where the Shafee, after having preferred his claim before witnesses previous to the decree of the magistrate or the surrender of the purchaser, dies, or sells the house from whence he derived his right;—or where the house adjoining to that to which the right or Shaffa relates is sold for in the first of these instances the house is not a part of his hereditaments, because it was not his property; and the right of Shaffa fails in the second instance, as the fundamental principle of that right is extinguished previous to his becoming the proprietor; and in the third case, he has no right of Shaffa with respect to the house which is sold, since the house from which he would have derived that right is not his property.

CHAPTER II.

OF CLAIMS TO SHAFFA, AND OF LITIGATION CONCERNING IT.

The claims are of three kinds. I. The immediate claim (which must be made on the instant, or the Shafee forfeits his title).

—Claims to Shaffa are of three kinds—The first of these is termed Talb Mawasibat, or immediate claim, where the Shafee prefers his claim the moment he is apprised of the sale being concluding; and this it is necessary that he should do, inasmuch that if he make any delay, his right is thereby invalidated: for the right of Shaffa is but of a feeble nature: as has been already observed; and the Prophet, moreover, has said, “The right of Shaffa is established in him who prefers his claim without delay.”

If the Shafee receives a letter which, either in the beginning or the middle, apprises him of the circumstance of his Shaffa, and he read it on in the end, his right of Shaffa is thereby invalidated. Many of our modern doctors accord in this opinion; and it is in one place recorded as the doctrine of Mohammed.—In another place, however, it is reported from him, that if the man claim his Shaffa in the presence of the company amongst whom he may be sitting when he receives the intelligence, he is the Shafee, his right not being invalidated unless he delay asserting it till after the company have broke up. Both these opinions are mentioned in the Nawadir; and Koorokhee passed decree agreeably to the last quoted report; because the power of accepting or rejecting the Shaffa being established, a short time should necessarily be allowed for reflection; in the same manner as time is allowed to a woman to whom her husband has given the power of choosing to be divorced or not.

If the Shafee, on hearing of the sale, exclaims “Praise be to God!” or “There is no power or strength but what is derived from God!” or “God is pure!” his right of Shaffa is not invalidated, inasmuch that if, immediately on pronouncing these words he without delay claim his Shaffa, he will accordingly get it; because the first of these is considered as a thanksgiving on his being freed of the neighbourhood of the seller; the second (which is an expression of admiration) is supposed to proceed from the astonishment with which he is struck at the intention manifested by the seller of doing a thing which would be vexatious to him; and the last is considered as an exclamation prefatory to further discourse. None of these expressions, therefore, can imply a refusal or rejection of the Shafaa.—In the same manner also, if, on receiving the news of the sale, he ask "Who is the purchaser, and how much is the price?" it does not invalidate his right; since these questions cannot be considered as a refusal, but on the contrary it may be concluded from them that if the price be reasonable and a purchaser a person whom he would not like as a neighbour, he will afterwards claim his right of Shafaa.

When news of the sale is brought to the Shafee, it is not necessary, according to Haneefa, that he assert his intention of claiming the Shafaa before witnesses, unless the news be communicated to him by two men, or a man and two women, or an upright man. The two disciples maintain that he ought to declare his intentions before witnesses as soon as the news is communicated to him by one person, being either a freeman or a slave, a woman or a child,—provided, however, that the person be, in his belief, a true speaker.—It is otherwise where a woman is informed that her husband has given her the power of divorcing herself; for in that case it does not signify who is the informer, or what is his character.

Is the person who gives the intelligence to the Shafee be himself the buyer it is not (according to Haneefa) in such case necessary that he be an upright man; because he is the opponent; and uprightness is not requisite in him.

II. The claim by affirmation and taking to witness (which must be made as soon as conveniently may be after the other) —The second mode of claim to Shafaa is termed the Talb Takreer wa Ish-had, or claim by affirmation and taking to witness; and this also is requisite; because evidence is wanted in order to establish proof before the magistrate; and it is probable that the claimant cannot have witnesses to the Talb Mawasibat, as that is expressed immediately on intimation being received of the sale. It is therefore necessary afterwards to make the Talb Ish-had wa Takreer, which is done by the Shafee taking some person to witness,—either against the seller, if the ground sold be still in his possession,—or against the purchaser,—or upon the spot regarding which the dispute has arisen; and upon the Shafaa thus taking some person to witness, his right of Shafaa is fully established and confirmed. The reason of this is, that both the buyer and seller are opponents to the Shafaa in regard to his claim of Shafaa; the one being the possessor, and the other the proprietor of the ground sold; and, taking evidence on the ground itself is also valid: because it is that to which the right relates. If the seller have delivered over the ground to the buyer, the taking evidence against him is not sufficient, he being no longer an opponent; for having neither the possession nor the property, he is as a stranger. The manner of claim by affirmation and taking to witness is, the claimant saying "Such a person has bought, such a house, of which I am the Shafaa; I have already claimed my privilege of Shafaa, and now again claim it; the taking evidence against this person is from Abou Yoaaf that it is requisite the name of the thing sold, and its particular boundaries, be specified; because a claim is not valid unless the thing demanded be precisely known.)

And III claim by litigation —The third mode of claim to Shafaa is termed Talb Khasoomat, or claim by litigation,—which is performed by the Shafee petitioning the Kazee to command the purchaser to surrender up the ground to him; the method of doing which will hereafter be particularly explained.

A delay in the litigation does not invalidate the claim.—If the Shafee delay making claim by litigation, still his right does not drop, according to Haneefa. Such also is the generally received opinion; and decrees pass accordingly. There is likewise one opinion recorded from Abou Yoaaf to the same effect Mohammad maintains that if the Shafee postpone the litigation for one month after the taking of evidence, his right drops. This is also the opinion of Ziffer; and it is related as an opinion of Abou Yoaaf, that the right of the Shafee becomes null if he delay the litigation after the Kazee has held one court; for, if he willingly and without alleging any excuse, omit to commence the litigation at the first court held by the Kazee, it is a presumptive proof of his having declined it. The reasoning on which Mohammed found his opinion in this particular is, that if the right of the Shafee was never to be invalidated by his delaying the litigation, it would be very vexatious to the buyer; for he would be prevented from enjoying his property, in the apprehension of being deprived of it by the claim of the Shafae.—"I have therefore (says Mohammed) limited the delay that may be admitted to one month, as being the longest allowed term of prostration." In support of the opinion of Haneefa, it is urged that the right of the Shafee being firmly established by the taking of evidence, it cannot be extinguished but his own rejection, openly declared:—in the same manner as hold in all other matters of right.—With respect to what is mentioned by Mohammed, that "the delay would be vexatious to the buyer," it is of no weight; for in case of the absence of the Shafee, his right is not invalidated by the litigation being delayed; and the vexation sustained by the buyer from the delay is equally the same, whether the Shafee be present or absent.

Particularly, if it be occasioned by the absence of the magistrate.—If it appear that the Kazee was not in the city, and that on that account the litigation was delayed, the right is not invalidated, according to the concurrent opinion of three above-mentioned sages; for the litigation can only be made in the presence of the Kazee; and the delay is therefore excused.

Rules to be observed by the magistrate on an appeal.—When the Shafee goes to the Kazee and claims his right, alleging that "such a person has purchased a house, in which he has the right of Shaffa," the Kazee must first question the purchaser (the defendant in the cause) concerning the property on which the Shafee grounds his right of Shaffa; and if he acknowledge it, this is a sufficient ground for the Kazee passing a decree:—but if he deny it, the Kazee must then order the Shafee to bring witnesses to prove his property; for possession, which is apparent, may be owing to other causes than property; and a thing which is thus doubtful cannot be admitted as a proof to the detriment of another. Kadoosee alleges that the Kazee, before he applies to the defendant, ought to ask the plaintiff regarding the situation of the house and its boundaries; because if a man sue for the property of a house, it is requisite that he describe its situation and boundaries; and therefore he must do the same in claiming his right of Shaffa. When he has done this, the Kazee must next interrogate him regarding the grounds of his right of Shaffa; for the ground of Shaffa are various, and possibly he may set forth ground according to his own imagination, which do not, in reality, constitute any ground. If he reply that "he is the Shafee, because of his house being situated next to that which is the present object of dispute," his claim (as Khasaf observes) is complete. It is also mentioned in the Fatavee, that he must describe the boundaries of the house from whence he derives his right to the Shaffa in question.

And the mode prescribed for his examining the parties.—If the Shafee, being unable to bring witness, require that the purchaser be put to his oath, it must be ten times merely according to the best of his [the purchaser's] knowledge (that is to say, "By God, I know not that the plaintiff is the proprietor of the house on which he founds his claim of Shaffa"); because his deposition relates to a thing which is in the hand of another, and therefore he can only swear as to his own knowledge, and not positively as to the fact in question, namely, whether the house be, for certain, the property of the plaintiff or not.—If the purchaser refuse to swear, or the Shafee bring evidence, his property is proved in that house from which he derives his claim of Shaffa, and the neighbourhood of that house to the one in dispute is also proved. The Kazee must next ask the purchaser whether he has bought the house or not? and if he deny it, the Kazee must order the Shaffee to bring witnesses to prove the purchase; for the Shaffa cannot be established until the sale be proved; which must be done by witnesses.—If the Shafee cannot bring witnesses, the Kazee must administer an oath to the purchaser to this effect, "he has not purchased the house," or that "the plaintiff is not entitled to the privilege of Shaffa in the manner in which he has claimed it;" for here he swears regarding an act committed by himself; and relative to a thing which is in his own possession; and therefore it is necessary that the oath be positive as to the certainty of fact.

The cause may be tried and determined independent of the price of the property in dispute.—The Shafee may litigate his claim of Shaffa although he do not produce in court the price of the ground in dispute:—but when the Kazee has decreed to him the privilege of Shaffa, it is necessary that he bring the price. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet, as quoted in the Maboot. It is reported, from Mohammed that the Kazee ought not to pass the decree until the Shafee produce the price (and the same is also cited by Hassan from Hanifa); because possibly the Shafee may be indigent, and the Kazee must therefore delay the decree, in order that the purchaser may not lose his property.—The reason assigned in support of the first opinion quoted from the Zahir Rawayet, is that the price does not become due from the Shafee to the purchaser until the Kazee have passed his decree; and as the purchaser is not obliged to surrender up the ground previous to the decree, so in the same manner the Shafee (as has been mentioned above) is under no necessity of previously producing the price:—nor can there be any apprehension of the purchaser losing his property, since he has the right of detention, as will more particularly be shown in the ensuing examples.

But the defendant may retain the on until the other be produced.—When, previous to the Shafee producing the price, the Kazee has commanded the purchaser to deliver up the ground [to the Shafee], still he may retain it in his own hand until the price be brought to him.

The privilege is not forfeited by a delay in the payment.—If the Shafee delay to pay the price to the purchaser, after the Kazee has ordered him, still his privilege of Shaffa is not invalidated; for it has become firm established by the litigation and the decree of the Kazee.
The seller may be sued whilst the house is in his possession.—If the Shafee bring the seller into court whilst the house is still in his possession, he [the Shafee] may commence his litigation against him, and the seller may retain the house in his own possession until he receive the price from the Shafee. The Kazee, however, is not in this case to hear the evidence until the purchaser also appear, as for his presence there is a twofold reason; for first, the purchaser is proprietor of the ground, and the seller the possessor; and as the decree of the Kazee must be against both, both therefore must be present (It is otherwise where the purchaser has obtained possession; for then there can be no occasion for the presence of the seller, as he has become like a stranger, having neither the property nor this possession.) Secondly, the sale or bargain which has been concluded in favour of the purchaser is to be dissolved by oath; and it is therefore requisite that he be present, in order that the Kazee may decree the dissolution against him.

An agent for the purchaser may be sued (before delivery to his constituent).—If an agent on behalf of another purchase ground, the Shafee must sue the agent. If, however, the agent have delivered over the ground to his constituent, the Shafee must not institute his suit against the agent (as he is neither the proprietor nor the possessor), but against his constituent; for the agent then stands as the seller, and his constituent as the purchaser; and when (as has been already explained) the seller delivers up the ground to the purchaser, the Shafee's suit is against the latter.

And so also an agent for the seller, or an executor.—If the agent of a person who is absent sell ground on account of his constituent, the Shafee may claim his right and obtain the ground from the agent, provided it be in his possession. The same rule also holds in the case of an executor authorized to sell lands.

The Shafee, after gaining his suit, has an option of inspection, and also an option from defect.—If the Kazee decree in favour of the Shafee, at a time when he has not yet seen the property in dispute, he [the Shafee] has an option of inspection; and if any defect be afterwards discovered in it, he has an option from defect* and may, if he please, reject it, notwithstanding the purchaser should have excepted such defect from the bargain, or, in other words, should have exempted the seller from responsibility for such defect; because, as the transfer of property by right of Shaffe is the same as a transfer of property, the Shafee therefore, under both the above circumstances, the power of rejection, in the same manner as any other purchaser; and this power in the Shafee is not destroyed by the purchaser having seen the property, or having so excepted the seller; for he [the purchaser] was not deputed by the Shafee, and his act, of course, does not affect the Shafee's power of rejection.

In disputes concerning the price, the assertion of the purchaser, upon oath, must be credited.—If the purchaser and Shafee differ regarding the price, the former alleging one hundred, for instance, and the latter only eighty, and neither of them be able to bring any evidence, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited in preference to that of the Shafee; because here the Shafee alleges a right in the purchaser's property for a sum short of one hundred, which the purchaser denies; and, according to the LAW, the declaration of a defendant, upon oath, must be credited;—the oath of both parties being required in this case for the Shafee is plaintiff against the purchaser, but the purchaser is not plaintiff against the Shafee, he being at liberty either to claim or resign the thing in question; and it is a rule that both parties cannot be called on to swear, unless where both are in some manner plaintiff, or in some particular cases, where it is expressly ordained by the LAW, neither of which reasons exist in the present instance.

And so likewise evidence produced by him.—If both the Shafee and Shafee produce evidence, that produced by the Shafee must be credited, according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Abou Yoosaf on the contrary maintains that the evidence produced by the purchaser must be credited; because it proves a larger sum than the other, and it is a general rule that regard is had to the evidence which proves the most,—as where, for instance, a difference arises regarding the amount of the price betwixt a purchaser and a seller or an agent and his constituent, or a person who buys a thing from an infidel enemy, and the original proprietor of the thing;—in all which cases, if both parties bring evidence, the evidence of him who proves the largest sum is admitted.—The difference here alluded to, betwixt one who buys a thing from an infidel enemy, and the former proprietor of the thing, will be better elucidated by the following case.—A Mussulman merchant goes upon a voyage, arrives in the country of the infidels, receives their protection, and, whilst he remains there purchases a slave, who had formerly belonged to Zeyd, from an infidel, who had carried him away as his plunder; and, on his return, representing his slave, offering the price which the merchant had given to the infidel; but a difference arising betwixt them regarding the amount

*Option of inspection and option from defect are fully explained under the head of Sale (See Vol. II. p. 255 and 258)

* Arab. Tahalif.—For a full explanation of this term see p. 417 of this Vol. of the price, both adduce evidence to prove the sum they asserted;—in which case the evidence of the merchant, which goes to prove the largest sum, is admitted, in preference to that of Zeyd.—In support of the opinion maintained by Haneefah and Mohammed on this point, two arguments may be adduced.
Firstly, the evidence of the Shafee subjects the purchaser to an obligation; whereas the evidence of the purchaser does not subject the Shafee to any obligation, since he has it in his option to take the thing in dispute or not; and the intention of establishing evidence is to impose an obligation.—Secondly, if it be possible, a regard should be paid to the evidence of both parties; and here it is possible, for there is no absolute contradiction in this allegations of the two parties, since the purchaser may perhaps have twice purchased the thing; and both purchasers be thus apparently proved. The remark—the option of the Shafee to prefer whichever he pleases; that is to say, if the purchase have bought the thing twice, viz once for one thousand, and another time for two thousand, the Shafee has it in his option to take the thing for whichever of these prices he thinks proper.—With respect to the analogy urged by Aboo Yoosaf betwixt the case in question and that of a purchaser and a seller differing concerning the amount of the price, it cannot be admitted; for if two different sales take: place betwixt the parties, one immediately after the other, regarding the same thing, the one sale invalidates the other; and it being thus impossible to admit the allegations and evidence of both parties that evidence which proves the largest sum must be superior; and the superiority is therefore allowed to the evidence of the seller over that of the purchaser, because it proves the largest sum.
In the case of the Shafee, on the contrary, as the maxim of one sale invalidating the other does not affect him both the sales hold good with respect to him;—whence if the purchaser choose to purchase the same thing twice, the Shafee has it in his option to take it for either of the prices, as has been mentioned above. Beside, as an agent is supposed to stand in the place of a seller, and his constituent in that of a purchaser, the same laws will of course hold with respect to them as are established in the case of a buyer and a seller; and this is confirmed by a precept quoted from Mohammed, in which it is expressly said, that "the evidence bought by the constituent is preferable."—
With respect, also, to the analogy urged [by Aboo Yoosaf] betwixt the case in question and that of a dispute between the purchaser of a slave from an infidel, and the former master of such slave, it is entirely unfounded since it cannot be admitted that the effect of the branch is the same as that of the root, as we have it expressly declared in the Sayir Kabeer; that the evidence adduced by the former master of the slave is superior. But even admitting this, the argument is of no weight, for in the case of the merchant two bargains could not be made successively without the one of them being invalidated; whereas in the case of the Shafee (as we have already observed) both bargains may be effective.
And also his argument, if the seller allege a larger amount.—If the seller and purchaser differ regarding the price, and the seller (supposing him not yet to have received it) allege the smallest sum, the Shafee may take the house for the price alleged by the seller the assertion made by him of a smaller sum being considered as an abatement in favour of the purchaser, of which the Shafee is entitled to avail himself. We shall have occasion in the ensuing section to explain the ground on which this law is founded; and shall therefore in this place assign one reason. namely, that the right given to the Shafee, once the seller arises from his own declaration, in saying,
"I have sold it for such a price;" and therefore, so long as he has not received the price, his allegation must be credited regarding it,—whence the Shafee is entitled to take the property at a rate agreeable to his assertion.—If, on the contrary, the seller allege the largest sum, both parties must be required to swear, and the contract of sale is then dissolved. If, in this case, either of them refuse to swear, that price is established which has been set forth by the other, and the Shafee is consequently entitled to take the house for that amount. If, on the other hand, both parties swear, the Kazee, at the requisition of one or both of them; must dissolve the sale; and the Shafee (whose right is not be prejudiced by such dissolution) may then take the house for the amount alleged by the seller.
If the seller should have received the price, the Shafee may take the house for the amount set forth as the price by the purcesser; and here the allegation of the seller is of no weight or credit, for having received the price, the sale, as far as relates to him, is finally concluded, and he becomes only as a stranger; the dispute then lying betwixt the purchaser and the Shafee, regarding which we have already been very explicit in a former part of this section.

Case in which the seller's assertion may be credited concerning the price.—If the Shafee be not apprized of the seller's having received the price and the seller should say, "I have sold the property for one thousand dirms, which I have received," in this case the Shafee is entitled to take the property for one thousand dirms; for, as the beginning of the seller's speech, in which he acknowelledges the sale, creates the Shafee's right of Shaffa, the subsequent sentence, in which he asserts his having received the price, as tending to extinguish that right which he has himself created, must not be admitted. But if the seller should say, "I have sold the ground and received the price," and then should add, "which was one thousand dirms," his evidence with respect to the amount of the price cannot be admitted, because by the prior acknowledgment of his having received the price, he becomes like a stranger, and has no further concern or interest in the matter.

Section
Of the Articles in lieu of which the Shafee may take the Shaffa Property.

The Shafee is entitled to the benefit of any abatement made to the purchaser, but not to that of a total remission.—If the seller abate a part of the price to the purchaser, the Shafee is entitled to the benefit of such abatement; whereas if the seller, after the sale, remit the whole of the price to the purchaser, the Shafee is not allowed toavail himself of such indulgence. The reason of this distinction is, that an abatement of a part is an act connected with, and referring to, the original bargain or sale; and the Shafee is entitled to be benefit of it, because that sum which remains after deducting the abatement is the price; whereas an entire remission has no connexion with the original bargain. In the same manner also, if the seller abate a part of the price, after the Shafee has become seized of his Shaffa property, he [the Shafee] is entitled to the benefit of such abatement, and accordingly receives back the amount abated by the seller to the purchaser
He is not liable for any augmentation agreed upon after the sale.—If, on the contrary, the purchaser after the bargain is concluded, agree to an augmentation of the price in favour of the seller, the Shafee is not liable for such augmentation, because his privilege of Shaffa is established for the prior originally settled: and if any subsequent augmentation were admitted to operate with respect to him, it would be a loss to him; whereas, on the contrary, any subsequent abatement is a benefit. Analogous to this case of augmentation is that formerly stated, in which it was remarked, that if a man make a purchase for a certain price, and afterwards renew the purchase of the same thing, and settle a large price, the Shafee is not prejudiced by such augmentation, but is entitled to his Shaffa for the price first agreed upon.

If the price consist of effects, the Shafee may take it on paying the value of those effects: but if it consist of similars he is to pay an equal quantity of the same—if a man sell a house for a certain quantity of goods or effects, the Shafee is entitled to take it for the value of such effects; for effects are amongst the things denominated Zooat-al-Kreem, or things which, being estimable, are compensable by an equivalent in money. If, on the other hand, a man sell a house for a compensation in wheat, silver, or any other articles estimable by measure or weight, the Shafee may take it for an equal quantity of the same article; because these are of the class of Zooat-al-Imsal, or things compensable by an equal quantity of the same species. The reason of this is that the revealer of the law* has established in the Shafee a right to take possession of the property of the purchaser, on giving him a compensation similar to the price which he has paid;—it is therefore necessary that a similarly betwixt the compensation and price be observed as nearly as possible, in the same manner as in cases of destruction of property.—It is to be observed that articles which differ very little in their unities, such as walnuts or eggs, are included under the denomination of Zooatal-Imsal, or things compensable by an equal quantity of the same species. If, therefore, a man purchase ground for walnuts or eggs, the Shafee may give him a compensation in walnuts or eggs and is not required to pay an equivalent in money.)

And so likewise, if the price consist of land—If a man sells a house for a commission of land for another piece of ground, in this case, as each piece of ground is the price for which the other is sold, the Shafee of each piece is entitled to take it for the value of the other, land being of the class of Zooat-al-Kreem, or things compensable by an equivalent in money.

In case of a term of credit, the Shafee may either wait the expiration of the term, or take the property immediately, upon paying the price.—If a house be sold for a price payable at a distant period, the Shafee may either wait until that period be expired, and then take the house for the same price, or he may take it immediately, on paying the price in ready money; but he is not entitled to take it immediately and demand a respite to the period settled by the purchaser. Ziffer maintains that the Shafee is entitled to take the house immediately, and demand a respite of the payment (and such also is the opinion of Shafee); for the respite is a modification of the price, in the same manner as if it were stipulated to be paid in coin of able inferior species; and as the Shafee is entitled to take the house for the price itself, he is of course entitled to take it for the price under its modification. The argument adduced by us, in support of the former opinion, is that a delay or respite cannot be established but by a positive stipulation betwixt the parties; and in the present case there is not any stipulation, either betwixt the Shafee and the seller, or the Shafee and the purchaser.—nor can the seller's consenting to a respite in favour of the purchaser be construed into a consent to respite in favour of Shafe; for men, as they differ in their circumstances, are more or less capable of discharging their debts.—With respect, moreover, to the arguments used in behalf of Ziffer's opinion, it is true that the respite is a modification of the price; yet the law is not to be bent thereby; for the respite is in fact, a right of the purchaser;

*Meaning, the Prophet, who is often termed Shari, or the lawgiver.
but if it were admitted a modification of the price, it would be a right of the seller, like the price itself;—this case being analogous to where a man purchases a thing for a price payable at a distant time, and afterwards sells it again by a tawleesa;—in which instance, if no such stipulation be expressed, the second purchaser is not entitled to a term of credit,—and so here likewise,—if in the case here considered, the land be still in the possession of the seller, and the Shafee take it and pay him the price in ready money, his [the seller's] claim against the purchaser ceases; for the bargain with respect to him is dissolved, and the Shafee is substituted in his place, as has been already explained.—If, on the contrary, the land be in the possession of the purchaser, and the Shafee take it from him, still the seller must allow to the purchaser the term of credit originally settled; because the bargain be twixt them is not dissolved by the Shafee's taking the land, and the case is therefore the same as where a person makes a purchase upon credit, and then sells the article for ready money, in which case the first seller is not entitled to demand ready money from him. It is, however; lawful for the Shafee to defer taking the land until the term of credit be expired; but he must make his demand without delay; for if he neglect to make an immediate demand, his right of Shaffa, as well as the rights of Haneefa and Mohammed, becomes null:—contrary to be opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.—The reason for the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed upon this head is, that as the Shaffa has existence from the time of the sale, it is therefore requisite that the claim be made upon the instant of the sale being known. The reason for Aboo Yoosaf's opinion is that 'the only use of the claim is to enable the Shafee to take the land, which end cannot be at present effected, whence he remains silent; and as this silence does not argue any recession from his right, that it is consequently not invalidated. To this, however, it may be replied, that the taking of the land is a matter posterior to the claim: and the Shafee has it, moreover, in his power to take it on the instant, by paying down the price.

Case of property subject to Shaffa, purchased by a Zimmee for a price consisting of unlawful articles—If a Zimmee purchase land for wine or pork, and the Shafee be also a Rimmee, he [the Shafee] may take the land for an equal quantity of similar wine, or for the value of the pork, because a bargain of this kind is held valid amongst Zimmeees; and as the right of Shaffa is enjoyed in common by both Mussulmans and Zimmeees, and wine, amongst the latter, is held as vinegar amongst the former, and hogs as sheep, it follows that, vinegar being included under the denomination of Zoot-al-Imral, and sheep under that of Zoot-al-Koom, the Shafee is at liberty to take the land for an equal quantity of wine, or for the value of the pork. If, on the contrary, the Shafee be a Mussulman, he is to take the land for the value of the wine as well as of the pork; for the giving or receiving of wine amongst Mussulmans is prohibited by their religion, and it is therefore, with respect to them; reckoned also amongst the things which are of the denomination of Zoot-al-Koom.—If, on the other hand, there be two Shafee, the one a Mussulman, and the other a Zimmee, the former must take half of the land for half the value of the wine, and the latter the other half, for half the quantity of the wine.—If, also, the Zimmee Shafee become a Mussulman, as his right is strengthened, not invalidated, by his conversion, he is therefore to take his half of the land for half of the value of the wine; because, by his embracing the faith, he is incapacitated from paying the actual wine, which then (as it were) becomes non-existent with respect to him;—in the same manner as where a person makes a purchase of a house for a measure of green, dates, and a Shafee afterwards appears, at a time when the season for green dates is past; in which case he must take the house for the value of the dates,—and so likewise in the present instance, as wine is, in effect, non-existent with respect to Mussulmans, they being prohibited by the law, from using it in any shape.

Section,
The Shafee may either take the buildings or plantations of the purchaser (paying the value), or may cause them to be removed.—If the purchaser of ground subject to a claim of Shaffa erect buildings or plant trees upon it, and the Kazee afterwards order the ground to be delivered to the Shafee, it in this case rests with him [the Shafee] either to take the ground, together with the building or trees, paying the value of both, or to obligate the purchaser to remove them. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the Shafee cannot oblige the purchaser to remove his buildings; but he must either take the ground, paying the value of the trees or buildings, or relinquish the whole. This is also the opinion of Shafei. He, however; admits that the Shafee may cause the buildings or the trees to be removed, on indemnifying the purchaser in the loss he may be thereby sustain. In short, according to him, the Shafee has three things in his option: for he may either take the land, together with the trees and buildings, paying the value of those,—or he may cause them to be removed, indemnifying the purchase,—or, lastly, he may relinquish the whole. In support of the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf two arguments are urged. First, the purchaser was justifiable in erecting the buildings;—since the ground was his own property, and it would therefore be unjust to oblige him to remove it:—in the same manner as where ground is for a short time transferred by a great, or by a defective sale, and afterwards taken back,—in which case the grantee or the seller has it not in his power to oblige the grantee or the purchaser to remove any buildings he may have raised upon the ground whilst it was in his possession,—or (in cases of Shaffa) where the purchaser has raised a crop of grain from the ground,—in which case the Shaffee cannot oblige him to remove it until it be fit for reaping.—SECONDLY, in the present case one of two grievances must follow; for either the Shaffee must suffer a grievance in being obliged to pay an enhanced price for his Shaffa on account of the additional value of the buildings, or also the purchaser must suffer a grievance being compelled to remove them. Now the latter of these grievances is the heaviest, for it is a loss without any recompense; whereas the increase of price paid by the Shaffee is not without a consideration;—and where the Shaffee either takes the ground, paying for the trees and buildings, or relinquishes the whole, the greater of the two grievances is obliterated, and the smaller one only is induced. The remarks urged in behalf of the opinion quoted from the Zahir Rawyat are, that as the purchaser has planted trees or erected buildings on ground over which the rights of another extended, without first obtaining the sanction of that other, they must be removed, in the same manner as where a person who holds ground in pledge builds upon it without the permission of the pledger.—Besides, the right of the Shaffee is stronger than that of the purchaser, as being of prior date; whence it is that any act of the purchaser, even such as the selling or granting of the ground, may be dissolved. It is otherwise with respect to a grantee, or a purchaser under an invalid contract (according to Haneefa); because they act under a permission from the possessor of the right; and also, because the right of resumption in cases of gift or invalid purchase, is but of a weak nature,—whence it discontinue upon the erection of buildings. The right of Shaffa, on the contrary, still continues in force; and therefore the rendering absolutely obligatory the value of the trees or buildings, upon the Shaffee, in case of his claiming his right, would be absurd; in the same manner as holds in cases of claim of right;*—in other words, if a person purchases land, and plant or build upon it, and it afterwards prove the right of another, the purchaser recovers the price of the land and the value of the trees and buildings from the seller, and not from the claimant of right; and in the present instance the Shaffee stands as the claimant of right. Analogy would suggest that grain also should be removed from the land; but, by a more favourable construction of the law in this particular, it is not to be removed; because the term of its continuance is limited and ascertained; and as the delay may be recompensed to the Shaffee by a rent or hire, it cannot therefore be very grievous to him.

The Shaffee is not entitled to any remuneration for buildings erected or trees planted on land which proves the property of another:—but he may remove them.—If a Shaffee having obtained possession of his Shaffa land, erect buildings, or plant trees upon it, and it afterwards appear that the land was wrongfully sold, being the property of another, the Shaffee recovers the price, from the seller, where he had taken the land from him,—or from the purchaser, where he had taken it from him; because it is evident that it was wrongfully taken. He is not, however, entitled to recover from either party the value of his buildings or trees, but is at liberty to carry the wherever he pleases.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the Shaffee may also recover the value of the buildings or trees from the person from whom he received the ground; because that person, under such circumstances, is considered as the seller, and the Shaffee as the purchaser; and it is an obligatory rule that the purchaser may recover from the seller the value of such buildings as he has erected on the ground, if it appear that the ground sold to him was not the property of the seller, but of another person. There is, however, a difference, in this case, betwixt a Shaffee and an ordinary purchaser; for the latter is deceived by the seller, and is empowered by him to take the ground,—whereas the Shaffee is not deceived by the purchaser, nor can he be said to be empowered by him to take the ground, since the purchaser himself is compelled, the Shaffee taking possession of the ground without his consent.

If the property have sustained any accidental or natural injury after sale, still the Shaffee cannot take it for less than the full price.—If a man purchase a house or garden subject to a claim of Shaffa, and the building (owing to some unforeseen calamity) be destroyed, of the trees decay, it rests in the option of the Shaffee either to resign the house or garden, or to take it and pay the full price: because as buildings or trees are mere appendages of the ground (whence it is that they are included in the sale of land without any particular mention being made of them), no particular part of the price is set against them,—unless where they have been wilfully destroyed by the purchaser, in which case it is lawful for him [the purchaser] to sell the appendages so destroyed, and make a profit by them, exclusive of the full price of the ground. It is otherwise when one half of the ground is inundated: for in such case the half of the thing itself being destroyed, the Shaffee may take the remainder paying only half the original price.

If the injury be committed by the purchaser, the Shaffee must make the ground alone at its estimated value.—If the purchaser wilfully break down the erections, the Shaffee may either resign his claim, or may take the area of ground for a proportionable part of the original price; but he is not entitled to the ruins, because they become a separate property, and are no longer appendages of the ground; and the right of Shaffa extends only to the ground, and to things so attached to it as to be appendages.

Case of a Shafee taking ground with fruit trees.—If a man purchase a piece of ground, having date trees upon it bearing fruit at the time, the Shafee is entitled to take the fruit, —provided particular mention have been made of it in the sale, for otherwise it is not comprehended. What is here advanced proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that the Shafee is not entitled to take the fruit; because, as the fruit is a dependant both of the tree and of the ground (whence it is not included in a sale of ground unless it be particularly mentioned), it therefore resembles the furniture of a house. The reason for a more favourable construction, in this particular is that the fruit, in consequence of its connexion with the tree, is a dependant of the land, in the same manner as an erection, or any thing inserted in the wall of a house, such as a door, for instance; and therefore the Shafee is entitled to take it. The same rule also holds where the ground is purchased at a time when there is no fruit upon the trees and the fruit is afterwards produced whilst it [the ground] is yet in the purchaser’s possession;—in other words, the Shafee is here also entitled to take the fruit, because that is a dependant of the owner of the article; in the same manner as in the case of a female slave who is sold, —if she be delivered of a child previous to her being given over to the purchaser, still the child, as well as its mother, is the property of the purchaser.

In either of the two preceding cases if the purchaser have gathered the fruit, and the Shafee afterwards come and claim his privilege he is not entitled to the fruit so gathered; for it is no longer an appendage of the ground. It is said, in the Mabboot, that if the purchaser have gathered any of the fruit, a proportional abatement should be made in the price to the Shafee. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks, that this is in the former only of the two above-mentioned cases; for the fruit being produced at the time, and being actually and expressly included in the sale, it is natural to suppose that a part of the price was given in consideration of it; whereas, in the latter case, the fruit was not produced, and could only be included in the sale as a consequent, whence no part of the price could have been set against it.

OF THE ARTICLES CONCERNING WHICH SHAFFA OPERATES

The right of Shaffa holds with respect to all immovable property.—The privilege of Shaffa takes place with respect to immovable property, notwithstanding it be in capable of division, such as a bath, a mill, or a private road. Shafee maintains that nothing it subject to Shaffa but what is capable of being divided: because (according to his tenets) the end of Shaffa is to obviate the inconveniences attending a division of property, which does not hold in a property incapable of division. Our doctrine, however, is grounded on a precept of the Prophet, who has said “Shaffa takes place with regard to all lands or houses.” Besides, according to our tenets, the grand principle of Shaffa is the conjunction of property, and its object (as we have already explained) to prevent the vexation arising from a disagreeable neighbour; and this reason is of equal force whether the thing be divisible or otherwise.

The privilege of Shaffa does not extend to household effects or shipping:—because of a saying of the Proph’t, “Shaffa affects only houses and gardens;” and also, because the intention of Shaffa being to prevent the vexation arising from a bad neighbour, it is needless to extend it to property of a moveable nature.

Unless it be sold separate from the ground on which it stands.—It is observed, in the abridgment of Kadoores, that Shaffa does not affect even a house or trees when sold separately from the ground on which they stand. This opinion (which is also mentioned in the Mabboot) is approved; for as buildings and trees are not of a permanent nature, they are therefore of the class of moveables. There is, however, an exception to this in this case of the upper story of a house; for it is subject to Shaffa—whence the proprietor of the under storey is the Shafee, as is also the proprietor of the upper the Shafee of the under one, notwithstanding their entries be by different roads.

A Mussulman and a Zimmee are on an equality with respect to it.—A Mussulman and a Zimmee being equally affected by one principle on which Shaffa is established, and equally concerned in its operations, are therefore on an equal footing in all cases regarding the privilege of Shaffa, and for the same reason, a man or a woman, an infant or an adult, a just man or a reprobate, a freeman or a slave (being either a Mokatib or a Malzoon), are all equall with respect to Shaffa.

It holds with respect to property transferred in any shape for a consideration.—When a man acquires a property in land for a consideration (in the manner, for instance, of a grant for a consideration), the privilege of Shaffa takes place with respect to it, because it is in the power of the Shaffa to fulfil the stipulation.

It does not hold in a property assigned in dower, or as a compensation for Khoolah, or

*The term, in the original, signifies boats including every species of water-carriage
The privilege of Shaffa cannot take place relative to a house assigned by a man as a dower to his wife, or by a woman to her husband as the condition on which he is to grant her a divorce, or which is settled on a person as his hire or reward, or made over in composition for willful murder, or assigned over as the ransom of a slave; for with us it is a rule that Shaffa shall not take place unless there exist an exchange of property for property, which is the case in any of these instances, as the matters to which the house is opposed are not property. Shafei holds Shaffa to take place in all these cases; because, although the matter to which the house is opposed be not property, it is nevertheless capable of estimation (according to his tenets), and therefore the house may be taken upon paying the value of the matter to which it is opposed, in the same manner as in the sale of a property for a consideration in goods or effects. It is to be observed, however, that this opinion of Shafei obtains only with respect to a case where a part of a house is assigned as a dower, or made over as a consideration for Khoola, a composition for murder, and so forth: for, according to his tenets, there is no Shaffa except in cases of joint property.

It holds with respect to a house sold in order to pay the dower.—If a man marry a woman without settling on her any dower, and afterwards settle on her a house as a dower, the privilege of Shaffa does not take place, the house being here considered in the same light as if it had been settled on the woman at the time of the marriage.—It is otherwise where a man sells his house in order to discharge his wife's dower, either proper stipulated: because here exists an exchange of property for property.

If a man, on his marriage, settle a house upon his wife a hire dower, and stipulate that she shall pay him back, from the price of the house, one thousand dirms, according to Haneefa the privilege Shaffa does not take place relative to that house; whereas the two disciples hold that it affects a part of the house equivalent to one thousand dirms.

It does not hold with respect to a house the possession of which is compromised by a sum of money.—The privilege of Shaffa does not operate relative to a house concerning which there has been a dispute betwixt two men, compromised by the defendant (who was the possessor) paying the plaintiff a sum of money, after denying his claim: for in this case, the compromise being made after the denial, the house, in the imagination of the defendant, still belongs to him under his original right of property, and consequently no sale or exchange of property for property can here be established in regard to him;—and so likewise if he refuse to answer to the suit, and then compromise it with a sum of money.—since it may be supposed that he has parted with his money rather than be under the necessity of taking an oath, even with truth on his side, or of involving himself in litigious disputes and bruises. If, on the contrary, he confess the justness of the plaintiff's claim, and then compromise with a sum of money, the privilege of Shaffa takes place; because as he has here acknowledged the plaintiff's right to the house, and retained if afterwards in virtue of a compromise, an exchange of property for property is clearly established in this instance.

It holds with respect to a house made over in composition.—If a defendant compromise a suit by resigning or making over a house to the plaintiff, after having either denied his claim or acknowledged it, or refused to answer it, the right of Shaffa is established with respect to the house: because, as the plaintiff here accepts the house in consideration of what he conceives to be his right, he is therefore [in adjudging the right of Shaffa against him] dealt with according to his own conceptions.

But not with respect to property transferred by grant.—The privilege of Shaffa is not admitted in the case of grants,—unless when the grant is made for a consideration, in which case it is, in effect, ultimately a sale. Still, however, the privilege of Shaffa cannot be admitted, unless both parties have obtained possession of the property transferred to them by the terms of the grant (nor if the thing granted on either side be an indefinite part of any thing); for a grant on condition of a return is still a grant in its beginning, as has been already explained in treating of gifts. It is further to be observed that the privilege of Shaffa cannot be admitted, unless the return be expressed as a condition on making the grant: for if it be not so expressed, and the parties give to each other reciprocal presents, these presents on both sides are held as pure grants, although each of them having met with a requital of his generosity, neither is allowed the power of retracting.

It cannot take place with respect to a property sold under a condition of option.—If a man sell his house under a condition of option, the privilege of Shaffa cannot take place with respect to that house, the power reserved by the seller being an impediment to the extinction of his right of property but when he relinquishes that power, the impediment ceases, and the privilege of Shaffa takes place, provided the Shafee prefer his claim immediately. This is approved.

*The reasonings on both sides are here recited at large; but are omitted in the translation, as containing merely a string of metaphysical subtleties or little or no use.

*That is, "reserving to himself the power of hereafter dissolving the sale." (See Vol. II. p. 220 to 256.)
But it holds with respect to a property so purchased.—If, on the contrary, a man purchases a house under a condition of option, the privilege of Shaffa takes place with respect to it; for such a power reserved by the purchaser is held, in the opinion of all the learned, to be no impediment to the extinction of the seller’s right of property; and the right of Shaffa is founded and rests upon the extinction of the seller’s right of property, as has been already explained. And on the Shaffa taking possession, the purchaser’s right of option ceases.—If the Shaffa take the house during the purchaser’s right of option (namely, three days), such right ceases, and the sale is completely concluded; for the purchaser, as no longer having the house in his possession is no longer capable of rejecting it; and the Shaffa cannot pretend to claim the power of dissolving the bargain, since that power was founded in a condition established in favour of the purchaser only. If the sale upon option, the possessor of the option is Shaffa of the adjacent property.—If, whilst one of the parties, either purchaser or seller, has the power of dissolving the bargain, the house adjoining to the one in question be sold, he who possessed such power is the Shaffa of the adjoining house.—If it be the seller, he is the Shaffa, because whilst he retained the power of dissolving the bargain, his right of property remained unextinguished; or, if it be the purchaser, his claim ing the Shaffa of the second house is a proof of his inclination to keep the first, and not to avail himself of his power of dissolving the bargain.—His right of property is therefore held to commence from the time of adjusting the bargain; and in consequence of his right of property in the first house, he has the right of Shaffa with respect to the second. If, in this case, the Shaffa of the first house should afterwards come and claim his right, he is entitled to the Shaffa of the first house;—but he is not entitled to that of the second, because the first house was not his property at the time when the second was sold. If a man purchase a house without seeing it, and afterwards, in virtue of his privilege of Shaffa, take the adjacent house, which happens to be sold, still his power of rejecting the first house on seeing it does not cease; for as it would not be annulled even by an express renunciation; it consequently is not annulled by an act which affords only a presumption of renunciation.

The right does not hold with respect to a property transferred under an invalid sale.—The privilege of Shaffa cannot take place regarding a house transferred by an invalid sale before or after the purchaser obtaining possession of the house. If before the purchaser obtains possession of the house belonging as usual to the seller, and his right of property is not extinguished; and after he has obtained possession there is still a probability that the bargain may be dissolved, since the law admits the dissolution of a sale, in a case of invalidity, in order to obviate such invalidity, an effect which could not be produced if the privilege of Shaffa were allowed. If, however, the purchaser put an end to the possibility of the dissolution by any particular act, such as by erecting buildings on the ground, or the like, the privilege of Shaffa may take place, since the impugnment then no longer exists.

The seller of a property, under an invalid sale, is still Shaffa of the adjacent property. If the house adjacent to one which has been transferred by an invalid sale be sold whilst the one so transferred is still in the possession of the seller, he [the seller] is the Shaffa of the adjacent house, because of the continuance of his right in the other. Until he deliver the property sold to the purchaser, who then has the right.—If the seller have delivered over the first house, previous to the Kazee decreeing to him the Shaffa of the adjacent one, the purchaser, because of the possession already acquired in obtaining possession of the first house, is the Shaffa of the second. It is otherwise where the seller delivers over the first house after the Kazee has decreed to him the Shaffa of the second; for in this case his right of Shaffa is not invalidated; because, after the decree of the Kazee has passed, it is no longer necessary that he preserve his right of property in that house from which he derived his right of Shaffa.

Which, however, falls upon the seller resuming his property.—If the seller take back the first house, previous to the Kazee decreeing the Shaffa to the purchaser; his [the purchaser’s] right of Shaffa becomes null; because his right of property in that house from which he derived it has ceased previous to its being granted him by a decree of the Kazee. If on the contrary, the seller does not take back the first house until after the Kazee has decreed the Shaffa of the second to the purchaser, his [the purchaser’s] right of Shaffa is not invalidation; because, at the time it was decreed, the house from which it was derived was his property; and (as we have already observed) after the decree of the Kazee has passed, it is no longer necessary that he preserve his right of property in that house from which he derived his right of Shaffa.

A right of Shaffa is not created by partners making a partition of their joint property.—If two or more partners divide the ground in which they have hitherto held a joint property, the privilege of Shaffa cannot be claimed by any neighbour; because, although the division of joint property bear the characteristic of an exchange, yet it also bears the characteristic of a separation, namely, a separation of the rights of possession from those of others, a thing which may be done by compulsion, since any one of the partners may cause it to be effected by an application, to the Kazee, notwithstanding it be contrary to the inclination of the others. It is not
CHAPTER IV.

OF CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH INVALIDATE THE RIGHT OF SHAFFA.

A right of Shaffa is invalidated by the Shafee omitting to procure evidence in due time. — If the Shafee omit to procure evidence of his having claimed his Shaffa on being informed of the sale, notwithstanding his ability so to do, his right of Shaffa is void, because of his neglecting to claim it — in the same manner also, if he prefer the Talb Mawasibat, or immediate claim, and omit the Talb Ish-had wa Takze, notwithstanding his ability to make it, his right of Shaffa is void, as has been already explained.

Or by his offering to compound it. — If the Shafee agree to compound his privilege of Shaffa for a compensation, he thereby invalidates his right, and is not entitled to the compensation; for he has no established right or property in the place in dispute, but merely a power of insisting on becoming the proprietor exclusion of the purchaser: and as, therefore, a remuneration of Shaffa (understood in renouncing all right to disturb the proprietor in the enjoyment of the property) is not a subject of exchange, it follows that no consideration can be demanded for it. At most, moreover, the relinquishment of the right could not lawfully be suspended even up in a valid condition, that is, a condition proper to it (such as a stipulation of giving something in return which is not property), it follows that it cannot be lawfully suspended upon an invalid condition, or condition not proper to it (such as a condition of giving up property in return for a mere right, which is not property), a fortiori. The condition of a return is therefore null, and the relinquishment of the right remains valid without a return: — and the case of a person selling his right of Shaffa is subject to the same rule. — It is otherwise in a case of compensation for retaliation; because retaliation is a right established against the person of the murderer in behalf of the representative of the murdered, who is the avenger of his blood. — It is also otherwise with respect to a consideration received for manumission or divorce, because that is a consideration for a right of property established in the subject of the manumission or divorce. — Analogous to the case of relinquishment of Shaffa for a compensation by composition is that where a man says to his wife, being under an option of divorce: "Choose me, for one thousand dirhams," or where an impotent person tells his wife that "if she will relinquish her right of dissolving the marriage he will give her one thousand dirhams," for if, in either of these cases, the wife accept the proposal, she forfeits the power she possessed, and the husband cannot be compelled to pay the composition — bail for the person, also (commonly termed Hazir Zaminees), bears a resemblance to Shaffa in this particular; for if a person who is bail for the appearance of a debtor apply to the creditor and prevail upon him to compromise with him, by relinquishing his claim on him as security, for a certain compensation, the surety is in this case released from his engagement, and at the same time is not liable for the compensation. This is one tradition. According to another tradition, the surety can neither be made liable for the compensation, nor yet released from his engagement of bail. Some also, contend that this last is the case with respect to Shaffa, whilst others maintain that the rule applies to bail only.

Or by the death of the Shafee before the Kazee's decree. — If the Shafee die, his right of Shaffa becomes extinct Shafei maintains that the right of Shaffa is hereditary. — The compiler of the Hidayat remarks that this difference of opinion obtains only where the Shafee dies after he has sold, but previous to the Kazee decreeing him the Shaffa; for if he die after the Kazee has decreed his Shaffa, without having paid the price, or obtained possession of the property sold, his right devolves to his heirs, who become liable for the price. The argument of our doctors upon the point in which they differ from Shafée is, that the death of the Shafée extinguished his right in the property from which he derived his privilege of Shafée; and the property does not devolve to his heirs until after the sale. Besides, it is an express condition of Shafée, that a man be firmly possessed of the property from which he derives his right of Shafée at the time when the subject of it is sold, a condition which does not hold on the part of the heirs. It is, moreover, a condition that the property of the Shafée remain firm until the decree of the Kazee be passed; and as this does not hold on the part of the deceased Shafée, the Shafée is therefore not established with respect to any one of his descendants, because of the failure of its conditions.

It is not invalidated by the death of the purchaser, and therefore cannot be disposed of on his behalf. — If the purchaser die, yet the right of Shafée is not extinguished, for the Shafée who is entitled to it still exists, and no alteration has taken place in the reasons or grounds of his right. The house, therefore, is not to be sold for the payment of the purchaser’s debts, or disposed of according to his testament; and if the Kazee or executor sell it in order to discharge the debts of the estate, or if the purchaser have bequeathed it, the Shafée may render as of these transactions void, and may take the house; for the right of the Shafée is antecedent, whence he has the power of annulling the purchaser’s acts with respect to the property, even during his lifetime.

It is invalidated by the Shafée selling the property, whence he derived his right. — If the Shafée previous to the decree of the Kazee sell the house from which he derives his right of Shafée, the reasons or grounds of his right being thereby extinguished, the right itself is invalidated, notwithstanding he be ignorant of the sale of the house to which the right is connected; and at the same time as where a man relinquishes his Shafée without being informed of the sale, or acquires a person of a debt without knowing the amount; in the first of which cases the right of Shafée is invalidated, and in the second the debtor is acquitted. It is otherwise where the Shafée sells his house upon a condition of option: for as, whilst a power of option remains in the seller, his property is not totally extinguished, it follows that the ground of Shafée (namely, a conjunction of property) still continues.

Or by his acting as agent for the seller. — If the Shafée act as agent of the seller, and sell the house on his behalf, his right of Shafée is thereby invalidated; whereas, if he act as agent for the purchaser, and purchase the house on his behalf, his right of Shafée is not invalidated. In short, it is a rule, that if a person, an agent for another sell the land, &c. of that other, the right of Shafée in both is thereby invalidated: whereas, if an agent (such as a manager, for instance) purchase land, or so forth, the right of both continues unaffected; for the former, if he were afterwards to contest his right, must in so doing labour to annul the sale which was completed by him,—whereas the latter, in so doing does not annul the purchase made by him, the taking of a property in virtue of Shafée being itself a sort of purchase. In the same manner also, if the Shafée become Zamín be’I Dirk, or bail for what may happen. * by engaging to be responsible to the purchaser for the amount of the price in case the house should afterwards prove the right of another person, his right of Shafée is thereby invalidated. So also, if a man sell a house, stipulating the option of a third person, meaning the Shafée, and he [the Shafée] confirm the sale, he thereby forfeits his right of Shafée; whereas, if a man purchase a house, stipulating the option of a third person, who is the Shafée, and he [the Shafée] confirm the purchase, his right of Shafée is not invalidated.

He may resume his right where he had relinquished it upon misinformation concerning the price. — If intelligence be brought to the Shafée, of the house which is the subject of his right being sold for one thousand dirms, and he relinquish his right of Shafée, and afterwards learn that the house was sold for a less price, his resignation is not binding, and he may still assert his right of Shafée, for it was the dearness of the price which induced him to resign; but upon the diminution of the price becoming known, the reason of his resignation no longer exists, and it is consequently void. In the same manner also, if news be brought that the house is sold for one thousand dirms, and the Shafée afterwards learn that it was sold for a quantity of wheat or barley equivalent to one thousand dirms, or even more, his resignation is void, and he may still take his Shafée; because it is to be supposed that his reason for resigning it was his inability to furnish the amount of the price in that species (namely, dirms) for which he first heard the house was sold; but upon his understanding that it was sold for wheat or barley, it is probable that he may be able to furnish the quantity, since it frequently happens that men who are unable to pay one thousand dirms are capable of furnishing an equivalent, or even more than an equivalent, in barley or wheat. This rule also holds regarding every other article sold by weight or measure, or which differs so little in its species that it may be sold by number (such as eggs or walnuts), in the same manner as with respect to barley or wheat. It is otherwise with respect to goods or effects; for if the Shafée, hearing that the house is sold for one thousand dirms, resign his right, and afterwards learn that it was sold for goods.

* For an explanation of this phrase see Vol. II. p. 255.
equal in value to one thousand dirms, or more, his resignation is nevertheless binding, and he not entitled to his Shaffa, because he would in this case be liable for the price of the goods, which consists of dirms and deenars.—So, likewise, his resignation is binding if he afterwards learn that the house was sold for a certain number of deenars equivalent to one thousand dirms, or more.

Or the purchaser.—If the Shaffa be first informed that a particular person is the purchaser, and thereupon resign his Shaffa, and he afterwards learn that the purchaser was another person, he is still entitled to his Shaffa, because a man might not wish to have one person for his neighbour, although he may very readily choose to have another. In the same manner also, if he afterwards learn that two persons are the purchasers (viz, the one who was first he first heard of, and another), he is entitled to take his Shaffa from the one in whose favour he had not resigned it.

Or where he has been misinformed concerning the article sold.—If news be brought to the Shaffa that one half of the house is sold and he resign his right, and it afterwards appear that the whole was sold, he must still in such case claim his Shaffa, since it is to be supposed that he at first resigned his right in order to avoid the convenience of a partner, whereas if the whole be sold there is no occasion for his being a subject to any such inconvenience. If, on the contrary, the case be reversed, that is to say, if he first learn that that the whole, and afterwards that only the half is sold, he is not (according to the Zahir Rawayet) entitled to claim his Shaffa, because his resignation of the whole comprehended his resignation of a part.

Section.

Device by which the right of Shaffa may be evaded.—Where a man sells the whole of his house, excepting only the breadth of one yard eiding along the house of the Shaffa, he is not in this case entitled to claim his privilege, because of his neighbourhood being thus cut off. This is a device by which the Shaffa may be disappointed of his right; and it is still the same, if the seller grant the intervening part of his house as a free gift to the purchaser, and put him in possession of it.

Case of a house purchased in shares, by the same person, at different times.—If a man purchase, first, a share of a house, such as a third or a fourth, and afterwards the remainder,—the neighbour has the privilege of Shaffa over that share which was first bought, but not over that which was last bought: for although, as being a neighbour, he is entitled to that privilege over both, still the purchaser has a superior right to the Shaffa of the remainder of the house, as being a partner therein, the right of a partner superseding that of a neighbour, as has been already explained. If, therefore, a man wish to disappoint a neighbour of his right of Shaffa, he may do it by first purchasing a part of the house, for the price he means to give for the whole, excepting only a single dirms, which he may afterwards as price of the remainder.

Where the price of the property sold is compromised for a specific article, the Shaffa, if he insists on his right, must pay the price.

If a man purchase a house for a certain price, and afterwards, in lieu of that price, give a Jamma, or gown; to the seller, the Shaffa must take the house for the price first settled, and not for the value of the gown; for the exchanging the price for the gown was a distinct and separate bargain; and the price which the Shaffa is to pay is on account of the house, not on account of the gown. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this also is a device, by which the right of Shaffa, either of a partner or a neighbour, may be eluded; as the house may be sold for a price equal to twice its value, and then, in lieu of that price, a gown may be given to the seller equal to the real value of the house. Such an evasion, however, may be productive of loss to the seller in case the house should afterwards prove to have been the right of another; for then the purchaser of the house is entitled to receive back, from the purchaser of the gown (that is, the seller of the house); the whole price of the house, which was much more than adequate to its value; the bargain regarding the gown remaining un-dissolved. There is, indeed, one mode by which the seller may avoid the risk of such a loss; and that is, by purchasing, in lieu of the number of dirms for which the house was sold, a quantity of deenars.—for, as this is a Sirf sale, it follows that upon the right of another appearing to the house, the agreement becomes null, as mutual seized, which is a condition of Sirf sale, does not here exist; because as it here appears that the seller was not entitled to the price of the house in lieu of what he purchased or accepted deenars, he is obliged to restore the deenars, but nothing more.

A device, as above described, for eluding the privilege of Shaffa, is not abominated by Aboo Yoosaf. According to Muhammad, however, it is abominable; because (as he argues) the privilege of Shaffa is instituted solely with a view to prevent the inconvenience which might otherwise ensue to the Shaffa; but if devices are admitted to elude and set at nought his privilege, the inconveniences which may ensue will not be prevented, and the end of the institution will be defeated. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is, that as the above devices prevent the right of Shaffa from ever being established, the inconveniences that may accrue to the Shaffa ought not to be considered.

Section

MISCELLANEOUS CASES.

The Shaffa may take a share from one of several purchasers: but if there be several sellers, and only one purchaser, he must take or relinquish the whole.—In five persons purchase a house from one man, the Shafee may take the proportion of any one of them. If, on the contrary, one man purchase a house from five persons, the Shafee may either take or relinquish the whole, but is not entitled to take any particular share or proportion. The difference between these two cases is that if, in the latter instance, the Shafee were allowed to claim a part, it would occasion a discrimination in the bargain to the purchaser, and be productive of very great inconvenience to him; whereas in the former instance, the Shafee being merely the substitute of one of the five purchasers, no discrimination in the bargain is occasioned. There is no difference in the law in either of these cases, whether in making the purchase, a certain proportion of the price had been set against each proportion of the house, or whether one price had been in general terms agreed upon for the whole; for the law is grounded only upon the discrimination in the bargain. Neither is there any difference whether the Shafee take his right before the purchaser has obtained possession; or delay it until after.—This is approved.

A licensed slave (involved in debt) and his master may be Shafee to each other's property.—If a man being possessed of a Mazon [licensed] slave, involved in debt, sell his house, that slave may be the Shafee of it. And in the same manner also, if such a slave sell a house, his master may be the Shafee of it, for the act of taking a property by privilege of Shaffe stands as a purchase, and purchase and the sale is admitted betwixt them, as being attended with advantage since it is here considered to be on behalf of the creditors. It is otherwise where the slave is not involved in debt, for then if he sell a house, it is on account of his master, and the man on whose account the house is sold cannot be the Shaffe.

Act of a father or guardian with respect to the Shaffe of an infant ward.—If a father or guardian resign the right of Shaffe belonging to their infant ward, such resignation is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf and Haneefa. Mohammad and Ziffer say that it is not lawful, and that the right of the infant Shafee being still extant, he is entitled to claim it as soon as he attains maturity. The learned in the law observe that there is the same difference of opinion in the case of a father or guardian resigning to make the Shaffe of Shajee on being apprised of the sale of the house;—or of an agent resigning the claim before the tribunal of the Kazee. The arguments used by Mohammad and Ziffer are twofold.—First, it is alleged that the right of Shaffe being firmly established in the infant, the father or guardian have not the power of annulling it, any more than of annulling his right to a fine of blood or retaliation.—Secondly, their authority over the affairs of the infant is vested in them in order that they may prevent him from suffering and injury: and if the father or guardian, in order to make the Shaffe of Shajee he should occasion an injury instead of preventing one. The arguments, on the other hand, in support of the doctrine of Aboo Yoosaf and Haneefa are likewise twofold—First, the taking by privilege of Shaffe is virtually traffic, since it stands as purchase; and the father or guardian may therefore reject it, in the same manner as a thing offered for sale.—Secondly, the taking by privilege of Shaffe...

CHAPTER I.

Partition involves a separation, in articles of weight or measurement of capacity. --The partition of things held in joint property is lawful and valid, because the Prophet was accustomed to make a partition of plunder and hereditaments: and it is moreover a practice which no one pretends to controvert. It is to be observed, however, that partition may be received in two senses; for, con-dered in one view, it is separation, as it separates or distinguishes the right of one man from that of another; and considered in another view it is an exchange; because, the share or portion which falls to one of the parties in consequence of the partition is partly his own original right; but part of it was the right of the other during their joint property; and this he receives in lieu of that part of his own right, which remains involved in the other's share. It is more particularly a separation with respect to articles of weight or measurement of capacity such as wheat or silver, because of the similitude of their parts; or of those articles do not differ in their properties, the end to be answered by one parcel of wheat or silver being just the same as by another (since there is nothing in the one that was not in the other), it follows that each person receives his entire right, and nothing is left in the share of the one which of right belongs to the other:--whence it is that one partner may lawfully take his share during the absence of the other; and also, that if two men make a joint purchase of any article of weight or measurement of capacity, and afterwards divide it each may separately sell the share which falls to him for a determinate profit on half the original price.

And an exchange, in articles of dissimilar parts or unities. --It is, on the other hand, more particularly an exchange with respect to articles dissimilar in their parts or unities, such as animals or household goods; --whence it is that one of two partners in such articles cannot lawfully take his share in the absence of the other; and also, that if two men buy any thing of this species, and afterwards make a division, they cannot separately sell their respective shares at determinate profit on half the original cost. Here, however, if those articles be all of one particular species, such as a herd of goats, the Kazee, at the requisition of one of the partners, must enforce a partition; for the properties of all the goats being nearly the same, such a partition is, in effect only a separation; and the intention of such an equsition being, that the partner who makes it may enjoy the use of his own share solely, without any other person being able to interfere in his property, it is incumbent on the Kazee to comply with his requisition. Where, on the contrary, the joint property consists of articles of different species, the Kazee must not enforce a partition, as it cannot be made equitably where such partial things differ from the rest in properties—if, however, both the partners consent to a partition of things of various species, it is lawful.

The magistrate must appoint a public partitioner; and must appoint him a salary,—It is incumbent on the Kazee to appoint a person to make partitions, and to settle on him an allowance from the public treasury, so as that partitions may be made for the people without his receiving any hire; because, as the making of partitions is a part of the duty of the Kazee himself (it being necessary in order to terminate dispute), the allowance of the person appointed for this purpose must be defrayed from the public treasury, in the same manner as those of the Kazee: and also because, as the appointment of a person to make the partition is a benefit which extends to all Musulmans, the charge of his maintenance must be defrayed from the public treasury, which is the property of all.

Or establish a particular rate of hire for his work.—If it be not in the power of the Kazee to settle the allowance from the public treasury, he must at all events appoint a person who will make the partition for a certain rate of hire, to be paid by the parties who are concerned and particularly benefited by the division. In this case, the rate must be moderate and fixed, so that the partitioner may not be able to make exorbitant demands.—It is, however, more eligible that his allowances be paid from the public treasury, as this is easier for the people in general, and precludes, in a greater degree, the imputations of corruption and injustice.

The partitioner must be just, and skilful.—The partitioner must be a man noted for justice and integrity; and he must also possess a knowledge of that particular business.

But must not always be the same person.—The magistrate must not compel the people always to accept of one particular person for their partitioner; because the transaction which passes betwixt the partners and the partitioner is a species of contract; and it is not lawful to compel any person to enter into a contract;—and also, because, if such a practice were admitted, the person possessing the exclusive appointment would demand an immoderate rate of hire.

The partners may agree to procure a partition, or requisition (in the case of an infant) an order from the magistrate.—It is lawful for several partners to agree amongst themselves, and to make a division of their joint property. But if there be an infant among them, it is requisite that they procure an order from the magistrate; for they possess no power over the infant.

One public partitioner cannot be concerned with another.—The Kazee must not suffer the persons employed in making partition to be concerned together in the hire or profit arising from their business, such a conjunction tending to raise the hire to an exorbitant rate; for each of them, when applied to, will make some excuse for declining the employment, and they will refer the party who has occasion for their services from one to another, until at length he be constrained to consent to immoderate terms;—whereas, if every man is concerned only for himself, each will readily consent to be employed for a moderate hire, rather than lose it altogether.

The partitioner is paid in proportion to the number of claimants.—The rate of wages to a partitioner is regulated by the number of persons for whom the division is made, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is determined in proportion to their respective shares the wages of the partitioner being on account of their property, and therefore determined according to its extent, like the wages of a public weigher, or a measurer, or of a person who digs a well to be held, in joint property,—or like the maintenance of a slave belonging to several partners. The argument of Haneefa is, that the wages of the partition are given to him for discriminating and separating the shares, in doing which it signifies not whether the shares be large or small, since the shares of the inferior partner is distinguished and severed by his work, as well as that of him who holds a large proportion. It moreover sometimes happens that the labour in calculating a small share is more than in ascertaining a large share; and sometime the reverse; hence it is difficult to determine how far the one or the other is attended with the most trouble; and therefore the hire must be referred to the mere act of dividing off or discriminating. It is otherwise in digging a well; for, in that instance, the wages are on account of digging and carrying away the earth, in which there is difference in the labour performed for each partner's proportion. With respect to weighing or measuring, if those be performed in order to effect a partition of any thing (such as what held in partnership) it is affirmed by some that the same difference of opinion subsists betwixt Haneefa and the two disciples:—but if they be performed merely to ascertain the quantity of the whole or for any other purpose than partition, the wages are then on account of the weighing or measuring, which is greater in the larger than in the smaller share. There is also another opinion maintained upon the authority of Haneefa, that the hire of the partitioner falls entirely upon the one who solicits the partition, and not on the one who has not solicited it, because of its being advantageous to the one, but not to the other.

In the distribution of hereditaments, the magistrate must previously ascertain the circumstances.—When several co-partners appear before the Kazee, and represent that a tenement or piece of ground which is in their possession has devolved to them as the heirs of a certain person, the Kazee must not make a partition of the house or ground unless he has proved, by witnesses, if the death of the person, and the number of his heirs. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that if they all concur, the Kazee may make the partition, taking care, however, to insert in the Kissmat Namma, or deed of partition, that it was made in consequence of their declarations.

But not if the property consist of moveables.—If, on the contrary, the joint property be moveables and not lands or tenements, and the parties represent that it is their inheritance the Kazee may, on their representation, order the partition.

Nor in the case of property acquired by purchase.—Or, if the joint property be lands or tenements, and they represent that they acquired it by purchase, the Kazee may order a partition. The argument of the two disciples is, that possession is an apparent proof of property, and the concurrent declaration of all the parties with respect to their several claims is a proof of their veracity. Besides, there is no person who either disputes or denies their allegations; and where there is no denial the law require no evidence. Hence the Kazee must order the partition in the instance above mentioned, as well as in cases which relate to moveable property acquired by inheritance, or landed property acquired by purchase. It is requisite, however: that he specify, in the deed of partition, that it has been made in consequence of their declarations, in order that his decree may extend only to those who have attended, and not to others who may (perhaps) afterwards appear. The argument of Haneefa is, that the order which the Kazee gives for the partition is in fact a decree against the defunct, by which his right is terminated; for until a partition take place, the hereditaments are still considered as his estate; insomuch that if any increase be produced upon it, such increase is subject to the will of the deceased declared in his testament, or is appropriated to the payment of his debts, neither of which could be the case after partition has been made. The partition, therefore, being in fact a decree of the Kazee affecting the defunct, the concurrence of a part of the claimants to the suit of the others is not admitted as an argument of sufficient weight; and hence they must support their claims against the defunct by evidence; in which case a part of the heirs are considered as litigants on behalf of the defunct.

Objection.—A part of the heirs cannot be considered as litigants on behalf of the defunct, since each individual acknowledges the claims of the others and a man who acknowledges another's claim cannot be regarded as his opponent.

Reply.—A part of the heirs may be considered as litigants on behalf of the defunct, although they do acknowledge the claims of the others, their acknowledgment being of no weight—in the same manner as where a man sues for a debt against an estate, and an heir or executor acknowledges his claim, in which case such acknowledgment, as being to the detriment of the others, is not sufficient, but the claimant must produce evidence before the Kazee in his suit, even against that heir or executor, before he can establish his claim against the estate in general to the prejudice of the whole of the heirs. The acknowledgment of the heir or executor being therefore of no weight, he may, with propriety, be considered as an opponent or litigant.

What is here mentioned is the law with respect to immoveable property * It is otherwise with respect to moveable property; † because that requires care in keeping, and there is an advantage arising from the immediate partition of it; whereas immoveable property, being by its nature safe, requires no care;—besides, the person in whose possession moveable property remains is responsible for it; whereas (according to Haneefa) he is not so with regard to immoveable property. It is also otherwise with respect to immoveable property acquired by purchase; because an article sold is no longer accounted the property of the seller, although it still remain undivided; and the partition of it, therefore, cannot be regarded as a decree of the Kazee, passed against an absent person, by which his right is terminated.

Nor in case of a partition being demanded without the parties specifying the manner in which the joint property was acquired.—If the joint owners of a property request a partition of it, without specifying whether it was acquired by inheritance, or by purchase, or by any other means the Kazee may order the partition, this being, in fact, not a decree against another person, since no other is acknowledged by them. The author of this work says, that this adjudication is to be found in the Kitab al Kissmat.* It is mentioned in the Jama Sagheer that when two men apply for a partition of lands which they prove by witnesses to be in their possession, the Kazee must not order the partition until they also prove, by evidence, that the lands are their property; for otherwise it is possible that they may belong to another person.

Some say that this is agreeable to the opinion of Haneefa alone;—but others aver that it is agreeable to the opinion of all the learned; and this is approved, since it is unnecessary to order the partition of landed property in order to preserve it. Besides, the right of property being the ground on which partition is made, it cannot take place until that right be established by evidence

A partition may be granted on the requisit and testimony of any two heirs; but an agent or guardian must be appointed to the charge of the affairs of infant heirs.—Where two heirs appear and produce evidence to prove the death of their ancestor, and the number of his heirs, and the house or other inheritance is in their possession, but one of the heirs is absent,— in this case the Kazee may order a partition, if the heirs who attend require it, appointing an agent to take possession of the portion of the absentee; or if, under the same circumstances, one of the heirs be an infant, the Kazee may order a partition, appointing a guardian to take possession of his portion;— because in so doing the interest of the infant or absentee is promoted.—(But here likewise the production of evidence is indispensable, according to Haneefa, in opposition to the opinion of the two disciples, as before stated)
It would be otherwise if they had become proprietors of the house by purchase; for in that case no partition could be made in the absence of any of the partners. This distinction between the case of property acquired by inheritance and property acquired by purchase is made on the following grounds.

—An infant, or the heir of an ancestor stated as his substitute, is to return, that he has the power of returning (on discovering a defect) any thing which his ancestor may have bought, or, in like manner, he may be comppelled (on the discovery of defect) to take back any thing which his ancestor may have sold; and he is likewise subject to become deceived † in consequence of the purchases of his ancestors (that is to say, if the ancestor purchase a female slave and die, and the heir afterwards have a son by her,
and the slave then prove the property of another person, the son born of her is free, but the heir must pay the value of him to the proprietor of the slave, and he may again recover it from the person who sold the slave.

hammed, the disciple of Haneefa.

term has been fully explained elsewhere.

in the same manner as if he were the ancestor who made the purchase). One of the heirs, therefore, stands as litigant on behalf of the ancestor, and the other is litigant on his own behalf; and the partition, under such circumstances, is in fact a decree passed in the presence of both the parties. The purchaser, on the contrary, becomes the proprietor of the thing bought by a recent title of property, and not in the manner of a substitute, insomuch that he cannot, on discovering a defect, return the article to the person from whom the late seller had before bought it.
Hence neither of the two present purchasers can stand as litigant on behalf of an absentee.
Thus there is an evident difference between the two cases.

And it cannot be granted where the pro-

erty, or any part of it, is held by an absent heir, or his trustee, or an infant.—If the land,* or a part of it, be in the possession of the absentee, or of his heir, or of his agent, and in the possession of an infant heir, the partition must not be ordered, whether the heirs who are not produce the evidence or not. This may proved; for the partition, in such a case, would in fact be a decree of the Kazee again an absentee, or an infant, divesting them of something they possess without any litigant appearing on their behalf;—nor can the trustee of the absentee stand as litigant on his behalf in any thing which may be attended with loss to him;—an it is illegal in the Kazee to pass a decree without all the litigants being present as trustees.

If only one heir appear, a partition must not be ordered, although he produce the necessary evidence, for it is requisite that both the litigants be present; and one man cannot stand as litigant on both sides. It is otherwise where two appear, as has been already shown.

The partition may be ordered although one of the requiring parties be an infant, or, one an infant heir, and the other a legatee.—If two heirs appear, one an adult, and the other an infant, the Kazee must appoint a guardian to the infant, and order the partition as soon as evidence is produced; and in the same manner, if an adult heir appear, and also a legatee of one third of the estate, and they demand a partition, and produce evidence (one to prove that he is heir, and the other that he is legatee), the Kazee must order the partition; for in each of these cases the litigating parties are both supposed to appear,—the adult heir being litigant on the part of the deceased, and the legatee on his own behalf,—and, in the same manner, the guardian being litigant on behalf of the infant,—whence it may be said that the infant (as it were) has appeared in his own proper person as an adult, because of the guardian being his substitute.

to be understood throughout).
CHAPTER II.

OF THINGS WHICH ARE FIT OBJECTS

OF PARTITION.

An estate may be distributed on the requisition of any one partner, whose share separately is capable of being converted to use;—Where the respective share of each of the partners is capable of being separately converted to use, if any one of them demand a partition it must be granted; because partition is an indisputable right, when required in any article capable of partition; as has been before explained. If, on the contrary, the share of one partner only be fit for use, and not that of the other, because of its being extremely small, and the owner of the greater share demand a partition, the Kazee must grant it; but he must not grant it at the requisition of the other partner; for as the former can receive a benefit from his share, his demand is worthy of regard; but as the latter can have no other motives for his requisition than malice, and a desire of giving trouble, it is not to be attended to. Khasaf holds the reverse of this doctrine, 'because (says he) the great partner, in making his demand, occasions an injury to another, whereas the small partner, in making his demand, submits to his own injury.'—Hakim Shaheed, on the other hand, mentions in his abridgment, that the Kazee must order the partition at the request of either of the partners; for as the great partner is desirous of enjoying the use of his share, and the small partner voluntarily submits to his own injury." The first of these opinions, however, is the most authentic.

If the shares be separately useless, the assent of all the parties is requisite.—If the shares of each of the partners be so very small that they would separately be of no use, the Kazee must not order a partition unless both partners acquiesce; for whenever partition is compulsively made, it is with a view to promote utility; but, in the present instance, all utility would be destroyed by it, and therefore it cannot take place without the consent of both the partners, as they must necessarily be the best judges in a matter which concerns themselves, and the Kazee can only be guided by appearances.

A partition must be ordered where the property consists of articles of one species (not being land or money).—When the joint property is Arooz* (that is, neither dirms, deneers, lands, nor houses), the Kazee must order the partition, provided it [the property in question] be all of one species, such as are used for the measurement of capacity, or simillars of tale, or gold, silver, iron, or copper, or cattle of one species, whether camels, oxen, or goats; for as, in this case, there can be no difference in the design, the partition may be effected with equity, and utility may thereby be accomplished.

But not where it consists of various species.—The Kazee must not order a partition when the joint property is of various species, such as a camel and a goat, or a house and an ass; because, as articles of different species cannot be indiscriminately blended, the partition, in this instance would not be a separation and distinction, but rather an exchange, which must always be effected by a mutual concurrence of the parties, not by the decree of a magistrate.

Or of household vessels.—The Kazee must not order a partition of household vessels, as those are subject to the rule of diversity of species, because of difference of workmanship.

A partition may be made of cloth of an equal quality.—He may make a partition of Herat cloths, as these are uniform in quality; but he must not make it of a single piece of cloth which is not uniformly alike throughout; for the division of one piece or cloth occasions an injury, as it cannot be effected without cutting it; neither must he make a partition of two pieces of cloth where they are of unequal value. It is otherwise where there are three pieces, the value of one of which is equal to that of the other two: or where the value of one of them is one dirm, that of another one dirm and a quarter, and that of the third one dirm and three quarters; for, in the first case, he must give one piece to the one partner, and the other two to the other partner; and, in the second case, he must give to one of the partners the second piece, valued at one dirm and a quarter; to the other the third piece, valued at one dirm and three quarters, and must leave the first still to be held in partnership, one fourth appropriated to one partner, and three fourths to the other, as it is lawful to divide a part of a joint property, and to leave a part undivided.

But not of jewels or slaves.—Haneefa is of opinion that slaves and jewels must not be divided by the Kazee, because of the great difference which is to be found amongst them. The two disciples hold, that he may make a division of slaves, for this reason, that they are of one species, like camels, or goats, or captives taken in war. The argument of Haneefa is, that among the individuals of the human species there is a wide difference, because of their various characteristics; and hence slaves are, in effect, of different kinds. It is otherwise among animals, for with them there is little difference to be found betwixt the individuals of the same genus; and although the male and female of the human race be held as different species, yet the male and female amongst animals are reckoned as the same species. It is also different with respect to slaves taken in war, as it is in their value that the captors hold a right, whence it is lawful for the Sultan to sell them and make a division of the price; whereas, in a case of partnership, the right of the partners is connected with the substance of the article, as well as with the property it involves. Hence there is a difference betwixt plunder and partnership—some are of opinion that jewels cannot be divided when they are of different species, such as pearls and rubies, Others say, that where the jewels are of large grains they cannot be divided, because of the great difference that may be betwixt them; but that when the grains are small, the difference being inconceivable, the jewels may be divided. Others, again, maintain that no jewels, whether of small or large grains, can be divided, because the difference betwixt them, and the difficulty of ascertaining their value, is greater than in the case of slaves, inasmuch that if a man marry a woman, and in general terms stipulate to give pearls or rubies as her dower, such stipulation is invalid;—whereas if he stipulate, in general terms, to give slaves, it is valid. The Kazee, therefore, is not to exert his authority in making a partition of jewels.

Partition cannot be made of a bath, mill, or well, without the consent of all the parties—The Kazee must not order the partition of a joint mill, bath, or well, unless with the concurrence of all the partner (and such also is the rule with respect to a wall which stands betwixt two houses); for if, in the latter cases, a partition were to take place, it would be injurious to all parties, as the individual share of each would then be useless.

Partition of houses and tenements.—It is proper to remark, that a single roofed place, surrounded with walls, with a door or entry, is termed a Bait, or room. A Manzil, or tenement, on the contrary, is a place composed of different rooms, a roofed court,* and a kitchen, such as a man may reside in with his family. A Dar, or house, on the other hand, is a place consisting of various rooms or tenements, with an open court. A tenement is then-fore superior to a room, and inferior to a house. These are the definitions of Shims-al Ayma in his book on Shafia. In this work, whenever the general word Khanna [house] is used, we mean such an one as we have now described, under the denomination of Dar, excepting only where we mention an under house in contradistinction to an upper house. These are the definitions of Shims-al Ayma in his book on Shafia. In this work, whenever the general word Khanna [house] is used, we mean such an one as we have now described, under the denomination of Dar, excepting only where we mention an under house in contradistinction to an upper house, and then we only mean a Bait or a Manzil.

If there were several houses held in partnership or coparcenary in one city, each house must be separately divided, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say, that if it be expedient for the partners the whole of the houses must be united in one general partition, and not divided separately. All the houses, therefore, must be considered merely as one house, or consisting of various apartments, and all the shares of each partner must consequently centre in one of the houses, so that it may be his entirely. The same difference of opinion subsists regarding the case of lands held in partnership or coparcenary, and disposed in different situations. The argument of the two disciples is, that all the houses are, on the one hand, of one species with respect to name, appearance, and original design, as on the other hand, they are of different species with regard to their particular qualities, and their commodiousness for habitation, which depends on size; and so forth; whence it must be left to the Kazee to determine their different degrees of superiority. The argument of Haneefa is, that regard should be paid only to what they are in reality, with respect to their qualities; and that in them they may greatly differ on account of the difference of the cities, lanes, or neighbourhood, in which they are situated, and their proximity to or distance from water or a mosque; and that therefore it is impossible to observe an equality in the partition without dividing each house separately;—whence it is that a man cannot appoint an agent to purchase a house in general terms,—and so likewise, that if a man marry, assigning as a dower 'a house' (in general terms), his mention of the house is invalid,—as holds where a man assigns 'cloths' (generally) as a dower, or appoints an agent to purchase 'cloths.'—It is otherwise with respect to a single house, held in partnership or coparcenary, composed of different rooms; for as, in such case, to divide each room amongst the copartners would be productive of inconvenience to all; the whole house is therefore divided at once.

When two houses held in partnership, are situated in different towns, we learn from Illilal that it is the concurrent opinion of Haneefa and Abu Yousaf that both houses shall be divided separately. Mohammed, on the contrary, maintains that they must be divided at once, as well as the houses situated in the same town.

Rooms, whether situated all in the same quarter, or in different quarters, must be divided at once, for the difference amongst them is inconceivable Manazil Molazika (that is to say, adjoining tenements, or such as are in the same house, one part of them being contiguous to another), are considered as rooms; whereas, Manazil Motbayena (which is the term used for apartments not adjoining, in contradistinction to the other), are considered as houses. If a Manzil or tenement being the middle term betwixt a house and a room, and resembling both. If there be a partnership in immovable property of two species such as in a house and a piece of ground, or in a house and a shop, the Kazee must divide each separately, they being of different species.
CHAPTER III.

OF THE MODE OF ACCOMPLISHING PARTITION.

The partitioner must draw a plan; and must make the distribution equitably by measurement. That is incumbent upon the partitioner to draw on paper a plan of the thing which he divides, so that it may remain on his memory. — He must likewise observe an equality in the partition, that is to say, he must divide the article into due proportions; and it is also recorded that he ought to separate each share and measure it, so that its extent may be known. He must, moreover, appraise the article, as it is requisite, for his further guidance, that the value be ascertained.

Partition of houses how accomplished. — Supposing the article to be a house, in separating the shares he must also separate the road and the drain belonging to it, if possible, so that one share may no longer have any connexion with the other, in order that every cause of dispute may be terminated, and that the intention of partition may be completely accomplished. In doing this he must term one share the first share, that which lies next to it the second, and that which lies next to it the third share, and so on; and he must then write down their names, and draw them like lots; and he that draws the first name gets the first share, he that draws the second gets the second share, and so on to the end. The article must, moreover, be divided into fractions equal to the smallest proportion; that is to say, if the smallest proportion held by any of the partners or copartners be a third, the whole must be divided into three parts; or if the smallest proportion be a sixth, the whole must be divided into six parts; so that the division may be made accurately. Thus, if an estate is to be divided betwixt two heirs, the one being the son and the other the daughter, it must be divided into three shares, one termed the first, the next to it the second, and the next the third; and the partitioner is to write the names upon billets, and cause them to be drawn like lots; and if the son's name come up first, he gets the first share, and the one next to it, and the third goes to the daughter; — or, if the daughter's name come up first, she gets the first share, and the other two fall to the son.

The drawing of lots is proposed in order to give satisfaction to the parties, and to prevent the partitioner from being influenced by partiality or favour. It is not, however, absolutely necessary; and if the partitioner chooses to appoint a particular share to each, it is valid; for the making the partition is an act of magistracy, and the authority of the partitioner must therefore be enforced.

In the partition of landed property, a composition in money cannot be admitted. — The partitioner, in making a division of landed property, must not annex a consideration in dirms or deernars without the concurrence of the parties; that is to say, if he make one share less than the other, and, as a compensation, annex to it a sum in dirms, it is not valid, unless they consent; — for the partnership is not in dirms, and partition is in the right of the individual concerned; if dirms be admitted into the transaction it destroys the equality of the partition; because one of the partners gets the property; and is liable for the dirms which have become the right of the other; and there is a possibility that he may never pay them, by which means the other would lose his right. Partition of a house, with a piece of ground: — If the partnership property consist of two things, namely a house, and a piece of ground each, according to Aboo Y. osaf, must be divided separately, agreeably to its value; for it is only by ascertaining the value of each that an equality can be observed in the partition. It is recorded from Haneefa that the ground may be divided agreeably to its measurement, and afterwards he on whose share the house is situated, or whose share is the most eligible, must pay a sum in dirms to the other, so that an equality may be effected; — and that therefore dirms may be introduced as auxiliaries in the division when necessity requires it. Mohammad in this case maintains that the person on whose share the house is situated must give to the other partner a space of ground (equal in value to it) if, however, the house (not containing the house) be still the most valuable and it be impossible for him to effect an equality for want of enough of ground to compensate for the value of his house, he may then give dirms equivalent to the excess; for as the necessity exists only in that degree, the original rule of partition by measurement must not in any greater degree be abandoned. This is conformable to the opinion delivered in the Assil [the MasbocT]

Partition of land where there is a road or drain. — If the partitioner so divide the property, that the road or drain of one runs through the share of the other, supposing that had been expressed regarding this matter, the case then admits of two prelacements. — I It is possible for him to turn the road or drain another way, so that it pass not through the share of the other; — in which case the partition is valid; — for it is not proper that he let the road or drain of one man pass through the share of the other; on the contrary, it is incumbent on him to turn it another way, even though each individual may have mutually stipulated that they were to enjoy their respective shares "with all the rights and immunities belonging to them;" because the intention of partition is to separate and discriminate the proportions of each partner; and as it is possible, in the present instance, without injury to either, to effect such a separation and discrimination completely, so as that no connexion or dependance may remain betwixt the shares, this is therefore indispensable. — It is otherwise with respect to lands sold with an express condition that "they are sold with their immunities," for here, notwithstanding the connexion or dependence which may subsist betwixt them and the lands of another, the intention of selling which is to transfer the right of property, is nevertheless of an imperfect nature.

--II. It is (or may be) impossible to turn the road or drain another way, so that it pass not through the share of the other:—and this may happen under two different circumstances:—FIRST, where the parties have not stipulated to one another the enjoyment of their shares "with all the rights and immunities belonging to them;" —in which case the partition must be annulled, an account of the connexion and mixture of property, which renders it inefficient, the ends of partition (namely, separation and discrimination) not being thoroughly accomplished;—the partition must therefore, in this instance, be made anew, in such a manner that the road and water-drain of each may be separate. (It is otherwise with respect to lands sold; for the object of a sale is the transfer of right of property, which the purchaser may fully possess without being able to enjoy immediately the use of it, whereas the intention of partition is that the use of the property may be enjoyed in the fullest degree, which it cannot be unless a separate road be made.)—SECONDLY, where all the parties have stipulated that they shall enjoy their respective shares with all the rights and immunities belonging to them; in which case, the partition is valid, and the road and water-drain are included in it, since the end of partition is that each may enjoy the use of his property, and it is impossible perfectly to enjoy the use of the grounds without a road and water-drain. The road and water-drain are therefore, in this instance, included in the partition, provided the parties mutually stipulate to each other the enjoyment of their shares with all their respective rights: as however, the object of partition is to discriminate, which requires a complete separation of all connexion in their respective shares, the road and water-drain are not included, unless such a stipulation be particularly made. It is otherwise with respect to lands farmed; for the intention of farming being to enjoy the use of the lands, which cannot be done without having road and water-drain, it follows that if these articles should not have been expressed, they are nevertheless included in the farm.

In case of a dispute concerning the road, it must be divided.—If the parties differ regarding the road, some of them desiring that it should remain, as formerly, in common, but that all the rest of the property be divided, and others of them opposing this, in such case, provided it be practicable, the magistrate must divide the road, and assign a part of it to each particular share;—or, if this be impracticable, he must leave the road out of the partition, which must nevertheless be made, in order that the parties may enjoy the full use of all their property excepting the road.

If the parties differ regarding the extent of the road (that is, regarding the height and breadth which ought to belong to each), the Kazee must regulate their proportions by the breadth and height of the doors of their respective houses as that is sufficient to answer their necessary occasions. The advantage of this arrangement is, that if any of them be desirous of making a projection or terrace from his house over the street he may do it above the height of his door, but not below it; and the road will still remain in common, according to their several proportions, in the same manner as before the partition; for the partition (as we have observed above) did not take place regarding the road.

The parties may make a private agreement with regard to it.—If two partners in dividing a road, agree that the one shall have two thirds and the other only one third; such a partition is valid, although the house be held betwixt them in equal proportions; for in partition it is lawful to give more or less than his proportion to one partner, provided both of them agree to this.

Complicated partition of different houses and tenements.—If two partners hold a house, the upper floor of which is held by a stranger, or which has no upper floor and likewise another house, the under floor of which is held by a stranger, and also a complete house (that is, one of two stories), in this case the Kazee must apportion each house separately, and make his division accordingly. Mohammed alleges that this is the only lawful mode. Aboo Yoosaf and Haneefa are of opinion, that he ought to make the partition according to measurement. The argument of Mohammed is, that the lower floor has many advantages and conveniences which the upper floor cannot possess, such as walls, necessary houses, stables, and so forth; and that therefore the equality of partition cannot be effected but by an apraisement. The argument of the two disciples, on the other hand, is, that the partition, if possible, ought to be made by a measurement, since the partnership subsists in a thing capable of measurement, and not in the value of that thing. They afterwards however, differed regarding the mode of measurement; Haneefa contending that one span of the lower floor should be held equivalent to two spans of the upper floor; and Aboo Yoosaf maintaining that a span of the one is equivalent to a span of the other. Some have thought that the contradictory opinions of these three ages ought to be ascribed to their different places of abode, and the periods in which they lived; for during the time of Haneefa the inhabitants of Koofa (the place of his residence) preferred the under floor to the upper; whereas afterwards, in the time of Aboo Yoosaf, the people of Bagdad (where he lived) held the upper and the under floor in equal estimation; and Mohammed observed that, on the contrary, the taste of mankind differed, some preferring the upper and some the under floor, and others holding them in equal estimation. There are again some who, instead of ascribing the opinions of the three sages to the prevailing customs and notions of the ages and places in which they lived, are rather for deriving the origin from different principles. Thus, in support of Haneefa's doctrine, it is argued, that the advantages of an under floor are double those of an upper one; for the advantages of the under floor remain after the upper one is ruined and destroyed, whereas those of the upper floor do not remain after the destruction of the under one. In the under floor, moreover, there are not only the advantages of habitation, but also those of foundation; for the proprietor of the under floor may build if he pleases, but the proprietor of the upper floor can only enjoy the advantages of habitation as it is not lawful for him to erect any buildings without the consent of the proprietor of the ground floor; and upon these considerations a span of the under floor should be reckoned equivalent to two spans of the upper. In favour of Aboo Yousaf's opinion, on the other hand, it is alleged, that habitation is the great end of both, and that both are equally fit to answer that end; whence it is lawful for the proprietor of either of them to erect any buildings that are not productive of injury to the other. Lastly, it is urged, on the part of Mohammed, that the advantages of an upper and an under floor are according to the seasons of summer or winter, the violence of the wind, the temperature of the air, and the different climates or countries in which they are situated; whence it is impossible to establish any just rule of partition, but by appraisement. In modern times the law is administered agreeable to the adjudication of Mohammed, which does not require any comment or elucidation — The mode of partition prescribed by the doctrine of Haneefa, in the case in question, is as follows.—The partitioner must first set against the upper floor house (which we shall suppose measures one hundred spans) a part of the complete house equal to thirty-three one-third spans; because an upper floor is rated at half the value of an under floor; consequently thirty-three and one-third spans of the upper floor of the complete house are equal to sixty six and two-thirds of the upper floored house; and as those sixty-six and two-thirds, together with the thirty-three and one-third spans of the under floor, form the complete house; the whole amount exactly to the one hundred spans of the upper floor house. The partitioner must then set sixty-six and two-thirds spans of the complete house against the under floor house (supposing it to measure one hundred spans), for the upper floor of the complete house is rated at only half the value of the under floor house, and sixty-six and two-thirds spans of both the floors of the complete house are equal to the one hundred spans of the under floor house. The mode, on the other hand, of making the partition, according to Aboo Yousaf's doctrine, is as follows. Let one hundred spans of the upper floor house be set against fifty spans of the complete house; or, let one hundred spans of the under floor house be set against fifty spans of the complete house; for, according to him, the upper and the under floor are held in equal estimation; wherefore fifty spans of the complete house comprehending fifty spans of the under floor, and fifty spans of upper floor, must be equal to one hundred spans.

In disputes after partition, the evidence of two partitioners must be admitted. If the partners differ after partition, one pleading that "he has not received the whole of his share, a part of it still remaining in the possession of the other" — and the other denying this, and the two partitioners (or any other two persons) testify that "they had made a partition," their evidence, according to the two disciples, must be admitted. Mohammed says that it cannot be admitted, because the evidence they give relates to their own act, and is consequently inadmissible in the same manner as the evidence of a man relative to some act of his own, on the occurrence of which a person may have formerly suspended the emancipation of his slave. The argument of the two disciples is, that the witnesses, in fact, testify to the act of others (namely, the act of seizing and possessing), and not to their own act; because their act was merely discriminating and separating, to which evidence is not required; hence their stimoney must be admitted. Tahavee observes that where the partitioners receive pay for making the partition, it is universally allowed that their evidence cannot be admitted; and indeed several doctors of our sect are of the same opinion; alleging that as in that case, their evidence tends to prove that they have fully and accurately performed the work for which they received pay, it is in the nature of a representation on their own behalf. Our author, however, does not subscribe to this reasoning; for he remarks, that the two partitioners could not have a view to their own interest in their evidence, as the partners have agreed that they fully and accurately performed the work of partition for which they receive their pay, the only question in dispute being the seizin and possession; wherefore no imputation of falsehood ought to fall on them.

But not that of one partitioner. If only one partitioner give evidence, it must not be admitted; for the evidence of one man alone against another is not sufficient.

CHAPTER IV.

OF PLEA OF ERROR IN PARTITION; AND OF CLAIMS OF RIGHT IN REGARD TO IT.

A plea of error cannot be admitted, where the party acknowledges having received his share, unless it be supported by evidence.—Where one of the partners complains of an error in the partition, and that a part which ought to have fallen to him by the partition is in the possession of another, in this case; if he has before acknowledged that he had received his share, his complaint must not be held without support by evidence; for it is, in fact, suing to cancel the partition after it has been accomplished; and it is to be presumed that there is no error, and that his complaint is false. If the complainant cannot support it by evidence, the other must be required to deny the complaint upon oath; and if they refuse to swear, their refusal is construed as proof in favour of the complaint, and the Kazee must cause their property to be divided anew, agreeably to their several proportions, as this is dealing with them according to their own submission. The author of this work thinks that in the above case the complainant's suit should, on account of his contradicting himself, be wholly rejected.

A complaint of after-assumption is a complaint of usurpation.—If the complainant alleges that he received his whole right, but that the otherwards took a part of it, the denial of the other, on oath, must be credited, as this is in fact a complaint of usurpation.

In case of a complaint of non-delivery: both parties are sworn, and the partition is dissolved and made anew.—If he alleges that "a certain village fell to him in consequence of the partition, but that the other had not delivered it up to him," in this case provided he has not previously acknowledged the obtaining possession of his share, and the other contradict him, both must be required to swear;—because the dispute is with respect to the quantity which the complainant received in consequence of the partition; and hence the difference in the present instance is analogous to a dispute concerning the quantity of an article of sale,—in which case a mutual oath is tendered to the parties (as has been fully explained under the head of Sales); and so here likewise.

A plea of error cannot be heard, if the partition was made by the parties.—If one of the parties complain that an error took place in the division, his complaint must not be attended to, it being held in the same light as a complaint of a fraudulent bargain, which in case of sales concluded by the principals themselves, cannot be heard. In partition, there, as in sales, since both parties have mutually concurred, such a complaint cannot be heard. If, however, the partition was made by the order of the Kazee, and extreme fraud be alleged, the complaint must be heard, as the stability of the Kazee's authority depends on justice.

Case of a claim laid to a particular room in a house, after partition.—If a house be divided between two partners, each receiving a part and afterwards one of them claim a room in the possession of the other, alleging that "it is one of the things which ought to have fallen to him in consequence of the partition," and the other deny this,—in the case, as the plaintiff complains of usurpation, it is requisite that he bring proper evidence; and if both bring evidence, that adduced on the part of the plaintiff, who is not in possession, must be admitted in preference to that of the other; for it is a maxim of the law that the evidence on the side of the party who is out of possession is preferable to that on the side of him who is in possession.

If the complaint above mentioned be previous to an avowal of the plaintiff's having ever acquired possession, both parties must be required to swear, and the partition must be annulled, and performed anew. In the same manner, also, if two partners differ regarding their boundaries, the one alleging that "a certain boundary belongs to him, but has fallen into the possession of the other," and the other alleging the same thing regarding another boundary, and both produce evidence, the Kazee must decree, in favour of each, that boundary which is in the possession of the other. If only one produce evidence, the Kazee must pass a decree only in his favour; but if neither of them produce evidence, they must both be required to swear, in the same manner as in cases of sale.

Of the Laws which prevail in a Claim on Right.

In a case of claim set up to an indefinite part, after partition, it must be dissolved and made anew.—If a house (for instance) held in partnership be divided, and afterwards an undefined part of the whole (such as a half or a third), prove the right of another, the partition, according to all our doctors, is null, and must be made anew. If a definite part be claimed, after partition, it must be compensated far from the shares of the other partners, or, the partition must be dissolved and executed anew.—If a particular and defined part of what has fallen to one of the partners, in consequence of partition should prove the right of another person, the partition is valid, according to all our doctors, and becomes not void with respect to what remains after the right of the other person has been separated;—but the party from whose share that right is taken has in his option either to dissolve the portion (thereby restoring the property to the state in which it stood previous to the partition) and then to demand a new one;—or, if he choose, he may let the partition hold good, and exact from his partner's share a compensation for that part of which he has

And so likewise, if an undefined part be claimed — If, after partition, an undefined part of the share of one of the partners (such as a half), prove the right of another person, the partition is valid with respect to the remainder, and does not become void according to Hanafi and Mohammed; but the partner upon whose share the claim operates has it in his option to annul the partition (restoring the concern to the state on which it previously stood), and then to demand a new partition; — or, if he choose, he may let the partition hold good, and exact from his partner a compensation for the half of his share which he has lost, and which is equivalent to one fourth of the share in that partner's possession. According to Aboo Yoosaf, the partition is in this case null, since by an undefined proportion of one of their shares proving the right of another person, a third partner is created, without whose concurrence the partition is void; in the same manner as where an undefined part of the whole article proves the right of another person. The reason of this is, that where an undefined proportion of one of their shares becomes the right of another; one of the objects of partition (namely, separation) is destroyed, since the share of one of the partners by that means becomes in itself a matter of partnership; and he must have recourse to the object of partition (namely, separation) still exists with respect to the remainder. The argument of Hanafi and Mohammed is, that the object of partition, namely separation, is not defeated by an undefined proportion of one of the partner's shares becoming the right of another person. Hence a partition of this nature, originally made, would be valid; — as where, for instance, the first half of a house is jointly held by two partners, Zeyd and Amroo, and by a third person, named Khalid, one half thereof by Khalid, and the other half betwixt Zeyd and Amroo; the second half being held jointly between Zeyd and Amroo, Khalid holding no share thercing —in which case Zeyd and Amroo might lawfully make a partition betwixt themselves, Zeyd getting the whole of their joint share in the first half of the house and one fourth of the second half; and Amroo getting three fourths of the second half; and it is in the same manner ultimately valid; the case becoming similar to that in which a defined proportion of one of the shares proves the right of another. It is otherwise where an undefined proportion of the whole house, including both shares, proves the right of another; because in this latter case, supposing the partition to be valid, an injury is sustained by the third person, whose right was manifested after the partition, since he must then accept his proportion, not in a compact manner, but dispersed, from the shares of each of the others; whereas, in the former case (in which an undefined proportion of one of the shares proves the right of another), he suffers no injury. Thus there is an evident difference between two cases. In short, the nature of the case in question is this: that one of two partners takes one third of a house, and the other takes the remaining two thirds; the value of the first third being equal to that of the other two thirds; and afterwards one half of the first third proves the right of another person, in which case (according to Hanafi and Mohammed), the first partner has it in his option to annul the partition; for if it continue valid, his share is defective, because of its being dispersed, put in the first third of the house, and part in the two last thirds; — or, if he please, he may take one fourth of the share which fell to the second partner; for if the whole of his (the first partner's) share had proved the right of a third person, he would have been entitled to take one half of the second partner's share; whereas (arguing of a part from the whole) since one half of his share proved the right of the third person, he is entitled to take half of a half of the second partner's share, which is equal to one fourth.

If the partner to whose for the first half falls should sell a moiety of it, and afterwards the other money prove the right of another, he is still entitled to one fourth of the second half in the possession of his co-partner, for the reasons before assigned; and his option of annulling the partition drops, because of his having sold a part of his share. This is according to Hanafi and Mohammed Aboo Yoosaf maintains that the second half, in the possession of the co-partner, must be divided equally between them; and that the first partner forfeits to his co-partner one half of the price for which he sold a part of his share; for (agreeably to his tenants) the original partition is invalid; and as an article of which a person obtains possession by an invalid deed becomes his property, he may lawfully dispose of it by sale; but he is responsible for the value of it; and hence in the case in question, the first partner is responsible for the value of an half of what he has sold, as that is a moiety of the other's half.

A debt proved against an estate, annuls the partition of it among the heirs. — Is the estate of a deceased person be divided amongst the heirs, and afterwards a debit be proved against the estate equal to the whole; the partition must be annulled, because the debit prevents the estate from being the property of the heirs; — and the same rule holds where the debt is not equal, because the right of the creditor attaches equally to the whole fortune of the deceased. The partition must therefore be annulled, unless there be left after it a sum sufficient to discharge the debt, in which case it is not annulled, since the annulment of it is not necessary for the discharge of the debt.

Unless the creditor remit it, or the heirs discharge it.—In the creditor, after the partition; remit the debt, or if the heirs discharge the debt from their own fortunes, the partition remains valid, whether the debt be equal to the estate or exceed it, the obstacle to its validity being thus removed.

An heir may prefer a claim upon an estate after partition.—If one of the heirs prefers a claim of debt against the deceased, after the admission; of the hereditaments, his claim is admissible; for in this case there is no contradiction, since the debt relates to the spirit of value, and not to the substance of the particular hereditaments, and it was in the substance of the hereditaments that the partition took place.

A claim cannot be set up, by an heir, to any particular article, after distribution—If, a part of the heirs, after partition, prefer a claim for a particular thing, included in the estate, on whatever ground the claim be built, it cannot be admitted, on account of the contradiction, which is here evident, as their acquiescence in the partition implies an acknowledgment in them that particular thing, which has been divided, was a part of the co-parcenary.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE LAWS OF MAHAYAT.

Mahayat is a partition of usufruct.—Mahayat, in the language of the law, signifies, the partition of usufruct; and it is allowed; because it is frequently impossible for all the partners to enjoy together, and at one time, the use of thing held in partnership. Mahayat, therefore, resembles the partition of property (whence it is that the Kazee may enforce it in the same manner)—with this difference, however, that in the partition of property each partner enjoys the use of his respective share at the same time, whereas in the partition of usufruct each most frequently enjoys the use of the thing held in partnership only when it comes to his turn, by rotation. Partition of property is therefore more effectual than partition of usufruct in accomplishing the enjoyment of the use; for which reason, if one partner apply for a partition of property, and another for a partition of usufruct, the Kazee must grant the request of the former; and if a partition of usufruct should have taken place with respect to a thing capable of a partition of property such as a house or a piece of ground, and afterwards one of the partners apply for a partition of property, the Kazee must grant a partition of property and annul the partition of usufruct.

And is not annulled by the decease of the parties.—A partition of usufruct is not annulled by the death of one of two partners, nor even by the death of both, for if it were annulled, it must (most probably) be renewed (since the heirs of the deceased may lawfully demand a partition of usufruct), and therefore it would be to no purpose to annul it.

Partners may make it by allotting to each the use of a particular part of the joint concern.—If two partners, by a mutual contract, make a partition of usufruct respecting a house, to this effect, that one of them shall inhabit one part of it and the other another, or that one shall inhabit the upper floor and the other the under, such contract is valid; for as a partition of property executed in this manner is lawful, so likewise is a partition of usufruct. It is proper to remark, that a partition of usufruct, when thus executed, is in reality a separation, that is, a division of the whole of the share of usufruct of one partner from those of another partner, and a concentration of both into one place: but the contract does not comprehend an exchange, whence it is that a limitation of time is not required in it;—for if it comprehended an exchange, a limitation of time would have been requisite because of its being (in that case) a lease.

In which case either is at liberty to let his share.—It is lawful for each partner to let out on rent that part of which the usufruct has fallen to him, and he may appropriate to himself the rent accruing therefrom, whether it be a condition in the agreement of partition of usufruct or not; for every use which accrues from that part becomes (in consequence of the partition of usufruct) his property and the rent which he receives is nothing more than a compensation given him in lieu of the use accruing from it.

Or by stipulating an alternate right to the use.—If two partners make an agreement of partition of usufruct regarding a slave, in this manner, that the one day he shall serve the one, and the next the other, it is lawful (and so likewise if they make a similar agreement regarding a small room); for partition of usufruct is sometimes effected by means of time, and sometimes by means of place; and in the present instance it is effected by means of the former.

A difference between the parties must be settled by the interference of the Kazee.—If two partners disagree concerning the terms of their contract of partition, the one alleging that it related to time, and the other that it related to place; the Kazee ought to enjoin them to agree regarding one or other of these matters. The reason of this is that the partition of usufruct with respect to place is the more equitable, since by that means each partner enjoys the use at the same time; the other partner enjoys it also; but partition of usufruct with respect to time (on the other hand) is the more complete in regard to the use, since each individual then enjoys it entire. As, therefore, the reasons in favour of these two methods are different, it is requisite that the partners agree on one of the n;—and if they choose partition with Case of partition of the use of two slaves.

If two partners (whom we shall suppose Zeyd and Amroo) make a partition of usufruct regarding two slaves, for this effect, that the one shall serve Zeyd, and the other Amroo, it is valid, according to the two disciples; for as (by their doctrine) partition of property with respect to slaves, is lawful, whether performed by the authority of the Kazee, or by the mutual agreement of the parties, it follows that partition of usufruct, with respect to slaves, is also in the same manner lawful. Some (by inference from the doctrine of Haneefa) maintain that the Kazee must not enforce the partition of usufruct with respect to slaves (and such is regarded in this opinion by hasaf); because compulsion being (as we have formerly shown) disallowed by Haneefa with respect to partition of property in the case of slaves, it evidently follows that the Kazee cannot enforce a partition of usufruct in a similar case. The truth is, that if the Kazee enforce a partition of usufruct in this way, it is lawful, according to Haneefa,—whereas, if he were in this way to enforce a partition of the substance it would be unlawful; because in the service of slaves there is no great difference, but in t-eir persons they differ considerably.

If a partition of usufruct be made regarding the above two slaves in this manner, that the maintenance of the one whom Zeyd takes for his service shall be defrayed by Zeyd, and the maintenance of the one whom Amroo takes shall be defrayed by Amroo, it is valid, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that it is not valid, because the maintenance of each of the slaves is incumbent on both the masters:—but when it is stipulated that the maintenance of one of them shall fall solely on one of the masters, and that of the other on the other master, it may be called an exchange; and as the consideration (supposing it an exchange) is uncertain, it is therefore invalid. The reason for a more favourable construction in this particular, is that in feeding slaves strictness is not particularly regarded. It were otherwise, however, if each partner stipulated to clothe his slave, as strictness is regarded with respect to clothing them.

Or, of two quadrupeds.—If a partition of usufruct be made regarding two quadrupeds, to this effect, that the one partner shall have the riding of the one, and the other the riding of the other, it is not valid according to Haneefa. According to the two disciples it is valid; since a partition of property made in this manner is (by their doctrine) valid; and partition of usufruct is only a branch of partition of property. The argument of Haneefa is, that there is a difference in the use and riding of one or another of the quadrupeds, because of the difference in riders, some being expert and knowing the art of riding, and others the reverse. The same difference of opinion also obtains concerning a partition of usufruct, by rotation, with respect to one quadruped;—in opposition to a slave; for a slave serves according to his own reason, and will not suffer a greater burden than he is capable of bearing, whereas a quadruped must submit.

Partition of the advantage from a house may be effected by each party letting in to hire alternately.—Is a partition be made regarding the produce of a house, to this effect, that the one partner shall let it out to rent for one or two months, and enjoy the produce or rent, and that afterwards the other partner shall let it out in the same manner, and enjoy the rent, such a partition is valid, according to the Zahir Rawayet; but a similar agreement regarding a slave or a quadruped is not valid. The reason of this distinction is, that in the case of the slave or quadruped the equality of the several shares, which is a necessary condition, is lost,—whereas in the case of the house it is preserved; for slaves and quadrupeds are changed and prejudiced by the lapse of time and severe labour, and it is probable that their hire will be less the second than it was the first turn, where as house may be supposed to continue in the same state during both turns, and the rent may be equal.

Any occasional excess in the rent being divided equally between them—if it should happen that the rent of a house is greater during the turn of one partner than in that of the other, they are both to participate in the excess, or difference betwixt the one rent and the other, so that an exact equality may be effected between them. It is otherwise where they make a partition respecting the use of the house, and it afterwards yields a greater produce to the one in his turn than to the other, for as, in this case an equality has still been preserved in that which was the subject of partition (namely, the use), the excess of acquisition, received in return for the use, is immaterial, since it frequently happens that there are two things exactly equal, and yet the return received for the one is greater than that received for the other.

In a case of partition of the advantage from two houses, neither party is accountable for any excess of rent to the other.—A partition concerning the rent of two houses is likewise lawful, according to the Zahir Rawayet for the same reasons as have been assigned in the case of one house. If, however, one house yield a greater rent than the other, still the partners do not both share in the excess. The reason of this distinction is that, in the case of two houses, when a partition of their rents is made, separation is the prevailing principle; because as each partner enjoys the rent of his particular house, at the same time, it follows that each obtains the whole of his respective rights, without leaving any part of them with the other,—whereas in a partition of the usufruct of one house, the partners receive the rent by rotation (that is, the one receives the rent the one month, and the other receives it the other), and it may therefore be said that they successively grant to each other a loan of their shares of the rent,—the partner who holds the second month lending to him who holds the first month his share, or half of the rent for the first month, which he is again to receive out of the rent of the second month;—and it may be also said that during their respective monthly acts as agent for the other in receiving his share: and when the other has received his share from the rent of the second month, if there be an excess, it is divided betwixt them; but if, on the contrary, he be not able to recover the whole amount of his loan from the rent of the second month (it being less than the first), the excess which is on the side of him who held the first month must be divided betwixt the partners, so that a perfect equality may be thus accomplished.

Case of partition of the advantage from two slaves.—According to the two disciples, a partition with respect to the hire of two slaves, made in the manner of the preceding case, is lawful, as well as a partition with respect to the service and use of two slaves. Hâneefâ maintains that it is not valid; because the difference to be found in two slaves is greater than that which is to be found in one slave at two separate periods. As, moreover, a partition with respect to the gain required from a single slave, by rotation, is invalid, it follows that such a partition with respect to the gain acquired from two slaves is invalid a fortiori. Besides, a partition regarding the service and use of slaves is admitted from necessity, slaves being of themselves indivisible; but there is no necessity in the case of the hire of slaves, as that is a thing which is capable of division. In the case moreover, of service, it may not be requisite to consider matters strictly;—whereas, in the case of hire (which is a money transaction) matters must be considered strictly. Hence there is no analogy between the cases.

A partition of advantage from two quadrupeds.—A partition of usufruct concerning the hire of two quadrupeds is invalid, according to Hâneefâ, in oposition to the two disciples. The arguments used on both sides are the same as those which have been set forth in the case of a partition of usufruct concerning the use of service of a quadruped.

A partition of usufruct cannot be made with regard to productive articles.—If two partners make a partition of usufruct regarding an orchard of dates, or a garden containing trees, in this manner, that each shall take a part and cultivate it, and enjoy the fruits produced from it,—or, if they make a partition of usufruct regarding a herd of goats, in this manner, that each shall take a certain number, and feed them, and enjoy the milk produced by them, neither of these partitions of usufruct is valid; because partition of usufruct regarding use, as well as partition of usufruct regarding service, is admitted only from necessity, as being unsubstantial, and therefore incapable of division; but, in the present instances, the fruit and the milk, when once produced, are capable of division, being things which substantially exist, and therefore there is in these instances no necessity. The device here is for one of the partners to sell his share to the other, who may first enjoy the fruit and milk, and after which the other's turn is expired, his partner may again purchase the whole, and enjoy the fruit and milk in his turn. Or, one may enjoy the produce of the other's share in the manner of a loan, and ascertain the quantity thereof, for the loan of indefinite things is lawful.
BOOK XL.

OF MOZAREA, OR COMPACTS OF CULTIVATION.

Definition of the term.—Mozarea, in the language of the laws, signifies a compact between two persons, one being a proprietor of land, and the other the cultivator, by which it is agreed that whatever is produced from the land shall belong to both in such proportions as may be therein determined.

Difference of opinions concerning compacts of cultivation.—A compact of cultivation is not valid according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain it to be valid; because it is related of the Prophet that he entered into such a compact with the people of Kheebir, by which it was agreed that they should manage the gardens and lands of Kheebir, and enjoy one half of the fruits and grain produced from them, and that they should give the other half to him. Besides, a compact of cultivation is, in fact, a compact of partnership in regard to stock and labour, in this way, that one of the parties being the proprietor of the ground, and the other the tiller of it, the product is between them. It is therefore valid from its analogy to a contract of Mozaribat; for contracts of Mozaribat are valid on a principle of convenience; since, as it often happens that there are men possessed of property who have no stock for trade, or for the purpose of managing it, and again, that there are others endowed with such a capacity who have no property, it is therefore convenient that a contract of Mozaribat be established between them, by which means the desires of both are accomplished; and as the same reason subsists in the case of compacts of cultivation, they are therefore valid as well as compacts of Mozaribat. It is otherwise where one man gives to another goats, fowls, or silkworms, to take care of, on condition that he who thus takes care of them shall have one half of the produce and the proprietor the other half; for this is disapproved; because as the care and management of the keeper has no effect in creating the produce, partnership is therefore not sufficiently established in that instance. The arguments of Haneefa on this point are threefold. First, the Prophet has expressly prohibited Mokhabera, which is in the dialect of Medina, which has the same signification as Mozarea, namely, compacts of cultivation. Secondly, to make a compact of cultivation is to hire a labourer for a part of that thing which is produced by his labour; it is therefore, in effect, a Kafeez Teham, and as that is unlawful, so likewise is this. (Teham signifies a miller or grinder of wheat, and Kafeez a cup used for measuring; Kafeez Tehan, therefore, means to hire a person to grind wheat into flour, in consideration of a measure of the flour for his hire)—Thirdly, the rate of hire, in such cases, is uncertain when any produce is reaped; or it is annulled when no produce is reaped; and in either case the hire if invalid. With respect, moreover, to the transaction which passed between the Prophet and the people of Kheebir, it was not a compact of cultivation, but was rather in the nature of a tributary revenue, allowed to be paid in kind, as an indulgence or compromise. As compacts of cultivation are thus deemed invalid by Haneefa, it follows that (agreeably to his doctrine), where the labourer waters, tills, and sows the land, and it nevertheless proves unproductive, he is entitled to the customary rate of hire adequate to his labour, since (according to Haneefa) the compact of cultivation is, in effect, as an invalid hire. This is where the seed sown is furnished by the proprietor of the ground; for if the seed be furnished by the cultivator, it is liable for the rent of the land, at the customary rate—and if, in either case, any produce be reaped, it belongs to him who supplied the seed, since it is an increase from his property;—and the other, if he be the cultivator, is entitled to a rate of hire adequate to his labour,—or, if he be the proprietor of the ground, to an adequate rent for his ground. In the present time; however, the adjudication of the courts is given according to the doctrine of the two disciples, both because compacts of cultivation are convenient to mankind, and also because they have become established. They require that the ground be capable of cultivation. The following conditions are essential to the validity of a compact of cultivation. I. That the ground be capable of cultivation; for otherwise the object of the compact cannot be accomplished.

That the parties be duly qualified.—II. That the proprietor of the ground and the manager be both qualified to make such a compact; that is to say, that they be both in their right reason, of age and conversant in such compacts; for unless the parties be so qualified no compact whatever is valid.

That the term of the compact be expressed.—III. That the period or term be expressed; for such a compact is in the nature of an agreement, either for the use of the ground (as when the cultivator supplies the seed), or, for the use of the labour (as when the seed is supplied by the proprietor of the ground), and the determinate use of either can be ascertained only by the period.

That the party be specified who is to supply the seed.—IV. That it be expressly stipulated by whom the seed is to be supplied, in order that the grounds of the compact may be known;—in other words, in order that it may be known who is to be charged for the use of the labour, or on the use of the land, and that no source of dispute may remain.

That the share of the other party be expressed.—V. That the particular share which is to fall to him who does not supply the seeds be expressed; for in consequence of the agreement he is entitled to a share; and it is requisite that the proportion be determined, because a thing which is unknown cannot be established by the compact, not withstanding a share be in general terms stipulated.

That the land be delivered up to the cultivator—VI. THAT the proprietor of the land deliver up the land to the cultivator, in order to the cultivation of it, and that he himself abstain from any mangement or enjoyment of it; insomuch that if it be stipulated in the compact of cultivation that he also shall manage, the compact is null, because of the invalidity of such stipulation.

That both parties participate in the produce. —VII. THAT both parties participate in the produce of the ground after it is reaped; for a compact of cultivation is ultimately a compact of partnership; wherefore every stipulation repugnat to partnership invalidates the compact. (For example, if a precise quantity of the produce be stipulated for one of the parties, it is invalid; since, as it is uncertain whether so much will be produced, the partnership is therefore defeated)

And that the particular seeds be mentioned. —VII. THAT the particular species of seed, such as wheat, barley, &c., be expressed, in order to the species in which the hire of the labourer is to be paid may be known.

Of compacts of cultivation four descriptions are valid.—Compacts of cultivation (according to the two disciples) are of four different kinds:

1. Where the ground and the seed are supplied by the one, and the cattle and the labour by the other: and this is lawful for the cattle are considered as implements of labour, and the case is therefore similar to that of a man hiring a tailor to sew his robe with his (the tailor's) own needle.

2. Where the ground alone is supplied by one of the parties, and the labour, seed, and cattle by the other:—and this also is lawful for in this case the labourer has hired the ground for a known proportion of its produce, and it is therefore lawful, in the same manner as if he had hired or rented it for a certain number of dirms. III Where the ground, the seed and the cattle, are supplied by the one, and the labour alone by the other:—and this likewise is lawful; for in this case the proprietor of the ground hires a labourer to work with implements belonging to him (the hirer); and it is consequently analogous to the case of a man hiring a tailor to sew his robe with his (the tailor's) needle, or, to that of a man hiring a labourer to dig with his (the hirer's) hoe. IV. Where the ground and cattle are supplied by one of the parties, and the seed and labour by the other. This is not valid, according to the Zahir Rawayat:—but it is reported from Abou Yoesaf, that this also is valid; for, as, if it were agreed that both the cattle and the seeds should be supplied by the proprietor of the land, it would be valid, it is in the same manner valid where he supplies the cattle only; being, in fact, the same as where the cattle are furnished by the cultivator. The reason on which the opinion in the Zahir Rawayet is grounded are, that the use of cattle is different, in its naturr from the use of ground; for the use of ground arises from a strength in the soil which occasions vegetation, whereas the use of cattle consists in their fitness for labour, and their power therefore, not being of the same species, the use of the cattle cannot be a dependent on the use of the ground. It is otherwise where the cattle are supplied by the cultivator; for the use of cattle and the use of a cultivator or labourer are of the same species, the product being equally derived from the work of both.

And two are invalid.—It is here proper to remark, that besides the four species of compacts of cultivation above enumerated, there are two more, which are, however, invalid. I. Where it is stipulated that the seed shall be supplied by one of the parties, and the ground, the labour, and the cattle, by the other; which is invalid, because the sixth condition before mentioned is not found in it. II. Where it is stipulated that the seed and cattle shall be furnished by one of the parties, and the ground and labour by the other, which is likewise invalid, for the same reason. In both these cases the produce of the lands (according to the one opinion*), belongs to him who supplied the seed, upon the same principle that it belongs to him in any other cases of compacts of cultivation which are invalid. But according to the other opinion, the produce belongs to the proprietor of the land he therefore stands (as it were) as merely a borrower of the seed of which he has obtained possession by its being sown in his ground.

The period of their duration must be known and the produce must be participated between the parties, in definite proportions.—Compacts of cultivation are not valid unless the period of their duration be known;—nor unless the produce of the land be indefinitely participated between the parties (such as in the third, a fourth, &c.) that partnership may be established betwixt them. If, therefore, it be stipulated that either of them in particular shall receive a certain number of measures of grain from the produce of the ground the compact is null as in this case partnership is defeated (in other words, is not established) since it is possible that no more may be produced from the ground than what is thus stipulated to one of the parties—and the case is therefore similar to that of two men concluding a contract of Mozaribat, in which it is stipulated that one of them shall receive a certain number of dirms.

In the same manner, compacts of cultivation are invalid where it is stipulated that he who supplies the seed shall receive an equal quantity of grain from the produce of the ground, and that the rest shall be divided betwixt the parties;—for, in case the produce exceed the quantity of seed, a stipulation of this nature defeats the partnership with respect to that particular quantity; or with respect to the whole, in case the produce should not exceed the quantity of the seed. A stipulation of this nature, more over, is similar to where the parties agree, regarding tribute-land, that the rest of the produce shall be divided after deducting tribute. It is otherwise where two men agree that one tenth of the produce shall go to one of the parties, and that the remainder shall be divided betwixt both; for a stipulation of this nature does not defeat partnership, because the remaining nine-tenths still continue participated between the parties; whence this is similar to a stipulation, regarding tithe-lands, that "after deducting the tithe, the remainder shall be divided betwixt the parties."

In the same manner also, a compact of cultivation is invalid if it stipulate that whatever is produced on a particular spot (such as on the banks of a rivulet), shall belong to one of the parties, and that the remainder of the produce of the whole ground shall be divided betwixt both; for such a stipulation defeats partnership, since it is possible that nothing may be produced except upon that particular spot:—and it is in like manner invalid where it is stipulated that the produce of one spot of ground shall go to one of the parties, and the produce of another spot to the other.

In the same manner also, a compact of cultivation is invalid where it is stipulated that the one shall get the straw, and the other the grain; for it is possible that nothing may be produced but straw; and it is equally invalid if it be stipulated that the straw shall become their joint property; and that the grain shall belong to one of them only; for here a partnership is not established with respect to the grain, which is the particular object of cultivation.

If the grain alone be mentioned, the straw goes to him who supplies the seed.—If it be stipulated, in the compact of cultivation, that the grain shall be divided equally betwixt the parties, and no mention be made of the straw, still the compact is valid, because a partnership is stipulated in that thing which is the chief object of cultivation; and in this case the straw will belong to him who supplied the seeds, as of that the straw is the produce. (The Shiekhah of Balkh* are of opinion that the straw should also be divided equally betwixt the parties; because such is the usual practice. But, contrary what not of mention is made of the straw; and also because as the straw is subordinate to the grain it should, as well as the grain, be held in partnership.)

And it may be stipulated to go to him.—If it be stipulated that the grain shall be reason of this is, that as the cultivator has acquired the use of the ground in consequence of an invalid compact, he ought therefore to restore the use itself; but that being impossible, and there being no similar in which he might make a return, it is therefore incumbent that he make a return in the value to an amount not exceeding what the other would have received in virtue of the stipulations of the compact. This is the doctrine of the two elders, Mohammed is of opinion that he must pay an equivalent, whatever it may be.

And also an adequate hire for the cattle, if supplied by him.—If the cattle be provided by the proprietor of the ground, so as that the compact (according to the Zahir Rawayet), becomes invalid, the cultivator is in that case liable for a suitable hire on account both of the cattle and the ground; and this is certainly just, as the cattle are equally included in the contract of hire, and the use of the cattle and the use of the ground are uses of different kinds.

If it be the proprietor who thus gets the produce, he may keep the whole; but if the cultivator, he must bestow the surplus in charity.—Where the proprietor of the ground, in consequence of having supplied the seed, is entitled to the produce, he may lawfully on the compact proving invalid, enjoy the whole, since it was a hired frame, the ground which was his own property. If, on the contrary, the cultivator, in consequence of having supplied the seed, be entitled to the produce he is to reserve for his own use a quantity equal to the seed he supplied, and also a quantity equivalent to the rent he is to pay to the proprietor of the ground, and the rest of the produce he must apply to charitable purposes; because the produce springs from the seed, but grows out of the ground, whence his right to the use of the ground is invalid; and as invalidity in regard to the use occasions a baseness in regard to the product, it follows that what remains with him as a return is lawful to him, and that everything else must be bestowed in alms.

The party who agrees to supply the seed is at liberty to retract previous to the sowing.—Where two men enter into a compact of cultivation, and he who was to supply the seed afterwards retracts, previous to the sowing, the Kazee must not compel him to abide by the compact, because he cannot abide by it without sustaining an immediate loss from the sowing of his seed, and the case is therefore similar to that of a man who hires another to break down his house, in which instance, if the hirer were to retract, the Kazee could not compel him to abide by his agreement. If, on the contrary, the party retract who was not to supply the seed, the Kazee may compel him to fulfil the compact; for in so doing he does not sustain any loss; and compacts of cultivation, like compacts of hire, are binding, unless when some plea can be alleged sufficient to dissolve compacts of hire, in which case a compact of cultivation is also dissolved.

And if the proprietor of the ground thus retract, the cultivator is not entitled to anything.—If the proprietor of the ground, being to furnish the seed, should retract, after the cultivator has tilled the ground, the cultivator is not entitled to receive anything for the work he has performed. Some, however, are of opinion, that although in point of law, there be no compensation due to the cultivator, still, in point of conscience, it is incumbent on the proprietor of the ground to satisfy the cultivator for the work he has performed, as he has been deceived in this instance.

The compact is annulled on the decease of either party.—When one of the parties dies, the compact of cultivation, like compacts of hire, becomes dissolved. (The reason of this is fully set forth in treating of Hire.)

If the proprietor of the ground die, when the crop has appeared, the compact is dissolved at the end of that year.—If a man give up a piece of ground to another for a term of three years, and afterwards, when the first year's crop has begun to grow, but is still unfit for reaping, the man die, the ground, in this case, remains in the hands of the cultivator until the crop be fit for reaping, and the produce is then divided according to the conditions of the compact, and the compact is dissolved with respect to the remaining two years of the term; because analogy would suggest that it discontinues even for the first year, as the duration of a compact depends on the duration of the parties; but it is continued throughout the first year, in order to the preservation of the rights of both parties (that is, the cultivator and the heirs of the proprietor), since, if it were to discontinue, the cultivator would sustain an injury. It is otherwise in regard to the second and third years, because in the discontinuance of the compact, no injury is sustained by the cultivator; and accordingly the compact is dissolved for these years, agreeable to analogy.

But if he die before that, it is dissolved immediately.—If the proprietor of the ground die after the cultivator has ploughed the land, and dug rivulets for watering it, but previous to the crop appearing, the compact is dissolved, since in such case the dissolution of it is not injurious to the cultivator's property. (It is otherwise where the proprietor of the ground dies after the crop has begun to grow, and appears like grass; for in that case the compact is not dissolved, as the cultivator would then be injured in his property by the dissolution of it). In this case the cultivator is not entitled to any thing for his labour; because the use of a person's service cannot be appreciated but by a compact; and when the compact becomes null, the estimation of the service no longer remains,
The proprietor of the ground may dissolve the compacts with a view to sell the ground for the discharge of his debts.—It is lawful for the proprietor of the ground to dissolve the compact, in case he have occasion to sell the ground to discharge considerable debts which he may have incurred, for this is a pretext, which he may avail himself of, in the same manner as in Hire: — and in this case the cultivator has no right to claim from him any expense which may have attended the tilling of the land, or the digging of drains; because service is not appreciable but in consequence of a compact; and as the price set on the service, in the present instance, was upon the supposition of a produce, it follows that upon the produce being prevented the cultivator is not entitled to any thing.

But if the crop be growing, the sale must be delayed until it be ready for cutting.—If, however, the crop have begun to grow, although it be still unfit for reaping, the land must not be sold for the payment of the proprietor’s debts until the grain be ready to cut down; because if the lands were to be sold, under such a circumstance, the sale would be injurious to the right of the cultivator; whereas, by waiting until the crop is ready, it only occasions a small delay in the payment of the proprietor’s debts, which is the lighter evil of the two. The Kazee must also, in this case, enlarge the proprietor, if he have been imprisoned on account of his debts, for it being unlawful immediately to sell the lands, the proprietor, in delaying to pay his debts, is guilty of no injustice, and imprisonment is intended as a retribution for injustice.

Rules in case of the compact expiring before the crop is ready to cut — If the term of the compact of cultivation should expire before the crop be ready for cutting, the cultivator must pay to the proprietor of the land a hire or rent for his [the cultivator's] proportion of the ground until the crop be ripe; and in the mean time any work which it may require must be performed by both parties according to their respective proportions. The reason of this is, that in thus prolonging the compact, and ordaining the payment of a rent, a regard is paid to the benefit and interest of both parties, wherefore it is necessary that it should be prolonged; and it is also necessary that both should bear their proportions of the work or expenses; because the compact which they entered into is expired, and the crop remains their joint property, and in cases of joint property the work is incumbent on both parties, in the same manner as the subsistence of a partnership slave. (It is otherwise where the proprietor of the land dies whilst the worker of the ground is still lawful to work; or yet green; for in that case it is incumbent on the cultivator to perform the whole of the work that may be required; because in such an event the compact is continued during the remainder of its term; and it [the compact] obliges the cultivator to sustain the whole burden of the work; — whereas, in case of the term of the compact expiring, it is no longer binding, and therefore the cultivator alone is not obliged to perform the work.) If, therefore, either party incur any expense after the expiration of the term, without consulting the other, or without an order from the Kazee, he must bear it himself as he had no right of himself to subject the other to any charge.

If, in the example above recited, the proprietor of the land should be desirous of taking the crop (which is still green) after the expiration of the term of the compact, yet he must not be allowed to do so, because it would be an injury to the cultivator. If, on the contrary, under the same circumstance, the cultivator be desirous of taking the green crop, the proprietor of the land has three things in his option; for he may either pull up the crop and divide it; or he may keep it altogether and make an allowance to the cultivator, equivalent to his share of it; or he may take care of the crop until it be fit for reaping, in which case he may deduct from the share of the cultivator the amount of the expense, incurred on that account; — because if the cultivator should choose to desist from labouring, on the expiration of the term of the compact, he cannot be compelled, since it is prolonged with a view to his benefit, which he himself has forsaken; and no injury is occasioned to the proprietor of the ground, as he has three modes in his option, by either of which injury is prevented.

If the cultivator die, his heirs may continue the cultivation, but are not entitled to wages.—If the cultivator should die after the crop has begun to grow, and his heirs should offer to continue the cultivation until it be fit for reaping, and the proprietor of the land should not consent, in this case they are nevertheless authorized to continue the cultivation, as the proprietor will sustain no injury thereby; but they are not entitled to any hire or wages, as the compact is continued with a view to their benefit. If on the contrary, the heirs should desire to pull up the crop, and not to continue to cultivate, they cannot be compelled to continue to cultivate, for the reason above assigned; but the proprietor of the ground has in his option the three modes already recited.

The incidental charges are sustained by the parties in proportion to their respective shares.—The expense of cutting down the crop, or reaping it, or cleaning it, or threshing it, and of cleaning the grain from the straw, falls upon both the parties in proportion to their several shares. If, therefore, they were to stipulate in the compact that the expenses shall fall on only one of them, the compact would be invalid. In short, all the above mentioned charges must be sus-
Nature of a compact of gardening.—

Musakat, in the language of the law, signifies, a contract entered into by two men, by which it is agreed that the one shall deliver over to the other his fruit-trees, on condition that the other shall take care of them, and that whatever is produced shall belong to them both, in the proportions of one half, one third, or the like; as may be stipulated. Hanefi alleges, that a compact of gardening, stipulating an indefinite proportion of the produce, such as an half, or a third, is invalid. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that it is valid, provided a term or period be expressed; and this is approved. It is to be observed, that compacts of gardening are frequently termed Mamilat as well as Mosakat; and the same laws hold with respect to them as those which have been laid down with respect to compacts of cultivation.

Doctrine of Shafei upon this subject.—

(Shafei is of opinion that compacts of gardening are valid; and that compacts of cultivation are only so, where they happen in subordination to the former; as, for example, where the fruit trees grow in fertile and clean ground, which is watered for the embellishment of the trees, and the proprietor of them directs the cultivator to sow a crop on the ground upon condition that he shall get a share, such as one half of the produce. The reason he assigns is, that the original thing, in this point, is a contract of Mozaribat; and to that a compact of gardening bears a nearer resemblance than a compact of cultivation; for as, in compacts of gardening, the partnership subsists in the produce, and not in the principal or stock; whereas, in compacts of cultivation, if it be agreed that a partnership shall exist in the produce, and not in the principal (namely, the seed)—in other words, if the parties agree that the one who furnished the seed shall receive an equal quantity of seeds from the crop, and that the remainder shall belong to them both, the compact is invalid. As, therefore, compacts of gardening bear a nearer resemblance to Mozaribat than compacts of cultivation, it follows that they are the primary object, and that compacts of cultivation are lawful only as a dependant; like a right of drawing water, which cannot be sold separately, but is included, subordinately, in the sale of the land; or like a moveable article

* Applying, more particularly, to the plantation and culture of date and other fruit trees.
COMPACTS OF GARDENING

(such as the furniture of a house), which cannot be separately appropriated in Wakf, but is included in the appropriation of the house or ground on which it stands,\"

And thus it is stated in the specification of a term; but it is not essential—that specification of a term is requisite in compacts of gardening, by analogy, in the same manner as in compacts of cultivation, the one being, in reality, a contract of hire, the same as the other. According to a more favourable construction, however compacts of gardening are lawful without any specification of a term. Thus, if two men enter into a compact, by which it is agreed that the one shall deliver his date trees to the other, who shall water and nourish them until they produce fruit, and it become ripe, and no particular period (such as a year; or the like) be specified, the compact is nevertheless valid, and continues in force with respect to the first fruit that may be produced; for the season for producing and ripening fruit is known, and seldom differs much. In the same manner also, if two men enter into a compact, and agree that the one shall deliver to the other the roots of shrubs, which are in the ground, * and that to other shall water and nourish them until they yield ripe seed, to be shared between them without mentioning any term, the compact is not necessarily invalid, and the place with respect to the first seed that shall be produced and arrive at maturity because as seed is of the same nature as fruit, the period of its maturity being equally known, it is therefore, needless to settle any limited time. It is otherwise with regard to compacts of cultivation, which are invalid unless a period be settled; because the time of commencing the cultivation differs greatly; some crops being sown during the autumn, some during the winter, and others during the spring; and as there is thus a difference in the time of beginning the cultivation, the period of its ending cannot be known, for the ending depends on the beginning.

Except where the trees are newly planted.——It is also otherwise in case of gardening, where one man delivers to another his young trees newly planted, for in that case the compact is not valid unless a period be fixed; it being very uncertain when the trees may arrive at that stage in which they are capable of bearing fruit, as that is a circumstance which depends on the strength and fertility of the soil.

Or, where the compact is declared to be for as long trees, &c., shall last,—It is also otherwise, where a man delivers to another his date garden, his herb roots, desiring him to water and nourish them always until they die, or until their roots be pulled, and their vegetation be thereby terminated,—or where he sets no bounds whatever to the duration of the compact with respect to the herbs; for in this case the compact is invalid, its period, being uncertain, because herbs grow as long as their roots are suffered to remain in the ground.

The specification of too short a term invalidates the compact.——If the parties, in a compact of gardening, settle a period during which it is certain that the trees cannot bear fruit, it is invalid; because the object of such compact, which is a partnership in the produce, is thus defeated.

But not where it is possible that the end of it may be answered within that period.—If the parties settle a period during which the trees may bear fruit, although they be frequently later in bearing, it is valid, because the object of the compact is not a certainty defeated in this instance. If, therefore, the trees bear fruit within the prescribed term, it belongs to them both in the proportions which they may have previously settled; or, if they should not yield fruit until after it is expired, the gardener is entitled to a suitable hire for his labour, because the compact has in this case been rendered abortive by the error of the parties. In fixing a period too short for the trees to yield fruit, and which invalidates the compact in the same manner as if it had been known to be too short at the beginning. It is otherwise, however, if the trees afterwards yield no fruit; for in that case it is supposed owing to a blight, and not to the shortness of the period, that the compact proves abortive; the compact therefore holds good, and neither of the parties is entitled to receive anything from the other. A party.

The compact is valid, with respect to fruit trees, vines, herbs, and roots.—Compacts of gardening are lawful with respect to date-trees, vines &c., and also with respect to herbs and roots. According to the first opinion of Shafei, they are lawful with respect to date-trees and vines only; because the validity of such compacts is founded on the sentence of the Prophet regarding Kheebir, which is confined solely to these two. The argument of our doctors is, that the validity of such compacts is founded on their utility, and consequently is established regarding other things as well as date and vines; and in answer to Shafei, it is observed, that the sentence of the Koran regarding Kheebir does not admit of so confined a construction; for the inhabitants of that country cultivated all kinds of trees and herbs.

The compact cannot be dissolved by either party, but under some plea or pretext.——The proprietor of the orchard cannot dissolve the compact unless he have some plea for so doing, such as when the claims of his creditors oblige him to sell it. In the same manner also, the gardener cannot cease to work, and thereby dissolve the compact unless he adduce some plea, such as sickness. It is otherwise in compacts of cultivation; for (as has been already observed) in those instances the party who supplies the seed is at liberty to dissolve the compact at any time previous to the sowing.

A compact may be entered into whilst the fruit is green: but not after it is ripe.—If two men enter into a compact of gardening, to the effect, that the one shall deliver over to the other his date orchard, at a time when the fruit has already appeared, but is still very small, and may, by watering and proper care, become full and large, it is valid: whereas, if the fruit were arrived at perfection, and were incapable of being further improved by care, it would be invalid. In the same manner also, if two men enter into a compact of cultivation, by which it is agreed, that the one shall deliver over to the other his crop, being yet green, and unfit for reaping, the compact is valid; whereas if the crop be fit for reaping it is invalid. The reason of this is, that the labourer is entitled to a share of the produce on account of his labour; but if the compact were to hold good, when his labour can have no effect, he would be entitled to a share for his labour, and this is not admitted in this Law.

If the compact be invalid, the gardener gets wages.—When compacts of gardening are invalid, the gardener is entitled to suitable wages, as an invalid compact of gardening is equivalent to an invalid contract of hire, and therefore resembles an invalid compact of cultivation.

The compact is annulled by the decease of either party.—Rules in case of the proprietor dying.—If, in a compact of gardening, one of the parties should die, the compact becomes null, because it is in reality a contract of hire. If the owner of the orchard die whilst the fruit is yet green, the gardener may continue to work as usual until it be ripe, notwithstanding the dissent of the heirs. (This proceeds upon a favourable construction: for by continuing the compact, the gardener is prevented from suffering an injury, and none is occasioned to the heirs.) But if the gardener should rather choose to submit to the injury, the heirs have in that case three things at their option; — in other words, they may either divide the green fruit, agreeably to the proportion stipulated, or, they may keep the whole of the green fruit, and pay to the gardener the value of his proportion, or, lastly, they may take care of the fruit until it be ripe, and expend such sums as may be necessary for that purpose, and afterwards recover a proportionable part of the expense from the share of the gardener—for the gardener is not at liberty to occasion an injury to the heirs.

Rules in case of the gardener dying.—If the gardener die, his heirs may continue to work, although the proprietor should not consent thereto, because it tends to their mutual benefit. If, on the contrary, the heirs of the gardener decline working, and rather choose to gather the fruit whilst it is still green, the proprietor of the orchard has the three things in his option, as mentioned above.

Rule in case of both parties dying.—If both the parties die, the heirs of the gardener may continue to work; for as, if the gardener had lived, and the proprietor of the orchard had died, he [the gardener] might have continued to work, it follows that his heirs, as being his substitutes, have the same thing in their option. If, however, they should decline it, the heirs of the proprietor are in that case at liberty to pursue either of the three ways above mentioned.

Rule in case of the compact expiring whilst the fruit is yet green.—If the term of the compact should expire whilst the fruit is still green and unripe; the gardener may continue in his employment until it become ripe; and in this case he is not liable for any rent on account of the trees, the letting of trees being unlawful. It is otherwise with respect to compacts of cultivation; for if their term expire whilst the crop is yet green, the cultivator may continue to work until it be fit for reaping—but he is liable for the rent of the ground, the letting of ground being lawful.

If the term of a compact of gardening expire at a time when the fruit is still green; the gardener alone is obliged to perform the rest of the work; whereas, on the contrary, if the term of a compact of cultivations expire at a time when the crop is still green, both parties are obliged to work until the crop be brought to maturity. The reason of this distinction is that, in compacts of cultivation, the cultivator being liable for the rent of the ground after the expiration of the term of the compact, it would be unjust that he alone should afterwards perform the labour; whereas, in cases of compacts of gardening, the gardener, as not being liable for any rent is obliged to perform the work alone, after the expiration of the term, in the same manner as before.

The compact may be dissolved by any plea or pretext.—Compacts of gardening may be dissolved by particular pleas, such as where the gardener is a thief, and there is reason to be apprehensive of his stealing the branches or leaves of the date trees, or the fruit, before it is ripe, or, where he [the gardener] is disabled from working by sickness.

A question has arisen whether, if the gardener be desirous of relinquishing his work, it is lawful for him so to do—concerning which two opinions are regarded, one, that it is lawful; and another, that it is not so. This apparent difference may, however, be reconciled, by supposing that the former opinion alludes to cases wherein it is stipulated that the gardener shall work with own hands, which condition he is, by reason of sickness, unable to fulfil.

A lease of open land, for planting, in consideration of a part of the produce, is invalid.

If a man deliver to another a piece of open ground, for a certain number of years, that he may plant upon it, and stipulate that the trees and the ground shall be in partnership between them, each holding a half,—it is invalid, for two reasons; First, because they have stipulated a partnership in the ground, being a thing which already exists without the previous aid of the gardener’s labour; and Secondly, because such a compact is liable to the same objection as Kafeez Tahen; for in this instance the master of the orchard in effect hires the gardener, and settles, as his wages, a part of the thing produced by his labour, namely, one half of the trees.—In this case, therefore, the whole of the fruit and trees go to the master of the ground; and the gardener is entitled to the price of his trees, and also to an adequate consideration as the hire of his labour; for as it is impossible to restore to him the trees, because of their adhesion to the ground, he necessarily gets their value, and also an adequate hire;—nor is his hire included in what he receives for the trees; that is to say, they are both due, distinctly; the use of labour being in this case itself capable of estimation.

BOOK XLII.

OF ZABBAH OR THE SLAYING OF ANIMALS FOR FOOD. *

All animals killed for food, except fish and locusts must be slain by Zabbaah.—All animals, the flesh of which is eatable, except fish and locusts, are unlawful, unless they be slain by Zabbaah; but when slain by Zabbaah they are lawful, as by means of Zabbaah the unclean blood is separated from the clean flesh,—whence it is that all animals not eatable (such as rats, dogs, or cats), are rendered clean by Zabbaah, excepting only hogs and men.

Zabbaah is of two kinds, by choice, and of necessity.—Zabbaah is of two kinds;—I. Ikhtiaree, or of choice (that is, voluntary, or at pleasure), which is effected by cutting the throat above the breast;—and II. Izi-rare, or of necessity (that is, at random, from necessity), which may be affected by a wound on any part of the animal’s body.—The latter kind, however, is merely a substitute for the former, and accordingly is not of any account unless the former be impracticable, as the former is more effectual in extracting the blood; but the latter suffices where the other is impracticable; as mankind are required to act only according to their ability.

It must be performed by a Mussulman, or a Kitabee.—It is one of the laws of Zabbaah that the person who performs it be either a Mussulman or Kitabee.—The Zabbaah of a Mussulman is therefore lawful; and so also the Zabbaah of a Kitabee, although he should not be a subject of a Mussulman state,—provided, however, that it be done in the name of God, for in the Koran we find these words, “THE VICTUALS OF KITABEES ARE LAWFUL TO YOU.”

Provided he be a person acquainted with the form of invocation, whether man or woman, infant or idiot.—The Zabbaah is lawful provided the slayer be acquainted with the form of the Tasmee, or invocation in the name of God, the nature of Zabbaah, and the method of cutting the veins of the animal; and it signifies not whether the person be a man or a woman, an infant or an idiot, a circumcised person or an uncircumcised.

It cannot be performed by a Magian.—An animal slain by a Magian is unlawful; because the Prophet has said, “Ye may deal with them as well as with Kitabees; but ye must not marry their women, nor eat of animals slain by them;”—and also, because a Magian is a polytheist, and does not acknowledge the unity of God.

An apostate.—The Zabbaah performed by an apostate is unlawful; because he is not permitted to continue in the faith to which he has turned, but must rather suffer death.

It is otherwise with respect to a Kitabee; for if he change his religion, he is permitted (according to our doctors) to continue in that which he has adopted; and the law will still consider him, with respect to Zabbaah, in the same light as the people of that faith which he has embraced.

Or an idolater.—The Zabbaah of an idolater is unlawful; because he does not believe in the Prophets.

Games slain in any place by a Mohrim is unlawful, or slain by any other person in holy ground.—Any species of game slain by a Mohrim is unlawful, although it be not slain within the holy territory:

* The Arabic lexicographers define Zabbaah to signify, in its literal sense, the act of cutting the throat; in the language of the law it denotes the act of slaying an animal agreeably to the prescribed forms, without which it is not considered as eatable.

† That is to say, their flesh may be used in medical compositions; but still it cannot be eaten as ordinary food.

* The appellation given to a pilgrim during his residence at Mecca—It is also applied to any person who, having resolved to undertake a pilgrimage, lays hims. If under particular restrictions.

† Arab. Arzal haram: the territory in the neighbourhood of Mecca, where no animal of the game species is ever put to death.
same manner, any game slain in the holy territory is unlawful, although the slayer be not a Mohrm. It is otherwise where a Mohrm or any other person slays an animal that is not game, in the holy territory or in any other place; for this is sanctioned by the law, because the holy territory affords no protection to goats, and the slaying of goats by a Mohrm is not prohibited.

Rules with respect to the Tasmeea or invocation.—If the slayer wilfully omit the Tasmeea, or invocation "in the name of God," the animal is carrion, and must not be eaten. If, however, he omit the invocation through forgetfulness, it is lawful in either case.—Malik, on the contrary, maintains that it is unlawful in both; and that Mussulmans and Kitabees are considered as the same, with respect to the omission of the invocation. The same difference is to be found in the opinions of our doctors concerning a man omitting the invocation on letting loose a hound or flying a hawk at game, or when he shoots his arrow. The opinion of Shafei, in this particular, is opposed to that of all our sages; for, previous to his time, it was the universally allowed opinion, that an animal slain under a wilful omission of the invocation was unlawful; the only point on which they differed being respecting the omission of it from forgetfulness. The sect of Abdool Ibn Omar were of opinion that an animal slain under an omission of the invocation from forgetfulness is also unlawful; whilst, on the contrary, the sects of Alee and Ibn Abbas deemed it lawful, but not under an omission made wilfully.—Hence Aboo Yousaf and the other Hanefite doctors have declared an animal slain under a wilful omission of the invocation to be utterly unlawful: and that the Kazee cannot authorize the sale of meat so killed, it being contrary to the current opinions of all our doctors. The arguments of Shafei on this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has said, "Let Mussulmans slay in the name of God, whether they mention it with their tongues or not." Secondly, If the invocation were essential to the legality of the animal, it could never be remitted on a plea of forgetfulness, any more that the purification essential to prayer.

Besides, admitting the invocation to be essential, still the Mussulman faith is a substitute for it, in the same manner as in a case of omission through forgetfulness. The arguments of our doctors, on the other hand, are twofold. First, God has said, in the Koran, "Eat not any thing over which the name of God has not been mentioned." Secondly, it is the universal opinion, as has been already remarked. Secondly, the Prophet has said, regarding Addee the son of Hatim, "When thou hast let loose the invocation, should cut away the knife from his hand and take up another, and with it slay the animal, it is lawful;—whereas if he pronounce the invocation over one arrow, and then take another and shoot the game with it, it is unlawful, the instrument over which the invocation was pronounced having been changed.

It is abominable to add any other thing to the name of God at the time of performing the Zabbah, such as if a man were to say "O God, accept this from me!"—This may occur in three different shapes; as first, where he says anything besides the name of God, without pausing between them, or making use of the conjunction "and," as in the example cited above,—or, where he says, Bism Illah, Mohammed Rasool Illah, "in the name of God, Mohammad is His Prophet," which would be abominable, but the rest would not be unlawful;—secondly, where he says anything besides the name of God, without making a pause, but using the conjunction; as if he were to say, "Bism Illah wa Ism Falan," "in the name of God and the name of another;" or "Bism Illah wa Falan," "in the name of God and another;"—in either of which case the animal slain is unlawful; and, thirdly, where he says anything besides the name of God, separately, and by itself, either before or after the invocation, and the throwing down of the animal, which is of no consequence, and, in effect, "render the meat unlawful for it is related of the Prophet, that he said prayers immediately after performing Zabbah.

Nothing must be said except the invocation.—It is a condition of Zabbah that nothing but the invocation be said: that is, that no prayer or other matter be mentioned. If, therefore, a man, during the Zabbah, instead of "Bism Illah" ("in the name of God"), were to say, "Ilahoom agar lee," ("O God, forgive me!") the animal slain is not lawful, as this is a prayer or entreaty. If, however, instead of "Bism Illah" he, say "Alhumdillillah" ("praise be to God"), or "Subhanallillah" ("God is purest"), and mean this as an invocation it is sufficient. But if he sneeze during the Zabbah, and exclaims "Alhumdillillah!" ("praise be to God!") it is not sufficient (according to the Rawayet-Saheeh), because the exclamation will then be considered as thanks, and not as the invocation. The method which has frequently prevailed of saying "Bism Illah or Illa' Akbaro" ("in the name of God, and God is the highest"), during the Zabbah, is copied from Ibn Abbas.

The method of slaying animals.—The place for slaying is betwixt the throat and the libba [the head of the breast-bone], because the blood freely issues from a wound given in that place: the Zabbah, therefore, when performed anywhere within that space, is lawful.

The vessels which it is requisite to cut in Zabbah are four; namely, the Halkoom, or windpipe; the Mirree, or gullet; and the Wadijan, or two jugular veins.—This is founded on a saying of the Prophet. According to Shafei it is sufficient if two of these vessels (namely, the windpipe and gullet) be cut. According to Malik, on the contrary, three of these vessels do not suffice, but it is requisite that they be all cut. According to Haneefa the animal is lawful where three of the four vessels are cut, whichever they may be. Aboo Yoosaf was also at first of this opinion; but he afterwards declared it indispensably requisite that the windpipe and gullet should be cut, and one of the two blood-vessels: because as the effusion of the blood is the design of cutting the blood-vessels, one of them may serve as a substitute for the other:—but as the gullet and windpipe, on the contrary, answer two different purposes (the one being the channel of food, and the other the channel of respiration), it is requisite therefore that they be both cut, the one being unfit to stand in the place of the other. The argument of Haneefa is that the majority represents the whole in many rules of the law; and when three of the four vessels are cut, the majority is cut, and the object (which is the speedy effusion of the blood and deprivation of life) is effected, since upon three of the above-mentioned vessels being cut, the animal cannot remain alive. If, therefore, to avoid giving additional pain, only three vessels be cut, it is sufficient.—It is otherwise when only two are cut; for as, in that case, a cutting of the majority, representing a cutting of the whole, does not exist, it follows that the animal so slain is not lawful.—Mohammed is of opinion that the greater part of each of the four vessels should be cut, because every one of them may be considered as a principal of itself, being separated from the rest. In the Jama Sagheer, also, he alleges that if one half of 'he windpipe, and one half of each of the blood-vessels be cut, the animal is not lawful; but that if the greater part of the windpipe, and the greater part of each of the blood-vessels be cut, previous to the death of the animal, it is lawful;—and he has not made mention of any difference of opinion.

It may be performed with nails, horns, or teeth (detached from their native place).—If a man slay an animal with nails, horns, or teeth it may be eaten without apprehension, provided the nails, horns, or teeth be detached from the place in which they grew. The act, however, is abominable, because it introduces the use of human members, and further, because it is productive of too much pain to the animal. If the act could be performed the Zabbah in such a manner as may be most easy to it. Shafei is of opinion that an animal slain in the above manner is unlawful, and carion; because the Prophet has said, "the Zabbah is lawful when performed with any thing that can draw blood, or cut the vessels, excepting the teeth and the nails, which are the instruments of the Abyssinians," and also, because it is a thing not allowed by the Law any more than if the teeth or nails had been fixed in the place in which they grew. Our arguments, on the contrary, are that the Prophet has said, "Spill the blood with whatever thing it may please thee;" and it is likewise related that he said, "Cut the vessels with what thing soever thou pleasest." With respect to the saying quoted by Shafei, it alludes to nails and teeth fixed in their native place; for it was a frequent custom amongst the Abyssinians to slay cattle in that manner. —Nails, moreover, when removed from their place, are instruments for cutting; and the object of Zabbah, namely, the effusion of the blood, may be accomplished with them, whence they are the same as a sharp iron or stone. But when they are in their place they slay by means of the force or weight applied to them, and the animal so slain is, in effect, strangled.

* The force of this term is explained in a note a little farther on.

Or with any sharp instrument — It is lawful to slay with the kind of a reed, with a sharp stone, and with every thing that is sharp and capable of cutting the vessels and drawing the blood excepting teeth and nails fixed in their native place.

It is observed by the slayer.—It is laydable in the slayer to sharpen his knife; for the Prophet has said, "God has enjoined us to be merciful to all; wherefore, when ye slay, let it be done in the most merciful manner; and when ye perform the Zabbah, let one of ye sharpen your knife and do it in the easiest manner for the animal.

It is abominable first to throw the animal down on its side, and then to sharpen the knife; for it is related that the Prophet once observing a man who had done so, said to him, "How many deceits do you intend that this animal should die? — Why did you not sharpen your knife before you threw it down?"

It is abominable to let the knife reach the spinal marrow, or to cut off the head of the animal. The meat, however, in either of these cases is lawful. The reasons of the abomination in cutting into the spinal marrow are, FIRST, because the Prophet has forbid this; and, SECONDLY, because it unnecessarily augments the pain of the animal, which is prohibited in our Law.—In short, everything which unnecessarily augments the pain of the animal Zabbah is abominable.

It is abominable to seize an animal destined for slaughter by the feet, and drag it to the place appointed for slaying it.

* The Abyssinians are held in great contempt by the Musulmans.

It is abominable to break the neck of the animal whilst it is in the struggles of death; but when the struggles are over it is not abominable to break the neck and strip off the skin, for then it is insensible to pain.

The animal is lawful although it be wounded previous to cutting its throat — It is a man slay an animal by first cutting it in the back of the neck, doing it, however, in such a manner as to cut the vessels whilst the animal is still alive, the meat is lawful, because the animal dies by Zabbah: but the act itself is abominable, as it unnecessarily augments the pain of the animal, being in effect the same as if he had first wounded the animal, and afterwards cut its vessels.

If, on the contrary, the animal die previous to the cutting of the vessels, the meat is not lawful, because in this case the animal dies before the Zabbah has taken place.

All tame animals must be slain by cutting the throat; and wild animals by chasing or shooting them — In the case of all animals attached to man, and which do not fly from him, the Zabbah is performed by cutting the vessels: — but in the case of those which have become wild, and fly from him, the Zabbah is performed by chasing and wounding them; because where the Zabbah Ikhtiaree, or Zabbah of choice, is impracticable, there is occasion for the Zabbah Iztiraree, or Zabbah of necessity; and there is such an impracticability regarding the latter class of animals, but not regarding the former.

The Zabbahs Iztiraree is also lawful to killing an animal which has fallen into a well, provided the other sort of Zabbah be impracticable.—Malik maintains that the meat is unlawful in both the foregoing cases,—that is, in the case of a wild animal, and of one which falls into a well,—because such instances are rare. We, again, say that as the impracticability of the Zabbah Ikhtiaree (which is allowed to be a valid argument), exists in both these cases, it follows that the substitute, namely, Zabbah Iztiraree, may be adopted: nor is what he observes (that "such instances are rare") admitted: on the contrary, they very frequently happen.

In Kadooree, moreover it is expressly said that it is lawful to use the Iztiraree Zabbah towards all animals that fly from man: — and it is reported, from Mohammed, that if a goat become wild in the plains, the Iztiraree Zabbah is lawful with respect to it; but if it become wild in the city, the Iztiraree Zabbah is not lawful, because in the city it may be caught, and consequently the Ikhtiaree Zabbah is not impracticable. With respect to cows and camels; however, the city and plains are alike; because these animals attack, with their horns or their teeth, any person that attempts to catch them; whence it is impossible to catch them, even though it be in the midst of the city that they have become wild; and the Ikhtiaree Zabbah is therefore impracticable. When, also, these animals attack a man, they are considered as wild, provided it be not in his power to catch them; wherefore if one of them should attack a man, and he with an intention of Zabbah kill it, the flesh of it may be eaten lawfully.

Camels must be slain by Naher, rather than by Zabbah—the most eligible method of slaughtering a camel is by Naher, that is, spearing it in the hollow of the throat, near the breast-bone, because this is agreeable to the Sonna, and also because in that part of the throat the vessels of a camel are combined. It is also lawful to slay it by Zabbah, although this is considered as abominable, since it differs from the Sonna. In regard to goats and oxen, it is most eligible to slay them by Zabbah, as being agreeable to the Sonna, and also because the vessels of a goat are assembled together in the upper part of the throat—but they may also be speared like a camel, although this method be not approved, as being contrary to the Sonna.

The fetus of a slain animal is not lawful. If a person, having slain a camel or cow, should find a dead fetus in the womb, such fetus is unlawful, whether it be covered with hair or not. This is the opinion of the [the law of] Haneefa; and it has been adopted by Ziffer and Hasan bin Zceyad. The two disciples maintain that if the fetus be complete in its form, it is lawful, (and Shafei concurs with them in this opinion); because the Prophet has explained the Zabbah of the fetus to be the Zabbah of the mother; that is to say, the Zabbah of the mother answers for that of the fetus likewise. Besides, the fetus is, in reality, a constituent part of the mother; as it is joined to her until separated by a pair of scissors or knife subsists on the same food, and lives by the same breath;—and it is likewise considered as such in law, inasmuch that it is included in the sale of the mother, and is rendered free by the emancipation of the mother. The fetus, therefore, being a constituent part of the mother, it follows that the Zabbah of the mother serves also for it. When a separate Zabbah is impossible, in the same manner as a wound in the case of game serves as a substitute for Zabbah. Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that a fetus if complete with respect to life; that is to say, that it has a separate existence, inasmuch as it may survive after the death of the mother, whence it is that a separate Zabbah is necessary, in case of its being alive. Moreover, if a person destroy a fetus he is subject to a pecuniary penalty; and the owner of it may emancipate it alone, without including the mother. It is also lawful to bequeath it in legacy, or to leave a legacy to it. Besides, the object of Zabbah is to separate the blood from the flesh; an object which cannot be accomplished, in the case of a fetus, by the Zabbah of the mother alone. It is otherwise with respect to wounding game, as in that case the blood is separated from the flesh, and though it be in an imperfect manner, yet as any other mode is impracticable, it is therefore considered as Zabbah. A foetus, moreover, is included in the sale of the mother, because the sale would otherwise be invalid, and from this necessity it is included. And it is likewise rendered free by the emancipation of the mother, in order that a bond-infant may not be born from a freed-woman.

Section

Of the Things which may lawfully be eaten, and of those which may not.

All beasts and birds of prey are unlawful.

—All quadrupeds: that seize their prey with their teeth, and all birds which seize it with their talons, are unlawful, the Prophet having prohibited mankind from eating them.—The reason of this prohibition is because man is held particularly dear, and it is to guard him, lest by eating of these animals their bad qualities might be communicated to him, and effect his disposition.

Hynenas, and foxes, being both included under the class of animals of prey, are both unlawful.—(Shafei maintains that they are both lawful.)—Elephants and weasels are also accounted animals of prey: and pellicans and kites are abominable, because they devour dead bodies.

Rocks are neuter: but carrion crows and ravens are unlawful.—(Maipies, the crocodile, otter, all insects, and the ass and mule are unlawful.)—Crows which feed on grinn [rocks] are lawful; but the crocodile of the wilderness [the carrion crow] and the raven, are not lawful.—According to Haneefa the mapi is neuter, like poultry, although it be said (upon the authority of Aboo Yoosaf) that it is abominated, because it frequently eats dead bodies.—The crocodile and the otter, wasps, and in general all insects are abominated. The ass and the mule are unlawful, because they are prohibited by the Prophet.—The flesh of horses is held in abomination by Haneefa and Malik. According to the two disciples and Shafei it is neuter; for it is mentioned in the Hadiths of the Prophet that permitted it; and some are of opinion that the milk of mares is also neuter.

Hares are neuter.—According to Haneefa, the flesh of hares is neuter, because the Prophet eat it, and commanded his companions to eat of it.

* Arab. Zoo-Nab; meaning, literally, creatures which have canine teeth. The elephant (although certainly not a beast of prey) is perhaps classed with those, because of his tusks.

† It is here proper to remark, that, in the Mussalman law, there are four gradations from legality to illegality. I. Hili (that is, indifferent, and which may either be pursued or avoided). II. Mohab, or neuter (that is, prohibited, but which is nevertheless lawful). III. Makrooh or abominable (that is, reprobated, but which is prohibited).
to offer a sacrifice at the expense of the child, where he is possessed of property), eating what partes of it are eatable, and selling the remaining parts that are valuable in their substance) such as the skin, etc., Mohammed, Ziffer, and Shafie, have said that a father is to sacrifice on account of his child at his own expense, and not at that of the child.

The victim for one person is a goat; and for any number from one to seven, a cow or camel.—The sacrifice established for one person is a goat; and that for seven, a cow or a camel.—If a cow be sacrificed for any number of people fewer than seven, it is lawful; but it is otherwise if sacrificed on account of eight. If, also, in an association of seven people, the contribution of any one of them should be less than a seventh share, the sacrifice is not valid in the part of it.

An animal held in joint property may be jointly offered in sacrifice.—If a camel that is jointly and in an equal degree the property of two men, should be sacrificed by them on their own account, it is lawful, according to the most authentic traditions: and in this case they must divide the flesh by—weight, as flesh is an article of weight. If, on the contrary, they distribute it from conjectural estimation, it is not lawful; unless they add to each share of the flesh part of the head, neck, and joints.

Others may be admitted to a share in an animal purchased for sacrifice.—If a person purchase a cow, with an intent to sacrifice it on his own account, and he afterwards admit six others to an association with him in the sacrifice, it is lawful.—It is, however most advisable that he associate with the others at the time of purchase, in order that the sacrifice may be valid in the opinion of all our doctors; as otherwise there is a difference of opinion.—It is related, from Haneefa, that it is abominable to admit others to share in a sacrifice after purchasing the animal; for, as the purchase was made with a view to devotion, the sale of it is therefore an abomination.

It is not incumbent on the poor or travellers —Sacrifice is not incumbent on either a poor man or a traveller; for Aboo Hieekir and Omar Farook did not offer the sacrifice of the Yd during their travels: and it is, moreover, related that Alee said, "neither the prayers of Friday, nor the sacrifice of the Yd are incumbent on travellers."

The time of performing it.—The time of the offering is on the morning of the day of the festival, but it is not lawful for the inhabitants of a city to begin the sacrifice until their priest shall have finished the occasional prayers. Villagers, however, may begin after break of day. The place, in fact, must regulate the time. Thus, where the place of celebration is in the country, and the performers of it reside in the city, it is lawful to begin in the morning: but if otherwise, it must be deferred until the prayers be ended.

BOOK XLIII.

OF UZHEEA, OR SACRIFICE

Sacrifice must be performed at the Yd. Kirban.—It is the duty of every free Mussulman, arrived at the age of maturity to offer a sacrifice on the Yd Kirban, or festival of the sacrifice,* provided he be then possessed of a Nisab,† and be not a traveller. This is the opinion of Haneefa, Mohammed, Ziffer and Hasan; and likewise of that of Aboo Yoosaf, according to one tradition, and also in the opinion of Shafei, sacrifice is not an indispensable duty, but only laudable. Tahavee reports that in the opinion of Haneefa it is indispensable; whilst the two disciples hold it to be in a strong degree laudable.

It is incumbent on a man, for himself, and for his infant children.—The offering of a sacrifice is incumbent on a man on account of himself, and on account of his infant child. This is the opinion of Haneefa in one tradition. In another (which is recorded in the Zahir Zawayeet) he has said that it is not incumbent on a man to offer a sacrifice for his child. In fact, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, a father or guardian are In the victim be slain after the prayers of the mosque, and prior to those offered at the place of sacrifice, it is lawful; as is likewise the reverse of this.

Sacrifice is lawful during three days,—that is, on the day of the festival, and on the two ensuing days. Shafei is of opinion, that it is lawful on the three ensuing days. The sacrifice of the day of the festival is, however, far superior to any of the others. It is also lawful to sacrifice on the nights of those days, although it be considered as abominable.—Moreover, the offering of sacrifices on these days is more laudable than the custom of omitting them, and afterwards bestowing an adequate sum upon the poor.

If the sacrifice be delayed beyond the proper time, the victim be bestowed in charity.—If a person neglect the performance of the sacrifice during the stated days, and is unwilling to oblige upon the offering of any particular goat, for instance, or, being poor, have purchased a goat for that purpose;—in either of these cases it is incumbent on him to bestow it alive in charity. But, if he be rich, it is in that case incumbent on him to bestow, in charity, a sum adequate to the price, whether he has purchased a goat with an intent to sacrifice it, or not.

The sacrifice of a blemished animal is not admitted.—It is not lawful to sacrifice animals that are blemished,—such as those that are blind, or lame, or so lean as to have no marrow in their bones, or having a great part of their ears or tail cut off. Such, however, as have a great part of their ears or tail remaining may lawfully be sacrificed.—Concerning the determination of a great part of any member, there are indeed various opinions reported from Hanefi.—In some animals he has determined it to be the third; in others more than the third; and in others again, only the fourth.—In the opinion of the two disciples, if more than the half should remain, the sacrifice is valid; and this opinion has been adopted by the learned Aboo Lays.

But a trifling blemish does not render it exceptionable.—If an animal have lost the third of its tail, or the third of its ear, or eyesight, it may be lawfully sacrificed;—but if, in either of these cases, it should have lost more than a third, the offering of it is not lawful. The rule which our doctors have laid down to discover in what degree the eyesight is impaired, is as follows. The animal must first be deprived of its food for a day or two, that it may be rendered hungry; and having then covered the eye that is impaired, food must be gradually brought towards it, from a distance, until it indicate, by some emotion, that it has discovered it.—Having marked the particular spot at which it observed the food, and uncovered the weak eye, the perfect eye must then be bound, and the same process carried on, until it indicate that it has observed it with the defective eye. If then the particular distance from those parts to where the animal stood be measured, it may be known, from the proportion they bear to each other, in what degree the sight is impaired.

An animal wanting a horn, or mad, or castrated, may be sacrificed.—If a person sacrifice an animal without a horn, it is lawful;—and so likewise where the horn is broken, or where the animal is mad or castrated.—Many, however, have said, that it is not lawful to sacrifice a mad animal, unless it eat food, in the same manner as it is not lawful to sacrifice a Gurreen [the offspring of a wolf and goat] unless it be fat. With regard to animals that want teeth, it is reported from Aboo Yoosaf that they may be lawfully sacrificed, provided they be able to chew.—or (according to another report) provided the greatest of their teeth be remaining. Animals, however, that are born without an ear cannot lawfully be sacrificed. What is here said refers also to animals as may have existed in the animal previous to the purchase of it: for if it be perfect at the time of purchase, and afterwards contract such a blemish as to render the sacrifice of it unlawful, and the proprietor be rich, it is in that case incumbent on him to sacrifice another; whereas, if he be poor, he may lawfully sacrifice the same. The reason of this is, that as an offering is incumbent on a rich man originally, and not on account of his purchase, the animal, therefore, which he buys is not particularly set aside for the offering; whereas, on the contrary, an offering not being incumbent on a poor man, except when he purchases an animal with that intent, the animal so purchased is therefore particularly destined for the purpose:—and accordingly, our doctors hold that if an animal, purchased with a view to be offered, should die, it is incumbent on the proprietor, if he be rich, to substitute another, but not if he be poor;—or, if the animal be either lost or stolen, and the purchaser, having bought another, should then recover the first, in such case it is incumbent on the proprietor, if he be rich, to sacrifice one of them, whether it be the first bought or the second; but if he be poor, he is under an obligation to sacrifice both.

Any accident befalling the victim at the time of slaying it does not invalidate the sacrifice.—If it should happen that the goat, having been turned over in order that the sacrifice might be performed, in the struggle breaks one of its legs, in that case, provided the sacrifice be immediately made it is lawful and sufficient. So also, it is lawful, if the animal, in that situation, having received any hurt, should run away, and having been immediately and without delay taken, should they be sacrificed. Moreover has likewise judged the sacrifice lawful, if, in this case, the animal should not be retaken until after some delay;—in opposition to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

Goats, camels, and cows alone are lawful in sacrifice.—It is not lawful to offer a sacrifice of any animal except a camel, a cow, or a goat; for it is not recorded that the Prophet or any of his companions ever sacrificed others. Buffaloes, however, are lawful, as being of the species of a cow. Every animal of a mixed breed, moreover, is considered as of the same species with the mother.

Age at which an animal is fit for sacrifice.

The sacrifice is lawful of any animal of the three species above mentioned, although it be only a Soonee: but not if younger; excepting, however, a sheep, which may be sacrificed when a Judday, or so young as to have no teeth; and in this case our doctors have made it a condition that the sheep be of large stature, insonmuch as to have the appearance of a Soonee at a little distance.

The period of Juddy in sheep (according to our doctors) is at the expiration of six months, and the commencement of the seventh. The time of Soonee in goats or sheep is at the age of one year, in cows, at the age of two; and in camels, at the age of five years.

If one of seven joint sacrifices die, the consent of his heirs is requisite to the sacrifice.—If seven persons purchase a cow for sacrifice, and one of them afterwards die, and his heirs desire the other six to sacrifice a cow on account of themselves, and on account of the dead, it is lawful; whereas if they sacrifice it without the consent of the heirs it is not lawful.

If a Christian, or any person whose object is the flesh, and not the sacrifice, be a sharer with six others, the sacrifice is not lawful on the part of any.

Rules with respect to the disposal of the flesh, &c. of the victim.—It is lawful for a person, who offers a sacrifice, either to eat the flesh, or to bestow it on whomsoever he please, whether rich or poor; and he may also lay it up in store.

It is most advisable that the third part of the flesh of a sacrifice be bestowed in charity.

It is lawful either to bestow the skin of a sacrifice in charity, or to make any utensil of it, such as a bucket, sieve, or the like. It is likewise lawful to barter it for any un consumable article that yields profit in its substance;—but it is not allowable to barter it for anything consumable, as vinegar, and such like. Flesh, in these respects, is considered in the same light as the skin, according to the most authentic traditions.

If the flesh of a sacrifice be sold along with the skin of it for money, or for any thing that is not profitable but in consumption, it is incumbent on the seller to devote the price to the poor; and the sale is valid.

It is not lawful to give a part of the sacrifice in payment to the butcher.

*The sheep and the goat are held to be of the same species.

It is abominable to take the wool of the victim and sell it before the sacrifice be performed; but not after the sacrifice. In the same manner, it is abominable to milk the victim and sell the milk.

It must be slain by the sacrificer, or in his presence.—It is most advisable that the persons who offers the sacrifice should himself perform it, provided he be well acquainted with the method; but if he should not be expert at it, it is then advisable that he take the assistance of another, and be present at the operation.

A Kitabee may be employed to slay it, but not a Magian.—It is abominable to commit the slaying of the victim to a Kitabee. If, however, a person order a Kitabee to slay his victim, it is lawful. It is otherwise where a person orders a Magian, or worshippers of fire, to slay his victim, for this is imadmissible.

Two persons slaying each other’s victim by mistake must make a mutual compensation.

—If two persons commit a mistake, each slaying the offering of the other, it is lawful; and no compensation is on that account due from either. If, also, having erred in this manner, they should eat the flesh, and then discover the mistake, in this case it is requisite that they sanctify the act of each other, and sacrifice is then fulfilled. If, on the contrary, they refuse to do so, and dispute the matter, each is in that case entitled to take a compensation for the value of the flesh of his offering from the other and must then bestow such compensation in alms, as it is a return for the flesh of his offering: and the same rule also obtains where a person destroys the flesh of the offering of another.

Case of sacrifice of an unspared animal. —If a person usurp a goat and sacrifice it, he is in that case bound to compensate for its value, and his offering is thereby rendered valid; because upon paying the compensation he is held to have been proprietor of the goat from the time of his having usurped it. It is otherwise where a person sacrifices a goat committed to him as a deposit; for this is not valid; because he is obliged to compensate for it (not on account of the animal, but) on account of the sacrifice, and hence his property in it is not established until after he has sacrificed it.

OF KIRABEEAT OR ABOMINATIONS

Difference of opinions concerning the extent of the term Makrooh.—The author of the Hedaya remarks that our doctors have disagreed concerning the extent in which ABOMINATIONS.

Section I.

Of Eating and Drinking

It is abominable to eat the flesh or to drink the milk of an ass, or to take the urine of a camel... - Haneefa has said that the flesh and milk of an ass, and the urine or a camel are abominable. According to Aboo Yoosaf the urine of a camel may be taken as a medicine; but with respect to milk, it is a secretion from the blood, and is therefore subject to the same rule with the flesh of the animal from which it is produced.

Or to use vessels of gold or silver. It is not allowable, either to men or women, to use a vessel of gold or silver in eating, drinking, or in keeping perfumes; because the Prophet has said, with respect to any person who drinks out of a vessel of silver or gold, that "the fire of hell shall enter into his belly;" and it is also related, that a person having brought water for Aboo Hareefa in a silver vessel, he refused to drink, declaring that the Prophet had prohibited him from drinking out of such a vessel. The prohibition, therefore, being established with respect to drinking, it follows that the rule extends to the using of oils, and similar articles, that being in effect the same with drinking, since in both cases the vessel of gold or silver is induced. Whence it is that the use of a golden or silver spoon is abominable, as also the use of a silver or golden bodkin for drawing antimony along the eyelids, or of boxes for holding antimony, or any other thing, made of those metals.

It is allowable to use vessels of lead, glass, crystal, or agate. The use of vessels of lead, glass, crystal, and agate, is permitted. Shafei maintains that those are abominable, because they resemble gold or silver in point of splendour.

Or to drink out of vessels, or ride upon a saddle, or sit upon a chair or sofa, ornamented with gold or silver. It is allowable, according to Haneefa, to drink out of a wooden vessel ornamented with silver, provided the particular part to which the lip is applied be void of it. In the same manner, also, it is permitted to ride upon a saddle interwoven with silver, provided the space allotted for the seat be plain; and this rule likewise holds with respect to a couch or sofa. According to Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, all those are abominable. From Mohammed there are two traditions on this point; one corresponding with the opinion of Haneefa, and the other with that of Aboo Yoosaf. After the same manner they have disagreed concerning the use of a vessel or chair adorned both with gold and silver; concerning swords, mosques, frames of glasses, and books, when they are ornamented either with gold or silver; and also concerning stirrups, bridles, or cruppers of that description. These differences of opinion, however, exist only where the gold and silver is so applied, in any of these cases, that it is to be separated only by means of some difficult process; but the gilding of things, either with gold or silver, in such a manner as to require art to separate it, is unanimously allowed. The argument of the two disciples is that the use of one part of a vessel includes the use of the whole; wherefore they hold it equally abominable as if the part applied to use were like wise of gold or silver. Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that ornaments of gold or silver, when not applied to use, are merely appendages, and therefore not to be regarded; whence the use of the article is allowable, in the same manner as wearing a garment which is trimmed with silk, or a ring which has a piece of gold set in it.

The information of an infidel may be credited with regard to the unlawfulness of any particular food. If a person send his servant, or a hireling, being a Magian, to purchase meat, and he purchase meat accordingly, and acquaint his master that he has bought it from a Magian, it is lawful for a Mussulman, it is lawful for him to eat the food so purchased; because the word of an infidel is creditable in all matters of a temporal nature, as he is presumed to be possessed of reason, and falsehood is prohibited in his religion: besides, there is a necessity for believing his assertion in temporal concerns, from their frequent occurrence. If, on the contrary, the servant inform his master, that "he purchased the meat from an infidel who is not a scrupulist, and it was slain by one who was neither a scrupulist nor a Mussulman," it is in that case unlawful for the master to eat the flesh so purchased; for as the word of an infidel is credited with respect to the legality of meat, it is credited with respect to the illegality, in a superior degree.

A present may be accepted by the hands of a slave or an infant. If a slave, either male or female, or an infant, should carry something to a person, saying, "such an one has sent this to you as a present," in that case...

* Makrooh is the participle passive of Kuriha, to abominate; this word is frequently taken in a milder sense; and may relate to any thing improper or unfinished.
the person may justly credit the information, as it is a frequent custom to send presents by such messengers. In the same manner, if either of these should intimate to a slave that his master had given him a licence to trade, he is allowed, accordingly, to accept of it; because it is perhaps impossible for them to bring witnesses to attest the intention of the master, whence, if there word were not credited, it would occasion an obstruction to business, and an unnecessary restraint amongst mankind.—It is related, in the Jama Sagheer, that where a slave girl comes to a person and says, "my master has sent me as a present to you," it is lawful for that person to accept of her.

The word of a reprobate may be taken in all temporal concerns, but not in spiritual matters.—In all temporal concerns the word of a reprobate* may be taken; but in matters of a spiritual nature the word of an upright must be only is to be credited. The reason of this distinction is, that affairs of a temporal nature are of frequent occurrence amongst every sect of men; whence is, in the transaction of them, anything more than maturity of age and sanctity of intellect (such as integrity, &c.) were required, it would occasion a restriction in business; to obviate which; the word of one person, in such case, is creditable, whether that person be virtuous or dissolve, a Mussulman or an infidel, a man or a woman. Concerns of a spiritual nature, on the contrary, are not of such frequent occurrence; hence is it requisite that in relation to them a greater caution be used. The word, therefore, of none but an upright Mussulman is admissible in spiritual matters; because an unjust man lies under a suspicion of falsehood; and an infidel, as not following the law himself, has no right of enforcing it upon others. The case is different with respect to temporal matters; for an infidel is permitted to reside in a Mussulman territory purely on account of his temporal business, for which he would be incapacitated if his word in temporal matters were to be rejected. From this necessity, therefore, credit is given to it.

And the same of a person of unknown character.—A person, also, whose character is unknown is considered in the same light as an unjust man or reprobate; and his word relative to matters of faith is inadmissible. It is, however, related in the Zahir Rawayet, that suspicion and probable conjecture are the grounds on which it is lawful to determine in this point;—in other words, practice must accord with the conjecture which appears most probable or best supported. There is also another tradition from Hanefi, that the word of a person of unknown character may be believed in matters of a spiritual nature.

The word of an upright person, whether freeman or slave, may be taken in spiritual matters.—The word of a freeman or slave, whether male or female, is admitted in spiritual concerns, provided they be upright; for, in consequence of integrity, veracity preponderates; and this is a cause of belief.—It is to be observed, that what was before related; of licensing a slave to trade, sending presents and messages, and the like, are of the class of temporal matters; as is also the investing of another with the power of agency.—Information, on the contrary, concerning the impurity of water (for instance) is a matter of a spiritual nature. In this instance, therefore, if the former be an upright Mussulman, the person who receives the information is at liberty, in performing his purification, to substitute sand for the water, in the manner of teyummim,† and must not perform it with the water.—If, on the contrary, the informer be a profligate, or of unknown character, it is incumbent on the person who receives the information to consider the matter deliberately; when, provided he conclude the informer to be a person of veracity, he must perform teyummim instead of ablation.—(In this case, however, he should use the precaution of first pouring out a little of the water, and may then perform teyummim; whereas, if the informer be of an upright character, as there is in that case no suspicion of falsehood; the pouring out the water by way of precaution, is entirely unnecessary.)—If, on the contrary, the result of his reflection be that the information was false, he must perform ablation, but not teyummim with the water. This is what the law enjoins; but in this case also it is a requisite precaution that, after ablation, he perform teyummim, as the judgment he has formed in this case is entirely from conjecture. It is also to be observed that all cases of illegality are considered as of a spiritual nature where they affect not the property of any person. Where, on the contrary, the testimony of one upright person tends to injure the property of another, it is not in such case of any weight;—as where, for instance, an upright person testifies that a certain person has married his own foster-sister; in which case his testimony is not creditable, as tending to hurt the property of the husband, inasmuch as he would be deprived of the effects of the woman, to which the marriage had entitled him;—or where a person informs who had purchased a slave girl, that she is his own foster-sister, or that she is a free woman.

It is laudable to accept an invitation to a marriage-feast, notwithstanding any irregularities which may be practised there.—If a person be invited to a marriage-feast, and, upon going there, observe the company to be engaged in wanton amusement, or in singing, still it is laudable in him to sit down and partake of the entertainment; for the acceptance of such invitation is strictly orthodox, as the Prophet has said, "whosoever refuses an invitation is certainly not obedient to me."—He is not, therefore, to leave the entertainment on account of any irregularities committed by others; in the same manner as, at the ceremony of a funereal prayer, a person is not to absent himself, although people hired for the purpose of lamentation may there be present.—If, however, he have power to prohibit these irregularities, it is incumbent on him to exert it: but if he possess not such power, he must then remain with patience.—This is where the person invited is not a Mooktidda,* or holy man; for, if such a person should be present and have it not in his power to restrain these irregularities, it is then incumbent on him to withdraw, as his presence in such a place shows a relaxation of religion. If also, irregularities be committed during the time of eating, it is improper that any person should remain there, whether he be a Mooktidda or not; God having prohibited us, in the Koran, from sitting in company with the wicked. All this proceeds on the supposition of the invited person being actually present at the marriage-feast, before he is aware of those irregularities.

* Arab, Fasik, in opposition to Adil, a just or upright person.—The distinction between these terms has been fully explained elsewhere.

† For a further explanation of this, see Vol. I. p. 109.

Unless those irregularities be known beforehand.—For if he be previously aware of such irregularities being practised, it is incumbent on him to stay away, whether he be a Mooktidda or otherwise.

Section II.

Of Dress

Women may dress in silk; but men must not.—A dress of silk is not lawful for men; but women are permitted to wear it: for it is related by several of the companions of the Prophet, of whom was Alee in particular, that one day the Prophet appeared with a piece of silk in one hand, and of gold in the other, and said, "Both these are prohibited to the men of my tribe, but are lawful to the women."

Farther than what is merely ornamental. A small quantity of silk, such as three or four fingers breadth, used as a fringe or border to a garment, or applied to any such purpose, is allowable; because it is related that the Prophet prohibited the wearing of silk, excepting a shred of the breadth of three or four fingers in a garment; and it is moreover related, that the Prophet wore a robe with an edging of silk to it.

A pillow of silk is allowable.—According to Haneefa, it is allowable to make a pillow of silk, and to sleep upon it. The two disciples, on the contrary, hold this to be abominable; and the same difference of opinion obtains concerning making curtains of silk, and hanging them upon doors. The arguments of the two disciples on this point are twofold. First, the use of silk in general is prohibited by the Prophet. Secondly, the making of pillows and curtains of silk is a custom of the proud; and the imitation of such is forbidden.

The argument of Haneefa, on the other hand, is that the Prophet sat upon a pillow of silk; and that there was one laid upon the sofa of Abdoola Ibn Abbas.

And a dress of silk to warriors.—It is allowed to warriors, in the opinion of the two disciples, to wear a dress of silk or satin in the time of war; because there is a tradition, recorded by Shaaby, that the Prophet permitted the wear of silk during the time of battle. Moreover, it is in a manner necessary, as being best adapted to counteract the hard pressure of armour, and tending to excite horror in the eyes of the enemy. Haneefa, on the contrary, holds this to be abominable, because the traditions which point out its illegality are absolute, without distinguishing between any particular period or juncture, such as war, or the like; and the necessity may be answered in a dress of Makhloot.—that is having the wool of silk, and the warp of anything else. Besides, silk, and every other thing that is proscribed, becomes allowable in no case but that of necessity; and with respect to the tradition recorded by Shaaby, it alludes to dress of Makhloot.

Or of mixed cloth—A garment of cloth, the woof of which consists of silk, and the warp of anything else, such as wool or cotton, is allowable to wear during war, because of its being necessary: but it is abominated at any other junction because there is no necessity for it. The same rule also obtains with respect to cloth of which the warp is silk and the woof wool or cotton: and for the same reason.

Section III.

Of Ornaments.

Men are not to wear ornaments of gold or silver, except on signet-rings, girdles, and swords—Men are prohibited from the use of ornaments of gold, such as rings, and the like, because of a saying of the Prophet to that effect. Ornaments of silver are likewise unlawful; because silver is, in effect, the same as gold. An exception, however, is made with respect to signet-rings, girdles, or swords; the use of silver in ornamenting those being approved.—In the Jama Sagheer, it is related that silver rings only should be used: whence it may be inferred that rings

* Literally, an exemplary person, as being eminent for sanctity of character. Whence the term is applied to priests, or other persons who exercise a holy office. The Persians term such a person a Pealsha, or one who leads the way.
of stone, iron, or brass, are forbidden. It is also related, that, the Prophet on seeing a ring of brass upon the finger of a man, said, "I perceive the smell of an image," and again, that having seen, upon the finger of another person, a ring of iron, he spoke to him thus, "I see upon your finger the ornament of the people of hell."—What is here said respects the circular hoop, and not the setting or bezel of the ring. Hence it is lawful that the setting be of stone. It is proper, however, that men, in wearing rings, fix the setting or bezel towards the palm of the hand, and women otherwise, because, with respect to them, rings are considered as ornaments.—Sovereigns and judges, moreover, wear rings, only as having occasion to seal with them; but with respect to other people, it is most advisable that they never wear rings, as a like reason does not operate with them.

The setting of a ring may be of gold.—If a piece of gold be inserted in the setting of a ring, it is allowable; for, in that case, the gold is only dependent on the ring, in the same manner as a shred of silk upon a garment.

Gold is not to be used in any cases of necessity, where silver will answer equally well.—It is forbidden, in the opinion of Haneefa, to bind the teeth with a thread of gold. Mohammed, on the other hand, maintains that this practice is unobjectionable. Of Aboo Yoosaf there are two opinions recorded; one corresponding with the opinion of Haneefa, and the other with that of Mohammed. The two disciples, in support of their opinion, quote the case of Arifja, the son of Assad, who, having lost his nose by a wound he received at the battle of Goolab, made a false one of silver, which occasioning a very offensive smell, the Prophet commanded him to make another of gold. The argument of Haneefa is, that gold is in its nature unlawful whence the use of it is allowable only in a case of necessity; and as the necessity may in general be equally well answered by substituting silver, gold therefore remains subject to its original state [of prohibition]; this necessity, however, could not be answered, in the case of Arifja, but by a substitution of gold, because of the silver occasioning a nauseous smell.

Infants must not be sumptuously apparelled.—It is abominable in any person to clothe an infant child in a dress of silk, with ornaments of gold; for, since that dress is proved to be prohibited to men, they are consequently forbidden to dress others in it; in the same manner as it is unlawful to give wine to drink, because of the illegality of drinking it.

Vain superfluities are not allowable.—The custom of keeping handkerchiefs, as is frequently practised, is abominable. Many, however, hold that it is allowable, if done from motives of necessity. This is approved: for the practice is abominable only when done ostentatiously, in the same manner as the mod of sitting with the knees on a line with the chin, and the hands folded round the legs.

It is allowable to bind the finger with a string, or a ring, with a view to aid the memory concerning some business relative to another person.

Section IV.

Of the Commerce of the Sexes; and of looking at or touching any Person.

Men must not look at strange women, except in the face, hand, or foot.—It is not permitted for a man to look at strange women, except in the face, and palm of the hands, which is allowable, because women being frequently concerned in business with men, such as giving taking, &c., it would therefore subject them to great inconvenience if these parts were veiled, whence there is a necessity for leaving them bare.—It is reported, from Haneefa, that it is allowable to look at the feet of a woman; because of there being sometimes occasion for it. From Aboo Yoosaf there is a tradition that the seeing of the shoulder is likewise allowed; because that, from the influence of custom, it is left exposed. If, however, a man be not secure from the touch of lust, it is not allowable to look even at the face of a woman, except in cases of absolute necessity.

A man (if young) must not touch a strange woman.—It is not lawful for a man to touch the hand of a strange woman, notwithstanding he have a control over his lust; because the Prophet has said, "Whosoever toucheth a strange woman, shall be scorched in the hand with hot cinders on the day of judgment"—This, however, proceeds on a supposition of the woman being young; for if she be old, insomuch as to be insensible to lust, in that case it is lawful to touch her at the time of salutation. The case is similar where the man, being old, is insensible to passion himself, and not such as to excite it in the woman he touches.

A female infant may be touched or looked at.—It is lawful to touch or look at a young girl insensible of the carnal appetite; as in that case there is no apprehension of seduction.

Rules to be observed by a magistrate with respect to woman, when acting in his judicial capacity or by a witness.—A Kazee may look in the face of a strange woman, when he passes a decree upon her, notwithstanding * Meaning, that when a person sits in the manner so described, from ostentation, it is abominable, but that it is allowable when done with a view to obtain rest.

there be an apprehension of lust; because he is under a necessity of so doing, for the purpose of expediting his decrees, in order that the rights of mankind may sustain no injury. — Witnesses also, are under the same necessity, in order to their giving evidence, and hence it is lawful for them likewise to look in the face of a strange woman, where they are desirous of giving evidence concerning her. — With respect, however, to looking merely in order to bear testimony, it is certain that this is not allowable where there is any apprehension of lust, since others might be found free from such influence; which argument does not apply at the time of actually giving evidence.

A woman be looked at with a view to marriage. — A man may without blame look on a woman whom he has an inclination to marry, notwithstanding he knows that it will inflame his passion.

Rules to be observed by a physician in prescribing for women. — A physician, in administering to a strange woman, is permitted to look at the part affected. It is, however, most advisable that he instruct another woman how to apply the remedy, as the circumstance of an individual of one sex looking at another of the same is of less consequence. If he should not be able to procure a fit woman to instruct, it is in that case incumbent on him to cover all the member affected by the woman, leaving exposed only the particular part affected, when he may look towards it; refraining from it however as much as is possible, since anything the sufficiency of which is prompted by necessity, ought to be exercised with as much restriction as the circumstances of the case will admit. — In the same manner also, it is lawful for a man, in administering a gynecia to a woman, to look at the proper part.

A man may view or touch any part of another man, except his nakedness. — One man may, without blame, look at any part of another, except from beneath the navel up to the knee; because the Prophet has said, "the nakedness of a man is from the navel to the knee;" and as, in another tradition, it is said, "from beneath the navel," it may thence be inferred that the navel is not included, but that the knee is so. — Still, however, in this a gradation is observed; for the exposure of the knee is of less consequence than that of the thigh, as on the other hand the exposure of the thigh is not so bad as that of the positive nakedness, or genitals; wherefore a person is to be proved mildly when he leaves his knee bare; to be treated more harshly when he covers not his thigh; and, in the case of exposing his genitals, must be compelled by punishments to cover them.

Every part of a man, which it is proper for another to look at, may likewise, without blame, be touched by him; for the sight and the touch of those parts of a man which are not nakedness are considered in the same light.

A woman also, may look at any part of a man except his nakedness (provided she be free from lust). — Women may lawfully look at a man, except in the space from the navel up to the knee; provided they be secure from lust; for men and women are considered as alike, in looking at parts not private, the same in looking at a dress or a quadraped. (In the Mabsoot, under the head of Hermaphrodites, it is related that a woman looking at a strange man resembles a man looking at his female relation in which case it is unlawful that he look at her back or belly, * lest he thereby excite lust.) — If, however, a woman be inflamed with lust, or harbour a strong suspicion that looking at a man would create it, or be in any degree doubtful about it, in either of these cases it is most becoming that she shut her eyes, and avoid looking at a strange man; and if a man also be thus circumstanced, it is incumbent on him to close his eyes, nor must he look at a strange woman; because lust having great power over women, is considered as always operating upon them; and when men are also subject to a passion of that nature, it exists then on the part of both; and this is a weighty reason for rendering their looking at each other illegal. It is otherwise where the woman is influenced and not the man, for then there is not an equally cogent reason to render it unlawful, one party only being in that case inflamed with lust.

Or at any such part of another woman. — A woman is permitted to look at any part of another except from under the navel to the knee. This is according to one tradition of Haneefa; but according to another tradition, the looking of one woman at another of her sex, is the same as that of a man at his female relation; that is, they are not permitted to look at the back or belly. The first tradition is, however, the most authentic.

A man may view his wife or his slave in any part. — It is lawful for a man to look at his slave girl in any part, provided he be not related to him within the prohibited degrees; and also at his wife in any part; even in the pudenda, if he please; because the Prophet has said, " shut your eyes from all excepting your wives and female slaves." Nevertheless, it is most becoming that a husband and wife should neither of them look at the genital parts of the other, as the Prophet has said, "when ye copulate with women of your own tribe, you must conceal as much as possible; and be not then naked, as that savours too much of the custom of asses." A man may look at the person of his kinswoman. — It is lawful for a man to look at his female relation either in the face, head, breast, shoulder, or legs: for as it is usual

with relations to visit one another without any previous intimation, and unattended with any retinue, and as women, in their house, generally wear a dress adapted to service, if, therefore, the sight of the parts of the body which would inspire too great restraint upon them. It is different with respect to other parts; and hence proceeds the illegality of looking at the back or belly. (It is proper to observe that by the term relation [Mohrim], as here used, it to be understood any person between whom and the beholder marriage is utterly and perpetually illegal, in consequence of affinity by either blood or marriage.)

Male and female relations may touch each other (if there be no apprehension of passion.) — Every part in a relation which it is lawful to look at may likewise be touched; unless, however, there be a dread of its inflaming the passion of either, in which case neither the sight nor the touch is approved.

Or sit in private of travel together.—There is no impropiety in a man sitting in private with his female relation, or travelling with her; because the Prophet has said, "No woman shall travel more than three days and three nights, unless accompanied by her husband, or her relation; and if, in this case the woman should have occasion to mount upon, or descend from a horse the man may then, in assisting her, without blame, touch her back or belly, if covered, and provided he be sure of his passion, but otherwise he must beware of touching her."

A man may look at the female slave of another, in the same manner as his kinswoman. — Every part which it is lawful for a man to look at in his female relation, may likewise be viewed by him in the female slave of another, whether she be an absolute slave, a Modabira a Moktaba, or an Am-Walid; for as a slave is necessitated to wear clothes adapted to servile employments, that she may discharge the business of her master, and attend upon his guests, her condition without the house is therefore the same, in relation to stranger, as that of a free woman without the house, in regard to her kinsman. — With respect to privacy, or travelling with the female slave of another, many have said that it is allowed, in the same manner as in the case of a female relation. — Some however, declare it improper, as not being justified by necessity. Mohammed; in the Mabasot, has said that the assisting of a female to ascend or descend from a horse is approved, provided it be in a case of necessity.

And may also touch her with a view to purchase. — It is permitted to a man to touch a female slave when he has an inclination to buy her, notwithstanding he may be apprehensive of lust. It is so related in the abridgment of Kadooree; and Muhammad, in the Jama Saghier, has given a similar absolute opinion in this case, without making any exceptions as to the circumstance of lust. The two disciples, on the other hand, maintain that although, on account of necessity, it be proper for a person to look at a slave girl when he is about to purchase her, notwithstanding it may be the means of inflaming his passion, still it is improper to purchase her without a complete remission of passion, or where there is a probability of its being excited. In case of an exemption from passion, however, they hold it allowable either to touch or look at her.

An adult female slave must be put in a decent habit. — When a female slave arrives at maturity, it is improper to leave her in drawers only: on the contrary, it is requisite that she have two clothes, in order that her back and belly may be covered, as these, with regard to her, may be considered as privy parts. It is moreover reported, from Mohammed, that when a female slave reaches the age of puberty, she must not be exposed in drawers only as that may occasion lust.

An eunuch or hermaphrodite is the same as a man with respect to those rules. — A Kiasee, or simple eunuch, is considered in the same light with a man, whence anything prohibited to a man is so likewise to him, for he possesses virility, and is not disabled from copulation; and the same, also, of a Majooob or complete eunuch; for he is likewise capable of friction, and has the power of passing semen; and so likewise of a hermaphrodite, as he is merely a defective man.

A male slave must not view his mistress but in the face or hands. — It is not lawful for a male slave to view his mistress, except in the face, or palm of the hands, in the same manner as a strangers. Malik maintains that a slave is in the predicament of a kinsman within the prohibited degrees (and such also is the opinion of Shafeei); because his mistress is subject to his entering her apartment frequently without intimation. The arguments of our doctors are, that the slave is a man neither related to her as a kinsman nor husband; that he is liable to be influenced by a passion towards her, as marriage may eventually be lawful between them (that is, in case of his emancipation); and that there is no necessity for his approaching her without leave, as the business of a slave properly lies without the house.

A man may gratify his passion with his female slave in whatever way he pleases. — It is lawful for a man to perform the act of Azil* with his female slave without her consent, whereas he cannot lawfully do so by his wife unless with her permission. — The reason of this is that the Prophet has forbidden the act of Azil with a free woman without her consent, but has permitted it to a master in the case of his female slave. Besides, carnal connexion is the right of a free woman for the gratifying of her passion, and the propagation of children (whence it is that a wife is at liberty to reject a husband who is an eunuch or impotent); whereas a slave possesses no such right.—A man, therefore, is not at liberty to injure the right of his wife, whereas a master is absolute with respect to his slave. If, also, a man should marry the female slave of another, he must not perform the act of Azil with her without the consent of her master.

Section V.

Of Istibra, of waiting for the Purification of Women.

A man must not have connexion with his purchased female slave until one term of her courses have elapsed.—A man, when he purchases a female slave, is not permitted either to enjoy her, or to touch, or kiss her, or look at her pudenda, in lust, until after her Istibra, or purification from her next ensuing courses; for when the captives taken in the battle of Antass were brought thence, the Prophet ordained that no man should have carnal connexion with pregnant women until after their delivery, or with others until after one menstruation; which evinces that the abstinence so enjoined is incumbent on a proprietor; and further, that the occurrence of right of property and of possession is the occasion of its being incumbent. The end proposed in this regulation is, that it may be ascertained whether conception has not already taken place in the womb, in order that the issue may not be doubtful.

But this rule operates only on the purchaser, not on the seller.—Abstinence until after purification is incumbent on the buyer, but not on the seller; for the true reason of its necessity is the desire of copulation; and as the buyer is presumed to possess this desire, and not the seller, the observance of it is thereby enjoined him, and not the other. If, moreover, desire be an internal operation of the mind, the obligation of the law in this particular, rests upon the argument of such desire. Now the more power of committing the carnal act is an argument of the desire for such act; and as this power is established only by property and possession it follows that property and possession are the occasions of this obligation of abstinence.

This law, therefore, extends to a right of property, in all its different modes of being acquired, such as by purchase, donation, legacy, inheritance, covenants, &c., whence it is that this abstinence is enjoined upon a person, who buys a female slave, either from an infant, or a woman, or from a slave licensed to trade, or from a person who is by law prohibited from having any carnal connexion with her. In the same manner also, this abstinence is incumbent where a person buys a female slave who is a virgin; for the law proceeds according to the proof of the cause which prompted it, and not according to the proof of the propriety or expediency, as those relate to what is internal and unknown.

In the purchase of a menstruous female slave, the purchaser must wait for another complete term.—If a person purchase a female slave during her menstruation, no regard is paid to this menstruation with respect to determining the abstinence.† In the same manner, also no regard is paid to a menstruation which occurs between the time of taking possession and the time of the right of property being established, by purchase, or the like; and so likewise, regard is not paid to the delivery of a female slave between the establishment of a right of property in her, and the act of taking possession (contrary, however, to the opinion of Aboo Yousif). The reason of this, is that the occurrence of right of property and possession is the cause of purification being required; and the obligation of observing the purification is an effect of property and possession; and the effect cannot take place before the occurrence of the cause. The same rule holds with regard to such menstruous purgations as may happen previous to the procuring of sanction, in the case of an unauthorized sale of a female slave, notwithstanding the purchaser may be seised of her; and so likewise, where the courses happen after the seisin in the case of an illegal contract of sale, and before the slave is purchased by a valid contract; for in none of all these do the present courses determine the abstinence.

A person purchasing his partner's share in a female slave must wait until her next purification. Abstinence is requisite in the case of a partnership female slave, where one of two partners purchases the other's share; for here the cause is complete, and upon the completion of the cause the effect takes place.

Other rules to be observed respecting female slaves.—If a person purchase a Magian female slave, or receive her in donation, and

* The phraseology runs throughout this section which renders the translation of it into English particularly difficult, as the precise meaning of the term Istibra cannot be expressed by any single word in our language. The best Arabic lexicons define Istibra to signify "the purification of the womb." The term, however, must here be received in a more involved sense; for Istibra does not, in fact, mean simply purification, but a desire of, or (as rendered in the text) a waiting for purification; for which reason the translator renders it purification, or abstinence, as best suits the context.

† Arab, Fee babul Istibra; (literally) "in point of purification," meaning that purification requisite to determine the abstinence imposed on the purchaser of a female slave.
she, after his taking possession of her, have her courses, and then become a Muslima,—or, if a person purchase a female slave, and make her a Mokatiba, and she, after his taking possession of her, having voided her courses, prove unable to discharge her ransom,—such courses are sufficient to establish the requisite purification, in either of these cases, as having happened after the occurrence of the cause for waiting, namely, right of property and possession.

In cases where a female slave, having eloped, returns to her master,—or, having been taken away, or hired out, is restored,—or, having been pawned, is redeemed,—abstinence is not requisite, for the cause of it (namely, the acquisition of property and possession) does not exist in either instance.

Where the carnal act is unlawful, all incentives to it are prohibited.—In every case where abstinence is enjoined, and carnal connexion prohibited, all sorts of allurements and dalliance, such as kissing and hugging, alike prohibited, as these lead to the commission of unlawful acts. Add to this, the possibility of their being committed on the property of another, as may happen if the slave prove with child and the seller lay claim to her. (It is reported from Mohammed that dalliance with a captive slave girl is lawful.)

Pregnant women are purified by delivery, and immature females by the lapse of a month.—The purification of a pregnant female slave is established by her delivery, and that of a girl in whom the menses have not yet appeared, by the lapse of a month, that space being, with respect to such an one, a substitute for the courses, in the same manner as holds in the case of a woman under Edit.* If, however, the menstrual blood should discharge itself before the expiration of the month, the purification by lapse of time is annulled, because of the ability with respect to the original circumstance, prior to accomplishing the object of the substitute.

Rule respecting adult females not subject to the courses.—If the courses be delayed in a female slave who is of age to be subject to them, it is in that case requisite to refrain from any carnal connexion with her, until it appear that she is not pregnant, when it becomes lawful to cohabit with her. (This opinion is quoted from Haneefa, in the Zahir Rawayet, without specifying any particular term.)

Devices used to elude the abstinence required.—It is allowable, according to Aboo Yoosaf, to elude the abstinence by the practice of a device; in opposition to the opinion of Mohammed. The arguments of each on this point have been already detailed under the head of Shaffa.—The opinion of Aboo Yoosaf has been adopted by Kazaees in their decisions, where it has appeared that the seller had not cohabited with the slave from the period of her courses antecedent to the sale;—and, according to the opinion of Mohammed, when the contrary has been proved.

The device which may be practised in a case where the purchaser is not married to a free woman, is that he may first marry the slave, and then purchase her.—If, on the contrary, he be already married to a free woman, the device in that case is that the seller, previous to the sale, or the purchaser, before taking possession, give the slave in marriage to another person (who must, however, be one in whom they can confide, that he will not cohabit with her, and that he will inform her), and then, that the party purchase the slave, in the former instance, or take possession of her, in the latter,—and the husband divorce her:—because as the purchaser was at any rate prohibited from cohabiting with the slave at the time when the cause of the abstinence first operated (that is, when he first acquired property and possession), no abstinence is therefore required after she did become lawful to him, as regard is paid to the time and circumstances under which the cause takes place;—in the same manner as where a person purchases and takes possession of a slave who is in her Edit,—in which case, upon the expiration of the term of Edit, abstinence is no longer required, since in this case the slave was nonlawful to the purchaser at the time of the cause taking place.

A person pronouncing Zihar must entirely abstain from his wife until he have made expiation.—It is not lawful for a person who has given abusive language to his wife, either to look at her pudenda in lust, or to cohabit with her, or to kiss or touch her until such time as he have performed expiation; because, as it is unlawful for him to copulate with her until after expiation, it is, consequently, unlawful that he enter into dalliances with her, since the cause of an illegal act is likewise illegal;—in the same manner as holds in cases of Yttikaf and

*This condition is here made, because it is not lawful for a Mussulman to marry a slave if he should be previously married to a free woman. (See Vol. I., p. 31.)
† It is here understood that marriage exempts from abstinence.
‡ Literally, "it is not lawful for a Moazhir,"—meaning a person who has, pronounced a sentence to Zihar upon his wife. (This whole passage will be better understood by a reference to a Zihar, Vol. I., p. 117.)
§ Yttikaf is a religious austerity practised by the most pious of the Mussulmans in the last ten days of the month of Ramzan; they remain during that period in a mosque, without ever departing from it but Ihram;* or where a person, by mistake, cohabits with the wife of another,—in which case she must observe an Edit; during which, as it is unlawful for the husband to have connexion with his wife, so it is likewise unlawful for him to use any of its internal parts with her. It is otherwise during the courses or fasting, for, although copulation be at such time prohibited, yet dalliance is lawful, because the courses are frequent and of long continuance, engrossing a great part of life, as they happen once every month, and continue ten days every time;—and, in the same manner, the days of fasting are protracted to one month by the divine ordinances, and (among pious persons) voluntarily occupy a considerable part of life;—whence if dalliances were forbidden during these terms, it would tend to restrain men too much in their enjoyments.

A person indulging in wantonness with two female slaves who are sisters, must put one of them away before he can have connexion with the other.—If a person, incited by passion, should kiss two female slaves who are sisters, he is not in that case permitted to have carnal connexion with either of them, or to kiss, touch, or look at the pudenda of either in lust, until he render one of them unlawful to him, either by making her the property of another, in whatever manner he may choose, or by giving her to another in marriage, or by emancipating her; because it is not lawful either to copulate or to enter into dalliance (such as kissing or hugging) with two sisters. But whenever one of them is rendered unlawful, the enjoyment of the other is permitted to him.—(The transfer of a part of the slave in this instance, is the same as a transfer of the whole, with respect to the illegality of enjoyment; † and so likewise the emancipating her, or rendering her a Mokatiba in part.) If, on the contrary, he let one of them to hire, or pawa her, or create her a Modabib, the other is not thereby made lawful to him, as he does not by any of these acts relinquish his property in her. If, also, he should give one of them in marriage to any person by an invalid contract, he does not thereby acquire a right to enjoy the other; unless, however, the husband of that one consummated the marriage, in which case an Edit is incumbent upon her, and this is the same as a valid marriage, with regard to rendering the enjoyment of her illegal. If, also, he once carnally enjoy one of them, he may afterwards continue to do so—but he cannot then lawfully have connexion with the other; for if so, it would be a connexion with two sisters, which is unlawful: but this consequence is not induced by connexion with one of them.

Any two women who are related to each other in a degree that prevents their being lawfully married to the same person, are considered as sisters, and are consequently subject to the rules exhibited in the preceding case.

Men must not kiss or embrace each other. It is abominable for one man to kiss another either in the face or hand, or on any other part; as it is likewise for two men to embrace each other. Tahavee reports that this is the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed; but that Aboo Yoosaaf holds it not improper for a man either to kiss or embrace another; because it is related that when Jaffer came from Abyssinia the Prophet embraced him and kissed him between the eyes. The argument advanced by Haneefa and Mohammed is a tradition that the Prophet prohibited both kissing and embracing; and with respect to the circumstance adduced by Aboo Yoosaaf, it must be construed as having happened prior to the prohibition. The learned, however, have said that this disagreement between our doctors concerning the act of embracing, respects only a case where men are not properly dressed, as where, for instance, they are in drawers only; but that those acts are allowable, in the opinion of all our doctors, when the parties are clothed with an under and upper garment.—This is the most approved doctrine.

But they may join hands.—Two joining hands by way of salutation is allowable; for the Prophet has said, "Whosoever joins his hand to that of his brother Mrassu man, and shakes it, shall be forgiven of his sins."

Section VI.

Of the Rules to be observed in Sale

Dung may be sold; but not human excrement.—Three is no impropriety in the sale of dung; but it is abominable to sell human excrement. Shafiei maintains that the sale of dung is likewise abominable, because of its being actually filthy; in the same manner as excrement, or the undressed skin of a dead animal.—The argument of the Haneeefites upon this point is, that dung is capable of yielding profit, as it is commonly strewed upon land, in order to render it more fertile; and as it thus yields a profit, it is therefore a valuable property, the sale of which is lawful.

Unless mixed with mud.—It is otherwise with respect to excrement, as that is incapable of profit, unless it be mixed with mud, when the calls of nature absolutely force them, abstaining themselves at the same time from all enjoyments.

* Ihram is the ten period during which pilgrims remain at Mecca. They are then subject to a number of strict regulations, and are particularly enjoined to refrain from all worldly pleasures.

† That is to say, he will as completely render one of the sisters illegal (or forbidden) to him (and consequently legalize his connexion with the other) by selling or otherwise transferring his property in a part of her, as by transferring her in toto.
A person may purchase and have connexion with a female slave on the faith of the seller’s assertion respecting her.—If a person see another selling a female slave, he at the same time knowing her to be the property of some other person, and he be informed by the seller that “he has been empowered by that other to dispose of her,” it is in that case lawful for him to purchase her, and have carnal connexion with her; and the word of one man, although he be not upright,† may be received in temporal matters, provided there by no opponent to shake the credit of his testimony.—The same rule also holds if the seller allege that he had received her in donation from the other, or that he had bought her from him; with this difference, however, that he is here required to be of an upright and trustworthy character; and so likewise if he be not trustworthy, provided the purchaser believes that he speaks truth; but if he disbelieve him, it is not lawful for him to purchase the slave. The law is the same, if the purchaser, not having previously known the female slave, be informed by the seller, that “she is the property of another who has empowered him to sell her,”—or that “he has purchased her from such a person.”—If, on the other hand, knowing her to have been in the possession of another he do not receive any information from the seller, he cannot in that case lawfully purchase her until he know by what means the seller has acquired a property in her; for having been in the possession of another is an argument of her being the property of another. If, on the contrary, he should not know her to have been before the property of another, he may then lawfully purchase her, notwithstanding the seller bear a bad character; because possession, even with an unjust man, argues property; and suspicion, or probable conjecture, lose all force in any case where a legal argument can be urged. Where it is evident, however; that a person of such appearance as the seller is not likely to be the proprietor of her, it is most prudent on that account to avoid buying her. Nevertheless, if the purchase be made—there are hopes of its being lawful, because of its being supported by a legal argument.

But if the seller be a slave, precaution must be used.—If the person who offers the female slave to sell be a slave, male or female, in that case the other must neither accept nor purchase her until he enquire into the circumstances; because as property cannot be a proprietor, it is evident that some other is the proprietor of her. If, however, the seller inform him that “his master had licensed him to sell her,” his word may in that case be taken, provided he be upright and trustworthy; but if he be otherwise, the purchaser must be guided by probable opinion; and if he have not the means of forming any opinion of him, whether good or bad, he must not in that case purchase her, or admit his allegation concerning her.

A woman may marry (after observing her Edit) on receiving authentic information of her widowhood or divorce.—If a person of an upright and trustworthy character inform a woman that her husband who was absent had died, or that he had divorced her thrice,—or, if a person of a reprobate character deliver her a letter from her husband, wherein he acquaints her of his having divorced her, and she, not knowing for certain that the letter was written by her husband; should believe this to be so, and in either of these cases she may lawfully observe her Edit, and then marry;—because in this instance a circumstance destructive of the former marriage has occurred without any person appearing to contradict it. In the same manner, also, if a woman inform a man that her husband haddivorced her, and that the stated period of her forbearance had elapsed, the man may lawfully marry her. If also, a woman inform her former husband who had divorced her thrice, that “after the lapse of her Edit she had married another, with whom she had cohabited, and that having divorced her she had again completed her Edit from that divorce,” the first husband may in that case lawfully marry her again. The law is also the same where a woman informs a person that, having been a slave she had received her freedom.

Information tending to annul a marriage, must not be credited unless supported by testimony.—If a person inform a woman that her marriage had been originally unlawful, insomuch as her husband was at that time an apostate, or her foster-brother, his word is not in that case to be credited, unless confirmed by the evidence of two men, or of one man and two women. So likewise, if a person inform another that his wife had been an apostate at the time of marriage, or that she is his foster-sister, he is not in that case permitted either to marry the sister of that woman, or to marry other four women, until the information so given be fortified by the attestation of two upright men. For here the husband is informed of an illegal circumstance co-existent with the marriage; whereas his execution of the contract of marriage is an argument in favour of its validity, and a denial of its invalidity; and hence the information of the other is apparently contradicted. The case is otherwise, however, if a person, having married a child, should be informed that she had afterwards sucked the milk of his mother or sister; for the information so given is to be believed.

* Because in this case the mud or manure is the article sold, the ordures being merely a dependant.
† Arab. Adil, in opposition to Fasik.
since here the bar to the marriage is subsequent to, and not co-existent with, the contract; and the execution of the contract, being antecedent to the circumstance of its illegality, does not therefore afford any proof of its non-existence; whence the information is not controverted.

A man is not at liberty to marry a female slave on her informing him that she is free. —If a girl, so young as to be unable to give any account of herself, being in the possession of a man who asserts her to be his property, should be afterwards when she arrives at the age of maturity, not in another city by a man who formerly knew her, and tell him that “she is a free woman.” he is not, on the strength of her word, permitted to marry her, as there is an argument against the truth of it, namely, her having been in the possession of another.

A Mussulman is not allowed to pay his debts by the sale of wine; but a Christian may pay his debts in this manner. —If a Mussulman, involved in debt, should sell wine, it is abominable in his creditor to receive payment in the money so obtained; whereas, if the debtor were a Christian, it would be allowable so to do. The reason of this distinction is, that in the former instance the sale was invalid, as wine is not valuable to Mussulmans, and the price of it being therefore the property of the purchaser, cannot be lawfully received in payment. In the latter instance, on the contrary, the sale was lawful, wine being a valuable commodity amongst Christians; and as, consequently the price of it is the property of the seller, the discharge of a debt from such price is lawful.

It is abominable to monopolize the necessaries of life; or to forestall the market. —It is abominable to monopolize the necessaries of life, and food for cattle, in a city where such monopoly is likely to prove detrimental. So likewise it is abominable to forestall † as where people leave a city to meet a caravan with a view to purchase goods and lay them up. This however, is immaterial, when it tends not to the injury of any one. The argument, in this case, is a tradition of the Prophet, who said, “Blessed is he Jann, and accused is the monopolizer.” (By Jahb is to be understood a merchant who brings camels, goats, and so forth, for sale.) Another argument is, that grain is connected with the rights of every one, whence the withholding it from sale is an invasion of the general rights of mankind, and an occasion of scarcity in their necessary food. Such an act is therefore abominable where the effects of it are extended to the people; as is the case when the monopoly is made in a small city. It is otherwise, however, where it carries not along with it any sensible detriment to the people, as where it is done in a large city. This law is similar in the case of forestalling. The learned, however, remark that this is where the purchasers neither conceal from the market the price current of the market, nor deceive them in it; for if they either conceal or deceive them in the established prices, the anticipation of the market is in such case abominable, whether it be hurtful in its consequences or otherwise. The restriction of the term Ihtikar, or monopoly, to the necessaries of life and the food of animalis according to Haneefah. Aboo Yoosaf has said that the hoarding of anything, the detention of which from circulation produces bad consequences, although it be such articles as gold, silver, or cloth, comes equally within the definition of a monopoly. It is reported from Mohammed, on the contrary that the withholding of cloth from the market does not constitute a monopoly. It therefore appears that, according to Aboo Yoosaf, regard is paid to the actual detriment in determining the monopoly, as that is the cause of its being abominated; whereas, according to Haneefah, regard is paid to the particular detriment. Decrees pass according to the latter opinion. It is to be observed that, if the period of detention be short, it is not a monopoly, as not being then attended with any detriment. If, on the contrary the period be long, it becomes an abominable monopoly, as it then induces detriment. Some have said that by a long period is to be understood at least forty days, because of a saying of the Prophet, “Verily, whosoever hoards victuals for the space of forty days is at variance with God, and God is at variance with him.” Others have said that a month is a long space, and that any time less than a short space, and that the degree of guilt rises in proportion to the necessities of the people, and the effect of the monopoly in producing a famine. Others, again, have said, that although there be a fixed period for rendering it punishable in this world, still it is criminal, however short the period may be. In short, it is not good to trade in grain, or commodities of that nature.

But a person may monopolize the product of his own grounds, or what he brings from a distant place. —If a person should hoard a quantity of grain, being the product of his own cultivation, or which he had brought from another city,—in either of these cases it is not deemed an abominable monopoly:

*Arab, Ihtikar. It is explained in the text to signify, in its literal sense, the laying up of anything; and in the language of the law, the purchasing of grain, or other necessaries of life, and keeping them up with a view to enhance the price.

†Arab, Talakkee.

* By trading is not here to be understood simple purchase and sale, but the usual practice of merchants in keeping up their commodities, and watching the turns of the market, in order to sell to the greatest advantage.
it is not so in the first case, because such product being an unmixed right of his own, without any relation to that of other people, he is therefore permitted to hoard it up; and in the same manner as it is lawful for him not to cultivate the seed, so is it lawful for him not to sell the product—now it so in the second case, according to the opinion of Haneefa, the reason in support of which is, that the rights of the people extend only to what is collected in the city, or what is brought thither from its dependencies. Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, deems this practice abominable, because the tradition recorded on this head is absolute. Mohammed, also, has said that every place from which grain is frequently brought to a particular city may be deemed a dependency of it; and that a monopoly of whatever may be brought from such place is forbidden, as the rights of the people are connected with it. It is otherwise, however, where goods are brought from a distant place, such as it is not customary to bring them from; since in that case the rights of the community are not concerned.

Sovereigns must not fix prices.—It is not the duty of sovereigns to establish fixed prices to be paid by the community; because the Prophet has forbidden this, saying, "Establish not prices, as those are regulated by God." Besides, the price is the right of the merchant, and the measure of it is therefore left to him; and sovereigns are not entitled to invade any such right.

except in cases of necessity.—Except where the welfare of the community is concerned, as shall presently be made appear.

A monopolizer, upon information, must be required to sell his superficial provisions.—If a person guilty of a monopoly be brought before the Kazee, he must direct him to sell whatever he may have laid up more than is amply sufficient for the subsistence of himself and family, and must prohibit him from the like practice in future; and if, after this, he should again monopolize, the Kazee may then chastise him at his own discretion.

A combination to raise the price of provisions must be remedied by the magistrate fixing a rate.—If victuallers, taking advantage of the necessity of the people, raise the market to an exorbitant rate, and the Kazee be otherwise unable to maintain the rights of the people; he may in that case regulate the prices, with the assistance of men of ability and discernment. —Notwithstanding if this, however, they should continue to sell their grain at a rate exceeding the fixed standard, the Kazee must confirm the sale, nor has the power of annulling it. This, according to Haneefa, is evident; for he holds it unlawful to inhibit a freeman in this respect—and so likewise, according to the two disciples, unless the inhibition affect only some particular people, since (agreeably to their tenets) inhibition is not allowed where it is indefinite.

Is it lawful for a Kazee to sell the grain of a monopolizer without his consent?—Some say that upon this point there is a diversity of opinion, in the same manner as in the case of selling the effects of a debtor;—whilst others maintain that it is lawful in the opinion of all our doctors, because Haneefa holds it just to inhibit a freeman, with a view to removing a common evil, as is the case in the present instance.

Arms must not be sold to seditious persons.—It is abominable to sell arms in the time of sedition to a person whom the seller knows to be a rebel, as this is a cause of evil. If, however, the seller should not know the purchaser to be engaged in the rebellion, he may then without blame sell arms to him.

The crude juice of fruit may be sold for the purpose of making wine.—There is no impropriety in selling the juice of dates or grapes to a person whom the seller may know intends making wine of it for the evil does not exist in the juice, but in the liquor, after it has been essentially changed. The case is different with respect to selling arms at a time of tumult, since in that instance the evil is established, and exists in the original thing, arms being the instruments of sedition and rebellion.

A house may be let anywhere out of a city for the purpose of a pagoda or a church.—If a person let a house to hire in a village, or in the neighbourhood of a city, in order that the lessee may convert it into a pagoda, or a Christian church, or that he may sell wine in it, it is immaterial, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold such lease to be improper, as tending to promote sin. The arguments adduced by Haneefa are, that the compact is formed with a view to obtain profit from the house, which becomes due immediately upon the delivery: that the guilt exists only in the act of the lessee: and that, as he is a free agent, no crime of his can therefore be imputed upon the lessor. The reason of restricting the place, in this instance, to a village, or the neighbourhood of a city, is because it is illegal to let out a house in a city for any of the above-mentioned purposes as there the light of the Mussulman religion is supposed to blaze, which is not always the case in other places. The learned, however, have said, that this refers only to the neighbourhood of Koofa, because many infidels reside there; but that in any other place where the Mussulman religion prevails it is unlawful. This latter opinion is the most authentic.

The Mussulman may carry wine for an infidel, and receive wages for so doing.—If an infidel hire a Mussulman to carry wine for him, and afterwards pay him for his labour, the money so obtained is lawful to the Mussulman. The two disciples have said that it is abominable, as being the instrument of sin, and likewise because the Prophet (according to the Rawayet Saheeh has denounced curses upon ten several people who are concerned in wine, amongst whom are they who carry it. The argument of Haneefah is, that the sin lies only in the drinking of it, which is the act of a free agent; that the carrying it is no ways allied to the drinking of it; and that the object of the porter is not that another should drink it, but only that he himself should obtain the reward of his labour;—and with respect to the tradition above alluded to, it refers only to a case where the wine is carried with intent to promote sin.

Rules respecting the ground and houses of Mecca.—There is no impropriety in the sale of the walls of the houses at Mecca, but it is abominable to sell the ground on which they stand. This is the opinion of Haneefah. The two disciples have said that the ground of Mecca may likewise be sold; and it is also related that Haneefah acceded to this opinion; because in the same manner as the houses are property, so likewise is the ground. The real opinion of Haneefah, however, is that it is improper; because the Prophet has said, "Mecca is sacred, and the houses therein can neither be sold nor inherited." Mecca, moreover, is sacred, as the being a dependancy of the Kaba, and the place where reverence is particularly shown to it; whence it is not lawful either to hunt at Mecca, or to cut the thorns or grass which grow there (except when they have faded and become parched); or to shake the leaves off the trees growing there.

It is abominable to let the ground of Mecca, because the Prophet has said, "Whoever hires out the ground of Mecca is guilty of usury; whoever has use for the ground at Mecca, let him reside in it; and whoever possesses more than is sufficient for his own purposes, let him bestow it upon others." Implied usury is abominable.—If a person takes from a merchant something he may have occasion for, and leave with him a certain number of dirhms (for example) he is guilty of an abomination; because, in thus taking what he wants, he derives an advantage from a loan (namely, the money he leaves with the merchant); and the Prophet has prohibited us from taking interest on loans. He must therefore first deposit the dirhms with the merchant, and then take from him whatever he may want; as the money in this case a trust, and not a loan, insomuch that the merchant is not subject to pay a compensation in case of the loss of it.

Section VII.
Miscellaneous cases

The Koran ought to be written without marks or points.—It is abominable to distinguish the sentences of the Koran with marks, or to insert in it the points or short vowels. Nevertheless, the learned amongst the moderns have said that these distinctions are proper when made for the use of a foreigner.

Infidels may enter the sacred mosque.—There is no impropriety in a Polytheist entering the sacred mosque. Shafeei held this to be abominable; and Malik has said, that it is improper for such to enter into an mosque. The argument of Shafeei in support of his opinion is, that God has said in the Koran, "Associators are impure, and therefore must not be permitted to enter the sacred mosque." Another argument is, that an infidel is never free from impurity, as he does not perform ablation in such a manner as to work a purification; and an impute man is not allowed to enter into a mosque. The same arguments have been urged by Malik; but he extends them to any mosque. The argument of our doctors in this point is drawn from a tradition that the Prophet lodged several of the tribe of Sakeef, who were infidels, in his own mosque. Besides, as the impurity of an infidel lies in his unbelief, he does not thereby desile a mosque. With respect, moreover, to the text above quoted, it merely alludes to infidels entering a mosque in a haughty and forcible manner, and to a custom which was practised in the days of ignorance of walking about the mosque naked.

It is abominable to keep castrated cattle.—It is abominable for a Mussulman to keep castrated cattle in his service; as the employment of them is a motive with men for reducing others to a like state, a practice which is proscribed in the sacred writings.

It is allowed to castrate cattle.—It is not abominable to castrate cattle, or to make a horse copulate with an ass, as these tend to the benefit of mankind. Besides, it is related, in the Nakl Saheeh, that the Prophet rode upon a mule, which if such promiscuous procreation of animals had been prohibited, he would never have done, as thereby a door would have been opened to sin.

A Jew or Christian, may be visited during sickness.—There is no impropriety in visiting a Jew or Christian during their sickness, as this affords them a kind of consolation; and the law does not prohibit us from thus consoling them. Nay, we are told in the Nakl Saheeh, that the Prophet visited Jew who lay sick in his neighbourhood.

Vain invocations in prayer not allowed.—It is abominable that a person, in offering up prayers to God, should say, "I beseech thee, by the glory of thy heavens!" or "by the splendour of thy throne!" for a style of

*Arab. Moshiirak i.e. an associater, including all who deny the unity of the Godhead, and therefore applying to (trinitarian) Christians as well as to Idolators.
†This is a mosque in Mecca, so called because the Prophet most frequently offered up prayers in it.
‡That is, in the Koran, which is termed, by way of pre-eminence, the Shara, or Law.
this nature would lead to suspect that the Almighty derived glory from the heavens; whereas the heavens are created, but God, with all His attributes, is eternal and immutable. It is, however, recorded by Aboo Yoosaf, that there is no impropriety in this (an opinion which has been likewise adopted by Aboo Lais), because it is related of the Prophet that he offered up a similar prayer to God. Our doctors, on the other hand, have urged that this tradition is uncertain; and that to abstain from whatsoever is suspected of being wrong is most prudent and advisable.

It is abominable to say, in a prayer, “I beseech thee, O God, by the right of” (any particular person), or “by the right of” (any of the Prophets); because none of his creatures is possessed of any right with respect to the Creator.

Gaming is disallowed.—It is an abomination to play at chess, dice, or any other game; for if anything he staked it is gambling, which is expressly prohibited in the Koran; or, if, on the other hand, nothing be hazarded, it is useless and vain. Besides the Prophet has declared all the entertainments of a Muslim to be vain excepting three; the breaking in of his horse; the drawing of his bow; and the playing and amusing himself with his wives. Several of the learned, however, deem the game of chess to be allowed, as having a tendency to quicken the understanding; which opinion has also been ascribed to Shafei.—Our doctors have founded their judgment in this particular on a saying of the Prophet, “Whosoever plays at chess or dice does as, it were, plunge his hand into the blood of a hog.” Moreover, plays of this nature are apt to withhold men from the adoration and worship of God at the set periods; and the Prophet has said, “Whosoever tends to relax men in their duty to God is considered in the same light with the practice of gaming.” It is also proper to remark, that if a man play at chess for a stake it destroys the integrity of his character, and renders him a Fastik, or reprobate: but if he do not play at it for a stake, the integrity of his character is not affected. Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed hold it abominable to salute any person that is engaged in play: since, in thus refraining, our abhorrence of gaming may be expressed. Hence, on the contrary, holds to proper, as being the means of diverting the parties from their game.

Presents (except of cloth or money) and entertainments may be accepted from a mercantile slave.—There is no impropriety in a person receiving a present from a slave who is a merchant; or in accepting from him an invitation to an entertainment; or in borrowing his carriage; but it is abominable to receive from him a present either of cloth or money. What is here advanced proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that there is no difference whatever between his invitations and his presents consisting of cloth or money;—in other words, they are all equally abominable in the acceptance, as being all gratuitous acts, to which a slave is not competent.—The reason, however, for a more favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is that the Prophet accepted a present from Soliman when he was a slave, and from Barea when she was a Mokaathib. A number of the companions, also, accepted an invitation from the freedman of Aboo Russaid whilst he was yet a slave. There is, moreover, a sort of necessity which operates upon a mercantile slave, and obliges him to give into these several customs. Thus, for instance, if a person, having gone to his shop with a view to purchase wares, and having requested of him something to drink, should be refused by him, in that case he would consequently incur the imputation of covetousness, few people would frequent his shop, and his trade would thereby be ruined.

Besides, when a slave is permitted to trade, he implicitly possesses all the power of a merchant in its full extent. But he is under no necessity of clothing people, or of distributing money to them; and hence it is not allowed to him to perform such acts, in conformity with what analogy suggests upon this subject.

General rules with respect to infant orphans or foundlings.—Is a person beseeching anything in gift or signs upon an orphan* under the protection of a particular person, it is lawful for that person to take possession of such gift or alms on his behalf. It is here proper to remark, that acts in regard to infant orphans are of three descriptions.—I. Acts of guardianship, such as contracting an infant in marriage, or selling or buying goods for him; power which belongs solely to the Walee, or natural guardian, whom the law has constituted the infant’s substitute in those points. Acts arising from the wants of an infant; such as buying or selling for him on occasions of need; or hiring a nurse for him, or the like; which power belongs to the maintainer of the infant, whether he be the brother, uncle, or (in the case of founding) the Moolatkai, or takar-up, or the mother, provided she be maintainer of the infant; and as these are empowered with respect to such acts, the Walee, or natural guardian, is also empowered with respect to them in a still superior degree;—nor is it requisite, with respect to the guardian, that the infant be in his immediate protection.—III. Acts which are purely advantageous to the infant, such as accepting presents or gifts, and keeping them for him; a power which may be exercised either by a Moolatkai, a brother, or an uncle, and also by the infant himself; provided he be possessed of discretion, the intention being only to open a door to the infant’s re-

* Arab. Lankut. Properly, a founding.

CULTIVATION OF WASTE LANDS

receipt of beneficial or advantageous nature.—The infant, therefore, is empowered in regard to those acts (provided he be discreet), or any person under whose protection he may happen to be.

It is not lawful for the Muhtasib to take up a foundling to hire him out in service; nor is it lawful for an uncle to do so to his infant nephew, although he be under his immediate care. It is otherwise with a mother; for she may lawfully let her infant child to hire, provided she have immediate charge of him; because a mother is empowered to use the services of her infant child by employing him, without tendering him any return,—whereas a Muhtasib or an uncle has not this power.—If the child should of himself enter into an engagement of service, it is not valid, as there is a possibility of its tending to his prejudice.—Still, however, if after having hired himself out he should fulfil his engagement, it is then valid; because in thus confirming it his advantage only is consulted; and he is consequently entitled to the hire agreed for.

A master must not fix an iron collar on the neck of his slave.—It is abominable for a person to fix an iron collar on the neck of his slave in such a manner as to deprive him of the power of moving his head, according to the custom of tyrants; because a punishment of this nature is like the torment of the damned, and is consequently unlawful, in the same manner as scourging with fire.

But he may imprison him.—A Mussulman may imprison his slave; for as a custom prevails amongst the Mussulmans of confining people who are mad or seditious, so in a similar manner it is lawful for a person to confine a slave, that he may prevent his absconding, and thus secure his property.

Glysters are allowed in case of necessity.—It is not abominable to apply a glyster in a cause of need; because medical practices are approved, in the united opinion of all our doctors, as well as by the traditions of the Prophet. An application of this kind is, moreover, equally proper, whether it be administered to a man or woman. It is not allowable, however, to have recourse to any forbidden thing, such as wine, or the like; for it is unlawful to seek health by unlawful means.

The allowances of a Kazee are to be defrayed from the public treasury.—It is not improper to defray the allowances of a Kazee from the public treasury, because the Prophet nominated Abul Bin Osman Kazee of Mecca, appointing him his allowance from the public treasury there; and he also nominated Ali to be Kazee of Yemen, appointing him his allowance from the treasury there.—Besides, as a Kazee is, by the nature of his office, confined to the business of guarding the rights of Mussulmans, his maintenance is therefore drawn from their property (and the public treasury is the property of the Mussulman community); for a confinement to any particular office or duty entitles to maintenance; as holds in the case of an executor, or a Mozarib factor who travels, with the stock.—It is to be observed, however, that the propriety of the Kazee receiving his allowance from the public treasury is only where he takes it in a satisfactory manner, without any condition; for if he should refuse to undertake the office, unless the sovereign allow him a certain salary, it is unlawful; because he in such case demands a reward for the discharge of an act of piety; for such the office of a Kazee is; nay, the exercise of jurisdiction is the noblest species of devotion.—It is also proper to remark, that if a Kazee be poor, it is most eligible, or rather incumbent on him to receive his maintenance from the public treasury; for otherwise he would be unable to support the dignity of his office from a necessary attention towards the concerns of his subsistence. If, on the contrary, he be rich, some deem it most eligible that he should not receive his allowance from the public treasury; whilst others maintain that it is incumbent on him so to do. The latter is the better opinion; because otherwise the office might be rendered low and contemptible; and also because, if an indigent person should succeed a rich Kazee, it would then be difficult for him to procure a salary, as that had been, perhaps, for a long time relinquished.

Case of a Kazee dismissed after having received his allowance.—If a Kazee, having possessed himself of one year's allowance, should be dismissed from his office before the expiration of that year, there is in this case a disagreement amongst our doctors, in the same manner as they have differed in opinion where a wife dies in a similar predicament.* The better opinion, however, is that he should restore the excess.

Female slaves may travel without being attended by a kinsman.—There is no impropriety in a female slave or an Am-Walid travelling without being attended by a kinsman; because a stranger (as has been already explained) is considered the same as a kinsman with respect to looking at or touching a female slave; and an Am-Walid is also a slave, as being property, although she cannot be sold.

BOOK XLV.

OF THE CULTIVATION OF WASTE LANDS.†

Definition of Mawat.—Mawat (which is here rendered waste land) signifies any piece

*See Vol. I., p. 143.
† Arab. Ahyun-al-Mawat, meaning, literally, the revival of the dead.
of ground incapable of yielding advantage, either from a want of water, an inundation, or any other cause, such as prevents tillage; and it is termed Mawat, or dead, because, like the dead, it is of no use.

And description of the land so termed.—Any piece of ground which, from a long time, has lain waste without belonging to any person, or which has been formerly the property of a Mussulman, who is not then known and is likewise so far removed from a village that, if a person call by from hence his voice cannot there be heard, is termed Mawat. The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this is the explanation of it as delivered by Kadooree. It is reported from Mohammed that it is requisite the ground be neither the property of a Mussulman nor a Zimmee; and likewise, that it be of no use; in which case it becomes absolutely Mawat: but that ground which is the property either of a Mussulman or a Zimmee is not Mawat—If the proprietor he unknown, the ground in the meantime belongs to the Mussulman community; but if he afterwards appear, it must be restored to him, and the cultivator is responsible for whatever damage he may have occasioned.—

With respect to the ground being distant from a village, as mentioned by Kadooree, Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that this is a condition, for this reason, that where the ground is contiguous to a village it cannot be said to be entirely useless to the inhabitants of it. Mohammed holds it sufficient that the villagers do not in reality make use of the ground, whether it be contiguous or not. The same opinion has been delivered by the Imam styled Khahir Zada; but Shims al Ayma, the Sinokshian, has adopted the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

The cultivation of waste lands invests the cultivator with a property in them.—Whosoever cultivates waste lands, with the permission of the chief, obtains a property in them; whereas, if a person cultivate them without such permission, he does not in that case become proprietor, according to Haneefs. The two disciples maintain that, in this case also, the cultivator becomes Proprietor; because of a saying of the Prophet, "Whosoever cultivates waste lands does thereby acquire the property of them." and also because they are a sort of common goods and become the property of the cultivator in virtue of his being the first possessor: in the same manner as in the case of searing game, or gathering firewood. One argument of Haneefa on this point is a saying of the Prophet, "Nothing is lawful to any person but what is permitted by the Imam."—and with respect to the saying quoted by the two disciples, it is to be construed merely into a judicial permission (for the Prophet was himself an Imam).—in the same manner as where he said, "Whoever kills an infidel is entitled to his armour."—Besides, all waste lands are plunder, seeing that the Mussulmans acquired the possession of them by conquest; and hence no person can assume a property in them without the consent of the Imam— as holds in all cases of plunder.

Tithe only is due from land so cultivated, unless it be moistened with tribute water.—If a person cultivate waste land, a tithe only is due from it, for it is unlawful to charge a Mussulman with tribute in the beginning—but if the land be moistened with tribute water, tribute may lawfully be imposed, as it then becomes due on account of the water. Hence, also, a person cultivate waste lands and afterwards relinquish them, and another then cultivate them, some have said that the second cultivator is best entitled to the property; for the first was owner of the profits merely, and not of the land itself; and therefore upon his relinquishing it, the second obtains a superior claim. It is certain, however, that the first cultivator may resume the lands from the second, because he is proprietor of them in virtue of having brought them to a state of cultivation (as appears from the saying of the Prophet quoted in the preceding case), and does not forfeit his property by the relinquishment.

In the cultivation of the circumjacent grounds, a road must be left to it.—If a person cultivate a piece of waste land, and four others afterwards so cultivate the circumjacent ground as to obstruct the passage into his property, it is reported, from Mohammed, that his road is lead through the ground of him who cultivated last; for, after three of the sides bordering upon his property had been cultivated, the other of consequence remains for his ingress and egress; and therefore the person who cultivates it willfully aims at the destruction of his right.

A Zimmee acquires a property in the land he cultivates, as well as a Mussulman.—If a Zimmee cultivate waste lands, he becomes proprietor of them, in the same manner as a Mussulman; because cultivation endows with a right of property. (Haneefa, however, holds that the consent of the Imam is requisite.—A Zimmee and a Mussulman, therefore, are alike in this respect, in the same manner as in all other points of property.

If the land be not cultivated for three years after it is marked off, it may be transferred by the Imam.—If a person circumscribe a piece of ground, and set marks upon it with stones or such like, and keep it in that state for the space of three years without cultivating it, the Imam may in the case lawfully resume it, and assign it to another; because the ground was given to the first with a view to cultivating it, so that a benefit might ensue to the Mussulmans from the collection of the tithe and tribute; and as he neglected this, it is therefore incumbent on the Imam to deliver it over to another, that the end for which it was given to the first may be answered,—Moreover, the encompassing of the ground with stones, &c., does not, like cultivation, create a right of property, since by cultivating the land is understood rendering it productive, whereas the encompassing it with stones serves merely to designate the boundaries: the land, therefore, still remains unappropriated as before. With respect to the specification of three years, as here mentioned, it is founded on a saying of Omar, 'The marker has no right after three years have elapsed.'—It also proceeds on this principle, that three periods of time are requisite for a person who marks lands; one, that he may go to his place of abode after having set the marks; another, that he may there settle his affairs; and a third that he may return to his land; and each of these several periods is determined at a year, as it is probable any less division of time, such as an hour, a day, or a month, might not suffice to answer the purpose. If, therefore, after the elapse of three years the marker return not to his lands, it is presumed that he has relinquished them.—Lawyers remark that what is here advanced proceeds upon a principle of equity; but that, in strictness of law, if a person cultivate the lands which another has marked before the elapse of the period above mentioned he becomes the proprietor of them, as in this case he is the cultivator, and not the other.

Manner of marking off waste land.—It is here proper to observe that waste lands may be marked by other modes beside setting stones, such as by surrounding them with the branches of trees; by burning the underwood and thorns which may be growing upon the lands; or by collecting them together and scattering them, mixed with a little earth, about the borders, without carrying them so uniformly round as to form a continued boundary or, lastly, by digging a trench one or two yards in width.

Cultivation is established by digging and watering the ground.—It is related, as an opinion of Mohammed, that if a person dig up earth, and water it, and also go to the cultivated of it; whereas, if he dig it up or water it singly, he is only held to have set a mark upon it. In the same manner, if he dig a trench or ditch without watering the land, it is considered only as marking; whereas, if he moisten it with water, after digging a trench, it is cultivation.

Enclosing it, or sowing it with seed.—If, moreover, a person raise an enclosure round the land so high as to be a dam to the water, he is held to have cultivated it; and so likewise if he sow seed in it.

Cultivation not permitted on the borders of land already cultivated.—It is not permitted to cultivate a piece of waste land immediately bordering upon lands that are in a flourishing state; as it is requisite that a space be left for the use of the cattle of the other proprietor, and also for piling up his stacks, whence such land does not come under the description of waste any more than a river or a highway; and accordingly, our doctors have said, that it is not lawful for the Imam to bestow on a person any article of indispensable use to the Mussulmans, such as a salt-pit, or a well from which the people draw water to drink.

A space is appropriated to wells dug in waste lands.—Whoever digs a well in waste land is entitled to a space or piece of land* round it. If, therefore, the well be dug for the use of camels, a space of forty yards is annexed to it.—This is related in the traditions. Several of our doctors have construed the forty yards to mean the aggregate space. The better opinion, however, is that forty yards are annexed to each side of the well; for as many lands are of a soft and humid soil, it might happen that if another person should dig a well at less distance from the first the thirty yards, the water of the one might ove through the earth and communicate with the other. If the well be dug with a view to drawing water from it by means of camels or other animals,† in that case the space of sixty yards is annexed, according to the two disciples. Haneefah holds that in this case likewise only forty yards are allowed.—The arguments of the disciples upon this point are twofold.

First, a saying of the Prophet, 'The precincts of a fountain are five hundred yards, of a well from which camels may drink forty, and of a well from the water of which sixty yards.'—Secondly, there is a necessity that a considerable space be annexed to a well of this nature, since the camels may be required to be led to a distance from it, as the rope by which the water is drawn up is often of long extent; but where wells are so made that the water may be taken out by the hand, it is not necessary that any great space be allotted on this account; and therefore a difference should certainly be made between the two sorts of wells. Haneefah argues from the tradition before cited, in which forty yards are mentioned, without mention of sixty yards.

The objection, moreover, started by the two disciples may be obviated by making the camels revolve round the well with the rope, instead of driving them directly from it.

If the well have a fountain in it, the space annexed to it is five hundred yards; because of the tradition before quoted; and also, because a large space is here absolutely requisite; for as the fountain is brought out to water the ground, one space is required through which the water may be conducted from the fountain; another for a reservoir wherein the water may be collected, and a third for conveying the water from the reservoir fair to moisten the lands for cultivation. A considerable space is therefore required, which is determined at five hundred yards.

by the tradition; and this, according to the most authentic opinions, means five hundred yards, on each side of the fountain; the yard measuring six spans.—(Some have said that the annexation of five hundred yards to a fountain is only in the country of Arabia, where the soil is hard; but that in our country, where it is soft, a larger extent is required as otherwise the water of one fountain might transude through the earth and communicate with that of another.)

Within the limits of which no other person is entitled to dig.—If a person attempt to dig a well within the limits of the proprietor of another well, in that case the other may prohibit him; because the limits of his well are his property (as has been explained), and therefore none has a right to encroach upon them. If, also, a person should actually dig a well within the limits of another the first proprietor has in that case the option either of filling it up himself gratuitously, or of forcing the other so to do.—Some have said that in this case, the first proprietor is to take a compensation for the damage from the other, and then to fill up the well himself:—in the same manner as where a person destroys a wall the property of another, in which case he must make reparation to the proprietor, who must rebuild it himself.

This is approved. It is related in Khasas's treatise upon the duties of a Kazee, that the damage, in this instance, must be computed by a comparison of the value the first well bore before the other was dug, with what it bears afterwards; the difference showing the loss sustained.

Or, if any do so, he is responsible for such accidents as it may occasion.—There is no responsibility for any thing which may happen to be destroyed by falling in to the first of the two wells, as the proprietor, in digging it, was not guilty of any trespass.—This is evident, in the opinion of Haneefa, if he dug it with the consent of the Imam; and also in the opinion of the two disciples, whether with the consent of the Imam or not;—according to Haneefa, because the digging of a well, in this instance, was the same as the setting of marks, which may be done without the consent of the Imam, although the property cannot be acquired without his permission.—If, on the contrary, anything be destroyed by falling into the second well, it must be stoned for as the proprietor of this well has been guilty of a trespass in having dug upon the property of another. If, on the other hand, a person dig a well bordering on the precinct of another, without however encroach- ing upon it, and the water of that other should then decrease, he is not liable to make any compensation, as he is not here guilty of any transgression.—In this last case, moreover, the second digger is entitled only to the ground on three sides of his well, as the ground on the side of the first well is the property of the first digger.

A space is also appropriated to a water-course.—Whoever digs a channel for conducting water to any place, has a space annexed to it, according to his want. It is related by Mohammed that an aqueduct is the same as a well, so far as regards the annexing of land to it.—Some say that this is the doctrine of the two disciples; but that, according to Haneefa, no space is allowed, except when the water appears above ground; for as an aqueduct is in fact merely a rivulet, it is therefore subject to the same rules. Several doctors have, however, maintained that when an aqueduct appears above ground, it is then considered in the same light as a spring or fountain: and that consequently the same quantity of land is annexed to it, namely, five hundred yards.

Or to a tree planted in waste land.—If a person plant a tree in a waste spot of land, he is entitled to a small space an appendage to it: wherefore no other person is allowed to plant tree on the ground within his precincts, as this space is useful to him for collecting his fruits, and heap ing them upon it. The space allotted to a tree is the measure of five yards, agreeably to what occurs in the traditions upon that subject.

The deserted beds of rivers must be cultivated.—Lands through which the Euphrates, the Tigris, or any similar river formerly ran, must not be cultivated, if it be possible that the river may again run over them; as the people whose lands lie adjacent to the river in its former course have an interest in desiring that the river may not be prevented from returning to it. If, however, the lands be not likely to be again overflowed, they are then held to be waste, provided they do not adjoin to any cultivated spot:—because such lands are not the property of any one; for the superiority of water repels all other superiority; but as soon as the land appears above the water it becomes subject to the Imam.

A space is not allowed to an aqueduct running through another's land without proof of prior right.—Whoever has the property of an aqueduct, which runs through land belonging to another, is not (according to Haneefa) entitled to any adjacent space, unless he produce evidence to prove his right.—The two disciples, on the contrary; maintain that he is, in virtue of his property in the aqueduct, entitled to the banks on which people pass, and which the earth thrown up by the excavation of it occupies. Some have said that the difference of opinion in this case is founded on that which obtains where a person digs a canal in waste lands by permission of the Imam; for in this case, according to Haneefa, he is not entitled to any space; whereas the two disciples maintain that he is so entitled, since he can derive no advantage from the canal unless he possesses a space annexed to it, as he must.

often be obliged to walk along the banks of it to clear away any incumbrances that may stop the course of the water, it being impracticable for a person, in the common course of things, to walk in the middle of it. As, moreover, he is often necessitated to dam it with earth and clay, and it is impossible for him to bring those from any distance without incurring an extraordinary expense; he is therefore entitled to a space of ground, in the same manner as a person who digs a well. The argument of Haneefa is, that the claim to any space is repugnant to analogy, the right to it being established, in the case of a well, solely on the ground of the precept before quoted. Besides, the necessity of a space, in the case of a well, is more urgent than in the case of a canal or aqueduct; for, in the latter, the use of the water may be enjoyed without any space, whereas, in the former, this is impossible, as the water must be pulled up by a rope, to effect which a space is requisite, as has been before explained. Hence there is an obvious difference between a well and a canal; and consequently they can bear no analogy to each other. The reason for founding the case in question on this is that if the proprietor of the aqueduct be entitled to a space of land, he is held to be seized of the said space as a dependency of the aqueduct; and the evidence of the possessor is valid in case of a contest; whereas if, on the contrary, he be not entitled to any space, he is not held to be seized of it, and circumstances therefore testify for the proprietor of the land; as shall shortly be explained. - If, however, the case in question be considered separately, and not as founded on the above, then the two disciples argue that the space is in the hands of the proprietor of the aqueduct, as he preserves the water by means of it; whence it is that the proprietor of the land is not entitled to break it down. - Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the dependent land resembles the other land, of the proprietor, with respect both to appearance and substance; with respect to appearance, because it is on a level with, and joins to it; and with respect to substance also, because it is of the same soil, and is equally capable of nourishing trees and vegetables; and circumstances testify for him who is in possession of what bears the greatest resemblance to the dependent ground, namely, the land adjacent to it; - in the same manner as where two people contend for a door-plank in the possession of some other person, and which exactly resembles other that is possessed by one of the litigants; for, in that case the Kazi must adjudge such plank to be the property of him who possesses the correspondent one. In reply to what the two disciples further urge - it may be observed that the contest here does not hinge upon what was placed for the conservation of the water (the banks), but upon what is independent of it, and fit for producing treat, &c. Besides supposing that the proprietor of the aqueduct preserves the water only on account of the dependent space of land, it may be answered that the proprietor of the ground preserves it only on account of the dependent space of land likewise. - With respect, moreover, to what they urge, that "the proprietor of the land is not entitled to break down the banks of the aqueduct," it is to be observed that this is not because they are the property of the proprietor of the aqueduct, but merely because he has an interest in them; - in the same manner as where a person is possessed of a wall, and another, having the property of a wall near it, lays beams across both with the assent, of the other; for in such case the other has not afterwards the power of pulling down his own wall, since he must thereby injure the right of this person.

Differences of opinion concerning, aqueducts. - It is related, in the Jama Bagheer, that if a person possess an aqueduct having banks on each side, and adjacent to them a piece of land belonging to some other person, and the banks be not in the hands of any one, that is to say, be destitute of marks, such as trees, stones, or the like, to determine the propriety, those banks belong to the proprietor of the land, according to Haneefa; whereas the two disciples hold that they, appertain to the proprietor of the aqueduct. - If, on the contrary, the marker of any person be left upon them, they are then unanimously of opinion that the marker has the better claim. - Still, however, they differ in opinion where there is a tree upon the banks, and it is not known who planted it; - for Haneefa is of opinion that to plant a tree is the right of the proprietor of the grounds, whilst the two disciples hold this to be the right of the proprietor of the aqueduct. - With respect, also, to throwing up earth, many have said that there is a disagreement; whilst others have said that this belongs to the proprietor of the aqueduct, provided he do not exceed the prescribed bounds. With regard to walking upon the banks, some have said that it is not permitted, in the opinion of Haneefa; whilst others have said that it is not prohibited, because of there being a necessity for it. The learned Aboo Jaffir has said that he would decree according to the opinion of Haneefa in the case of planting a tree, and according to that of the two disciples in the case of throwing up earth. It is reported, from Aboo Yoosef, that the width of the dependent space of an aqueduct is half the breadth of the aqueduct; but according to Mohammed it is the whole breadth: and this opinion is the most favourable to mankind. - It is here proper to observe, that the subject resolves itself into, that several the treating of the cases of shirba, or a right to water, whether derived from the possessions of land, or from other causes.

Section 1.

Of Waters.

All people have a right to drink from a well, canal, or reservoir; and also cattle.
If a person have the property of a canal, a well, or a reservoir, he cannot prohibit either man or beast from drinking of it. — Here it is necessary to promise that water is of four kinds. I. The water of the ocean, which every person has a right to drink, or to carry away for the purpose of moistening his lands. — If, therefore, a person incline to dig a canal, and convey the water in it from the ocean to his land, no person has power to prevent him from so doing; for the enjoyment of the water of the ocean is common to every one, in the same manner as the light of the sun or moon, or the use of the air. — II. The water of large rivers, such as the Oxus, the Euphrates, or the Tigris, in which every person has an absolute right to drink, and also a conditional right to use it towards moistening his lands; — that is to say, a person, if he cultivate waste land, may dig a channel for the purpose of conveying water from it to the river in order to provide his land so be not detrimental to the people; but if there be a probability of its being hurtful in its consequences (as if, by opening the banks, the water should overflow the country and villages around), in that case he is not permitted to dig a channel for the watering of his land, as the prevention of a public evil is a consideration of greater moment. — Analogous to this, also, is the erection of a mill on the banks of a river; for the demolition of the banks by the mill is the same as by watering land. — III. Water in which several have a share; — and in which, likewise, the right of drinking is allowed to every one; for it is recorded in the traditions that three things are common to all, namely, water, grass, and fire. Besides, wells, and the like, are not dug for the purpose of preserving water; and hence the water of them is not the property of anyone; for it is common, and as such cannot be made a particular property until it be separately kept and preserved; — as holds with respect to a door that only sleeps upon a person's ground. There is, moreover, a necessity for establishing this common right with regard to water, since it is impossible for every person to carry it along with him; and as a person may be in want of it for himself and his horse, mankind would therefore be too much cramped if an unlimited use of it were not granted them. If, however, a person incline to bring water to moisten the land he had cultivated from a river or canal which belongs to others, the proprietors may prevent him, as otherwise their right of watering would be entirely destroyed. — IV. Water which is preserved, or in other words kept in vessels. Water of this description is property, because of its detention; and the right of others no longer extends to it; — in the same manner as holds with respect to game, after being taken by any person. Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether this water may not also be participated, because of the tradition before quoted. Hence, if a person, in a time of scarcity, steal a quantity of water equivalent to the amount which constitutes theft, he is not liable to amputation.

Unless there be other water at a little distance. — If a person be possessed of a well, fountain, or rivulet, he may prevent any one from drinking the water of them, or encroaching on his property, provided there be other water at a little distance, and which is not the particular property of anyone. If, however, this be not the case, the proprietor must then either bring him water to drink, or permit him to take it himself, on condition that he destroy not the banks. What is here advanced is reported from Tahavse. — Some have said that this is approved, in case the possessor of the well has dug it himself in land which is his own property; but that, if he should have dug it in waste lands, he is not, in that case, in any account permitted to prohibit others from entering on his premises to drink water; for the waste lands are a common right; and as the well was dug towards the promoting of a common right, namely, tithe and tribute, it follows that the digging of it is not destructive of the liberty of drinking. If, therefore, the proprietor refuse the other permission to drink, and that others be apprehensive either of the death of himself or his horse from an excess of thirst, he may then lawfully oppose the proprietor with weapons, as he has already aimed at his destruction in withholding his right, namely, the water; for the water of a well is common, and is not property. — It is otherwise with respect to water kept in vessels; for a person in want of it where it is so kept, is only permitted to contend with the possessor of it without weapons. The same law obtains in the case of a person oppressed with hunger. Many have said that in the case of a wall it is not lawful to use weapons; but that it is allowable to contend with a stick; for the possessor is guilty of an offence in refusing the water; and the application of a stick is a substitute for correction.

Water may also be carried away for the purpose of cultivation. — It is lawful for men to carry away water from a rivulet to perform their ablutions, or to wash their garments. This is approved; because, to desire men to purify themselves, or to wash their garments with such water, without carrying it away as mentioned by some, would be attended with much inconvenience.

Or for watering trees or parterres. — IV. also, a person be inclined to water the trees or small parterres before his house, he may lawfully carry away water for that purpose from the rivulet of another; for the law allows great liberty in the case of water, and considers the refusal of it as truly opprobrious. — A person is not, however,
Section II.

Of digging or clearing Rivers.*

Rivers are of three descriptions.—Rivers are of three kinds.—I. Such as are not the property of any, and of which the waters have not been divided, like the Tigris, Euphrates, &c. —II. Such as, being appropriated and divided, are at the same time public rivers, in which boats sail. —III. Rivers that are held in property, and divided; and are also private, in which no boats sail.

Great public rivers must be cleared and repaired at the expense of the public treasury.—If the first kind of rivers, if the river fill up so as to require digging, the care thereof devolves upon the chief, who is to defray the charges of it from the public treasury; for as the work is performed for the advantage of the Musulman community, the expense attending it must be defrayed from the property of the community;—those expenses must, however, be disbursed from the funds of tribute and capitation-tax, and not from those of tithe and alms;—for the latter are appropriated solely to the use of the poor, whereas the former are intended as a provision to answer contingencies.

Or by a general contribution of labour.—If there be not any money in the public treasury, the chief is in that case at liberty; with a view to promote the public utility, to compel the people to repair the damage in question, as it is presumed they would not of themselves apply to the work,—whence it was that Omar Farook said to the people, "Were I to leave you to your own direction, without ever using compulsion, verily, matters would come to such a pass that you would even sell your children."—None, however, must be compelled but such as are able to work; and such as are not able to work, and are rich, must pay a certain sum, according to their particular station and ability.

And appropriated rivers, at the expense of the proprietors.—With respect to the second kind of river, it must be cleared, when requisites, at the expense of the proprietors, without any supply from the public treasury; for the right of the river particularly belongs to them, as does also the use of it.—If, therefore, any one of them should refuse to assist in digging, the chief may compel him to the end that the others may not suffer any injury by his refusal.

Objection.—It would appear that, in being thus forced to work, the refuser suffers an injury.

Reply.—Such injury is particular, and is not without its use, for in recompense thereof the party obtains his share of the water; it is, moreover, to be put in competition with the common injury that would otherwise be suffered by the rest.

If, also, some of the proprietors of the river be desirous of strengthening the banks, from an apprehension that they might give way, and it be probable that bad consequences may ensue from their decay (such as inundating the neighbouring country, and breaking up the roads), the chief may in that case use compulsion with any of them who refuse to assist in the undertaking. He must not, however, use force where the decay of the banks cannot produce any bad consequence; for the fall of the banks is an event merely probable. It is otherwise with respect to clearing a river in a case of necessity; for that is a matter of certainty,—whence it is that compulsion may be used to effect it,—With respect to the third kind of rivers they are particularly appropriated and therefore the digging of them is entirely the duty of the proprietors. Some have alleged that the magistrate may employ force with any who refuse to dig; in the same manner as in the case of the second kind of rivulets. Others, again, have maintained that the magistrate has not a power of this kind; since both of the injuries, namely, that of the partner on whom compulsion is used, and also that which the other partners sustain in consequence of his refusal, are private; and the injury to the other partners may be remedied by their taking from the one who refuses to work a part of the expense incurred in digging the rivulet, proportionately to his share (provided, however, that the work be executed at the instance of the magistrate).—It is otherwise with respect to the second kind of rivers, as there one of the injuries is public.

Objection.—Here likewise is a conjunction of two injuries and as one of these (namely, that sustained by those who have a right to drink the water) is public, it would follow that, to prevent this public injury, compulsion may be used in the case of private rivers likewise.

*Arab. Nahr.—It is a term of very general application, signifying not only rivers properly so called, but also canals, or any other species of aqueduct constructed by art.

† Arab. Wale; meaning, generally, the governor of a province or district.
CULTIVATION OF WASTE LANDS.

[Vol. IV

Section III.

Of Claims of Shirb, and of Disputes and particular Privileges with respect to it.

A right to water may exist independent of the ground.—A claim of Shirb, or right to water, is valid independent of any property in the ground, upon a favourable construction of the law; for a person may become endowed with it, exclusive of the ground, either by inheritance or bequest; and it sometimes happens that when a person sells his lands he reserves to himself the right of Shirb. Besides, Shirb being a desirable object, and also capable of yielding advantage, the claim to it is therefore valid.

No person can alter or obstruct the course of water running through his ground.—If a person be possessed of a rivulet running through lands which are the property of another, and the proprietor of these lands, being desirous that it should not run through them, attempt to prevent it, on the plea of its being his property, he must not be permitted to do so, but the rivulet must be suffered to flow in its usual channel; for, as the rivulet is in the possession of the person who has the property of it, because of his water running in the bed of it, his word, in case of a litigation, is therefore to be credited in preference to that of the other; whereas, if the rivulet were not in his possession (as if it should contain now water), in that case the word of the proprietor of the lands would be credited;—unless the other could prove by witnesses that the rivulet is his property, or that he formerly conveyed water through it towards his own grounds for the purpose of watering them, when the Judge must decree it to him, as he thus substantiates his claim.—(Analogous to this is a contention concerning the property of a river-head, or a water drain, a mount, or a road through the court of another.)

In case of disputes, a distribution of the right to water must be made.—If a rivulet be jointly held by several persons, and they dispute concerning their particular proportions of right to water, a distribution must be made according to the extent of land which they severally possess; for as the object of right to water is to moisten their lands, it is consequently fit that each receive in proportion to his territory:—It is otherwise in the case of a road; for the object in that being to pass and repass, the smallness or largeness of the house is of no weight in the division:—that is to say, if the partners in a road dispute concerning their shares, it is decreed that they shall hold it equally, and that no distinction shall be made from the difference of their houses.

When water is wanted, towards moistening lands for cultivation, the magistrate may then employ force in causing a rivulet to be dug; but not where the water is wanted only to drink.
A rivulet must not be dammed up for the convenience of one partner, without the consent of the others.—If it happen that the person who possesses the highest part of rivulet be not able, without stopping the current, to enjoy his right to water in a satisfactory manner (for this reason; that his lands, being high precipitate the water from them with great velocity); still he must not be permitted to dam the rivulet, as he would thereby destroy the right of the others; he must, therefore, take his share without stopping the current. If, however, the others assent to his stopping the current that he may the better water his land, or enter into an agreement that each shall stop it in his turn, it is lawful, as being their right. But if be possible to effect the stoppage with a board, they must not use clay, or any kind of plaster, without the consent of the whole, as an injury would be thereby done to their ares.

One partner in a rivulet cannot dig a trench or erect a mill upon it without the general consent.—It is not permitted to any of the sharers to dig another rivulet leading from the common one, or to erect a water mill upon it;—because, in the former instance, the bank of a common rivulet must necessarily be broken; and in the latter, an errection is made of a building upon a partnership concern;—unless, however, the mill be stationed on the builder's land, and be not injurious, either to the ground, by breaking down the banks, or to the water, by diverting it into another channel;—in which case it is lawful, as being the exercise of a power derived from property, and from which there results not any injury to others.

Nor construct a water-engine or a bridge.
—(The erecting of a machine for raising water by camels, or oxen, is considered in the same light as the erecting of a mill.)—It is likewise unlawful for any of the sharers either to erect a small bridge which may be occasionally withdrawn, or a large one of stone or bricks which is durable and fixed.
—In short, a private rivulet is considered in the same light as a private road, in which several participate, but in which none have any particular privileges.—It is otherwise where a person possesses a small private rivulet brought out from a large private one jointly held by several; for in that case, if the proprietor of the little rivulet choose he may erect upon it a large solid bridge;
or, if there was previously a bridge over it, he may, if he please, pull it down (provided a greater quantity of water than formerly do not, by that means, flow into his rivulet) for under these circumstances the demolition of the bridge is lawful, being in virtue a power derived from his own property, which occasions no detriment to others. He must not, however, extend the inlet of the smaller rivulet; as he would thereby destroy the banks of the large one, and likewise draw a greater quantity of water into his own than is his due.—Neither must he suffer to enlarge the sluice through which he re-cieves his share of water, where the distribution is made in that manner.—that is, where boards with holes are fixed on the bank of the river contiguous to the lands of each partner, that he may receive, as his share, whatever quantity of water issues through his board.—But any of them who chooses may either heighten or lower his particular board, as the equality of the division depends upon the largeness or smallness of the holes, and upon the height or lowness of them, for an alteration in that respect occasions no difference in the distribution.

One partner cannot alter the mode of partition without the others' consent.—If where the distribution is made by sluices, in the manner above described, one of the partners choose that the partition he made by the measure of time, he is not at liberty so to adjust it, unless by the assent of the others; for whatever is the established mode must be continued; as the right of every one is by that means more clearly distinguished.

Or increase the number of openings through which he receives his share.—If each partner in an appropriated rivulet have a specific number of holes or sluices allotted to him, it is not permitted to any of them to increase that number, notwithstanding it may occasion no injury to the others; for here exists a partnership in particular property, and in which the right of each is particularly specified.—It is otherwise in the case of large rivers, such as the Tigris or the Euphrates; for as there any person is at liberty to dig a small rivulet, and fill it from them, he is consequently at liberty to increase the hole or sluices through which the waters pass from them.

Or convey his share into lands not entitled to receive it.—It is not lawful for any of the partners in a river to convey his share of water into such of his lands as are not entitled to receive water from that river; for this circumstance might, in process of time, furnish an argument of his having a right to water these lands from that river.

Or through such lands into those that are entitled.—Neither is it lawful for a partner to convey his share of water through such of his lands as are not entitled to it, into others that are: for, in this case, it is probable he would receive a greater quantity of water than his due, as part would be absorbed by the lands through which they first passed. (This is analogous to the case of a joint road, where one of the partners wishes to open a road to the inhabitants of a house, in the same range, whose road lies through another way, by permitting them to pass through his house in their way to their own).

Neither can he shut up any of the water-vents.—If two persons possess a rivulet jointly, and receive their shares by water issuing through sluices, and the one whose share lies nearest to the source be inclined to stop several of the sluices allotted to him, to prevent the issue of a superfluity of water into his lands, he must not be allowed so to do, as he might thereby subject the lands of the other sharer to be overflowed.

Or adopt a partition by rotation.—Neither is he at liberty to change the mode of participations; by taking the use of the whole in rotation, instead of each receiving a moiety of the whole quantity, for as the division has already been settled by the mode of vents or sluices, he cannot afterwards require any other mode,—unless the other assent, in which case he may do so;—is still, however, remaining at the option of this partner (or of his heir, after his decease) to annul this, and revert to the former mode,—because the establishment of division, by giving the whole to each in rotation, in a case where each had formerly hold a separate share, is, in fact, leading a right to water (as an exchange of Shirb for Shirh is null) and a right to water is inheritable, or the use of it may lawfully be left in legacy, but it can neither be sold nor bestowed in gift, nor left in legacy to sell, give away, or bestow in alms, these several deeds being unlawful on account of the uncertainty to which they are liable, either from ignorance or deceit, with regard to the quantity of water,—or because Shirb is not, in itself, a substantial property, but rather a privilege or immunity, insomuch that if a person water his lands from the Shirb of another, he is not liable to make compensation for it;—and these several deeds being void, a legacy for any of these purposes is also void.

A right to water cannot be consigned as a dower.—A right to water is incapable of being assigned as a specific dower in a contract of marriage, wherefore if such he mentioned in a marriage contract, Mihm-ljal, or proper dower, is due.

Or given as a consideration for Khoola.—In the same manner, also, it cannot be given as a consideration for Khoolas;—whence, if a wife bargain for her divorce, in consideration of her making over such right, the husband may restore it to her, and, in lieu of it, take from her the dower he had assigned her on their marriage. The ground on which the law in these cases proceeds is, that right to water is a matter the extent of which cannot be ascertained with any precision.

Or in composition for a claim.—A right to water is incapable of being given in composition for a claim; for as it cannot, by means of any deed whatever, be rendered property, a composition in consideration of it is consequently null.

Or sold (without ground) to discharge the debts of a defunct.—(mode to be pursued in this last instance) A right to water, with out ground, cannot be sold after the death of any person to discharge his debts, in the same manner as it cannot be sold during his lifetime. What, then, shall the Imam do, in this case, towards settling the debt of the deceased?—This question has given rise to a diversity of opinions; but the most advisable method of proceeding, in such an instance, is to join the right to the lands of another person not possessing such right, and then, with his consent, to dispose of both,—when, computing how much the value of the lands has been increased by the addition of the right, he may apply the difference towards paying off the debts of the deceased. If he be not able to procure land in this manner, he may buy a piece of land payable from the effects of the deceased, and having joined it to the right, sell them together; when with the price so obtained he must first discharge the purchase-money discharging the debts of the deceased.

Any accident from the use of the water does not induce responsibility.—In a person, having moistened his lands, or filled them with water, should by that means overflow the lands of his neighbour, he is not, in such case, liable to make a compensation, as he was not guilty of any transgression.

BOOK XLVI.

OF PROHIBITED LIQUORS.

There are four prohibited liquors. I. Khamr (the crude juice of the grape).—Tums are four prohibited liquors,—the first of which is termed Khamr,* meaning (according to the exposition of Haneefa) the crude juice of the grape, which, being fermented, becomes spirituous,—first gathering foam and settling, and then possessing an inebriating quality. According to the two disciples; the juice becomes Khamr upon its fermenting, and being spirituous without the condition of its gathering foam;—for whenever the juice of grapes becomes spirituous, the appellation of Khamr, and the characteristic of it, namely, illegality, are both established. The argument adduced by Haneefa is, that fermentation is the commencement of the process by which liquor becomes spirituous, and which is completed when it foams and settles, as by that means the dregs are separated from the finer particles;—and the ordinances of the law regarding Khamr (which are decisive), such as punishment for drinking it, the holding him an infidel who shall deem it lawful, and the prohibition against selling it,—have all a reference to the completion. Some of the learned allege that it is declared unlawful to drink after having become spirituous, purely

* The translator has, in the course of the work rendered every inebriating drink under the general term wine, which comprehends all descriptions of prohibited liquors. In this book, however, he retains the original terms for the sake of distinction.

from motives of caution.—Others, again, maintain that the term Khamr is applicable to whatever is of an inebriating quality; because it is mentioned in the traditions, that “whichever inebriate is Khamr”; and (in another tradition) “Khamr is produced from two trees, namely, the vine and the date.” The term Khamr, moreover, is derived from Mokhamira, signifying, stupefaction, or deprivation of sense, which is a consequence of drinking any inebriating liquor. In reply to this, however, Hanbali argues that the term Khamr, according to the concurrent opinion of all lexicographers, is used only in the sense above mentioned, whence it is that liquors of other descriptions other terms are applied, such as Nabeez, Tabeekh, and Mosillia. Another argument is that the illegality of Khamr is indubitable,—whence, if every inebriating liquor were Khamr, all such would of course be likewise indubitably illegal,—whereas this is not the case, for there is a doubt regarding them. In reply, moreover, to the arguments of some of the learned as above adduced, it is to be remarked that the first-recited tradition is not perfectly authentic, Yechya Ibn Mayeen having disputed it; and with respect to the second quoted tradition, the intention of it was merely to explain the law, or, in other words, to show that all liquors extracted from either of the two trees mentioned, being of an inebriating quality, are unlawful as well as Khamr.

Which is unlawful in any quantity.—Khamr is in itself unlawful, whether it be used in small or great quantities, the illegality not depending on drinking it to such a degree as to produce intoxication. Some of lesser principles reject the absolute illegality of Khamr, alleging that its effects only are the cause of its illegality; because the evil of it is, that it creates an inattention towards the worship of GOD; and as this evil is occasioned only by intoxication, it follows that where this does not take place it is not unlawful.—This, however, is gross infidelity, and in direct contradiction to the Koran. GOD having there termed such liquor filth, a thing which is unlawful in its own nature. Bajees, the Prophet has decreed Khamr to be unlawful, according to various traditions; and all the doctors are unanimously of this opinion. It is to be observed, however, that although Khamr be unlawful, even is so small a quantity as may not be sufficient to intoxicate, yet the same law does not hold with respect to other things of an inebriating quality; for a little of them if not sufficient to intoxicate, is not forbidden. Shafei, indeed, is of opinion that these are likewise unlawful, in any quantity.

In filth in an extreme.—Khamr is filth in an extreme degree, in the same manner as urine; for the illegality of it is indisputably proved, as has been already shown.

Whoever maintains Khamr to be lawful is an infidel,* for he thereby rejects incontestable proof.

And cannot constitute property with a Mussulman.—Khamr is not a valuable commodity with respect to Mussulmans. If therefore, it be destroyed or usurped by any person, there is no responsibility. The sale of it is moreover unlawful; for GOD, in terming it filth, manifested a detestation of it; whereas, if it had been a commodity of value, some respect would have been shown to it. Besides, it is recorded in the traditions, that “he who prohibited the drinking of it; did likewise prohibit both the sale of it and the use or enjoyment of the price of it.” Nor be employed in the discharge of his debts.—If a Mussulman be indebted to another, and wish to discharge the debt with the price of Khamr, in that case both the payment and receipt is unlawful because such price is produced from an illicit sale, and is considered either as an usurpation or a trust in the Mussulman’s hands, according to the different opinion of the doctors on this subjects; in the same manner as in the case of the sale of carrion. If, on the contrary, the doctot be a Zimmee, it is lawful for his Mussulman creditor to receive such payment; as the sale of Khamr is legal amongst Zimmecs.

Or used by him.—It is unlawful to derive any use from Khamr, either as a medicine, or in any other manner; because the use of filth is forbidden; and also, because abstinence from it is enjoyed and this injunction could not be observed in case of its use being allowed.

And the drinking of which, in any quantity induces punishment.—Whoever drinks Khamr incurs punishment, although he be not intoxicated: for it is said, in the traditions, “Let him who drinks Khamr be whipped; and if he drink it again, let him be again in the same manner punished.” The whole of the companions are agreed upon this point; and the number of stripes prescribed is eighty, as has already been shown in treating of punishments.

Unless it be boiled.—If a person boil Khamr until two-thirds of it evaporate, it is not thereby rendered lawful. If, however, a person drink of it after such process, he is not liable to punishment, unless he be intoxicated.

But it may be converted into vinegar.—It is lawful to make vinegar of Khamr. Shafei, however, holds a different opinion.

II. Bazik (the boiled juice of the grape), termed (when boiled away to one half) Monissaf. Taus much with respect to Khamr, the first in order of prohibited liquors.—The second species of prohibited liquor, is the juice of grapes boiled until a quantity less than two-thirds evaporate. This is denominated Bazik. It is also termed Monissaf; but that is only where exactly one half of it evaporates in boiling. This kind of liquor is unlawful, according to all our doctors;—according to the two disciples, when it only ferments and becomes spirituous;—and according to Haneefa, when it foams and settles. Yoosaf has said that Monissaf is lawful (and several of the tribe of Mutazalli* have seconded this opinion); because it is a good liquor, or, in other words, is pleasing to the palate and also, because it is not Khamr. The argument of our doctors, that as Monissaf is pure, and equally delicious with Khamr, a number of the idle and dissolute are consequently tempted to drink it; and it is therefore prohibited, with a view to prevent that dissipation which is found on occasion. Yoosaf, or Hie Sikker (an infusion of dates).—The third species of unlawful liquor is termed Sikker; and is made by steeping fresh dates in water until they take effect in sweetening it; when it is both unlawful and abominable to drink of it. Sharek-Ibn-Abahola alleges that it is lawful, as God, speaking of his bounty in the Koran, says, "YE ENJOY Sikker from the grape and the date;" wherein we may infer that it is allowable,—as bounty cannot apply to any thing unlawful. The argument of our doctors is the concurrent opinion of all the companions upon this point; and with respect to the text above cited, it has a reference to a particular period, having been revealed in the infancy of religion of Islam, when all sorts of spirituous liquors were lawful.

IV. Nookoo Zabeb (an infusion of raisins).—The fourth species of prohibited liquors is Nookoo-Zabeb;† that is, water in which raisins are steeped until it become sweet, and is affected in its substance. This kind is, however, lawful, because it possesses a more agreeable quality,—and is prohibited only when it ferments and becomes spirituous. Yoosaf is of a different opinion regarding this liquor likewise.

The three last are not so illegal as Khamr. They may be held legal, without incurring a change of infidelity. It is to be observed that the illegality of these liquors, namely, Bazik, Monissaf, and the Nookoo of dates and raisin, is inferior to that of Khamr. If, therefore, any person hold these lawful, still he is not deemed an infidel. It is otherwise in the case of Khamr; for, with respect to the liquors here mentioned, the illegality a mere matter of opinion; whereas, with regard to Khamr, the illegality is undisputed.

And may be drank (so as not to intoxicate) without punishment.—Punishment, more-Khamr (a mixture of the infusion of dates and raisins) may be drank.—There is no impropriety in drinking Khooolteen; that is, water in which dates have been steeped, mixed with that of raisins, and boiled together until they ferment and become spirituous. This is grounded on a circumstance relative to Ibn Zeyyad, which is thus related by himself:—"Abdolla, the son of Omar, having given me some Sherbet to drink. I became intoxicated to such a degree that I knew not my house. I went to him the next morning, and how informed him of the circumstance, he acquainted me that he had given me nothing but a drink composed of dates and raisins."—Now this was certainly Khooolteen, which had undergone the operation of boiling; because it is elsewhere related by Omar that it is unlawful in its crude state.

Liquors produced by means of honey or grain are lawful.—Liquor produced by means of honey, wheat, barley, or milk, is lawful, according to Haneefa and Aboo Younas; although it be not boiled, provided, however, that it be not drank in a wanton or joyous manner. The argument they adduce is the saying of the Prophet "Khamr is the product of these two trees" (meaning the vine and the date);—that is to say, he confined the prohibition to these two trees, as his intention was to explain the Law. It is to be observed that several of the learned have made the boiling of these liquors a requisite towards their legality. Others, on the contrary, hold it to be no way necessary (and such is the opinion recorded in the Mabsoot); because the liquors are not of such a nature that a little induces a wish for more, whether they be boiled or crude. It has likewise been disputed whether a person who gets drunk with any of these liquors is to be punished. Some have said that he is not.

But any person drinking them to intoxication incurs punishment.—The learned in the Law, however, have determined otherwise; for it is related by Mohammed that punishment is to be inflicted on whoever is intoxicated with any of the aforesaid strong liquors; for this reason, that in the present age they are so much sought for by the dissolute as other liquors were formerly; nay even more so. The same law holds with regard to strong drinks extracted from milk. Many have said that any drink made from the milk of a mare is unlawful, in the opinion of Haneefa, because it is derived from the flesh, which (according to him) is unlawful. Lawyers, however, remark it as the better opinion that the milk is not unlawful according to Haneefa; for although he has pronounced the flesh to be abominable, yet the reason is either because, if it were otherwise, the means of conquest would thereby be destroyed; or because the horse is a noble animal; neither of which reasons hold with regard to the milk.

Mosillis (grape juice boiled down to a third) is lawful.—If the juice of grapes be boiled until two-thirds of it evaporate (being then termed Mosillis), it becomes lawful, according to the two Elders, notwithstanding it be spirituous. Mohammed, Shafei, and Malik, say otherwise. (This difference of opinion, however, exists only on the supposition that it is used with a view to strengthen the constitution; for if it be drank from pleasure or joy they are unanimous in judging it unlawful.) Mohammed, Shafei, and Malik, in support of their opinion, have cited a saying of the Prophet: "Every inebriating drink is Khamr; and whatever in excess produces intoxication is prohibited, even in moderation;" and in another place, "Any drink of which one cupful occasions intoxication, is unlawful in a single drop."—Another argument is, that every inebriating liquor tends to stupefy the senses, and is consequently prohibited either in a small or large quantity, in the same manner as Khamr. The two Elders, in support of their opinion, have quoted the saying of the Prophet: "Khamr is unlawful in its very nature," and in another place, "Little or much of it is alike unlawful; and intoxication from every other strong drink (that is to say, every kind besides Khamr) is forbidden." Now since the Prophet has specified intoxication as a condition with respect to other drinks than Khamr, we may conclude that on that circumstance only their illegality depends. Besides, stupefaction of the senses takes place only when liquors are used in such excess as to inebriate which is allowed to be dregal. A little, therefore, of any strong rink other than Khamr is never illegal, except when it is served in such a quantity as to induce a wish for more, in which case the law regards every quantity of it in the same light. This, however, is not the case with Mosillis, a little of which, because of its thickness, does not induce a wish for more; and which, in its substances, is food—wherefore when used in a moderate quantity it retains its original legality. *

General rule with respect to it.—If it is little water be poured into Mosillis to render it fine, and it be afterwards boiled for a short time it is still Mosillis, that addition of water tending only to weaken it.—It is otherwise where water is mixed with crude juice, and this mixture is then boiled until two-thirds of it evaporate; for, here, either the water purely evaporates altogether, or it evaporates jointly with the juice; and in other case it is plain that two-thirds of the pure juice of the grapes or dates does not evaporate, which is requisite to render it a legal drink.

* By original legality Haneefa alludes to an opinion he maintained in opposition to Malik, that every thing is originally lawful in its nature, being rendered otherwise only by the prohibition of the sacred writings; whereas Malik holds every thing to have been originally unlawful, until sanctified by the Koran.

Rule in the boiling of unpressed grapes.—If grapes be first boiled, and afterwards pressed until their juice be extracted, in that case a very little more boiling is sufficient to render the drinking of the liquor lawful, according to one tradition of Haneefa. According to another tradition it does not become lawful until two-thirds of it evaporate in boiling; and this is the better opinion; because the juice remaining within the film, and not being in any manner affected by the boiling, it is consequently similar to juice which is not boiled.

Or grapes mixed with dates.—If fresh or dried grapes; being mixed with dates, be then boiled, two-thirds of the mixture must evaporate before it becomes lawful; for although, with respect to dates, a small boiling be often sufficient, yet with respect to the juice of grapes two-thirds are always required to have evaporated in boiling. The same rule also holds where the juice of grapes is mixed with the water in which dates have been steeped. If, however, dried grapes, being mixed with the water of dates, should be boiled for a little, and afterwards some dates or dried grapes be thrown into it, in that case, provided the quantity thrown in be small, and not so much as is generally used to make Nabrez, it is lawful. It is otherwise if the quantity be not small;—in the same manner as where a pot of the water of dates or raisins is mixed with the boiled juice. Still, however, the person who drinks it is not subject to punishment, because its illegality is adjudged merely on principles of caution; and endeavours must always be used to avoid the infliction of punishment.

Liquor, having once acquired a spirit, is not rendered lawful by boiling. In Khamr, or any other spurious liquor, be boiled until two-thirds of it evaporate, still it is not lawful; for the illegality of it, which was previously established, is not removed by boiling.

Rule with respect to the use of vessels.—There is no impropriety in squeezing juice into pots or vessels of a green colour, or of which the interior part has been varnished with oil. The reason of this is, that formerly, in the infancy of the Mussulman religion, it was customary to keep Khamr in such vessels; and, on this account, when Khamer was rendered illegal, the Prophet prohibited the use of them likewise. He afterwards, however, permitted the use of them, seeing that the vessels of themselves did not render any thing unlawful. If, therefore, Khamr have been kept in these vessels, it is necessary they be washed before they are applied to use. If a vessel be old, it becomes clean by three washings; but if it be new it can never be cleansed, in the opinion of Mohammed; for then the wine penetrates, and makes a deep impression in it; contrary to the case of an old one. Aboo Yoosaf holds that it may be cleansed by washing it thrice, and drying it after each washing.—Several have said that, in the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, the mode of cleansing it is by filling it with water, and letting it remain for a short time; and then emptying it and filling it again; and so repeating this process until the water poured out be perfectly pure; when the vessel is clean.

Vinegar may be made from Khamr.—When Khamr is converted into vinegar, it is then lawful, whether it has been made so by throwing anything upon it (such as salt or vinegar), or, have become so of itself.

Vinegar made of Khamr is not abominable. Shafeei maintains that it is abominable; and that all vinegar obtained from Khamr by means of some mixture is unlawful. With respect, however, to such as turn so from Khamr of itself, he has given two different opinions.

And the vessel in which it is so made becomes pure.—When Khamr is changed into vinegar, the vessel in which it is contained becomes clean according to the quantity of the Khamr. With regard to that part of the vessel that was empty, several have said that it also becomes clean, as being dependent on the other; but others have said that, as it is battered over with dried Khamr, it does not become clean until it be washed with vinegar, when it is immediately purified. In the same manner also, if Khamr be poured out of a vessel, and the vessel be then washed with vinegar, it becomes (as lawyers have said) instantaneously clean.

Rules with respect to the dregs of Khamr.—It is abominable to drink the dregs of Khamr, or to use it in cooking that has as some women do; for the dregs are not entirely void of the particles of Khamr, and it is unlawful to apply any unlawful thing to use;—whence the illegality of using it in healing a wound, or applying it to a sore on the back of a quadruped.—It is also unlawful to administer it to an infidel or an infant; and whosoever does so is chargeable with the crime of it. In the same manner, it is unlawful to give it to a quadruped to drink. Concerning this point, however, several have said that although it be unlawful to carry Khamr to a quadruped, yet if the animal, being brought to it, should drink of it, there is no impropriety; nor the same manner in the case of a dog and a carrion; that is to say, carrion must not be thrown to a dog; but if a dog be carried to where carrion is, he may, without any impropriety, be suffered to eat it.

It is allowable to mix the dregs of Khamr with vinegar. In this case, however, it is required, that the vinegar be carried to the place where the dregs are, and be there mixed, for otherwise it is unlawful.

A person who drinks the dregs of Khamr without being intoxicated is not liable to punishment. Shafii is of a different opinion; for in this case several of the particles of Khamr must necessarily be drunk likewise. Our doctors, on the contrary, argue that as the dregs, of Khamr are disagreeable to the palate, a little of it does not, by consequence, beget an inclination for more: and thus, being like other strong drinks, the drinking of a little, unless it be attended with intoxication, is not punishable.

An injection of Khamr is unlawful but not punishable. An injection of Khamr into the anus or penis is unlawful as being a benefit derived from an unlawful article. It is not, however, punishable, as punishment is inflicted only in the case of drinking it.

And so likewise a mixture of it in viands—Is a person throw Khamr into soup, it is not then lawful for him to eat the soup—because of its being rendered impure. Nevertheless, if he eat it, he is not liable to punishment, for in this case the Khamr is as it were boiled.

If a person knead flour with Khamr, in that case it is unlawful to eat the bread or paste so made, as many of the particles of the Khamr still remain in it.

Section.

Of boiling the Juice of Grapes.

There are three general principles to be observed upon this subject.—In boiling the juice of grapes there are three principles.—The first principle is, that whatever quantity may run over the pot from the agitation in boiling, or from the foaming of the juice, is not taken into account, but if considered as not having belonged to it; and the residue is to be boiled until two-thirds of it evaporate, in order that the remaining third may be rendered lawful. To illustrate this:—suppose a person inclined to boil ten cups of juice; in that case, if one cup be lost from its boiling over the pot, he must boil the remainder until six cups have evaporated and three remain in the pot, when it becomes lawful.

The second principle is, that if water be first poured into the juice, and the whole be then boiled, and the water, on account of its subtlety, be soon wasted, it is requisite that whatever remains after the evaporation (of the water) be boiled until two-thirds of it be wasted. If, on the contrary, the water and juice evaporate together, it is in that case requisite that the mixture be boiled until two-thirds of the whole evaporate, that the remaining third may be rendered lawful; for here the third of the mixture of water and juice which remains becomes the same as if, a third of the pure juice having remained, water had then been poured into it and boiled. This:—suppose a person should mix ten cups of juice with twenty cups of water;—in that case, if the water purely evaporate, the mixture must be boiled until a ninth of it remain, which is equivalent to one-third of the pure juice:—whereas, if the juice and water evaporate conjunctly, the whole must then be boiled until two-thirds of it evaporate.

If juice be boiled with fire, at one or several different times before it be inebriating or prohibited, it is lawful. If, also, the juice, being taken from the fire, and continue to boil until two-thirds of it evaporate, it is lawful, in this case the evaporation is the effect of the fire.

The third principle is, in boiling juice, after part of it has evaporated, and part has likewise been poured out,—to know how much more must evaporate, that the remaining part may be rendered lawful:—and, in order to this, the following rule must be observed.—The quantity which remains after part has been poured out must be multiplied by the third of the whole; and this sum being divided by the quantity which remains after part of it has evaporated, the quotient is the quantity that is lawful. Thus, if a person boil ten cups of juice, and after one cup had evaporated three cups more should be poured out; then three cups and one-third (the third of the whole) being multiplied into six, the number which remains after the loss of evaporator and pouring out amounts to twenty, and this sum being divided by nine, there remains two cups and two-ninths; the quantity which is lawful, when the rest has evaporated.

BOOK XLVII.

OF HUNTING.

Section I.

Of catching Game with Animals of the Hunting Tribe, such as Dogs. Hawks, &c.

It is lawful to hunt with all animals of the hunter tribe that are duly trained. It is lawful to hunt with a trained dog, a parrot, a hawk, a falcon, and in short with every animal of the hunter tribe that is trained. It is related in the Jannah that game caught with a trained animal of the hunter tribe, whether bird or beast, is lawful; but that, caught with any other animal it is not lawful, unless when taken alive, and slain by Zabghab. This doctrine is established by a text of the Koran, in which mention is made of trained dogs. The term Kalb [dog] comprehends, in its general

* The common method of making strong drink, among the Asiatics, is by fermenting the juice in the sun.

† Yuz.—It is an animal of the leopard on lynx species, hooded and trained to catching game, nearly on the same principle as the hawks.
acceptation every carnivorous animal even to a tiger.* It is, however, related as an opinion of Abū Yosaf, that tigers and bears are excepted, as neither of them hunt for others,—the tiger because of his ferocity, and the bear because of his voraciousness. Some of the kites tribe havelike been excepted because of their voraciousness; and the hog has been excepted because it is essential filter, and because it is unlawful to derive any advantage from it. It is to be observed that it is a condition of the lawfulness of game that the animal which takes it be of the hunter tribe, and trained; and also that the master let slip the animal in the name God; for it is so related in a tradition of Abūe, the son of Hatim Tai.

Rules for ascertaining whether a dog, &c., be duly trained.—The sign of a dog being trained is, his catching game three times without eating it; whereas the sign of a hawk being trained is, merely, his returning to his master, and attending to his call. These signs are adopt from Abūollah Ibn Abass. The body of a hawk, moreover, is not capable of enduring blows; but as, on the contrary, the body of a dog has this capability, a dog is therefore to be beaten until he desist from eating the game. Besides, one sign of being trained is, to desist from that which custom and habit have made agreeable; and as it is the custom of a hawk to be wild and to fly from man, it follows that its paying attention to its master's call, and showing no wildness, is a sign of its being trained. With respect to a dog, on the contrary, he is attached to man; but his custom is to tear and eat; and consequently, when he preserves game and does not eat it, it is a sign of his being trained.

—It is to be observed that the condition here-recited, of a dog desisting, and not eating three times, is the doctrine of the two disciples (and there is also one tradition from Hāneefah to the same effect)—and the reason of it is that, in less than three times there is a probability of the dog's perseverance-having proceeded from satiety or some such cause; but that when he desists from eating for three different times, it is a proof that such perseverance has become a custom; for this particular number of three is the established standard for experiments, and for the discovery of an evasion,—in the same manner as it is used in determining the period of an option. It is also required to have been adopted in the story of Moses and Khizir; † for Khizir, upon the third instance, said, "Now there is a separation between you and me." Another reason is that plurality is a sign of knowledge; and as three is the smallest number of plurality, it has therefore been adopted as the standard. In the opinion of Hāneefah, however, as recorded in the Mahoeot, a training does not take place, so long as the hunter does not conceive the animal to be trained; and he holds it improper to fix on the number three; because the fixing on a particular number cannot be done by the forethought of man, but must be regulated by the precepts of the sacred writings; and as no precept has been issued on this head, it is proper to consign it to the judgment of him who is best acquainted with the matter, namely, the hunter. According to a former tradition, Hāneefah holds the game of the third time to be lawful; whilst the two disciples maintained that it is not lawful, as the animal does not become trained until after the third time; and consequently the game of the third time is lawful for the untrained animal, and, as such, is unlawful: this being like the act of a slave in the presence of his master; in other words, if a slave perform any acts in the presence of his master, such as purchase or sale, and the master, seeing and knowing the same, remain silent, the slave in that case becomes licensed,—not only with respect to the act in question, but also with respect to every act which he may afterwards perform:—and so likewise in the case in question. The reasoning of Hāneefah is, that when the animal takes the game the third time, and instead of eating preserves it, this argues it to have been trained at the time of taking the game, and consequently the game of the third time is the game of a trained animal.

* Arab. Assid; including lions, and every other creature of the feline tribe, except the panther before mentioned.
† The expression in the original, signifies to send off. It here means the act of casting off the hound or hawk, and hunting them at the game.

—It is otherwise in the case above cited, because license is a notification, and cannot take place without the knowledge of the slave; and the slave cannot acquire this knowledge until after he has performed the act, and his master remained silent.

The innovation must be repeated (or, at least, must not be wilfully omitted) at the time of letting slip the hound, &c.—If a person let slip his trained dog, or his trained hawk, and at the time of letting them slip repeat the name of God, or omit it from forgetfulness, and the dog or hawk catch the game, and wound it so that it dies, the game may in that case lawfully be eaten.

—If, however, he should wilfully, and not from forgetfulness, omit the name of God, it is not then lawful to eat the game so taken. It is mentioned in the Zahir Rawayat that the wounding of the game is a condition of its lawfulness, as it furnishes the means of a Zabbah Istiraree. (The meaning of a Zabbah Istiraree has already been explained in treating of Zabbah.)

The Arabs, having a dual number, do not of course admit two to constitute plurality.
A hunting quardruped eating any part of the game renders it lawful. — If a dog or panther eat any part of the game, it is unlawful to eat of such; but if a hawk eat part of it, it may lawfully be eaten. — The distinction between these two cases has already been explained.

If a dog (for instance) catch game several times without eating it, and afterwards catching game eat part of it, such game cannot lawfully be eaten, as the circumstance of the dog eating it is a proof that he has not been properly trained. In the same manner also, the game which he may afterwards take is not lawful until he shall have been trained anew, concerning which the same difference of opinion obtains as that already set forth concerning a training in the beginning. With respect to the game previously taken by him, illegality does not attach to such parts of it as have been eaten, since there the subject no longer remains; but with respect to such parts as have not been preserved (that is, have been left upon the plain), they are unlawful according to all our doctors. As to what may have been preserved (that is, what the hunter may have carried to his own house), it is unlawful, according to Ianeeza. The two disciples maintain it to be lawful; for they contend that the circumstance of the dog eating at that time is no argument of his not having been previously trained, as an art may be acquired and afterwards forgotten. The argument of Ianeeza, on the contrary, is that the dog's eating of the game at that period is a proof of his never having been properly trained from the first.

Game caught by a hawk, after it has returned to its wild state, is not lawful. — If a hawk fly from its master, and remain for a while in a state of wildness and flight, and afterwards catch game, such game is not lawful, as the hawk in that state is not trained; for the sign of being trained is to return to its master; and as it did not so return, the sign no longer remains; whence it is considered in the same light as a dog which eats its game.

A dog does not render his game unlawful by taking its blood. — If a dog eat the blood of his game, and not the flesh, the name is lawful, and capable of being eaten, as the dog has preserved it for his master, which argues him to have been well trained, since he eat merely what was unfit for his master, and preserved what was fit for him.

Or by eating a piece of the flesh cut off and thrown to him by the hunter. — If a hunter, having taken the game from his trained dog, cut off a piece of it, and throw it to the dog, and the dog eat the same, still the remaining part of it is lawful, as it is not then game; the case being, in fact, the same as if a person were to throw to a dog any other kind of food. The law is the same where a dog leaps upon his master; and takes from him part of the dead game in this hands and eats it; this being similar to where a dog attacks his master's goat, and kills it, which is no proof of the dog's not being trained.

Game of a dog biting off a piece in the pursuit of his game. — If a dog lay hold of game with his teeth, and having bitten off the part eat it and afterwards catch the game and kill it, without eating any other part of it, the game is unlawful; because upon the dog eating part of his game it becomes evident that he is not trained. If, on the contrary, he drop the part bitten off, and having pursued the game kill it and deliver it up to his master without eating any part of it; and having afterwards passed by the part bitten off eat the same, the game is lawful; for as, if the dog, under these circumstances, had eaten part of the body of the game in the hands of his master it would have been of no consequence, it follows that it is, a fortiori, of no consequence where he eats what was separated from it, and unlawful for the master to eat. It is otherwise in the former case; because there the dog eat in the very act of hunting; and also, because the tearing off a piece of flesh with teeth admits of two explanations; for first, this may be done with a view to devouring, and secondly, it may be done with a view merely to weaken the animal, in order the more easily to catch it; and the eating of the piece before catching the animal argues the first of these, whereas the eating of it after catching and delivering the game to the hunter argues the second, whence no inference can be drawn that the dog is not trained.

Game taken alive must be slain by Zabbah. — If a hunter take game alive which his dog had wounded, it is incumbent upon him to slay it according to the prescribed form of Zabbah, and if he delay so doing until it die, it is then carrion and incapable of being eaten. The law it the same with respect to game taken by a hawk, or the like; and also with respect to game shot by an arrow. The reason of it is, that in this case the hunter is capable of the original observance, namely, Zabbah Ikhtiaree, before the occurrence of the necessity for the substitute, namely, Zabbah Itbariaree; and therefore the validity of the substitute is annulled. This law, however, supposes a capability in the hunter to perform the Zabbah; for where he takes the game alive, and is incapable of performing the Zabbah, and there exists in the animal more life than in one whose throat has been just cut, such game (according to the Zahir Rawayet is not lawful. It is related, as an opinion of Ianeeza and Aboo Yoosaf, that it is lawful (and this opinion has been adopted by Shafei); because the hunter is not in this case capable of the original observance, and is therefore in the same situation as a person necessitated to use sand instead of water, notwithstanding he be in sight of water. The reason alleged in the Zahir Rawayet is, that the hunter's finding the animal alive is equivalent to his capability of performing the Zabbah, since it enables him to reach the throat of the animal with his hand. Hence he has, in a manner, the power of performing the Zabbah, which he neglects. It is otherwise where only as much life exists in the animal as in one whose throat has been cut; because it is then, in effect, dead, whence it is that if, in that state, it should fall into water, it is not unlawful, any more than it has fallen into water when actually dead, the dead not being a fit subject for Zabbah. Some of the learned have entered more particularly into this case, alleging that the inability to perform the Zabbah arise from the want of an instrument, it is not then permitted to eat it; and that if the inability arise from the want of time, in that case likewise it is not permitted to eat it, according to our doctors,—in opposition to the opinion of Shafei. The argument of our doctors is, that when the animal is taken alive it is no longer game, because the term game is applicable only to what is wild and free; and that therefore the Zabbah Iztiraro is then of no effect. What is here recited proceeds on the supposition of the animal being taken alive, and of there being a possibility of its continuing to live; for if there be no possibility of its continuing to live (as where its belly has been torn, and part of his entrails have come out), it may lawfully be eaten without the performance of Zabbah, because the life that remains in it is equivalent only to the struggling of an animal whose throat had been cut, and is consequently of no effect,—in the same manner as where a goat falls into water, after having had its throat cut.

Provided it live long enough to admit of performing this ceremony,—If the hunter find the game alive, and do not take it from his dog will be dead, and there have been sufficient time, after he has found it alive, to perform the Zabbah, it is not in that case lawful to eat it: because this is equivalent to an omission of the Zabbah, notwithstanding an ability to perform it. If, on the contrary, he had found it alive at a period when, if he had taken it, there was not sufficient time to perform the Zabbah, it is lawful.

The game taken is lawful although it be not the same that was intended by the hunter. —If a hunter let slip his dog at game, and the dog take some other game, the game so taken is lawful. Malik has said that it is not lawful, since the dog took this game without having been let slip at it, as it was at another specific animal that the hunter let him slip. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the object of the hunter is merely the acquisition of game; and all game is the same to him. Besides, the specification of the particular animal is of no advantage, as it is impracticable to teach a dog to take that particular animal.

Rule in casting off a panther at game. —If a person let slip a panther at game,* and

* The lynx or panther used in hunting is generally kept hooded, and is conveyed from the panther lie for a while in ambush, and then catch and kill the game, it is lawful to eat it; because the lying in ambush being with a view to catch the game, and not to take rest, does not of consequence terminate the act of letting it slip. The same rule also holds with respect to a dog, when trained in the manner of a panther.

All the game caught by the dog, etc., under one invocation, is lawful. Rule for determining this with respect to dog. —If a dog let slip at game, and take and kill it and afterwards take and kill other game, both are lawful; because the act of letting him slip continues to operate, and is not terminated until after the taking of the second game; this case being similar to that of a person shooting at an animal with an arrow, which not only his and kills it, but also hits and kills another. If, on the contrary, the dog, after killing the first game, lie down upon the ground and rest for a long time, and then, some other game passing by, he rise up and kill it, it is not lawful to eat that other game; because when the dog lay down and took rest, he thereby determined the act of letting him slip, since his sitting down was with a view to take rest, and not to deceive the game: in opposition to what was before recited.

And hawks.—If a hawk, being let slip (cast off) at game, first perch upon some thing, and afterwards, going in quest of the game, take it and kill it, it is lawful to eat it. This, however, proceeds on the supposition of the hawk neither tarrying long, nor with a view to rest, but merely a short time, and with a view to surprize her prey.

Game is not lawful when caught (by a hawk, etc.) independent of the act of the hunter. —If a trained hawk catch game and kill it, and it be not known whether any person let her slip at such game, it is then unlawful to eat it; because in this case a doubt exists with respect to the letting slip; and game is not unlawful unless the animal which takes it he let slip at it.

It is requisite to its legality (when caught dead) that blood have been drawn from it. —If game be strangled by a dog, and not wounded, it is not lawful to eat it; because the wounding of it is a condition of its legality, according to the Zahir Rawayet (as has been before mentioned); and this condition implies that where merely particular members of the game are broken by the dog it is not lawful to eat it.

Game is rendered unlawful by the conjunction of any cause of illegality in the catching of it. —If a trained dog be assisted place to place upon a sort of litter. When the hunters have approached within sight of their game, they unhook the panther and cast off his chains, and he instantly springs at his prey, if within his reach, or if otherwise, practices a variety of stratagems to get near to it.
in killing the game by a dog that is not trained, or by a dog belonging to a Magian, or by one upon which the invocation had been wilfully omitted, in that case the game is unlawful; because two causes are here united, namely, a cause of legality, and a cause of illegality, and caution dictates a preference to the cause of illegality.

Game hunted down by any person not qualified to perform Zabbah is unlawful.—Any person not permitted to perform Zabbah (such as an apostate, a Mohrimit, or a person who wilfully omits the invocation) is the same as a Magian with respect to letting loose an animal of the hunter tribe.

If a dog, without being let slip, should of himself pursue game, and a Mussulman repeat the invocation, and then make a noise and incite the dog to run faster, and the dog catch the game, it is in that case lawful to eat it.

Game killed at a second catching of it (either by the same or a second dog) is lawful.—If a Mussulman, having repeated the invocation, let slip his dog at game, and the dog having pursued and caught the game and thereby rendered it weak, let it go, and afterwards catch it a second time and kill it, it is in that case lawful to eat it; and so likewise where a Mussulman lets slip two dogs, and one of them renders the game weak, and the other kills it; and also, where two men let slip their dogs (that is, each of them one dog), and one of the dogs renders the game weak, and the other kills it. In this last case, however, the game is the property of him whose dog rendered it weak; because he deprived it of the quality of game, as he disabled it from running.

Section II.

Of shooting Game with an Arrow.*

Game slain by a hunter shooting at random, on hearing a noise, is lawful, provided the noise proceeded from game.—If a person hear a noise, and, imagining it to be that of game, shoot an arrow, or let slip his dog or hawk and in either case game be killed, and it be afterwards discovered that the noise did actually proceed from game, it is then lawful to eat the game so killed by the arrow, dog, or hawk, whether it were the game of which the noise was heard, or not; because the object of the hunter was merely to game of whatever kind. This is according to the Zahir Rawayet.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that a hog is in this case an exception;—in other words, if it be afterwards known that the noise proceeded from a hog, the game killed by the arrow, hawk, or dog, is not lawful; because a hog is in an excessive degree im withstanding he may have continued in the search of it until he found it; because in this case two causes are conjoined,—one of illegality, namely, the other wound, and one of legality, namely, the wound of his arrow; and it is the established custom to give the preference to the cause of illegality. Moreover, caution is easily observed in this case, as it is an uncommon one. All that has been above recited relates to the shooting of an arrow; but it is equally applicable throughout to the letting slip of a dog, or so forth.

* Game which, being shot, falls into water, or upon any building, &c., before it reaches the ground, is unlawful.—If a person shoot at game with an arrow, and hit it, and it fall into water, or upon the roof of a house, or some other eminence, and afterwards upon the ground, it is not lawful to cut it; because the animal is in this case a Mootradeea, the eating of which is prohibited in the Kor'an; and also, because there is a suspicion that the death may have been occasioned by the water, or by the fall from the eminence and not by the wound.*

Rule with respect to water-fowl.—If a water-fowl be wounded, and the member wounded be not a part under water, it is lawful,—whereas, if it be a part under water, it is not lawful, in the same manner as a land bird, which being wounded falls into water.

Game slain by a bruise, without a wound, is not lawful.—If an arrow hit (stunned) by an arrow without a sharp point is unlawful, as it is so recorded in the traditions. It is to be observed, moreover, that the wounding of game is a condition of its legality; because a Zabbah Iztiraree cannot otherwise be established,—as has been already mentioned.†

Game killed by a bullet from a cross-bow is not lawful, as this missile does not wound, and is therefore like a blunt arrow. A stone also, is subject to the same rule, as it does not wound; and game is also unlawful when killed by a great heavy stone, notwithstanding it be sharp; because there is a probability that the game may have died from the weight of the stone; and not from the sharpness of it. If, however, the stone be sharp, and not weighty, the game killed by it is lawful, as it is then certain that it must have died in consequence of a wound from it.

Game killed by a small pebble stone, and of which no part has been cut by the stone, is not lawful, because in this case the game is bruised and not wounded. If, also, game be beaten by a stick or piece of wood until it die, it is not lawful, as the death is then occasioned by the weight of the stick or piece of wood, and not by any wound; yet if, in his case, the stick or piece of wood, because of their sharpness, occasion a wound, there is no impropriety in eating the game, as the stick and piece of wood are then equivalent to a sword and spear. The general rule, in short, in these cases, is that when it is known with certainty that the death of the game was occasioned by a wound, it is lawful food; but unlawful where the death is known with certainty to have been occasioned by a bruise, and not a wound; and that, in case of the existence of a doubt (that is, where it is not certainly known whether the death was occasioned by a bruise or by a wound), it is then also unlawful, from a principle of caution.

If a person throw a sword or a knife at game, and the game be struck by the handle of the sword, or the back of the knife, it is not lawful; whereas if struck by the edge, and wounded, it is lawful.

Case of cutting off the head of an animal.—If a person cut off the head of a goat, it is lawful to eat it, as the jugular veins have been cut through; but it is nevertheless abominable. If, however, a person perform this action by beginning with the spine, so as to occasion the death of the animal before the jugular veins be cut, it is not lawful; but it is lawful if the animal do not die until after the jugular veins are cut.

A Magian, an apostate, or an idolator are not qualified to kill game.—Game killed by a Magian, an apostate, or a worshipper of images, is not lawful, because they are not allowed to perform Zabbah (as has been already explained in treating of that subject), and Zabbah is a condition of the legality of game. It is otherwise with respect to a Christian or a Jew, because, as their performance of a Zabbah Ikhthariare is lawful, it follows that their performance of a Zabbah Iztiraree must also be lawful.

Case of game wounded by one person, and then slain by another.—If a person shoot an arrow at game, and hit it, without wounding it so weak as to prevent it from running, and in that state another person shoot at it, and kill it, the game is the property of the second hunter, because he was the person who took it, and the Prophet has said, "Game belongs to him who takes it." If, on the contrary, the first hunter render it too weak to run, and another person then kill it, it is in that case the property of the first hunter. Nevertheless, he must abstain from eating it, as there is a probability that it may have died in consequence of the second wound; and as it had not the power of running after the first wound, it ought to have been slain by a Zabbah Ikhthariare, no regard being, in such an instance, paid to the Zabbah Iztiraree, in opposition to the former case.—This prohibition, however, against eating the game, proceeds on the supposition of its being in such a condition as to induce us to believe the continuance of its existence possible; since under these circumstances its death is referred to the second shot: but if the first wound be such as to render the continuance of its existence impossible (as if it have as little life in it as with its throat cut, having, for instance, had its head cut off), in that case it is lawful to eat it, as its death is not then referred to the second shot it being at that period in a state equivalent to annihilation. If, however, the first wound be such as to render the survival of the game impossible, and there nevertheless be more life in it than in an animal with its throat cut (as if, for instance, it be capable of living one day), in that case, according to Aboo Yoosuf, it is not rendered unlawful by the second shot, because such a degree of life (in his opinion) is vital effect, and according to Mohammed it is unlawful, as such a degree of life (in his opinion) is of effect.

* Amidst such a mass of frivolous absurdity, the translator thinks it unnecessary to offer any apology for the omission, in this place, of a long discussion still more futile than any thing which has gone before.

In the foregoing case, the second hunter is responsible to the first for the value which the game bears after receiving the first wound; because he (the second hunter) has destroyed game the property of the first hunter (who became the proprietor of it in consequence of his wounding it, and thereby incapacitating it from running); and the game is, by such wound rendered defective and in all cases of responsibility for destruction of property a regard is paid to the time of the destruction. The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that in this case there is a distinction; in order words, responsibility takes place where it is known that the game in question died in consequence of the second wound (that is, where the wound of the first hunter was such that the animal lived after it,—and the wound of the second hunter such as to destroy the existence); and the second hunter is accordingly responsible for the value of the game, in its wounded and defective, not in its unwounded and perfect state; in the same manner as where a person kills the sick slave of another. If, however, it be known that the game died in consequence of the first wound, or if it be uncertain of which wound it died, Mohammed has said, in the Zeeadat, that it is incumbent upon the second hunter, first to pay a compensation for the damage he may have occasioned to the game by the wound; and, secondly, to pay a compensation for half the value which the game bore after receiving both wounds; and, thirdly, to pay a compensation of half the value of the flesh. The reason for the first compensation is, that the second hunter, having occasioned a damage to an animal which was the property of another, is bound, in the first instance, to make good the amount of that damage. The reason for the second compensation is, that, as the animal died of both wounds, the second wound must have been the immediate cause of its destruction; and as it was at that time the property of another person, it is incumbent upon him to make a compensation for half the value which it bore after receiving both wounds, as the first wound did not proceed from him, (With respect to the damage occasioned by the second wound having paid it before, he is not required to pay it again.) The reason for the third compensation is that, as the game, after receiving the first wound, was in such a state as to have rendered it lawful by a Zabbeh Ikhtiaroo, if it had not received the second wound, it follows that the second hunter in consequence of the second wound, did render unlawful half of the flesh with respect to the first hunter. He is only required, however, to pay a compensation for one half of the flesh, as he paid the other half before in as much as he paid half the value which included the flesh.

Case of game first wounded, and then killed by the same person.—If, instead of two persons shooting the game, one person shoot the same game twice, the law is then the same with respect to the illegality of the game as when it receives two wounds from two different persons;—this being similar to where a person, having shot game upon any eminence, and rendered it weak and feebile, afterwards shoots it a second time, and brings it to the ground,—in which case the game so killed is unlawful, insomuch as the second wound is the cause of illegality; and so also in the case in question.

All animals may be hunted.—The hunting of every species of animal is lawful whether they be fit for eating or otherwise, because the legality of hunting has been absolutely declared in the Koran without restricting it to animals fit to eat. Another reason is, that the hunting of animals not fit for eating may proceed either from a desire to obtain their skin, their wool, or their feathers, or from a wish to exterminate them on an account of their being mischievous or hurtful; and all these motives are laudable.
ever. In the language of the law it means the detention of a thing on account of a claim which may be answered by means of that thing; as in the case of debt.—This practice is lawful, and ordained; for the word of God, in the Koran, says, GIVER AND RECEIVE PLEDGES:—"and it is also related, that the Prophet, in a bargain made with a Jew for grain, gave his coat of mail in pledge for the payment. Besides, all the doctor have concurred in deeming pawn legal; and it is, moreover, an obligatory engagement, and consequently lawful, in the same manner as bail.

Pawn is established by declaration and acceptance; and confirmed by the receipt of the pledge.—Contracts of pawn are established by declaration and acceptance, and are rendered perfect and complete by taking possession of the pledge. Several of the learned have said that the contract is complete immediately upon the declaration; for as it is a deed purely voluntary, it therefore obtains its completion from the voluntary act alone; as in cases of gift and alms. The seisin of the pledge is, nevertheless, absolutely requisite to the obligation of the deed, as shall be shown in its proper place. Malik has said that a contract of pawn becomes valid and binding immediately upon the concurrence of the parties; because they relate to the property of both, and are consequently similar to sale. One of the arguments advanced by our doctors is, the text of the Koran, above quoted; and another argument is, that as the act of pledging is purely voluntary (whence it is that there is no compulsion on the pawner towards the act), it must therefore be effectually concluded, in the same manner as in the case of legacies: and a contract of pawn can only be effectually concluded by the seisin, in the same manner as as a legacy is effectually concluded by the testator dying without having receded from his bequest. It is to be observed, that if the depositor relinquish the pledge to the pawnee, his so doing is equivalent to an acceptance; in other words, his not obstructing the pawnee from taking possession of the pledge is equivalent to his actually investing him with the possession, and is a sufficient proof of his having so done. This is recorded in the Zahir Rawayet; and the reason of it is, that as the seisin of the pledge is sanctioned in virtue of the agreement, it therefore resembles the seisin of a thing sold. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that the seisin of a movable pledge can only be accomplished by the laying hold of and removing it, not by the pawner's merely relinquishing it, as above mentioned; for the seisin of a pledge is an occasion of responsibility from the first, in the same manner as usurpation. The former is, however, the better opinion.

Upon the pawnee taking possession of the pledge, the contract becomes binding.—Upon a person receiving a pledge which is distinguished and defined (that is, unmixed and disjoined from the property of the depositor) the acceptance being then ascertained, the contract is completed, and consequently binding. (Until, however, the seisin actually takes place, the pawner is at full liberty either to adhere to, or recede from the agreement, as the validity of it rests entirely upon the seisin, without which the end and intention of a pledge cannot be answered).

And he [the pawnee] is responsible for the pledge.—Upon the pledge, therefore, being delivered to the pawnee, and his taking possession of the same, he becomes answerable in case of its being destroyed in his hands. Shafeei maintains that a pledge being a trust in the hands of the pawnee, if it be destroyed in his possession still he does not on that account forfeit his due; because it is recorded in the traditions, that "no pledge shall be distrained for debt, and the pawner shall be liable for all risks," meaning (according to Shafei), that if the pledge be destroyed, still the debt is answered in account of any responsibility arising therefrom;—and further, because a pledge being merely a testimony, the loss of it does not annual the debt, seeing that a debt still exists after the loss even of a written bond; and reason of which is, that the use of taking such a testimony is to add greater security to the pawnee's debt and therefore if, from the decay or destruction of the pawn or testament, the debt of the pawnee were cancelled, it would be opposite to the spirit of the agreement, since it could admit a possibility of the pawnee's right becoming extinguished, a thing repugnant to conservation and security. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are two fold. First, a tradition of the Prophet, who once decreed the claim of a pawnee to be nullified, on account of the death of a horse which he had in a pledge (although, indeed, several of the learned, in their comments on this tradition, have remarked, that it was made at a time when the value of the horse could not be ascertained). Secondly, all the companions of the Prophet, and their followers, have declared a pledge to be a subject of responsibility; that is to say, that if it decay in the hands of the pawnee, he sustains the loss. With respect, moreover, to the assertion of Shafei, that "a pledge is a trust," it is inadmissible, as being in direct contradiction to the concurrent opinion of the companions above-mentioned. With respect, also, to the tradition adduced by him as an argument, the real meaning of it is, "that a pledge cannot be completely seised, so as to render it the absolute property of the pawnee in the room of his other claim," an explication which Koorokheen has transmitted to us, as delivered by former sages. As, however the pawnee is entitled to take possession of the pledge as a security for his claim, and to detain it (for Rehn, in his literal sense, signifies detention), it necessarily follows that a pledge is not a trust.

Which he is entitled to detain until he receive payment of his debt.—In short, in the opinion of our doctors, a contract of pawn requires that the pledge be continually detained in the hands of the pawnee in lieu of his debt, in this way, that it remain in his possession as a security for the fulfilment of his claim;—whereas, in the opinion of Shafei, the claim of the pawnee is connected with the substance of the pledge, as a satisfaction for his claim,—in this way, that he may sell it, and thereby obtain a discharge,—it being until such sale a trust reposed in him, and the property of the depositor;—and accordingly to these different tenets several cases occur concerning which there is a disagreement between our doctors and Shafei.

Without admitting the pawner to any use of it.—For instance,—if the pawner be desirous of resuming his pledge for a short time, that he may enjoy the use of it (as in the case of taking milk from a cow, or so forth), he is not so allowed, according to our doctors, unless by the consent of the pawnee as the object of the agreement of pawn (namely, a constant possession) would by that means be entirely defeated;—whereas, according to Shafei, a pawner may even forcibly take back his pledge for a temporary enjoyment of the use, nor can he be prevented from this; because (in his opinion) a pledge may be sold conformably to the nature of the agreement; and the resumption of it towards an enjoyment of the usufruct cannot be considered as a subversion thereof.

(The debt to which the pawn is opposed must be actually due.)—A contract of pawn is not valid unless opposed to a debt due at that time; for the end of such contract is to establish possession in order to the obtaining of payment; and the obtaining of payment presupposes an obligation of debt.

The responsibility or the pledge extends to the amount of the debt owing to the pawnee.—A PLEDGE is insured in the possession of the pawnee, in whatever is the smallest amount—the debt of the pawnee, or the value the pledge bore at the time of being deposited. Thus if a pledge equivalent to the amount of the debt perish in the pawnee’s hands, his claim is rendered void, and he thereby, as it were, obtains a complete payment. If, on the contrary, the value of the pledge exceed the amount of the debt, the excess is in that case considered, as a trust, and the whole of the pawnee’s claim is annulled, on account of the decay of that part of the pledge which is equivalent to the amount thereof; and the remainder (the excess), as being held in trust, is not liable to be compensated for, and consequently the pawner sustains the loss of it. If, on the other hand, the value of the pledge be less than the debt, the pawnee forfeits that part of his claim only which is equal to the value of the pledge, and the balance, or excess, must be paid to him by the pawner. Ziffer maintains that a pledge is liable to be compensated for according to its value;—whence if a pledge of the value of one thousand five hundred dirms at the time of delivery be destroyed, and the debt of the pawnee be one thousand dirms, the pawner has a claim upon the pawnee for the difference, namely, five hundred dirms.—His arguments upon this point are twofold.—First, a saying of Alee: ‘The pawner and pawnee shall mutually restore to each other the excess, whether the pledge exceed in value the debt, or the debt the pledge.’—SECONDLY, the amount in which the pledge exceeds the debt being (as well as the sum equivalent to the debt) given in pledge, the excess is of consequence a subject of responsibility as much as that part which is equivalent to the debt. Hence, when the debt is annulled, a restitution must be made of the surplus. Thus, the opinion of our doctors upon this subject is adopted from Omar Farook, and Abdoola-Ibn Mansool. They moreover, argue, that as the pledge was taken possession of purely for the purpose of obtaining payment it is therefore a subject of responsibility only in that degree of value from which the payment of the debt might have been made, as in the case of a real payment, the surplus being pawned merely from necessity (as it was impossible to have pawned the exact value of the debt), and therefore not demanding restitution.—With respect, also, to the saying of Alee (as quoted by Ziffer), the meaning of it is, that the parties shall mutually return the excess, in case of sale (that is to say, if the pawner sell the pledge), not in case of destruction, for he has elsewhere declared the surplus to be held by the pawnee in trust.

The pawnee may demand payment of his debt, and imprison the pawner in case of contumacy.—It is lawful for the receiver of a pledge to demand of his debtor, and even to imprison the debtor in case of refusal; because the claim still exists after the receipt of the pledge, which is not considered as a fulfilment, but merely as a preservative of it. The pawnee, therefore, is not prohibited from making the demand; and if the circumstance of the evasions and delays of the pawner be made known to the Kazee, he must imprison him, as has been formerly explained.*

It is required of the pawnee, before payment to produce the pledge.—WHENEVER a pawnee demands payment of his debt, it is requisite that the Kazee order him first to produce the pledge; because as he possesses that for the purpose of obtaining payment, it is not lawful for him to take his due at the same time that he retains possession of the pledge, which he holds as a security; since

* In other words. ‘The pawnee is responsible for it,”

* In treating of the duties of the Kazee, (See Vol. II., p. 338.)
if in such case, the pledge were to perish in his hands, a double payment would be induced, which is inadmissible. And when the pawnee shall have produced the pledge, the Kazee must order the depositor first to discharge the debt, in order to ascertain the pawnee's right, in the same manner as the right of the pawner is ascertained, to the end that both may be placed upon an equal footing: as in the case of bargains, where the seller having produced the goods, the buyer then lays down the purchase-money.

But if the demand, payment in a distant place, he is not required to produce it unless this can be done without expense.—If the pawnee demand payment in a city different from that wherein the contract of pawn was concluded, and the pledge be of such a nature as neither to require charge of carriage or expense, the same rules which have been laid down in other cases hold good in this; as the place for the surrender of a pledge of this kind being entirely immaterial and inap- propriate, the doctors have therefore assigned no particular rules or conditions regarding it. If, on the contrary, the pledge be of such a nature as to require carriage and charges of removal, the pawnee is not desired to produce it; for such a requisition would necessarily oblige him to have it carried from place to place. It is, moreover, incumbent on him to relinquish the pledge to the pawner, and to allow him to resume it; but he is not required to remove it from one place to another, as that would be a loss to him which he had not stipulated.

The pledge may be sold, at the desire of the pawner; and the pawnee cannot afterwards be required to produce it.—If the pawner empower the trustee to sell his pledge, and he sell it accordingly, either for ready money or on credit, it is lawful, the power of the pawner to sell it being indisputable. If, therefore, the pawnee afterwards demand payment, he is not desired to produce the pledge, as that in such case, is not in his power. The same rule also holds where the pawnee, at the instance of the pawner, having sold the pledge, does not possess himself of the purchase-money; for then the Kazee may compel the pawner to discharge his debt, without requiring the pawnee to produce the pledge, which because of its having been sold at the desire of the pawner, has become converted into a debt, wherefore the pawner himself did, as it were, pawn the purchase-money (that is, the debt).—If, on the contrary, the pawnee possess himself of the purchase-money, he must in that case be required to produce it upon demanding his debt; for as the money is a commutation for the pledge, it is therefore a substitute for it. It is to be observed, however, that in the above case the pawnee has a right to the possession of the purchase-money; for as he himself made the sale, the rights of the contract consequently appertain to him.

He must produce it on receiving a partial payment, as well as in case of a complete discharge.—In the same manner as the pawnee is required to produce the pledge when he is about to receive payment of his debt in full, he is also required to produce it when he receives part payment, provided the term stipulated be expired; because his producing it can be of no prejudice to him) whilst at the same time it serves to dissipate any apprehension of the loss of the pledge which may have arisen in the mind of the pawner. The pledge, however, is not to be restored until a complete discharge be made. If, also, the pledge should have been sold by the pawnee, and the purchase-money taken possession of by him he is required to produce such purchase-money upon demanding payment of his debt, or of part of it, in the same manner as he is required to produce the pledge itself, in case of its being extant, as the purchase-money is a substitute for the pledge.

If a person should, by misadventure, kill a pawned slave, and the magistrate decree the value of such slave to be made good by the Aikas of the slayer within the term of three years, the pawner must not be compelled to discharge the pawnee's debt until he (the pawnee) shall have produced the full value of the slave; for in this case, the value is a substitute for the slave who was in pawn; and it is consequently incumbent on the pawnee to produce the whole of its value, in the same manner as he is required to produce the whole pledge where it is extant. Here, moreover, the pledge has not become converted into value by any act of the pawner; whereas, in the case formerly stated (namely, where the pawnee sold the pledge at the desire of the pawner without possessing himself of the purchase-money) the pledge was converted into debt by the act of the pawner, since he invested the pawnee with a power of disposal. There is consequently an essential difference between these two cases;—whence it is that, in the present instance, it is incumbent on the pawnee to produce the value received for the slave, whereas, in the former case, he is not required to produce the pledge, nor yet its price, as of that he had never received possession.

Cases in which he is not required to produce it.—If the pawner deliver the pledge into the hands of a trustee, ordering him, at the same time, to resign it in charge to some one else than the pawnee, and he accordingly do so, in that case the pawnee is not required to produce the pledge upon demanding payment of his debt, for this is rendered impossible, from its not having been intrusted to his care, but to that of another. — If, also, the trustee, having committed the pledge into the hands of one of his relations, should then abscond, and the person to whom it was given acknowledge, upon its being demanded from him, that "he had indeed received it in trust, but was ignorant of the real proprietor," the pawnor may be compelled to discharge his debt, without the pledge being required to produce the pledge, as he had never received it (and the same rule also holds, where the trustee absconds, carrying the pledge along with him, without its being known whither he is gone). — If, on the other hand, the trustee deny the goods entrusted to him to be a pledge, asserting that "they are his own property," the pawnor cannot take anything from the pawnee until the contrary be proved; because the formalities of the trustee is tantamount to a destruction of the pledge and when a pledge is destroyed, the pawnee is considered as having received payment of his debt, after which he is no longer at liberty to claim it.

The pawnor cannot reclaim the pledge on the plea of selling it for discharge of his debt. — If the pawnor demand a restitution of the pledge with a view to sell it, and thereby pay off his debt, still it is not incumbent on the pawnee so to do, as the contract of pawn requires that the pledge be continually dotaining in the hands of the pawnee until such time as his debt be paid. — If, also, the pawnor discharge the debt in part, still it remains with the pawnee to keep possession until he shall have received payment of the balance; but whenever a complete payment is made the pawnee must be directed to restore the pledge to the pawnor, as the obstacle to his so doing no longer exist, the claimant having obtained his due.

The pawnor must restore what he has received in payment, if the pledge perishes in his hands. — If, after the discharge of the debt, the pledge should be destroyed with the pawnor, he must return the money he received in payment; for as, upon the pledge perishing in the hands of the pawnor, he appears to have received payment in virtue of his previous possession of it, he therefore appears to have taken payment twice, and consequently must return what he has received. In the same manner, if the pawnor and pawnnee should, by mutual consent, dissolve the contract of pawn, the pawnor may, nevertheless, keep possession of the pledge until such time as he receive payment of the debt, or exempt the pawnor therefrom.

The contract is not dissolved until the pledge be restored. — A contract of pawn is not rendered void until the pawnor restore the pledge to the pawnor, according to the prescribed mode of annulment.

The debt is discharged by the loss of the pledge. — If the pledge perish in the hands of the pawnor, after the parties have in concert dissolved the contract, his debt is in that case considered as discharged, provided the value of the pledge be adequate to it, the agreement being still held in force.

The pawnor is not entitled to use the pledge. — It is not lawful for the pawnor to enjoy, in any shape, the usufruct of the pledge. — If, therefore, a slave be pawned, the pawnor must not employ him in service;
if a house, he must not dwell in it; and if clothes, he must not wear them; — for the right of the pawnor is in the possession, not in the use. — Neither is a pawnor authorized to sell the pledge, unless at the desire of the pawnor.

Or to lend or let it to hire. — A pawnor is not permitted to let out, or give the pledge in loan; for as he is himself prohibited from enjoying any use of it, he consequently is not authorized to confer the power of enjoyment upon another. If, therefore he does so, it establishes a transgression; but a transgression does not occasion a dissolution of the contract.

He may consign it in charge to any of his family. — A pawnor may either watch over the pledge himself, or he may devolve the care of its preservation upon his wife, child, or servant, provided they be of his family.
If, on the contrary, he commit the care of it, or resign it in trust, to one who is not of his family, he becomes the security, and the person to whom he gave it the secondary security. Concerning this, however, there is a difference of opinion between Haneefa and his two disciples; for he does not consider the other person to be a secondary security; whereas they have declared it to be in the option of the pawnor to make whomsoever he may please the secondary security.

If he transgress with respect to it, he is responsible for the whole value. — If a pawnor commit any transgression* with respect to the pledge, he must make reparation to the whole amount of the value; in the same manner as in a case of transgression for the amount in which the value of the pledge exceeds the debt is a trust: and a transgression with respect to a trust, renders the person who commits it liable to make complete reparation.

The use of the pledge is determined by the pawnor's mode of keeping or wearing it. — If a person pledge a ring, and the receiver put it on his little finger, and it be afterwards lost or destroyed, he is responsible, as he has transgressed in making use of the pledge instead of using means for its preservation: — and, in this case, the right or left hand is indifferent, there being no uniform custom of wearing a ring invariably upon either. — If, on the contrary, the pawnor wear the ring upon any other than his little finger, this is not considered as an enjoyment of use, but as a means of preser-

* Such as converting it to his own use, &c.
(as prohibited above).
PAWNS.

| VOL. IV |

tivation, as it is contrary to the customary mode of wearing a ring.—So likewise, if the pawn wear a sheet (which he has received in pledge) after the customary mode, he is responsible for it; whereas, if he spread it over his shoulders, he is not responsible.

If a person pawn two or three words, and the pawnee sling them over his shoulder, then, provided there be only two, he becomes responsible for their value in case of their loss, but not if there be three; the reason of which is, that amongst warriors it is a frequent custom to sling two words on their shoulders in battle, but never to sling three.

If a person pawn two rings, and the pawnee put them both on his little finger, and it appear that he was accustomed to adorn himself in this manner, he is liable to make compensation in case they be by any means destroyed; but if the contrary be proved, he is exempt from any responsibility.

The expenses of conservation (of the pledge) rest upon the pawnee; and those of subsistence upon the pawnee. The rent of the house wherein the pledge is kept, as well as the wages of the keeper, rest upon the pawnee;—but if the pledge be a living animal, and require a keeper and maintenance, the expense of these must be defrayed by the pawnner.—It is to be observed that the wants of a pledge are of two kinds; I. such as are requisite towards the support of the pledge and the continuance of its existence;—II. Such as may be necessary towards its preservation or safety, whether wholly or partly. Now, the absolute property of the pledge appertains to the pawnner, the expenses of the first class must therefore be defrayed by him; and as he has, moreover, a property in the usufruct of the pledge, its support and the continuance of its existence for this reason also rest upon him, being an expense attendant upon his property;—in the same manner as holds in the case of a trust. (Of this class are the maintenance of a pledge in meat and drink, including wages to shepherds, and so forth, and the clothing of a slave, the wages of a nurse for the child of a pledge, the watering of a garden, the grafting of fig-trees, the collecting of fruits. &c.) The expenses of the second class, on the contrary, are incumbent on the pawnee; because it is his part to detain the pledge; and as the preservation of it therefore rests upon him, he is consequently to defray the expense of such preservation. (Of the second class is the hire of the keeper of the pledge; and so likewise the rent of the house wherein the pledge is deposited, whether the debt exceed or fall short of the value of the pledge.)—All that is here advanced is according to the Zahir Rawayet. It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that the rent of the house is defrayed by the pawnner, in the same manner as maintenance, it being his duty to use every possible means towards securing the existence of the pledge; but that a Julai, or reward for restoring fugitive slave, is of the second class: for as the pawnner is necessitated to use every possible expedient to recover the possession of the slave, the reward, as being connected with preservation, must be defrayed by him. This, however, holds only with respect to such pledges as do not exceed the amount of the debt; for where the value of the pledge exceeds the amount of the debt, the pawnner must not be taxed with the payment of the whole, but with such share of it only as is proportionate to the value of the pledge; and at the remaining part, in proportion to the surplus, falls on the pawnner; for the excess not being held by the pawnner in pledge, but in trust, the restitution of the salvos, in regard to the excess, is, as it were, made to the absolute owner, to whom, therefore, the surplus must be charged.

But those incurred by sickness, or by offences must be defrayed by both.—The expense of healing the wounds, of curing the disorders, and of pecuniary expiations for the crimes of pledges, are defrayed by the pawnner and pawnner proportionally to the amount of the debt, and the excess of the value of the pledge over the debt.

Taxes are defrayed by the pawnner.—The taxes on pledges are levied from the pawnner as they are necessary towards the subsistence of his property.

Tithes (upon pawned land) have preference to the right of the pawnner. The tithe from the revenue of tithe-lands held in pawn precedes the right of the pawnner; because it is connected with both the substance and the property of the pledge, whereas the right of the pawnner is connected with the property of it only, not with the substance. Still, however, the contract of pawn is not invalidated in regard to the sum remaining after the payment of the tithe, as the obligation of tithe in no respect impugns the pawnner’s right of property. It is otherwise where an undefined part of a pledge proves the right of another; for in that case the contract becomes null with respect to the remainder, because this shows that the pledge was not wholly the pawnner’s property.

If either party voluntarily defray what is incumbent on the other he has no claim upon him on that account. If either party defray any of the expenses incumbent on the other, it is deemed a voluntary and gratuitous act. If, on the contrary one of them should, by order of the Kazee, fulfil a duty incumbent on the other, he has in that case a claim on the other for so doing, in the same manner as if he had done it at his instigation; for the Kazee’s jurisdiction is general: It is recorded, from Hancoofa, that no claim can be made on the other, notwithstanding the expense be defrayed by order of the Kazee unless he were then absent. Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, has said that a claim is valid in both cases; that is, whether the other were present or absent.
CHAPTER II.

OF THINGS CAPABLE OR BEING PAWNED; AND OF THINGS FOR WHICH PLEDGES MAY BE TAKEN.

An indefinite part of an article cannot be pawned.—It is unlawful to pawn an indefinite part of anything. Shafi'i maintains that it is lawful.—On behalf of our doctors two reasons are urged. First, this disagreement arises from the difference of opinions regarding the object of pledges; for according to us, pledges are taken to be detained with a view to obtain payment of a debt, which cannot be effected in case the pledge be an undefined part of property; because a seisin of things of that nature cannot be made a real seisin being only practicable with respect to things which are defined and distinguished; whereas, according to Shafi'i, the object of pledges is that the pawnee may be made to effect a discharge of his debt; and with this object pledges of the nature above mentioned are not in any shape inconsistent.—Secondly, it is an essential part of the contract of pawn, that the pledge be constantly detained in the hands of the pawnee until the redemption of it by the pawnee; a condition which cannot be fulfilled with respect to pledges, of the above nature; for in such cases it would be necessary that the pawn and the pawnee have possession of the article alternately, whence it would be the same as if the pawnner were to say to the pawnner, “I pawn it to you every other day.”—As, therefore, a constant detention is in such case impossible, it follows that the pledge of an undefined part of anything, whether capable of division or incapable, is illegal.

Even to a partner in the article.—It is not lawful to pledge any undefined part of joint property, even to a copartner; for, besides that the detention of such pledges cannot be made, the receiver would in such case retain possession of it, one day in virtue of property, and another in virtue of the contract of pawn, and thus he would hold it one day in pledge, and another not.

If the pledge be rendered indefinite by any supervenient act or circumstance, the contract of pawn is annulled.—A supervenient indefiniteness in repugnant to the continuance of a contract of pawn, according to the Mabsoot;—in other words, if a person pledge a piece of ground, for instance, and afterwards desire a trustee* to sell the half thereof, and the trustee accordingly do so, the contract of pawn no longer exists.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, that a supervenient indefiniteness does not dissolve a contract of pawn,—in the same manner as it has no effect in the case of donations;—in other words, if a person bestow anything in gift upon another, and afterwards retract the half, the gift still remains valid with respect to the other half.

The reason for what is quoted from the Mabsoot, as above, is that, in the case there stated, the subject of the contract does not exist as before; and a subsequent circumstance, as far as it has a tendency to annihilate the subject of the contract, operates equally as if it had existed from the beginning;—in the same manner as where a person (whether knowingly or unknowingly) marries within the prohibited degree.—It is otherwise with gifts; for the effect of gift is investiture with right of property; and an undefined part of a thing is capable of being property. The reason, moreover, why seisin, in the case of a gift, is requisite before the right of property can be acquired, is to prevent the possibility of compulsion: for if the grantee should become proprietor of the gift immediately upon its being offered, and without taking possession, the giver (who ought to act of his own accord) would then be constrained to do that to which he has not yet assented; namely, to deliver up the gift.

An article naturally conjoined to another cannot be pawned separately.—It is not lawful to pledge fruit without the trees which bear it, crops without the land on which they are produced, or trees without the ground on which they stand; for as the pledge, in all these cases, has a natural connection with an article which is unpledged, it is therefore in effect, indefinite, until such time as it separated from that article. In the same manner also, it is unlawful either to pawn a piece of ground without the trees which are produced upon it, a field without its produce, or a tree without its fruit; because, in these cases, a mortgage is induced of an article naturally conjoined with another which is not pledge. In short, it is a rule that when a pledges is joined to something not in pawn, the contract is not valid, since in such case possession cannot be taken of it. Haneefah has judged it lawful to pawn a piece of ground without its trees; for as the trees have no connection with the ground, except in that part only from which they vegetate, they may therefore be excepted, together with the particular spot on which they stand. It is otherwise when a person pawns the court-yard of a house without the building itself; for then the part of the ground on which the building stands remains unpledged, whereas it is requisite that the whole of the ground be pledged.

Trees: however, may be pawned with the immediate spots on which they grow, without including the est of the land.—It is lawful to pawn trees, together with the particular spots of ground on which they grow: for here subsists a vicinility only with the pawner's property, which is not repugnant to a contract of pawn. If, in this case, there be fruit upon the trees, it is included in the contract; for as the fruit is an appandage of the tree, because of the connection between them, it is therefore included in the contract in order that the same may be valid.—It is otherwise in the case of sale, for as trees may be sold without their fruit, unless that be expressly stipulated, it is not included in the sale. It is also otherwise with respect to valuables deposited in a house; for these not being appendages to the house are not included in the pledge, unless they be expressly stipulated. Grain, however, and herbs are considered as included, in case of their ground being pawned; but not in case of the sale of it. Buildings, also, and trees, are excluded from the contract of pawn, when the ground or villages to which they belong are pledged.—A person may also lawfully pawn a house, together with whatever it contains.

A claim of right established in a separable part of a pledge does not annul the contract with respect to the remainder.—In another person prove his right to part of a pledge, and the remaining part be of such a nature that it might with propriety be distinctly pawned (as where another proves his right to the court-yard of a pledged house, without the building), the contract still subsists with respect to the remaining part; in other words, if the residue be destroyed in the hands of the pawnee, his debt is divided between such residue and the value of what had proved the right of another: and the proportion which the residue bears to the whole is struck off from the debt, and that which the other part bears to the whole remains due from the pawnor.* If, on the contrary, the residue be of such a nature that it cannot be separately pawned (as where another proves a right to a pledged house without its court-yard), the contract of pawn becomes absolutely void; for it cannot operate upon any thing except what remains after deducting what has proved the right of another; and such residue is incapable of being pawned.

Occupancy, so as to obstruct a delivery of the pledge to the pawnee, prevents his becoming responsible for it.—It is to be observed that the continuance of the pawnor, or of his goods, in the house which he has pledged are obstructive of a regular delivery of the house:—in other words, if a person pledge or mortgage his house, and remain himself, or keep his goods therein, a delivery to the pawnee is not established until he evacuate it, or withdraw his goods therefrom, whence, if it be destroyed in the interim, the pawnee is not answerable.—In the same manner, the continuance of any thing within a pledged vessel is repugnant to the delivery of it; and so likewise the continuance of a burden on a pawned quadruped,—whence the continuance is not complete until the burden be taken off, as the animal otherwise continues occupied. It is different where the burden is pawned at the pawnor's option, not the animal; for in this case the contract is valid, and the burden is pledged immediately upon the pawnor delivering to the animal, it being occupied by the burden, not the burden by it; in the same manner as where things contained in a house or vessel are pledged without that house or vessel.—It is otherwise, however, where a person pawns a saddle or bridle upon a camel, and delivers the camel to the pawnor; for in that case the contract is not valid until the saddle or bridle be taken off the camel and delivered separately to the pawnor; these being dependents of the camel, in the same manner as fruit is a dependent of the tree:—whence it is that (as lawyers have remarked) whenever a camel is pawned with a saddle or bridle upon it, these are likewise included in the contract, although not particularly specified.

Pledges cannot be taken for trusts.—It is not lawful to take pledges for trusts, such as deposits, loans, or Mozaribat, or partnership stock;—in other words, if a person commit his goods in trust to another, taking a pledge for the same, it is invalid, as the receipt of the pledge would subject the receiver to responsibility; for if the pledge were destroyed in his hands; his claim would be extinguished in a degree proportionate to the value. In short, it is requisite that something lie against the pawnor of a nature to subject him to responsibility, in order that, opposed to it, the possession of the pledge, in the event of its destruction, may subject the pawnor to responsibility and operate as a discharge of his claim; but there is no responsibility with respect to trusts.

Not for any thing not insured with the holder of it.—It is not lawful to take a pledge for articles which do not subject the holder to responsibility,—such, for instance, as an article sold, and which still remains in the hands of the seller; for if the purchaser be desirous of taking a pledge from the seller to answer the delivery, it is invalid, an article sold, not being included in the hands of the seller. (Still, however, if the article sold perish in the seller's hands, his claim on the buyer for the price ceased; or, if he should have previously received the price from the buyer, he must restore it.)—With respect, on the contrary, to articles which subject the holder to responsibility that is, such as are deposited by the holder, a similar article sold, not being in the hands of the seller, the holder to a wife and the composition for wilful murder), it is lawful to take pledges for them, as responsibility attaches to all such matters, since if the article is extant the delivery of it is incumbent, or the value if it be destroyed. Opposing a pledge to such articles, therefore, is taking a pawn in security for that which is itself a subject of responsibility, and is consequently valid.

* The mode of calculation, in this case, will be exhibited in a note in the last section of this book.

Nor is a security against contingencies.

It is not lawful to take a pledge as a security against contingencies;—in other words, if a person sell an article and receive the price, and the purchase, from an apprehension that the property might afterwards prove the right of another, and that he might thereby rendered liable to a loss, should on that account demand a pledge from the merchant securing him against such a circumstance, it is invalid; for it is an established maxim that a pledge is to be taken as a security for the discharge of a claim then extant; and in the above case the claim does not exist, but is only what may possibly happen. If, therefore, a pledge be in such a case taken, it is considered as taken in trust, and not in pawn, and is in no respect subject to the laws of pledges. In a similar manner, if a person deposit any thing in pledge with another, in security for any thing which may in future be due from him, it is invalid. It is, indeed, otherwise in the case of a commenced debt;—as where a person gives a pledge to another on the strength of his promising to lend him one thousand dollars, and the other takes the pledge and promises to lend the money, and the pledge remains in his hands; for in this case he is responsible in proportion to the sum promised, in the same manner as if it had been actually paid, the promise of debt being considered as an actual existence of it, for this reason, that it was made at the earnest desire of the borrower.

Case of pawns in bargains of Sillim or Sirf.

If a person, having bespoke goods of a merchant, pawn something in security for the payment of the purchase-money, or having sold silver to a banker, receive a pledge in security for the price, or if a merchant give a pledge to a person who has bespoke goods from him, as a security for his delivery of them,—the contract is valid. Ziffer has said that the contract, in these instances, is not valid, inasmuch as the object of the pawn in such cases is that it may be a security for the discharge of the several claims, namely, the purchase-money, of the goods bespoke, the value of the silver sold to the banker, or the goods bespoke,—which is not allowable, because an exchange is here induced of things not delivered for things of a different species; and an exchange of such things, previous to soisin being obtained of them is unlawful. The argument of our doctors is, that as a parity of species betwixt the things which were to be delivered, and the pledge, holds good with respect to their worth, by means of their being the engagement may be fulfilled;—and the possession of a pledge induces a responsibility in regard to its worth, although with respect to its substance it be considered merely as a trust.

If, also, the pledge opposed to the price of the article bespoke, or the value of the silver sold, be destroyed at the time of making the contract (that is, before the company in whose presence it was made breaks up), the bargain is accomplished, and the pawnee or seller is reckoned to have received his right; because by the destruction of the pawn he is virtually considered to have received the price of his silver, or the amount of money which was to have been advanced.—If, on the contrary, the buyer and seller should have separated previous to the destruction of the pledge, the bargain becomes invalid; because the receipt of the price of the silver or the advance of money for the goods at the time of making the bargain (which is a condition), is not here established either in reality or in the construction of law.—If, moreover, a pledge taken, in security for the delivery of the goods bespoke be destroyed, the bargain is completed, and the pawnee (who advanced the money) is held to have received the goods which he bespoke.

In the dissolution of a contract of Sillim, the pledge remains as a security for the advanced capital. In the parties to a contract of Sillim dissolve the bargain in a case where a pledge has been given for the delivery of the goods, it still remains as a security for the refunding of the money which had been advanced, as that then stands in lieu of the goods;—in the same manner as where goods are usurped, and the Kazeel having ordered their restoration, a pledge is given for that purpose, and afterwards the goods are destroyed,—in which case the pledge remains a security for the value of the goods.

And if it be lost in the advancee's hands his claim of restitution is annulled.—In the above instance, the pledge be lost after the parties had agreed to annul the bargain of Sillim, the bespoke article is in that case considered as delivered, and the purchaser (the advancee) has no further claim.—It is, however, incumbent on him to give to the seller as much grain as he should have received from him, in order to his recovering the money he had advanced,—in the same manner as where a person, having sold a slave and delivered him to the purchaser, takes a pledge in security for the price, —and they afterwards mutually consent to annul he bargain,—in which case the seller is entitled to retain possession of the pledge as a security for the restoration of the slave; and if the pledge be destroyed in his hands, he is considered to have received the purchase-money; and it is incumbent on him to pay the sum of the purchase-money to the buyer, and thereby recover his slave.

A freedman, a Madabbir, a Makatiib or an Am-Walid, or a recreant; he is not lawful to pawn either a freedman and Madabbir a Makatiib, or an Am-Walid; because the end of a contract of pawn is to establish the pawnee’s possession of the pledge, with a view to obtaining payment of his claim; a view which cannot be accomplished in any of the above-mentioned instances, as a freedman is not property, and the sale of the others is contrary to law.

Pledges cannot be taken to secure the appearance of a surety: or of a criminal liable to retaliation.—If a person agree to be bail for the appearance of another it is not allowable to demand a pledge from him on this account. In the same manner also, it is not lawful to take a pledge as a security for a criminal condemned to suffer retaliation either in life or limb, as in such case the right could not be obtained by means of the pledge. It is otherwise in the case of offenses by misadventure; for there the fine may be discharged by means of the pledge.

Or in security for a right of Shaffa.—It is not lawful to take a pledge opposed to a right of Shaffa:—in other words, if a person appeal to the Kazee (for instance), and claim his privilege of Shaffa, and obtain from him a decree to that effect, and demand of the purchaser a pledge for the house over which his privilege of Shaffa extends, the pawn is not valid; for the article is not insured in the hands of the purchaser: (that is to say, if the house suffer any damage in the possession of the purchaser, he is not responsible for it); and a pledge cannot be taken but for matters that induce responsibility.

Or for a criminal slave, or the debts of a slave.—It is not permitted to take a pledge opposed either to a slave guilty of a crime, or to the debt of a slave; because the master is not in either instance responsible, since, in the case of the death of the slave, he is not obliged to discharge his debts.

Or for the wages of a public singer or mourner.—It is not lawful to give a pledge for the wages either of a mourner* or of a singer. If, therefore, a pawn be given in such case, and be afterwards destroyed in the hands of the pawnee, he is not responsible for it, as the thing in security for which it was pledged is not a subject of responsibility.

A Musulman cannot give, or take wine in pawn: but if he receive wine from a Zimme, and it be destroyed, he is responsible. It is unlawful for a Musulman either to give or take wine in pawn, whether from a Musulman or a Zimme. Notwithstanding this, however— if the Zimme be the pawner and the Musulman the pawnee, and the wine be lost or spoiled, the Musulman is accountable for it, in the same manner as in the case of his having usurped it; whereas, if the Musulman were the pawner and the Zimme the pawnee: and the wine be lost in the hands of the latter, he would not owe any compensation to the Musulman, any more than a person who had usurped wine from a Musulman. It is otherwise where the pawner and pawnee are both Zimmee; for wine is property with them. Carriion, on the contrary, is not property with them any more than with Musulmans; and accordingly a pawn of carriion is not valid among them by more than with us.

A pawnee is still responsible for the pledge, although it appear that the debt to which it was opposed is not due.—If a person purchase vinegar, a slave, or a slaughtered goat, and having given a pledge for the purchase-money, afterwards discover the vinegar to be wine, the slave to be a freeman, or the goat to be carriion,* still the seller is responsible for the pawn in case of its being lost or destroyed; for it was deposited in opposition to a debt to all appearance due. The same rule also holds in a case where a person, having killed a freeman, or given a pledge for the payment of his value, afterwards discovers that he was a freeman. So, likewise, where the parties in a suit compromise the business for a part of the plaintiff's demand and the defendant deposits a pledge to answer the same, and they afterwards agree that nothing was owing from the defendant, the pledge is insured in the hands of the holder of it.

A father or guardian may pledge the slave of his infant ward for a debt owing by himself.—It is lawful for a father to pledge, in security of his own debt, the slave of his infant child; for a father has the privilege of depositing the goods of his infant child in trust; and to pledge them is still more conducive to the interest of the proprietor than to place them in trust, since if a pledge be lost it must be accounted for, whereas a trustee is not responsible for the deposit in his hands. A guardian also is the same as a father in this particular, because he who has civil authority vested in him is beneficial to the child. Abbo Youssif and Ziffer maintain that this is not lawful either to the father or guardian (and such is what analogy would suggest); for a pledge is, in effect, equivalent to a payment; and as a father is not privileged to pay off his debts with the goods of his child, it follows that he has no power of giving them in pledge. To this, however, it may be replied, that there is an obvious difference between the act of pledging and that of payment; for discharging the debts by means of the child's property is a destruction of his right without any equivalent; whereas, placing his property in pledge is providing it a guardian, for the interim, without in any degree affecting his right.

But they are accountable in case of loss.—As, therefore, the contract of pawn is valid in this instance, it follows that in case of the *Meaning, a person employed, on occasions of grief, in making lamentations. It is a custom amongst the Musulmans to employ such persons; although prohibited by the Law,—whence it is that they cannot legally sue for their hire.

*As having died a natural death.—The term carriion is applied to the flesh of all animals not slain according to the prescribed form.
pledge being destroyed in the pawnee's hands, he is considered to have received payment of his debt, and that the father or guardian are responsible to the infant, as having discharged their debt by means of his property.

And they may also authorize the pawnee to sell the slave.—It is like manner it is lawful for a father or guardian to order the pawnee to sell the pledge; for both of these have the privilege of selling the goods of their infant ward. The learned have said, that this is founded on the law in a case of sale; for where a father or guardian gives the goods of his ward to his own creditors, in payment of his debt, it is lawful; and a commutation being thus made of the debt for the price, the father or guardian, in the opinion of Haneefa and Moham med, become answerable to the ward for the value.—According to Aboo Yoosof, on the contrary, a commutation takes place; and the same difference of opinion obtains where an agent for sale disposes of the goods of his constituent to a person to whom he is indebted. The contract of pawn, however, is in these instances similar to that of sale with respect to its effects; for in both the object is to discharge the debts of the father or guardian with the goods of the infant, and to become answerable for them.

A father may retain the goods of his infant child in pledge for a debt owing from the infant to himself, or to another infant child, or to his own merchantile slave.—If a father pawn the goods of his infant child into his own hands for a debt due from the child, or into the hands of another of his children being an infant, or of his slave, being a merchant and not in debt, it is lawful; because a father, on account of the tender affection which he is naturally supposed to have for his child, is considered in a double capacity, and his bare inclination as equivalent to the assent of both parties; in the same manner as where a father sells the property of his infant child to himself.

But a guardian has not this privilege.—It is not lawful for a guardian to pledge into his own hands goods belonging to his ward on account of a debt due to him, or into the hands of his child being an infant, or into the hands of his slave being a merchant and free from debt nor is it permitted to him to give anything of his own in pawn into the hands of an orphan for a debt owing to the orphan from himself; for a guardian, being merely an agent, cannot of course have a double capacity in contracts. A guardian, moreover, is more deficient in tenderness than a father, and therefore cannot, like a father, stand in a double capacity in making contracts. Besides, a guardian pawning the property of his ward into the hands of his infant child, or his slave, being a merchant and free debt, is in effect the same as pawning it to himself.—It is otherwise where a guardian pawns the property of his ward to his adult son, to his father, or to his indebted slave, since over these he has no authority.

Yet he also may retain the goods in pawn for necessaries furnished by him.—If a guardian purchase victuals or apparel for the use of his ward, and, having debited him for the price, take in pawn part of his goods as a security for the debt, it is valid; for, as he is permitted to borrow for the use of the orphan, and as taking a pawn is like the discharge of a claim, it is of consequence legal. Besides, as it is lawful for a guardian to trade on account of his ward, it follows that it is also lawful for him to give and receive pawns, they being similar to receipts and payments.

A child cannot recover property which had been pawned by his deceased father, but by redeeming it.—If a father pawn the goods of his infant son, and the infant attain maturity, still he is not at liberty to annul the contract of pawn and take back the pledge until he shall have discharged the debt; for the contract is binding upon him; as the act of a father on behalf of his infant child is binding upon the child after he shall have attained maturity, a father being his infant child's substitute.

If he redeem it during the father's lifetime, he has a claim on him for what he pays.—If a father pawn the goods of his son on account of his own debt, and the son, by a discharge of the debt, redeem the same, he has a claim on the father for the sum; for it was necessary that the son should discharge the debt, having occasion to release his goods out of the hands of the pawnee;—in the same manner as holds with respect to the lender of a pledge; in other words, if a person lend any thing to another with a view to that other's pawnning it, it is lawful to him to redeem the article from the pawnee by a discharge of the borrower's debt, and then to prefer a claim of debt against the borrower; and so here likewise.

And the father is responsible in case of the pledge being lost.—In this case, the pawn be lost or destroyed before the son's release of it by discharging his father's debt, it is lawful for him to prefer a claim upon the father, as he has in effect discharged his debt by means of his (the son's) property.

It is lawful for a father to pawn the goods of his son for a debt jointly due by both. If, therefore, the pledge be destroyed, the father must compensate to the son by the payment of a sum equivalent to his [the father's] share of the debt; because he has paid off so much by means of the sons' property.—The same rule also holds with a grandfather, or a guardian, in case of the non-existence of the father.

Case of a guardian pawning the goods of his orphan ward, and then borrowing and losing the pledge.—If a guardian purchase victuals for an orphan, so as that the price is a debt upon the orphan, and pawn an article belonging to the orphan as a security for the debt, and the pawnee take possession of the same, and the guardian then borrow it from the pawnee for the use of the orphan, and it be destroyed in his (the guardian's) hands, it is no longer included in the contract of pawn, nor is any person responsible for it; for the act of the guardian in this instance is the same as that of the orphan when he has attained maturity, her having borrowed the article for his use,—in which case such is the rule. The debt of the orphan, in this case, still remains due; and the creditor is to receive payment from the guardian, who is reimbursed by the orphan; because the guardian, in borrowing the pledge, was not guilty of any transgression, as it was borrowed for the orphan's use. If, on the contrary, it have been borrowed on his own account, he is responsible for it to the orphan; because in borrowing it for his own use he is guilty of a transgression, as having usurped a privilege which does not belong to him. It, also, he were to usurp it from the pawnnee and apply it to his own use, he is responsible for the value, as having been guilty of a transgression,—with respect to the pawnnee, by the usurpation,—and with respect to the orphan, in having applied the article to his own use. He is, moreover, in this instance bound to discharge the debt of the pawnee, if the term stipulated should have expired. If, therefore, the value of the pawn be equivalent to the debt, he must discharge it in full, without any reimbursement from the property of the orphan; for the same that was before due from the orphan to him becomes now so from him to be orphaned, and hence a commutation takes place. If, on the other hand, the value of the pledge be short of the debt, he must discharge from his own property a sum equivalent to the pledge, and the residue from that of the orphan; for he is only liable for the amount of the value of the pledge. If, on the contrary, the value of the pledge exceed the debt, he must pay the amount of the debt to the pawnnee in discharge of his claim, and the remainder is the right of the orphan. If the stipulated term of payment should not have expired, the value of the pledge must be deposited in pawn with the pawnnee; for the guardian having destroyed one of the established rights of the pawnnee, the value of it therefore must be given in pledge into his hands; and upon the term if payment arriving, the same rules are to be observed as are above fully set forth. It is to be observed, however, that the guardian, in case of having extorted the pawn and applied it to the use of the orphan, becomes (if under these circumstances it should be destroyed) liable only to make restitution for violating the rights of the pawnnee, as if applying it to the use of the orphan he does not violate his right; neither is his taking it from the pawnnee any transgression with respect to the orphan, as a guardian is authorised to take the goods of his ward;—whence it is that Mohammed, in the Zeodat (under the head of Acknowledgements), has said, "Where a father or guardian acknowledge having usurped the goods of his infant ward, nothing is chargeable to them in case of loss or decay; because this is not an usurpation, they having an unlimited power to take the goods of their ward." In the above case, therefore, the guardian is answerable to the pawnee; and at the expiration of the stipulated term he must discharge his debt and charge it to the account of the orphan; for he has in no respect prejudiced him, but has on the contrary applied the pawn in his use. If, however, the term of payment be not arrived, the thing given in reparation must, until then, remain as a pledge in the hands of the pawnee, when he is to obtain payment of his debt, and the guardian to recover the amount from the orphan's property.

Money and all weighable and measurable articles may be pawned.—Rules to be observed in those instances.—It is lawful to pawn dirms, deenars, or any article of weight or measurement of capacity; for as a debt may be discharged by means of such articles, they are consequently fit to be pawned. If, therefore, any such articles be pawned, in security for an article of the same kind or species, and be lost in the pawnnee's hands, the debt becomes cleared in a degree, proportionate to the value of the pledge, if that he either equal to, or less than the amount of the debt. If, on the contrary, the value of the pledge exceed the amount of the debt, the whole of the debt is in that case held to be discharged, notwithstanding the one be base and the other pure; for where the pawn, and debt are of the same kind, the quality is not to be considered. This is the opinion of Haneef; for (according to him) the pawnnee in the above case is to receive payment of his debt by weight, and not by value.—The two disciples, on the contrary, hold that the pawnnee, on the loss of the pledge, becomes responsible for its value in something of a different species, which value he holds (as it were) in pawn in lieu of the original pledge.* The argument of Haneef is, that any regard to quality drops in the case of usurious property† when opposed to its own species.—A discharge in a pure article of this nature, moreover, in return for a base article, is lawful,—as where, for instance, a debtor, through inattention,

* Here follows a case in point, quoted from the Jama Saghier, with the author's remarks, and the difference of opinion among the Mussulman doctors concerning it, which is omitted by the translator. It interrupts the discussion of the point in question, and the arguments adduced have been before fully detailed under the head of Usury.

† Arab. Imwal Rabwee, meaning any sort of grain,—and also gold or silver; in short, everything with respect to which usury can be conceived possible.
repays a debt of base money in pure money.

Case of a silver vessel pawned, and afterwards lost.—If a silver vessel equiponderant to ten dirms be pawned for a debt of ten dirms, and afterwards lost in the hands of the pawnee, the whole amount of the debt stands discharged. The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this rule universally obtains notwithstanding the value of the vessel is either equal to, or greater than the weight of it; but that where the value, by being short of the weight, is short of the debt, there is a difference of opinion; for, according to Haneefa, the whole debt, in that case, stands discharged (he holding the pawnee to have received payment by the weight of the vessel); whereas the two disciples teach that the pawnee remains responsible for the value, which continues, with him (as it were) in pawn, his claim still existing as before.

Or broken.—If, on the contrary, the vessel be not lost, but broken, then, on the first supposition (that is, supposing the weight and value to be the same), according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf the pawner is not compelled to redeem it; for if he were to redeem it by paying the greatest part of his debt, and deducting some small part of it in consideration of the loss arising from the breakage, it would in that case appear that he considered the quality separately, and on this account paid only part of his debt, which is illegal; or if, on the other hand, he were to redeem it by paying the whole of his debt, and thus taking the broken vessel, it would be a loss to him. The pawner, therefore (according to the two Elders), is at his own option, either to redeem the broken vessel by paying the whole of his debt, or to relinquish it and compound with the pawnee for its value, which may either be of the same or of a different species from the vessel; and this value remaining (as it were) in pawn, the pawnee becomes proprietor of the vessel, because of his having thus made compensation for it. In the opinion of Mohammed, on the contrary, the pawner may either redeem the broken vessel by a payment of the whole of the debt, or he may give it to the pawnee as discharge of it, in the same manner as in the case of the loss of the pawn. Hence Mohammed conceives an analogy between a pawn damaged and a pawn lost, for this reason, that when a redemption cannot be made without a compensation, it is then the same as if the pawn were lost; and as, when the pawn is actually lost, the debt becomes (in the opinion of all our doctors) annulled, it is so likewise in the present instance, which is a case of loss in effect. Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf have said, that when a pawn is lost the pawnee is held to be paid in respect of the worth, in this manner, that he becomes immediately answerable for the value of the pawn to compensate for its loss, and that a commutation for the debt takes place. But when a debt is annulled for a pawn then extant, though somewhat damaged, on absolute appropriation of it takes place; that is to say, it must be so detained as to render the substance of it the property of the pawnee. This is, however, a mistaken determination, and is rejected in law: wherefore it is most proper that a substitute be made of the value. A pledge may be stipulated, in sale, for the price of the article sold.—If a person sell a slave on condition that the purchaser shall deliver to him in pawn some specified thing, it is lawful on a favourable construction, whereas analogy would suggest that it is unlawful. So also, it is lawful for a person to sell a slave, on condition that the purchaser give, as his security, a third person who is present at the conclusion of the bargain, and who consents to be security. The objection suggested by analogy, in this instance, is that the agreement entered into forms a double compact, or one compact within another, which is prohibited in the law. Besides, it contains a condition which is not conformable to the object of the agreement, and from which there results an advantage to the seller, who is a party in both the compacts; and such a condition renders a contract of sale void. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is that such a condition in the agreement is no way repugnant to the contract, since bail or pawn tend to ensure and strengthen the agreement, and are in strict conformity with the obligation of the price. If, therefore, the proposed surety be present at the conclusion of the agreement, or the pledge be specified, attention is paid to the condition of bail or pawn; for, as being proper to the agreement, they are consequently legal.

But the agreement is not valid unless the pledge be particularly specified.—If, on the other hand, the surety be not present, nor the pledge specified, the agreement is invalid; for the intention of pawn does not in that case exist, inasmuch as the pledge or surety is unknown; and as there remains only a nugatory condition, the agreement is therefore invalid. Still, however, if the proposed surety appear before the parties have separated, and acquiesce in the bail, the agreement then becomes valid. Nor can the purchaser be compelled to deliver it.—If the purchaser, after the pawn had been agreed upon, should refuse to deliver the pledge specified, the Kazee must not compel him thereto, as it is the delivery alone that determines the agreement. Ziffer has said, that when the condition of pawn is included in the sale, a fulfilment of it is absolutely necessary; and that therefore the Kasze may enforce it; for the condition having been stipulated as an article of the sale, becomes one of the rights thereof, and is equally binding, although it be not in itself of any force;—in the same manner as a power of agency included in a contract of pawn, which is binding because of the contract being so; in other words, if the pawner of a thing were to stipulate that the pawnnee shall undertake the sale of it, such agency would be binding;—whence it would not afterwards be in the power of the pawnner to retract it. In reply to this, however, it is to be observed, that the agreement of pawn is voluntary on the part of the pawnner; and there is no compulsion to the execution of a voluntary deed. The seller, however, may, at his discretion, either relinquish the agreement of pawn, or he may invalidate the sale;

* A long discussion which follows upon this subject is omitted by the translator, as containing merely a train of subtle and frivolous distinctions relative to usury, of no practical utility.

for as he had earnestly desired the detention of the pawn, and as it was on the strength of that condition only that he had agreed to the contract, it is evident, in default of it, obliged to adhere to his agreement, unless the buyer should in the mean time either have paid the price, or pawned, in place of the thing specified, the worth of it in dirms or deenars, in which case the sale becomes complete and binding, since, in the first instance, the seller obtains his object, and in the second he obtains the fulfilment of a condition with which he was satisfied, the pawn of the value being the same as that of the substance, for the end of the agreement is to obtain payment and that can only be obtained by means of the product of the pledge, namely, the value.

An article tendered by a purchaser in security for the price of the merchandise is considered as a pledge, although the term pawn be not expressly mentioned by him.—
If a person purchase anything for a particular sum, and request of the seller "to keep his robe until such time as he pays him the purchase-money," the robe is considered as a pledge; for the buyer, in saying that the seller should detain the robe until he render him the purchase money, spoke in a manner which implied an intention of pawn, although he did not expressly mention the word pawn; and in every agreement regard is to be had to the spirit, not to the letter. Ziffer maintains that, in this case, the robe is not pawned, in which opinion Aboo Yoosaf likewise concurs; and the reason they allege is, that the expression used by the buyer does not only imply an intention to pawn, but may likewise signify a deposit, which construction, as being the most favourable, ought to be adopted.—It is otherwise where a person expresses himself, "keep, this robe in security of your debt (or goods)," for then, in mentioning the security, it becomes obvious that his object was to pawn it.—In answer to this, however, it is to be observed, that in either case his intention was to pawn he robe; for although the expression, "keep his robe," may admit of the interpretation either of pawn or deposit, yet when the speaker subjoins, "until such time as I pay you the purchase-money," it is no longer doubtful that he means to pawn, and not to deposit it.

Section.

Where two (or more) articles are opposed in pledge to one debt, they cannot be redeemed separately.—If a person pawn two slaves for a debt of one thousand dirms, and afterwards pay the proportion of one of these slaves, still he is not permitted to take back that slave until such time as he render to the pawnner the residue of the debt. (By the proportion of the slaves is to be understood the particular sum for which each is pawned, when they are both opposed to the amount of the debt.) The argument in suppport of this determination is, that as a pawn is detained in behalf of the whole debt, it is therefore detained in behalf of every part of it, in order the more strongly to bind the pawnner to the payment of his debt; in the same manner as hold with respect to an article sold, where, if the seller, having paid part of the purchase-money, be desirous of Taking in lieu thereof a proportionate part of the article, it is not allowed: on the contrary, he must wait until the payment of the whole price be made, when he may take the whole of the goods purchased.

Notwithstanding each article be opposed to a particular part of the debt,—this same rule also holds, according to the Mabsoot, when the depositor previously specifies the particular value of each of the component parts of his pledge; as, for instance, when a person, having pledged two slaves against a debt of one thousand dirms, declares the value of each to be five hundred dirms. It is related in the Zeeadat, on the contrary, that in this case the pawnner is permitted to take back the slave upon paying to the pawnner the sum which he had before specified to be his value. The argument of the Mabsoot is that, in the case in question, there is only one agreement; and that no separation takes place in it on account of the distinct specification;—in the same manner as in sale; in other words, if a person sell two slaves for one thousand dirms, and particularly mention the price of each to be five hundred dirms, still there are not two distinct bargains; and so likewise in the present instance. The argument of the Zeeadat is that in the above case there subsists two agreements; and that it is unnecessary to consider them as one; for, if they be considered as two, it amounts merely to this, that it would follow that the one is a condition of the other, a condition which does not invalidate the agreement, but rather the condition itself is invalid (whence it is that if the pawnner acquiesce in the agreement respecting only one of the two slaves, it is lawful). It is otherwise in the case of sale; for if there be two contracts of sale, it leads to this, that the one is a condition of the other; a conclusion which would invalidate the sale altogether.

An article pawned to two persons (in security of a debt jointly owing to both) is pledged in toto to each.—If a person pawn any specified article into the hands of two people, in security of a debt which he jointly owes to both it is lawful; and in this case the articles is held to be completely pledged into the hands of each of the creditors; because the spirit of the agreement is, that the article is held entirely in one pledge:—nor does it hence follow that the pledge is undefined, because of the separateness of rights; for each has a claim to the whole, the object of the agreement being a detention in security of debt; and as that is a thing incapable of severalty, the pawn is therefore detained wholly in security of the debt of each. It is otherwise where a person bestows anything in gift to two people; for this is not lawful, according to Hanefa, as the object of a gift is an endowment with right of property, and two men cannot lawfully have each a complete possession of one thing, since this would induce the consequences of a moiety being appropriated to each indefinitely, which in gifts is not admissible. And if they agree to hold it alternately, each is in his turn trustee on behalf of the other. If, in this case, the parties agree to a Mahayat, or alternate possession of the pledge, each is, during his term of possession, a trustee on behalf of the other; and if it be destroyed, each is responsible according to his respective share,—for upon this happening each is held to have received a discharge of his claim, a discharge being capable of partition. If, also, the pawnee pays off the debt of either, the article in that case remains wholly in pledge with the other, since it was before completely so in the hands of each without any separation. Analogous to this is the detention of things which have been sold to two or more jointly; for one of the buyers, after paying his proportion of the price, is not entitled to take from the merchant his share of the goods purchased; on the contrary, the merchant may detain the whole until such time as he shall have received the remaining part of the price from the other purchaser.

If two people, by one agreement, pawn a certain thing into the hands of one person in security of a debt which they jointly owe to him, it is lawful, and the thing so pledged is detained in security of the whole of the debt. The pawnee is, moreover, at liberty to detain the pledge until he receive a complete discharge; for the two having pawned the article together, the pawnee is therefore held to have received a complete and undivided seizin of it.

If two persons, respectively, claim an article from a third, in virtue of an alleged pawn, and both produce evidence, the claim of both is null. If two persons prefer a claim to a slave in the possession of a third, each separately asserting "that the possessor had formerly completely pawned the slave into his hands, and had afterwards borrowed or usurped him," and each produce an evidence in support of his declaration, the claims and evidences are null and inadmissible; for each of the claimants having maintained and supported by evidence that the possessor had pawned the slave completely into his hands alone, it is not, therefore, in the power of the Kazee to decree him either, as it is impossible that the same slave should be pawned wholly into the hands of one person, and at the same time wholly into the hands of another:—neither could he decree wholly the substance of the pawn to any one of them; since he has no reason to prefer one to the other; nor could he decree each of them an half, as a pawn is indivisible. As, therefore, it is impossible, to decide according to the evidences of either they are both set aside.

Objection.—It would appear that the Kazee ought to decree the slave to be the pledge of both, since they have both, as it were, received him at the same time, the period when he was pledged not being ascertained.

Reply.—The Kazee has no power to pass a decree of that nature, as he would thereby depart from the evidence adduced by the parties, each having expressly declared, that the slave was wholly pawned into his hands towards obtaining a satisfaction for the whole of his particular claim. If, on the other hand, he were to decree an half to each, he would act in opposition to the evidence, which a Kazee is not at liberty to do.

If a pawnor die, leaving an article in pledge with two pawnses, it is sold for the discharge of their claims. If a pawnor die, leaving a pledged slave (for instance) in the hands of two pawnses, and each of them produce evidence to prove that the slave had been pledged wholly to him, a moiety of the slave is in that case awarded in pledge to each, and may respectively be sold by them in satisfaction of their claims, upon a favourable construction; and such is the opinion of Hanefa and Mohammad. Analogy would suggest that the pawn is in this instance null (and such is the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf); for as the intention of a contract of a pawn is that the pledge shall be detained towards obtaining payment of a claim, it follows that the decree of the Kazee, awarding a moiety of the slave to each, proves the pawn to have been indefinitely held in severalty, which is unlawful now, in the same manner as in the lifetime of the pawnor. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction of the law in this particular is, that the object is not the mere contract itself, but its utility. Now the utility of the agreement in the lifetime of the pawnor consisted in a detention of the pledge, which cannot be accomplished in the case of an indefinite severalty of claim; but the utility of it after his death is, that the pawnee may sell it in order to discharge his debt, which a severalty of claims does not prevent, the case being the same as where two men contend that they are married to the same woman,—or where two sisters contend that they are married to the same man, and evidences are produced to prove it by both;—for in this case the evidence adduced is disregarded during the lifetime of the man; but after his death a decree is passed assigning them their respective shares of inheritance, as that is capable of division.

CHAPTER III

OF PLEDGES PLACED IN THE HANDS OF A TRUSTEE

The parties may, by agreement, entrust the pledge to the custody of any upright person. —If the pawnor and pawnee agree to place the pledge in the hands of any upright person (to act as trustee for both), it is lawful. Malik is of opinion that this is not lawful; because the seisin of the trustee is the same as that of the pawnee (whence it is that the trustee has recourse to him for indemnification where the pawn is lost in his possession, and another, having proved a right to it, takes a compensation from him for its loss); and such being the case, no account is made of the seisin of the pawnee; wherefore the contract of pawn is incomplete, because of the failure of one of its conditions, namely, the seisin of the pawnee. The argument of our doctors is that the seisin of the trustee is apparently the same as that of the pawnee, with respect to preservation (the substance of the pawn being a trust), and with respect to worth it is the same as that of the pawnee, as it subjects him to responsibility in case of its loss, a pawn being insured with regard to its worth; wherefore the trustee stands in the place of two parties, the pawnor and the pawnee, to strengthen the object of both, namely, the contract of pawn. (With respect to the trustee’s right of having recourse to the pawnor, in case of the loss, and so forth, as mentioned above, it is admitted solely in consideration of his being the pawner’s deputy for the conservation of the substance of the pledge, in the manner of any ordinary trustee.)

After which neither of them is at liberty to take it out of the trustee’s hands.—The pawnee is not at liberty to take the pledge from the trustee, insomuch as the right of the pawner is still connected with it, in this way, that the pledge is a deposit in the trustee’s hands. Neither is the pawnor at liberty to take it, because of the pawnee’s right being connected with it for the purpose of obtaining payment of his debt. Neither party, therefore, is at liberty to invalidate the right of the other.

But the pawnee is responsible in case of loss.—If the pledge be destroyed in the possession of the trustee, the pawnee is responsible; for the seisin of the trustee is the same as that of the pawnee in regard to the worth of the pledge; and responsibility attaches only on account of worth.

Unless the trustee have transgressed, in which case he is responsible.—If, on the contrary, the trustee deliver the pawn either to the pawnor or pawnee, he is responsible; for this reason, that he is the pawner’s trustee with respect to the substance of the pledge and the pawnee’s trustee with respect to its worth; and each of these parties stands as a stranger towards the other; and a trustee is rendered responsible by delivering the object of his trust into the hands of a stranger. The trustee, therefore, being in this case responsible, cannot retain the value by way of the pawn in his own possession; for as he has become indebted for the value, it follows that, if he were to retain it by way of the pawn, he becomes at once the claimant and claimer, and the payer and receiver; in which is implied an obvious inconsistency.

Rules to be observed in this instance.—The pawnor and pawnee must therefore, in this case, concur to take the value from the trustee, and deliver again to him, or to any other person, in place of the original pawn. If, however, they should not concur in so doing, either of them may in that case refer the matter to the Kazeer, who may take the value from the trustee, and again deliver it to him, or to any other, in the place of the original pawn. If the Kazeer do so, and the pawnor afterwards discharge his debt, then, supposing that the responsibility for the value had attached to the trustee in consequence of his having restored the pledge to the pawnee, the value in question remains secure to the trustee, as the pawnor here appears to have recovered his pledge, and the pawnee his debt. If, on the contrary, the responsibility had attached to the trustee in consequence of his having surrendered the pledge to the pawnee, the pawnor, upon discharging the debt, is entitled to take from him the value in question; for as, in case of the existence of the pawn, he would immediately on payment of the debt resume it, he is by consequence at liberty to take the substitute. It is to be observed, in this case, that if the trustee have given the pledge to the pawnee in loan or trust, and it have been destroyed without any transgression on his part, he (the trustee) is not entitled to take the value from him (the pawnee);—whereas, if the pawnee have occasioned the loss, he is so entitled; for as the property of the thing has before vested in him in virtue of his having committed it for its loss, it was of course his own property that he lent; and the borrower is therefore liable for its loss when occasioned by himself, but not otherwise. If, also, the trustee give the pledge to the pawnee, “in order that he may preserve it himself as a security for, his debt,” and it be afterwards destroyed,

he is entitled to take the value from the pawnee, whether he (the pawnee) were the occasion of its loss or not; for it was not given to him in the nature of trust or loan, but on terms which implied a liability to make compensation.

The pawner may commission the pawnee, or any other person, to sell the pledge, and discharge the debt; but he cannot reverse the commission, if it be included in the contract. —If the pawner constitute the pawnee, or an other person of character, an agent for the sale of the pledge, towards effecting a discharge of his debt at the expiration of the stipulated term, such agency is valid; because here the pawner has merely created an agent for the sale of his own property. If, also, such agency be expressed as an article in the contract of pawn, the pawner has not afterwards the power of reversing it; because where the agency is thus stipulated, it is one of the rights of the contract, and is therefore binding; in consequence of the contract being so; and also, because an agent of the pawnee is connected with it, the annulment of it would be a destruction of his right; —the case here being similar to that of an agent for a defendant, who has been so created at the instance of the plaintiff; for such agent cannot be dismissed from his employ but in the presence of the plaintiff.

Rules with respect to an agent appointed to sell a pledge. —If the pawner constitute any person his agent to sell the pledge, without restricting him to ready money or credit, so as to leave him entirely at his own option in those points, and afterwards prohibit him from selling it on credit, such prohibition is of no effect; for the agency (as was before mentioned) being at first absolute, is not afterwards subject to the restriction of the pawner. In the same manner, the agent cannot be dismissed by the pawnee, as on him it is no way dependent, having been created agent by the pawner. If, also, the pawner die, the agency nevertheless continues in force; for as the contract of pawn becomes not void upon the death of the pawner, so neither does the agency, that being expressly included therein. Besides, if the contract were by this event rendered void, it would be so only with respect to the rights of the heirs of the pawner, to which the rights of the pawnee are superior. The agent, moreover, is empowered to sell the pawn without the consent of the heirs, in the same manner as he would have done in the lifetime of the pawner without his consent. —So likewise, if the pawnee should die the agency does not determine; for a contract of pawn is not rendered void, either by the death of the person or of one but continues, and before, with all its rights and privileges; such as possession, discharge, and the agency in question. The power of agency, however, ceases on the death of the agent; and his heir or executor cannot stand in his place; because agency is not an inheritance, the constituent being supposed to have confided in his agent alone, and not in any other person. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that the agent's executor may sell the pledge; for as the agency is binding, the executor has a power of selling it; —in the same manner as where a Mozarib, after having exchanged the capital stock for any species of merchandise, dies,—in which case his executor is permitted to dispose of the merchandise, the compact being still binding. To this, however, it may be replied, that agency is the right of a principal over his factor; and the heirs of an agent can inherit only his own rights. It is otherwise with respect to Mozarib, as the rights of that appertain to the Mozarib, or manager.

The pawnee cannot sell it without the pawner's consent. —A pawnee has not a power of selling the pledge without the consent of the pawner, as the property of it hangs absolutely to him. Neither can the pawner sell it without the consent of the pawnee; for, as the thing pledged is, with respect to its worth, the right of the pawnee, it follows that the pawner, if he were to sell it without the concurrence of the pawnee, would not have it in his power to surrender it to the purchaser.

The agent at the expiration of the term of credit, may be compelled to sell the pledge. —If, at the expiration of the stipulated term of credit, the agent refuse to sell the pledge deposited for that purpose with him, and the pawner have absconded, the Kazzee must compel him to execute the sale, by imprisonment, or other compulsory means, the agency being binding for two reasons; —First, because, when expressly included in the contract of pawn, it becomes one of the rights thereof; and, Secondly, because the right of the pawnee is connected with it; and the discharge of the agency annihilates that right. The same rules, in short hold in this instance, as in the case of an agent for the adjustment of a cause of dispute created by the defendant at the instance of the plaintiff; for if the defendant abscond, and the agent refuse to settle the cause, he is compelable thereunto by the Kazzee, for the second reason above-mentioned, that the right of the plaintiff would else be destroyed. (It is otherwise with respect to a mere agent for sale; for if he refuse to execute the sale, he cannot be compelled thereto; as his constituent may still sell the article, whence his right is not destroyed.) What is here advanced proceeds on the supposition of the agency being included in the contract of pawn; for if it have not been stipulated until after the execution of the contract, there is in that case a different opinion; some asserting that the agent cannot be compelled to execute the sale, whilst others maintain that he may be compelled. Of these the compiler of the Hodiya remarks that the last is the better opinion. Aboo Yoosaf has said that the agency is equally binding in both cases (that is, when included in the contract, and also when made posterior thereto). And the Jama Saleer and Mabsot tend greatly to corroborate this opinion for in treating of this species of agency they have supposed it absolute, and not discriminated between that included in the contract of pawn and that agreed upon posterior thereto.

If the pledge be sold by commission from the trustee, the purchase-money is substituted in place of it. When the agent of a trustee in whose hands a pledge has been deposited sells it, it is no longer in pawn, and the purchase-money stands in its place (that is to say, as it were, in pawn), although the agent may not yet have received it, as being the substitute for a thing which was before in his possession. Hence, if the purchase-money should be lost, by the purchaser (for instance) dying insolvent without having discharged it, the loss falls upon the pawnee; because the contract of pawn still continues in force with respect to the purchase-money, that is, until in the place of the thing sold, namely, the pledge. In the same manner, where a pawned slave is slain, and the murderer accounts for his value, the contract still continues in force, as the owner of the slave is entitled to the value in virtue of his property, notwithstanding such value be paid in atonement for blood. The same rule also holds where a slave, having killed another pawned slave, is commuted for the one so killed.—the murderer being in that case substituted for the murdered.

If the trustee, having sold the pledge and paid off the pawnee, be exposed to any subsequent loss, he may reimburse himself from either party. If a trustee, having been appointed agent for the sale of the pledge, should sell it, and deliver the price to the pawnee by way of payment, and another afterwards prove a property in the pledge, and he accordingly pay that other a compensation for its value, it then remains in his option, either to take the value from the pawner, or the amount of the purchase-money from the pawnee: but he is not permitted to take more from the pawnee than the purchase-money. The compiler of the Fazua remarks that this case may occur under two different circumstances or predicaments:—I, where the pledge is destroyed after the sale; and II, where it remains whole and complete.—In the former of other, the owner of the pledge is at liberty there to take a compensation for the value from the pawner, who is an usurper of his right, or form the trustee, who has invaded it, in having sold his property and delivered it to another. Should he, therefore, take it from the pawner, the sale of the trustee becomes valid, as does also the pawner's seisin on the price in satisfaction for his debt; because, as the pawner, by making compensation, becomes proprietor of the pledge and effects the usurpation, it then appears that he had authorized the trustee to sell that which was his own.—If, on the contrary, he take the compensation from the trustee, he (the trustee) may, if he choose, have recourse to the pawner; that is to say he may take from him the value of the pledge; for, as being his agent, and the manager of his affairs, he is consequently entitled to an indemnification for whatever loss he may have unavoidably sustained in the execution of his commission. And in this case, also, the sale of the pledge is valid, as well as the pawner's seisin of the purchase-money in satisfaction for his debt,—whencesoever, in this case, he (the pawnee) cannot urge any future claim against the pawner on the score of his debt.—Or, if the trustee choose, he may have recourse to the pawnee; that is to say, he may resume from him the purchase-money which he had unjustly received from him; unjustly, because it proved in the end to be the trustee's property, by his having afterwards made good the loss to the proprietor. For when he gave it to the pawnee, he supposed it to have been the property of the pawner; because he might, perhaps, when it proves his own property, be inclined to confirm the transfer, and he is therefore allowed to resume it. As, however, the resumption of the purchase-money from the pawnee deprives him of a discharge of his claim, which the seisin of it was intended to effect, he therefore remains at liberty to demand payment from the pawner in this instance. In the latter of the above circumstances, on the contrary (where the pledge remains whole and complete after the sale), it is incumbent on the owner of the pledge to resume it from the purchaser, as he possesses the substance of his property; and the purchaser is entitled to a restitution of the purchase-money from the trustee, because of his being the seller; after which the trustee may, at his option, receive an indemnification either from the pawner or pawnee, from the former, because he occasioned him to enter into the agreement, from which he is consequently bound to release him, and from the latter, because, when the thing sold was proved to belong to another, the money obtained in lieu thereof is no longer formed purchase-money, and the pawnee having received it only as such a seisin is no longer of effect. If, therefore, he take the value from the pawner, the pawnee's seisin of the price is rendered valid:—whereas, if he resume the purchase-money from the pawnee, his seisin being thereby destroyed, his former right (namely, the claim against the pawnee) exists as before.

But if he was commissioned by the pawner after the contract, he must recur to him alone for indemnification. Azt is also here advanced precedent on the assumption of the purchase-money having been included as an article of the contract of pawn; for if the pawner appoint the trustee his agent for the sale of the pledge after the contract, he (the agent) is in this case to indemnify himself for any loss he may sustain, in consequence of selling the pledge from the pawner, not from the pawnee, notwithstanding he may have made over to the pawnee the price he had received for the pledge, since with this agency the pawnee has no concern, insomuch that the pawner may remind the agency without consulting him.

A stranger proving his right in a pledged slave, who had died with the pawnee, may seek his compensation from either party. — If a pledged slave die in the possession of the pawnee, and it be afterwards discovered that he was the property of another, and not the pawner, it remains with the proprietor to demand a compensation from either the pawner or pawnee; for both are violators of his right,—the one in having delivered the pledge to another, and the other in having received it. If, therefore, he take a compensation from the pawner, the pawner, because of the slave having died in his possession, is held to have received payment of his debt; for as the pawner has obtained a property in the slave by indemnifying his owner, the payment of his debt is therefore effected by the slave dying in the pawnee’s hands. If, on the contrary, he take a compensation from the pawnee, he (the pawnee) is not only entitled to an indemnificatory satisfaction from the pawner, but his claim upon him still exists as before: — he is entitled to an indemnification from the pawner, because of his having received him; and his claim of debt exists as formerly, because the discharge effected by the pledge having died in his possession ceases to be of force upon his making good the value, whence his right reverts.

Objection (by the Kazee Aboo Khazim).—It would appear that in this case the pawnee’s claim does not exist as before, but that the death of the slave in his hands establishes a satisfaction for it; because, upon the pawner compensating for the slave’s value (by the pawnee recovering such value from him as above), he becomes, in virtue of such compensation, proprietor of the slave, whence it appears that he, in fact, pledged that which was his own, and that the case is the same as if the proprietor had taken the compensation, from the pawner, which yd exempt him from all further obligation to the pawnee.

Reply.—As the pawnee first pays the compensation, he first becomes proprietor of the slave from the time of possession; and when, afterwards, he retakes that sum from the pawner, his property in the slave is annulled, and the pawner becomes proprietor of him. The pawner’s property in the slave therefore, takes place in this instance, posterior to the contract of pawn (the pawnee having, as it were, sold the slave to the pawner, and received the price for him); — and this debt to the pawnee remains against him as before,—whence the pawnee is entitled to take it from him. It is otherwise in the former alternative (where the owner takes the compensation from the pawner); for in this case the pawner becomes proprietor from the time of the slave being in his possession (which was prior to the contract of pawn), whence it may be said that he merely pawned what was his own; — and upon the death of the slave, no claim to the pawn exists in the pawnee’s hands; he stands acquitted of his debt, which the pawnee, therefore, cannot afterwards claim from him.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE POWER OVER PAWNS; AND OF OFFENCES COMMITTED BY OR UPON THEM.

A pledge cannot be sold without the pawnee’s consent. — If the pawner sell the pledge without the consent of the pawnee, the sale remains suspended upon his will because of his right being involved in the pledge notwithstanding such sale be an act of the pawner with respect to what is his own property; in the same manner as when a person bequests the whole of his state, in which case legacy is suspended in its effect, with respect to the excess, above one-third, upon the consent of his heirs—because of their right being connected therewith. If, therefore, the pawnee assent to the sale, it is valid; for it was before suspended only on account of his right, which he here consents to forego: and it is also valid if the pawner discharge his debt; for the sale is an act of the proprietor upon his property, being suspended in its effect only because of an obstacle, * which obstacle is here removed. — In the former case, upon the pawnee having given his consent, and the sale having been thereby rendered valid, the right of the pawnee is transferred from the pledge to the thing given in exchange, namely, the price,—which, in the case here considered, then becomes a substitute for the original pledge. This is approved; because the right of the pawnee is connected with the worth of the pledge; and the return is in effect the same as the consideration: — this being analogous to where an indebted slave is sold by the consent of his creditors in which case their right is transferred from the slave to the value received for him, as they are supposed, in asenting to the sale, to have agreed to the transfer of their right from the slave to the value, but not to the total abolition of it. If the pawner refuse his assent, and annul the contract of sale, it is null of course (according to one tradition), where, if the pawner redeem the pledge, still the purchaser is not at liberty to take

* Namely, the pawnee’s right connected with the pledge.
† By the discharge of the debt, which of course disengages the pledge from any claim the pawnee might otherwise have upon it.
it; for as the right of the pawnee is equivalent to his actual property, he therefore stands the same as the proprietor of the pledge (whence his power according to, or annulling the contract of sale). According, however, to a more authentic tradition, the pawnee has not the power of annulling the sale; for his right can sustain no detriment, as the sale cannot, at all events, be carried into execution until he assent to it. The execution of the sale, therefore, being in this manner suspended, the purchaser has the option of waiting until the pawner may redeem the pawn, and resign it to him conformable to the contract, or of carrying the matter before the Kazee; for the seller has it not in his power to deliver the goods, and the power of dissolving the contract rests with the Kazee alone; this being similar to where a slave, having been sold by his master, eludes the right of the purchaser; has received possession of him, in which case the purchaser may either wait until the slave return, or he may prefer a complaint to the Kazee, in order (as the seller is incapable of delivering the goods) to obtain an annulment of the contract.

Who, if the pawner sell it more than once, may ratify either sale.—If the pawner sell the pledge without the consent of the pawnee, and again, before the pawnee has signified his assent, sell it to another person, in that case whichever of these two contracts the pawnee may confirm is valid; for as the first sale is dependent on the consent of the pawnee, it cannot prevent the second from being so likewise. If, therefore, the pawnee chooses, he may ratify the second sole. If, on the contrary, the pawner, after having first sold the pawn as above, should let, give, or pawn it to another person, and the pawnee give his consent to such lease, gift, or pawn, the sale which preceded either of these deeds is valid. The difference between these two cases is, that in the first (where one sale is made after another), the pawnee may derive an advantage from confirming either of them (as his right lies in the price and whichever, therefore, he approves is valid. In the case of a lease or gift, on the contrary, no advantage can accrue to the pawnee, as his right lies in the return for the article, not in the usufruct. If, therefore, the pawnee approve of either of these, he by consequence impliedly assents to the abolition of his own right; and the previous sale (which was suspended on his consent only because of his right) becomes valid of course.

A pawned slave may be emancipated by the pawner.—It is permitted to a pawner to emancipate the slave whom he has deposited in pawn; for as he is sane and adult, he may of course render free his own property which the pawn indisputably is. As, moreover, the contract of pawn does not induce any destruction of the pawner's property in the pledge, his act with respect to it is not rendered void by the pawnee withholding his consent to it, notwithstanding the pawnee's right (of detention in regard to the worth) be thereby defeated,—in the same manner as where the purchaser of a slave emancipates him without having taken possession; in which case the slave is free, notwithstanding the seller's right (of detention of the article in satisfaction for the price) be thereby rendered null.

Objection.—If a person bequeath a slave to another upon his deathbed, and leave no other effects except that slave, and the heirs of the testator afterwards emancipates the slave, such manumission is not valid, because of the slave's legalities and bonds; it would follow that a pawned slave cannot be emancipated, because of the right of the pawnee.

Reply.—The manumission of the slave by the heirs of the testator is not (in the opinion of Haneefa) void, but is merely suspended until such time as he (the slave) shall have performed emancipatory labour. The sale, moreover, or gift of a pawn is null, for this reason, that the pawner is unable to surrender it to the purchaser or in case,—an objection which does not obtain in the case of manumission, since in this instance a delivery is not required. The manumission is therefore valid, and takes immediate effect,—whence the contract of pawn is null, as the subject of it no longer remains.

Who, if he be rich, must substitute the value in pawn for the slave.—Consequently, if the pawner be rich and the debt to the pawnee be then due, he (the pawnee) may require payment of it immediately;—or, if it be not due until after the expiration of a term, he may take from him, over and above the value of the slave, and return it as a substitute until his debt become payable, when he may take it in satisfaction of his right, restoring any surplus which may remain from it to the pawner.

But if he be poor, the slave must perform emancipatory labour to the amount of his value for the discharge of the pawnee's claim. This is supposing the pawner to be rich for, if he be poor, the slave in (question must perform emancipatory labour to an amount adequate to his value; and with this (which, if it be of a different species from the debt, must first be converted into the same) the debt of the pawnee is to be discharged; for a discharge from the pawner being here impossible, it is consequently made from him who enjoys the advantage of the manumission, namely, the slave. The slave however, when his emancipator afterwards becomes rich, is entitled to take from him the sum he earned; because he has, in fact paid his debt, not voluntarily or gratuitously, but in conformity with the ordinance of the law in this particular.

Although he should have denied his being in pawn previous to such emancipation.—If a person make a declaration of having pawned his slave, by saying to him, "I have deposited you in pledge with such a person," and the slave deny it, and the master afterwards emancipate him, at a time when he is poor, it is incumbent upon the slave to perform emancipatory labour, according to our doctors. Ziffer is of a contrary opinion; for he holds this case to be analogous to where a master first liberates his slave, and then declares his having pawned him; in which case, if the master be poor, and the slave deny it (as above), emancipatory labour is not incumbent on the slave; and so here, likewise. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that, in the case in question, the master declare the pawn at a time when he is undoubtedly competent to it, as he still possesses a property in the slave, not having yet emancipated him; and consequently his declaration is valid. —It is otherwise where the declaration of pawn is made subsequently to the emancipation, as the master's power of pawnage is then terminated;—whence there is no analogy between the cases.

A pawner may create his pawned slave a Modabbir or Am-Walid.—If a pawner create the slave whom he has pawned a Modabbir, it is valid, according to all authorities;—according to our doctors, because, as the complete emancipation would be lawful, it follows that this qualified emancipation is lawful, a fortiori; and according to Shafei, because the granting Tadbeer to a slave does not (as he holds) prevent the sale of him. In a similar manner, it is in the power of a pawner to constitute his pawned female slave an Am-Walid; for as a father has this privilege with respect to the female slave of his child, because of the right which he has in his property, notwithstanding such right be inferior to that of the child himself, it follows that the enjoyment of the same privilege by a pawner, in virtue of his right in the pledge, is valid a fortiori. The right of the pawner being superior to that of any other person, as he is the proprietor.

And if he be rich, he must substitute the value in pawn; but if he be poor, the slave must perform emancipatory labour to the full amount of the debt.—When, therefore, a pawned slave is constituted either Modabbir or Am-Walid, such slave is excluded from the contract of pawn, as the intention is defeated, since a debt cannot be discharged by means of a Modabbir or Am-

Walid;—whence if the pawner be rich, he is responsible for the value, after the manner before shown in the case of pawned slaves emancipated; but if, on the contrary, he be in indigent circumstances, the pawner may require from the Modabbir or Am-Walid emancipatory labour to the amount of the debt, as the fruit of their labour is the property of their master. It is otherwise in the case of a pledged slave emancipated by an indigent pawner; for the fruits of his labour being his own property, he is obliged to labour to the amount of his value only, or that of the debt of the pawner, in case of its being less than his value.

The pawner, on becoming rich, is responsible for the emancipatory labour in the former instance, but not in the latter.—It is not permitted either to a Modabbir or Am-Walid to resume from their master when he becomes rich what they paid on his account when poor, because they in fact paid this from his property; † but when a poor pawner emancipates the slave whom he had pledged, he [the slave] is entitled to take what he may have paid on account of his emancipator; because he has paid it from his own property, †—and this from necessity, in conformity with the precepts of the law (as before observed), whence such payment cannot be considered as gratuitous. Some have said, that if the debt be not due at the time, the Modabbir or Am-Walid are compelled to earn its value; which, as being a substitute for the pawn, must be detained as such in lieu of the original: but that if, on the contrary, the debt be then due, it is in that case necessary to discharge it from the stock of the pawner; and as the earnings of the Modabbir or Am-Walid are considered as the property of the master, they must therefore labour towards obtaining a sum adequate to the whole of the debt.

An emancipated Modabbir does not owe the pawnage labour beyond his value.—If a pawner emancipates the slave whom he had created a Modabbir, as above, it is not then incumbent on the freedom to earn, a greater sum than his value, although he should be thereunto commanded by the Kazee; for after emancipation, the fruits of his labour are his own property. Still, however, he cannot recover from his master what he had paid on his account prior to his freedom; as that was, in fact, the property of the master.

¶ A person is not entitled to recover, who pays the debts of another in a gratuitous manner.
the same rules hold as are established in the case of emancipating the pledge.

By a stranger.—If a stranger (that is, a person unconcerned in the contract) destroy the pledge, the pawnee (not the pawnor) is litigant against him, and may take from him a compensation for the value, which he must retain in pawn in place of the original pledge; for the pawnee, as being the most entitled to the substance of the pledge, is also most entitled to its substance, namely, the value. It is here to be observed, that the stranger must compensate for the pledge according to the value which it bore at the time of its being destroyed. If, therefore, it be valued at five hundred dirms at the period of its destruction, and at one thousand dirms on the date of the contract, the stranger must account for five hundred dirms to the pawnee, who must retain the same in pawn;—and five hundred dirms are remitted from the debt; for the deficiency to the amount is a destruction which has occurred in the hands of the pawnee, occasioned (as it were) by the visitation of heaven; and as the property has thus perished in his hands, a proportionable amount is therefore deducted from his claim.

Or by the pawnor.—If the pawnor destroy the pledge before the expiration of the stipulated term of payment, he is responsible for the value, because of his having destroyed the property of another;—and this value he is to retain in pawn until the term of payment arrive; for as it is a substitute for the substance of the pledge, it is consequently subject to the same rule. As soon, therefore, as the debt becomes due, the pawnee may take it from the value and if When a balance remain, it must be restored to the pawnor, as being a return for his property, with which the pawnee has no concern.

A depreciation in the value of the pledge occasions a proportionable deduction from the pawnor’s account. If a person, pawn, and article estimated at one thousand dirms, in security of a debt of the same amount payable at some future period, and the article, in consequence of a fall in the price, bear afterwards a value of five hundred dirms, and be then destroyed in the pawnor’s hands, he (the pawnee) is responsible for five hundred dirms, and five hundred are also remitted from his debt; for the deficiency of five hundred dirms arising from the fall in the price being (as it were) a decay of part of the pawn whilst in the hands of the pawnee, an adequate sum is therefore retained from his claim; and the remaining five hundred dirms are likewise due from him in consequence of the decay, and remain with him in pawn, as before stated.

The pawnee lending the pledge to the pawner, is freed from responsibility during the loan.—If a person, having received slave in pawn, lend him to the pawner, in order that he may enjoy the use of his service, or for any other purpose, and the pawner take possession, the slave is no longer a subject of responsibility with the pawnee (in other words, if he be killed or lost in the hands of the pawner, the pawnee is not thence held to have received payment of his debt); because he has passed out of the possession of the pawnee; and the seisin of the pawner in virtue of a loan does not stand as the seisin of the pawnee, as the tenure of loan is repugnant to that of a pawn, since the latter induces responsibility, whereas the former does not.

But he may resume it at pleasure, and then his responsibility reverts.—The pawnee, however, is at liberty at any time to resume the pledge from the pawner; because he holds it by the tenuro of a loan which is not binding; and also, because the contract of pawn still subsists;—whence it is that if the pawnor were to die without having returned the pledge, the pawnee would in that case have a claim upon it in preference to the other creditors (that is to say, he would be entitled first to take a satisfaction for his claim from the pledge; which done, if any part should remain it would be distributed among the other creditors).

Objection.—If a pawnee be not held liable for a pledged slave after he is lent, how is the contract of pawn supposed then to exist, Reply—Responsibility is not, in every instance, one of the requisites of a contract of pawn;—whence it is that the effect of the contract reaches to the child of a pawned female slave, although such child be not a subject of responsibility from loss or destruction.

As, therefore, the contract still subsists, the pawnee resume the pledge from the pawnor, he again become liable for it, in the same manner as formerly, having again taken possession of it in virtue of the contract of pawn.

The pledge being lent to a stranger by either party, is no longer a subject of responsibility. If either of the parties to a contract of pawn and the pledge with the concurrence of the other to a stranger, it is not in this case a subject of responsibility to the pawnee, any more than in the former instance of but the contract of pawn still continues in force, and either party is entitled to resume the pledge from the borrower, and to place it in pawn as before, from the interest each has in it.

The pledge, on being disposed of by either party, with the consent of the other, is excluded from the contract.—If either party, with the consent of the other, let, sell, or bestow the pawn in gift to stranger, it is excluded from the contract, and cannot again be subject to it, unless the parties conclude a fresh agreement. It is to be observed that if, in any of these cases, the pawner die before a restitution of the pledge be made to the pawnee, he (the pawnee) is upon the same footing with the other creditors; because as, in consequence of these acts, a binding right of others is connected with the pledge, the effect of the contract no longer remains:—wheras no binding right is connected with a pledge in consequence of the loan of it:—for which reason there is an essential difference between the cases here considered and that of loan.

If the pawnee borrow the pledge from the pawnor for any particular purpose, and it be destroyed previous to his having applied it to that purpose, he is responsible for it,—that is to say, a sum proportionate to its value is retrenched from his claim; for until he apply it to that use for which he has borrowed it, the seisin which he had made in virtue of the contract of pawn still subsists. The law is similar where the pawn is destroyed after the pawnee has accomplished the service for which he had borrowed it; for then his seisin of loan exists no longer. If, on the contrary, it be destroyed during the period in which he enjoys the use of it, he is not responsible, as at that time he holds it in loan, not in pawn. (The same rule also holds where the pawner consents to the pawnor’s making use of the pledge.)

A person borrowing an article, with intent to pawn it is restricted in the pawn according as he specifies the particulars of the debt, etc., or otherwise.—If a person borrow a robe from another, with an intent generally declared “to pawn it,” he may accordingly pawn it in security for any debt whether great or small:—whereas, if the lender particularly specify the sum; in security for which the borrower may pawn the robe, he is not, in that case, permitted to pawn it for a sum either larger or smaller than what is so specified:—not for a larger sum, because the intention of the lender is, that the robe shall be pawned for a debt which may be easily discharged, an intention which is obviously defeated in the case of pawning it for a large sum:—nor for a smaller sum, because the view of the lender here is, in case of its loss, the obtaining from the pawner that sum which he would receive from the pawnee in consideration of the extra value of the pledge. The same rule also holds where the lender specifies either the particular species of debt, the person who is to receive the pawn, or the city in which the contract is to be concluded:—such restrictions being severally attended with particular advantage; for the payment of some debts is more easily effected than of others,—and it is also more convenient to make payment in some cities than in others, and so likewise it is of advantage to particularize the persons, as some men are just and careful, whilst others are not so.

*That is,—where the pawnee, being already possessed of the pledge, obtains the owner’s consent to make use of it.—For the elucidation of what is here advanced it is proper to remark, that a pledge may either be delivered to the pawnee, given in trust to an Adil, or retained in the hands of the owner [the pawnor] under a responsibility to account for it if necessary.

And if he transgress, is responsible for the value in case of loss.—If, therefore, in any of these cases, the borrower act contrary to the directions of the lender, he becomes responsible for the value of the article in case of loss:—and when this happens, the lender has it in his option either to take a compensation from the borrower (in which case the contract of pawn subsists entirely between the borrower and the pawnee, since the former, by paying the compensation for the pledge, becomes sole proprietor of it), or from the pawnee, who will take an indemnification from the pawner, and likewise receive payment of his debt, as has been before explained in the cases of claims laid to pledges. If, on the contrary, the borrower conform to the directions of the lender, by pawning the robe for the exact sum to which he was restricted and the value of the robe be equal to, or greater than the amount of the debt, the pawnee is held, in case of its loss, to have received payment of his debt, and the proprietor of the robe receives from the pawner the amount of the debt, being the sum which the borrower had cleared by means of his property (and it is on this account that the borrower must pay the amount of the debt,—not because he was seised of the robe, as that was in virtue of a free loan from the proprietor).—In the same manner if, when the pawnee had conformed to the direction of the lender, the robe be in any degree depreciated, the pawnee forfeits a proportionate part of his claim, and a like sum is due from the borrower to the lender, because of so much having been retrenched from his debt. If the value of the robe be short of the amount of the debt, and it be lost in pawn, a sum equivalent to its value is retrenched from the claim, and the remainder of the debt is due from the pawnee, as no discharge of debt is effected beyond the amount of the value of the robe; and the pawnee, moreover, indebted to the lender for the value of the robe, has no means of it made payment of as much of his debt.—If, also, the value of the robe be adequate to the amount of the debt and the proprietor be desirous of redeeming his property, on the part of the pawnee, by paying the amount, the pawnee is not in that case allowed to object to the restoring of it; because the robe being the property of the lender, he does not, consequently, by redeeming it, officiously intermeddle in an affair which does not concern him (whence he is entitled to take from the pawnee (the borrower) the sum which he pays towards the redemption of the pawn); and the Kazee must therefore compel the pawnee to surrender the robe. It is otherwise where an unconcerned person pays the debt of the pawnor; for as, by endeavouring to redeem a thing which is not his own property, he interferes in a business which does not relate to him, the pawnee is not therefore compellable to surrender the pledge to him.

But not if it be lost before pawn, or after redemption.—If the borrowed article be lost in the hands of the borrower, either prior to his having pawned it, or posterior to his having redeemed it, he is not responsible; for here he has not accomplished any discharge by means of the value, which (as we have shown in the above case) is the sole cause of responsibility.

On disputes concerning the loss of the pledge, the deposition of the borrower is credited with respect to the person in whose hands it was lost, and that of the lender with respect to the restrictions of the loan.—If a dispute arise between the lender and borrower after the loss of the pledge, the lender asserting that it had been lost whilst in the hands of the pawnee, and the borrower on the other hand maintaing that it was lost in his own possession, either before he had pawned it or after he had redeemed it, the declaration of the borrower upon oath must be credited, because he is, in this case, the defendant, as he denies having paid the debt by means of the other's property.—If, on the contrary, they disagree concerning the amount of the debt to which the lender had restricted the pawn- ing of the robe, the declaration of the lender is credited; for as his deposition would be credited if he were to deny the loan itself, it follows that where he merely denies a quality of the loan it is credited a fortiori.

A person receiving a borrowed article in pledge on the faith of a promise, must pay the same to the pawnee, who again pays the same to the lender.—If the borrower of the robe pawn it on the faith of a promise, that is, on a person promising to lend him a certain sum of money, and that promise accept the pledge, and make the promise accordingly, and the pledge (which is supposed to be equal to the amount of the debt) be lost before the pawnnee had fulfilled his engagement, he [the pawnnee] is in that case responsible for the sum so promised, as a promise is held to be the same as a real debt, and the lender is entitled to receive from the borrower the sum which he takes from the pawnnee.

The lender of a slave to pawn may emancipate him, lodging the value with the pawnee, in substitute for the pledge.—If a person lend his slave to another, that he may pawn him, and the borrower pawn him accordingly, and the lender afterwards emancipate him, he is accordingly free; for the owner's property in him is not destroyed by the circumstance of his being pawned. And in this case the pawnnee may either receive payment of his debt from the pawnner (who is still indebted to him), or he may take from the lender the value of the slave by way of compensation, as the right which he had in the worth of the slave was destroyed by the lender emancipating him; and having thus received the value, he may retain it in pawn until such time as he obtain payment of his debt, upon which he must restore the said value to the owner.

The borrower transgressing upon the article (before pawn or after redemption) and then ceasing from such transgression is not responsible in case of loss.—If a person borrow a slave or a camel with intent to pawn it, and having first employed the slave in service, or rode upon the camel, he then pawn it in security of a debt adequate to its value, and having afterwards discharged the debt, the pledge be completely destroyed in the hands of the pawnee before restoration, in that case the pawnner is not responsible; for when he concluded the pawn he became exempt from responsibility, notwithstanding he had previously enjoyed the usufruct; since although he at first transgressed, yet he afterwards retracted, and acted in conformity with the intention of the lender.

In the same manner, if the pawnner, after having redeemed the pledge, employ it in service, without occasioning any detriment to it, and it be afterwards destroyed by some unforeseen contingency, he is not responsible, because the term of the loan having expired upon the redemption of the pawn, he is no longer a borrower, but becomes from that period a trustee; and although, in taking the service of the pawn, he was guilty of a transgression, yet as he afterwards retracted, and conformed to the intention of the lender he becomes thenceforth free from all responsibility. It is otherwise in the case of a person who has borrowed any thing not with an intent to pawn it; for his seisin, being derived merely from the loan, is not therefore the same as that of the proprietor, to whom he is consequently bound to restore the thing which he borrowed. In the case, on the contrary, of a loan with intent to pawn, when the thing is pawned the object of the lender is obtained; for his views is to have recourse to the borrower; that is to say, that when the pawn is destroyed in the possession of the pawnee, and a discharge of debt thereby proved, he may take from the borrower a sum adequate to what he is held to have discharged by the loss of the pawn: wherefore if it be destroyed in the hands of the borrower, without a transgression on his part, he is not responsible.

A pawnner destroying the pledge, is responsible to the pawnnee for the value.—If the pawnner kill the slave whom he had pledged he is responsible for the value; because by the murder of the slave he destroys the right of the pawnnee, which is sacred and inviolable; and a right of this nature, attaching to the property of any person, renders him [the proprietor] the same as a stranger with respect to responsibility; like the connexion of the right of the heirs with the property of a dying person, which proves the effect of his gratuitous acts in any thing, beyond the third of his estate; or like the connexion of the right of a legatee with the legacy bequeathed to him, which, if the testator's heirs should destroy the article (bequeathed to him in legacy), renders them responsible for the value as a substitute.

And so in proportion for any injury he may do to it.—If the pawnee commit any offence upon the pledge,* a sum is remitted from his debt equivalent to the atonement for such offence; because the substance of the pledge belongs to the proprietor (the pawner): and as the pawner has transgressed upon it in this instance, he is consequently responsible to the proprietor for having so done.

Any penal offence committed by a pledged slave upon the person or property of the pawner is of no account.—If a pledged slave be guilty of an offence against the pawner, either in person or property, such offence is of no account,—that is to say, is not attended with any effect;—and in this our doctors have been unanimous for as the offence is here committed by the property on the proprietor, the cognizance of it would tend to no advantage. (By the offences here alluded to it is to be understood merely such as induced fine, not such as occasion retaliation.)

Nor such offence committed by him upon the person of the pawner.—If a pledged slave be guilty of an offence against the person of the pawner, this likewise: (in the opinion of Haneefa) is of no account.—The two disciples have judged otherwise.—The argument adduced by them is that as, in such case, the offence does not affect the proprietor, an advantage may be derived from a cognizance of it, since the slave may be made over [to the pawner] in reparation of the injury.—The offence is therefore of account in this instance; and such (according to them) being the case, it follows that if the pawner and pawnee concur in dissolving the contract of pawn, and the pawner either deliver the slave, or pay a sum to the pawnee in atonement for the offence, the obligation of debt is void; †—but if the pawnee should signify that "he does not desire any compensation for the offence," the slave remains in pawn as before. The argument of Haneefa is, that no advantage can possibly result from taking cognizance of the offence in question; for if cognizance of it be taken on account of the pawnee, it is then incumbent on him to extricate the slave from the guilt in which he is involved; ‡ therefore he must first pay the expiratory sum, and then again receive it which there is evidently no advantage.

Nor upon his property, provided his value do not exceed the debt for which by stands pledged.—If a pledged slave commit an offence upon the property of the pawner, such offence is of no account, according to all our doctors, provided the value of the slave be adequate to the amount of the debt:

for here no advantage can result from taking cognizance of the offence; as the remedy applicable in this case is an appropriation of the slave to the pawnee, in compensation for the injury he had sustained,—a remedy which cannot here be effected, as the slave is not made over in atonement for the offence, but is sold, and a compensation for the injury he has done to the property of the pawnee discharged from the purchase money;—and the sum appropriated to the discharge of the compensation is deducted from the debt, there is finally no advantage in taking account of the offence in this instance. If, on the contrary, the value of the slave exceed the amount of the debt, there are two opinions recorded from Haneefa upon the case.—One is, that [the offence may be redressed in the proportion in which the value [of the slave] exceeds the debt, a pledge being a trust with respect to any excess, and the injury in this case being similar to that committed by a slave in deposit on the property of the trustee. The other is, that the offence cannot be redressed at all, for as the effect of the contract of pawn (namely, the detention of the slave on account of debt) applies to the excess as well as to any other part of the pledge, it may therefore be said that he is a subject of responsibility in toto.

But his offence against the son of the pawner is cognizable.—If an offence be committed by a pledged slave on the son of the pawner or pawnee, it is cognizable; for, as the right of property of a father is, in reality, distinct and separate from that of his son, the crime is therefore the same as if committed upon a stranger.

If the pledge be destroyed after depreciation, the pawnee must remain satisfied with the compensation he recovers from the destroyer.—If a person pawn a slave estimated at one thousand dirams, in security for a debt of the same amount, payable at some future period, and the value of the slave be afterwards lowered to one hundred dirams from a fall in the price,* and a person then kill the slave, and pay a compensation of one hundred dirams (being the value he at that time bears), and the time of payment arrive, the pawnee must in this case keep possession of the hundred dirams aforesaid in lieu of his debt and has no further claim whatever upon the pawner.—This is founded upon an established rule, that no regard is paid to any depreciation of a pledge from a fall in the price, regard being had solely to the value it bore at the time of the contract of pawn;—whence it is that (as is here mentioned) diminution of the value of a pledge from a fall in the price does not occasion a remission of the debt, according to our doctors:—contrary to the opinion of Zifer, who contends that, upon the pledge sustaining any loss with respect to its worth, it may be

* Such as by maiming, or otherwise.
† Because the slave here appears to have been "lost in the hands of the pawnee," a circumstance which liquidates his debt.
‡ Because he is possessed of the slave in a way which induces responsibility.

* That is, from a fall (for instance) in the current or market price of slaves, said to sustain a loss with respect to the substance also. The argument of our doctors is that a fall in the price arises merely from a decrease of desire in men towards the article,—a circumstance to which no regard is paid in the case of sale (whence the purchaser has on option in consequence of any casual fall in the market, but owes the whole price agreed for), nor in the case of usury (whence an usurper, upon restoring the article he has usurped, is not responsible for any depreciation it may have sustained in the interim of usury from a fall in the price). As, therefore, no art of the debt is remitted in consequence of a fall in the price, the slave continues in pledge opposed to the whole of the debt;—and upon any person killing him, he pays the value which he [the slave] then bears, namely, one hundred dirms (for, in exacting compensation, regard must be paid to the value at the time of the destruction taking place);—and the pawnee takes the hundred dirms, as being a compensation for the worth of the pledge with respect to the owner of it. But, after this, the pawnee has no further claim on the pawner; because the seisin of the pawnee stands as a seisin of payment from the time of his obtaining possession of the pledge—which payment is confirmed in the event of the loss of the pledge whilst in his possession. The value of the slave, moreover, at the beginning was one thousand dirms, and upon his being destroyed in the hands of the pawnee, he [the pawnee] is accounted to have received payment of his whole debt in virtue of his original seisin. But since, in consequence of his having received one hundred dirms, it is impossible that he can also be thus accounted to obtain payment of one thousand dirms (the original value of the slave) without inducing usury, the matter is therefore settled thus,—that he received these hundred dirms as part payment of his debts of one thousand dirms, and that there still remain nine hundred dirms annexed to the substance of the pledge; and that, upon the pledge being destroyed in his possession, he is in consequence of such destruction accounted to receive payment of nine hundred dirms. It is otherwise where the slave dies a natural death in the hands of the pawnee; for as, in that case, there can be no imputation of usury, he is therefore held to have received payment of the whole of the debt in that instance. But if (after such depreciation) he sell it by desire of the pawnee for payment of his claim, he is still entitled to any deficiency. If a person pawn a slave estimated at one thousand dirms in security of debt of the same amount, and the value of the slave be afterwards lowered to one hundred dirms by a fall in the price, and the pawnee be authorized by the pawner to sell the slave, and accordingly sell him for one hundred dirms, and take possession of the price towards the discharge of his debt,—he is still entitled to receive from the pawnee the remaining nine hundred dirms; for as the pawnee sold the pledge at the instance of the pawner, it is effect the same as if the pawner had taken it back and sold it himself— in which case the agreement would be dissolved and the debt would continue in force, except in regard to the sum which the pawnee had received—and so here likewise.

The pawner must redeem a slave of less value received by the pawnee in compensation for having slain the slave in pledge by payment of his whole debt— If a person pawn a slave valued at one thousand dirms against a debt of the same amount, and afterwards a slave valued at one hundred dirms kill the slave in pawn, and having been given in compensation for his blood, be detained in pawn in lieu of him, the pawner is in that case compellable to redeem him by the payment of the whole of the debt, namely, one thousand dirms. This is the opinion of Honore and Abu Yoosaf. Muhammad maintains that the pawner is in this case at liberty either to redeem the pledge by discharging the whole of the debt or to transfer the property of it to the pawnee as a commutation. Zisser, on the other hand, contends that the slave who perpetrated the murder is to remain in pawn in security of one hundred dirms; and that the remaining sum of nine hundred dirms is accounted to be discharged; because (as he argues) the seisin of the pawnee in virtue of the contract is a seisin of payment, which is fulfilled in this case by the destruction of the pledge; but as the pledge has left behind it a return or consideration, equivalent to the tenth part of the debt, such part is therefore still due and the slave is detained in pawn in security thereof. The argument of our doctors is, that in his case no part of the debt is remitted; because the second slave is a substitute for the first, in regard merely to flesh and blood (that is, in regard to appearance); and as, in case of the existence of the first slave, it is diminished by a fall in the price, still no part of the debt (as we have before shown, would be on that account annulled, so neither is any part a annulled when another slave is substituted for the one originally pledged. Muhammad has indeed said that the pawner may nevertheless refuse to redeem the pledge; for when a change and diminution of value took place in the pawn whilst in the possession of the pawnee (which is a cause of responsibility), the pawner became empowered to object to the redemption of it;—in the same manner as where a slave kills a purchased slave antecedent to the delivery of him,—in which case the purchaser has it at his option either to accept the slave who committed the murder in lieu of the one he purchased, or to annul the contract [of sale]. To this, however, the two Elders reply, that upon the second slave being, with regard to appearance, substituted for the first, it may be said that in change takes place in the identity of the slave; and as the substance of a pawn is a trust in the hands of the pawnee, it follows that the pawner cannot render it the property of the pawnee unless he should consent thereunto.—Moreover, the transfer of a pledge in commutation of the debt to which it stood opposed was a common practice in times of ignorance, but has since been proscribed by the law. It is otherwise with respect to the case of sale adduced as a parallel by Mohammed; for there the buyer has the option of annulling the contract of sale; and the annulment of sale is permitted by this law.

The fines incurred by a pledged slave must be defrayed by the pawnee.—If a pledged slave slay a person by misadventure, the fine of blood is in that case chargeable to the pawnee, who must defray it accordingly—or is he at liberty to commute the slave for it? or has he not the power of transferring the property of him to any person? If, therefore, the pawnee discharge the whole fine, the slave is thereby rendered pure; and the stains of guilt being thus effaced, his [the pawnee's] claim of debt subsists as before: but he is not entitled to make any demand on the pawner on account of the sum which he paid in expiation of the crime of the slave; for as it was committed whilst in his possession a circumstance which occasions responsibility, the atonement for it therefore rests upon him.

But if he refuse, they are defrayed by the pawner, who charges the pawnee accordingly, in liquidation of his debt.—If, however, the pawnee object to the payment of the penalty, the pawner must in that case be ordered either to pay the fine, or to make over the slave in lieu of it; for the pawner is the proprietor of the slave; and the fine was chargeable to the pawnee merely for this reason, that his right is connected with the slave [in virtue of pawn], and not because of his being in any respect the proprietor. Upon his refusal, therefore, the claim of atonement for the offence lies against the pawner, as being proprietor of the slave; and the atonement, in the present instance, is either paying the fine of blood, or making over the slave in lieu of it. If the pawner adopt the latter alternative, his debt to the pawnee is held to be completely discharged; for the transfer having been incurred by an offence committed by the slave whilst in the pawnee's possession, he, therefore, as it were, perishes in his hands. If, also, he adopt the former alternative (that of paying the fine), his debt is extinguished; for as the slave was (as it were) lost by the offence, the recovery of him was incumbent on the pawnee, by the payment of the atonement. Upon the pawner, therefore, discharging such atonement, he, as it were, retrieves the slave, and is consequently entitled to payment from the pawnee; for which reason the debt is held to be annulled. It is otherwise where a person pawns a slave girl who bears a child whilst in the possession of the pawnee; for if that child should either kill a man, or trespass upon any person's property, it is incumbent on the pawner in the first instance to make over the child in expiation for the murder, or in compensation for the damage he may have occasioned; as the child is not a subject of responsibility with the pawnee. If, therefore, the child be given in lieu of the blood or property, it is excluded from the contract of pawn, but is not deducted from the pawnee's debt,—in the same manner as where it dies a natural death:—or, if, on the other hand, he pay the atonement, the child in that case remains in pawn with its mother as before.

Rule with respect to the debts increased by a pledged slave destroying the property of a stranger.—If a pledged slave destroy the property of any person to an equal or greater amount than his value, and the pawnee discharge the debt thus incurred by the slave, his claim upon the pawner holds good as before, in the same manner as where he pays a pecuniary atonement for any offence committed by the slave. In case, however, of his objecting to such payment, the pawner is then required either to sell the slave towards discharging of the debt, or to pay it himself. If he adopt the latter alternative, the claim of the pawnee is cancelled, in the same manner as explained in the example of atonements. If, on the contrary, he prefer the former alternative and (declining to pay the debt himself) sell the slave towards the discharge of it, in that case the person who sustained the injury must first take what is due to him from the price (his claim having preference to that of the pawnee), and then, if anything remain, in inquiry must be made whether the claim of the proprietor of the goods was greater than that of the pawnee. If it be either equal to or greater than the claim of the pawnee, the residue of the price is appropriated to the pawner, and the debt of the pawnee is held to be annulled; for upon the slave being sold towards the discharge of a debt attaching to him in consequence of an offence committed whilst in the possession of the pawner, the case becomes in effect the same as if he had been destroyed in the pawnee's possession. If, on the contrary, the claim of the proprietor be less than that of the pawnee—then the claim of the pawnee is in that case annulled only in proportion to the sum disbursed to the proprietor and the remainder is detained in pawn in lieu of the slave:—wherefore, if the pawnee's debt be at that time due, he may then take this sum as a satisfaction for it but if the term of payment should not have arrived, he must retain it in his hands until his debt become payable. If, on the other hand, it should so happen that the price of the slave does not altogether suffice towards the discharge of the proprietor's debt, he [the proprietor] may in that case take the whole of the price, but without making a demand on any person for the remainder, until such time as the slave may have become free; for his right relates to the slave; and as the slave has been sold towards making satisfaction for it, his claim therefore to whatever part of the right may not have been thus discharged, is suspended until the slave obtain his freedom, when it may be again urged; and if the slave, after obtaining his freedom, should thus discharge the remainder, he is not then entitled to claim a reimbursement from any person, as the money be disbursed was due from him on account of his own act.

If the value of the slave be twice the amount of the debt, the fines incurred by him are defrayed equally by both parties. —If a person pawn a slave valued at two thousand dirms in security of a debt of one thousand, and the slave commit an offence in that case the pawn and pawnee must both be ordered to pay the atonement; for a moiety only of the slave is insured with the pawnee, the other moiety being with him as a trust; and accordingly the atonement for the insured moiety is chargeable to him, and that of the other moiety to the pawnee. If, therefore, the pawner incline to give the slave as a composition for the offence, and the pawnee assent thereto, his [the pawnee's] debt is extinguished. If, on the contrary, the parties disagree (one of them inclining to give the slave in composition, and the other wishing to discharge the atonement), the declaration is in that case accepted of the party who perfers paying the atonement, whether it be the pawner or pawnee; for if the pawnee pay the atonement and the right of the pawn is not annulled, whereas the pawner, in commuting the slave for the penalty, would destroy the right of the pawnee. If the pawnee pay the atonement, a part of the payment, in proportion to the part [of the slave] he held in trust, is considered as gratuitous (for this reason, that if he had not chosen to pay it, the matter would have rested upon the pawner), and such being the case, he has no claim upon the pawner for an indemnification. —If, on the contrary, the pawnee refuse to pay the atonement, and the pawner discharge the whole, a moiety of it is in that case placed to the account of the pawnee (that is to say, is deducted from his claim); for as, in all cases where pledged slaves commit a crime, the debt of the pawnee is held to be extinguished upon the pawner either making over the slave, or paying the atonement, it follows that the pawner, in paying the atonement, does not act gratuitously. As, therefore, a moiety of the atonement is due from the pawnee, if such moiety be equal to, or greater than his claim, the whole of his debt is extinguished; or, if it be less, a proportionate part; whilst the slave is detained in pawn in security of the part remaining due.

The executor of a deceased pawner may sell the pledge, and discharge the debt, with the pawnee's consent. —If a pawner die, his executor is empowered to sell the pledge, and discharge the debt, provided he obtain the consent of the pawnee; for as the executor represents the pawner, he has consequently the same power and privilege as had appertained to him during his lifetime. But if a pawner die without leaving an executor, it then belongs to the Kazoo to appoint a person to act in that capacity; as it is his duty to conserve the rights of those who are themselves incapable of maintaining them; which purpose is fulfilled in the appointment of an executor, who may discharge the debts of the deceased, and receive payment of his claims upon others.

An executor cannot commence the effects of the defunct to any particular creditor. —If an executor pawn part of the effects of the defunct to one of his creditors, it is illegal, and the other creditors may compel him to revoke the pawn; for an executor, not having the power of paying some of the creditors, and of excepting others, cannot therefore give pledges to some and not to others; as a pledge is held to be the same, in effect, with an actual payment. If, therefore, the executor should, in the meantime, discharge the claims of the other creditors, the pawn which he before made is valid, since in satisfying them he removes the bar to its legality.

Unless there be only one. —But if the defunct should leave only one debt against him, in that case the executor is justified in pawning part of the effects in security of it; for, since he has a power of giving part of the effects, in payment of the debts of the deceased, he may consequently deposit part of them in pledge; and if, afterwards, he sell the pledge as a means of discharging the debt, it is lawful, because the sale of the effects of the defunct with a purpose to pay off his debts being lawful when they are not pawned, it is consequently so likewise when they are pawned.

He may receive pledges in security for debts owing to the defunct. —If an executor take a pawn in security of a debt due to the defunct, it is lawful; because the seisin of a pawn is the same as a receipt of payment; and it is the duty of an executor to receive payment of the debts of the deceased. (A more particular explanation of the powers of an executor, with respect to pawns, shall be given in treating of Executorships.)

Section.

Grape-juice still remains in pawn after having become wine and then vinegar. —If a person pawn, in security of a debt of ten dirms, a quantity of the juice of grapes the same value, which afterwards becomes wine, and then vinegar, and the value of the vinegar be also ten dirms, it in that case remains in pawn for the debt of ten dirms; because whatever is fit to be sold is likewise fit to be pawned, since worth is requisite to the fitness in the one instance as well as in the other; and wine, although not at first qualified for sale, does yet possess that fitness ultimately; whence it is that if a person purchase the juice of grapes, and it become wine prior to his taking possession, still the compact of the sale is not dissolved, but the purchaser has, in such case, the option of either adhering to, or receding from the bargain; as the goods which he purchased, having been changed, are thereby as it were damaged.

A pledge destroyed in part is still retained in pawn with respect to the remainder.—If a goat, estimated at ten dirms, having been pawned for a debt of the same amount, should afterwards die, and its skin be preserved so as to bear a value of one dirm, it is detained in pawn in security of a like part of the debt; for as a contract of pawn is completed and perfected by the destruction of the pledge (since the object of it namely, a payment of debt, is then obtained), it follows that where a part of the pawn remains, the contract continues in force in proportion to that part. It is otherwise where a goat, having been sold, dies before the purchaser takes possession, and the skin is preserved; for in that case the contract is completely void (that is to say, it does not subsist even in regard to the skin);—because sale is rendered void, and entirely done away, be a destruction of the goat before the delivery of them to the purchaser; and such being the case, it cannot (in this instance) revert with respect to the skin.

Any increase accruing from the pledge is detained in pawn along with it.—Every species of increase according from a pledge after the execution of the contract (such as milk, fruits, wool, or progeny), belong to the pawner, as being the offering of his property;—but they are, nevertheless, detained with the original in pawn; for branches are dependent on the stock; and the contract of pawn, being of a binding nature, extends over all its branches. If, however, this offspring be destroyed in the pawnee’s hands, he is not responsible for it; because no part of the sum opposed to the original is opposed to the offspring, as that was not originally included in the contract, since the proposal and acceptance which form the contract did not relate to, or comprehend it. If, on the contrary, the original be destroyed, and the offspring remain whole, it is incumbent on the pawner to redeem the same, by paying its proportionate value; that is to say, the debt must be divided proportionately to the value which the original bore at the time of concluding the bargain, and that which the offspring bears at the time of redeeming it; and the proportion given to the original is, upon the loss of it, held to be annulled; but that of the offspring remains due, and must be paid by the pawnee towards the redemption of it. (A variety of cases are determined by this rule, several of which are set forth in the Kafaya of the Al-Moonihie; and the whole are enumerated in the Jama Saghier and Zeeadat.)

The pawnee, using the product from the pledge by permission of the pawner, is not liable for any thing on that account.—If a person, having pawned a goat, desire the pawnee to milk it, giving him, at the same time, permission to enjoy whatever quantity he might milk, and the pawnee act accordingly, he is not liable to compensate for the milk he may have taken, nor is his claim, on that account, in any measure diminished, since he used the milk at the instance of the pawner. If, therefore, the goat die unredeemed in the hands of the pawnee, the debt owing to him must be divided into two parts, proportionate to the value of the goat and of the milk; and that part opposed to the goat is cancelled; whilst the other part, opposed to the milk, remains due from the pawner; because, although the milk be the property of the pawner, yet as the pawnee consumed it by his desire, the case is the same as if the pawner had himself taken and destroyed it. The pawnee, therefore, is not answerable for the milk: but (if the goat die) his claim still exists with respect to that proportion which corresponds with it. The same rule also obtains with regard to the offspring of a goat, which a pawnee eats at the desire of the pawner; and, in fine, with respect to every increase accruing from pledges posterior to the contract.

The pledge may be augmented, but not the debt.—The augmentation of a pledge is lawful, in the opinion of all our doctors;—as where, for instance, a person, having pawned a slave for a debt of one thousand dirms, afterwards gives the slave a garment to be detained likewise in pawn in security of the same debt;—in which case the addition so made to the original pledge is lawful, and the garment is included in the agreement; the case being, in short, the same as if the slave and garment had been originally pawned together. On the other hand, the increase of a debt in security or which a pawn has been taken is not lawful (according to Haneefa and Mohammed); that is to say, the pledge opposed to a particular debt does not also stand opposed to any increase upon it. Aboo Yoonaf holds that both debts are liquidated.—The addition to a pledge, as here stated, is termed Zeadit Koosdee, or intentional increase.* and the debt is to be between the value the original pledge bore at the time of pawning it, and that which the addition bears on the day of its delivery.—Hence if the value of the latter was then five hundred dirms, and that of the original pledge at the time of concluding the agreement one thousand, and the amount of the debt likewise one thousand, the debt is in that case divided into three shares, two of which are opposed to the original pledge, and the remaining one to the increase; and according to this proportion they are respectively charged for, if lost or destroyed in the hands of the pawnee.

Case of increase to a pledged female slave.—If a person, in security of a debt of one thousand dirms, pawn a female slave of the same value, who afterwards brings forth a child likewise estimated at one thousand dirms, and the pawnee then increase the pledge, he has added a slave also valued at one thousand dirms (saying to the pawnee, "I have added this slave to the child of the pledge"), the slave is in that case pawned with the child only. If, therefore, the child afterwards die, the slave is no longer in pawn, insomuch that the pawnee may resume him from the pawnee without making him any return. If, also, the slave should die, or be lost, nothing is chargeable on that account to the pawnee;—If, on the other hand, the mother should die, the debt must in that case be divided between the value she bore at the time of concluding the contract, and that which the child bears on the day of redemption;—and since the slave was attached solely to the child, the share of the child must therefore be proportionably divided between it and the slave, agreeably to their respective values, in order that if either of them should die he may be charged for accordingly. If, on the contrary, the pawner attach the slave to the mother (saying to the pawnee, "I have placed him with her in addition to the pledge"), the debt must in that case be proportionally opposed to the mother and the slave, according to the value which they severally bore at the time of seisin; and from the sum opposed to the mother a proportionate part must be allotted to the child; for the pawner, in having placed the slave with the mother, joined him (as it were) to the original matter of the agreement;—whence the child is included in the proportion of the mother only.

Case of a pawner committing one slave in pawn for another.—If a person pawn a slave valued at one thousand dirms in security of a debt of the same amount and afterwards give the pawnee another slave, likewise of the same value, to be detained in place of the former, in that case the first slave is considered as being in pawn until such time as the pawnee restore him to the pawner in the way of annulment. The second slave being merely a deposit in his hands until he be regularly rendered a substitute for the other; for the first slave was included in the responsibility of the pawnee only because of his being possessed in security of debt; and as both the seisin and the debt still exist, the slave therefore continues a subject of responsibility until the seisin be formally voided; and such being the case, the pawnee is not liable for the second slave, as the parties intend one of them only to be included in the pawnee's responsibility;—but upon the pawnee restoring the first slave to the pawner, he becomes responsible for the second.

The pawnee is not responsible for the pledge after having acquitted the pawner of his debt.—If the pawnee acquit the pawner of the debt, or bestow it on him in gift, and the pledge, be afterwards destroyed in his (the pawnee's) possession, he is not responsible for it, according to our doctors, proceeding upon a favourable construction of the law:—contrary to the opinion of Ziffer. The reasons for a favourable construction of the law in this particular are twofold.—Firstly, a pledge is insured on two conditions:—one, that it be actually possessed by the pawnee; and another, that it be opposed to a debt either due or promised. Now, compensation for a pledge in the case of a debt then due, is made in this manner,—that if the pawn be lost in the hands of the pawnee, his debt is extinguished, provided the value of the pledge be adequate to the amount of the debt; whereas compensation in the case of a promised debt is made by constraining the pawnee, in case of the decay of the pledge in his hands, to make good to the pawner the sum he had promised;—and secondly, in a case where the pawnee acquires the pawner of the debt, or bestows it on him in gift, the second condition is wanting, as no debt exists in that instance either due or promised. Secondly, one object of a pawner in delivering the pledge to the pawnee is that, in case of its loss, he may be absolved from any further obligation; but where the pawnee acquires the pawnor of the debt, and the pawn is afterwards lost in his hands, the desire of the pawnor being accomplished, the pawnee is not therefore liable for it (unless however, the pawnee, having remitted the debt, refuse to restore the pawn, and prevent the pawnor from resuming it; for, in that case, if the pledge be lost, he is responsible for the value, since by such obstruction he becomes an usurper, as he no longer possesses a power of obstruction).—In the same manner, if a woman take a pledge from her husband in security of her stipulated dower, and afterwards exempt him from the payment of it, or apostatize from the faith before consummation, and the pledge he then destroyed in her hands, she is not responsible for it, as the dower (like the debt) was remitted.

If the pledge be destroyed with him after he has received payment of his debt, he must refund it, and the debt stands liquidated.—If a pawnee receive payment of his debt, either from the pawnor or from an unconnected person, in a gratuitous manner, and the pledge be afterwards destroyed in his possession, his debt is in consequence extinguished, and it is incumbent on him to restore what he had received to the person from whom he received it, whether the pawnor or any other; for the seizin of the pawnee is equivalent to a receipt of payment in case of the loss of the pledge; and in the present instance, upon the pledge being destroyed, the pawnee is accounted to have received payment from the time he was first seized of it; and as he is not entitled, after that, to a second discharge, and the payment he had received as above then becomes such in effect, it must therefore be refunded. In short, the discharge of the pawnee's claim, whilst he remains seized of the pawn, does not take place, but continues suspended until he deliver it to the pawnor; and such being the case, the pawnor is not therefore, during that time, held to be acquitted of the debt; and upon the pledge being afterwards destroyed in the hands of the pawnee, his possession of it under such a circumstance is, in effect, a receipt of payment, and the other payment received whilst he was in possession of the pledge is annulled and done away, for otherwise a repetition of discharge would be induced; for which reason he must refund the money he received in payment, and also for this reason that if he were not to refund it the intent of the pawnor would be defeated.

And so likewise, if he compound the debt,—If a pawnee purchase some specific article from the pawnor in lieu of his debt, or compound the debt with him for some specific article; and the pawn be afterwards lost in his possession, he is still responsible, and may therefore be compelled to restore the article which he had either received in purchase or composition; for the seizin of that article, in either case, is equivalent to an acceptance of payment; and consequently, if he do not refund it, a double receipt of payment is induced, as mentioned in the preceding example.

Or if the pawnor (with his concurrence) transfer the debt upon another person.—If a pawnor transfer the debt which he owes the pawnee upon another person (such as Zeyd, for instance), who agrees to pay the same, and the pawnee, having assented to such transfer, acquit the pawnor of the debt and the pledge be afterwards destroyed in the pawnor's hands, the transfer is thereby rendered ineffectual, and the claim of the pawnor is annihilated; for although, in consequence of the transfer, the transferred [the pawnor] be acquitted of any further concern in the matter, yet this acquittance is the same as an actual payment, inasmuch as the sum, the payment of which he had transferred upon the other person, is ultimately disbursed by him, having so transferred it in consequence of his having a claim upon the transferred for a like sum, whence the payment it made from him in effect; or, if that person was not indebted to him, still the pawnor must afterwards repay whatever sum he may have disbursed in consequence of the transfer, as in that case he acted in the capacity of an agent on his behalf.

If the pledge be lost after the parties agreeing that no debt had existed, it stands as a discharge of the supposed debt.—If a person pawn any thing into the hands of another, and both parties afterwards concur in saying that no debt had ever subsisted between them, and the pledge be then destroyed in the hands of the pawnor, it is answered by the debt; in other words, the debt in security of which the thing had been pawned is extinguished; for there is still a probability of the debt being established by the parties at some future period concurring and agreeing that it did exist; whence it is possible that the debt may be claimed, a circumstance which cannot happen in a case of acquittal of debt.

CHAPTER II.

OF NUlwANCES PLACED IN THE HIGHWAY.

Buildings or timbers placed in or projecting over the highway may be removed by any person whatever. If any person construct a bath, or set out a water-spout, or erect a wall, or set out timbers from his wall to build upon, or set up a shop or both. in the public road, every other person is at liberty, however mean and humble his condition, to pull down the same, and remove it; because all people are entitled to a free passage along such a road for themselves and their cattle; and the case is therefore the same as where a stranger erects a building upon a partnership property; in which instance any one of the partners is at liberty to remove such building; and so here likewise the removal is lawful to all, as all are alike partners in the rights of the road. It is lawful, however, for the person in question in all the above cases to make use of the bath, fountain, or so forth, where they are no way injurious to the community; for as he has the right (in common with others) of passing and repassing, it follows that, provided there be no injury sustained, the obstructing him in the enjoyment would be vexatious. But if they be injurious to the community, the use of them is abominable. They cannot be erected or set up in a closed lane without the consent of the inhabitants.—It is not lawful for an inhabitant of a lane shut up at one end to construct in it a bath, set out a spout, on so forth, without the consent of the other inhabitants, whether it be injurious to them or otherwise; for as the lane is, in fact, their property (whence it is that the right of Shaffa with respect to the houses in it appertains equally to them all), their acquiescence is therefore indispensable. In a public road, moreover, the conversion to particular use is lawful to all men indiscriminately, excepting only in instances where it may prove detrimental; for as it is impossible to obtain the acquiescence of every individual of the community, each is therefore accounted a proprietor, lest his right of use should be altogether defeated; but it is not so in a closed lane; for as it practicable to obtain the acquiescence of all the inhabitants of the lane, the privileges of partnership therefore hold good both actually and virtually, with respect to each individual of them.

A person erecting a building, &c., in the highway incurs a fine for any person.—If a person erect a building in the public highway, as before mentioned, and it happen to fall upon and destroy any one, a fine is due from the Akilas of the person in question; because he as the occasion of the destruction, and was guilty of a transgression in having erected a building such a situation and a person who occasions a destruction is responsible where he has in any respect transgressed, as in the case of digging a well in the highroad. The same rule also obtains where the building falls upon and thus destroys a man or an animal.

(Or number of persons) it may occasion the destruction of.—If a man stumble over the ruins of such building, and fall upon another man, and they both die, the person who erected it is responsible for both, and nothing is due from him who fell upon the other; for as the builder was the primary cause of the accident, the case is therefore the same as if he had struck the person who fell, and so caused him to fall upon the other, and they had both died consequently.

Case of death occasioned by the fall of a spout.—If a water-spout, set out from a house over the public road, fall upon any person, and kill him, an examination must be made to discover which part of the spout it was that hit the person; and if it appear that he was struck by the end next the house from which it had projected, no atonement is due from the person who set it up, because with respect to that part he is not a transgressor, since he had placed that in his own property; but if it appear that the deceased was struck by the projecting end, the person who set it up is responsible, because with respect to that part he is a transgressor, as having caused the spout to project over the road without any necessity, since he might to as good purpose have fixed it up as not to project over the road at all.—

(It is to be observed that in this instance expiation is not incumbent on the fixed up of the spout;—nor is he excluded from inheritance; for he is not actual perpetrator, but stands merely guilty of homicide by an intermediate cause.)—If, on the other hand, it appear that the deceased was struck by both ends of the spout, the fixer-up is responsible for an half of the fine, and the other half drops; in the same manner as where a person is wounded by another, and also by a lion or tiger, and dies,—in which case an half only of the fine is due from the wouder. If it cannot be discovered which part of the spout struck the deceased, in this case also an half of the fine is due; for the accident may have happened in either of two ways, in one of which the complete fine is due, and in the other nothing whatever; and therefore, in contemplation of both circumstances, an half is imposed.

A person having fixed up a nuisance upon his house, is responsible for any damage it may occasion even after he has sold the house.

—If a person construct a balcony, projecting from his house, and then sell the house, and the balcony afterwards fall upon any person and destroy him,—or, if a person set up a piece of timber in the middle of the highway, and afterwards sell it, and delivery it to the purchaser, and he [the purchaser] declare him acquitted of all accidents which may happen from it, and leave it there until it fall and kill some person,—the seller is responsible in both instances, and nothing whatever falls upon the purchaser; because the act of the seller (in constructing the balcony, or setting up the timber) is not done away by the extinction of his property; and as such act occasions responsibility, he is responsible accordingly and not the purchaser, who has not done any act to occasion responsibility.

A person laying fire in the highway is responsible for any thing which may be burnt in consequence.—If a person, lay fire in the highway, and any thing be burnt in consequence, he as having transgressed, is responsible for the damage. If, however, after the fire being thus laid in the highway, the wind should blow it to another place, and any thing be burnt in consequence, he is not responsible, as by the wind carrying off the fire his act is done away. Some, indeed, say that if the fire was laid in the highway at a time when the wind was high, he is responsible; because he laid the fire there, notwithstanding his knowledge of the probable consequence; and therefore the act of the wind, in carrying it off, is in effect the same as if he had himself carried it to the place which was burnt.

Workmen constructing a nuisance are responsible for any accident it may occasion before their work be finished.—If a person hire workmen for the purpose of constructing a balcony, or a penthouse, and such balcony or penthouse fall upon and kill a man before the workmen had finished it, the responsibility falls entirely upon the workmen; for the deceased was destroyed in consequence of their act; and so long as they continue engaged in the work, the balcony or penthouse is not held to be delivered to their employer. Their act is therefore construed into homicide, insomuch that they must perform an expiation for it. Besides, as their employer did not hire them to kill any person, but to construct an erection, the accident has therefore no relation to the contract of hire, but attaches to the workmen alone, whence the damage also attaches solely to them, as being a consequence of their act.

If, on the contrary, the balcony or penthouse in question fall after the work is finished, the owner of the house is responsible, on a favourable construction; for in this case the contract of hire has been completely fulfilled, insomuch that the workmen have become entitled to their wages. Their act has therefore devolved upon their employer, who consequently stands in the same predicament as if he had himself performed the work; and he is responsible accordingly.

A person is responsible for any accident occasioned by his throwing water in the highway.—If a person spill water on the highway, either purposely, or by performing his ablutions there, and a man or animal perish in consequence, a fine for the man is due from the person’s Akias, or a compensation for the animal from the person himself; because he has been guilty of a transgression, injurious in its consequences to the passengers upon the road. It is otherwise here water is spilled in a closed lane by one of the inhabitants, and a man or animal perishes in consequence; or, where an inhabitant of such a lane sets down any thing in the middle of it, and a man or animal falls over the same, and so perishes; for in none of these cases does responsibility attach to him, as any inhabitant of a closed lane is entitled, in virtue of his residence, to perform these acts in such lane, in the same manner as in a partnership house. Lawyers remark that what is here advanced applies only to a case where water is spilled upon the road in large quantities, such as commonly renders the footing insecure; but that if the water be only in a small quantity, and not in a degree to endanger the passenger, there is no responsibility.

Unless the person who sustained the damage had wilfully passed over such water.—If a person knowingly and wilfully pass over a road in which water has been spilled, as above, and perish in consequence of falling in it, nothing whatever is incurred by the person who split the water, since here the deceased has perished from his own wilfulness or obstinacy. Some, however, remark that this rule obtains only where the water is spilled over a part of the road, for in that case a part remains unaffected by it; whereas, if it extend over the whole road, the passengers have no option; and (as they further observe) the same distinction holds with respect to timbers, or other nuisances, set up in the highway.

The person who directs water to be sprinkled in the road is responsible for accidents.—If a shopkeeper desire a person to sprinkle water in the front of his shop, and another person fall there, and die in consequence, the responsibility rests upon him who gave the order (the shopkeeper), on a favourable construction (and so likewise, if a shopkeeper hire a workman, erect a stall or other erection in the front of his shop, and after it is finished a person fall over it and die)—because the order given by the shopkeeper is of a lawful nature, his right to the precincts in front of his shop being superior to that of any other person; and therefore the act of the person whom he directed must be referred to himself. It is otherwise where a person orders another to throw water, or erect an edifice on the middle of the highway; for in this case the responsibility rests upon him who obeyed the order, as an order to this effect is unlawful, the man who gave the order possessing no superior right in the highway.

Case of a person digging a well or laying a stone, in the highway.—If a person dig a well, or lay a stone, in the middle of the highway, and a man perish in consequence, a fine is due from the Akilas of the person who placed such nuisance there. If, on the contrary, an animal were thus to perish, the compensation for the same would be due from the property of the person in question; because, as has been guilty of a transgression, he is therefore responsible for any accidents it may occasion; and as the Akilas are not implicated except in offences against the person, it follows that, in cases of property merely, the responsibility rests solely upon the offender himself.

The throwing dirt, or digging a hole, in the highway is the same as placing a stone there. —The throwing of dirt or earth in the highway, or the carrying away of earth thence, so as to occasion an hollow, is the same as placing there a stone or log of wood, for the reasons already explained. It is otherwise where a person merely sweeps the road; for in this case he is not responsible to responsibility, as his act of sweeping does not occasion any nuisance, but rather the contrary. If, however, this person leave an heap of the sweepings in the road, so as to occasion accidents, he is responsible, since in acting thus he is guilty of a transgression.

The remover of a nuisance to another spot incurs responsibility for any accident it may afterwards occasion.—I a person lay a stone in the highway, and a second 'person remove the stone to another part of the road, and a man be thereby destroyed, the responsibility rests upon the remover of the stone; because the act of the original depositor is abrogated in its effect, by the place which he had occupied with the stone being cleared, and another place being occupied with it by the act of the remover,—who is therefore responsible for the consequence.

There is no responsibility for accidents occasioned by a sewer constructed in the highway by public authority.—It is related in the Jama Saghur, that if a person construct a common sewer in the public highways, by the order or compulsion of the Sultan, he is not responsible for consequences; because, in constructing the sewer, he has not committed any transgression, for in so doing he acted by order of the Sultan, who possesses a paramount authority with respect to all public rights. It is otherwise where a person does so without such an order; for in that case he is responsible, as having transgressed, in presuming to encroach upon the public rights without a sufficient authority:—besides, acts with respect to the highway are permitted under a condition of safety,—that is, under the condition that they be not injurious. It is to be observed that this distinction holds in all cases of acts with respect to the highway, as the same reasoning equally applies to every other instance.

A person digging a well in his own land is not responsible for any death it may occasion. —If a person dig a well in his own land, and another be killed by falling into it, the digger of the well, is not responsible, as he has not transgressed; and the same rule also hold where a person digs a well within the precincts of his house, a man being entitled so to do, for the purposes of domestic convenience. Some say that this rule with respect to a well dug in the precincts of a house holds only in cases where the householder has either a property in such precincts, or possesses a right, by immunity, of digging therein:—but that where the precinct is public, or held in partnership (as in the case of a court or closed lane), the digger is responsible, since in digging the well under such circumstances he is guilty of a transgression.—This is approved.

A person falling into a well and there dying of hunger, does not occasion responsibility.—If a person dig a well or pit in the highway, and another happen to fall in, and there perish of hunger, the digger is not responsible, according to Hanifs, because the deceased has himself died of hunger, and not in consequence of the excavation, as he death cannot be attributed to the latter unless he be killed by the fall, which is not the case in this instance.

Workmen employed to dig a well in another's land are not responsible for accidents unless they be aware of the trespass—
If a person hire workmen to dig a well the precincts of his neighbour's habitations and they dig it accordingly, and a man be killed by falling into it, the responsibility rests upon the employer, not upon the workmen, provided they dig the well under the idea of the place being within the precincts of their employer: because, as a contract to hire, ignorantly engaged in, is lawful and valid in appearance, their act is therefore referred to the hirer, they themselves having proceeded under a deception—the case being, in fact, the same as where a person desires another to play "such a goat," and he does so accordingly, and it afterwards appears that the goat was the property of another,—in which case the compensation is paid by the person who gave the order. It is otherwise where the workmen dig the well, knowing, at the same time, that the place is not within the precincts of the employer; for in this case they are responsible; because the contract is not here valid in appearance, as they have not been deceived.

The builder of a private bridge, &c., is not responsible for any life which may be lost in passing over it.—If a person construct a bridge, or lay a plank, in the highway [over a stream] without authority, and another, wilfully passing over such bridge or plank, fall off and perish, still the person in question is not responsible; because, although he be the creator of the same, and therefore the transgressor, yet as the deceased was a wilful agent* and transgressed in his own act, his destruction is therefore referred to himself; and also, because where the act of one who has an option intervenes, it precludes the reference of the destruction to the first agent; as where (for instance) a person digs a well in the highway, and another gives a man a push, and thereby causes him to fall into the well, so that he dies,—in which case the responsibility rests upon the person who gave the push, since his act, being the act of a wilful agent, precludes a reference of the destruction to the digger of the well.

A porter is responsible for accidents occasioned by his load.—If a person be carrying a load upon the highway, and the load fall upon any person so as to kill him, or fall in the road so as to cause a person to stumble and thereby occasion his death, the responsibility rests upon the carrier;—whereas, if a person be wearing a cloak upon the highway, and it fall upon any person, or upon the road so as to occasion death, the carrier of the cloak is not responsible. The difference between these two cases is, that as the business of the carrier is to take care of his parcel or load, the circumstance of restricting his liberty of carrying it to the condition of safety does not operate as a hardship upon him;—whereas, the business of the wearer is not merely the taking care of his garment, but the wearing of it; and therefore, as the restricting his liberty of wearing a cloak would operate as a hardship, its use is not restricted to any particular conditions, but is allowed to him generally.

A stranger hanging up a lamp, or strewing gravel, &c. in a mosque, is responsible for any accidents which may arise therefrom.—If a person hang up a lamp, or spread a carpet, or strew gravel in a mosque appropriated to any particular tribe or people, and any person perish in consequence, notings is incurreu, provided the person who hung up the lamp, or so forth, be one of that people;—whereas, if a stranger do any of these acts, he is responsible. In the same manner, if one of the people of a mosque sit in that mosque, and any person perish in consequence, he is not responsible, provided he be, at the time engaged in prayer: but if be engaged in reading the Koran, or teaching, or be waiting for the time of prayer, or sleeping (either during prayer or at any other time), or conversing, he is responsible. The reason for the law in the former instance is, that as all the regulations of a mosque, such as the appointment of a priest or a supervisor, the opening and shutting of the doors, and so forth, appertain solely to the people who own the mosque belongs, and not to any others, their acts are therefore of a natural nature, and are not restricted to the condition of safety; whereas the acts of all others with respect to it are either transgressive, or permitted under the condition of safety; and a pious intention does not prevent responsibility where the person errs in the manner of his piety. The reason for the law in the second instance is, that a mosque is constructed particularly for the purpose of prayer, to which reading the Koran, teaching, or so forth, are only (as it were) appendages; and as it is indispensable that a distinction be made between the original and the branch, or dependant, the act of prayer (which is the original) is therefore permitted generally, without any restriction to the condition of safety, whereas all other acts or employments are so restricted.

But he is not responsible for accidents occasioned by his own person.—If a stranger to the people of the mosque be at prayers in it, and a person fall over him, and die in consequence, the stranger is no way responsible; because (as has been already observed) a mosque is constructed for the purpose of prayer; and although the right of public prayer appertain solely to the people of that mosque, yet any person is entitled to pray there alone.

Section.

Of buildings which are in danger of falling. The owner of a ruinous wall is responsible for any accident occasioned by it after having received due warning, and requisition to pull it down.—If a wall belonging to any person lean towards the public highway and a person require the owner to pull it down, and call people to witness his requisition, and the owner neglect taking it down until a length it fall and destroy either man or property, the owner is responsible for the damage so occasioned, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that he is not responsible (and such is the doctrine of Shafœi); for he has neither perpetrated the destruction himself, nor done any thing transgressively to occasion it, as he built the wall in his own right, and its tottering, or the wind shaking it, were not his acts, whence the case is the same in effect as if the wall had fallen previous to the requisition and calling of witnesses, as aforesaid. The reasons, however, for a more favourable construction of the law in this particular are twofold.—First, upon a wall leaning over towards the highway, the public communication becomes interrupted, and the way occupied by the property of the owner of that wall. When, therefore, any person makes application to him, and requires him to clear the way, it is incumbent on him so to do; and he is consequently guilty of a transgression in neglecting it, and therefore remains responsible for any damage it may occasion;—in the same manner as where a man finds his garment upon another, and demands it of him; in which case, if that other refuse to deliver it, he is guilty of a transgression, and is consequently responsible for the garment if it should be lost whilst in his possession.—Secondly, if the owner of the wall were not made responsible for any damage its falling might occasion, he would neglect to remove the nuisance, and consequently passersby would sustain an injury, as they would be deterred from going by the place, for fear of the wall falling on them. The removal, moreover, of any thing injurious to the community is a duty incumbent upon the person to whom it belongs; and as the owner of the wall is the person immediately concerned in the present instance, it is therefore incumbent on him to take it down, notwithstanding his so doing may be prejudicial to himself, since private interest must yield to public benefit. It is requisite, however, that such a time be allowed as may admit of the owner taking down his wall, this being indispensable to the establishment of offence from neglect or delay. If (after the requisition for pulling it down,) any person be destroyed by the wall falling, a fine is due from the Akilas of the owner, not from the owner himself; for as the offence, in this instance, is still short of homicide by misadventure, an alleviation is admitted a fortiori lest the owner should suffer too severely:—but if, on the contrary, property (such as an animal, or household goods) be destroyed, the compensation for it must be paid by the owner of the wall, as the Akilas are not implicated in the responsibility for property. It is to be observed that the application (that is, the requisition for pulling down the wall) is a condition of responsibility, but not the taking to witness; for the latter is called in aid merely with a view to establish the former, in case of the owner of the wall denying it, and is therefore used only out of caution. The application is made by the claim at saying to the owner of the wall, "Your wall has become dangerous;—you must therefore take it down lest it prove destructive;" and the taking to witness is effected by his saying to the bystanders, "be ye witnesses that I have required this person to take down his wall."—It is proper, however, to remark that the taking to witness before a wall has become ruinous or crooked is not valid, as transgression cannot established previous thereto.

A person building a crooked wall is responsible for the damage occasioned by its falling.—If a person build a wall in the highway, leaning over from the first, lawyers remark that he is responsible for any thing which may be destroyed by its falling, independent of the requisition before mentioned, as having been guilty of a transgression in the building of it, in the same manner as a person who constructs a balcony or gallery projecting over the highway. The requisition is established upon the evidence of one man and two women.—The evidence of one man and two women suffices to establish the application above described for it is not here requisite, as in cases of murder, that both the witnesses be males, the death occasioned by the falling of a wall not amounting to murder.

A Zimme, may make it, as well as a Mussulman.—A Mussulman and a Zimme are upon an equal footing with respect to the requisition for pulling down the wall, as all mankind are partners in the right of passing along. The application is therefore valid, by whomsoever it be made,—whether a man, a woman, a free man, a Mokatib, a slave (provided his master give him permission to litigate the point), or an infant (with permission to litigate from his guardian).—It is also valid whether made by the Sultan or any other: for as the application affects a matter of right in which all are equally concerned, all are therefore equally entitled to make it.

Or the inhabitants of a neighbouring house.—If a wall lean over towards a neighbouring house, the owner of the house is entitled to require it to be pulled down,—or the tenants whether they be hirers or borrowers,—for to such persons in particular the right appertains in this instance.

And if those last grant a term of delay, it is valid.—If the owner or tenants of the house grant the owner of the wall a term of delay, or exempt him from responsibility for any damage which may be occasioned by it, it is lawful, and the owner of the wall is not responsible in case of any thing being destroyed by its fall, because the right of the owner or tenant alone is concerned. It is otherwise where a wall leans over a road, and the magistrate, or the person who made the requisition for pulling it down, grants a term of delay, or an exemption; for this is not valid; and the owner of the wall consequently still remains responsible in case of its falling and destroying anything: because here the right of every one is concerned; and the magistrate, or the person who made the requisition, is not at liberty to annul a right of the public.

A person selling a ruinous house, after requisition, is not responsible for any accidents it may occasion,—If, after application, a person sell a house, the wall of which leans over, and the purchaser take possession of it, and any thing be then destroyed by its falling, there is no responsibility whatever upon either party.—The seller is not responsible, as offence cannot be established in him unless it appeared that he neglected to take down the wall, having at the same time ability so to do; and here his ability has terminated with the sale:—neither is the purchaser responsible, because no application has been made to him. But if application be made to the purchaser after the sale, he then becomes responsible, as in that case he possesses the ability of complying with the requisition.

The requisition (to be valid) must be made to a person capable of complying with it.—The application and requisition for pulling down a ruinous wall are valid when made to any one who possesses the power of pulling it down;—but not when made to one who is not possessed of his power, such as a pauper, a trustee, a borrower, or a renter. The application and requisition in question are therefore valid when made to the pauper of a house, as he has it in his power to pull down the wall by redeeming his house. They are also valid with respect to a wall belonging to an infant when made to the infant's parents or guardians; and if, after the requisition, they neglect to pull down the wall, and any thing be destroyed by the fall of it, the compensation falls upon the infant's property, because their act is in effect the act of the infant. They are likewise valid with respect to a Mokatib, as he may be authorized to pull down a wall; and also, with respect to a trading slave, whether indebted or otherwise, for the same reason;—and if, in this last instance, the slave neglect to pull down the wall, and any property be destroyed by the wall falling, the compensation for it rests upon the slave's person:—or, if a man be destroayed, the fine is due from the master's Akilas.

The requisition, made to one of several coparceners, affects that coparcener in particular.—If a ruinous wall be held in coparcenary by several heirs, and a person apply to one of the heirs, requiring him to pull down the wall, the application affects that heir in particular; and accordingly, if any thing be afterwards destroyed by the falling of the wall, the heir who was applied to is responsible in proportion to his share of inheritance; for it was in his power to have remedied the nuisance by referring the matter to the Kuzzo, and representing the circumstance to him, requiring his order to his coparceners (if present) to pull down the wall,—or (if absent) his authority to do so himself.

After a wall falls, it is the duty of the owner to remove the ruins, and failing of this, he is responsible for subsequent accidents.—If a ruinous wall fall upon a man, after application, and destroy him, and another person fall over the corpse, and so perish, the proprietor of the wall incurs nothing for this second person, because the removal of the corpse was incumbent upon the heirs, not upon him. If, on the contrary, another person, after the wall falling, be destroyed by stumbling over a fragment of the ruins, the owner of the wall is responsible, as it is his business to clear the road of all such fragments, since those are his property, and an application with respect to the wall itself is (as it were) an application with respect to the fragments, the intention of it being to clear the highway.

The owner of a ruinous wall is not responsible for accidents occasioned by the fall of any article from it, unless such article belong to him.—If a person make application concerning a wall which leans over towards the highway, and it afterwards fall, throwing down a vase or urn, which had stood upon it, and a man be thereby destroyed, the owner of the wall is responsible, provided the vase or urn was his property, as the freeing the road from it rested upon him. If, on the contrary, the vase or urn be the property of some other, the owner of the wall is not responsible, since the freeing the road from the vase or urn rests upon him to whom it belongs.

CHAPTER III.

OF OFFENCES COMMITTED BY OR UPON ANIMALS.

The rider of an animal is responsible for any damage occasioned by it, which it was in his power to prevent.—The rider of an animal is answerable for any thing which the animal may destroy by treading it down, or by striking it with his head, his fore feet, or his body; but he is not responsible for any thing which the animal may destroy by striking it with his hind foot or his tail.—In short, it is a rule that the right of passing on the highway is allowed to the whole community, under the condition only of safety; for it is the exercise of a privilege in the passenger, with respect to himself in one shape, and with respect to others in another shape, the right of passage being participated among the whole community, —whence it is adjudged to all, under the condition of safety, with a view to the interest of both parties.—It is moreover to be observed, that a restriction to the condition of safety can obtain only in matters where an attention to safety is practicable; for if it were imposed where such attention is impracticable, the exertion of the privilege [of travelling on animals] would be altogether precluded. Now it is possible for a man to guard against the animal he rides treading men or property underfoot, when such is the case, since a person who rides is under no necessity of treading down every thing that lies in his way: but he cannot guard against the animal striking things with his hind feet or tail, since an animal unavoidably uses these parts, in travelling, without any immediate control from its rider. Accordingly he is restricted to the condition of safety in the former instance, but not in the latter.

Any if the stop the animal in the road, he is responsible for all accidents.—If, however, the stop the animal in the highway, he is responsible for any destruction which may be occasioned by a kick of its hind feet, or a stroke of its tail, since it is possible for him to avoid stopping, although it be not in his power to guard the animal from kicking, or so forth; and therefore, as he transgresses in so stopping, he is responsible for any damage which may ensue in consequence.

He is also responsible for any injury sustained from a large stone, thrown up by the animal's hoof.—If an animal's hoof strike upon and throw up gravel or small stones, and a person's eye be put out, or his clothes damaged thereby, the rider is not responsible; whereas, if the animal so throw up a large stone, he is responsible. The reason of this is that in the former case it was impossible to guard against the accident, since an animal cannot move without being liable to it; whereas, in the second instance, it is possible to guard against the accident, since animals may easily be so guided as to avoid large stones. It is to be observed that, in all these cases, a second rider (that is, one who rides behind the first) is in the same predicament as the first, with respect to responsibility.

But not for any accident occasioned by its dung or urine.—If an animal, whilst travelling, discharge its dung or urine on the highway, and any person perish in consequence, the rider is not responsible, since it was impossible to guard against this; and the same rule also holds where the animal stands still whilst discharging its dung or urine, or when the rider stops it for this purpose, since there are several animals which cannot perform these whilst in motion. Unless he had stopped it on the road unnecessarily whilst discharging those. —It, however, the rider have stopped the animal for any other purpose, and it discharge its dung or urine, and any person perish in consequence, he (the rider) is responsible, as in so doing he was guilty of a transgression, since he stopped the animal without any absolute necessity, knowing, at the same time, that this must be injurious to the passengers.

Responsibility attaching to the driver or leader of an animal.—The driver of an animal is responsible for any damage the animal may occasion with either its fore or hind foot, whereas the leader of an animal is responsible for damage occasioned by its fore foot only, not by its hind foot. The compiler of the Records remarks that this is what is said by Kadoorie in his compendium; —and several of our modern doctors coincide in the same opinion; because, as a person who drives an animal before him has a view of his hind feet, it is therefore in his power to avoid accidents from them; whereas, a person who leads an animal behind him, not seeing or having any command over its hind feet, cannot possibly guard against such accidents. Most of our modern doctors, however, are of opinion that as the driver of an animal has no more command over its hind feet than a person who leads it, he therefore is not responsible, any more than the other, for the damage which may be occasioned by them; —and this is approved.

It is written in the Jama Saghoer, that the driver or leader of an animal is responsible in all the instances in which responsibility lies against the rider; for as they (as well as one who rides) occasion the damage by taking the animal to the place where it is committed, their so doing is therefore restricted to the condition of safety, as far as may be practicable, in the same manner as holds with respect to the rider.

Expiation is required from the rider of an animal, —not from the leader or driver.—The rider of an animal is required to perform expiation only where he has happened to tread down a person,—not in any other instance; —but no expiatory act whatever is required from the leader or driver of an animal. The reason of this is that, in the case of treadings down a person, the rider is, in effect, the perpetrator of the homicide, as it is by his weight that the person is destroyed,—the weight of the animal being merely a dependent upon the weight of its rider, since to him the motion of its must be referred, it being the instrument of such motion. It is otherwise with the leader or driver of an animal: for those are only the producers of the intermediate cause, and not the actual perpetrators of the homicide, as their acts did not immediately affect the subject (and the same reasoning holds with respect to the act of the rider in all cases except that of treading down);—and expiation is enjoined, in cases of homicide, only where the offender is the actual perpetrator of the homicide, not where it is effected by an intermediate cause. In the same manner, the rider of an animal is excluded from his succession to the deceased by bequest or inheritance, in case of treading down, but not if the leader or driver, exclusion from bequest or inheritance being restricted to the actual perpetrator.

If there be a rider, as well as leader or driver, responsibility attaches to the former, not to the latter.—If one man ride upon an animal whilst another drives or leads it along; and it treads down a man, some say that no part of the responsibility falls upon the rider or leader; because the rider (as has been already explained) is accounted the actual perpetrator of the homicide, and the leader or driver the producer of the intermediate cause; and the accedent must be referred to the actual perpetrator, rather than to the producer of the cause.—This is approved.

Case of two riders driving against and killing each other.—If two men be riding on two different animals, and rush with violence against each other, so that they both die, the fine for each is due from the Akilas of the other. Shafei and Ziffer maintain that in this case the Akilas of each party owe a half fine only, on account of the other. Each having died as much in consequence of his own act as of that of the other, whence one half of the homicide, on each part, is of no account. The argument of our doctors is, that the death of each party must be referred solely to the act of the other, and not in any degree to his own act, for his act (namely, passing along the highway) is purely of a neutral nature, and an act of such a nature does not admit of the death being referred to it so as to occasion responsibility. It may indeed be objected, that upon this ground the whole of the blood is of no account, and of course that nothing whatever is due from the Akilas on either side;—for as the act of both (namely, passing along the highway) is of a neutral nature, it cannot be made the occasion of responsibility. In reply, however, to this it is to be observed, that although the act of each party, respectively, be of a neutral nature, still it is restricted to the condition of safety; and a neutral act, restricted to the condition of safety, notwithstanding that it be not an occasion of responsibility with respect to the party himself, is nevertheless so with respect to the other party. It is to be observed however, that a complete fine for each rider is due only where they have happened to rush against each other (as above) by misadventure; for where they have done so wilfully, a half fine only is due on account of each. All that is here advanced proceeds on the supposition of the parties being freemen; for if they be both slaves, the blood of each is of no account:—it is not of any account in a case of misadventure; because the offence of a slave effects only his own person, in this way, that his master makes his person over to the avenger of offence, or pays him an attorne- ment in lieu thereof; but in the present instance the persons of both slaves are destroyed in such a manner that the masters have no concern in it; nor have they left any thing in lieu thereof; and hence the blood of each must needs be of no account;—and so likewise in a wilful case; because each of them has perished at the time of his offence, without leaving any thing in lieu of his person, and in such a manner that the masters have no concern in it,—whence the blood of each must needs be of no account in this instance also. If one of the parties be a slave, and the other a freeman, then, in a case of misadventure, the freeman’s Akilas are responsible for the value of the slave, which must be paid to the freeman’s heirs, whose right is extinguished with respect to any thing beyond such value (as if, for instance, the value of the slave were one thousand dirms; in which case the freeman’s heirs would be entitled to take, from his Akilas, one thousand dirms, the remaining nine thousand of the freeman’s fine being remitted);—because, in conformity with the tenets of Hanefia and Mohammed, the value of the slave is due from the freeman’s Akilas as the compensation for his [the slave’s] person, for which the Akilas are responsible; and of this the freeman’s heirs are entitled to possess themselves, because it is an equivalent for the slaves’ right to any thing beyond the value of the slave drops, as the slave has left nothing behind him to answer such excess. If, on the contrary, the parties being a slave and a freeman, rush against each other wilfully, the freeman’s Akilas are accountable only for half the value of the slave (a wilful case only inducing half of the responsibility), which must be paid to the freeman’s heirs; for as, in this instance, a moiety of the fine for the freeman was due from the slave, and he left nothing except the half of his value (as above), they are therefore entitled to possess themselves of the same, and the remainder of the half fine, beyond half the value of the slave, is remitted.

The driver of an animal is responsible for any accident occasioned by its saddle, etc.,

* The fines here (as in all other cases) go to the heirs of each party respectively.
failing off.—Ir a person be driving an animal along, and the animal's saddle or load, or any thing else which may be upon it, fall off, and kill a man, the driver is responsible, as having been guilty of a transgression, in neglecting to secure the load, or so forth, properly upon 'the animal, for if it had been sufficiently secured, it could not have fallen off.

Responsibility in the case of a string of camels.—The person who leads a string of camels is responsible for any thing which they may tread down. If, therefore, the camels tread down a man, the fine for him is due from the leader's Akilas, or, if they tread down property, he is to make compensation for the same; because it was his business to look to the camels, in the same manner as a driver; and, as, where he neglects so to do, he is guilty of transgression, and transgression occasions responsibility, he is responsible accordingly:—but the responsibility for the person rests with this Akilas, and that for the property with himself, as has been already explained. If there be a driver of the string, as well as a leader, the responsibility rests equally with both; because, as the leader of one camel is the leader of the whole, so the driver of one is the driver of the whole, the halter of each being fastened to the one immediately before him. This rule, however, obtains only where the driver is at the end of the whole string; for if he be in the middle, and there lay hold of the halter of one of the camels, he alone is responsible with respect to such damage, as may be occasioned by the camels which come after him; because the leader at the head of the whole cannot be said to lead those, on account of the string being thus interrupted;—but both are equally responsible for any damage occasioned by the camels before him, since he drives those at the same time that he leads the others.

If a person fasten a camel to a string of camels, with the leader's knowledge, and the camel so fastened tread down a man, the fine for him is due from the leader Akilas because it was in his power to have looked after and watched his camels, so as to prevent an additional one being joined to the string; and in neglecting so to do he was guilty of a transgression; which occasions responsibility. Now the homicide, in this instance, is homicide by an intermediate cause; and the fine for it therefore falls upon the Akilas, in the same manner as in a case of homicide by misadventure. But the leader's Akilas are entitled afterwards to reimburse themselves by taking the amount of the fine from the Akilas of the person who fastened the additional camel to the string; because it was by his act that they became subjected to the payment of it; and the only reason by the responsibility did not fall upon them at the first is, that the act of fastening the additional camel was a sort of creation of a cause, whereas the leading of the string is, in the eye of the law, equivalent to the actual commission of the homicide; the destruction having been occasioned by the leading of the string, not by fastening the additional camel; and as the actual perpetration of the homicide is a thing of a more forcible nature than the mere creation of the cause of it, the responsibility consequently first falls upon the Aki las of the leader. Laywers remark that what is here advanced (of the leader's Akilas having recourse to the Aki las of the fastener) applies only to a case where the additional camel was fastened to the string at a time when it was moving forwards; for as in this case, the fastener does, as it were, direct his camel to be led, he therefore implies assumes the responsibility for such damages as it may occasion:—but where the additional camel was fastened to the string at a time when it stood still, and the leader afterwards leads it on, and a man is trodden down by this additional camel, the responsibility rests with the leader's Akilas, who are not entitled, in this case, to reimburse themselves from the Akilas of the fastener, because here the leader appears to have led on the camel of another without the other's concurrence, as he has not signified his consent either expressly or by implication.

A person is responsible for the damage occasioned by hunting his dog at anything.—If a person let slip his dog, and drive him (that is, run after him), and the dog, without stopping, destroy any thing, the responsibility for it rests with the person who let him slip, the act of the dog being attributed to him because of his driving him;—whereas, if a person cast off his hawk, and drive her (as above) and she, without stopping, destroy any thing, the person who cast her off is not responsible.—(The reason of this distinction between a dog and a hawk is, that a quadruped is capable of being set on or driven, whereas a bird is not so,—whence a regard is paid to the driving of the one, but not of the other).

But not unless he drive or encourage the dog.—If, on the contrary, a person let slip his dog without driving him (that is, with out running after him), and he destroy any thing without stopping, the person who let him slip is not responsible; because, as the dog, in this instance, acts from his own option, his act cannot be attributed to the person who let him slip.—It is related as an opinion of Abou Yoosaf that, in all those cases, the person who fast off the hawk or let slip the dog is to be held responsible, out of a regard to the preservation of property. Mohammed also observes, in the Mahboot that where a person lets slip or casts off any animal upon the highway, and the animal, without stopping, kills a man, the responsibility for the same rests upon the person who cast it off, or let it slip, whether he have driven it, or otherwise, the motion of the animal being referred to the person who let him slip, so long as it continues to move on in a straight line;—but that upon the animal turning off to the right or left, the effect of letting it slip terminates,—in other words, the person is no longer responsible in case of any damage;—and the same rule also holds where the animal stops, and then moves on of itself; for if, afterwards, anything be destroyed, there is no responsibility.

Nor where he has let him slip at game.—If a person let slip his dog at game, and the dog destroy anything else, without stopping, yet the person who let him slip is not responsible, provided he did not drive (that is, run after) him; for as hunting is a thing unlimitedly lawful, and is not restricted to the condition of safety (it not being an exertion which can effect any other than the hunter himself), transgression (which is the occasion of responsibility) cannot be established in this instance. If, on the contrary, a person let slip his dog on the highway, and the dog destroy any thing without stopping, compensation must be made by the person who let him slip; because, although the occupancy of the highway be a matter of a neutral nature, still it is restricted to the condition of safety, as being an exertion affecting the community; and the letting slip the dog, being an endangering of the safety of the highway, is therefore a transgression, and consequently induces responsibility.

A man, casting off his animal on the highway, is responsible for any depreciation it may commit.—If a person cast off or set loose an animal on the highway, and the animal move straight on, and then, turning to the right or left, tread down corn, or so forth, the person who cast it loose is responsible; but not if there be more roads than one. If, on the contrary, an animal break loose, and the moving on of its own accord, kill a man, or tread down property, either by day or night, the owner is not responsible; because the Prophet has so ordained; and also, because the fact of the animal cannot, in this case, be attributed to the owner—since he neither cast it off nor drove it.

For the eye of a goat an adequate compensation is due; and for the eye of a labouring animal a fourth of the value.—If a person put out one of the eyes of a goat, he must compensate (not for any determinate part of the whole value, but merely) for the defect thereby occasioned; because, as the only use of a goat is its milk or its flesh, not its labour nothing more can be required than merely the diminution occasioned in its value. For the eye, on the contrary, of an ox, a camel, a dromedary, an ass, or a horse, of whatever description, a compensation must be made of one fourth of the value; because the Prophet has said, "For the eye of every animal except a goat yet must pay a fourth of the value of the animal;"—and also because, as the work of the animal cannot be performed but by means of four eyes (two of the animal, and two of his dirir), the animal may therefore be said to have four eyes,—whence a fourth of his value is due for the loss of one eye.

Cases of damage occasioned by an animal, having a rider on its back.—If a person be riding upon his beast on the highway, and another person strike or goad the beast, without the consent of the rider, so as to cause it to kill a man by kicking, or striking him down, or running over him, the responsibility rests upon the person who so struck or goaded it, not upon the rider; because the former was the instigator of the animal's act, which must therefore be referred to him; and also, because this person is the producer of the cause of the accident (for an animal naturally kicks upon being struck or goaded), and, as such, is guilty of a transgression, having goaded the beast without the rider's consent; and as the rider has not in any respect transgressed, he [the goader] is therefore solely responsible.—If, however, the rider, at the instance of the other person striking or goading the beast, had stopped it in the highway, the responsibility rests upon him and the goader in equal shares, as in this case he also has transgressed, in having stopped the animal upon the road.—If, on the contrary, the beast strike out at the person who goaded or struck him, as above, and he die of the kick, his blood is of no account, as he may be said to have slain himself. If, on the other hand, the beast throw his rider, and kill him, the fine for him is due from the Akilas of the goader or striker, he having transgressed in producing the cause of the accident.

If a person be riding or stopping upon his beast on his own land, and another goad or strike the beast without the rider's consent, and the beast fly out and tread down a man, the responsibility rests upon the person who so goaded or struck it, and not upon the rider, for the reasons before explained.—If, on the other hand, a person be riding upon his beast on the highway, or stopping upon it on his own land, and another goad or strike it by his desire, and it fly out and tread down a man, neither the rider nor the other are in any degree responsible:—the latter is not so; because his act of striking or goading the animal is in such a case tantamount to that of the rider himself;—nor is the former (the rider) so, as he has here authorized an act to which he is perfectly competent, the goading of an animal being equivalent to driving it. But if the rider be moving along the road upon his beast, and another then strike or goad it by his desire, and it tread down a man, both parties are responsible in an equal degree, provided the man was trodden down without the beast making any stop, because, in this case, its motion is referred to both alike.*

* A frivolous discussion, on this point, of considerable length is omitted by the translator.
Wills.

Or being led in hand.—If a man be leading an animal, and another strike it, and it break away from the leader, and commit any damage without stopping, the person who struck it is responsible (and so likewise where the animal was driven by any person, instead of being led); because as the breaking away of the animal was owing to the act of the striker, any accident that may ensue is referred to him.

A person wantonly striking an animal, so as to occasion mischief, is responsible.—If the striker, in the examples here recited, be a slave, he is responsible in his person for any damage which may ensue; or, if he be an infant, the responsibility (for property destroyed, or for any personal injury short of a Mawziha wound) lies against his estate because slaves and infants are liable to be prosecuted for their acts.

And so likewise, a person who sets anything in the highway, which renders the animal mischievous.—If a beast be struck by any thing which a person may have set in the highway—and fly out, and kill a man, the responsibility rests with the person who placed the thing there; for as he transgressed in so doing, the striking is therefore referred to him, the cause being in effect the same if he had himself struck the animal.

OF MAWAHIL, OR THE LEVYING OF FINES.

Definition of terms.—Mawahil is the plural of Makola, signifying a Dogit, or fine of blood; and Akilas are those who pay the fine, which is termed Akil and Mawahil, because it restrains men from shedding blood.—Akil (among a variety of other senses) meaning restraint.

OF WASAYA, OR WILLS.

Definition of the terms used in wills.—Wasaya is the plural of Wasecat.—Wasecat means an endowment with the property of anything after death—as if one person should say to another, “give this article of mine, after my death, to a particular person.”—The thing so given is termed the Moose be his, or legacy;—the person who wills that it be given is denominated the Mawsee, or testator; the person in whose favour the will is made is called the Moosee le hoo, or legatee;—and the person appointed to carry the will into execution is called the Wasee, or executor.

CHAPTER I.

OF WILLS THAT ARE LEGAL, AND WILLS THAT ARE LAUDABLE; AND OF THE RETRACTION OF WILLS.

Wills are lawful and valid.—Wills are lawful, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that they are unlawful; because a bequest signifies an endowment with a thing in a way which occasions such endowment to be referred to a time when the property has become void in the proprietor [the testator]; and as an endowment with reference to a future period (as if a person were to say to another, “I constitute you proprietor of this article on the morrow”), is unlawful, supposing, even, that the donor’s property in the article still continues to exist at that time, it follows that the suspension of the deed to a period when the property is null and void (as at the decease of the party), is unlawful, a fortiori. The reasons, however, for a more favourable construction, in this particular, are twofold.—First, there is an indispensable necessity that man should have the power of making bequests; for man from the delusion of his hopes, is impromptu, and deficient in practice; but when sickness invades him he becomes alarmed, and afraid of death. At that period, therefore, he stands in need of compensating for his deficiencies by means of his property;—and this in such a manner, that if he should die of that illness, his objects (namely, compensation for his deficiencies, and merit in a future state) may be obtained, or, on the other hand, if he should recover, that he may apply the said property to his wants;—and as these objects are attainable by giving a legal validity to wills, they are therefore ordained to be lawful*. Secondly,

* In this place are stated an objection and reply, which the translator has omitted in wills are declared to be lawful in the Koran and the traditions; and all our doctors, moreover, have concurred in this opinion.

To the extent of a third of the testator's property.—If a person make a will in favour of a stranger, to the amount of a third of his property, it is valid, although the heirs of the testator should not be consenting thereto; for it is so recorded in the traditions.

But not to any further extent.—A bequest to any amount exceeding the third of the testator's property is not valid. In proof of this the following tradition is quoted, as delivered by Abe Vekass, "In the year of the conquest of Mecca, being taken so extremely ill that my life was despaired of, the Prophet of God came to pay me a visit of consolation. I told him, that, by the blessing of God having a great estate, but no heirs except one daughter, I wished to know 'if I might dispose of it all by will.' He replied, 'No!' and when I severely interrogated him 'if I might leave two thirds, or one half,' he also replied in the negative;—but when I asked 'if I might leave a third,' he answered, 'Yes, you may leave a third of your property by will; but a third part, to be disposed of by will, is a great portion; and it is better you should leave your heirs rich, than in a state of poverty, which might oblige them to beg of others.'"—Besides, the right of the testator's heirs is connected with his property; for when he is in his last illness he has no further use for it; and as this is the cause of the title to it becoming null and void in him, and vesting in the heirs, their right therefore, at that period, becomes connected with it accordingly. This right, however, is not recognized by the law, with respect to a stranger; to the extent of one third of the estate; in order that the testator may be enabled, by bequeathing a third of his property out of his family, to atone for his past deficiencies, as before mentioned. With respect to the heirs themselves on the contrary, this connexion of right is, recognized to the extent of the whole of the testator's property (whence it is that if a person should dispose of a third of his property to a part of the heirs, it would not be valid); for if no regard were paid to the connexion of their right with the whole of the property, with respect to themselves, so as to legalize the bequeathing a third of it to a part of them, in that case the object of a will (namely, a compensation for deficiencies) might not be attended to, as it is possible that the testator, instead of including the whole of the heirs, might leave the third only to a select part of them; and this would be an injury to the others, and would consequently induce a breach of the ties of kindred, which is unlawful.

Unless by the consent of the heirs.—It is to be observed, however, that although a will, bequeathing more than a third of the testator’s property, be not lawful, yet if the heirs, being arrived at the age of maturity, should give their consent to it after the death of the testator, it then becomes valid; for the objection to its validity is founded merely on a regard to their right, and therefore does not operate any longer, after they themselves agree to forego such right. Their consent, indeed, during the lifetime of the testator, is not regarded; for as this is an assent previous to the establishment of their right, they are therefore at liberty to annul it upon the death of the testator. It is otherwise where the consent is given after that event; for as this is an assent subsequent to the establishment of their right, they are not afterwards at liberty to annul it.

A bequest to an heir is not valid unless confirmed by the other heirs.—Where a person makes a will in favour of part of his heirs, the same rule holds as in the case of bequeathing more than a third to a stranger;—in other words, the deed is not valid, unless the other heirs give their consent to the disposition after the death of the testator; and their consent previous to his death will have no effect. It is to be observed that, in every instance where a will is rendered valid by the consent of the heirs, the legatee derives his property from the testator, not from the heirs. This is the opinion of our doctors. Shafei maintains that he derives his property from the heirs. The opinion of our doctors is approved; for the will of the testator is the occasion of the property, the consent of the heirs being only the removal of a bar; and as the law has regard to the case, not to the removal of a bar, the property is therefore derived from the testator, not from the heirs (whence it is that seisin is not requisite;* for if the property were derived from the heirs, seisin would be requisite; because the transfer of property from a living proprietor, without receiving any thing in return, is in effect a gift, to the establishment of which the seisin of the donee is a necessary condition); in the same manner as where a pauper sells the pawn in which case the ratification of the deed of sale rests entirely on the pauperee, and if he give his consent, the sale is valid, and the purchaser derives his property in the article sold from the pauperee, not from the pauperee.

A bequest to a person from whom the testor

tor had received a mortal wound is not valid, —If a person make a bequest in favour of another from whom he has received a mortal wound, it is not valid; whether the murderer be one of his heirs, or a stranger, or whether he may have wounded him wilfully or by misadventure, provided he be the actual perpetrator of the deed; because it is recorded in the traditions, that "there is no legacy for a murderer;" and also, because, as the person who gave the wound has hastened the death of the testator, he is, by way of punishment, excluded from the benefit of the will, in the same manner as a person under similar circumstances is excluded from inheritance.

And if a legatee slay his testator, the bequest in his favour is void. —So likewise, where a man, having made a bequest in favour of a particular person, is afterwards killed by that person, such bequest is invalid. —If, however, in these cases, the heirs should give their consent, the bequest then becomes valid, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. —Abu Yoesif of a contrary opinion, because the offence of the murderer, which is the cause of the invalidity of the will, still exists. —The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed upon this point are twofold. —First, the defect in the validity of the will; with respect to the murderer, is on account of the right of the heirs; because the advantage of such defect results to them, as in the case of exclusion from inheritance. —Secondly, the defect in the validity of the bequest, as made in favour of the murderer, is owing to the heirs withholding their consent, in the same manner as in the case of a will in favour of part of the heirs; and consequently, as the consent of the remaining heirs, in that instance, establishes the validity of the will, it follow that the consent of the heirs at large must have the same effect in the case in question.

A bequest to a part of the heirs is not valid. —If a man make a bequest in favour of a part of his heirs, it is not valid; because of a traditional saying of the Prophet, "God has allotted to every heir his particular right;" and also, because a will in favour of a part of the heirs is an injury to the rest; and therefore, if it were deemed legal, would induce a breach of the ties of kindred. —Besides, it is said, in the traditions, "a bequest to particular heirs is unjust." —It is to be observed that in judging whether the legatee be an heir, or otherwise, regard is paid to the time of the testator's death, not to the period of making the will; because the efficacy of the will is established after the death of the testator. —The gift of a dying person* is in this respect of the same nature with a legacy, both being the same in effect.

and is therefore executed to the amount of a third of the property.) —If, on the contrary, a dying person make an acknowledgment in favour of a part of his heirs, regard is paid to the time of such acknowledgment; because the acknowledgment of a dying person is an immediate and complete act of his own, and has not any reference to a future period; —and such being the case, it follows that it is not valid in favour of any who were actually heirs at the time of making it, —and that it is valid with respect to such as were not heirs at that time; although they should become so afterwards; —as where, for instance, a person makes an acknowledgment in favour of his child, who is a slave, and the child recovers his freedom before the death of the father; in which case the acknowledgment so made is valid, notwithstanding the child, by the recovery of his freedom, became one of his father's heirs; for as, at the time of the acknowledgment, he was not an heir,* any acknowledgment made in his favour was virtually made in favour of his master, who was a stranger; —and the validity of the acknowledgment being once established, it does not afterwards admit of being annulled from the circumstance of the child's becoming an heir. —It is to be observed, however, that although a bequest in favour of a part of the heirs be not valid, yet it is rendered so by their consent, as was already mentioned. —If, moreover, a part should give their consent, and part withhold it, the bequest then becomes valid in proportion to the amount of the shares of those who consent, and invalid in proportion to the amount of the shares of the others.

Bequests are valid between Mussulmans and Zimmees. —The bequest of a Mussulman in favour of a Zimme or of a Zimme in favour of a Mussulman, is valid, the former, because God has said, in the Koran, "Ye are not prohibited, O believers, from acts of benevolence towards those who subject themselves to you, and refrain from battles and contentions;" —and the latter, because Zimmees, in virtue of their compact with the Mussulmans, are considered in the same light with them in all temporal concerns; and as, on this principle, an intercourse of good offices towards each other is held lawful during life, they are therefore in the same manner permitted to extend beyond the grave. —It is related in the Jami Sagheer that a will in favour of an hostile infidel is not valid, as God has prohibited, in the Koran, the exercise of benevolence towards them.

The acceptance or rejection of them is not determined until after the death of the testator. —The acceptance or rejection of a bequest is not established until after the death of the testator; for as the bequest does not take effect before that event, those cannot be previously regarded.—Hence the acceptance or rejection during the life of the testator has no effect, in the same manner as an acceptance declared before the existence of a contract.—If, therefore, a legatee accept a bequest after the death of the testator, it is valid, notwithstanding he may have rejected it during his lifetime.

* A slave cannot possess any right of inheritance,

"It is laudable to avoid making them where the heirs are poor."—It is preferable and most advisable not to leave legacies, if the heirs be poor, and their particular portions not such as to enrich them; because this manifests benevolence to the heirs, who have a superior claim to it from the relation in which they stand, God having declared, in the Koran, "The exertions of generosity towards relations is more laudable than towards strangers."—Besides, in this an observance of two claims is maintained, namely, that of poverty and consanguinity. If, on the contrary, the heirs be rich or the particular portions assigned to them be such as to enrich them, it is most advisable to leave something short of a third of the estate in legacies, as a legacy to a stranger is an act of charity, whereas the bestowal of the whole upon the heirs is a gift; and the former is more laudable than the latter, being calculated to gain the favour and good will of God. Some have said that in such case the proprietor is under no restraint, but is perfectly at liberty to make a will in favour of strangers, or to suffer the whole to pass to the heirs, as each has its particular merit, the first being an act of generosity, and the second an obedience to the dictates of natural affection.

The legatee becomes proprietor of the legacy by his acceptance of it.—The property of a legatee in a legacy is established by his acceptance of it. Ziffir is of opinion that a legacy is like an inheritance; because the legatee acquired the property by transition from, and succession to the testator, in the same manner as an heir acquires it by succession to and descent from the last possessor; and therefore his acceptance is not necessary towards the establishment of the property, in the same manner as holds in the case of inheritance.—Our doctors, on the contrary, argue that a legacy establishes the property in the legatee de novo, and does not vest by succession and descent as in the case of inheritance (whence it is that a legatee cannot reject the legacy on account of any defect; in other words, if a person, having purchased a slave, for example, should bequeath him to another, and the legatee, after the death of the testator, discover the slave to have some fault or defect, it would no, on this account, be in his power to return him to the seller, as in a similar case, would be entitled to do;—and likewise, that nothing can be returned to a legatee on account of a defect; in other words, if a person should bequeath his whole estate by will, and afterwards sell something belonging to it, and the buyer discover a defect in the same, still he would not have the power of returning it to the legatee, whereas he might to an heir);—and such being the case, it rests, therefore, entirely on his acceptance, as no person can be made proprietor of a thing against his will. Inheritance, on the contrary, is a succession (whence it is that the rules above mentioned have effect in it); and an heir is therefore, as it were, forcibly put in possession of his inheritance, by the especial ordinance of the law, to the validity of it not being suspended on his acceptance or consent.

"Which may be either expressed or implied."—It is to be observed that acceptance in cases of bequest, is of two kinds.—1. Express, which needs not to be explained.—2. Implied, which is where the testator dies without having declared his acceptance or refusal; for this also is an acceptance in effect; because the bequest as rendered complete on the part of the testator by his death (in other words, it cannot be rescinded after that event); and as it was suspended in its effect purely in deference to his right of rejection, it of course falls into his property upon his demise;—in the same manner as is held in a case of salo with a reserve of option to the purchaser; in which instance, if the purchaser die without formally signifying his assent to the sale, it is then regarded as complete, and the article sold is considered as part of his estate.

Bequest by an insolvent person is void.—If a person deeply involved in debt bequeath any legacies, such bequest is unlawful and of no effect; because debts have a preference to bequests, as the discharge of debts is an absolute duty, whereas bequests are gratuitous and voluntary; and that which is most indispensable must be first considered. If, however, the creditors of the deceased relinquish their claims, the bequest is then valid, the obstacle to it being removed, and the legatee being supposed to stand in need of his legacy.

And so likewise by an infant.—Bequest by an infant is not valid. Shafii maintains that it is valid, provided it be made to a discreet and advisable purpose; because Omar confirmed the will of a Yaffai (that is, a boy who has nearly reached the age of maturity); and also, because in the execution of it a degree of advantage results to the infant, inasmuch as he acquires the merit of the deed,—whereas in the annulment of it he is deprived of all advantage. The arguments of our doctors, in support of their opinion upon this point, are two fold.—First, a will is a voluntary act, concerning which an infant has not a capacity of forming a proper judgment. Secondly, the declaration of an infant is not of a binding nature; but if the validity of a bequest by such were admitted, that effect would follow of course.—With regard to the tradition of
A bequest of (or in favour of) a foetus in the womb is valid.—A will in favour of a foetus in the womb, and a will bequeathing a foetus, are both valid, provided the birth happen in less than six months from the date of the will. The ground on which to first case proceeds is, that a legacy is, in a manner, a succession to property; and as a foetus is capable to succeed in the case of inheritance, it is so likewise in the case of a legacy, that being analogous to inheritance. If, however, the legatee should reject the legacy, it is rejected accordingly, as a bequest bears also the sense of an endowment, which may be declined. It is different with inheritance, as that is purely a succession, and is not annulled by the rejection of the heir.—Gift, moreover, differs from bequest, it not being (like bequest) admitted in favour of a foetus; for gift is purely an endowment; and no person can endow a foetus, with any thing. In the other hand, on which the second case proceeds is, that the existence of the foetus is understood at the period of making the will; and as the legacy of things not yet in being (such as the fruit a tree may hereafter yield) is valid, it follows that a legacy of a thing actually existing is valid a fortiori.

A female slave may be bequeathed with the exception of her progeny.—If a person bequeath a female slave, and except the offspring of her womb, both the bequest and the exception are valid. The bequest is valid, because the words “female slave” do not include the offspring. As, however, in the bequest of a female slave, her offspring is included dependently, were the bequest is absolute, it follows that where a slave is bequeathed with an exception of her offspring, such bequest is valid. The exception also is valid; because as it is permitted to bequeath a foetus in the womb, it is also allowable to except it from a legacy; for it is a rule that whatever is in itself capable of being the subject of a deed may also be excepted from that deed; and vice versa. Besides, the acceptance of the legatee is suspended until the death of the testator; and the annulment of the declaration, previous to the acceptance is valid, as in a case of sale for instance.

A bequest is rescinded by the express declaration of the testator; or by any act on his part implying his retraction.—Upon the testator either expressly rescinding his bequest (as if he were to say, “I retract what I had bequeathed”), or performing any act which argues his having rescinded it, retraction is established. It is established, in the former instance, evidently; and so likewise in the latter; for as acts are demonstrative of the inclination as much as express words, they are consequently equivalent thereto.—It is to be observed, that if the testator perform, upon the article he had bequeathed, any act which, when performed on the property of another, is the cause of terminating the right of the pro-

Omar, the term Yaffai, there used, must be understood to mean a person just arrived at the age of maturity, or, “the will of the Yaffai” relates merely to the celebration of his obsequies, which is lawful in the opinion of our doctors. Besides, the annulment of the will is advantageous to the infant, since in allowing his property to pass to the heirs the rights of natural affection are maintained, as before mentioned. With respect to the assertion of Saleeq, that “in the execution of the will an advantage results to the infant,” it may be replied that the point to be attended to, in case of advantage or loss, is the immediate tendency of any act or deed, and not what may eventually result from it; in other words, if the deed itself, in its immediate tendency, produce advantage, the execution of it on account of the infant is preferable; but in the case here considered the deed (that is, the bequest), in its immediate tendency, leads to a loss of property, although eventually the infant have an advantage, the bequest having been made with a view to obtain merit in the eye of God; and since the bequest of the infant, in its immediate tendency, occasions a loss, it is not valid: in the same manner as holds in case of a divorce; in other words, if an infant divorce his wife, or his guardian do so on his behalf, it is not binding, notwithstanding a divorce may on many occasions be attended with advantage,—as where an infant, having a wife who is poor, wishes to divorce her, and marry her sister, who is rich and handsome—In short, bequest by an infant is invalid, according to our doctors; and in the same manner, if an infant should make a will, and die after he had attained to maturity, the will is not valid, as having been made at a time when he was unqualified for such an act; and so likewise, if an infant should say, “It is my will, whenever I reach the age of a third of my father’s age, to be considered as a legacy in favour of a particular person,” the will is not valid; because an infant, being unqualified, is not competent to make a will that shall be deemed valid immediately; or that can be rendered so by being suspended to a future period; in the same manner as he is incapable of divorce or emancipation. It is otherwise with respect to a slave or a Mokatib; for they possess a complete competency, obstructed merely by the right of their master; and therefore all their acts (such as divorce, bequest, or so forth) are perfectly valid if referred to a period when that bar no longer exists; as where a slave (for instance) says “I declare my wife to be divorced whenever I am free.”

Or a Mokatib.—Bequest by a Mokatib is not valid, notwithstanding he leave effects sufficient to discharge his covenanted ransom; because the property of a Mokatib is not a fit subject of gratuitous acts. Some assert that this is according to Haneef; but that the two disciples hold an contrary opinion.
priector (such as the slaughter of a goat, or the flaying, roasting, or boiling of it, the fabrication of a vessel from a piece of copper, the grinding wheat into flour, or the fabrication of a sword from iron),—such act is a retractation of the bequest. If, also, he perform upon it any act creating an addition to the legacy, and this addition be so connected, that the legacy cannot be separately delivered (as where a person bequeaths the flour of wheat, and afterwards mixes it with oil,—or a piece of ground, and afterwards erects a building on it,—or undressed cotton, and afterwards dresses it,—or a piece of cloth, and afterwards lines or covers a gown with it),—such act is a retractation of the bequest. It is otherwise with respect to plastering the wall of a bequeathed house, or undermining the foundation of it; for these acts do not indicate a retractation of the bequest, as they affect the legacy in its dependencies only.

Or which extinguishes his property in the legacy.—Every act or deed which occasions an extinction of the property of the testator is a retractation from his bequest (as where for instance, a testator sells the article he had bequeathed, and afterwards purchases it,—or gives it to some person, and afterwards retracts the gift);—and consequently, the legacy does not go to the legatee after his [the testator's] decease:—because a will can hold good only with respect to the testator's property; and therefore, upon his property being extinguished, the bequest becomes null of course. (It is to be observed that the washing of a bequeathed garment is not a retractation from the bequest; on the contrary, it is rather a confirmation of it, as it is a custom to wash garments before they are given to any person).

The testator's denying his bequest is not a retractation of it.—If a testator deny his bequest, and the legatee produce witnesses to prove it, there is in that case a difference of opinion among our doctors:—for according to Mohammed, this is not a retractation;—whereas Aboo Yoosaf maintains that it is so, because retractation signifies the testator negativing his bequest at the present time; and as the denial is a negative applying both to the present and to the past, it therefore amounts to a retractations a fortiori. The argument of Mohammed is, that the denial of a bequest signifies the putting a negative upon it with respect to the past, of which its being negatived with respect to the present is a consequence; and upon the bequest being proved, by witnesses, to exist at present, the denial is of no effect. Another argument is, that as a retractation implies the former existence of a will, and the present annihilation of it, and denial (on the other hand) disavows both the former and the present existence of it, there is therefore an evident difference between a retractation and a denial; whence the latter ought not to be considered in the light of the former;—and accordingly, denial not being a retractation, if a husband deny his marriage, and the wife bring witnesses to prove it, still a separation does not take place between them.

Nor his declaring it unlawful or usurious.—If a testator declare the will he has made in favour of a particular person to be unlawful or usurious, this is not a retractation, because the specification of it under the description of illegality or usury is a plain proof that the subject of the description (namely, the will) does actually exist. The case would be different if he should declare the will to be null; for that is evidently a retractation; because, as a thing which is null is non-existent, the description of null evinces that the thing so described no longer exists. It is otherwise with the description of unlawful; for that indicates a continuance of the existence, as illegality cannot apply to a nonentity.

Or desiring the execution of it to be deferred.—If a testator should desire that the execution of his will be suspended for some time after his death, this is not a retractation. If, on the contrary, he say "I depart from my will" he is then held to have retracted it.

A bequest to one person is annulled by a subsequent bequest of the same article to another.—If a person say, "I will that a particular slave, which I formerly bequeathed to Zeyd, be given as a legacy to Amroo," in that case a retractation from the first will is established, as the tenor of his speech evidently shows that it was not his intention they should both partake of the legacy. It is otherwise where a person first leaves a particular article to one man, and then leaves the same thing to another;—as if he should say, "I will that this thing be given to Zeyd," and afterwards make a bequest of the same thing in favour of Amroo;—for in that case retractation of the first will does not take place; the subject being capable of division, and the separate sentences bearing that construction.

Unless that other be not than alive.—If a person say, "the slave which I formerly left to Zeyd I now bequeath to Amroo," and at that time Amroo be not alive, the first will, in favour of Zeyd, holds good for that was annulled only on account of the legacy having been completely devised to Amroo; and upon this no longer remaining in force, because of Amroo's death, the first will reverts. —If, on the contrary, Amroo be alive at the time of the bequest in his favour, and afterwards die before the testator, the legacy (the slave) in that case passes to the heirs, both bequests being void,—the first, because of the retractation,—and the last, because of the death of the legatee previous to that of the testator.
CHAPTER II.

CONCERNING THE BEQUEST OF A THIRD OF THE ESTATE.

Case of a person bequeathing two thirds of his property to two persons respectively.—If a person bequeaths a third of his property to one man, and a third to another, and the heirs refuse their consent to the execution of both bequests, one third is in that case divided equally between the two legatees; for where the will exceeds a third of the estate, and the heirs refuse their consent to the execution of the whole, it is then restricted to one third, as has been already explained; and as, in the present instance, the right of the both claimants is equally good and the third is capable of division, it is therefore divided equally between them. Or a third to one and a sixth to the other. —If a man bequeath a third of his property to one person and a sixth to another, and the heirs refuse to confirm the whole, in that case one third of the property is to be divided between the legatees in three equal lots, two to the legatee of the third, and one to the legatee of the sixth; because the bequest does not hold good for any thing beyond one third; and as both the legatees lay their claims on equally good ground, and it is impossible to discharge their demands (namely, a third and a sixth) with one third only, that is therefore shared between them in proportion to their respective claims, in the same manner as is practised with creditors, in discharging the debts of a person who dies insolvent. Here, moreover, the right of one legatee is to a sixth, and that of the other to a third: and as a third is twice the amount of a sixth, the third is therefore divided between the claimants in three shares, two shares going to the one, and one share to the other.

Cases of Mohabat wills.— (*A will by way of Mohabat, on a deathbed, is the same in effect as a bequest of property, and is therefore executed to any amount not exceeding a third of the testator's estate. (Mohabat literally signifies a gift. In the language of the law it means a gift interwoven in some compact or deed, as if a person should sell part of his property to another at an inferior value.)

If a person, having two slaves, one estimated at thirty dirms, and the other at sixty, should on his deathbed will that the slave worth thirty dirms be sold to Zeyd for ten and that the other worth sixty, he sold to Omar for twenty,—in that case Zeyd obtains a Mohabat of twenty dirms, and Omar a Mohabat of forty dirms; and this is what is denominated a will by Mohabat. But if the testator should not be possessed of any other property than these two slaves, and the heirs refuse to ratify the will, in that case the Mohabat is executed only in the proportion of a third. Now the whole of the property is ninety dirms, that being the aggregate value of the two slaves; one third of that therefore (being thirty dirm), is divided into three shares, two of which are given in Mohabat to Omar, and one to Zeyd; that is, the slave worth sixty dirms is sold to Omar for forty, and the other, worth thirty, to Zeyd, for twenty.

If a person, having two slaves one valued at thirty dirms, and the other at sixty, should on his deathbed emancipate both, such manumission is in effect a bequest. If, therefore, the person in question leave no other property than these two slaves, and the heirs refuse their consent to the emancipation, it takes effect in the proportion of one third; that is to say, each of the slaves is rendered free in one third of his value, and must earn the freedom of the remaining two thirds by emancipatory labour.

And bequests of specific sums of money.—If a person bequeath a particular number of dirms without specifying the relative proportion they bear to his estate,—such as a half, a third, a fourth, or the like,—it is valid, but is executed only to the extent of a third of his whole property, unless the heirs be willing to confirm the whole. Thus if a person, having only ninety dirms, should bequeath thirty to Zeyd, and sixty to Omar, and the heirs refuse their assent to it, in that case the sum of two legacies is reduced to thirty dirms, of which Zeyd receives ten and Omar twenty.)

Case of a person bequeathing the whole of his estate to one, and then a third of it to another.—If a person first bequeath the whole of his estate to one man, and then a third of it to another,* and the heirs refuse their assent, in that case one third of his estate is divided into four shares, of which three are given to the legatee of the whole and one to the legatee of the third. This is according to the two disciples. Haneefa alleges that the third of the estate must be divided equally between the two legatees; for in his opinion, when a legacy is extended beyond a third, the excess is of no weight in the determination. The argument of the two disciples is, that the testator has two objects in view; for first, he designs that

* The whole passage within the crochets seems to be an interpolation of Molooees employed in the composition of the Persian version of the Hadaya, as the translator has consulted various Arabic copies, without finding it in any of them. It may possibly have been inserted in some copies of the work in the manner of marginal illustrations, which induced the Molooees to give it a place in the text.

* This supposes the testator, first, to say, "I bequeath the whole of my property to Zeyd" (for instance), and again at some future time, "I bequeath a third of my property to Amroo," each of the legatees shall receive the whole of his legacy; and secondly, that a superiority of the one over the other shall be maintained. Now the attainment of the first of these objects is impossible, because of the right of the heirs, and is, indeed, in itself impracticable; but as there is no bar to the full accomplishment of the second object, the superiority of the one over the other is preserved, in the same manner as in the cases of bequest by Mohabat, or emancipation, or, of legacies of a specific number of dirms. The argument of Haneeufa is, that a will is null and void in whatever degree it may exceed a third of the estate, where the heirs refuse their assent; and cannot on any sort of pretext be executed in that amount, as being repugnant to the ordinance of the Law in this particular. Since, therefore, the will is rendered null in the excess above a third, one object of the testator (namely, to establish a superiority) is also rendered null, as being comprehended in it: in the same manner as a Mohabat is rendered null when interwoven in a contract or sale which is afterwards invalidated; as where, for instance, a person sells, by Mohabat, a slave valued at thirty dirms for twenty, and the sale afterwards becomes void in consequence of the loss of the subject of it previous to the delivery,—in which case the Mohabat also becomes void. It is otherwise in the cases of bequest by Mohabat or emancipation, or of legacies of a specific number of dirms; for there the validity does not rest on the consent of the heirs; it being eventually possible that the bequests may become valid notwithstanding the heirs should refuse to ratify them, by the testator (for instance), after making the bequest, increasing his property to a degree that might render the amount of the bequest no more than equal to, or less than, one third of the whole. Since, therefore, in these cases, the bequest is not in itself null, but rather stands within the possibility of being valid, a regard must consequently be paid, in such instances, to the superiority of one of the parties. It is otherwise in the case here considered; for it is in this instance impossible that the will should be valid, as has been already shown. It is also otherwise where a person bequeaths a particular slave, valued at one thousand dirms, to Zeyd, and another, valued at two thousand dirms, to Bicker, and has himself no other property than these slaves; for although, in this case, there be a possibility that the testator may so increase his property as to render the amount of the two slaves equal to, or less than, a third of the whole, yet Bicker would receive a proportion according to the third, not according to the amount of the legacy (viz. two thousand dirms); because here the right of the legatees is connected with the substance of the slaves, on this ground, that if the slave should be destroyed, the will would be rendered void, notwithstanding the testator might have acquired other property. Hence the apprehension before stated is of no weight in this instance, as the right of the legatee is here connected with the very article with which the right of the heirs has a connexion. In the case, on the contrary, of a legacy of a specific number of dirms, if the property of the testator be destroyed, and be afterwards acquired more, the legacy would be valid, and executed by means of the newly acquired property; whence it is plain that the right of the legatee, in the case of a legacy of a specific number of dirms, is not connected with the substance, and consequently is no annulled on account of its destruction.

The bequest of "a son's portion of inheritance" is void, but not the bequest of an equivalent to it.—If a person bequeath to another "his son's portion of inheritance," such bequest is null; whereas, if he bequeath "an equivalent to his son's portion," such bequest is valid; for the first is a bequest of what is the property of another, whereas the second is merely a bequest of something similar; and the semblance of a thing is different from the thing itself, notwithstanding its rate be determined thereby. Zifer is of opinion that a bequest of the former nature is likewise valid; because at the time of making it the portion belonged evidently to the testator. I reply to this, however, it is to be observed, that the legacy does not take place until after the death of the testator, when the property does not belong to him, and hence his bequest of his son's portion is a bequest of property not his own.

A bequest of "a portion" of the estate is executed to the extent of the smallest portion inheritable from it.—If a person bequeath "a portion of his estate," the legatee is in that case entitled to the smallest portion allotted to any of the heirs,—provided, however, that such portion be not less than a sixth, for then a complete sixth must be given to him; and if it should exceed a sixth, in that case also a sixth is given to him: for he is in no wise to get more than a sixth. A case in which one of the inheritable portions is less than a sixth is where, for instance, a person bequeaths to another "a portion of his estate," and leaves heirs, at his death, a son and a wife,—in which case, although the share of the wife be only an eighth, yet the legatee receives a sixth, and the remainder is then divided between the wife and son (the heirs) according to the ordinances of the Law. A case on the contrary, in which all the inheritable portions exceed a sixth, is where, for instance, a

*In this, and several subsequent examples, the effect depends entirely upon the terms in which the bequest is conceived, and which must therefore be particularly attended to.

—Thus, in the present instance, the testator is supposed to say, "I bequeath to such an one my son's portion of inheritance," and so of the rest.
person makes a bequest in the terms here stated, and dies, leaving heirs a full brother and wife; in which case, although the smallest portion be a fourth, yet the legatee is only entitled to a sixth; and that being paid to him, the remainder is then divided between the brother and wife, agreeably to the ordinances of the law. This is according to Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed are of opinion that the legatee is entitled to the lowest share, whatever be its amount, provided it do not exceed a third; but if it exceed a third, an exact third must be given him, and not more, unless the heirs be consenting thereto. The argument on which they ground this opinion is, that the word Sehm [portion], both in its literal and received sense, means a portion allotted to an heir; and as the smallest share is a matter of certainty, it is therefore adopted as the standard; except where the smallest portion of the whole is a certain sum in which case the bequest is executed in the proportion of a third, as a legacy exceeding a third is not valid, unless confirmed by the heirs. The argument of Haneefa is; that Sehm, according to the interpretation of the law, means a sixth; a legacy of a Sehm having been left in the time of the prophet, who ordained that a sixth of the property of the testator should be given to the legatee. In its literal sense, moreover, it bears the same meaning, because Ayass, a man skilled in the Arabic language, who was Kazee of Baghad, declared that Sehm literally signified a sixth. Since, therefore, Sehm, both in the practice of the law, and the literal signification, means a sixth, the legatees in cases of this kind is always entitled to it, and to no more.—(Several lawyers, however, remark, that although this was the received sense of Sehm in those days, yet in our time it means indefinitely, a portion, or part.)

A bequest of "part of the estate" undefined, may be construed to apply to any part. —If a person bequeath "part of his property" to another without specifying to what amount, the heirs are at liberty to give whatever they please to the legatee; for here the amount of the bequest is unknown; but as the uncertainty with respect to that is no bar to its validity, it is therefore valid; and such being the case, and the heirs being the representatives of the testator, it is consequently at their discretion to fix the amount, in the same manner as the testator himself might do if he were living.

Case of a person bequeathing first a sixth, and then a third, to the same person.—If a person bequeath "a third of his property" to another, and afterwards, either before the same or another company, bequeath "a sixth of his property" to the same person, in that case the legatee is entitled only to the sixth. (The proofs, in this instance, are drawn from the Arabic).

A person bequeathing a third of any particular property, is two-thirds of it to be lost and the remainder come within a third of the testator's estate, the legatee is entitled to the whole of such remainder.—If a person bequeath to another "a third of his dirms," amounting in all to three thousand, or "a third of his goats," amounting in all to three, and afterwards two-thirds of the dirms or goats be lost or destroyed, so that only one-third remains, and the remaining third do not amount to a third of the whole of the testator's property (he having been in possession of other things besides the dirms or goats), the legatee is entitled to the complete remaining third; that is, to a thousand dirms in the first case, or a thousand goat in the second. Ziffer maintains that the legatee is entitled only to one third of what remains,—that is, in the first instance to one third of one thousand dirms, and in the second to the third of the value of the goat; because the heirs and the legatee having had proportionate claims to the whole in an indefinite manner, are to participate in the loss according to the proportion of their claims;—in the same manner as holds where the effects are of different kinds, such as a gown, a slave, and a house; for if "one of these three" be bequeathed to a particular person in an indefinite manner, and two of them be afterwards destroyed, the remaining one is divided between the heirs and the legatee; and so likewise in the present instance. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that it is possible completely to maintain the right of one of two partners (such as the legatee, in the present instance) in one of three articles, where they are all of the same class (whence it is that the holder of a partnership property may be compelled, if it be of a homogeneous nature, to make a division of it among the partners; the division, with respect to any unique and specific article, being the right of each partner respectively)—and as the bequest precedes the right of the heirs,* the right of the legatee is therefore completely maintained with respect to the thousand dirms in question,—the case being in fact the same as where a person bequeaths another three dirms, two of which are afterwards lost,—when the remaining dirm goes completely to the legatee, according to all our doctors. It is otherwise where the effect bequeathed are of different kinds; for there, after the loss or destruction of two of the articles, neither the complete right of the whole, nor the complete particular right of any one of the parties, can be maintained by means of the remaining article; and therefore the division is not set aside in favour of the legatee on account of the priority of his claim; on the contrary, the remaining article is divided among the parties, according to the nature of their respective claims.

A bequest of "the third of" an article part of which is afterwards destroyed, holds with respect to a third of the remainder.—If a person bequeath to another "a third of his clothing," of which two thirds are afterwards destroyed, and the remaining third exceed in value a third of the whole property of the testator, the legatee is in that case entitled to only one third of the vestments that remain. Lawyers, however, have observed that this is only where the vestments are of different kinds; for otherwise they are considered in the same light as dirms;—and so likewise of all articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, as it is possible, in those also, to maintain complete the right of particular partners to particular portions, whereas it is that a division of such among partners may be compelled.

If a person bequeath to another "the third of his three slaves," and two of them afterwards die, the legatee is entitled only to a third of the value of the remaining slave; and the same rule also holds with respect to different houses. Some say that this is according to Haneefa only; and others, that it is the opinion of all our doctors. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that it is approved, proceeding upon the general rule before stated, that, in all articles which admit of the rights of the partners being united in them, it is practicable to unite the right of the legatee.

A legacy must be paid in full with the property, in hand, although all the rest of the estate should be expended in debts.

—If a person who dies, partly of ready money, and partly of debts due to him from others, bequeath to another one thousand dirms, and that sum exceed not a third of the existent property, it is paid to the legatee without any deduction. If, on the contrary, it exceed a third of the ready property, he is only to receive a third of the amount in hand; and afterwards a third must be paid him, of whatever sums may occasionally be recovered by the heirs, until in this manner the amount of the legacy be completely discharged. The reason of this is that the legatee is (as it were) a partner with the heirs; and therefore, if his claim in particular were discharge with the ready property (by its being applied to the payment of the whole of his legacy), an injury would be occasioned to the right of the heirs, as ready money is allowed to be preferable to money that is due.

A legacy left to two persons, one of them being at the time dead, goes entire to the living legatee.—If a person leave a third of his property, "to Zeyd and Omar," and Omar be at that time dead, the whole of the third is given to Zeyd, whether the testator, at the time of making the will, have been acquainted with the death of Omar or not; for as a defunct is not capable of becoming a legatee, he therefore cannot prevent a living person from being so;—in the same manner as where, for instance, a person bequeathed something "to Zeyd and to a wall." According to one tradition from Abbo Yoonaf it is said, that if the testator were not acquainted with the death of Omar, Zeyd is then entitled only to one half of the third; for on such a supposition the will in favour of Omar was valid in the opinion of the testator; which sufficiently indicates his will and intention to have been that Zeyd should receive only one half of the third. But it, on the other hand, he was acquainted with the circumstance of Omar's death it is evident that he intended that Zeyd should receive the whole, as a will in favour of a dead man is vain and useless.

A legacy being bequeathed to two persons indefinitely, if one of them die, a moiety of it only goes to the other.—If a person will that one third of his property "be divided, as a legacy, between Zeyd and Omar," and Omar be at that time dead, Zeyd is entitled to only one half of the third; for the words used by the testator clearly denote his intention that each should have an half; but Omar being at that time dead, the will with respect to him is void.

A bequest made by a poor man is of force if he afterwards become rich.—If a person who is poor bequeath to another "the third of his property," and afterwards become rich, the legatee is in that case entitled to a third of his estate, to whatever amount; for the bequest does not take effect until after the death of the testator, and therefore the condition of its validity is, his being possessed of property at the time of his decease. The law is also the same in case the testator, being rich at the time of making the will, should afterwards become poor, and again acquire wealth.

A bequest of any article, not existing in the possession or disposal of the testator as his decease, is null.—If a person bequeath "a third of his goats" to another, and it happen either that he has no goats, or that such as he had were destroyed before his death, the bequest is null; for the condition or its validity is, the testator being possessed of the property at the time of his decease, which is not here the case. If, on the contrary, having no goats at the time of making the will, he should afterwards acquire goats, so as to leave some at his death, it is evident that he gave a legacy to Zeyd (according to Abuayat Sahceh); for here the condition of validity (namely, that the testator die possessed of the property) exists.

Unless it was referred to his property, in which case it must be discharged by a payment of the value.—If a person bequeath "a goat of his property" to Zeyd, and afterwards die without leaving any goats, th
price of a goat must in that case be paid to Zeyd; for the testator's expression "a goat of his property" denotes his intention to bequeath the worth of the animal. If, on the contrary, he neither bequeath "a goat of his property," nor "one of his goats," but simply "a goat" (to Zeyd), without any relation to his property or herd of goats, in that case there is a difference of opinion, some saying that the bequest is not valid, as the absolute expression of the testator denotes his intention to have been a legacy of the animal itself, of which he had none, whilst others maintain it to be valid, for this reason, that the testator having specified a goat, of which he had none, must be supposed to have intended the worth of it. If, on the other hand, the words of the testator were, "I bequeath one of my goats," in that case the bequest is evidently invalid; because the relation to his herd of goats determines the legacy to have been restricted to the animal itself. (A variety of cases of this nature occur, and are determined on the principle now stated.)

Distribution of a bequest made indefinitely to three different descriptions of persons.—If a person bequeath "a third of his property to his Am-Walids, to the distressed, and to beggars," and the Am-Walids amount to three in all,—in that case, according to the two Elders, a third of his property is, after his death, divided into five shares, of which three are given equally among the Am-Walids, one to the distressed, and one to beggars. Mohammed, on the contrary, says that it is to be divided into seven shares, of which three are distributed in equal portions among the Am-Walids, two given to the distressed, and two to beggars.

Or, to an individual, and a particular class of people.—If a person bequeath "a third of his property to a certain person and to the distressed," in that case, according to the two Elders, the third is divided into two equal parts, one of which is given to the person named, and the other to the distressed; whereas Mohammed maintains, that it must be divided into three shares, one to be given to the said person, and two to the distressed.

Or to a particular class of people alone.—If a person bequeath "a third of his property to the distressed," the two Elders are of opinion that the executor may in that case give the whole of the third to one distressed person; whereas Mohammed holds that it cannot be given to fewer than two.

Case of a third person being admitted, by the testator, to a participation with two other legatees.—If a person bequeath one hundred dirms to Zeyd, and one hundred to Amroo, and afterwards declare Bicker to be a participant with them, by saying, "I have made three Bicker a sharer with Zeyd and Omar," Bicker is in that case entitled to a third of each of their portions, in order that he may be put on an equality, as the words of the testator evidently imply that intention, for the term used by him (Shirkot) literally means equality which it is here possible to preserve, and there is no impracticability in the execution of the bequest. It is otherwise, where the portions of the legatees are unequal, as if the legacy of Zeyd were four hundred dirms and that of Omar two hundred, and Bicker were declared by the testator to be a sharer with them; for in that case the establishment of an equality is impracticable, and therefore Bicker is entitled to receive a moiety of each of their shares, that they may be brought as nearly on an equality as possible.

An acknowledgment of debt, upon a deathbed, is sufficient to the extent of a third of the estate. If a person, on his deathbed, say be his heirs, "I am indebted to Zeyd, and you must credit what he says," in that case the claim of Zeyd, to any amount not exceeding a third of the estate, must be admitted, although the heirs should falsify it. This proceeds on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that the declaration of Zeyd is not to be credited; for although an acknowledgment concerning a thing undefined be approved, still its effect depends upon the ascertaining of it; and as that cannot be had, because of the death of the acknowledger, it would follow that the declaration of Zeyd is of no weight. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction, in this particular, is, that the object of the acknowledger is evidently to give Zeyd a preference over his heirs; and it being possible to execute his design in the way of a bequest, and men being (moreover) desirous of discharging themselves of obligations where they may know of the debt itself, but are uncertain as to the amount (as having forgotten it), the acknowledgment is therefore considered equivalent to a bequest of which the amount is left to the determination of the legatee,—whence the matter is regarded in the same light as if the acknowledger had said to his heirs, "If Zeyd come and claim any thing from you on my behalf, pay him the same, to whatever amount,"—which declaration would be recognized and complied with, to the amount of one third of the estate; and the acknowledgment being thus equivalent to a bequest, the declaration of Zeyd must be credited to the amount of one third of the acknowledger's estate, and no more. If, therefore, besides the acknowledgment in question, the dying person had made various bequests in favour of others, one third of his estate must be set apart for the legatees, and two thirds for the heirs, when both parties must be required "to verify the declaration of Zeyd to such extent as they may think proper." Now, if both parties acknowledge... that there is something owing to Zeyd, it is evident that there rests a debt upon the estate affecting the shares of each respectively; and accordingly, a deduction is made from the legatees, to the amount of one third of what they acknowledge to be owing to Zeyd, and from the heirs, to the amount of two thirds of what they have so acknowledged, in order that the acknowledgment of each party may be carried into execution in proportion to his right in the whole estate. If Zeyd should claim still more than what falls to him in virtue of this acknowledgment of the parties, each party [the heirs and legatees] must be respectively required to make oath, to the best of their knowledge, or, in other words to this effect, that "they do not know of any more being due to Zeyd;"—for they cannot be required to swear positively, as their oath regards a matter between the claimant and the acknowledger merely, and in which they are not principals.

A joint bequest to an heir, and a stranger is executed in favour of the latter only, to the extent of one half. If a person bequeath any article jointly to one of his heirs and a stranger, in this case the bequest in favour of the heir is not admitted, and a moiety only of the legacy is given to the stranger; because, as an heir possesses the capacity of being a legatee, he therefore obstructs the stranger in the title which he would otherwise have to the complete legacy. It is not so where a legacy is left between one person living and another dead, for here the whole goes to the living legatee, since as a dead person is incapable of succeeding to a bequest, there is no obstruction in this instance.

And so likewise a joint bequest to the murderer of the testator and a stranger.—If a person make a will jointly in favour of his murderer and a stranger, in that case the murderer is not entitled to any thing and the stranger receives only a moiety of the legacy, for the reason assigned in the foregoing case, to wit, that the murderer (like an heir) possesses the capacity of being a legatee, and therefore obstructs the stranger's title to the whole, as there stated. It is otherwise where a person, on his deathbed, makes a declaration of any specific thing or sum due by him to one of his heirs and a stranger jointly; for there the declaration is invalid as well with respect to the stranger as the heir. The reason of this distinction is, that a will or bequest is an indication of endowment; and as, by it, a joint concern is established between the two legatees, the bequest is therefore valid with respect to him, of the two, who is not under a legal incapacity, namely, the stranger;—whereas a declaration or acknowledgment is an announcement of the right of the parties in whose favour it is made, referred to a past time, under the description of joint concern, a thing which cannot be established; for the establishment of it with respect to the stranger only, independent of the description of joint concern, is contrary to the tenor of the dying person's declaration; and the establishment of it (on the other hand) in the manner of joint concern, occasions the establishment of a declaratory in favour of an heir, upon a deathbed, which is unlawful.

Any accident occasioning uncertainty with respect to the legatee annuls the will.—If a person bequeath three garments of different prices, leaving the best to Zeyd, the next in value to Omar, and the worst to Bicker, and one of these garments be afterwards lost without its being known which of them it was, and the heirs of the testator declare, to each legatee in particular, that "his share is lost," the bequest is null in toto, as it is in this case uncertain who are the legatees, and such uncertainty occasions an annulment of the will, since the Kazee cannot pass a decree concerning a thing unknown. If, on the contrary, the heirs make over the two remaining garments to the legatees, the bequest is not null, but still continues in force, and those two garments are divided among them, by two thirds of the best being given to Zeyd, two thirds of the worst to Bicker, and the remaining third of each to Omar.

Bequest of an apartment in a partnership house.—If Zeyd bequeath to Omar a specific apartment of a house held in partnership between him and Bicker, it is requisite that a partition be made of the house; and then, if the apartment so bequeathed should fall within the share of Zeyd, it must be given to Omar as his legacy, according to the two Elders; whereas, according to Mohammed, he is entitled only to one half of it. If, on the other hand, the apartment so bequeathed should not fall within the share of Zeyd, then, according to the two Elders, a number of cubits equal to the size of the bequeathed apartment must be given to Omar from the share of Zeyd, whereas, according to Mohammed, he is entitled only to half that number. The argument of Mohammed is that in this case the testator has bequeathed partly his own property, and partly the property of another, inasmuch as the house was shared equally between him and Bicker in all its parts. The bequest, therefore, takes effect with respect to the former, but remains suspended with respect to the latter; and if, upon the partition (which is a species of exchange), the apartment fall within the share of Zeyd, still that part of the bequest which had remained suspended does not take effect, any more than where a person bequeathes to another some article which does not belong to him, and afterwards purchases that article. Where, moreover, upon a partition of the house, the apartment in question falls to the share of the testator, his bequest takes effect with respect to the actual legacy, namely, an half of the apartment; whereas if, on the contrary, it falls to the lot of Bicker, Amroc (the legatee) is to receive from the share of Zeyd, a number of yards equivalent to half the apartment: because, upon the actual legacy failing the bequest must be executed by means of the consideration received in exchange for it; in the same manner as where a person bequeaths a slave who is afterwards killed; in which case the legacy must be executed from the compensation received for his blood (contrary to where the slave is sold; for in this case the bequest has no connexion with the price received, but is completely annulled by the sale; whereas a bequest is not annulled by a partition, as that is also a species of separation of property).—The argument of the two Elders is, that the testator has certainly meant to bequeath an article in which his property may be firmly and solidly established by means of partition; for his apparent object is to bequeath an article which in every respect may be productive of use; and that can be accomplished only by partition, as the use of a thing of which the property is shared in common with another is defective. Where, therefore, the apartment bequeathed, upon a partition being made, falls to the share of Zeyd, and his property in it is firmly established in toto, his bequest of it takes complete effect. With respect to what is urged by Mohammed, that "partition is a sort of exchange," it may be replied that the quality of exchange, in partition, is merely secondary, the original design of partition being, that each may enjoy the complete use of his own share (whence it is that the parties may be compelled to a partition of it); according to which original design the apartment may be said to have been in the possession of Zeyd from the beginning. Where, on the other hand, it falls to the share of Bicker, in that case the bequest of Zeyd takes effect from the share allotted to him, to the quantity of cubits of the whole apartment; because that quantity is the consideration for the apartment, as has been already stated:—or, because the bequest must be thus construed, that the testator, by the apartment, merely meant a sum of measurement equivalent thereto, in order that his design may be answered as for as the nature of the case admits;:*—or else, because the testator may have meant that the apartment should go to Omar, provided it fell to his share upon a partition, or otherwise a sum of measurement equivalent to it;—this case being analogous to that of a man suspending the freedom of a child born of his female slave, and the divorce of his wife, upon the circumstance of his female slave bearing the child (by saying, "upon my female slave being delivered of her first-born child, such child is free and my wife divorced"); which is construed to mean any child, to produce the divorce, and a living child to produce the emancipation.—‡ It is to be observed that where the apartment does not fall to the share of Zeyd, if the extent of the whole house be one hundred cubits, and that of the apartment ten, Mahommed in that case is of opinion that the share of Zeyd is to be divided into ten parts, of which nine must be given to the heirs, and one to Omar;—whereas the two Elders, hold that the share of Zeyd is to be divided into five parts, of which one must be given to Omar, and four to the testator's heirs. (With respect to what is mentioned in the Hodaya, that [according to the two Elders] "the share of the testator is divided into eleven parts, of which two are given to Omar and nine to the heirs," it is a mistake, for this mode of division obtains only in cases of declaration or acknowledgment.) It is here proper to remark that if a acknowledgment be made under the same circumstances as are here stated, as if Zeyd should declare an apartment of the extent of ten cubits, in a house of one hundred cubits, which he possessed in common with another to be the property of Omar, some say that in this case also a difference of opinion obtains between the two Elders and Mahommed; whilst others maintain that there is no difference of doctrine in this point, Mahommed also holding (in common with the two Elders) that in case the said apartment fall to the share of Zeyd, it goes complete to the acknowledgee [the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made], or otherwise, that the share of the acknowledgee is divided into eleven parts, of which two are given to the acknowledgee and nine to the acknowledgee. The reason of this last adjustment is that the acknowledgee here makes his given to Omar when it falls to the share of Zeyd?"

* The incapacity of an heir to succeed to a legacy does not arise from any natural or original defect in him, but is occasioned solely by the ordinance of the law in this particular, which suspends it upon the consent of his co-heirs.

"REPLY.—The apartment in question is made the legacy, where it falls to the share of Zeyd, for this reason, that in thus settling the matter a regard is paid to the two chief distinguishing circumstances of the case, namely, the quantity or sum [of the thing bequeathed], and the investiture [of the legatee] with the actual apartment:—and as, where the apartment falls to the lot of Bicker, it is impossible to pay attention to both circumstances, it accordingly in that case suffices to pay attention to the first."
The validity of a bequest of money belonging to another rests upon the proprietor's consent.—If a person bequeath a thousand dirms that belong to another, the execution of the bequest rests entirely on the consent of the proprietor, and it is optional in him to confirm it, or not, as he pleases. If he, therefore, after the death of the testator, give his consent, the bequest is valid, and the money paid to the legatee accordingly. This consent, however, is purely voluntary and gratuitous; whence, if, after having signified it, the person refuse to pay the money, it is lawful.

An heir, after partition of the estate, acknowledging a bequest in favour of another must pay the acknowledged legatee his proportion of such bequest.—If two sons make a partition of their father's estate, and one of them then declare that "his father had bequeathed a third of his property to Zeyd," he [the declarer] must in that case make over a third of his portion to Zeyd. This proceeds upon a favourable construction. Mohammed, on the contrary, maintains that the declarer is to make over the half of his portion to Zeyd (and such is what analogy would suggest) because when this son made the declaration that Zeyd was entitled to a third, he then in fact declared Zeyd to be entitled to as much as himself, whence it is requisite that he make over a moiety of his portion to him, in order that both may be placed on an equality. The reason, however, for a more favourable construction in this particular is, that the son has here made a declaration, in favour of Zeyd, of one third, affecting the whole estate indefinitely; and as the whole estate has gone in two portions, each falling to each son respectively, it follows that the son has made his declaration in favour of Zeyd with respect only to a third of his own portion.

* There being here a considerable deviation from the original text, and also some confusion in the subject (owing to the quantity of extraneous matter introduced by the Persian commentators, the translator thinks it his duty to give the whole passage here rally; from p. 682 to p. 683, as stated in the Arabic copy.—" here the apartment falls to the other partner, not the testator, the house measuring one hundred cubits, and the apartment ten cubits, the testator's share is divided into ten lots, nine for the heirs, and one for the legatee.—This is according to Mohammed; for he supposes the legatee to multiply a moiety of the apartment by five (the number of cubits it measures), and the heirs the half of the remainder of the house by forty-five; and thus the whole will compose five lots [of ten cubits], which makes ten [lots of five cubits].—But according to the two [Kilders] it is divided into eleven lots; (since they suppose the legatee to multiply by ten, and the heirs by forty-five; and thus the whole composes eleven lots two for the legatee, and nine for the heirs.—If declaration [acknowledgment] be put in the place of bequest, it is said there is a difference of opinion,—but it is also said that there is no difference on the part of Mohammed,—the only difference, according to him, being that an acknowledgment affecting the property of another is valid,—insomuch that he who makes an acknowledgment concerning property possessed by another in favour of a different person, and afterwards obtains possession of the same, must be directed to give it up to the acknowledgment;—whereas a bequest affecting the property of another is null; insomuch that if the testator should by any means afterwards became possessed of that property, and then die, still his bequest does not pass [is of no effect].
be short of the third, the residue must be made up to him from the value of the child. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that in this case the legatee is to receive to the amount of a third of the property from both the mother and child, in proportion to their respective values. Thus if the value of the mother be three hundred dirms, that of the child the same, and the other effects amount to six hundred dirms, the whole forms an estate of one thousand two hundred dirms, of which a third is four hundred. Now Haneefa holds that in this case the female slave must be made over to the legatee in payment of three hundred dirms, and he also receives one hundred deducted from the value of the child;—whereas the two disciples maintain that he is entitled to a deduction of two thirds from the value of each. The argument of the two disciples is, that the child is virilishly included in the bequest, from its being (as it were) a dependent on the original subject of it, and that, therefore the bequest must be executed proportionally from both, without preference or distinction.—The argument of Haneefa is, that the mother is the original subject of the bequest, and the child only a dependent; and the dependent cannot obstruct the original. If, moreover, the bequest were executed equally from both, it induces this consequence, that a part of the legacy is split off from the original subject, which is unlawful. All that is here advanced proceeds on a supposition of the birth of the child happening prior to the partition, and the acceptance of the legatee; for if it should take place afterwards, the child incontestibly belongs to him, as being the offspring of his property; for his right in the slave was fully and completely established by the partition.

Section.

Of the Period of Making Wills.

Gratuitous acts, of immediate operation, if executed upon a death bed, take effect to the extent of one third of the property only.—It is to be observed, as a general rule, that where a person performs, with his property, any gratuitous deed, of immediate operation (that is, not restricted to his death), if he be in health at the time, such deed is valid to the extent of all his property—or, if he be sick,* it takes effect to the extent of one third of his property; and where a person performs such deed, with his property, restricted to the circumstance of his decease, it takes effect to the extent of a third of his property, whether, at the time, he be sick or in health. If, on the contrary, a person makes an acknowledgment of debt, such acknowledgment is of effect to the whole extent of his property, notwithstanding it be made during sickness, as this is not a gratuitous deed. Still, however, a declaration of this nature, made in health, precedes a declaration of the same nature made in sickness. It is also to be remarked, that a sickness of which a person afterwards recovers is considered, in Law, as health.*

An acknowledgment on a death bed is valid in favour of a person who afterwards becomes an heir; but not a bequest or gift.—If a sick person make an acknowledgment of debt in favour of a strange woman, or make a bequest in her favour, or bestow a gift upon her, and afterwards marry her and then die, the acknowledgment is valid; but the bequest or gift is void; for the nullity of an acknowledgment in favour of an heir depends on the person having been an heir at the time of making it, whereas the nullity of a bequest in favour of an heir depends on the legatee being so at the time of the testator's death, as has been already explained; and as the woman was not an heir at the time of the acknowledgment, but had become so [by marriage] at the time of the testator's death, the acknowledgment is therefore valid, but the bequest is void; and so likewise the gift, it being subject to the same rule as the bequest.

Neither is an acknowledgment so made valid, if the principle of inheritance had existed in the person previous to the deed.—If a sick person make an acknowledgment of debt due by him to his son, or make a bequest in his favour or bestow a gift upon him, at a time when the son was a Christian, and he [the son] afterwards, previous to his father's death, become a Mussulman, all those deeds of acknowledgment, gift, or bequest, are void: the bequest and the gift, because of the son being an heir at the death of his father, as above explained; and the acknowledgment, because although the son, on account of the bar (namely difference of religion), was not an heir at the time of making it, still the cause of inheritance (namely consanguinity) did then exist, which throws an imputation on the father, as it engenders a suspicion that he may have made a false declaration, in order, to secure the descent of part of his fortune to his son. It is different in the case of marriage, as above stated; for there the cause of inheritance (namely, marriage), occurred posterior to the acknowledgment, and it had no existence previous thereto; for supposing the marriage to have existed at the period of making the acknowledgment, and that the wife, being then a Christian, should after—

* Arab. Marez.—This term (as has been already observed) literally means sick. In the language of the Law, however, it is always used to signify a dying person,—that is, "sick of a mortal illness;" and in that sense it is invariably to be understood throughout this book.

* This passage has no place in the Arabic copy. It has been introduced in the Persian version as a premiss necessary to the completely understanding of what follows.
wards, before the husband's death, become a Mussulman, in that case it (the acknowledgment) would not be valid.

Such acknowledgment, gift or bequest, in favour of a son, being a slave, who afterwards becomes free previous to the father's decease, is nevertheless void.—If a sick person make an acknowledgment of debt due by him to his son, who is an absolute slave or Mokatab,—or bestows gift upon him, or make a bequest in his favour, and the son should afterwards, before the death of his father, obtain his liberty, in that case none of these deeds are valid, because of the reasons explained in the preceding example. It is related, in the Mabsoot, under the head of Acknowledgments, that "the acknowledgment of a sick person in favour of his son who is a slave is valid, provided the slave be not in debt; for in that case the acknowledgment is, in effect, in favour of the master, who is a stranger; and an acknowledgment in favour of a stranger is valid; whereas, if the slave was indebted in debt, his father's acknowledgment in his favour would not be valid, as in such case it could not be construed to be in favour of the master, since an indebted slave is the proprietor of his own acquisitions."—The bequest is, however, invalid, because to establish it regard must be paid to the time of the testator's death, and the son is at that time an heir, as being then free. With respect, indeed, to the gift, it is said to be valid,* provided the slave be not indebted; because a gift is an immediate transfer and investiture; and as the son is at that period a slave, the gift is in effect in favour of the master, but if he be involved in debt the gift is invalid, as in that case he is master of his own acquisitions, and a gift is considered as such. According to the more commonly received authorities, however, the gift is void on either supposition; for as a gift during a mortal illness is equivalent to a bequest, it is therefore invalid, in the same manner as a bequest would be which was made in favour of the same person.

Rule for ascertaining a deathbed illness.—Paralytic, gouty, or consumptive persons, where their disorder has continued for a length of time, and they are in no immediate danger of death, do not fall under the description of sick [Mareez], whence deeds of gift, executed by such, take effect to the extent of their whole property; because, when a long time has elapsed, the patient has become familiarized to his disease, which is not then accounted as sickness. (The length of time requisite, by its lapse, to do away the idea of sickness in those cases is determined at one year; and if after that time the invalid should become bedridden, he is then accounted as one recently sick.) If, therefore, any of the sick persons thus described make a gift in the beginning of their illness, or after they are bedridden, such gift takes effect from the third of their property, because at such a time there is apprehension of death (whence medicine is then administered to them), and therefore the disorder is then considered as a deathbed illness.

CHAPTER III.

OF EMANCIPATION UPON A DEATHBED; AND OF WILLS RELATIVE TO EMANCIPATION.

Emancipation, gift, and acts of Mohabat, on a deathbed, take effect to the extent of a third of the property.—If a person, on his deathbed, emancipate a slave, or give a portion of his property to another, or make a Mohabat,* in purchase or sale, by buying an article at an over-value, or selling it at an under-value, or paying the dower, hire, or so forth,—or become security for another all these deeds are considered in the light of a bequest, and take effect to the extent of a third of his estate.

Case of a Mohabat, and an emancipation by the same person.—If a sick [dying] person make a Mohabat [of any kind], † and then emancipate his slave, and [after his death] the third of his property suffice not for both, in that case Haneeфа is of opinion that the Mohabat has the preference;—in other words, if, after executing the Mohabat, any part of the third remain, the slave is, without recompense, free in that proportion, and must perform emancipatory labour for the remainder of his value,—or for his full value, if nothing remain.—If, on the contrary, the person first emancipate the slave, and then make the Mohabat, the slave, and the person in whose favour the Mohabat is made, are upon a perfect equality, and each takes from the third of the estate in proportion to his right:—as, for instance,

* Mohabat literally signifies connivance.—Thus, a purchaser or seller who gives more, or takes less, for an article than its real value, connives at the loss.—This term, therefore, is not confined to sale, but extends to every act in which the person connives at his own loss, such as (in the case of dower) paying the wife more than she is entitled to, or (in a case of hire) paying the hirer more than he had agreed for.—The translator preserves the original term, as it is purely technical.—The Arabic text expresses this passage with great brevity: "Whoso frees his slave in sickness, or sells, or connives, or gives, it is lawful, and recognized to the extent of a third of his property." † That is, "execute any contract, or perform any act, by which he sustains a wilful loss."

* Probably meaning "in the Mabsoot."
the slave is emancipated from the third of the estate in the proportion of his value, and performs emancipatory labour for the remainder,—and the person in whose favour the Mohabat is made takes in the proportion of his Mohabat, and makes good the remainder.—The two disciples maintain that the emancipation has the preference in both cases, for it is the stronger, inasmuch as it does not admit of retraction. Haneefa on the contrary, maintains that Mohabat is the stronger, as being interwoven in a compact of exchange: contrary to emancipation, for in that there is no exchange. If, therefore, the Mohabat be first made, it sets aside the emancipation, because of the comparative weakness thereof;—whereas, if the emancipation be first made, it obstructs the Mohabat, because of its priority, but still does not set it aside, as emancipation is incapable of setting aside a Mohabat;—whence, in this instance, both are placed upon a footing. Accordingly, therefore, to this difference of opinion, if a person be possessed of two slaves, one valued at two hundred dirms, and the other at one hundred, and first sell the former by a Mohabat sale, for one hundred dirms, and afterwards emancipate the latter and die, leaving no other property, in that case, according to Haneefa, the Mohabat is executed in full, and the other slave is required to perform emancipatory labour to the full amount of his value;—whereas if, on the contrary, the emancipation precede the Mohabat, then a third of the value of both slaves, amounting to one hundred dirms, is divided equally between both parties (that is, between the emancipated slave and the person in whose favour the Mohabat was made); and accordingly, a moiety of the slave is emancipated without any consideration, and he is to perform emancipatory labour for fifty dirms more, being the remaining half of his value;—and fifty dirms are deducted, in the manner of a Mohabat, from the slave sold by Mohabat, and his price then one hundred and fifty dirms, for which the purchaser is accountable:—but the two disciples maintain that the slave is completely free in both instances. In the same manner, if a person, upon his deathbed, first sell a slave by Mohabat, then emancipate a second, and afterwards sell a third by Mohabat, and have no other property besides these three slaves, in that case, according to Haneefa, the half of the third of the property must be allowed to the person in whose favour the Mohabat was first made, and the remaining half of the third is equally divided between the emancipated slave and the one in whose favour the last Mohabat was made;—whereas, had he first emancipated one, then sold the second by Mohabat, and afterwards emancipated the third, in that case one third of the estate would be divided into two equal shares, of which one would be given to the person, in whose favour the Mohabat sale was made, and the other equally divided between the two emancipated slaves:—but the two disciples maintain that in both cases the emancipation is to be preferred.

Mohabat or emancipation precede, in their execution, the actual bequests.—It is to be observed, as a standing rule,* that where a person bequeaths several legacies, and the third of his property suffices for the payment of the whole, they are all carried into execution without a preference being given to either. But if, besides these legacies, he should in his last illness emancipate a slave, or direct the emancipation to take place after his death, or sell something by Mohabat,—in that case both kinds of emancipation, as well as the Mohabat, are preferred to the legacies, and must therefore be first executed from the third of the estate, and the remainder (if there be any) is then divided equally among the legatees.

The appropriation of a sum, by bequest, to the emancipation of a slave is annulled by the subsequent loss or failure of any part of it; but not the appropriation of a sum to the performance of a pilgrimage.—If a person, on his deathbed, set aside one hundred dirms, and will that "after his death the said sum be applied to the emancipation of a slave," and one dirm of the number happen to be lost, in that case Haneefa maintains that the will is annulled, and that the remaining ninety-nine dirms cannot be applied to the purpose of emancipating a slave. If, on the contrary, the person will that "the said sum be appropriated to defray the expense of a pilgrimage to Mecca," in that case the loss or destruction of one dirm does not invalidate the will, but the remaining ninety-nine dirms are applied to the purpose prescribed by the testator, by deputing a person from such a distance as may enable him to reach Mecca by means of the said sum (if also, in this last case, part of the sum have been lost or destroyed, and theretofore after the slave's return the pilgrim, it must be restored to the heirs.) The two disciples maintain that the will is valid in the former instance likewise, and the ninety-nine dirms applied to the emancipation of a slave, in the same manner as (in the other instance to the performance of the pilgrimage; the argument of Haneefa, is that, in the former instance, the will direct the emancipation of a slave valued at one hundred dirms; and therefore, if it were executed with ninety-nine dirms, it would take effect in favour of a person different from the intended legatee, which is not lawful. It is otherwise with a bequest concerning pilgrimage, as pilgrimage is purely a religious duty, and religious duties appertain exclusively to God; and as God therefore is the legatee in this instance, a diminution of the sum does not induce an execution of the will in favour of any other than the legatee, since a pilgrimage for

* Arab. Asl; literally, a root; meaning (in this place) a principle or ground of decision in all parallel cases.
ninety-nine dirms is performed on behalf of God, as much as a pilgrimage for one hundred dirms. Some have observed that this difference of opinion between Haneefas and the two disciples is founded on the different sentiments they entertain with respect to the emancipation of a slave; the two disciples holding it to be a religious act, in the same manner as the performance of a pilgrimage and having considered it as an act in favour of the slave alone. (The compiler of the Hadaya remarks that this last opinion is approved.)

A slave exceeding a third of the property, emancipated on a deathbed, is exempted from emancipatory labour by the heirs assisting to his freedom.—If a person during his last illness emancipate a slave valued at one hundred dirms, and die, leaving two sons and one hundred dirms, and the emancipated slave and his heirs give their consent to the emancipation, the slave is not required to perform any emancipatory service whatever, but is free without doing; for although the manumission was equivalent to a bequest in the proportion beyond a third of the emancipator’s property, yet it is valid on the heirs assisting to it.

A bequest of emancipation, in favour of a slave, is annulled by his being made over in compensation for an offence committed by him.—If a person will that “his heirs emancipate his slave at his decease,” and the slave, after the death of the testator, commit an offence, and the heir surrender him, as a compensation, to the avenger of offence, the will is void; because the surrender of him in compensation for the offence is approved; for as the right of the testator must yield to that of the avenger of offence, the right of the legatee must consequently yield to it likewise, since a legatee obtains his right in the legacy from the testator; and as, upon the slave being surrendered in compensation for the offence, he passes out of the property of the testator, the will is void of course. If, on the contrary, the heirs prefer paying a redemptionary atonement; the will remains valid, and does not become void (but in this case the redemptionary atonement falls entirely upon their property, as they have themselves undertaken the payment of it); and as the slave, by the payment of the redemption, is purified from the offence, the case is therefore the same as if he had not offended it all, and the will takes effect of course.

Where the heir and the legatee agree concerning a slave having been emancipated by the testator, the allegation of the heir is credited with respect to the date of the deed. —If a person bequeath to another a third of his property, and leave, among his other effects, a slave, and the legatee and heirs agree that the testator had emancipated the slave, but differ with respect to the time of such emancipation (the legatee asserting that it was during his health, and the heirs, on the other hand, maintaining that it was during his sickness), in that case the word of the heirs must be credited, and the legatee is entitled only to what remains after the value of the slave is deducted from the third of the testator’s whole property;* because the legatee here pleads his title to a third of what remains after the emancipation of the slave, since manumission granted during health does not stand as a bequest (whence it is that it takes effect from the whole of the property), and the heirs resist the plea, asserting that the testator had emancipated the slave during sickness; and as manumission during sickness is a species of bequest, and takes place of a bequest of a third of the property, the heirs are therefore negators; and as the assertion of a negator (the defendant), upon oath, must be credited, the legatee is therefore entitled to nothing whatever;—unless there should remain some excess in the third of the property over and above the value of the slave, in which case the legatee is entitled to such excess; or, unless the legatee confines his assertion by evidences, in which case he is entitled to a third of what remains of the whole estate after the emancipation of the slave.

Case of an alleged emancipation and debt, credited by the heirs.—If a person die, leaving no other property except one slave and the slave say so the heirs “your father whilst he was in health, emancipated me,” and another person say to them “your father was indebted to me one hundred dirms,” and the heirs credit both these assertions, (as, for instance, by replying to them together, “you both speak truly”), the slave is, in that case, required to perform emancipatory labour to the full extent of his value, according to Haneefas. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that the slave is emancipated without performing any service whatever, because the proof of the debt and of the emancipation during health are established, jointly, as the heirs have acknowledged both at the same time, and the emancipation of a slave during health does not induce the necessity of labour notwithstanding the emancipator should be involved in debt. The argument of Haneefas is, that the acknowledgment of the debt on the part of the heirs is stronger than that of the emancipation; because the former is valid at whatever period it may have been contracted, and is dischargeable from the whole estate; whereas the latter, if performed during sickness, is limited to a third of the estate; and such being the case, it would follow that the emancipation is utterly annulled. As, however, emancipation, after having been made, does not admit of being absolutely annulled, it is therefore virtually annulled, in this instance, by the imposition of emancipatory labour.—The same difference of opinion subsists in the case where a person, dying, leaves one thousand dirms, and one person asserts that the decease owed him one thousand dirms, and another, that he had deposited one thousand dirms in trust with the deceased, and the heirs confirm both assertions at one and the same time; for in such case the two disciples are of opinion that both claims are upon an equal footing, and the one thousand dirms are therefore to be divided equally between the parties; whereas Hanseeda maintains that the claim of the depositor is the strongest, as his right relates to the identical dirms whilst the creditor has only a general claim on the person.

* Literally, “is entitled to nothing whatever.” The translator renders the passage in a modified sense, because of the reservation afterwards stated.

Section.

Of Bequests for Pious Purposes.*

In the execution of bequests to sundry pious purposes, the ordained duties precede the voluntary.—If a person make several bequests for the performance of sundry religious duties, such as pilgrimage, payers, and so forth, it is requisite to execute first such as are absolutely incumbent and ordained; and this, whether the testator have mentioned them first or not; for the discharge of the ordained duties is of more importance than that of acts which are merely voluntary; and the law therefore supposes that the object of the testator was to begin with the performance of them. Unless all the purposes mentioned be of equal importance, in which case the arrangement of the testator must be followed.—But if the several duties, the objects of the will, be all of the same importance, and of similar force, and the third of the estate suffice not for the discharge of the whole, they must in this case be executed agreeably to the order in which they have been specified by the testator, as it may be inferred that those to which he gave the precedence were, in his opinion, the most urgent. Tahavee maintains that alms are to be executed before pilgrimage. There is also one report from Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect. Another opinion reported from him is, that pilgrimage precedes alms; and such is the opinion of Mohammed. The argument in favour of the first report is, that both are in an equally strong degree enjoined by God; but yet alms, as being connected with the rights of mankind, must be preferred, the right of the individual preceding the right of God.—The argument in support of the second report is, that the performance of pilgrimage, besides the expenditure of money, requires also an exertion of the body; and as this is not the case with alms, pilgrimage has therefore precedence. Either of those, however, is preferable to expiation, because they have been in a greater number of instances, and in a stronger degree enjoined by God.—Again: expiations for murder, for Zihar, and for a broken vow, are preferable to Sauda-fittir (charity given on the day of breaking fast), because these expiations have been enjoined in the Koran, whereas the latter has not. Sauda-fittir, on the other hand, is preferable to sacrifice, because it is an incumbent duty in the opinion of all our doctors, whereas a difference of opinion subsists with respect to the absolute obligation of sacrifice.

As well as where the purposes of the bequests are purely of a voluntary nature.—In the execution of all pious wills, where the objects of them are not incumbent duties (such as the execution of a vow, or a receptacle for travellers, or of a bridge), it is requisite to follow the arrangement of the testator, since it may be inferred that he considered those first mentioned as the most urgent. Lawyers, moreover, have remarked that if a person make several bequests, some for the performance of religious duties immediately enjoined by God, and others for benevolent purposes amongst mankind, in that case a third of his property must be set aside for the execution of them; and whatever may be the share appropriated for the performance of the duties belonging to God, it must be applied agreeably to the order of arrangement, as already explained.—It is to be observed, also, that every different duty is to be considered in the nature of a distinct legacy; for, the object of each being the attainment of the goodwill of the Almighty, every several duty has an object in itself, and each is therefore to be considered in the nature of a legacy left to a different person.

Rules in bequests towards the performance of a pilgrimage.—If a person will that "the pilgrimage incumbent on him be performed on his behalf after his death," in that case the heirs must depute a person for this purpose from the city of the testator, and furnish him with such conveyances and equipments as are suitable to his [the testator's] rank; because, being performed on his account, it must be executed in the same manner as it actually performed by himself. But if the property of the testator be inadequate to the expense of sending a person from his own city, in that case a person must be sent from some other nearer place, the distance of which from Mecca may be proportioned to the amount of the property.

If a person set out from his own city, with an intention of performing the pilgrimage to Mecca, and die on the road, after having willed that the pilgrimage be performed [by others] on his behalf, a person must be deputed for this purpose from the city of the testator, according to Haneefa (and such also is the opinion of Ziffer). The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that a person is to be sent from the place at which the testator had arrived in the prosecution of his intention;—and the same difference of opinion obtains where a person, having undertaken the pilgrimage on account of another, dies in the like manner on the road. The reasoning of the two disciples is, that the performance of a part of the journey, with the intention of having prosecuted the remainder, is in itself an act of piety, which is entitled to merit with God, and which annuls, in a proportionate degree, the obligation of the duty. Hence the pilgrimage is to be recommenced from the place in which he died, and which in effect has become (as it were) his city. It is otherwise where a person, with a view of trading, sets out on a journey to Mecca, and does on the way, after having willed that the pilgrimage be performed on his behalf; for in this case the part of the journey already performed not being an act of piety, there is as evident necessity for sending person from the city of the testator.—The reasoning of Haneefa is, that the will must be construed as meaning a commencement from the city of the testator, in order that the pilgrimage may be completely performed in the manner in which it was originally incumbent on the testator.

CHAPTER IV.

OF WILLS IN FAVOUR OF KINDRED AND OTHER CONNEXIONS.

A bequest to "a neighbour" is in favour of the owner of the next adjoining house.—If a person make a bequest in favour of "his neighbour,"* this according to Haneefa, is a bequest to the person whose house is immediately adjoining to that of the testator. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that it comprehends all the inhabitants of the vicinity, who belong to the same mosque, without any regard to the immediate adjunction of the houses; since, according to the common acceptation of the word, they all fall equally under the description of neighbours. The arguments adduced by Haneefa in support of his opinion upon this point are two fold. First, the person whose house adjoins to that of the testator is in reality the neighbour.

* Specifying the legatee by description only, without mentioning his name; as thus, "I bequeath one thousand dirhms to my neighbour."—In this and the succeeding examples, the effect turns entirely on the terms in which the testator signifies his bequest.

Secondly, the modes and descriptions of neighbourhood are many; and as it would be impracticable to carry the will into execution with respect to the whole, it is therefore necessary to restrict it to him whose title, from the circumstance of adjunction, is the most perfect and indisputable.

And comprehends all competent descriptions of persons.—It is to be observed that the learned in the law are of opinion that every person may be included under this description of neighbours, whether the proprietor of a house or not, or, whether a man or a woman, a Mussulaman or a Zimmeet, the term neighbour being equally applicable to all these. Haneefa also holds that an absolute slave, possessed of a house in the neighbourhood, is entitled to the benefit of the will.—The two disciples hold a different opinion; because, in such case, the benefit of the will would ultimately revert to the master of the slave, who is not supposed to be a neighbour. The argument of Haneefa, is that the term neighbour applies indiscriminately to all.

Rules in bequests to "the As'har" of the testator.—If a person make a bequest in favour of "his As'har,"* all the relations of his wife within the prohibited degrees (such as her father, brother, and so forth) are therein included; and likewise all the relations of his father's wife [his step mother] and of his son's wife [his daughter-in-law] within the prohibited degrees, as these all stand in the relation of As'har to the testator. This explanation of As'har has been followed by Mohammed and Aboo Obeydah. It is to be observed that all the kindred of the wife within the prohibited degrees are included in the bequest, notwithstanding she were, at the time of the death of the testator, in her dower from a reversible divorce. But if the divorce was irreversible, her relations are not to be included, as the existence of that degree of relation entitled As'har depends on the actual existence of the marriage at the time of the testator's death; and by an irreversible divorce marriage is utterly annulled.

And to his Khath.—If a man make a bequest in favour of "his Khath," it is a bequest to the husbands of his female relations within the prohibited degrees; and in it are likewise included all the relations of these husbands within the prohibited degrees, these also falling under the description of Khath.—(Some commentators remark, that this explanation is agreeable to the ancient custom; but that in the present times Khath comprehends only the husbands, as above.)—It is also to be observed that in this respect freemen and slaves, and the near and the distant relations are all upon a footing, because the terms Khath comprehends the whole of these.

* As'har is the plural of Sheral (pronounced, in Arabia, Dehr), which is a general term for all relations by marriage.
And to his Akraba.—If a person make a will in favour of his “relations” [Akraba*], it is executed in favour of the nearest of kin within the prohibited degrees, and falling of them, in favour of the next in proximity, and so on with respect to the rest within the prohibited degrees, in regular succession. The will, in this case, includes one or several persons, but the uncles, mother, or children of the testator are not comprehended in it. This is the opinion of Haneef. According to the two disciples, the will includes only such as are descended from the most distant progenitor of the testator, professing the Mussulman faith.—(Concerning the meaning of “the most distant progenitor professing the faith.” there is a difference of opinion; some maintaining that this applies to the remotest ancestor who actually embraced the faith and others alleging that it extends to the remotest ancestor who may have known of the existence of the faith, although himself may not have acceded to it; as is exemplified in the case of Aboo Talib, who although he understood the Mussulman faith, never embraced it.) The argument of the two disciples is, that the term relations being in general applied all of the same blood, the will therefore extends to all as fall under this description, to whatever degree removed. The arguments of Haneef are that legacies are a species of inheritance; and as, in inheritance, the arrangement here described is observed with respect to the heirs, it is also observed in the payment of legacies.—As, moreover, the plural term [Akraba] mentioned in inheritance means two, so likewise in bequest.† Besides, the object of the testator, in his bequest, is, to compensate for his deficiencies, during life, with respect to the ties of kindred, ‡ which affects only his relations within the prohibited degrees. The parents or children, moreover, are not styled relations [Akraba], insomuch that if a person were to call his father “his relation” [Kareeb], he would be considered as denying his parentage. The reason of this is that, in common usage, by the term relation [Kareeb] is understood one related to a person by means of another; but the relation of parent and child is personal, and not by means of another.—In short, according to Haneef, the will in question is restricted, in its operation, to the prohibited relations of the testator; whereas, according to the two disciples, it extends to [all the descend-

* Akraba is the plural of Kareeb, and signifies (collectively) kindred.

† There is something like a contradiction; for it was before said that “the will includes two or more.” This, however, is not to be taken as excluding any number above two, but merely as comprehending the dual as well as any higher number.

‡ Arab. Silla Rihm.—It is a technical term, comprehending, in its application, the kindred within the prohibited degrees only of] the most distant progenitor professing the faith:—whilst Shafei maintains that it is confined solely to the testator’s father [and his offspring].

If a person, having two paternals and two maternal uncles, make a will in favour of “his relations” [Akraba], it is in favour of the paternal uncles only, accordingly to Haneef, he holding that regard is to be paid to the order of relationship:—whereas, according to the two disciples, all the four uncles are included, they holding that no regard is to be paid to the order of relationship. If, on the other hand, the testator have only one paternal and two maternal uncles, the half of the legacy, in that case, goes to the paternal uncle, and the other half to the two maternal uncles, out of attention to the plural number, which, in bequests, comprehends two (as before observed); for, as, if there were two paternal uncles, the whole legacy would go to them, it follows that where there is one only, he gets no more than an half, and the other half goes to the two maternal uncles. It would be otherwise if the person had expressed his bequest for “his kinsman;” * for in this case the whole legacy would go to the paternal uncle, and nothing whatever to the two maternal uncles; because, as the term kinsman expresses a singular, not a plural number, the paternal uncle therefore takes the whole, he being next of kin.—If (in the case of a bequest to “relations”) the testator have a paternal uncle [and no maternal uncles], he is entitled to no more than a moiety of the third of the estate; for, as if there had been two paternal uncles, they would have had the whole between them, one consequently gets only an half.—If, on the contrary, he have a paternal uncle and aunt, and a maternal uncle and aunt, the legacy goes in equal shares between the paternal uncle and aunt, both being related to the testator within an equal degree of affinity—and their connexion being of a stronger nature than that of the maternal uncle or aunt.—A paternal aunt, moreover, although she be not entitled to inherit, is nevertheless capable of succeeding to a legacy,—in the same manner as holds with respect to a relation who is a slave or an infidel.—It is to be observed that, in all these cases, if the testator have no prohibited relation, the bequest is null, because it is restricted, in its operation, to these within the prohibited degrees, as before noticed.

Or to the Ahl of a particular person.—If a person make a bequest “to the Ahl of such as one,” it is a bequest to the wife of the person mentioned, according to Haneef.

* Arab. Zee-Kirrabat.
† The word Ahl, in its most common acceptation, denotes a people or family, as Ahl Iran, “the people of Persia.”—Ahlnee, “my family.”—(This and several succeeding examples turn entirely upon the meaning of the terms used by the testator.)
The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that the bequest comprehends every individual of the family, entitled to maintenance from that person, such being (with them) the common import of the word. The argument of Haneefas is that Ahl, in its literal sense, signifies a wife, a proof of which is drawn from this sentence of the Koran. "Moses walked with his Ahl" [WILK], (whence also the common mode of expression "such a person made taahul [married] in a particular city "); and as the word Ahl, in its literal sense, means a wife, it follows that whenever it is used absolutely it must be resolved into its literal sense, which is the true one.

(Or of the house of particular person.)—If a person make a bequest "to the Ahl of the house of such an one," the father and grandfather of the person named are included in such bequest, as well as all the descendants from the remotest progenitor, on the paternal side, professing the Mussulman faith; and if a person make a bequest "to the Ahl of such an one," it is a bequest "to the Al of his house," the term Al applying to the tribe from which he descended.

If a person make a bequest "to the Ahl of such a person's Nish [race] or Jins," [generation],—by the former is understood all those descended from his ancestors in general,—but by the latter, those only descended from the paternal stock, not from the maternal, because men are said to be of the generation of their fathers, not of their mothers.—It is otherwise where the term Kirrabat (affinity) is used; for that appertains both to father and mother.

Or to the orphans, blind, lame, or widows, of a particular race.—If a person make a bequest "to the orphans,—the blind,—the lame,—or the widows,—of the race* of such an one," and the individuals of the race name can be enumerated, the bequest includes them all indiscriminately, whether rich or poor, males or females; for the execution of the bequest is practicable in the instance, because of the ascertainment of the legatees.—(It is to be observed that, concerning the exposition of the expression "if they can be enumerated," here is a difference of opinion; for, according to Aboo Yoosaf, this phrase comprehends as many as can be counted without the aid of written calculations" whereas Mohammed holds that it extends no farther than to one hundred, any greater number being considered as beyond enumeration. Some, on the other hand, allege that the determination of this point rests entirely with the Kazee, and decree pass accordingly).—But if the individuals of the race named be incapable of enumeration, the poor only are in that case included in the bequest, not the rich; for it [the bequest] is of a pious nature, and the object of it (namely, by removing the wants of best attainable by removing the wants of the poor. Besides, as the very descriptions used indicate a degree of want and distress in the legatee, it is therefore proper to admit this to have been the testator's meaning. It is otherwise where a person makes a bequest "to the youths (or the virgins) of a particular race," who are innumerable; for in such case the bequest is void; because, as the description used does not indicate want the words of the testator cannot be construed to apply to the poor: neither can the bequest possibly hold valid in favour of all the individuals of the class named, since, as they are not to be enumerated, it is impracticable to define them, and a bequest to unknown legatees is null—for bequest is an act of endowment, and it is impossible to endow persons unknown. It is to be observed that, in the case of bequests "to the poor or distressed," the legacy must be paid to at least two paupers, two being the smallest number of plurality in bequest, as was before stated.

Or to the race of a particular person.—If a person make a bequest "to the race of such on one," in that case, according to the two disciples, and also according to the first opinion of Haneefas, the women of the said race are included, the plural term Binnee extending to females as well as males Haneefa, however, afterwards retracted this opinion, and maintained the males of the race only to be included, not the females; because the term Binnee applies to men literally, but to women only metaphorically; and a word must be taken in its literal not its figurative acceptation. It is otherwise where "the race of such a person" is the proper name of any particular tribe; for in that case the bequest includes the women also, as the term Binnee, in such instance comprehends the females of the tribe along with the males,—in the same manner as the general expression Benni.—Adim [the sons of Adam]—whence the bequest includes the freedment, the sworn confederates [Haleefs], the slaves, and the Mawalat confederates of the tribe named.

Or to the awlad of a particular race.—If a person make a bequest "to the children [awlad] of the race of such an one,"—the males and females have an equal right in such bequest, as the term awlad comprehends the whole.

A bequest to the heirs of a particular person is executed according to the laws of inheritance.—If a person make a bequest "to the heirs of such on one," the legacy is in that case divided among the heirs of the person named, in the manner of inheritance, a male getting as much as two females; because there is reason to imagine that the object of the testator, in using the word heirs, was that the same distinction might be observed in the partition of his legacies as obtains in the case of inheritance.

*Arab. Binnee. It is an irregular plural from Ibn, "a son," and expresses a generation or tribe.
Case of a bequest to "the Mawlas" of the testator.—If a person make a bequest "to his Mawlas," and have some Mawlas who had emancipated him, and others whom he had emancipated, the bequest is void; because the term Mawla partakes of two different meanings, an emancipator, and a freedman, and it cannot be discovered which of these the testator intended. Neither can the intention be construed to comprehend both; because a word bearing a double meaning cannot be used in more than one of its senses at a time; and as it is unknown which sense the testator meant it in, the legatee is therefore uncertain; and any uncertainty concerning the legatee annuls the bequest. (In several of the books of Shafei it is recorded that the bequest is construed in favour of all the Mawlas, both the emancipators and the emancipated, as the term used applies to both.) It is to be observed that where the term Mawla is mentioned, in the bequest, it comprehends every one whom the testator may have actually emancipated, whether in health or in sickness; but not his Modabbbirs or Am-Walids, as their emancipation does not take place until after his death, and his bequest is in favour of such only as are free previous to that event. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that a Modabbir or Am-Walid is also included, because, although these be not free previous to the testator's decease, still as a cause of freedom has been taken place, and is established in them, they may be said to have been emancipated. In this bequest is also included any slave of the testator to whom he may have said, "you are free if I beat you not before my death" (provided he did not afterwards beat him); because the slave is in this case free before the testator's decease, and from the time that his strength and power of beating failed him. If the testator have Mawlas whom he had emancipated, and also the children of those Mawlas, and likewise Mawlas by Mawalat, his freedmen Mawlas and their children are included in the bequest, but not his Mawlas by Mawalat. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that those last are likewise included, and that all those there description equally participate in the bequest, as the term Mawala comprehends the whole. Mohammed argues that Mawla is a term which partakes of two different meanings; but a word of double meaning cannot be used in more than one sense at a time; and as emancipation is an absolute and unrecognizable act, and a contract of Mawalat may be rescinded at pleasure, a Mawla by manumission has precedence of a Mawala by Mawalat, and those are consequently included in preference. But the Mawlas of the testator's Mawlas* are not included in the bequest, which relates only to the Mawlas of the testator, not to those of another. It is otherwise with the children of the testator's Mawlas; for they stand related to the testator because of their freedom proceeding from him. It is also otherwise where the testator has no Mawlas by manumission, nor children of these Mawlas; or in such case the Mawlas by Mawalat are included in the bequest, as the term Mawla applies to those by manumission, literally, and to those by Mawalat, metaphorically; and where the literal sense cannot be followed, the figurative sense may be adopted.

If, in the above case, the testator have only one freedman and several freedmen of his freedman, the half of the legacy goes to the freedman, and the remaining half reverts to the testator's heirs; and there is nothing whatever for the freedmen of his freedman; for the term Mawla applies literally to the freedman of the testator, and figurative to the freedmen of those freedmen; and it is impossible that the word should be meant in two senses, as it cannot bear, at once, a literal and a figurative meaning. Neither are the freedmen of the testator's parents or children included, they not being his freedmen either actually or virtually.

CHAPTER V.
OF USUFRUCTUARY WILLS.

An article bequeathed in usufruct.—If a person bequeath the service of his slave, or the use of his house, either for a definite or an indefinite period, such bequest is valid; because as an endowment with usufruct, either gratuitous or for an equivalent, is valid during life, it is consequently so after death; and also, because men have occasion to make bequests of this nature as well as bequests of actual property. So likewise, if a person bequeath the wages of his slave, or the rent of his house, for a definite or indefinite term, it is valid, for the same reason. Must be consigned to the legatee.—In both cases, moreover, it is necessary to consign over the house or the slave to the legatee provided they do not exceed the third of the property, in order that he may enjoy the wages or service of the slave, or the rent or use of the house during the term prescribed, and afterwards restore it to the heirs.

But if it constitute the sole estate, being a slave, he is possessed by the heirs and legatee alternately, or being a house, it is held among them, in their due proportions.—If the whole property of the testator consist of the slave

* Mawla is a term applying either to the patron or the client (see Willa); and expresses the relation between the emancipated and his emancipator.
† See Vol. III, pp. 513 and 517.

* That is, "the freedmen of his freedmen," or "the emancipators of his emancipators."
or the house in that case the slave is to be possessed one day by the legatee, and two by the heirs, alternately; but the house, on the contrary, is to be portioned into three equal parts, of which one is given to the legatee, and two to the heirs,—the legatee being entitled to one third,—the estate, and the heirs to two thirds. The reason of the distinction here made between house and a slave is, that a slave is incapable of being divided, and therefore an alternate use of him is established from necessity; whereas a house, on the contrary, is capable of division; and as division is the most fair and equitable mode (since retaliation necessarily induces a preference of one over the other in point of time), it ought to be adopted where it is practicable. Still, however, if the parties agree to enjoy the house by turns, it is lawful, as the right rests entirely with them,—but division is the most equitable mode.

Are the heirs (in the latter instance) allowed to sell their share.—It is not in this case lawful for the heirs to sell the two thirds of the house which are allotted to them. This is according to the Zahir Rawayet. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that such sale is lawful, because these shares are purely their own property. The ground on which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds is, that a right of residence may eventually be established to the legatee in the whole house, by so much other property of the testator being afterwards discovered as may cause the house to come within a third of his property. Besides, the legatee has a controlling power over the heirs with respect to their portions, so far as to restrain them from executing any deed which may injure or affect his share.

The bequest becomes void on the death of the legatee.—It is the legatee should die before the expiration of the limited term of usufruct, the article bequeathed in usufruct immediately reverts to the heirs of the testator; for the bequest was made with a view that the legatee might derive a benefit from the testator's property; but if the article were to devolve to the legatee's heirs, it induces the consequence of their being entitled to the use of the testator's property without his consent, which is contrary to law. If the legatee die during the testator's life time, the bequest is void: because the acceptance of it is suspended upon the death of the testator, as has been already explained.

A bequest of the produce of an article does not entitle the legatee to the personal use of the article.—If a person bequeath the produce of his house or of his slave to Zeyd, in that case some are of opinion that it is lawful for Zeyd to reside in the said house himself, or to use the slave for his own service, because an equivalent for the use is in fact the same as the use itself, so far as relates to the accomplishment of the testator's object. The more approved opinion, however, is, that it is not lawful; for a bequest of produce is a bequest of money, as it is that which constitutes produce; whereas residence or service is an enjoyment of the use; and the effect of these is different with respect to the heirs; for if any just debt should afterwards appear against the testator, it might be repaid by means of a restitution of the rent by the legatee, which could not be done in case of his having had the actual use.

Nor does a bequest of the use entitle him to let it to hire.—It is not lawful for the usufructuary legatee of a slave or a house to let them out to hire. Shafei maintains that he is at full liberty so to do, because, in consequence of the bequest, he becomes (as it were) proprietor of the article; and, as such, he is entitled to transfer it either for a return or otherwise, usufruct (according to him) being equivalent to actual property. It is otherwise with a loan, that being (according to his tenets) simply a licence [to the use of a thing], not an investiture.* The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, a bequest is an endowment with property, without a return, referred to the testator's decease; and hence the legatee is not empowered to make a transfer of the legacy even without a return, because of the analogy it bears to a loan; for a loan, according to our doctors, is an investiture with the use of a thing granted in the lifetime of the lender; and the borrower is not permitted to hire out the article lent (hire being an investiture for a return), so here likewise.—A proof of this is that an investiture for a return is strong and binding, whereas investiture without a return is weak and not binding; and a person who is not empowered with respect to the weakest of the two cannot be empowered with respect to the strongest. Bequest, moreover, as being a gratuitous deed, is weak and not binding.—Now in gratuitous deeds to voluntary agent is at liberty to retract, not the other party:—but as, in the case of a bequest, the voluntary agent is the testator, and it is impossible for him to retract after his decease, retraction is therefore not possible in this instance;—yet still the bequest is not originally of a forcible and irrevocable nature, the legatee of usufruct is of course not at liberty to let the article to hire, since hire, as being a contract of exchange, is forcible and irrevocable. Secondly, usufruct (according to our doctors) is not property; but the investiture of it for property induces a creation of the character of worth in it, necessarily, in order to establish an equality between the articles opposed to each other in exchange.

* By the term "produce"; [Arab. Hasil] as here used, is to be understood the earnings or hire of a slave, or the rent of a house, &c.

the power of such creation rests only with one who is a proprietor of usufruct as a dependent of his right of property, or in consequence of a contract of exchange, and who is consequently empowered to make over the property to another in the same manner in which he himself may have held it. But when a person who acquires the property of usufruct without any return on his part, and in an original manner (that is, not in virtue of its subjection to something else), afterwards makes it over to another for a return, it follows that he makes another proprietor of a thing in a degree superior to what he himself in effect was, which is unlawful.

A bequest of the use of a slave does not entitle the legatee to carry him out of the place, unless his family reside elsewhere.—If a person bequeath the service of his slave to another, the legatee it not entitled to carry the slave from the city of the testator; unless his own family reside in another city, in which case he may carry him thither, provided he exceed not a third of the testator's property. The reason of this decision is, because the bequest must take effect and be executed in conformity with the interest of the testator; and in a case where the family of the legatee reside in the same city with testator, his intent is that the legatee shall take the service of the slave there, without exposing him (the slave) to the trouble of a journey elsewhere; whereas, on the other hand, where the family of the legatee reside in a different city, the intent the testator is that the legatee shall carry the slave thither in order that the family may enjoy the use of his services, without putting them to the trouble of removing to his [the testator's] city to enjoy this advantage.

A bequest of a year's product, if the article exceed a third of the estate, does not entitle the legatee to a consignment of it.—If a person bequeath one year's product of his slave to another, and he have no other property except such house or slave, the legatee in that case receives one third of a year's product; because product, as being property, is capable of division. If, therefore, the legatee requires the heirs to make a division of the house, in order that he may himself collect the product from his own share (being a third), it would not be admitted. Aboo Yoosaf, indeed, according to one report, holds a contrary opinion; for he argues that the legatee is a partner with the heirs; and a partner has a right to demand a division of the common property. In answer to this, however, it may be observed that this right amongst co-partners arises from their having a property in the article itself; whereas the legatee, in the present instance, has a property only in the product of the article, and consequently is not entitled demand a division.

In a bequest of the use of an article to one, it is a burden to another the bequest of usufruct is exclusively entitled to the use during his term.—If a man bequeath the person of his slave to Zeyd, and the service of him to Omar, and the slave exceed not a third of the testator's estate, his person belongs to Zeyd, and his service to Omar; for as the testator has bequeathed a specific thing to each legatee respectively, each is therefore entitled to his own right. As, moreover (the bequest to the usufructuary legatee being at any rate valid), if the slave's person had not been bequeathed, that would have belonged to the heirs, at the same time that his services would have belonged to the legatee; so in the same manner his services belong to the legatee of usufruct where the testator has bequeathed his person to another; for bequest resembles inheritance, inasmuch as the right of property to the article is established after death in both instances.

A bequest of an article to one, and its contents to another, if connectedly expressed entitles the second legatee to nothing.—If a person bequeath his female a slave to one and the child in her womb to another, or a ring to one and the stone of it to another, or a leathern bag, containing dates, to one, and the dates to another, and the legacy do not exceed a third of the estate,—in this case the first legatee gets his legacy, but the legatee of the contained article is not entitled to any thing. This is where the second bequest is immediately conducted in the same sentence with the first. But if they be mentioned separately (as if the testator should first say, "I bequeath my female slave to Zeyd," and then remain silent, and afterwards say, "I bequeath the child with which she is pregnant to Amro"), the effect, according to Aboo Yoosaf, is the same as above mentioned; whereas Mohammed maintains that in this case the female slave goes to the first legatee, and her child is the equal of the contained (and the same holds with respect to the two other cases of the ring and the bag). The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that as the testator first bequeathed the female slave, and afterwards the child in her womb, it may be inferred that his object in the first bequest was the female slave only, the second bequest being merely an explanation of his meaning in the first,—which explanation is approved, whether it be connected in the same sentence or not; for as the bequest is not binding till after the death of the testator, his explanation connectedly or unconnectedly is one and the same; in the same manner as holds where a person first bequeaths the person of his slave to one and afterwards the service of him to another,—in which case the legatee of the person is not a partner of the legatee of usufruct with respect to the service.

In other words, "he is at liberty, at any period after making the bequest, to alter or amend it".
the slave. The argument of Mohammed is that the word ring comprehends both the stone and the hoop, and so likewise, the word female slave comprehends both the slave herself and also the child in her womb, —and the word bag includes both the bag and its contents. With respect, therefore, to the ring-stone, the child, and the contents of the bag, there are two different bequests to two different persons, where both the legatees are equal partners in each. Nor is the second bequest, in this instance, a retractation of the first, it being, in effect, the same as where a person first bequeaths a ring (for instance) to one, and again bequeaths the same ring to another,—in which case the second bequest is not a retractation of the first, but the two legatees are equal partners in the ring; and so here likewise. It is different when a man first bequeaths the person of his slave to one, and then the property of him to another, as the word slave does not comprehend the service of that slave. It is also different where a second bequest follows in immediate connexion with the first; for in that case the whole forms (as it were) one sentence indicating the design of the testator to be that the hoop of the right (for instance) shall go to one, and the stone to the other.

A bequest of the fruit of a garden implies the present fruit only, unless it be expressed in perpetuity,—if a person bequeath to any one “the fruit of his garden”; in that case the legatee gets the fruit actually in being at the time of the testator's death, not what may be produced afterwards. If, however, the testator say, “I bequeath the fruit of my garden perpetually to such an one,” the legatee is in that case entitled to the fruit then existing, as well as to whatever may afterwards grow there during his life. But if, on the other hand, the testator bequeath the produce of his garden (not the fruit), the legatee is then entitled to the present produce and to whatever may be collected from it until his death, although the word perpetual should or have been expressed; for as the word fruit, in its common acceptance, means a thing actually in being, it cannot therefore be applied to what is not in being, unless by an express provision for that purpose:—whereas produce, in the common acceptance of the term, comprehends not only what at present exists, but also what may hereafter exist in succession; and therefore its including what may appear after the testator’s decease does not depend upon the mention of any particular provision or term.

A bequest of the produce of an animal implies the existent produce only, in every instance.—If a person bequeath the whole of a sheep or its milk, or young, and then die, the legatee is in that case entitled to whatever may be extant (for these things) at the period of the testator’s death, and not to what may afterwards appear notwithstanding the word “perpetual” have been expressed; as the term wool, or so forth (as mentioned above), do not comprehend what is not actually in being. It is otherwise with respect to fruit (although that term also, in its common acceptance, comprehends only what is actually existent, and a bequest of non-existent fruit the never the less valid), because ordained contracts* (such as of gardening and hire) with respect to non-existent fruit being good in law, it follows that the word fruit, mentioned with a condition of perpetuity, comprehends also what is non-existent, and that a bequest of such is valid. It is otherwise with the wool, the milk, or the young of a sheep; for as, with respect to the non-existent of those articles, there are no ordained contracts, a bequest of such is not valid:—contrary to what is existent; for these are subjects of a valid contract (such as Khoola and the like), and therefore a bequest of them is likewise valid.

CHAPTER VI.

OF WILLS MADE BY ZIMMIES.

A church or synagogue, founded during health, descends to the founder's heirs.—If a Jew or a Christian, being in sound health, build a church of a synagogue, and then die, such building is an inheritance, according to all our doctors; because Haneefa holds an erection of this nature to be equivalent to a Wakf, or pious appropriation, which (agreeable to his tenets) is not absolute,† but descends to the heirs of the founder; and the two disciples, on the other hand, hold all such erections to be sinful in their nature; whence they are of no validity [as a public foundation], and therefore descend to the heirs [in the same manner as any other of the founder property].

In the bequest of a house to the purpose of an infidel place of worship, it is appropriated accordingly.—If a Jew or Christian will that, “after his death his house shall be converted into a church or synagogue for a particular set of people,” the bequest is valid, according to all our doctors and takes effect to the extent of a third of the testator's property; because a bequest has two different characters, the appointment of a successor, and an actual endowment; and the testator is competent to either of these.

Whether any particular legatees be mentioned, or otherwise.—If a Jew or Christian will that “his house be converted into a church or synagogue for a set of people,” without specifying the particular sect, the bequest is valid, according to Haneefa.

* Ordained contracts are such as are authorized and sanctioned by the KOBAN, and concerning the validity of which, therefore, no doubt can be entertained.
† See Vol. II, p. 231.
According to the two disciples, on the contrary, it is not valid; for a deed of that nature is in reality sinful, although it may appear pious to the testator; and a will for a sinful purpose is null, because the execution of it would be a confirmation of sin. The argument of Haneefa is, that the founding of churches or synagogues is held, by these persons, to be an act of piety; and as we are enjoined to leave them to the excuse of whatever may be agreeable to their faith, the bequest is therefore lawful, in conformity with their belief.

Objection.—What is the difference between the building a church or synagogue in the time of health, and the bequeathing it by will, that Haneefa should hold it inheritable in the former instance, and not in the latter?

Reply.—The difference is this: that it is not the mere erecting (of the church, &c.) which extinguishes the builder's property, but the exclusive dedication of the building to the service of God, as in the case of mosque erected by Mussulmans; and as an infidel place of worship is not dedicated to God, indisputably, it therefore still remains the property of the founder, and is consequently inheritable [in common with his other effects]; whereas a bequest on the contrary, is used for the very purpose of destroying a right of property.

The bequests of Zimmies are of four kinds,*—I. Those made for purposes held pious in their belief, but not in the belief of Mussulmans, such as the building of a church or a synagogue (as already mentioned), or the slaughter of hogs to feed the poor of their sect; in which cases Haneefa holds the bequest to be valid, in conformity with the faith of the testator, whereas the two disciples deem it invalid, as being sinful.—II. Those made for purposes held pious with Mussulmans, but not with Zimmies, such as the erection of a mosque, a pilgrimage to Mecca, or burning a lamp in a mosque, in all of which instances the bequest is invalid in conformity with the belief the testator, according to all our doctors; unless, however, it be made in favour of some particular persons, in which case it is valid, as under such circumstance it is an investiture, the mention of "building a mosque," or so forth, being considered merely in the light of a counsel—in other words, as if the testator had bequeathed his property to particular persons, counselling them therewith to erect a mosque). III. Those made for a purpose held pious both by Mussulmans and Zimmies, such as burning a lamp in the holy temple (of Jerusalem), or waging war against infidel Tartars;†

which are valid, whether made in favour of specific persons or not.—IV. Those made for purposes not held pious either by Zimmies or Mussulmans, such as the support of singers and dissolve women—which are invalid, as being of a sinful tendency;—unless, however, they be made in favour of particular persons, and then they are valid.

The will of a sensualist or innovator is the same as of an orthodox Mussulman, unless he proceed to avowed apostasy.—A Sexualist,* or an innovator,† provided he proceed not to open and avowed infidelity, is, in point of bequest, in the same state with a perfect believer, because the law regards only his apparent state, which is that of a Mussulman; but if he proceed to open infidelity, he is then considered as an apostate; and with regard to his will there is a difference of opinion (in the same manner as our doctors have differed with regard to every other deed of such persons),—Haneefa holding that in this case his bequest remains in suspense, and becomes valid upon his repentance, or null upon his death or expatriation,—and the two disciples (on the contrary) maintaining that it is in every respect valid.

The will of a female apostate is valid.—The will of an apostate woman is valid. This is approved; because women in such cases are left to themselves, and not put death, as in the case of men;†

A Moostamin may bequeath the whole of his property.—If a Moostamin bequeath the whole of his property to a Mussulman or a Zimme, it is valid; for a bequest of the whole of an estate is deemed illegal only as it affects the right of the testator's heirs (whence it is that if they assort such bequest is valid); but the heirs of the Moostamin are possessed of no cognizable rights, they being, as it were, dead, so far as relates to the Mussulman government, because of their being in a hostile country. Besides, the property of a Moostamin is in security only in virtue of the protection he receives from the state, which protection he enjoys in his own right; not in right of his heirs.

But if he bequeath a part only, the residue is transmitted to his heirs.—If a Moostamin bequeath part of his property, the bequest is executed accordingly, and the remainder is transmitted to his heirs, notwithstanding they be residents in an hostile country; such being the law with respect to Moostamins.

An emancipation, or Tadbeer, granted by him on his deathbed, takes effect in toto.—If a Moostamin, immediately before his death.

* Arab, Sahib-al-hawa. Hawa signifies the sensual passions, a complete conquest over which is essential to the character of a good Mussulman.
† Arab, Sahib-al-biddat. A free-thinker or secretary. Abroacher of new and heterodox inions in matters of faith.
‡ See Vol. II. p. 229.
emancipate his slave, or make him a Modab-bir in the Mussulman territory, it it valid, and the slave is accordingly free, notwithstanding his value exceed a third of his master's estate; for a bequest beyond a third of the property it is deemed illegal only as it affects the right of the testator's heirs; but a Moostamin's heirs possess no cognizable right, as was already mentioned.

Any bequest in favour of a Mussulman is valid.—IF a Mussulman or Zimmee make a will in favour of a Moostamin, it is valid; for a Moostamin, so long as he resides in a Mussulman country, is considered in the light of a Zimmee; and as the exercise of generosity and benevolence in favour of such is therefore allowed to Mussulmans during life, it is also permitted them to extend such acts to a period after their death.—(It is related of Haneef and Abul Yosaf, that they held wills in favour of Moostamins to be illegal, because of their intention to return to their own country; and also, because the Mussulmans not only allow this, but even do not suffer them to reside in their dominions more than a year, unless they submit to the payment of the capitation-tax.—The former is, however, the better opinion.)

The bequests of a Zimmee are subject to the same restrictions with those of a Mussulman.—If a Zimmee bequeath more than a third of his estate to a stranger, or to an heir, it is not valid, as being contrary to the laws of the Mussulmans to which they have laws to conform with respect to all temporal concerns.

He may make a bequest in favour of an unbeliever of a different sect.—If a Zimmee make a will in favour of an infidel of a different persuasion, it is valid, because of the analogy of legacies to succession by inheritance, all the different descriptions of those persons who disbelieve the true faith being considered as of one class.

Not being a hostile infidel.—If a Zimmee, residing in the Mussulman territory, make a will in favour of a hostile infidel, it is not valid for as inheritance does not obtain between those, because of the difference of country, it follows that a bequest from the one to the other is of no effect, bequest being similar to inheritance.

CHAPTER VII.

OF EXECUTORS AND THEIR POWERS.

An executor, having accepted his appointment in presence of the testator, is not afterwards at liberty to reject it.—If a person appoint another his executor, it remains with that other either to accept of or decline the appointment, in the presence of the testator; because no one has the power of compelling another to interfere in his concern. But if the executor accept his appointment in the presence of the testator, and afterwards, either in his absence, or after his death, decline it, such refusal is not admitted;
because the testator had placed a reliance on his consent; and therefore, if the rejection were allowed of either in his absence or after his decease, he would, necessarily be deceived.

His silence leaves him an option of rejection.—If a person appoint another his executor, and that other remain silent, without giving any indication of his acceptance or refusal, he is in that case at liberty, after the death of the testator, to accept or refuse the appointment, as may be most agreeable to him.

But any act indicative of his acceptance binds him to the execution of the office.—
But if a person, under such circumstances, should, immediately after the death of the testator, dispose of any part of the effects by sale, then, as an act of this kind is a clear indication of his acceptance, the executor-ship becomes obligatory on him. The sale moreover, is valid in this instance, notwithstanding the executor may not have conidered himself as such at that time; for his executorship (like inheritance, bequest being a sort of succession as well as inheritance), does not depend on his knowledge; and, as being an executor, a sale transacted by him is valid.

Having rejected the appointment, after the testator's decease, he may still accept of it, unless the magistrate appoint an executor in the interim.—If a person appoint another his executor, and the person so appointed, remain silent until the testator's decease and then reject the office, and afterwards declare his acceptance of it, such acceptance is valid, unless the Kazee, during the interim, should have set him aside, and appointed another, in consequence of his first declaration; because the refusal does not immediately annul the appointment, that being injurious to the decease; and although the continuance of it be prejudicial and troublesome to the executor, still he has the merit of it, which is an equivalent for the disadvantage,—whereas the injury to the deceased has nothing to counterbalance it.
The executorship therefore endures in this case. If, however, the Kazee set him aside, his decree to that effect is valid, as he possesses the power of removing an inconvenicence, to which executors are frequently subject, and which may render the continuance of the office injurious to them. The Kazee, therefore, to remedy this, may discharge the executor from his office, and appoint another in his room, to act with the estate, thereby preventing an injury both to the executor and the deceased. If, however, the executor, after being thus dismissed by the Kazee, declare his willingness to undertake the executorship, such declaration is not admitted or attended to, as he here assents after his appointment having been altogether annulled by the order of the Kazee.
Where a slave, a reprobate, or an infidel, are appointed, the magistrate must nominate a proper substitute.—A PERSON may appoint a slave, reprobate,* or an infidel, to be his executor; but it is incumbent on the Kazee to annul such appointment, and nominate another person, because of the disadvantages which would attend the confirmation of it in either of those instances; for a slave could not act but by the power of his master; a reprobate may be suspected of fraud; and it is not fit such a trust should be committed to an infidel, as the enmity which every infidel may be supposed to entertain towards a Mussulman on the score of religion will occasion a disregard to his interest. The dissolution of such appointments is therefore incumbent on the Kazee, notwithstanding their original validity.

The appointment of the testator's slave is invalid, if any of the heirs have a attained to majority; or not otherwise.—If a person appoint his own slave his executor, any of the heirs being arrived at the age of maturity, it is not valid; because such heirs may prevent the slave from the execution of his office by selling their property in him to another, and thereby rendering him incapable of acting but by the consent of the purchaser. If, on the contrary, the heirs be all infants, the appointment is in that case valid, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is not valid (and such is what analogy would suggest); because slavery is incompatible with the exercise of power; and also because, in this particular instance, it would follow that the property was master over the proprietor, which is contrary to LAW. The argument of Haneefa is, that the slave is sane and adult, and therefore capable of the discharge of such trust. Neither has any person the power of prohibiting him from it, because the heirs, although they be his masters, yet cannot execute in the room of their youth. As moreover, the deceased appointed him to this trust, it may hence be inferred that his tenderness, and regard for the heirs was superior, in his opinion, so that of any other. This appointment, therefore, is valid; in the some manner as that of a Moktab; in other words, if a person appoint his Moktab his executor it is valid; and so here likewise.

In case of the executor's incapacity, the magistrate must give him an assistant.—If an executor be unequal to the execution of his office, it is incumbent on, the Kazee to associate another with him, in order that the duties of the office may be properly executed.

But he must not do so on the executor pleading incapacity, without due examination.—If an executor represent to the Kazee his incapacity to execute the duties of his charge, it is requisite, in such case, that the Kazee, before he attends to his representation, make particular inquiry into the truth of it, as complainants of this kind often assert falsehoods, with a view to alleviate their own burden. But if it shall appear to the Kazee, on due examination that the executor is utterly incapable of the office, he must release him, and appoint another in his place, this being advantageous both to the executor and to the estate.

And if he appear perfectly equal to the office, he cannot be removed.—If an executor be perfectly equal to the discharge of his office, and trust worthy therein, the Kazee is not at liberty to dismiss him; for any person whom the Kazee may appoint in his place must be less eligible, as the deceased had particularly selected him, and testified his confidence in him. He therefore must be continued in preference to all others; unless to the testator's father, notwithstanding his supposed tenderness; and consequently to others a fortiori.

He cannot be removed on the complaint of the heirs, unless his culpability be ascertained.—If all or part of the heirs prefer a complaint against the executor, still the Kazee must not dismiss him immediately, nor until his guilt be ascertained, as he acts under an authority derived from the deceased. If, however, he prove culpable, it is incumbent on the Kazee to dismiss him and appoint another in his place; for the deceased nominated him to the office from supposing him worthy of confidence; but upon being found culpable he no longer continues so, insomuch that if the testator were living he would himself discharge him; and as he is incapacitated, by death, from so doing, the Kazee must take this upon him as his substitute.

One of two joint executors cannot act without the concurrence of the other.—If a man appoint two executors, neither of them is entitled, according to Haneefa, and Mohammed, to act without the other, except in particular cases, of which an explanation shall be hereafter given.—Aboo Yoosuf is of opinion that in all cases either of them may act without the other, because, an executor is endowed with his power of action in virtue of the will of the testator; and as power of action is a thing sanctioned by the LAW, and incapable of division,* he enjoys his power complete and perfect in the same manner as a complete authority to contract their infant sister in marriage appertains to each of her brothers respectively.—(The ground of this is, that executorship is a succession, which succession cannot be established in the executor, unless the authority of the testator devolve to him in the same degree in which it had appertained to the

* Arab. Fasik. (The term has been repeatedly defined.)

* That is, cannot be enjoyed or exercised partially.
The estate of the testator, also, and in discharging his debts, the act of either executor is lawful independent of the other. For none of these are considered as an exercise of power, but merely the performance of a duty.—insomuch that the depositor has himself a right to seize and carry away his deposit, if he find it among the effects of the deceased, and the creditor has a similar right with regard to his debt;—and it is, moreover, the duty of every one into whose hands property may fall, to attend to the preservation of it, whence this comes under the description of aid and assistance, not of an exercise of power;—neither do any of these acts require thought or consideration. Either of the executors has also a right singly to discharge a legacy, or emancipate a slave, if directed by the testator, because such deeds require no thought or consideration, since the act is implying a right of property, which is, in the same case, no less than the possession of a slave.

_Gr in which the interest or advantage of the estate are concerned._—In the same manner, either of them may institute a suit in claim of the rights of the testator because a conjunction of both in so doing would be impracticable, since, if they were to do it at one and the same time in the assembly of the Kazee, they must occasion noise and confusion (whence it is that only one of two agents for litigation is allowed to plead at a time). The acceptance for a gift for an infant is likewise an act which neither may perform singly; for in case of delay there is a possibility of the gift being rendered null by the death of the donor previous to the seizure. These acts, moreover, being permitted to a mother and nurse, is a proof that they are not exertions of power. It is likewise permitted to any of the executors, singly, to sell goods where there is an apprehension of their spoiling, as in the case of fruit, and the like: and also to collect together and preserve the scattered property of the testator, as delay might occasion the destruction of it; and such permission is, moreover, given to every person into whose hands property may fall, whence it may be inferred that this is not an exertion of power (It is recorded, in the Jama Sagheer, that none of the executors, where there are more than one, has singly the power of selling goods, or receiving payment of debts, because these are exercises of power which they must perform jointly, in conformity with the will and intention of the testator.)

_Case of a testator appointing different executors at different times._—If a person appoint two executors in a separate manner (as if he should first say to the one "I have appointed you my executor," and again, at a different period, to the other "I have appointed you my executor"); some allege that in this case each of them has individually a power of exercising the functions of his appointment, without consulting the other, in the same manner as two agents, where they are appointed by different commissions;—the reason of which is that he likewise, separately. It is other wise with agents appointed under different commission, for the appointment of each of those still continues distinct and separate, as settled by the constituent.

In case of the death of a joint executor, the magistrate must appoint a substitute.—If one of two executors die, it is incumbent on the Kazee to appoint another in his room. This is the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammad jbecause, according to their doctrine, the remaining executor has not, of himself, power to act on every occasion, and he interest of the deceased therefore requires the appointment of another to operate with him; and it is also the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, because, although the remaining executor be (according to him) empowered to act of himself; still it behoves the Kazee to appoint another his companion; for the design of the testator evidently as, to leave two successors the management of his concerns; and as this may be fulfilled by the appointment of a substitute for him who dies, one must be appointed accordingly.

Unless the deceased have himself nominated his successor.—If the deceased executor have appointed the living executor to act for him, it is in that case lawful for the latter (according to Zahir Nawwert) to act alone, nor is it incumbent on the Kazee to appoint another in the room of the deceased; because here the judgment of the deceased executor virtually subsists in the living one, as it were, by succession.—(There is a tradition of Haneefa having contradicted this doctrine, because of its repugnance to the object of the testator, namely, the agency of two persons; in opposition to the case where a dying executor appoints some other person to succeed him; for such appointment is valid, because of its being attended with the advantage of the judgment of two distinct persons, as was intended by the testator.)

The executor of an executor is his substitute in office.—If an executor, previous to his death, appoint another person his executor. In that case the person so appointed is entitled to act as executor, both to, and also to the person to whose affairs his immediate testator had acted as executor. This is according to our doctors. Shafei maintains that the person so appointed is not entitled to act as executor to the first deceased, because of the analogy his appointment bears to that of an agent; in other words, if a person, during his life time, appoint an agent to act for him. that agent is not permitted to delegate his powers to another without having previously obtained the consent of his constituent.—(The ground of the analogy between these two cases is, that in the same manner as the constituent is supposed to place a reliance on the agent, and on him only, so also the testator may be supposed to act with regard to the executor.) The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, an executor derives his power from the testator; and it is therefore lawful for him to appoint an executor to succeed him;—in the same manner as in the case of a grandfather; in other words, a father has the power of bestowing his child in marriage, which devolves upon his father after his death; and the grandfather has in such case the power of appointing an agent for the execution of the child’s marriage; and so likewise, it is lawful for an executor to appoint another executor, as the power appertaining to the testator devolves upon his executor, in the same manner as a father’s right to dispose of his child in marriage devolves upon the grand father. As, moreover, the grandfather is the father’s substitute with regard to the power which devolves to him, so in the same manner the executor is the substitute of the testator; because the nomination of an executor is, in effect, an appointment, by the testator, of a substitute with respect to the matters in which he is himself empowered; and as the executor, at the time of his death, possessed a power with respect to both estates (his own, and also that of his testator), it follows that the second executor (that is, the one appointed by him) in his substitute with respect to both estates also.—Secondly, as the testator had recourse to the assistance of the executor, notwithstanding he knew there was a possibility of his dying in the interim, and thereby leaving his object unaccomplished, it may be inferred that his intention was that his executor should in such case appoint another. It is otherwise with an agent; for he is not at liberty to appoint any other person his agent without the consent of his constituent; because, as the latter is still living, and consequently has it in his power to accomplish his object himself, it is therefore not to be supposed that he will consent to his agent appointing another agent under him.

An executor is entitled to possess himself of the portions of infant and absent adult heirs, on their behalf.—If an executor, the legatees being present, divide off the estate of the testator from the legacies, on behalf of his heirs who are infants, or adult absentees, and take possession of their portions, it is lawful; for an heir is successor to the deceased; and as an executor is also a successor to him, he is of course a competent diligent on behalf of infant for absent heirs, and may, of consequence, make a division, and possess himself of their portions on their behalf.—Insomuch that if those portions were to perish in his hands, still they are not at liberty to participate with the legatees.
in what remained to them after such division.

But not of the legacies of infant or absent legatees.—If, on the contrary, an executor, the heirs being adult and present, divide of the legacies from the estate, and take possession of them on behalf of infant or absent legatees, it is unlawful; for a legatee not a successor to the deceased in every respect, he being constituted a proprietor by a new and supernumerant cause; and as, therefore, the executor does not stand as litigant on his behalf, his taking his [the legatee’s] portion is not valid,—insomuch that if the legacy were to perish in his [the executor’s] hands, the legatee would be entitled to take a third of whatever had remained to the heirs. Neither as any compensation due from the executor in this instance; because an executor is a trustee: and as the power of conserving the effects of the testator is lodged in him, the case is therefore the same as if the loss had happened previous to the division of the effects.

A legacy appropriated to pilgrimage, if lost, must be repaired, to the extent of a third of the estate.—If a person bequeath a sum for the performance of a pilgrimage to Mecca, and then die, and the executor divide off the said sum from the heirs, and take possession of it, and it be afterwards lost or destroyed, either in his charge, of in that of the person whom he had appointed for the performance of the pilgrimage, in that case, according to Ifanecfa, a third of the remaining property of the deceased must be appropriated for the pilgrimage. Aboo Yosaf, on the other hand, holds that if the sum thus lost have been originally equivalent to a third of the property, nothing is afterwards to be taken from the heirs; but that if it was less, the deficiency must be applied to the purpose of the pilgrimage. Mohammed, on the contrary, is of opinion that in neither case is the executor to take any thing from the heirs: because the setting aside of a particular sum, for the performance of the pilgrimage, was the undoubted right of the testator; and as, if he had himself set aside the sum for that purpose, and it had afterwards been lost or destroyed, nothing further would have been required, and the legacy would have been void, it is in the same manner void where the sum was set aside by the executor, as he acts for, and stands in the place of, the deceased. The argument of Aboo Yosaf, in support of his opinion, is that a third of the whole property is a fund for the execution of wills, to which extent only they are to be executed, and no farther. The arguments of Ifanecfa, in support of his opinion on this point, are twofold. First, the performance of the pilgrimage was the object of the testator, not the setting aside a sum for that purpose; and therefore the appropriation of the money, without the accomplishment of the object, is of no consideration, it being, in effect, the same as if the sum had been lost previous to the division,—in which case a third of the remainder would be appropriated to the pilgrimage. Secondly, the division, with respect to the legacy, is not perfect and complete until the portion bequeathed for the purpose of pilgrimage be expended thereupon as there is no person to take possession of it. Where, therefore, this sum is not expended in the performance of pilgrimage, the partition is incomplete, and the case (consequently) the same as if the sum had been lost or destroyed before the partition.

A legacy, after being divided off by the magistrate, descends to the legatee’s heirs in case of his decease.—If a person bequeath a third of one thousand dirms to another who is at that time absent, and the heirs consign the said sum to the Kaze, in order to divide and set apart the share of the absent legatee, the division thus made by the Kaze is valid because of the original validity of the will, insomuch that if the absentee should afterwards die, previous to his having accepted his portion, the legacy nevertheless devolves to his heirs. The office of Kaze, moreover, is instituted with a view to the conservation of their rights, especially with respect to such as are dead or absent;—and as among these attentions to the rights of mankind is the setting aside and taking possession of the portions of absentees, such acts by him on behalf of an absentee are valid of course:—insomuch that if such portion were destroyed in his possession and the legatee should afterwards appear, still he would have no claim upon the heirs.

An executor may sell a slave of the estate, for the discharge of the debts upon it, in absence of the creditors.—It is lawful for an executor, in order to discharge the debts of the deceased, to sell a slave for a suitable price, in the absence of the creditors; for as the testator might have done so during his lifetime the executor, as his representative, is entitled to do the same. The ground on which this proceeds is, that the right of the creditors to the effects of the deceased lies, not in the things themselves but in their worth; and the worth of the slave is not annihilated by the sale, as the price (which is in reality the worth) still remains.

Unless the slave be involved in debt.—It is otherwise with respect to an indebted slave; for the sale of such in the absence of the creditors is not valid, as their right lies in the person of the slave, they having a claim to the earnings of his labour, which would be annihilated by the sale of him.

An executor, having sold and received the price of an article which afterwards proves to be the property of another, is accountable to the purchaser for the price he had received. —If a person appoint another his executor, directing him, after his decease, to sell a slave, and bestow the price in charity, and the executor accordingly sell the slave and take possession of the price, and it be afterwards lost or destroyed with him, and the slave prove to be the property of another person, he (the executor) is accountable to the purchaser for the price, agreeably to the instructions of the testator. If he is entitled to take an equivalent from the effect of the deceased, being, as it were, an agent on his behalf. This indemnification, according to Hancefa, he is to take from the whole of the estate at large, and such is the Zahir Rawayet. It is recorded from Mohammed, on the contrary, that he is to indemnify himself from the third of the effects as the instructions of the deceased were in the nature of a will; and the third of the property is the fund for the execution of a will. The ground of the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet is, that as the executor in the sale of the slave, was deceived by the testator, the restitution made by him to the purchaser is therefore a debt due to him from the testator; and the debts are discharged from the whole of the estate, not from the third. It would be otherwise if the Kazee, or his Ameen, should sell the slave, and he afterwards prove the property of another; for in this case the obligations of the sale do not rest upon those officers, but the purchaser comes at once upon the estate for an equivalent to the price lost or destroyed as above; since otherwise the door of magistracy would be shut, and the rights of mankind consequently injured, as no man will undertake the office of Kazee unless he be exempted from responsibility. It is to be observed that what is now advanced, that the executor is to take an equivalent from the effects of the deceased; proceeds on the supposition of these being sufficient to answer this purpose; for if they be inadequate to it, the executor is entitled to an indemnification only in the greatest possible degree; and if the deceased should have no effects whatever, the executor (like any other creditor) has no claim for indemnification.

If this has been lost, he may reimburse himself from the person to whom the article had fallen by inheritance.—If an executor sell a slave which had fallen to the share of a child of the deceased, and take possession of the price, and it be afterwards lost in his hands, and the slave prove the property of another person, the purchaser has in that case a claim for restitution from the executor, who is entitled to indemnify himself from the share of the child in whose behalf he acted; and the child is entitled to an equivalent from the shares of the other heirs; for upon the slave proving the property of another person, the distribution of inheritance, as at first executed, is annulled, the case being in fact, the same as if no such slave had ever existed, or been accounted upon as part of the estate.

An executor may accept a transfer for a debt due his infant ward.—If a person indebted to an orphan like a transfer on some other person, and the executor (the guardian of the orphan) accept the same, such acceptance is approved, provided it be for the interest of the orphan, because of the person on whom the transfer is made being richer (for instance) than the transferrer, and also a man of probity, and in a position of trust. Acting for the child is entitled to the evidences of the guaranty, merely that he may employ it for the interest of the orphan:—but if the transferrer be richer than the other, the acceptance is not approved, as being, in its tendency, prejudicial to the orphan.

Or sell or purchase moveables on his account.—It is lawful for an executor to sell or purchase moveables, on account of the orphan under his charge, either for an equivalent, or at such a rate as to occasion an inconsiderable loss,—but not at such a rate as to make the loss great and apparent; because, the appointment of an executor being for the benefit of the orphan, he must avoid losses in such a degree as possible;—but with respect to an inconsiderable loss, as in the commerce of the world it is often unavoidable, it is therefore allowed to him to incur it, since otherwise a door would be shut to the business of purchase and sale.

An executor, in giving a bill of sale, must not insert his power as an executor in it, but must give a separate paper to that effect, out of caution; for if the latter also were inserted, it might happen that the witness to the sale might set his name to the bottom of the instrument without examination, which would implicate a false testimony, since with the executorship he has no concern. Some, moreover, have asserted that the attestation of the witness ought to run in this manner—"Sold by Zeyd the son of Omar," and not "by Zeyd the executor of such a person:"—but others maintain that this is immaterial, and that the latter mode may with propriety be adopted, as executorship in a matter of notoriety.

He may also sell moveable on account of an absent adult heir.—An executor has the power of selling every species of property belonging to an adult absent heir, excepting such as immovable:—for as a father is authorized to sell the moveable property of his adult absent son, but not such as is in moveable, his guardian (the executor) has the same power. The ground of this is that the sale of moveable property is a species of conservation, as articles of that description are liable to decay, and the price is much more easily preserved than the article itself. With respect, on the contrary, immovable property, it is in a state of conservation in its own nature; whence it is unlawful to sell it,—unless, however, it be evident that it will otherwise perish or be lost, in which case the sale of it is allowed.

He cannot trade with his ward's portion.—It is not lawful for an executor to trade with the property of the orphan; for the conservation of it, merely, is committed to him, not the power of trading with it,—according to what is mentioned in the Aways upon this subject.

He may sell moveable property on account of the infant or absent adult brother of the testator.—According to Mohammed and Aboo Yoosuf, the executor of a brother, with respect to an infant brother, or one of mature age, who is absent, stands in the same predicament as the executor of a father with respect to his adult absent son (in other words, he is empowered to sell the moveable property of the orphan or absent); and so likewise of an executor appointed by the mother or uncle; for as the mother and uncle are permitted to interfere in the management of the property so far relates to its preservation, so also is the executor who represents them.

The power of a father's executor precedes that of the grandfather.—The power of the father's executor, in the management of the property of his orphans, is superior to, and precedes that of the grandfather. Shaiik is of opinion that in this respect the grandfather has the superior power; because the law has ordained him to be the representative of the father, where the latter has ceased to exist.—Whence it is that (failing the father) the grandfather inherits to his grandson. The argument of our doctors is, that as, in consequence of the will, the authority of the father devolves upon his executor, the executor's authority is therefore that of the father, in effect,—and consequently the father's executor precedes to grandfather, in the same manner as the father himself would. The ground of this is, that as the father, notwithstanding the existence of the grandfather, appointed another, to act for his children, it may be hence inferred that he considered such appointment more beneficial to them than if they had been left to the management of the grandfather.

If there be no executor, the grandfather is the father's representative.—If a father die without appointing an executor, the grandfather represents the father;* because a grandfather is most nearly related to the children of his son, and most interested in their welfare;—whence it is that the grandfather is empowered to contract the infant wards in marriage, in preference to the father's executor,—withstanding the latter take precedence of him in point of managing and acting with the property, for, the reasons already assigned.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF EVIDENCE WITH RESPECT TO WILLS.

The evidence of two executors to the appointment of a third is not valid unless he claim or admit it.—If two executors give evidence that the deceased had associated a third person with them, and that person deny his having done so, the evidence of the executors is of no effect; because their assertion having a tendency to their own advantage, in the case it will afford them from part of their labour, lays them open to suspicion. If, on the contrary, the third person claim or admit of the executorship, their evidence is valid, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that here also the evidence is null in the same manner as in the former instance, and for the same reasons. The ground of a more favourable construction, in this particular, is that as the Kazee has the power of either appointing an executor at the first, or associating a third person (by that person's consent) with the two executors, without any testimony on their part, it follows that their testimony merely prevents the Kazee from the trouble of nomination, by rendering it unnecessary for him to seek out and name a proper person to assist in the executorship;—the person still, however, holding his office in virtue of the Kazee's nomination.

The evidence of orphans to the appointment of an executor is not admitted if he deny it.—If two orphans give evidence that their deceased father had appointed a particular person his executor, and the person mentioned deny the same, their evidence is not credible, being liable to a suspicion in the advantages they would draw from the labours of a person exerted towards the preservation of their property.

The testimony of executors with respect to property, on behalf of an infant.—If two executors give evidence, on behalf of an infant heir (their ward) concerning property of the deceased, or of any other person, it is of no effect; because their testimony merely tends to prove their right to the management of such property.

Or of an absent adult, is not admitted.—If two executors give evidence, on behalf of an adult heir, concerning property of the deceased, it is of no effect; but it is valid concerning property appertaining to any other person. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples are of opinion that in both cases the evidence is valid, because it is not liable in either of them to any suspicion, as the power of an executor over the property ceases after the heir attains the maturity. The argument of Haneefa is, that as executors have the power of conservation and also of selling the moveable property of an adult heir in this absence, it follows that their evidence, in favour of an adult heir, concerning any part of the deceased's estate, is not altogether free from suspicion. It is otherwise with respect to their evidence on behalf of an absent adult heir, concerning and other property, for over that the executors cannot possess any authority, as the deceased constituted them his substitutes with respect to his own estate only, not with respect to the property of others.

* Literally, "is in the stead of," or "stands in the place of."
The mutual evidence of parties, on behalf of each other, to debts due to each from an estate is valid; but not their evidence to legacies.—If two persons bear evidence to a debt of one thousand dirms, due from a person deceased to Omar and Zeyd, and Omar and Zeyd give a similar evidence in favour of these two, the evidence on both parts is valid. If, on the contrary, each of the parties in the same manner give evidence that legacies had been left by the deceased to the other, their attestations are of no effect. This is the doctrine of Hancefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that in neither case are these evidences valid; and such also (according to the relation of Khasaaf) is the opinion of Hancefa. There is also a tradition of Aboo Yoosaf having concurred in the opinion of Mohammed. The reasons urged in support of the validity of the evidence, in the case of debt, is that debt relates solely to the person; and as the person admits a great variety of rights, the evidence of both parties is therefore admitted.

—Neither does it follow, in this case, that either party is to partake of what may be obtained in payment by the other, so as to cause the evidence of this party to be a mere establishment of their own right of participation,—insomuch that if a stranger were to pay, to one of the parties, of his own accord, the debt alleged to be due to that party, still the other party is not at liberty to claim any share in such payment. The reasons, on the other hand, against the validity of the evidence in this instance, are that as the death [of the debtor] occasions the relation to shift from the person to the property, since in consequence of the deceased the person no longer remains (insomuch that if any one party were to obtain payment of his right from the estate of the deceased the other party participates with them therein, provided the estate suffice for the discharge of the debts of both), it follows that the evidence of each, respectively, in behalf of the other, tends to establish a right of participation in whatever payment that other may obtain in consequence; and accordingly, the testimony is here liable to suspicion. It is otherwise where the debtor is living; for in that case the testimony of each party [of creditors] on behalf of the other is admitted; since as the debt, at that time, rests upon his person, not upon his property (the former still continuing existing), a participation, therefore, is not established in this instance.

Unless each legacy, respectively, consist of a slave.—If two persons give evidence that a particular person had bequeathed his female slave to two legats, and the two others give evidence that the same person had bequeathed a male slave to those two, both evidences are valid; for as their testimony does not in any respect tend to establish a participation, it is therefore liable to no suspicion, and must be admitted accordingly.

A mutual evidence of this nature is void where it involves a right of participation in the witnesses.—If two persons give evidence that a particular person had bequeathed the third of his property to Zeyd and Amroo,—and Zeyd and Amroo, on the other hand, give evidence that the same person had bequeathed a third of his property to these two, the evidence of both parties is void and of no effect (and so likewise if the two were to give evidence that the person had bequeathed his male slave to Zeyd and Amroo,—and Zeyd and Amroo, on the other hand, give evidence that the said person had bequeathed his female slave to those two);—because as the evidence on each part tends, in those instances, to establish a right of participation, it is therefore not altogether free from suspicion.

BOOK III.
OF HERMAPHRODITES.

Section I.

Hermaphrodites are either male or female.—A Khouns, or hermaphrodite, is a person possessed of the parts of generation of both a man and a woman. If, therefore, such person discharge urine from the male member he* is accounted a male, or if from the female member, a female;—because it is so recorded in the traditions, and likewise reported from Alee; and also, because the circumstance of the urine being discharged from either member in particular, denotes that member to be the original, and the other merely a defect. If, on the contrary, the person discharge the urine from both members, regard is paid to that from which it first proceeds, as this denotes that member to be the original. If, on the other hand, the person discharge his urine from both members equally (that is, at one and the same time) he is a Khoonsamooshkil, or equivocal hermaphrodite, according to Hancefa.

Or ambiguous.—Non is any regard paid to the superior or inferior quantity of the urine in this instance, because a superiority of discharge from either member does not denote that member to be the primary, since this circumstance arises merely from the urinary passage in the one being wider than in the other. The two disciples maintain that regard must in this case be paid to the comparative quantity of urine; and consequently, that the sex is determined according to the member from which the greatest quantity proceeds; because this denotes that member to be the superior and original and also, because the greater quantity is, in effect of law, the whole. From whichever member, therefore, the principal quantity of circumcise is discharged, that member is accounted the superior. If, however, the urine proceed from both passages alike (that is, at the same time, and in equal quantity), the person is accounted an equivocal hermaphrodite, according to all our doctors, as in this case neither member possesses any superiority over the other.—What is here advanced applies solely to hermaphrodites not yet arrived at the age of maturity;—for upon an hermaphrodite attaining to maturity, if his beard grow, or he have connexion with a woman, or nocturnal emissions, or his breasts appear as those of a man; or contrariwise, as those of a woman; or as those being indisputable tokens of manhood;—but if the breasts swell like those of a woman, or the menstrual discharge appear, or pregnancy, or carnal connexion with a man, the hermaphrodite is accounted a female, such being the tokens of womanhood. If, on the contrary, no distinguishing tokens of either sex appear, or the tokens of both (such as a beard, with the breast of a woman), the person is an equivocal hermaphrodite.

Section II.

Of the Laws respecting equivocal Hermaphrodites.

An equivocal hermaphrodite.—It is a rule with respect to equivocal hermaphrodites, that they are required to observe all the more comprehensive points of the spiritual law, but not those concerning the propriety of which [in regard to them] any doubt exists.

Must take his station, in public prayers, between the men and the women.—An equivocal hermaphrodite, in standing behind the Imam for the purpose of prayer, must take his station immediately after the man and before the woman, as it is possible that he may be a man, and it is also possible that he may be a woman. If, therefore, he chance to stand among the women, he must recite the prayers repeatedly, for as it is possible he may be a man they would otherwise be nugatory. If, on the contrary, he stand among the men, his prayers are valid; but the men who are next to him are to recite their prayers repeatedly, out of caution, as it is possible that he may be a female.

Observing (in other respects) the customs of women.—It is laudable in an equivocal hermaphrodite to cover his head, during prayer, with the skirt of his garment, and also to sit in the posture of women; for if he be a man, this is merely a deviation from custom, which does not imply any positive illegality; but if he be a female, his neglecting so to do would induce an abomination, it being indisputably incumbent on women to be covered upon that occasion. It is also laudable in him, if he be without a garment, to recite the prayers repeatedly; but still the prayers are lawful although he should neglect so to do. It is, moreover, abominable in him to wear silk or jewels.

He must not appear before man or woman, or travel along with either, except a relation; and he must be circumcised by a slave purchased for that purpose.—It is abominable in an equivocal hermaphrodite to appear naked before either man or women, or to be in retirement with either man or woman except his prohibited relation. In the same manner, it is abominable in him to journey in company with a man other than his prohibited relation,—or with a woman notwithstanding she be a prohibited relation, as it is not lawful for two women to travel together, although they be relations. It is also abominable that he be circumcised by a slave purchased for a woman; and therefore, to perform this ceremony, a female salvo must be purchased at his expense;—or, if he be destitute of property, the price of such slave must be advanced to him, by way of loan, from the public treasury, with which he may purchase her for the purpose of circumcising him; and having so done, she is to be sold, and her price paid into the treasury, as he has then no further occasion for her.

Rules to be observed by him during a pilgrimage.—If an equivocal hermaphrodite undertake a pilgrimage during his adolescence (that is, when nearly arrived at maturity), Aboo Yusef declares he is uncertain which modes of dress is most proper for him to adopt;—for if he be a male, his wearing a seamed garment is abominable; and he be a female, it is abominable to wear any thing else. Mohammed, however, says that he ought to wear a seamed garment, in the same manner as woman; because it is still more abominable for a woman to neglect this during pilgrimage than for a man to wear it.

Divorce or emancipation, suspended upon the circumstance of sex, are not determined, in relation to an hermaphrodite.—If a man suspend the emancipation of his slave, or the divorce of his wife, upon the circumstance of her producing "a male child," and she be delivered of an hermaphrodite child the divorce or emancipation do not take place until the sex or condition of the child be fully ascertained, since the person cannot incur the penalty, in this instance, because of the doubt.

Until his sex be ascertained.—If a man declare, "all my male slaves are free, or, "all my female slaves are free,"—and he be possessed of an hermaphrodite slave, this slave is not emancipated until his real condition be ascertained, since here the master cannot be forsworn, because of the doubt.

If, on the contrary, he thus mention his male and female slaves together, the hermaphrodite is in that case emancipated, since one or other description applies to him indubitably, as he must be either a male or female. His declaration of his sex is not admitted. If an hermaphrodite declare himself to be a male, or a female, and he be of the equivocal description, his declaration is not credited as his plea is repugnant to the suggestion of proof. But if he be not of an equivocal description, his declaration may be credited, he being better acquainted with his own state than any other person.

Rules to be observed in his interment.—If an equivocal hermaphrodite die before his condition be ascertained, the ceremony of ablation must not be performed upon his body by either man or woman, neither of those being allowed to perform it to the other. Ablation, therefore, being impracticable in this instance, the ceremony of teryummim [rubbing with dust or sand] must be substituted for it;—and it is mentioned in the Jama Ramooz, that if the teryummim be performed by any other than a prohibited relation, the hand must be covered with a cloth.

If a hermaphrodite die at an age bordering on maturity (at twelve years of age, according to the Jama Ramooz), the corpse is not to have the ceremony of ablation performed upon it, whether it be male or female. Upon depositing it, moreover, in the tomb or grave it is laudable to cover the same with a cloth, this being indispensable with respect to woman, although not with respect to man.

When there is occasion to repeat the funeral prayers over a man, a woman, and a hermaphrodite, at the same time, the bier of the man must be placed next the Imam, that of the hermaphrodite next, and beyond all the bier of the woman.

Where there is any reason for interring a hermaphrodite in the same tomb [or grave] with a man, the former must be deposited after the latter, as it is possible that he may be a female; and a partition of earth must also be constructed between them. If, on the other hand, a hermaphrodite be interred in the same tomb [or grave] with a woman, he must be deposited first, as it is possible that he may be a man.

It is laudable to shroud the body of a hermaphrodite in the same manner as that of a woman, by wrapping it in five cloths; for, if it be a female, such is that ordained practice with respect to women; and if it be a male, that is merely an excess of two cloths, which is a matter of no moment.

Rules of inheritance with respect to hermaphrodites.—If a man die, leaving two children, one a hermaphrodite, and the other a son, in that case, according to Haneefa, the whole inheritance is divided between them in three shares, two going to the son, and one to the hermaphrodite; because he hold a hermaphrodite to be subject to the law of a woman, unless his condition be ascertained to be otherwise. Shobhaia, on the contrary, maintains that in this case the hermaphrodite is to receive half the share of a male heir, and half the share of a female,—by first calculating the amount of his shares, supposing him to be a male, and then the same supposing him to be a female, and adding the two together, and paying him a moiety of the added sums. Mohammed and Aboo Yousaf subscribe to this opinion. They however, differ in their exposition of it;—for Mohammed holds that the whole inheritance is to be divided into twelve parts, seven of which go to the son, and five to the hermaphrodite; whereas Aboo Yousaf alleges that it is to be divided into seven parts, four of which go to the son, and three to the hermaphrodite. The argument of Aboo Yousaf is that the son, if he stood alone, would be entitled to the whole inheritance; and the hermaphrodite, if he stood alone, would be entitled to three fourths of the inheritance,—he being entitled (when standing alone) to a half, if accounted a male, or to the whole, if accounted a female; for the whole property consists of four quarters, the half of which is two quarters—and these, being added together, make six quarters, the half of which is three. Where, therefore, those two unite in one inheritance, the estate is divided between them according to their respective proportions of right; and as the right of the son is to four fourths, and that of the hermaphrodite to three fourths, the former gets in the proportion of four, and the latter in the proportion of three—and accordingly, the whole inheritance is divided into seven parts, four of which go to the son, and three to the hermaphrodite. The argument of Mohammed is that, supposing the hermaphrodite to be a male, the inheritance would be divided between him and the son in equal shares; or supposing him (on the other hand) to be a female, it would be divided between them in three lots. We must therefore have recourse to the smallest number which admits of division by two and by three; and as this number is six, it follows that on the former supposition the inheritance is to be divided equally between the two, three shares of the six going respectively to each,—or that, on the latter supposition, it is to be divided between them in three lots, two shares of the six going to the hermaphrodite, and four shares to the son. The hermaphrodite, therefore, is entitled to two shares, unquestionably; and there being still a doubt with respect to the one redundant share that is divided into two. Hence the hermaphrodite gets two shares and an half; and a fraction thus falling to his share, the root of the proportion (six) must be multiplied by two, in order that there may be no fractions; * and the whole calculation, being twelve, will come out right, in this way, that five go to the

* That is, in order to reduce the whole to integral parts, hermaphrodite, and seven to the son. The argument of Haneefa is, that it is necessary, in the first place, to establish the hermaphrodite's right in the inheritance; and as the smaller portion of inheritance (namely, that of a woman) is unquestionable, and any thing beyond it is doubtful, that alone is to be established, and due, which is certain and indisputable, not any more, as a right to property is not admitted under any circumstance of doubt,—the point in question being, in fact, the same as where a doubt exists with respect to a right in property, founded on any other cause beside inheritance, in which case the unquestionable proportion only would be decreed, and so here likewise;—excepting, however, in the case of a smaller share* going to the hermaphrodite, supposing him to be a male; for then he would be entitled to the share of a son, since, in such instance, that would be his indisputable right; as where, for instance, a woman dies, leaving heirs her husband, mother, and a full sister; who is an hermaphrodite,—or, where a man dies, leaving heirs his wife, two maternal brothers, and a full sister who is an hermaphrodite;—in the former of which cases (according to Haneefa) one half of the property would descend to the husband, a third to the mother, and the remainder to the hermaphrodite,—and in the latter, a quarter would descend to the wife, a third to the two brothers and the remainder to the hermaphrodite; for in both these cases the remainder is smaller than either of the two full shares, that is, the share of the hermaphrodite supposing him to be a man, and the same supposing the hermaphrodite to be a woman.

CHAPTER THE LAST

MISCELLANEOUS CASES

The intelligible signs of a dumb person suffice to verify his bequests, and render them valid; but not those of a person merely deprived of speech.—Where people read a deed of bequest to a dumb person, and desire to know whether they shall testify such deed on his behalf? and the dumb person makes a sign by an inclination of the head, equivalent the expression of assent “Yes!” or, where a dumb person himself writes such deed, and they thus desire to know whether they shall testify it on his behalf? and he makes a sign; by an inclination of his head in the affirmative,—the bequest, provided the sign be made in such a manner as is commonly used to denote affirmation, is valid:—but this mode of affirmation by a sign does not suffice with respect to a person whose inability to speak is supereminent, occasioned (for instance) by some recent disorder; Shafei maintains that the sign in question is cogent and valid equally with respect to both; for the inability alone is the cause of its being at all admitted as sufficient, a cause which exists alike in both.—Our doctors, however, conceive a natural difference between a person originally dumb, and one who merely labours under a recent incapacity of speech, for various reasons.—First, signs are not cognizable, unless they be habitual and their meaning ascertained, which is the case with the signs of a dumb person, but not with the case of one who has merely lost his speech. (Still, however, our doctors hold that if this person be so long deprived of speech as to render signs habitual to him, and their meaning ascertained, he then stands in the same predicament with a dumb person in this particular.)—Secondly, the person in question is chargeable with a neglect in not having made his will before he had lost his speech, whereas no such neglect can be charged to the dumb person.—Thirdly, it is most probable that a recent incapacity of speech will be removed and yield to remedies which is not the case with dumbness, and therefore there is no analogy between them.

A dumb person may execute marriage, divorce, purchase or sale, and sue for or incur punishment, by means of either signs or writings; but he cannot thereby sue for or incur retaliation.—Where a dumb person is capable of either writing intelligibly, or making intelligible signs, marriage, divorce, purchase, of sale, declared by him, are valid, and retaliation is also executed on his behalf, or upon him; but he is not liable to punishment, nor is punishment inflicted on his behalf. His written deeds are valid, and cognizable, for this reason, that the writing of an absentee is equivalent to the oral declaration of a person actually present (in such manner that the Prophet, in promulgating his laws, sometimes used one mode, and sometimes another); and necessity is the ground of validity with respect to the writing of an absentee, which ground exists still more strongly in the case of a dumb person.

—It is to be observed that writings are of three different sorts or descriptions; I regular testimonials† (meaning, such as are

* Namely, a smaller share than the half of the whole.
† This might be rendered, with more strict property, “a fraternal connexion,” an hermaphrodite being, in fact, neither a brother nor sister. The translator, however, thinks it most advisable to adhere literally to the original,

* Meaning, punishment for offences against God, namely, for whoredom and slander; as is explained a little farther on.
‡ Arab. Moost'beon Marsom. † is a technical term, applied to all regular deeds, contracts, &c.
executed upon paper, and have a regular title, superscription, and so forth, as is customary), which are equivalent to a real declaration, whether the person be present or absent: II. irregular testimonials* (meaning, such as are not written upon paper, but upon a wall, or the leaf of a tree, or, upon paper without any title or superscription), which are not admitted as proof farther than merely as they signify the writer's object or design: and II. writings which are not testimonials in any sense† (meaning, such as are delineated in the air, or upon water), which, as they are merely, equivalent to words not heard, are no way cognizable, nor attended with any effect.—With respect to signs made by a dumb person, they are recognized in the cases of marriage, divorce, and so forth (as mentioned above), from necessity, since those are matters in which the right of the individual alone is concerned, and which are not restricted to any particular form of words, but are even, in some instance (such as of Beesyo-Taata, or sale by a mutual surrender), effectuated without any words whatever: and retaliation also is a right of the individual,—But there is no necessity for punishment, as that is a right of God, whence the prevention of it by the existence of any doubt), and therefore, if a dumb person verify the report of a slanderer, still he is not liable to punishment,—neither is punishment inflicted upon him if he himself slander another by signs, because the slander is not express, which is the condition of its being punishable.—The difference between punishment and retaliation is, that the former is not established by doubtful evidence, whereas the latter is as all other matters of charge a particular person with "illegal carnal connexion," or a person make confession of "illegal carnal connexion," till punishment is not to be inflicted; whereas if witnesses testify to "a murder" in general terms, or a person make a confession of "a murder," retaliation is inflicted, although the term "wilful" should not have been expressly mentioned.—The ground of this is that retaliation possesses the character of reciprocity, as having been ordained for the preparation of injuries; and it is therefore admitted to be established notwithstanding a doubt, in the same manner as all other matters of reciprocity which concern the rights of the individual.—With respect, on the contrary, in such punishments as are inflicted purely in right of God, they have been ordained for the purpose of determent; and as that does not bear the character of reciprocity, punishment, as not being a matter of necessity, is not established under any circumstance of doubt. —Mohammed, in treating of Acknowledgments,* says "the writing of an absentee is not cognizable as proof, with respect to retaliation upon himself, such acknowledgment send a written acknowledgment, inducing retaliation upon himself, such acknowledgment is not cognizable). Our author remarks, upon this passage, that it may be taken in two ways. First, by the absentee may be meant any absentee, whether dumb or otherwise; and on this construction the point admits of two determinations: the one what is here mentioned; and the other, what has been before recited. Secondly, by the absentee may be meant a person who is not dumb;—and if he [Mohammed] had said "the writing of an absentee, not being dumb, is not cognizable as proof with respect to retaliation, since, having the power of speech, it is possible that he may himself appear, and make an express confession by word of mouth;—an expectation which cannot be entertained with respect to a dumb person, since it is impossible that such person should speak, as to make an express oral confession." Some of our doctors entertain an apprehension that the signs of a dumb person, who is at the same time able to write, are cognizable; because signs are admitted as proof purely from necessity, which does not exist in this instance.—This apprehension, however, is repugnant to what has been before mentioned, as from that we are to infer that the signs of a dumb person are cognizable, notwithstanding he be capable of writing; for as it is their said that " if a dumb person make signs, or write, it is valid," it follows that signs and writings are of equal weight, and that either of them suffices;—the reason of which is that signs and writings are, both of them, admitted as proofs purely from necessity; and as, on the one hand, writing possesses an explicitness of whole signs are destitute (the design or meaning of the person being ascertained indubitably from what he writes), whereas signs are of an ambiguous nature, so, on the other hand, signs possess an explicitness of which writings are destitute, as they approach still nearer to speed;—and signs and writings are therefore upon an equal footing. The writing of a person who has been deprived of the use of speech by any accident, for two or three days, is not cognizable, any more than that of an absentee who is not dumb, since there is still room to hope that he may be able to speak, as his organs of speech remain.

mixed with those of carrion* goates, and the one be not known from the other, and the number slaughtered exceed the number of carrion the persons about to use them must make a deliberate selection, and eat such only as they suppose most likely to have been lawfully slain.—But if the number of carrion exceed the number slaughtered, or if they be equal in number, none of them must be used.—What is here advanced applies solely to a situation which admits a latitude of choice; for in a situation of necessity the selection may be made under either circumstance, and those used which the people suppose most likely to have been lawfully slain: because as, in time of want, indubitable carrion is allowed to be lawful, it follows that what comes within the possibility of having been duly slain is lawful a fortiori: but still a deliberate selection must be made, since it is most likely that by this means those will be used which have been duly slain; and the selection is therefore not to be dispensed with except in cases of extreme urgency. Shafei maintains that, in a situation which admits a latitude of choice it is not lawful to eat any of the goats, notwithstanding the number of those duly slain exceed the number of the carrion; for as the selection is an argument of necessity, it is not to be practised except in a case of necessity, which does not apply to a situation admitting a latitude of choice. The argument of our doctors is, that the circumstance of the slain goats exceeding the carrion in number is equivalent to necessity, whence the eating of some of them is lawful after a due selection;—in the same manner as it is lawful to take and use articles sold in a Mussulman market, because of the greater number of commodities there exhibited being lawful, notwithstanding a market be not altogether free from certain prohibited articles, such as stolen or usurped goods, and the like; the ground of which is, that as it is not always possible to make a distinction with respect to small matters, a regard to them is remitted, since otherwise the business of life could not be carried on; and accordingly, a small degree of dirt, or of nakedness, in prayer, is not of any moment. In a case, therefore, where the number of slaughtered goats exceeds that of the carrion, the eating of some of them is allowed, from a species of necessity. It is otherwise where the number of the carrion exceeds or equals that of the slain; for in this case, supposing the situation to be such as admits a latitude of option, no necessity whatever exists.

Acknowledgments—
Chapter I.—Of Ikrar, or acknowledgments, 427
Definition of the term, 427
Acknowledgment proceeding from a competent person is binding upon the acknowledger, 427
But not upon any other person, 427
The points that establish competency are freedom, 427
Sanity of mind and maturity, 427
Acknowledgment is not invalidated by ignorance of the subject, 427
But it is so by ignorance of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made, 428
Acknowledgments generally made must be specified to relate to something of a valuable nature, 428
And if more be claimed than the acknowledger specifies, his assertion upon oath is credited, 428
An acknowledgment expressed under the general term property, must be received according to the explanation of the acknowledger, 428
But if made to a great property, it cannot mean less than what constitutes a Nisab in the property to which it relates, 428
Cases of acknowledgment relating to many dirms, 429
Or to dirms generally, 429
Acknowledgment made in favour of an embryo, in virtue of bequest or inheritance, is valid, 429
Provided the birth take place within a probable period, 429
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS—continued.
And if the embryo prove still born, the thing acknowledged must be divided among the heirs, or if twins be born it must be divided between them, 439
But if such acknowledgment be ascribed to an impossible cause, it is null, 429
And so also if it be made without specifying any cause, 429
Acknowledgment relating to a thing existing but not yet produced is valid, 429
Acknowledgment of a debt under a condition of option is valid, and the condition becomes null, 429
Chapter II.
Of exceptions, and what is deemed equivalent to exceptions:
The exception of the part of a thing acknowledged is valid, if immediately joined with the acknowledgment; but if the whole be excepted, the exception is not attended to, 430
The exception must be homogeneous with the acknowledgment, otherwise it is invalid, 430
A reservation of the will of God renders the acknowledgment null, 430
In an acknowledgment regarding a house, an exception of the foundation is invalid, 430
An exception of the court yard of a house is admitted, 431
A reservation of non-delivery of the article is done away by the delivery of it to the acknowledgment, 431
Objection, 431
Reply, 431
But in case of a disagreement with respect to the article, both parties must be sworn, 431
If the article be not specific, the reservation is not regarded, 431
A reservation of non-receipt of the thing acknowledged must be credited, 432
A reservation of the cause of obligation being illegitimate does not annul the acknowledgment, 432
An exception with respect to the quality of money acknowledged to be due, is set aside by the counter-assertion of the person in whose favour the acknowledgment is made, 432
But not when the exception relates to the species and not to the quality, 433
An exception with respect to the quality is admitted if the cause of the obligation is not mentioned by the acknowledgment, 433
And also where it is mentioned, if it be either usurpation or trust, 433
With respect to the deposit or usufruct of Satooka dirds, 433
An exception of a part from the whole is not to be credited if made separately, 434
Unless this arise from some unavoidable accident, 434
In an, of usurpation or damages, article must be accepted, 434
Where the property is lost, if the acknowledgment allege a trust and the other party assert an usurpation, the acknowledgment is responsible, 434

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS—continued
Objection, 434
Reply, 434
But not if he assert a trust and the other a loan, 434
Case of the, of receipt of money with a reservation of its being the property of the acknowledgment, 435
Case of the, of receipt of specific property with a reservation to the same effect, 435
Case of a dispute with respect to immovable property, 435
Chapter III.
Of acknowledgments made by sick persons, 436
Debts acknowledged on a death-bed (without assigning the cause of them), are preceded by debts of every other description, 436
Objection, 436
Reply, 436
A dying person cannot concede any specific property, 437
Nor make a partial discharge of his debts, excepting those contracted during his illness, 437
A debt acknowledged upon a death-bed is discharged after all other debts, 437
If there be no other debts it is discharged previous to the distribution of the inheritance, 437
An in favour of an heir, is not valid unless admitted by the co-heirs, 437
And so also of an, in favour of a part of the heirs, 438
The, of a dying person in favour of a stranger is valid to the amount of the whole estate, 438
Objection, 438
Reply, 438
But it is annulled by a subsequent acknowledgment that the stranger is his son, 438
In favour of a repudiated wife, 438
Of parentage with respect to infants, 439
With respect to parents, children, and patrons are valid, 439
If confirmed by the parties, 439
The, of a dying persons with respect to an uncle or a brother, entitles them to inherit if he have no other heirs, but does not establish their parentage, 439
Of a brother by the heir entitles to inheritance, but does not establish parentage, 440
Of, made by a co-heir of the partial payment of a debt owing to the person from whom the inheritance descends, 440

AGENCY—continued.

Chapter I.

A person may lawfully appoint another an agent to act on his behalf in contracts, 376

And for the management of suits or criminal prosecutions, or for the payment or execution of all rights, except retaliation or punishment, 377

Objection, 377

Reply, 377

A person under accusation may employ an agent to conduct his defence, 377

Cannot be appointed to manage a suit unless the constitutent be sick or absent, 377

Or about to travel, 378

A woman may appoint an agent for litigation in all cases, 378

To be valid, must proceed from a competent constitutent, and must be vested in a person of understanding, 378

A Mahijoor slave, or an infant capable of understanding, may be appointed an agent, 378

But the obligations they enter into are not binding upon them, but upon their constituent, 378

Contract concluded by agents are either such as the agent refers to himself, 378

Or to his constitutent, 379

An agent cannot be appointed to receive a loan, 379

A debt contracted to an agent cannot be extracted by his constitutent, 379

But if payment be made to the constitutent it is valid, 379

And the debtor may (in his payment) deduct a debt owing him by the constitutent, 379

Or by the agent when he alone is indebted to him, 379

Chapter II.

Of Agency for Purchase and Sale, 379

For purchase, 379

An agent must be properly instructed with respect to what he is to purchase, 379

Except where his powers are general, 379

An agency is invalid where the terms in which it is expressed leave a great degree of uncertainty with respect to the subject of it, unless in case of subsequent explanaation, 381

A power to purchase taam (food) is restricted to the purchase of wheat or flour, 380

An agent may return goods purchased by him to the seller on account of a defect, 380

But not after having delivered them to his constituent, 380

A right of preemption may be enforced against an agent before deliver to his constitutent, but not afterwards, 380

Agency in Sirf or Sillim is valid, 381

An agent paying for goods with his own money is entitled to repayment from his constitutent, 381

He may detain from his constitutent what he purchase, until he be paid the price, 381

But if the purchase perish in the agent’s hands during such detention, he is responsible 381

AGENCY—continued.

Case of an agent purchasing, at the rate of his instruction, a larger quantity of an article than was specified in the instruction, 382

An agent cannot purchase for himself any specific article which he is directed to purchase for his constitutent, 382

Unless he purchase it for something of a different nature from the price specified, 382

Or through the mediation of another agent, 382

Case of, in purchase of an indefinite slave, 382

Which admits of four descriptions, 383

Case of dispute between the agent and constitutent respecting a slave who, after being purchased by the agent, dies in his hands, 383

In a case of dispute between an agent and constitutent respecting the purchase of a specific slave, the declaration of the agent must be credited, 383

An agent avowing his commission cannot afterwards retract, unless the alleged constitutent deny the commission, 384

An agent is not at liberty, if he choose, to purchase only one of two slaves specified, 384

But not if the purchase be at an evident disadvantage, 384

Nor if the price exceed the rate expressed in his instructions, unless the difference be trifling, 384

An agent may liquidate a debt due from him to his constitutent by the purchase of a specific article, 385

But if the article be not specified, and perish, after purchase, in the agent’s hands, the debt is not liquidated, 385

Where an agent and constitutent disagree respecting a purchase, a judgment must be given according to the value, 385

Or according to the declaration of the seller, 386

Of the appointment of agent by slaves for the purpose of purchasing their own persons in their own behalf, 386

A person may employ a person to purchase his freedom from his master, 386

A slave may act as the agent of another person in purchasing his own freedom, 387

Objection, 387

Reply, 387

Of Agency for Sale, 387

An agent for sale cannot sell to his father or grandfather, 387

He may sell the article committed to him at whatever rate, and in return for whatever commodity he think fit, 387

Objection, 388

Reply, 388

An agent may purchase a thing at any rate not greatly exceeding the value, 388

An agent for the sale of a slave may lawfully sell any part or portion of him, 388

An agent for the purchase of a slave may purchase him either wholly or in shares, 388
An agent to whom an article of sale is returned by a decree of the Kazee, in consequence of an original defect, may return it to his constituent, who must receive it back without any suit, 389

Objection, 389

Reply, 389

And so also where the defect is supervenient, provided the Kazee's decree be not founded on the agent's acknowledgment, 389

In which case the constituent is not obliged to receive it back without a suit, 389

If the defect be original, the constituent must receive back the article from his agent without litigation, whether it be returned by the purchaser in consequence of his [the purchaser's] acknowledgment or not, 390

A constituent must be credited with respect to his instructions, 390

An agent for sale is not responsible for consequences, 390

Miscellaneous Cases :-

Joint agents cannot act separately without a mutual occurrence, 391

Objection 391

Reply, 391

Except in the management of a suit, 391

Gratuitous divorce or manumission the restoration of a deposit, or the discharge of a debt, 391

An agent cannot appoint a secondary agent, 391

Unless by consent of his constituent, or unless his powers be discretionary, 391

Contracts entered into by a secondary agent in the presence of the primary are, however, valid, 391

And they are also valid, although made in his absence, provided he afterwards consent to them, 392

And the same of a contract engaged in by any stranger, 392

Or that (in a case of purchase or sale) the constituent has previously fixed the rate, 392

Joint agents must act together, although the constituent have fixed the rate, 392

A Mokatib, a slave, or a Zimme, cannot act on behalf of an infant daughter, being a Mussalima, 392

And the same of an apostate or infidel alien, 392

Chapter III.

Of the Appointment of Agents for Litigation and for Seisin.

Khasoomat, or litigation, means a conversation carried on between two persons in the way of contention and disagreement, 292

Agency for litigation implies and involves an agency for seisin, 392

But decrees are passed on the contrary principle in the present times, 393

An agent empowered to take possession of a debt is also an agent for litigation, 393

A commission to take possession of substance does not involve a commission to litigate, 393

An agent for litigation is empowered to make concession on behalf of his constituent, 394

Case of an appointment of agency with an exception of acknowledgment, 394

Agency for the receipt of a debt committed to the surety for the debt is invalid, 395

Case of a plea of agency urged for the receipt of a debt in absence of the constituent, 395

Objection, 396

Reply, 396

Case of a plea of agency urged for the receipt of a trust in absence of the constituent, 396

A person commissioned to receive a trust on the plea of having purchased it, is not entitled to receive it from the trustee, 396

A person commissioned to receive a debt is entitled to receive it, although the debtor pleads his having already paid it, 396

The seller of an article cannot be compelled to take back the article from the purchaser's agent on a plea of defect, until the purchaser swears to the defect, 396

A person receiving money to appropriate to a particular purpose, may pay his own money in lieu of it, 397

Chapter IV.

Of the Dismissal of Agents :-

A constituent may dismiss his agent at pleasure, except where the right of another person is concerned, 397

An agency continues in force until the agent receives due notice of his dismissal, 397

A commission of agency is annulled by the death, confirmed lunacy, or apostasy, of the constituent, 397

But not by apostasy if the constituent be a woman, 398

Case in which an appointment of agency by a Mokatib, a Mazoon, or a co-partner are annulled, 398

A commission of agency is annulled by the death or lunacy of the agent, 398

Or by his apostasy and flight to a hostile country, 398

Agency is not renewed by the repentance and return of an apostate constituent, 399

Agency for any particular act is annulled by the constituent himself performing that act, 399

An agency dissolved by any act of the constituent cannot afterwards revive, 399

APPROPRIATIONS, 231

Definition of, and various opinions respecting it, 231

Alienation of an article appropriated is completed by a decree of the magistrate, and the declaration of the appropriator, or the consignment of it to a procurator, 232

A decree of the magistrate fixes the appropriation, but the decision of a referee does not, 233

Case of an appropriation made upon a death-bed, 233

The appropriator's right of property is destroyed; but without a transfer of that right to any other person, 233

Any undefined part of a thing may be appropriated, 233

Case of appropriation of land, where an indefinite portion of it afterwards appears to be the property of another person, 234

The object of an appropriation must be of a perpetual nature, 234

Objection, 294

Reply, 234

Appropriation of immovable and of movable property, 234

The appropriation of articles in which it is not customary is unlawful, 235

An appropriation cannot be sold or transferred, 235

But it may be divided off, where it consists of an undefined part of anything, 235

APPROPRIATIONS—continued.

In case of dividing it off, the payment of a balance made by the appropriator is lawful, but if made to the appropriator it invalidates the appropriation, 236

The income of an appropriation must be expended (in the first instance) upon keeping it in repair, 236

Unless the appropriator be rich, in which case he is answerable for the repairs, 236

But in such degree only as may suffice to preserve it in its original state, 236

Of persons who are not liable to Claims, 413

A person is not liable to a claim who sets up a plea of disposit, pledge, or usurpation in the article claimed, supported by the testimony of witnesses, unless he be a person of notoriously bad character, 413

Or that his witnesses bear defective testimony, 414

Or is liable if he set up a plea of right of property, 414

Or if the plaintiff sue him on a plea of theft or usurpation, although he produce evidence to prove a trust, 414

And so also if the plaintiff sue upon a plea of theft without specifying the thief, 414

But not if the plaintiff sue him on a plea of purchase, 415

Chapter IV.

Of things claimed by two Plaintiffs, 415

If the, be laid to a thing of a divisible nature, and the proofs on each part be equal, the thing must be adjudged equally between both claimants, 415

If it be a wife, the right must be adjudged according to her declaration, 415

Or if the witnesses specify dates, according to the prior date, 415

A decree adjudging a wife to a single claimant, cannot be reversed in favour of a subsequent claimant, unless his witnesses prove a priority of date, 416

The claimants to a slave on a plea of purchase, upon his being adjudged between them, are severally at liberty to pay half the price or to relinquish the bargain, 416

But if they specify and prove dates, the slave must be adjudged to the prior purchaser, 416

Where one party pleads purchase and the other gift and seisin, without specifying dates, the article must be adjudged to the purchaser, 416

Objection, 417

Reply, 417

A claimant on a plea of purchase, and a claimant on a plea of marriage, are upon an equal footing, 417

Two claims equally supported, must be determined by the priority of date, 417

Two pleas of purchaser, preferred against one person, must also be determined by the oldest date, 417

If against two different persons; the article is adjudged equally between both claimants, 417

Unless one only adduces evidence to a date, when it must be adjudged to him, 418

Where four claimants plead a right in a thing as derived from four different persons, the article is adjudged among them in equal lots, 418

Claim—continued

The evidence of the possessor must be preferred to that of the plaintiff, where it proves a prior date of right, 418

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff is preferred where the claim is laid absolutely, 418

And the same where the subject in dispute is immovable property, 418

Case of claims to animals, founded upon generation, 419

Or to any other property, founded upon a cause of right, equivalent to generation, 419

The possessor of an article, proving his having purchased it from the claimant, sets aside his plea, 419

If each party prove a purchase from the other (without specifying the date), no decree can take place, 419

And so also if each prove payment of the price, 420

In disputes concerning land, a decree must be passed in favour of the last purchaser, 420

The production of any number of witnesses above the lawful number makes no difference with respect to the decree, 420

Case of a claim made by two persons to a house where one claims the half and the other the whole, 421

In claims founded upon generation, regard must be paid to the date stated by the claimant, 421

One party pleading a trust and the other asserting an usurpation, each is upon an equal footing, 421

Of disputes concerningPossession:—

The possession of an animal is ascertained by any act which implies an use of the animal, 421

The right of one using a thing is preferable to that of one laying hold of it, 421

Right of possession over a founding is established by his own acknowledgment, 422

A decree cannot be issued respecting a claim to land without the adduction of evidence, 422

Chapter V.

Of Claim of Parentage:—

A claim made by the seller of a female slave to a child born of her, within less than six months after the sale, is established, 422

And if the purchaser make the same claim, still the claim of the seller is preferred, 422

If the birth happen within from six months to two years after the sale, his claim is not admitted without the verification of the purchaser, 422

The mother become his Am-Walid if the child be living at the time of the claim, 423

If made by the seller after the mother has been emancipated by the purchaser, it is valid; but if the child should have been emancipated by him, it is null, 423
CLAIM—continued.
A claim made by the original seller after a second sale is valid, and that sale is null, 423
A claim established with respect to one twin, establishes it with respect to the other also, 424
A claim of offspring cannot be established after an acknowledgment in favour of another person, 424
A claim of parentage made by a Christian is preferable to a claim of bondage advanced by a Mussulman, 425
A claim of parentage by a married woman is not admitted unless at least one woman testify to the birth, 426
Or (if she be in her Edit) one man and two woman, 426
But if her husband verify her claim, there is no occasion for such evidence, 426

1. With acknowledgment
2. Under silence
3. And after denial, 441
By concession of property for property, is equivalent to sale, 441
And is rendered invalid by an ignorance of the thing to be given in, 441
By a concession of usufruct is equivalent to hire, 441
But the term of usufruct must be specified, 441
After denial, are equivalent to an exchange with respect to the plaintiff, but not with respect to the defendant, 441
The concession of a house by a, does not induce a right to shaffa, 442
Objection, 442
Reply, 442
But shaffa is induced by the act of giving a house in, 442
Cases in which part of thing given must be restored, 442
If the, be after denial or silence, and the thing compounded for prove the right of another, the consideration must be returned, and the plaintiff must lay his claim against him who has the right, 442
And the same, proportionally, where any part of it proves the property of another, 442
If the thing given in, after acknowledgment, prove the right of another, it must be restored, and the plaintiff is entitled to an equivalent from the defendant, 442
If this happen in, after silence or denial, the plaintiff must claim from defendant the article in dispute, 443
A, for an undefined part of a thing is not affected by the right of another afterwards appearing to a part of that thing, 443
In consideration of, a part of the subject is invalid, 443
Disputes concerning property may be compounded, 443
And also claims of usufruct, 443
Are lawful in homicide, 443
But if acceded to for one unlawful articles nothing is due, 444
There is no, for punishment, 443

Chapter III
Of Compositions of Debt:—
A debt owing in consequence of any contract concluded, when credit may be compounded by payment of a part, 448
And the same of similar debt owing in consequence of any act which subjects to responsibility, 448
Debt may be compounded by a forbearance of the same sum, 448
But not if the postponed payment be stipulated in money of a different denomination, 448
A postponed debt cannot be compounded by the immediate payment of a part, 448
A debt of bad money cannot be compounded by the payment of a smaller sum in good money, 448
But a debt of good money may be compounded by bad, whether the sum be smaller than or equal to the demand, 449
A debt in money of two denominations may be compounded by a smaller sum of either denomination, 449
Case of a proposal from a creditor to grant his debtor a complete discharge on condition of his paying one-half of the debt within a limited time, 449
Which admits of three different statements:—
I. Yhere the proposal has no condition attached in failure of payment.
COMPOSITION—continued.
II. Where it is annexed that in failure of payment the proposal shall be void, 449
A acknowledgment may be stipulated for a, 450
But if the stipulation be publicly proposed, the composition is of no effect, 450
Of participated debts, 450
One of two partners compounding his share of a debt due to them jointly, the other partner may either take his proportion of the, or look to the debtor for his share, 450
One of two partners receiving payment of his share in a debt due to them jointly, and paying the other his proportion of what is recovered, has still a claim upon them remainder, 450
If the other prefer receiving payment of his part solely from the debtor, and the property be lost, or the debtor prove insolvent, he has then a claim to his proportion of what has been received by his partner, but not where his partner has compounded for his share by a commutation, 450
In a release from a part of his share by one partner, the right of his creditor continues in proportion to their remaining claims, 451
One of two partners may agree to a postponement of payment, 451
One of two partners receives his share by usurping anything from the debtor or by losing or destroying anything belonging to him, or by accepting a lease in, or by burning a piece of cloth, his property, 451
One of two partners annuls his share by marrying the debtor (being a female) and settling his share of the debt as her dower, or by compounding with it for an offence, 451
Or compounding his share of the debt by a purchase, the other may either take his share from the debtor or an equivalent for his proportion in receipt from the purchaser 451
Objection, 452
Reply, 452
One of two partners in a silih contract cannot compound for his share, 452
Of Takharij, 452
Definition, 452
Heirs may compound with a co-heir for his share of inheritance, consisting of lands or effects, by any equivalent, 453
Or by one precious metal where the inheritance is in another, 452
An inheritance of bullion or effects may be compounded for by gold or silver; but this gold or silver must exceed the share of the same metal inherited; and the heir must be put in possession of such excess at the time of adjusting the, 453
An inheritance of money may be compounded for by money, each species being opposed to the other respectively, 453
INDEX.

Composition—continued.
The inheritance of a debt cannot be compounded, except by the heir agreeing to release the debtor from his proportion, 453
Or by the other heirs paying him that proportion gratuitously, 451
Or lending it to him, to transfer to the debtor, 453

Compacts of:
Compacts of cultivation or Mozarea, 578
Definition of the term, 579
Difference of opinions concerning compacts of cultivation, 591
They require that the ground be capable of cultivation, 579
That the parties be duly qualified, 579
That the term of their continuance be expressed, 579
That the party be specified who is to supply the seed, 579
That the share of the other party be expressed, 579
That the land be delivered unto the cultivator, 580 Cultivation—continued.
That both parties participate in the produce, 580
And that the particular seeds be mentioned, 580
Of compacts of cultivation, four descriptions
And two are invalid, 580
The period of their duration must be known, and the produce must be participated between the parties in indefinite proportions; 580
If the grain alone be mentioned, the straw goes to him who supplies the seed, 581
And it may be stipulated to go to him, 581
But it cannot be stipulated to go to the other, 581
The produce is participated according to agreement, and if nothing be produced, the cultivator has no claim, 581
Where the contract proves invalid, the produce goes to him who furnishes the seed and the other party, 581
If he be the cultivator, gets wages, not exceeding his right under the compact, 581
Or if the proprietor of the ground, an adequate rent, 581
And also an adequate hire for the cattle, if supplied by him, 5 2
If it be the proprietor who thus gets the produce, he may keep the whole, but if the cultivator, he must bestow the surplus in charity, 582
The party who agrees to supply the seed is at liberty to retract previous to the sowing, 582
And if the proprietor of the ground thus retract, the cultivator is not entitled to anything, 582
The compact is annulled on the decease of either party, 582
If the proprietor of the ground die when the crop has appeared, the compact is dissolved at the end of that year, 582
But if he die before that, it is dissolved immediately, 582
The proprietor of the ground may dissolve the compacts with a view to sell the ground for the discharge of his debts, 58
But if the crop be growing, the sale must be delayed until it be ready for cutting, 583
Rules in case of the compact expiring before the crop is ready to cut, 583
If the cultivator die, his heirs may continue the cultivation, but are not entitled to wages, 583
The incidental charges are sustained by the parties in proportion to their respective shares, 583

DEPOSITS—
Deposits, or Widda, 471
Definition of the terms used in deposit, 471,
A trustee is not responsible for a deposit
unless he transgress with respect to it, 471
He may keep it himself, or commit the care of it to any of his family, 471
But if he give charge of it to a stranger, he becomes responsible, 472
And so also if he lodge it in a place of custody belonging to another, 472
He is not made responsible by putting in out of his own possession with a view to the immediate preservation of it, 472
He becomes responsible on neglecting to deliver it on demand, 472
If he mix it inseparably with his own property, he must make the proprietor a compensation, 472

Deposits—continued.
If the mixture be occasioned by accident, the proprietor becomes a proportionate sharer in the whole, 473
If the trustee expend a part, and supply the deficiency by mixture from his own property, he is responsible for the whole, 473
In case of transgression with respect to the deposit, the trustee is responsible so long as the transgression continues, 473
If the trustee deny the deposit upon demand
he is responsible in case of the of it, 474
But not if the denial be made to a stranger, 474
A trustee is at liberty to carry the deposit with him upon a journey, 474 Provided the contract be absolute, the road safe, and the journey necessary, 474
Unless this be expressly prohibited, 474
In a case of a deposit by two persons, the trustee cannot deliver to either his share but in presence of the other, 474
Two persons receiving a divisible article in trust, must each keep a half, 475 Restrictions are not regarded where they are repugnant to custom or convenience, 475 Or where they relate to the particular apartment of a house, 475
Where the deposit is transferred to a second trustee, and lost, the proprietor receives his compensation from the original trustee,

But if one of them only be converted, separation takes place, 63
Divorce—continued.

If the conversion of either happen in a foreign country, separation takes place upon the lapse of the woman’s term of probation, 65

If the wife be an alien, she is not to observe an edit from separation in consequence of her husband’s conversion, 65

The conversion of the husband of a Kitabee does not occasion separation, 65

Case of a convert removing from a foreign land into a Mussulman territory, 65

A women entering from a foreign to a Mussulman country, is at liberty to marry, 66

But if pregnant, she must wait until her delivery, 66

In the case of apostasy, separation takes place without divorce, 66

Chapter II.

Of delegation of, 87

Definition of the phrase, 87

Section I.

Of Ikhtiyar, or Option, 87

Delegation by option confers on the wife a power of divorcing herself; but this right of option is restricted to the precise place or situation in which she receives it, 87

And is annulled by her removal, 87

Intention on the part of the husband is requisite to constitute a delegation, 87

Under this form a single divorce only takes place, whatever may be the intention, 88

And to effect, it is requisite that the personal pronoun be mentioned by one or other of the parties, 88

That is, either by the husband, in his declaration, 88

Or by the wife in her reply, 88

Takes place, although her option of it be expressed in the Mozaree or common tenor, 88

Where the husband gives a power of option thrice repeated, and the wife make only a single reply, yet three divorces take place from it, independent of the husband’s intention, 88

Where the word, is mentioned by the husband, the, which follows is reversible, 89

Section II

Of Amir-ba-Yed, or Liberty:——

In the delegation of liberty, takes place according to the number mentioned by the wife, independent of the husband’s intention, and the, which follow is irreversible, 89

Delegation of liberty may be restricted to a particular time, or to several different specified periods of time, 89

Objection, 89

Reply, 89

And it is not annulled by the wife’s rejection of it, until the time or time mentioned be fully expired, 89

The time of it may be fixed for the occurrence of any specified event, 90

It is not annulled by delay (where there is no specification of time), nor until the wife rises from her seat, &c., 90

But it is annulled on the instant of her rising from her seat, 90

It is not annulled by a change of posture from a more active to a more quiescent position, 90
DIVORCE—continued.
A wife may signify her wish to consult her friends without prejudice to her right of option.
Section III.
Of Masheeat, or Will:—
Where a man empowers his wife to, herself in express terms, the, which follows is reversible, 91
Although her reply be expressed in the form of an irreversible, 91
Her power, when thus granted, cannot be retracted, 91
The power may be granted generally, 92
A wife empowered to give herself three divorces, may give herself one, 92
But when empowered to give herself one, she cannot give three, 92
Where the wife's reply disagrees with the husband's declaration with respect to the nature of the, it takes place according to his declaration, not according to her reply, 92
When the power is conditional upon the pleasure of the wife it is annulled by her reply, and is according with the husband's declaration, 92
And also by her suspending her will upon that of her husband, 93
When the power is expressed with an unrestricted particle (in respect to time), it is perpetual, extending to all times and places, 93
But not when it is expressed with an unrestricted particle in respect to place, 93
Chapter IV.
Of, by Yameen, or Conditional Vow, 94
Definition of Yameen with respect to, 91
Pronounced with reference to a future marriage, takes place upon the occurrence of such marriage, 94
Or upon the occurrence of any other circumstance on which it may be conditionally suspended, 95
Provided it be pronounced during an actual, or with reference to an eventual, possession of authority, 95
Objection, 94

Of Istisna, that is, Reservation or Exception 99
With a reservation of the will of God, does not take place, 99

DIVORCE—continued.
Unless it be pronounced with a pause between the, and the reservation, 99
Objection, 99
Reply, 99
Pronounced with an exception in point of number, takes place accordingly, 99
Chapter V.
Of the Divorce of the Sick:—
A wife divorced by a dying husband inherits if he die before the expiration of her Edit, 99
Unless she be divorced at her own request, or by her own option, or for a compensation, 100
In case of any possible collusion between the parties, by the husband, after a declared, acknowledging himself indebted to her, or bequeathing her a legacy, she receives whatever may be of least value, inheritance, debt, or legacy, 100
Pronounced in a situation of danger, cuts off the wife from her inheritance, unless the danger be imminent or certain, 101
A conditional, pronounced in sickness, does not cut off the wife from her inheritance, unless the condition be her own act, 101
Objection, 102
Reply, 102
Provided that act be of an avoidable nature, 102
Where recovery intervenes between a sick-bed and the death of the husband, the wife is cut off from inheritance, 102
And so also where her apostasy intervenes, 102
But not where her incest intervenes, 102
Occasioned by the slander of a dying husband does not cut off the wife from her inheritance, 103
And so also of a death-bed, occasioned by Aila, 103
Where a death-bed, is reversible the wife inherits in every case, 103
Chapter VI.
Of Rijaat, or returning to a divorced wife, 103
Definition of Rijaat, 103
A man may return to a wife repudiated by one or two reversible divorces, 103
Provided he do so before the expiration of her Edit, 103
Rijaat is of two kinds, express and implied, 103
The evidence of witnesses to Rijaat laudable, but not incumbent, 104
The wife should have due notice of it, 104
A declaration of previous Rijaat, made after the declaration of the Edit, is to be credited where both parties agree in it, 104
But not where they disagree, 104
The declaration of a wife who is a slave must be credited respecting the termination of her Edit, 104
At what time the power of Rijaat terminates, 105
A husband may take back an unenjoyed divorced wife, provided she be delivered of a child within such a time as establishes its parentage in him, 106
Divorce—continued.
A man acknowledging that he had never consummated with his divorced wife has no power of Rijaat, although he has been in retirement with her, 106
Rijaat may be established by the birth of a child, 106
A woman under reversible, may adorn herself, 107
A man must not approach a reversibly divorced wife without giving her intimation, 107
A divorced wife cannot be carried upon a journey until Rijaat be established, 107
Cohabitation is not made illegal by a reversible, 107

Of Circumstances which render a divorced Wife unlawful to her Husband, 107
A man may marry a wife repudiated from him by one or two irreversible divorces, 107
Objection, 107
Reply, 107
But if by three divorces, he cannot marry her until she be previously married to another man, 108
Nature of the consummation in the second marriage which renders a divorced wife lawful to her first husband, 108
The second marriage, when contracted under a legalizing condition, is disapproved; yet the woman is rendered legal by it to her first husband, 108
The first husband, recovering his wife by an intervenient marriage, recovers his full power of, over her, 109
The wife’s declaration of her having been legalized is to be credited, 109

Chapter VII.
Of Aila, 109
Definition of, 109
The mode in which Aila is to be established, 109
In breach of Aila expiation is incumbent, 109
But if it be observed, a, irreversible ensues at its termination, 109
A vow of abstinence for a term short of four months does not constitute Aila, 110
A vow of abstinence, under a penalty annexed, constitutes an Aila, 111
Aila holds respecting a wife under reversible, 111
But drops on the accomplishment of her Edit, 111
An Aila made respecting a woman before marriage is nugatory, 111
An Aila made respecting a wife at a distance may be orally rescinded, 112
An equivocal expression of divorce takes effect according to the husband’s interpretation of his intention, 112

Chapter VIII.
Of Khoola, 112
Definition, 112
Reasons which justify Khoola, or, for compensation, 112
Which occasions a single irreversible, 112

Divorce—continued.
The wife is responsible for the compensation, 113
Difference between a wife requiring Khoola in lieu of an unlawful article, and requiring, in lieu of the same in express terms, 113
The compensation for Khoola may consist of anything which is lawful in dower, 114
Case of Khoola required in lieu of property unspecified, 114
Case of Khoola in lieu of an absconded slave, 114
Cases of Khoola granted for a specific sum, 114
A proposal of Khoola made to the wife, with a reserve of option to the husband, is invalid, 115
The assertion of the husband respecting Khoola is to be credited, 115
A mutual discharge leaves each party without any claim upon the other, 116
Khoola entered into by a father on behalf of an infant daughter is invalid, 116
Unless he engage to hold himself responsible for the compensation, 116
Or refer it to his daughter’s consent, 116
Chapter IX.
Of Zihar, 117
Definition, 117
Zihar prohibits carnal connexion until expiration, 117
Nature and duration of Zihar, 117
If the prohibition occasioned by Zihar be violated, yet no additional penalty is incurred, 117
Zihar cannot occasion, 117
Zihar is established by a comparison with any part of the body which implies the whole person, 117
A general comparison takes effect according to the husband’s explanation, 118
And the same of a comparison in point of prohibition, 118
Zihar has no effect upon any but a wife, 118
Objection, 118
Reply, 118
Zihar collectively pronounced takes place upon every individual to whom it is addressed, 119

Of Expiration:—
A Zihar may be expiated by the emancipation of a slave, &c., 119
The emancipation of a slave of any description suffices, 119
Unless such slave be defective in one of his faculties, 119
The emancipation of a deaf slave suffices, 119
But not that of one who has lost both his thumbs, 120
Or who is insane, 120
Unless it be an occasional insanity only, 120
Nor of a Modabbir, or Am-Walid, or Moktib, who has paid part of his ransom, 120
That procured for a parent or child suffices, 120

DIVORCE—continued.

But not that of a share in coparcenary slave, 120

The partial emancipation of a sole share (when followed by the emancipation of the remainder) suffices, 120

But not if carnal connexion take place between the two emancipations, 120

Zihar may be expiated by fasting two months, 121

But if carnal connexion take place during the fast, it must be commenced de novo, 121

Fasting the only mode in which a slave can expiate Zihar, 121

Zihar may be expiated by the distribution of alms, 121

Carnal connexion during expiation by alms does not require that the alms be distributed anew, 122

Chapter X.

Of Laan, or Imprecation, 123

Definition, 123

A man accusing his wife of whoredom must verify his charge by an imprecation, 123

Conditions under which an imprecation is incumbent, 123

Objection, 123

Reply, 123

Not incumbent upon slaves or infidels, 123

Nor, where the wife is a slave, an infidel, or a convicted slanderer, 124

Objection, 124

Reply, 124

Nor where both parties are convicted slanderers, 124

Form of imprecation and manner of making it, 124

When both parties have made imprecation, a separation takes place, 124

The husband, on receding from his impreca-tion, may again marry his wife, 125

Imprecation occasions a decree of bastardy, 125

A husband receding from imprecation must be punished for slander, 125

Imprecation not incumbent where the husband or wife is an idiot, or an infant, 125

Or where husband is dumb, 125

Or where the accusation is indirectly insinuated, 126

Imprecation made posterior to the birth of a child does not effect that child's descent, 126

Chapter XI.

Of Impotence, 126

An impotent husband must allow a year's probation, after which separation takes place, 126

And the wife retains her whole dower, if the husband should ever have been in retirement with her, 126

But the wife's claim of separation may be here defeated by the husband swearing that he had enjoyed her, 127

Rules to be observed at the expiration of the year of probation, 127

DIVORCE—continued.

The year of probation to be calculated by the lunar calendar, 127

A husband cannot annul the marriage, where the defect is on the part of the wife, 125

A wife cannot sue for a separation on the ground of the husband being leprous, scro-phulous, or insane, 128

Chapter XII.

Of the Edit, 128

Definition, 128

Edit of, of a free woman is three menstruations, 128

Of one not subject to course, three months, 122

Of one who is pregnant, the term of her traul, 128

That of a slave is two menstruations, 128

And of one not subject to courses, one month and a half, 128

Edit of widowhood, 129

—after, 129

A female slave emancipated during Edit must observe the Edit of a free woman, 129

Rule of Edit of a woman past child-bearing 129 — in an invalid marriage, 129

Edit of an Am-Walid, 130

— of the widow of an infant, 130

— of a menstruous woman, 130

— of a divorced woman who has connexion with a man during the term of her Edit, 130 — of a woman who adults man during her Edit of widowhood, 131

— of a widow or a divorced wife may be accomplished without her knowledge, 131

— from an invalid marriage, 131

A woman's oath confers the accomplishment of her Edit, 131

Case of a woman re-married after divorce and again repudiated, 131

Of Hidud, or Mourning, 132

Definition, 132

Mourning is incumbent on the death of a husband, 132

Although he die during the wife's Edit from irreversible, 132

Mourning not incumbent upon infidel women or infants, 133

But incumbent upon slaves, 133

Nor upon Am-Walids, nor upon widows from invalid marriage, 133

Proposing for a woman during her Edit is disapproved, 133

Rules for the behaviour of woman during Edit, 133

A wife under irreversible, must be accommodated with a separate apartment, 133

Rules respecting a wife divorced upon a journey, 134

Chapter XIII.

Of the Establishment of Parentage, 134

A child born after six months from the dat-of a marriage upon which is suspended a conditional, is the lawful offspring of such marriage, 134

Objection, 134
DIVORCE—continued.

Reply, 134

The parentage of child born two years after reversible, is established in the divorce, 134

And so also of a child born within two years after tripleicate or irreversible, 135

And so likewise of a child born of a wife under age, within nine months after either reversible or irreversible, 135

And so also of a child born within six months after the wife declaring her Edit to have expired, 135

Whatever be the occasion of the Edit, 136

The birth must be proved by evidence, 136

The parentage of a child born of widow, when uncontroverted, is established in her decreed husband, independent of evidence, 136

A child born within less than six months after marriage is not the offspring of that marriage; but if after six months, it is so, independent of the husband's acknowledgment, or upon the evidence of one witness to the birth where he denies it; and Laa is incumbent if he persist in his denial; and the wife's testimony is to be credited in respect to the date of the marriage, 136

Suspended upon the birth of a child cannot take place on the evidence of one woman to the birth, 137

The term of pregnancy is from six months to two years, 137

Case of a man divorcing a wife who is a slave and then purchasing her, 137

Miscellaneous cases, 137

Chapter XIV.

Of Hizanit, or the Care of Infant Children, 138

In case of separation, the care of the infant children belongs to the wife, 138

Order of precedence in Hizanit after the mother, 138

In defect of the maternal, it rests with the nearest paternal relative, 138

Length of the term of Hizanit, 139

A slave has the right on attaining her freedom, 139

And also an infidel mother the wife of a Mussulman, 139

Children, after the term of Hizanit, remain soley under the care of the father, 139

The mother cannot move with her children to a strange place, 139

Chapter XV.

Of Nisfha, Maintenance, 140

Of Nisfka of wife, 140

The subsistence of wife is incumbent upon her husband, 140

In proportion to the rank and circumstances of the parties, 140

And this, although she withhold herself on account of her dower, 141

But not if she be refractory, 141

On an infant incapable of generation, 141

But it is due to an adult wife from an infant husband, 141

It is not due where the wife is imprisoned for debt, 141

DIVORCE—continued.

Or forcibly carried off, 141

Or goes on a pilgrimage, 141

Unless she be accompanied by her husband, 141

It continues during her sickness, 141

Husband must maintain his wife's servants, 142

If the husband be poor, the magistrate must empower the wife to raise subsistence upon his credit, 142

At a certain specified rate, 142

To be varied according to any change in his circumstances, 142

Arrears of maintenance not due unless the maintenance have been decreed by the Kazee at the rate previously determined on between the parties, 142

Arrears of a decreed maintenance drop in the case of the death of either party, 143

Advances of maintenance cannot be reclaimed, 143

A slave may be sold for the maintenance of his wife if the latter be free, 143

A husband must maintain his wife, being a slave, where she resides with him, 143

And the same of Am-Walids, 143

A wife must be accommodated with a separate apartment, 143

But under the control of husband with respect to visitors, 144

Maintenance of the wife of an absentee is decreed out of his substance, 144

Objection, 144

Reply, 144

Unless that be of a nature different to what is necessary for her support, 144

But she must give security that she has not already received anything in advance, 144

It can be decreed only to the wife, infant children, or parents of the absentee, 145

No decree can be issued against an absentee's property upon the bare testimony of his wife, 145

Divorced wife is entitled to maintenance during her Edit, 145

No maintenance due to widow, 145

Nor to a wife in whom separation originates,

Unless it originate in a circumstance not criminal, 145

A wife who apostatizes has no right to maintenance, 145

A father must provide for the maintenance of his infant children, 145

A mother is not required to suckle her infant, 146

Except where a nurse cannot be procured, 146

A father must provide a nurse, 146

But he cannot hire the child's mother in that purpose, 146

Yet he may hire any other of his wives for
that purpose, 146

Or the child's mother after the expiration of her Edit, 146

Difference of religion makes no difference as to the obligation of furnishing maintenance to a wife or child, 146

Is incumbent upon the requisition of the party concerned, 353
It is not obligatory in case inducing corporal punishment, 353
Unless it involve property, when the fact must be stated in such a way as may not occasion punishment, 353
Required in whoredom is that of four men, 353
In other criminal cases, two men, 353
And in all other matters, two men, or one man and two women, 353
Objection, 354
Reply, 354
The, of women alone suffices concerning matters which do not admit the inspection of men, 354
It is not admitted to prove that a child was live-born further than relates to the rites of burial, 355
The probity of the witness and his mention of the term, are essentials, 2'5
The apparent probity of the witness suffices, excepting in cases producing punishment or retaliation, 355
If, however, their probity be questioned, a purgation is required, 356
Nature of a secret, 355
And an open purgation, 366
Justification of a witness by the defendant, 356
A slave may be a purgator in the secret purgation, 357
Is of two kinds, that which occasions effect to itself, 357
And that the effect of which rests upon other, 357
The signature to a deed must not be attested, unless the witness recollect the circumstance of signing it, 357

Evidence—continued.
And if a person give, and become blind, a decree cannot issue upon it, 359
Of a slave is inadmissible, 360
Or of a slanderer, 360
But if infidel slanderer recovers his competency as a witness upon embracing the faith, 360
Is not admitted in favour of relations within the degree of paternity, 360
Nor between a husband and wife, a master and his slave, a hirer and a hireling, 360
The testimony of a master cannot be admitted in favour of his slave, 361
Nor of one partner in favour of another relative to their joint concern, 361
In favour of an uncle or brother is admitted, 361
But of public mourners or singers is not admitted, 361
Or of common drunkards, or of falconers, &c., 361
Or of atrocious criminals, 362
Or of immodest persons, 362
Or of usurers or gamesters, 362
Or of persons guilty of indecorum, 362
Or of free-thinkers, if they avow their sentiments, 362
The, of the sect of Hawa and another heretics is admissible, but not that of the tribe of Khetapia, 362
Objection, 363
Reply, 363
A Moostamin cannot testify concerning a Zimmee, but a Zimmee may concerning a Moostamin, 363
Moostamins may testify concerning each other, being of the same country, 363
The testimony is admissible of one whose virtues predominate, 363
And of such as remain uncircumcised from any justifiable cause, 363
Or of a eunuch, 363
Or of a bastard, 363
Or of a hermaphrodite, 363
Of a viceroy, 363
Two brothers attesting their father's appointment of an executor must be credited, if the executor verify their testimony; and the same of the attestation of two legatees, two debtors or creditors, or two executors, to the same effect, 363
Objection, 364
Reply, 364
Attestation to a person's appointment of an agent is not to be credited, 364
A defendant's impeachment of the integrity of witnesses is not credited unless he state their commission of some specific crime, 364
Or adduce, to the plaintiff's acknowledgment of their irregularity, 3:4
He is not allowed to adduce, of their being hired by the plaintiff, 364 Unless his own property be involved, 364
A witness's immediate acknowledgment of mis-statement or omission, from apprehension, does not destroy his credit, 364

Evidence—continued.
Chapter III.
Of Disagreement of Witness in their Testimony, 365
Evidence repugnant to the claim cannot be admitted, 365
The witnesses must perfectly agree in their testimony, 365
The witnesses may be credited to the smallest amount in which they agree both in words and meaning, 365
The, of a witness who attests a larger sum than the claim amounts to is null, 366
To a debt is not annulled by a subsequent declaration of part of the debt having been discharged, 366
The, of witnesses who agree with respect to fact and time, but differ with respect to place must be rejected, 366
To the theft of an animal is not annulled by a difference between the witnesses with respect to the colour, but it is so by a difference with respect to the sex, 366
To prove a contract is annulled by any difference with respect to the terms of the contract, 367
Except in regard to a woman's dower, when she is entitled to the smallest sum testified, 368

Chapter IV.
Of Evidence relating to Inheritance, 368
Must be adduced to prove the death of the inheritor and the right of the heirs, before inheritance can take effect, 368
An heir may recover an article in possession of another by proving it to have been the property of his inheritor, or a loan to deposit from him, 369
The right to an article is not established by, of the former possession of it, 369
Unless the defendant acknowledge such former possession, 369
Or two witnesses attest his having made such acknowledgment, 369.

Chapter V.
Of the Attestation of Evidence, 369
Attestation of, is admitted to all matters not liable to be affected by doubt, 369
The attestation of the same two witnesses suffices to prove the, of two, 370
But the, of each must be attested by the two respectively, 370
The attestation must be at the desire of the primary witness, who must state the terms of his testimony to the attesting witness, 370
Form of an attestation, 370
A person cannot attest the attestation of another, unless that other desire him to do so, 370
Attestation is admitted only in case of the death (at a distant place) or sickness of the primary witness, 370
The attesting witnesses may appear as purgators on behalf of the primary witnesses, 371
But their not doing so does not affect the which they attest, 371
Evidence—continued.
The denial of the primary witnesses annuls the attestation, 371
If the attesting witnesses have not a clear personal knowledge of the defendant, the identity must be proved by other witnesses, 371
And so also with respect to the limits of the claim, 371
The identity of a person affected by a Kazee's letter must be proved, 3/1
A false witness must be stigmatized, 372
The mode of stigmatizing, 372
Of Retraction of Evidence, 372
Retracted before a decree, is void, 372

Chapter II.
Of Retraction of Gifts, 485
The donor may retract his, to a stranger, 485
But there are various circumstances which bar the retraction, 485
A, of land cannot be retracted after the donee has built or planted on it, 486
After the sale of a part of the land by the donee, the donor may resume the remainder, 486
A, to a kinsman, cannot be resumed, 486
Nor a, to a husband or wife during marriage, 486
The respect of a return prohibits retraction, 486
Although the return be given by a stranger, 486
If part of the, prove the property of another, a proportionable part of the return may be resumed, 486
When the return is opposed only to a part the remainder of the, may be resumed, 487

Gifts—continued.
Retraction requires mutual consent, or a decree, 487
The donor's re-possession of the, is not requisite to the validity of retraction, 487
The donee, incurring any responsibility in consequence of a, receives no compensation from the donor, 487
A mutual, requires mutual seisin, 488

Chapter I.

The usufruct and the, must be particularly specified, 490

Objection, 490

Reply, 490

The, or recompense may consist of anything capable of being price, 490

The extent of the usufruct may be defined by fixing a term, 490

Or in hiring servants, &c., by specifying the work to be performed, 490

Or by specification and pointed reference, 490

Chapter II.

Of the Time when the Hire may be Claimed, 491

Can only be claimed in virtue of an agreement, or in consequence of the end of the contract being obtained, 491

The tenant becomes bound for the rent by a delivery of the house, &c., to him, 491

If it be not otherwise specified in the contract, rent may be demanded from day to day, 491

Or the, of an animal (upon a journey) from stage to stage, 491

A workman is not entitled to anything until his work be finished, 491

Case of a baker hired to bake bread, 492

And of a cook, 492

And of a brick-maker, 492

The article wrought upon may be detained by the workman until he he paid his, 492

And he is not responsible in case of accidents during such detention, 492

If the work he of a nature not to produce any visible effect in the article, it cannot be detained, 492

A workman, if the contract be restricted to his work, cannot employ any other person, 493

Case in which, from an unavoidable accident, the contract cannot be completely fulfilled, 493

Chapter III.

Of things the Hire of which is Unlawful or otherwise; and of Disputed Hire, 494

A house or shop may be hired without specifying the particular business to be carried on in it, 494

Unless it be of a nature injurious to the building, 494

In a lease of land the renter is entitled to the use of road and water, 494

But the lease is not valid unless the use to which it is to be applied be specified, 494
HIRE—continued.
At the expiration of the lease the land must be restored in the original state, 494
An absolute contract leaves the hirer at liberty to give the use to any person, 494
But in a restricted contract, any deviation with respect to the use renders the hirer responsible for the article, 495
Unless that be of a nature not liable to injury from such deviation, 495
Or unless the deviation be not of a nature to injure the article, 495
An excess in the use induces a proportionable responsibility in case of accident, 495
A rider, taking up an additional rider, incurs responsibility for half the value of the animal, 495
A hired animal perishing from ill-usage subjects the hirer to responsibility, 496
In the hire or loan of animals, responsibility is induced by any deviation from the prescribed journey, 496
The change of a saddle for another of the same sort does not induce responsibility, 496
Unless the weight be different, when responsibility attaches in proportion to the excess, 496
If the nature of the saddle be different, responsibility attaches in toto, 496
A porter is not made responsible for any immaterial deviation from the prescribed route, 497
Any injurious deviation from the prescribed culture of hired land induces a proportionable responsibility, 497
A tailor is responsible for deviating from his orders, 497
Chapter IV.
An invalid condition invalidates, 497
But a proportionate is in such a case due, to the extent of the specified, 497
A contract indefinitely expressed closes at the expiration of the first term, 498
Rules with respect to annual leases, 498
Wages are due to keepers of baths and cuppers, 498
But there is no, for the covering of mares, 498
Nor for the performance of any religious duty, 499
Nor for singing or lamentation, 499
Of indefinite articles, 499
Of a nurse, 500
A contract of, stipulating that the recompense shall be paid from the article manufactured or wrought upon is invalid, 501
Partners do not owe, to each other with respect to their stock, 501
Any uncertainty in terms invalidates the contract, 501
A lease of hands is not invalidated, by stipulating a right to perform any act which does not leave lasting effects, 502
A contract stipulating the recompense to consist of a similar usufruct is nugatory, 502
Objection, 502
Reply, 502
Case of two partners, 502

HIRE—continued.
Lease of land is invalid, unless it specify the purpose to which the land is to be applied, 503
Responsibility does not attach from the customary use of an article, under an indefinite contract, 503
Chapter V.
Of Responsibility of a Hireling, 503
Difference between common and particular hirelings, 503
The article committed to a common hireling is a deposit, 503
But he is responsible if it be destroyed in course of his work, 504
A surgeon or farrier, acting agreeably to customary practice, is not responsible in case of accidents, 504
A particular hireling, 505
Is not responsible for anything he loses or destroys, 503
Chapter VI.
Of Hire on one of two Conditions, 505
The, is valid of a tradesman, under an alternative with respect to work, 505
Or of an article under an alternative of another article, 505
Or with respect to use, 505
Case of a tradesman hired under an alternative with respect to time, 506
Case of, of a shop, under an alternative with respect to the business to be carried on in it, 506
And of an animal under a condition with respect to the journey it is to perform, 506
Or the load it is to carry, 506
Chapter VII.
Of the Hire of Slaves, 507
A hired servant cannot be taken upon a journey, unless it be so stipulated in the contract, 507
Wages paid to an inhibited slave, hired without the consent of his owner, cannot be resumed, 507
The usurper of a slave is not responsible for what the slave earns during the term of usurpation, 507
Case of a slave hired for different terms, 508
Case of a hired slave absconding before the expiration of the term, 508
Chapter VIII.
Of Disputes between the Hirer and the Hireling:—
In cases of dispute with a tradesman concerning the orders he has received, the assertion of the employer must be credited, 508
And so also, if the dispute be with respect to wages, 509
Chapter IX.
Of the Dissolution of Contracts of Hire
A contract for the hire of a house is dissolved by a defect in it, 509
Or by its falling to decay; and the hire of land by its wells being dried up,—or of a mill by the mill-stream stopping, 509
But if the mill-house be used, a proportionate rent is due, 510
INDEX.

HIRE—continued.
A contract of, is dissolved by the death of one of the contracting parties being a principal, 510
It admits a reserve of option, 510
It is dissolved by the occurrence of any status of res for dissolution, 510 Circumstance which form a pretext for dissolving contracts of, 510

Miscellaneous Cases:

Or co-partnership in the profits of stock and labour, -34
Definition, 454
A participation in the profit is an essential of the contract, 454
Chapter I.
Contracts of, are lawful, 454
The stock is a trust in the manager's hands, 454
If the contract be of an invalid nature, the manager, in lieu of profit, receives an adequate hire, 455
A manager opposing the proprietor, stands as an usurer, 455
A, holds only in such stock as admits of partnership, 455
It requires that the profit be determinate, 455
And not subjected to any uncertainty, 456
That the stock be completely made over to the manager, 456
A condition of management by the proprietor invalidates the contract, 456
And so also a like condition by the contracting party, although he be not the propietor, 456
The manager is at liberty to act with the stock according to his own discretion, 456
But he cannot entrust it to another in the manner of, without the proprietor's consent, 457
Nor lend it to another, 457
Mozaribat—continued.
He cannot deviate from any restrictions imposed upon him in the contract, 457
Upon violating them, he becomes responsible for the stock, 457
A restriction to any particular part of a city is invalid, 458
Unless stipulated under an express exception of any other place, 458
He may be restricted in his transactions to particular persons, 458
The contract may be restricted in its operation to a particular period, 458
Nothing can be purchased by the manager which is not a subject of property, in virtue of seisin, with respect to the proprietor, 459
The manager cannot purchase a slave free with respect to himself, where any profit has been previously acquired upon the slave, 460
Purchasing a female slave and begetting a child, 459
Chapter II.
Of a Manager entering into a contract of Mozaribat with another, 460
A manager entrusting the stock in his hands to a secondary manager, is responsible to the proprietor upon any profit being made upon it, 460
Where so entrusted with the proprietor's concurrence, 461
The contract may stipulate a proportion of the profit to the slave of the proprietor, 463
But if slave engage in such a contract on behalf of his master, it is invalid, 463
Chapter III.
Of the dismissal of a manager, and the division of the property, 463
The contract is dissolved by the death of either party, 463
Or by the apostasy and expiration of the manager, 463
If he apostatize without going to a foreign country, the contract still continues in force, 464
All acts of manager are valid until he be duly apprized of his dismissal, 464
After being so apprized he may still convert what remains on his hands into money, 464
But if it have been already converted into money, he cannot transact with it, 464
Unless this money be of a species different from the original stock, in which case he may convert it into money of a different species, 464
If at the dissolution of the contract the stock consist of debts, the manager must be compelled to collect them, where any profit has been acquired, 464
All loss upon the stock is placed upon the manager, 464
If the profit be divided previous to a restoration of the capital, and any accident afterwards befal the stock, the manager must return the portion of profit he had received, 465
Mozaribat—continued.
The manager is not responsible for deficiency, 465
The profit received by the manager is no way implicated with respect to any new contract between the same parties, 465
Chapter IV.
Of such act as may lawfully be performed by a Manager, 465
A Manager may sell the stock, either for ready money or upon trust, 465
Or entrust a slave with the management of it, 465
Or, having sold it for ready money, may grant a suspension of payment, 465
Or allow the purchaser to transfer the payment upon another person, 465
The acts of a manager are such as he is empowered to perform by the contract, 466
Or in virtue of a general and discretionary power vested in him by the proprietor, 466
Or such as he is not empowered to perform in either way, 466
A manager is not allowed to contract male and female slaves forming a part of the stock, in marriage to each other, 466
Any part of the stock delivered by the manager to the proprietor in the manner of a Bazar, still continues to appertain to the stock, 467
Objection, 467
Reply, 467
No part of the manager's expenses to be defrayed unless he travel, 467
To a distance beyond a day's journey from the usual place of his abode, 468
And it is defrayed out of the profit, not out of the stock, 468
All expenses incident to the sale of stock must be defrayed out of that, 468
All expenses upon articles purchased which do not substantially add to the article, are voluntary on the part of the manager, 468
Case of loss of the stock after a profit having been acquired and debt incurred upon it, 468
Cases of sale by the employer to the manager, 469
Or by the manager to the employer, 469
Case of a slave purchased by the manager and who is afterwards guilty of homicide, 469
The manager bargaining for an article, and then losing the stock, must have recourse to his employer for another stock, to enable him to fulfil his engagement, 470
Chapter V.
Of Disputes between the Proprietor of the Stock and the Manager, 470
In disputes respecting the acquisition of profit upon the existing stock, the assertion of the manager is to be credited, 470
But in disputes concerning the proportions of profit, that of the proprietor, 471
As also in disputes concerning the nature of the agreement under which the stock was entrusted to the manager, 471

Mozaribat—continued.
If the proprietor assert a restriction, the denial of the manager is credited, 471
But if each allege a different restriction, the allegation of the proprietor is credited, 471
In disputes concerning restriction to time, the evidence which proves the latest date is preferred, 471

Maintenance to, of absentee may be decreed out of his effects, 149
May take their maintenance out of his effects, but a trustee cannot provide it in that manner without a decree, 149
Arrears not due in a decreed maintenance, 149
Unless where it is decreed to be provided on the absentee’s credit, 149
Partition.—See Marriage, 66
Chapter I.
Of Partition, of Kismat, 565
Partition involves a separation in articles of weight or measurement of capacity, 565
And an exchange in articles of dissimilar parts or unities, 565
The magistrate must appoint a public partitioner, and must appoint him a salary, 566
Or establish a particular rate of hire for his work, 566
PARTITION—continued.
The parties may make a private agreement with regard to it, 572
Complicated partition of different houses and tenements, 5/2
In disputes after partition, the evidence of two partitioners must be admitted, 572
But not that of one partitioner, 573

Chapter IV.
Of pleas of Error in Partition and of Claims of Right in regard to it, 573
A plea of error cannot be admitted where the party acknowledges having received his share, unless it be supported by evidence, 571
A complaint of after assumption, is a complaint of usurpation, 574
In case of a complaint of non-delivery, both parties are sworn, and the partition is dissolved and made anew, 574
A plea of error cannot be heard if the partition was made by the parties, 574
Case of a claim laid to a particular room in a house after partition, 574
Of the laws which prevail in a claim of right, 574
In a case of claim set up to an indefinite part after partition, it must be dissolved and made anew, 574
If a definite part be claimed after partition, it must be compensated for from the shares of the other partners, or the partition must be dissolved and executed anew, 574
And so likewise, if an undefined part be claimed, 575
A debt proved against an estate annuls the partition of it among the heirs, 575
Unless the creditor remits it, or the heirs discharge it, 576
An heir may prefer a claim upon an estate after partition, 576
A claim cannot be set up by an heir to any particular article after distribution, 576

Chapter V.
Of the Laws of Mohayat, 576
Mohayat is a partition of usufruct, 576
And is not annulled by the decrees of the parties, 576
Partners may make it by allotting to each the use of a particular part of the joint concern, 576
In which case either is at liberty to let his share, 576
Or by stipulating an alternative right to the use, 576
A difference between the parties must be settled by the interference of the Kazee, 578
Case of partition of the use of two slaves, 577
Or of two houses, 577
Or of two quadrupeds, 577
Of the advantage from a house may be affected by each party letting it to hire alternately, 577
And occasional excess in the, rent being equally divided between them, 578
PARTITION—continued
In a case of partition of the advantage from two houses, neither party is accountable for any excess, of rent to the other, 578
Case of partition of the advantage from to slaves, 578
A partition of advantage from two quadrupeds, 578
A partition of usufruct cannot be made with regard to productive articles, 578

PARTNERSHIP.—See COMPOSITION, 450
In profits of stock and labour, 454
—or Shirkat—
Definition of Shirkat, 217
Partnership is lawful, 217
Of two kinds, 217
By right of property, 217
By contract, 217
By right of property, is either optional or compulsive, and does not admit of either partner acting with respect to the other's share, 217
By contract, 217
Of four descriptions, 217
By reciprocity, 217
In traffic, 217
In arts, 217
Upon personal credit, 217
Description of, by reciprocity, 217
It requires equality in point of capital, 227
And of privileges, 217
And similarity of religion and sect, 218
The term reciprocity must also be expressed in the contract, 218
It is lawful between free adults, whether Mussulmans or Zimmies, 218
It is not lawful between a slave and a free-man, or an infant and an adult, 218
Or a Mussulman and an infidel, 218
Nor between two slaves, two infants or two Mokatibs, 218
It comprehends both agency and bail, 216
A purchase made by either partner is participated between both, except in articles of subsistence, 219
A debt incurred by either partner is obligatory upon the other, 219
Bail for property engaged in by either partner is binding upon the other, 219
Unless it be engaged in without consent of the surety, 220
An accession of property to either partner by gift or inheritance, resolves a, by reciprocity into a, in traffic, 220
Unless the property be of a nature incapable of continuing stock, 220
By reciprocity, cannot be contracted but in cash, 220

PARTNERSHIP—continued.
And copper coinage is comprehended under cash, 221
Or in gold and silver bullion, where that passes in currency, 221
Or, according to Mohammed, in homogenous stocks, after admixture, 222
It cannot be contracted respecting heterogeneous stocks, 222
By right of property, is effected by each partner selling one half of his stock to the other, 222
Description of, in traffic, 222
It does not admit mutual bail, but it requires mutual agency, 223
It admits of inequality in point of stock, 223
And also of a disproportion of profit, 223
A person may engage a part only of his property in it, 224
The stock can only be such as is lawful in reciprocal, 224
But the respective stock may be heterogeneous, 224
Debts can only be claimed from the partner who incurs them, 224
And this partner, on making payment, has recourse to the other for his proportion, 224
The contract is anulled by the loss of the whole capital, or of the stock of either partner in particular, 224
And in the last case the loss falls upon the partner to whom such stock had belonged, 224
Unless it had perished after admixture, 225
A purchase made by one partner, where the stock of the other afterwards perishes, is participated in both, and the, continues in force agreeably to the contract, 225
But if it perish before the other's purchase, that continues between them under a, by right of property, 225
Unless there be no mention of mutual agency in the contract, for in this case it belongs solely to the purchaser, 225
Holds without admixture of stock, 225
Does not admit a specification in behalf of either partner, 226
Either partner may make over his property in the manner of a Bazat, 226
Or lodge it as a deposit, 226
Or intrust it to the care of a manager by Mozaribat, 226
Either partner may also appoint an agent on his own behalf, 226
Each partner holds the stock in the manner of a trustee, 226
Description of, in arts, 227
It is not requisite that the parties both follow the same trade, or reside in the same place, 227
Objection, 227
Reply, 227
It admits an inequality of profit, 227
The work agreed for by either partner is binding upon the other, and either is at liberty to call upon the employer for payment, 227
Description of, upon credit, 228
It may include reciprocity, 228
Each partner is agent for the other, 228
The profit of each must be in proportion to the share of each in the adventure, 228
Of invalid, 229
Does not hold in articles of a neutral nature, 229
Unless they be taken possession of jointly, 229
Nor in this instance, where the means of acquiring them are different, 229
The profit to each partner must be in proportion to the stock, 229
A contract of, is annulled by the death or apostasy of either, 229
Whether the survivor be aware of that event or not, 230
A person cannot pay Zakat upon his partner's property without his permission, 230
Case of mutual permission to pay Zakat, 230
A female slave, purchased under a contract of reciprocity, becomes the property of that partner who, with permission of the other, has carnal connexion with her, 231
But he seller may take the price from either, 231

Pawns—
Rahn, 629
Chapter I.
Definition of Rahn, 629
Is established by declaration and acceptance, and confirmed by the receipt or the pledges, 630
Upon the pawnee taking possession of the pledge, the contract becomes binding, 630
And he the pawnee is responsible for the pledge, 630
Which he is entitled to detain until he receive payment of his debt, 631
Without admitting the pawnor to any use of it, 631
The debt to which the pawn is opposed must be actually due, 631
The responsibility for the pledge extends to the amount of the debt owing to the pawnee, 631
The pawnee may demand payment of his debt, and imprison the pawnor in case of contumacy, 631
It is required of the pawnee, before payment, to produce the pledge, 631
But if he demand payment in a distant place, he is not required to produce it, unless this can be done without expense, 632
The pledge may be sold at the desire of the pawnor, and the pawnee cannot afterwards be required to produce it, 632
He must produce it on receiving a partial payment, as well as in case of a complete discharge, 632

Cases in which he is not required to produce it, 632
The pawnor cannot reclaim the pledge on the plea of selling it for the discharge of the debt, 33
The pawnee must restore what he has received in payment if the pledge perish in his hands, 633
The contract is not dissolved until the pledge be restored, 633
The dept is discharge by the loss of his pledge, 633
The pawnee is not entitled to use the pledge, 633
Or to lend or to let it to hire, 633
He may consign it in charge to any of his family, 633
If he transgress with respect to it, he is responsible for the whole value, 633
The use of the pledge is determined by the pawnee's mode of keeping or wearing it, 633
The expenses of conservation of the pledge rest upon the pawnee, and those of subsistence upon the pawnor, 634
But those incurred by sickness, or by offences, must be defrayed by both, 634
Taxes are defrayed by the pawnor, 634
Tithes, upon pawned lands have preference to the right of the pawnee, 634
If either party voluntarily defray what is incumbent on the other, he has no claim upon him on that account, 634
Chapter II.
Of Things capable of being Pawned, and of Things for which Pledge may be taken, 635
An indefinite part of an article cannot be pawned, 635
Even to a partner in the article, 635
If the pledge be rendered indefinite by any supervenient act or circumstance, the contract of pawn is annulled, 635
An article naturally conjoined to another cannot be pledged separately, 635
Trees, however, may be pawned with the immediate spots on which they grow, without including the rest of the land, 635
A claim of right established in a separable part of pledge does not annul the contract with the respect to the remainder; 636
Occupy, so as to obstruct a delivery of the pledge to the pawnee, prevents his being responsible for it, 636
Pledges cannot be taken for trusts, 636
Nor for anything not insured with the holder of it, 636
Nor as a security against contingencies, 637
Of, in bargains of Sillim or Sirf, 637
A freeman, a Modabir, a Mokatib, or an Am-Walid cannot be pawned, 637
Cannot be taken to secure the appearance of a surety, or of a criminal liable to retaliation, 638
Or in security for a right of Shaffa, 638
Or for a criminal slave, or the debts of a slave, 638
INDEX 757
PAWNS continued.
Or for the wages of a public singer or mourner, 638
A mussulman cannot give or take wine in, but if he receive wine from a Zimmie, and it be destroyed, he is responsible, 638
A pawnee is still responsible for the pledge, although it appear that the debt to which it was opposed is not due, 638
A father or guardian may pledge the slave of his infant ward for a debt owing by himself, 638
But they are accountable in case of loss, 638
And they may also authorized the pawnee to sell the slave, 639
A father may retain the goods of his infant child in pledge for a debt owing from the infant to himself, or to another infant child or to his own mercantile slave, 639
But a guardian has not this privilege, 639
Yet he may also retain the goods in, for necessaries furnished by him, 639
A child cannot recover property which had been pawned by his deceased father, but by redeeming it, 639
If he redeem it during the father's lifetime, he has a claim on him for what he pays, 639
And the father is responsible in case of the pledge being lost, 639
Case of a guardian pawing the goods of his orphan ward, and then borrowing and losing the pledge, 639
Money, and all weighable and measurable articles may be pledged.—Rules to be observed in these instances, 640
Case of a silver vessel pawned and afterwards lost, 641
Or broken, 641
A pledge may be stipulated in sale for the price of the article sold, 641
But the agreement is not valid unless the pledge be particularly specified, 641
Nor can the purchaser be compelled to deliver it, 641
An article tendered by a purchaser in security for the price of the merchandise is considered as a pledge, although the term pawn be not expressly mentioned by him, 642
Where two or more articles are opposed in pledge to one debt, they cannot be redeemed separately, 642
An article pawned to two persons in security of a debt jointly owing by both is pledged in toto to each, 643
And if they agree to hold it alternately, each is, in his turn, trustee on behalf of the other, 643
If two persons, respectively, claim an article from a third, in virtue of an alleged, and both produce evidence, the claim of both is null, 643
Objection, 643
Reply, 643
If a partner dies, leaving an article in pledge with two pawnees, it is sold for the discharge of their claims, 643

PAWNS—continued.
Chapter II.
Of Pledges placed in the Hands of a Trustee, 644
The parties may, by agreement, entrust the pledge to the custody of any upright person, 644
After which neither of them is at liberty to take it out of the trustee's hands, 644
But the pawnee is responsible, in case of loss, 644
Unless the trustee has transgressed, in which case he is responsible, 644
Rules to be observed in this instance, 644
The pawnor may commission the pawnee or any other person, to sell the, and discharge the debt; but he cannot reverse the commission, if it be included in the contract, 645
Rules with respect to an agent appointed to sell a pledge, 645
The pawnee cannot sell it without the pawnor's consent, 645
The agent, at the expiration of the term of credit, may be compelled to sell the pledge, 645
If the pledge be sold by commission from the trustee, the purchase money is subsituted in the place of it, 646
If the trustee, having sold the, and paid off the pawnee, be exposed to any subsequent loss, he may reimburse himself from either party, 646 but if he was commissioned by the pawnee after the contract, he must recur to him alone for indemnification, 646
A stranger proving his right in a pledged slave, who had died with the pawnee, may seek his compensation from either party, 647
Chapter IV.
Of the Power over Pawns, and of Offences committed by or upon them, 647
A pledge cannot be sold without the pawnee's consent, 647
Who, if the pawnor sell it more than once, may ratify either sale, 648
A pawned slave may be emancipated by the pawnor, 648
Objection, 648
Reply, 648
Who, if he be rich, may substitute the value in pawn for the slave, 648
But if he be poor, the slave must perform emancipatory labour to the amount of his value for the discharge of the amount of the pawnee's claim, 648
Although he should have denied being in pawn previous to such manumission, 649
A pawnor may create his pawned slave a Modabbir or Am-Walid, 649
And if he be rich, he must substitute the value in pawn; but if he be poor, the slave must perform emancipatory labour to the full amount of the debt, 649
The pawnor, on becoming rich, is responsible for the emancipatory labour in the former instance, but not in the latter, 649
PAWNS—continued.
An emancipated Modabbir does not owe the pawnee labour beyond his value, 649
Destruction of the pledge by his pawnor, 654
By a stranger, 650
Or by the pawnee, 650
A depreciation in the value of the pledge occasions a proportionable deduction from the pawnee’s claim, 650
The pawnee lending the pledge to the pawnor, is freed from responsibility during the loan, 650
But he may resume it at pleasure, and then his responsibility reverts, 650
Objection, 650
Reply, 650
The pledge being lent to a stranger by either party, is no longer a subject of responsibility, 650
The pledge, on being disposed of by either party, with the consent of the other, is excluded from the contract, 650
A person borrowing an article, with intent to pawn it, is restricted in the pawn according as he specifies the particulars of the debt, &c., or otherwise, 651
And if he transgress, is responsible for the value in case of loss, 651
But not if it be lost before pawn, or after redemption, 652
On disputes concerning the loss of the pledge, the deposition of the borrower is credited with respect to the person in whose hands it was lost, and that of the lender with respect to the restriction of the loan, 652
A person receiving a borrowed article in pledge on the faith of a promise, must pay the sum promised to the pawnor who again pays the same to the lender, 652
The lender of a slave to pawn may emancipate him, lodging the value with the pawnee, in substitute for the pledge, 652
The borrower transgressing upon the article (before pawn or after redemption), and then ceasing from such transgression, is not responsible in case of loss, 652
A pawnor destroying the pledge, is responsible to the pawnee for the value, 652
And so in proportion for any injury he does to it, 625
And final offence committed by a pledged slave upon either the person or property of his pawnor of no account, 653
Nor such offence committed by him upon the person of the pawnee, 653
Nor upon his property, provided his value do not exceed the debt for which he stands pledged, 653
But he is responsible against the son of his pawnee cognizable, 653
If the pledge be destroyed after depreciation, the pawnee must remain satisfied with the compensation he recovers from the destroyer, 653
But if, after such depreciation, he sell it by desire of the pawnee for payment of his claim, he is still entitled to any deficiency, 654
PAWNS—continued.
The pawnor must redeem a slave of less value (received by the pawnee in compensation for having slain the slave in pledge) by payment of his whole, 654
The fines incurred by a pledged slave must be defrayed by the pawnee, 655
But if he refuse, they are defrayed by the pawnor, who charges the pawnee accordingly, in liquidation of his debt, 655
Rules with respect to the debt incurred by a pledged slave destroying the property of a stranger, 655
If the value of the slave be twice the amount of the debt, the fines incurred by him are defrayed equally by both parties, 656
The executor of a deceased pawnor may sell the pledge and discharge the debt, with the pawnee’s consent, 656
An executor cannot pawn effects of the defunct to any particular creditor, 656
Unless there be only one, 656
He may receive pledges in security for debts owing to the defunct, 656
Grape-juice still remains in pawn after having become wine and then vinegar, 656
A pledge destroyed in part is still retained in with respect to the remainder, 657
Any increase accruing from the pledge is detained in, along with it, 657
The pawnee using the product from the pledge by permission of the pawnor, is not liable for anything on that account, 657
The pledge may be augmented, but not the debt, 658
Increased to a pledged female slave, 658
Of a pawnor committing one slave in pawn for another, 658
The pawnee is not responsible for the pledge after having acquitted the pawnor of his debt, 658
If the pledge be destroyed with him after he has received payment of his debt, he must return what he has received, and the debt stands liquidated, 659
So likewise if he compounds the debt, 659
Or if the pawnor, with his concurrence, transfer the debt upon another person, 659
If the pledge be lost after the parties agreeing that no debt had existed, it stands as a discharge of the supposed debt, 659

Evidence of reprobate persons is neither attended with, for whoredom to the accused, nor with, for slander to the accusers, 161
Witness defective in point of number incur, for slander, 191
And so also, of the complete number of witnesses, where one of them afterwards proves incompetent; but no fine is due in this case, except the accused suffer lapidation, when a deyit is due from the public treasury, 191
The testimony of secondary witness invalidates that of primary witnesses, 192
One of four witnesses retracting, after lapidation upon the accused, incures for slander, and is responsible for one-fourth of the fine of blood, 192 PUNISHMENT—continued.
But if he retract before lapidation, all the witnesses are liable to, 192
One of the five witnesses retracting does not incur, or fine, 193
Where justified witnesses prove afterwards defective, the fine of blood is due from the purgators of these witnesses, 193
Case in which the fine of blood falls upon the slayer, 194
Evidence of whoredom is valid, although the knowledge of the fact be unlawfully obtained, 194
The accused’s plea of celibacy, if unfounded does not prevent lapidation, 193
Chapter IV.
Of Hidd Shireeub, or the Punishment for Drinking Wine, 195
General rule, 195
Punishment is not inflicted in a case of confession or accusation made after the smell is gone off, 195
Unless this be owing to an unavoidable delay in bringing the accused to the seat of justice, 195
It is incurred by drinking Nabeez, 195
The smell alone does not suffice for conviction without evidence, 196
Nor intoxication, unless it be known to proceed from wine, 196
Not to be inflicted during intoxication, 196
For wine-drinking, to a free person, is eighty stripes, 196
And to slave forty, 196

Chapter 1.

Of Sale :

Is contracted by declaration and acceptance, 241

Expressed either in the preterite or the present, 241

Or by any expression calculated to convey the same meaning, 241

Objection, 241

Reply, 241

The acceptance may be deferred until the breaking up of the meeting, whether the declaration be made personally, 241

Or by letter or message, 242

An offer made by the purchaser cannot be restricted by the seller to any particular part of the goods, 242

Unless he oppose a particular rate of price to particular parts or portions, 242

If the acceptance be not expressed in due time the declaration is null, 242

Declarations and acceptance, absolutely expressed, render the, binding, 242

Where the article and the price are both produced, the, is complete without any specification of quantity or amount, 242

But a mention of money without a specification of the sum (unless it be produced upon the spot) is not valid, 242

A, may be entered into either for ready money or with specification of a promised time of payment, 242

The price must be stipulated at some known and determinate rate, 242

Grain may be sold for other grain of a different species, 243

Goods may be sold by a weight or measurement which is not of any particular standard, 243

Except in a case of Sillim, 243

And a, expressing the whole quantity in this way is altogether void, unless the amount of the whole be particularly specified, 243

If the quantity agreed for, fall short, the purchaser may either take it or undo the contract, 243

But if it exceed, the, is valid to the amount of the quantity bargained for, 243

SALE—continued.

If the quantity be of a nature capable of specification and fall short, the purchaser may either take it or undo the bargain, 244

But if it exceed, the, is binding to the amount agreed for, 244

If the quantity be so expressed as to relate both to description and to substance, the purchaser may either stand to or undo the bargain, whether it exceed or fall short of the amount specified, 244

The, of a specific number of yards of a tement is null, but not the, of a share, 244

The purchase of a package of cloth is null, if it contain more or less than the quantity of pieces agreed for, 244

Unless the seller previously specify the price of each particular price, 245

A, is null in toto, if the description of the goods be at all fallacious, 245

Case of the purchase of a price of cloth at so much per yard, 245

In the, of a house, the foundation and superstructure are both included, 245

In the, of land, the trees upon it are included, 245

But not the corn, 245

Nor in the, of tree is the fruit then upon it included, 246

But the purchaser must immediately clear these away, 245

In the, of ground, the seed sown in it is not included, 246

The imme-product is not included in the, of land or trees, although the rights and appendages be expressed in the contract, 246

Nor unless all its dependencies be generally expressed, 246

Nor can any product be included after being gathered or out down, 246

Fruit may be sold upon the tree in every state of growth, 246

But if the contract involve any condition not properly appertaining to, it is null, 246

The additional growth of fruit purchased on the tree, is suffered to continue upon it, by consent of the seller, is the property of the purchaser, 246

And so also if the purchaser take least of the tree, 247

But this rule does not hold with respect to grain purchased upon the ground, 247

Any new fruit which may grow in the interval is the property of the seller and purchaser, 247

Rule in the purchase of vegetables sold on a tree, 247

Grain may be sold in the ear, or pulse in the husk, 247

The, of a house includes the fixtures and their appendages, 248

The seller must defray the expense of weighers, tellers, measurers, and money-essayers, 248

But the charge of weighing the price must be defrayed by the purchaser, 248
SALE—continued
In barter or exchange, the mutual delivery must be made by both parties at the same time, 248
Chapter II.

Of Optional Conditions:—
Definition of term, 248
A condition of option may be lawfully stipulated by either party, 248
Provided it exceed not the term of three days, 248
If it exceed three days, and the stipulating party declare his acceptance before the expiration of the third day, the is lawful, 249
The payment of the price may be substituted as the condition, 249
The seller, by stipulating a condition of option, does not relinquish his property in the article sold, 249
But the property in it develops upon the purchaser where the stipulation is made on his part and he is consequently responsible for the loss of the goods, 249
If the purchaser have the option, and the goods be injured or destroyed in the interim, he is responsible for the price, 250
But if it rest with the seller, the purchaser is responsible for the value only, 250
Right of objection, in the purchase of a wife, is not affected by cohabitation with her in the interim of option, 250
Case of optional purchaser of a slave related to the purchaser, 250
And of a slave optionally purchased under a vow of menstrous female slave, 260
Or of a menstruous female slave, 250
Or of a pregnant wife, 251
Optional purchase made by a privileged slave, 251
Case of optional purchase of wine by a Zimmerman, who in the interim embraces the faith, 251
The possessor of option may annul the, with the knowledge of the other party, or confirm it without his knowledge, 251
And even if he annul it without the other's knowledge, and the other be informed informed the expiration of the term, it is valid, 252
A right of option in, cannot descend to an heir, 252
A right of option may be referred to third person, 252
Case of selling two slaves, with a condition of option with respect to one of them, 252
Objection, 252
Reply, 253

Option of Determination, 253
It extends to a choice out of three, but not out of more, 253
Objection, 253
Reply, 253
An option of determination may involve a condition of option, 253
But the term for making the determination must not, at all events, exceed three days, 253

SALE—continued.
Of the articles referred to the purchaser's choice, one if the subject of the, and the others are as deposits, 253
And both may be returned in case of a condition of option, 253
The heir of the person endowed with an option of determination may return one of the two articles referred to the purchaser's option in case of his death, 254
Option is declared and the, made binding by any act of the purchaser in relation to the article sold, 254
Any option of determination vested jointly in two persons, is determined by the subsequent consent of either to the purchase, 254
Objection, 254
Reply, 254
If any article purchased under one description prove to be of another description, the purchaser may either confirm or annul the contract, 254
Objection, 254
Reply, 254

Chapter III.

Of Option of Inspection, 255
A purchaser may reject an article upon inspection after purchase, 255
Although, before seeing it, he should have signified his satisfaction, 255
Objection, 255
Reply, 255
A seller has no option of inspection after, 255
The option of inspection continues in force to any distance of time after the contract, unless destroyed by circumstance, 255
Such as would have annulled a condition of option, 255
Option of inspection is destroyed by the sight of a part of the articles, where that suffices as a sample of the whole, 255
Option of inspection in the purchase of a house, 256
An agent for seisin may inspect in the same manner as a purchaser, 256
The inspection of a blind person may be made by touch, smell or taste, 257
Or (in a purchase of land) by description, 256
A sight of one of two articles, such as do not admit of samples, still leave a power of rejecting both, 257
The option is destroyed by the decease of the person with whom it rested, 257
Case of inspection previous to purchase, 257
A persons, after disposing of a part of his purchase, has no option with respect to the remainder, 258

Chapter IV.

Of Option from Defect, 258
A purchaser discovering a defect in the article purchased, is at liberty to return it to the seller, 258
Unless he was aware of the defect before hand, 258
Whatever tends to depreciate an article is a defect, 258
SALE—continued.
Defects incident to children affect the, of a slave, during infancy, but not after maturity, 258
Lunacy operates as a perpetual defect, provided it occur after the, 259
Defects which operate in the, of female slaves, but not of males, 259
Infidelity is a defect in both male and female slaves, 259
Constitutional infirmities are defects in a female slave, 259
A purchaser is entitled to compensation for a defect in an article where it has sustained a further blemish in his hands; but he cannot, in this case, return it to the seller, 259
A purchaser is entitled to compensation for a defect discovered after the article has been cut up, 260
Unless, after cutting, he put it out of his power to restore it to the seller, 260
Or, if the return be rendered impracticable by any change wrought upon the subject prior to the, he is entitled to compensation for defect, notwithstanding the, of it, 260
Appropriation of a purchase to the use of an infant (implied in any act concerning it which has a reference to the infant) by precluding a return to the seller, leaves the purchaser no right to compensation for a defect, 260
The purchaser of a slave is entitled to compensation for defect, after the death or emancipation of the slave, 260
But not after the emancipation, where it has been granted in return for property, 261
Nor after his death, where he has been slain by the purchaser, 261
A purchaser of food is not entitled to compensation for defect after having eaten it, 261
And so also, after having eaten only a part of the food, 261
Case of defect in very perishable commodities 261
Case of a purchaser selling what he has purchased, which is afterwards, returned to him in consequence of a defect, 262
Objection, 262
Reply, 262
Conduct to be observed by the magistrate, in case of a purchaser, after having taken possession, alleging a defect in the article, 262
Case of a purchaser alleging the existence of a defective property before he had made the purchase; and the forms of deposition to be required of the seller in this instance, 263
Case of a person purchasing two slaves, one of whom proves defective, 263
In the purchase of articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, the part which proves defective may be returned to the seller, 262
If a part of such articles prove the property of another, still the purchaser is not at liberty to return the remainder, 264

SALE—continued.
A purchaser, by applying a remedy to the defective article, or making use of it, deprives himself of the power of returning it to the seller, 264
If a purchased slave suffer amputation for a theft committed with the seller, the purchaser may return him, and receive back the price, 265
And so also if he suffer death for a crime committed with the seller, 265
Case of a slave suffering amputation for two thefts one committed with the seller, and the other with the purchaser, 265
Case of a slave, after being thrice sold, suffering amputation for a theft committed with the first seller, 265
Where the purchaser grants the seller an exemption from defects, he cannot afterwards return the article, whatever the defects in it may be, 266

Chapter V.
Of invalid, Null and Abominable Sales, 266
Distinctions between a null and invalid, 266
The property purchased under a null, is merely a trust in the purchaser's hands, 267
But that purchased under an invalid, becomes his property, 267
A, of prohibited things, if for money, is null, 267
But if in the way of barter is invalid, 267
The, of a Modabbir, Am-Walid, or a Mokatib is null, 267

OfMoorabihat, and Tawleeat, that is, Sales of Profit and of Friendship, 281
Definition of Moorabihat and Tawleeat, 281 require that the price consist of simior, if otherwise, that the person who enters into the agreement with the purchaser should have obtained possession of the price in the interim
but the profit agreed for must be in money or specific articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, and must be stipulated upon the whole price, generally, and not proportionably upon its parts, 2S2


SALE—continued.
All intervening expenses which enhance the value of the article may be added to the prime cost, 282
In case of an over-statement of the price, the purchaser may undo the bargain, 283
Or (in Tawleesat) deduct the excess, 283
A profit by a Moorabihat, cannot be twice obtained upon the same article, 283
Case of Moorabihat transacted by a privileged slave with his owner, 283
Case of Moorabihat transacted between the manager of a stock and the purchaser, 284
An article may be disposed of by Moorabihat, where a defect has intervened not proceeding from the seller, or where the seller has used the article in the interim, without injury to it, 284
But if the defect be occasioned by, or compensated to, the seller, a proportionable deduction must be made from the price, 285
If the article be damaged by an accident not proceeding from the seller, still it is a proper subject of Moorabihat, c85
A mis statement of a prompt payment instead of a suspended payment, leaves it in the power of the purchaser to undo the bargain in a sale either of profit, 285
Or of friendship, 285
In a sale of friendship the rate must be specified; and the purchaser has a right of option until after the specification, 286
Movable property cannot be re-sold before seisin, 286
But land may be re-sold previous to seisin by the first purchaser, 286
In the re-sale of articles of weight, and measurement of capacity, it is requisite that the article be weighed or measured again by the second purchaser, 286
It suffices that the article be weighed or measured by the seller, in the purchaser’s presence, 287
In the re-sales of articles of tale or longitudinal measurement, the telling or measuring by the second purchaser is not requisite, 287
A seller may dispose of the price of his goods without having taken possession of them, 287
The parties may make any subsequent addition or abatement with respect either to the goods or the price; and such addition or abatement are incorporated in the contract, 287
Objection, 287
Reply, 287
The price cannot be increased after the destruction of the goods in the purchaser’s hand, 288
Objection, 288
Reply, 288
Prompt payment may be commuted for distant payment, 288
Chapter VII.
Of Ribba, or Usury, 289
Definition, 289
SALE—continued.
Usury (occasioned by rate united with species) is unlawful, 289
It consists in the, of an article (of weight or measurement of capacity) in exchange for an unequal quantity of the same article, 289
But does not exist where the quantities are not ascertained by some known standard of measurement, 289
It is occasioned either by an inequality in point of quantity, or by a suspension of repayment; unless the consideration and the return be heterogeneous, 289
Objection, 290
Reply, 290
All articles ordained by the Prophet to be articles of measurement, continue so, notwithstanding any alterations of custom; and the same of all ordained by him to be articles of weight, 290
All articles referred to any known standard of weight are considered as articles of weight, 290
Note concerning Sif Sale, 291
Similar may be sold for each other, without inducing usury, 291
Usury cannot take place with respect to Faloos, as they are articles of, 291
Objection, 291
Reply, 291
Flour or meal cannot be sold for wheat, 291
Flour may be sold for flour, 292
But not for meal, 292
The, of flesh for a living animal is not usurious, 292
Nor the, of fresh dates for dried ones, 292
The, of the manufactured produce of an article in exchange for a similar article, is usurpious, unless it exceed that article in quantity, 293
One species of flesh may be sold for another species, 293
The, of the milk of one animal for an unequal quantity of milk of another species of animal does not induce usury, 293
Bread may be sold for flour of an unequal rate, 293
Usury cannot take place between a master and his slave, 293
Unless the slave be an insolvent Mazoon, 293
Nor between a Musulman and an infidel in a foreign country, 293
It may take place between a protected alien and a Musulman, 293
Chapter IX.
Of Rights and Appendages, 293
Definition of rights and appendages, as connected with, 79
Difference of rights in a purchase with respect to a Manzil, a Dar, and a Bait, 294
A porch over a road, connected with a house, is not included in the, of it, unless it be expressly specified, 294
The avenue is not included in the purchase of an apartment of a house,—nor wells or drains in the purchase of lands, unless the appendages be expressed in the contract, 294

SALE—continued.

Chapter X.

Of Claim of Right, preferred by others to the Subject of a Sale.
A female slave, claimed after having produced a child whilst in the purchaser's possession, is, together with her child, the property of the claimant, provided the claim be established by evidence; but if the claim be supported by the purchaser's acknowledgment only, the child is not his property, 294

A person selling another as slave, who afterwards proves to be free, must restore the purchase money; or, if the alleged slave have excited the purchaser to the bargain, he must restore it in defect of the seller, 293

Case of claim to an immovable property after a composition with respect to it, 296

Of Fazoolee Bea, or the Sale of Property of another without his Consent, 296

A, contracted without authority may be dissolved by the proprietor of the subject, 296

If assented to, the price is the property of the proprietor, and deposited with a Fazoolee seller, 296

Who is at liberty to dissolve the contract without his concurrence, 296

If the proprietor die, and the subject be not specified, he is invalid, 297

The emancipation, by the original proprietor, of a slave usurped and sold by the usurper is valid, 297

The fine incurred by maiming a slave sold under an usurpation goes to the purchaser, if the former proprietor assent to such, 297

The re-sale of a slave purchased from an usurper is rendered invalid by the proprietor signing his assent to the first, but if the slave perish in the interim, the assent is of no account, 298

Objection, 298

Reply, 298

An article purchased through the medium of an unauthorized person cannot be returned to the proprietor, although the purchaser, prove the want of authority, or the proprietor's assent to the, but if the seller avow he is not being authorized, the, is null, 298

In the, of immovable property by an unauthorized person, the seller is not responsible, 299

Chapter XI.

Of Sillim Sales, 299

Definition, 299

A Sillim, is lawful, 299

In all articles of weight (except dirms and deemars), measurement of capacity, 299

Longitudinal measurement and tale, 299

It is not lawful with respect to animals, 300

Or the parts of animals, or skin, firewood, or hay, unless the quality be ascertained, 300

Nor unless the subject be in continued existence until the time of delivery, 300

SALE—continued.

It is lawful with respect to articles which, although perishable in their nature, are kept in a state of preservation, or in situations where the article may always be had, 300

It is not lawful with respect to flesh-meat, 301

The period of delivery must be specified, 301

Private standards of measurement cannot be used in it, 301

It is not lawful under a restriction of the subject to the produce of a particular place, 301

And requires that the genus be specified, and that the species, quality, quantity, period of delivery, rate, and place of delivery, be all determined, 302

Objection, 302

Reply, 302

The place of delivery, however need not be determined with respect to articles which are not of expensive carriage, 303

The price must be received at the meeting, 303

Whence, if a debt owing from the seller to the purchaser be considered as part of it, the, is invalid in that proportion, 304

But it cannot be disposed of by the seller until he take possession of it, 304

Nor can the purchaser perform any act with respect to the goods until he receive them, 304

In a dissolution of Sillim the stock cannot be applied to the purchase of anything from the seller until it be first received back, 304

Objection, 304

Reply, 304

An article subsequently purchased and made over in fulfilment of a Sillim, is not held to be delivered, 304

Unless the purchaser receive it first on behalf of the seller, and then make seisin of it on his own account, by two distinct measurement, 303

Objection, 305

Reply, 305

A second measurement is not required in a similar receipt of article by a lender, 305

If the seller measure the article on behalf of the purchaser in his absence, it is not a delivery, although it be measured, into the purchaser's sack, 305

And so also if it be measured by the seller into his own sack, at the purchaser's instance, although the purchaser be present, 306

Case of delivery of a determinate article in the same parcel with an undeterminate article, 306

Objection, 306

Reply, 306

If the contract be dissolved, and the article advanced perish before restitution, the seller is responsible, 306

The dissolution of a, is rendered invalid by the article perishing before restitution, 370

| Definition, 547 |
| The right of, appertains to a partner in the property, a participator in the immunities of the property, and a neighbour, 548 |
| No person can claim it during the existence of one who has a superior right, 548 |
| Unless he first relinquish it, when the title devolves to the next in succession, 548 |
| One who is a joint proprietor of only a part of the article has a title superior to a neighbour, 549 |
| The relative situation of the property determines the right, when claimed on the plea of neighbourhood, 549 |
| The right of all the Shafees (claiming upon equal ground) is equal, without any regard to the extent of their properties, 549 |
| If some be absent, the, is, adjudged equally amongst those who are present,—but the absentees appearing receive their shares, 549 |
| The right does not operate until after the sale of the property, 550 |
| Nor until regular demand, 550 |
| Nor does the property go to the Shafie but by the surrender of the purchaser, or a decree of the magistrate, 550 |

| Chapter II. |
| Of Claims of, and Litigation concerning it, 350 |
| The claims are of three kinds, 450 |
| I. The immediate claim, which must be made on the instant, or the Shafie forfeits his title, 550 |
| II. The claim by affirmation and taking to witness which must be made as soon as conveniently may be after the other, 551 |
| III. The claim by litigation, 551 |
| A delay in the litigation does not invalidate the claim, 551 |
| Particularly, if occasioned by the absence of the magistrate, 552 |
| Rules to be observed by a magistrate on an appeal, 552 |
| The mode prescribed for his examining the parties, 552 |
| The cause may be litigated and determined independent of the price of the property in dispute, 552 |
| But the defendant may retain the one until the other be produced, 552 |

SHAFFA—continued.
The privilege is not forfeited by a delay in the payment, 552
The seller may be sued whilst the house is in his possession, 553
An agent for the purchaser may be sued (before delivery to his constituent), 553
And so also an agent for the seller, or an executor, 553
The Shafee, after gaining his suit, has an option of inspection, and also an option from defect, 553
Of Disputes relative to the Price, 553
In disputes concerning the price, the assertion of the purchaser, upon oath must be credited, 553
And so likewise evidence produced by him, 553
And also his assertion, if the seller allege a larger amount, 554
Case in which the seller's assertion may be credited concerning the price, 554
Of the Articles in lieu of which the Shafee may take the Shaffe Property, 555
The Shafee is entitled to the benefit of any abatement made to the purchaser, but not to that of a total remission, 555
He is not liable for any augmentation agreed upon after the sale, 555
If the price consist of effects, the Shafee may take it on paying the value of those effects; but if it consist of similars, he is to pay an equal quantity of the same, 555
And so likewise, if the price consist of land, 555
In case of a term of credit, the Shafee may either wait the expiration of the term, or take the property immediately, upon paying the price, 555
Of property subject to, purchased by a Zimme for a price consisting of unlawful articles, 556
The shafee may either take buildings or plantations of the purchaser (paying the value), or may cease them to be removed, 556
The Shafee is not entitled to any remuneration for buildings erected or trees planted on land which proves the property of another:—but he may remove them, 557
If the property have sustained any accidental or natural injury after sale, still the Shafee cannot take it for less than the full value, 557
If the injury be committed by the purchaser, the Shafee may take the ground alone at its estimated value, 557
Of a Shaffe taking ground with fruit trees, 558
Chapter IV.
Of Articles concerning with Shaffe Operates, 558
The right of, holds with respect to all immovable property, 558
Unless it be sold separate from the ground on which it stands, 558
A Musulman and a Zimme are on an equality with respect to it, 558

SHAFFA—continued
It holds with respect to property transferred in any shape for a consideration, 558
It does not hold in a property assigned in dower, or as a compensation for Khoola, or as a hire, or in compensation for murder, or as the price of manumission, 559
It holds with respect to a house sold in order to pay the dower, 559
It does not hold with respect to a house the possession of which is compromised by a sum of money, 559
It holds with respect to a house made over in composition, 559
But not with respect to property transferred by grant, 5.9
It does not apply to property sold under a condition of option, 559
But it does with respect to property so purchased, 5.0
And on the Shafee taking possession, the purchaser's right of option, ceases, 5.0
In case of sale upon option, the possessor of the option is Shafee of the adjacent property, 560
It does not apply to property transferred under as invalid sale, 560
The seller of property under an invalid sale is still Shaffe of the adjacent property, 560
Until he deliver the property sold to the purchaser, who then has the right, 569
Which, however, falls upon the seller resuming his property, 560
A right of Shaffe is not created by partners making a partition of their joint property, 560
The right once relinquished cannot afterwards be resumed, 561
Chapter IV.
Of Circumstances which Invalidate the Right of Shaffe, 561
A right of, is invalidated by the Shafee omitting to procure evidence in due time, 561
Or by his offering to compound it, 561
Or by the death of the Shafee before the Kazee's decree, 561
It is not invalidated by the death of the purchaser, and therefore cannot be disposed of on his behalf, 562
It is invalidated by the Shafee selling the property whence he derived his right, 562
Or by his acting as agent for the seller, 562
He may resume his right where he had relinquished it upon misinformation concerning the price, 562
Or by the purchase, 563
Or where he has been misinformation concerning the article sold, 563
Device by which the right of, may be evaded, 563
Case of a house purchased in shares, by the same person at different times, 563
Where the price of the property sold is compromised for a specific article, the Shafee, if he insist on his right, must pay the price, 563
SALE.—continued.
Miscellaneous Cases, 563
The Shafee may take a share from one of several purchasers; but if there be several sellers, and only one purchaser, he must take or relinquish the whole, 564
In case of the sale and partition of half a house, the Shafee may take the purchaser's lot, 564
If one partner sell his share, the Shafee may annul any subsequent partition, and take it for the price, 564
Acts of a father or guardian with respect to the Shaffa of an infant ward, 564
The concession of a house by a composition does not induce a right, 442
But is induced by the act of giving a house in composition, 442

The articles opposed must be exactly equal in point of weight, but may differ in quality, 312
The exchange must take place upon the spot, 312
Gold may be sold for silver at an unequal rate provided the exchange take place upon the spot, 312
No act can be performed with relation to the return until it be received, 312
Objection, 313
Reply, 313
Gold may be sold for silver by conjecture, but not gold for gold, nor silver for silver, 313
In the, of an article having gold or silver upon it, the price paid down is opposed to the gold or silver, 313
In the purchase of plate, if the parties separate before payment of the full price, the sale is valid only in the proportion paid, 313
Or if it discovered to be in part the property of another, the purchaser may relinquish the bargain, 314
But this does not hold with respect to an ingot, 314
Where the article on each side consist of two species of money, the sale at an unequal rate is lawful, 314
And so also where the article on one side consists of a certain number of coins of one species, and on the other of an equal number of two species, 315

Chapter I.

Oaths of sinful nature are of three kinds, 150

Prejury, 150

Objection, 150

Reply, 150

Contracted, where not fulfilled, 151

And inconsiderate oaths, 151

Expiration is incumbent, whether the vow be wilful, a compulsory, or although the oath be taken under a deception of the memory, 151

The violation of a vow, whether by compulsion or through forgetfulness, requires expiration, 151

Objection, 151

Reply, 151

Chapter II.

Of what Constitutes an Oath, or Vow, and what does not constitute it, 151

An oath may be expressed by using the same of God, or any of His customary attributes, 131

Excepting His knowledge, wrath, or mercy, 151

It is not constituted by using any other name, 151

Particles of swearing, 152

Swearing by the truth of God is not an oath, 152

The expressions, "I swear," "I vow," "I testify," constitute an oath, without the name of God, 152

Swearing by the existence of God makes an oath, 152

A vow may be contracted by the imprecation of a conditional penalty, 152

Chapter III.

Of Kafara, or Expiation:—

A vow may be expiated by the emancipation of a slave, the distribution of alms, 153

Of fasting, 153

Previous expiation does not suffice, 153

A sinful vow must be broken and expiated, 154

Or infidels, being nugatory, cannot be held as violated, 154

Of abstinence, 154

Is binding, where any condition annexed, 155

Pronounced, with reservation of the will of God, are null, 155

Chapter IV.

Of Vows with respect to entrance into a residence in a particular place, 155

A, against entering a house is not violated by entering a mosque, church, &c., 156

A, against entering a serai is not violated by entering a ruin, 156

A, against entering any particular house is not broken by entering it when in ruins, 156

Vows—continued.

Against entering in a house not violated by going under the roof or entering the portion, 156

Case of, respecting abstinence from a thing

in which the vower is at present engaged, 156

Against residing in a city not broken by the vower's family, continuing to reside there, 157

Chapter V.

Of Vows, respecting various actions, such as going, riding, and so forth, 158

An evasion of, is a violation of them, 157

An undetermined, of performance is not violated until the death of the vower, 158

Made with a view of prevention, 158

Case of, expressed generally, but restricted in its sense to some particular occasion, 158

Chapter VI.

Of Vows in respect to Eating or Drinking, 158

With respect to eating dates, 158

Of abstinence from anything is not broken by eating that thing when it has acquired a new description, 159

Or denomination, 159

Chapter VII

Of Vows with respect to Speaking and Conversing, 163

A, against speaking to such a person is violated by speaking to him within hearing distance, although he be asleep, 168

Case in which the violation of the vow depends upon the meaning of the terms used in it, 163

Case of a, against conversing with a person

for a specified time, 163

Repetition of prayer, &c., at the stated season

does not violate a vow of silence, 163

Made respecting the day, extends to the night

also, 164

Case of a, of inhibition restricted to a particular occurrence, 164

A, against conversing with a person described is, in relation to another, not violated by conversing with that person after the description with respect to the other is done away, 164

A, against conversing with such a youth is violated by conversing with him after manhood, 165

Respecting converse with reference to him, 165

Chapter VIII.

Of Vows in Manumission and Divorce,—

Divorce vowed on condition of the birth of a child, takes place, although the child be stillborn, 166

Freedom vowed in favour of a child that may be born of a female slave, takes place on her first liveborn child, 166

Case of a, of freedom to the first purchased slave, 167

Case of a, of freedom to a last purchased slave, 167

Vows—continued.

Case of a, of freedom to whichever of his slaves shall congratulate the vower on the birth of a child, 167

Emancipation of a slave in consequence of a, does not suffice for expiation, 167

But the emancipation of a father in female sequence of purchase suffice, 166

The emancipation by purchase of a female slave by a person to whom she stand in the relation of an am-Walid does not suffice, 168

Case of a, of freedom to a female slave on condition of concubinage, 168

A general vow of freedom to slaves includes every description of them, 169

Case of a, of divorce indefinitely expressed, 169

Chapter IX.

Of Vows of Buying, Selling, Marriage, and so forth, 169

A, against the performance of certain acts is not violated by procuring an agent to perform those acts, 169

Except in the case of marriage, manumission, or divorce, 169

Or any acts, the right of which solely apper-tain to the vower, 169

Nor by employing the other to do the thing where the advantage results solely to the subject of the, 170

A, of freedom conditioned upon the sale of a slave, takes place on the instant of the sale, and the sale is null, 170

Divorce suspended upon the not selling of a slave, takes place on emancipation or Tadbeer, 170

A, of general divorce in reply to a wife charging her husband with bigamy, takes place upon her in the same manner as upon the rest, 170

Chapter X.

Of Vows respecting Pilgrimage, Fasting, and Prayer, 171

Case of a, of Masha, 171

Case of a, of manumission suspended upon the not performance of pilgrimage, 171

Case of a, against fasting, 171

Case of a, against fasting for a day, 171

Case of a, against prayer, 171

Chapter XI.

Of Vows respecting Clothing and Ornaments, 171

Of husband against wearing cloth of his wife’s manufacture, 171

Chapter XII.

Of Vows concerning Striking, Killing and so forth, 172

A, made against striking a person is not violated by striking that person when dead, and the same of a vow against clothing, 172

Speaking to, going to, 173

Or washing the person, 173

A, against beating is violated by any act which causes pain, unless that act be committed in sport, 173

Of slaying a person who is already dead incurs the penalty, 173

Vows—continued.

Chapter XIII,

Difference in a, between the Term Shortely and in Length of Time, 173

A, to discharge a debt is fulfilled by discharging it in light or base money, or in money belonging to another, 173

Of by means of liquidation, 173

Objection, 174

Reply, 174

But not by the gift of the creditor, 174

A, not to accept reimbursement of a debt in partial payments, is not violated until the whole debt shall have been received, 174

Chapter XIV.

Of Miscellaneous Cases, 174

A, against doing a thing unrestrictedly pronounced, operates as a perpetual inhibited, 174

A, of performance is fulfilled by a single instance of performance, 174

An oath imposed by a supreme magistrate continues in force only during the existence of that magistrate’s authority, 175

A, of gift, is fulfilled by the offer of a gift, although it be not accepted, 175

But not to any further extent, 671
Unless by consent of the heirs, 671
A bequest to an heir is not valid unless confirmed by the other heirs, 671
A bequest to a person from whom the testator had received a mortal wound is not valid, 672
And if a legatee slay his testator, the bequest in his favour is void, 672
A bequest to a part of the heirs is not valid, 672
Bequests are valid between Musulmans and Zimmies, 672
The acceptance or rejection of them is not determined until after the death of the testator, 672
It is laudable to avoid making them where the heirs are poor, 673
The legatee becomes proprietor of the legacy by his acceptance of it, 673
Which may be either expressed or implied, 673
Bequest by an insolvent person is void, 673
So by an infant, 673

WILLS—continued.

Or a Mokatib, 674
A bequest or, in favour of a fetus in the womb is invalid, 674
A female slave may be bequeathed, with the exception of her progeny, 674
A bequest is rescinded by the express declaration of the testator, or by any act on his part implying his retraction, 674
Or which extinguishes his property in the legacy, 675
The testator's denying his bequest is not a retraction of it, 675
Nor his declaring it unlawful or usurious, 675
Or desiring the execution of it to be deferred, 675
A bequest to one person is annulled by a subsequent bequest of the same article to another, 675
Unless that other be not then alive, 675

Of a person bequeathing two-thirds of his property to two persons respectively, 676
Of Mohabat, 676
Bequests of specific sums of money, 676
A person bequeathing the whole of his estate to one, and then a third of it to another, 676
A bequests of a son's portion of inheritance is void, but not the bequest of an equivalent to it, 77
A bequest of "portion" of the estate is executed to the extent of the smallest portion inherited from it, 677
A bequest of "part of the estate," unfined, may be construed to apply to any part, 678
A person bequeathing first a sixth, and then a third, to the same person, 678
Or, first a third, and then a sixth to the same person, 678
A person bequeathing a third of any particular property, if two-thirds of it be lost, and the remainder come within a third of the testator's estate, the legatee is entitled to the whole of such remainder, 678
A bequest of "the third of" an article, part of which is afterwards destroyed, holds with respect to a third of the remainder 679
A legacy of money must be paid in full with the property in hand, although all the rest of the estate should be expended in debts, 679
A legacy left to two persons, one of them being at that time dead, goes entire to the living legatee, 679
A legacy being bequeathed to two persons indefinitely, if one of them die, a moiety of it only goes to the other, 679
A bequest made by a poor man is of force if he afterwards become rich, 679
A bequest of any article, not existing in the possession or disposal of the testator at his decease, is null, 679

WILLS—continued.

Of the period of Making, 684
Gratuitous acts, of immediate operation, if executed upon death-bed, take effect to the extent of one-third of the property only, 684
An acknowledgment on a death-bed is valid in favour of the person who afterwards becomes an heir, but not a bequest or gift, 684
Neither is an acknowledgment so made valid, if the principle of inheritance had existed in the person previous to the deed, 684
Such acknowledgment, gift, or bequest, in favour of a son, being a slave, who afterwards becomes free, previous to the father's decease, is nevertheless void, 685
Rule for ascertaining a death-bed illness, 685

Chapter III.

Of Emancipation upon a Death-bed, and of Wills relative to Emancipation, 685
Emancipation, gift and acts of Mohabat, on a death-bed, take effect to the extent of a third of the property, 685
Of a Mohabat and an emancipation by the same person, 683
Mohabat and emancipation precede in their execution the actual bequest, 686
The appropriation of a sum bequest to the emancipation of a slave is annulled by the subsequent loss or failure of any part of it, but not the appropriation of a sum to the performance of a pilgrimage, 686

It may be performed with nails, horns, or teeth (detached from their native place), 589
Or with any sharp instrument, 590
Precautions to be observed by the slayer, 590
The animal is lawful although it be wounded previous to cutting its throat, 590
All tame animals must be slain by cutting the throat; and wild animals by chasing or shooting them, 590
Camels must be slain by Nahr rather than by, 591
The foetus of a slain animal is not lawful, 591
Of the Things which may be lawfully eaten, and of those which may not, 521
All beasts and birds of prey are unlawful, 591
Wills—continued.
A slave, exceeding one-third of the property, emancipated on death-bed, is exempted from emancipatory labour by the heir-assenting to his freedom, 687
A bequest of emancipation in favour of a slave is nullified by his being made over in compensation for an offence committed by him, 687
Where the heir and the legatee agree concerning a slave having been emancipated by the testator, the allegation of the heir is credited with respect to the date of the deed, 687
Of an alleged emancipation and debt credited by the heirs, 687
Of Bequests for Pious Purposes, 688
In the execution of bequest to certain pious purposes, the ordained duties precede the voluntary, 688
Unless all the purposes mentioned be of equal importance, in which case the arrangement of the testator must be followed, 688
As well as where the purposes of the bequest are of a purely voluntary nature, 688
Rules in bequests towards the performance of a pilgrimage, 688
Chapter IV.

Chapter V.
Of Usufructuary Wills, 692
An article bequeathed in usufruct, 692
Must be consigned to the legatee, 692
But if it constitute the sole estate, being a slave, he is possessed by the heirs and legatee alternately; or, being a house, it is held among them in their due proportions, 692
Nor are the heirs in the latter instance allowed to sell their slaves, 693
The bequest becomes void on the death of the legatee, 693
A bequest of the produce of an article does not entitle the legatee to the personal use of the article, 693
Nor does a bequest of the use entitle him to let it to hire, 693
Wills—continued.
A bequest of the use of a slave does not entitle the legatee to carry him out of the place, unless his family reside elsewhere, 694
A bequest of a year's produce, if the article exceed a third of the estate, does not entitle the legatee to a consignment of it, 694
In a bequest of the use of article to one, and the substance of it to another, the legatee of usufruct is exclusively entitled to the use during his term, 694
A bequest of an article to one, and its contents to another, if connectedly expressed, entitles the second legatee to nothing, 694
A bequest of the fruit of a garden implies the present fruit only, unless it be expressed in perpetuity, 695

Reply, 696
The bequests of Zimmeees are of four kinds, 696
The will of a sensualist or innovator is the same as of an orthodox Mussulman, unless he proceed to a vowed apostasy, 696
The will of a female apostate is valid, 696
A Moostamin may bequeath the whole of his property, 696
But if he bequeath a part only, the residue is transmitted to his heirs, 696
An emancipation, or Tadbeer granted by him on his death bed, takes effect in toto, 696
Any bequest in favour of a Moostamin is valid, 697
The bequests of a Zimmee are subject to the same restrictions with those of a Mussulman, 697
He may make a bequest in favour of an unbeliever of a different, 697
Not being a hostile infidel, 697
Chapter VII.
An executor having accepted his appointment in presence of the testator, is not afterwards at liberty to reject it, 697
His silence leaves him an option of rejection, 697
But any act indicative of his acceptance binds him to the execution of the office, 697
Having rejected the appointment after the testator's decease, he may still accept of it, unless the magistrate appoint an executor in the interim, 697
