PUBLISHER’S NOTE

This is a word-to-word, line-to-line and page-to-page exact reproduction of the second edition of the monumental work “HEDAYA”. This has been intentionally done for the convenience of the readers, so that they may locate references and citations of this work made in other books.

It is hoped that the publication of this treasure of Islamic Jurisprudence which remained out of print for more than half a century will be greatly appreciated.

DEDICATION OF THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION.

TO WARREN HASTINGS, ESQ.,
LATE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF BENGAL, ETC.

SIR,—After the labour of several years, I am at last enabled to present you with a translation of the HEDAYA.

To you, Sir, I feel it incumbent on me to inscribe a work originally projected by yourself, and for some time carried on under your immediate patronage.—However humble the translator’s abilities, and however imperfect the execution of these volumes may be, yet the design itself does honour to the wisdom and benevolence by which it was suggested; and if I might be allowed to express a hope upon the subject, it is, that its future beneficial effects, in facilitating, the administration of Justice throughout our Asiatic territories, and uniting us still more closely with. Our Mussulman subjects, may reflect some additional lustre on your Administration.—I have the honour to be, with the utmost respect, and the most lively gratitude and esteem.

Sir,

Your most obedient,
And most humble Servant,

CHARLES HAMILTON.
ADVERTISEMENT TO THE SECOND EDITION.

In further pursuance of the design to which I alluded in my Preface to the Third Edition of Menu's Institutes, I now present to the profession the Second Edition of the HEDAYA. As this work has been made a text-book by the Council of Legal Education, for the examination of the students of the Inns of Court, who are qualifying themselves for call to the English Bar, with a view of practising in India; as the First Edition, by Mr. Hamilton, has been some time out of print; its bulk (four quarto volumes) is not calculated to assist reference to its pages; and its price had increased in proportion to the difficulty of obtaining it, I felt it a duty to publish a new Edition, in order to bring it somewhat more within the reach of the students, not only with reference to its size, but its cost. I have accordingly, therefore, prepared this Edition for those enterprising Publishers, Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. A large portion of the work having become obsolete, in consequence of the abolition of slavery, and from other causes, I have expunged the Books containing those portions from the present Edition, they being more interesting to the antiquarian (who can consult the First Edition) than useful to the student or practitioner, and their insertion would not only have increased the bulk of the volume, but its expense also. I have, however retained in the Introductory Discourse the translators's epitome of those books from which the object and scope of the obsolete law may be learned. Where portions of the expunged subjects have been incidentally mixed up with others, I have been constrained to retain such portions lest the context might, by their omissions, be involved in obscurity. The second edition is now comprised in one volume, printed in double columns, and in smaller type than the original, with a view of comprising it within that compass, but, as the type is clear, it is conceived that no disadvantage will result from this. Wherever any subject is omitted, I have inserted a note, expressing my reasons for expunging it. A large portion of the original translation had been printed in Italic letters. For the sake of uniformity and clearness, this plan has not been adopted in the present Edition. I have added a very copious Index, which will facilitate reference to the context; and I should have embodied in foot-notes, reference to the cases that have been decided upon the various subjects of which the work treats, but that I have already done so in that portion of my work on "the Mahommedan Law of Inheritance and Contract," in which the same subjects are discussed, and where those cases will be found collected.

Although the present Edition has been published with a view of assisting the student to prosecute his studies, yet the hope is entertained that the Judge, as well as the Practitioner, will find it useful, particularly in those provinces where the Mahommedan law demands a great portion of the attention of the judicial, as well as that of the practitioner. It is hoped, also, that it may be found useful in promoting the study of the law in the several Universities in India, being advisable to assimilate the curriculum in both countries as much as possible.

BY THE

COMPOSERS OF THE PERSIAN VERSION

PRAISE and glory unbounded is due to that adorable Being, in the investigation of whose ways; through several mazes, the most learned theologians are exhausted, and the most contemplative philosophers, in the wilderness of research, find the foot of comprehension shackled with the fetters of amazement!—Duly to return thanks for his favours (which to offer is a duty indispensible incumbent on every existent being) is impossible; and to touch the skirt of his intelligence (which exceeds the power of the finger of diligence) by force of reason and study, impracticable!—Salutations innumerable are also to be presented at the tribunal of Him who is seated on the elect throne, to follow whose infallible institutes is a certain means of attaining the Divine favour, and whose world-illuminating Lamp of Law derives its sacred light from the morning beams of the Day of Judgment.—All honour and blessing upon him, and upon his holy family, and his worthy Companions!—Upon the tablets of the hearts of those who adorn the exordium of the book of knowledge and wisdom, and upon the minds of those who expound the collected mysteries of the creation, it is impressed,—that, from the day that the delightful region of Bengal was cheered by the rays of Government of the Nawab Governor-General, Mr. Warren Hastings, the whole of his wise and prudent attention was occupied and directed to this point,—that the care and protection of the country, and the administration of public affairs, should be placed on such a footing, that the community being sheltered from the scorching heat of the sun of violence and tyranny, might find the gates closed against injustice and oppression; and that the range of sedition in those who deviate from the road of truth might be limited and shortened:—and since this hope must be fulfilled through the influence of the holy Law of the Prophet, and the injunctions and inhibitions of the chosen sect,—this denizen of the kingdom of humility and solitude, named Gholam Yehée, was therefore instructed and empowered, together with Molla Taj-addeen, Meer Mohammed Hosseine, and Molla Sharâeeat Ooila, to translate from the Arabic language into the Persian idiom certain treaties upon the Law, but particularly that excellent work the Hedaya (which, from its great subtlety, and the closeness of its style, is a species of miracle),—to which, accordingly, with their assistance, applying his attention, the Arabic text was, as much as it would admit, reduced into a Persian version; which they have entitled the Hedaya Farsee[Persian Guide].—hoping that mankind may thereby find their wants supplied, and that profit and advantage may thence accrue.

From those whose who travel in this fruitful garden let it not be concealed, that where, in the course of their investigation, the word Sheikhine [the two Elders] is mentioned, it signifies the two renowned Doctors, Imam Aboo Haneefa, and the most illustrious of his disciples, Imam Aboo Yoosaf:—where the word Tirraine [the two extremes] is written, it imports the sublime name of Aboo Haneefa (on whom be the peace of God) and Imam Mohammed, who stands next in rank to the two Elders; and by the term Sahibine [the two disciples] are intended the two scholars of Haneefa, upon both of whom be the blessing of God!

A hope is indulged, from the benevolence of those who shall persue the following pages, that if in passing over the valleys and the hills of this long journey, it should happen that the foot of meditation has anywhere slipped from its place, they will not treat it with severity, nor expose it to the finger of scorn or reprehension.—The guidance is ZAKAT means the alms imposed by the Law, in opposition to Sadka [charity], which signifies the voluntary contributions of individuals, and which is treated of at large under the head of gifts.—As ALMS, in our application of that word, is always used to denote something purely gratuitous, the translator, in treating of those imposed by the Mussulman law, has retained the original term, to which the English language does not afford any expression strictly analogous. Some writers have confounded Zakat and Sadka under one common meaning. The Arbian commentators, however, make an essential difference between them; for the former is merely an indispensable compliance with a legal obligation, claiming no merit in futurity; whereas the latter is as much an impulse of the mind as an act of the hand, and is of course entitled to its reward.—The impost of Zakat originated with MOHAMMED himself, who at first employed the revenue arising from it according to his discretion, in the support of his needly adherents; but the objects of it were afterwards ascertained by various passages in the Koran; and it is somewhat remarkable that the Prophet particularly excluded the members of his own family from any participation in it, and this in terms which sufficiently denote the arrogant superiority assumed by the tribe of Hashim.* To compensate, however, for this execution, he admitted them to a fifth share in that proportion of the spoil which was alloted to the public treasury. For some generations after MOHAMMED this impost was regularly collected, and faithfully applied to its appointed purposes.—In most Mussulman territories it continues to be levied at the present day; but the original object of its disbursement have been long since disregarded, and what was intended as a relief to the poor, is now, even in the best regulated governments, carried to the exchequer of the prince, who endeavours to satisfy his conscience by a sort of commutation, in the erection of mosques, or the support of a few indigent and idle Fakeers, about his palace. That which commenced in the indigence or rapacity of the sovereign, has now acquired a sort of prescriptive authority; and the revenue derived from Zakat is universally considered as the right of the state. It has indeed, for several centuries past, ceased to be collected upon stationary property, the only tax which at present...
bears the name of Zakat being that imposed on goods imported in the way of trade from one country or district into another, and levied in the name of a toll. — Many of its rules will be found to apply peculiarly to ARABIA and SYRIA, the countries in which these laws originated; and where flocks and herds have ever formed a chief part of the wealth of the inhabitants. Although the laws of Zakat have in a great measure been superseded, or become obsolete with respect to their original design, yet they are worthy of attention, as incidentally involving many of the laws of property in points not immediately connected with this subject. — Under this head is comprehended the Sadka Fittir or alms given to the poor on the festival of breaking Lent; because the payment of those is considered as a divine ordinance, and the amount (contrary to other descriptions of Sadka) is particularly prescribed by the LAW.

ZAKAT is the only one of the five books upon the Abadat, or spiritual law, retained by the English translator. It, is, therefore, immediately followed by the Maamilat, or temporal law, — commencing with MARRIAGE, and ending (properly) with BEQUEST, the last temporal act of MAN; — though a short supplementary book upon Hermaphrodites is added.

BOOK II. OF MARRIAGE.

The preliminaries to this most important of all contract, as set forth in Chap. I, are stated in terms remarkably simple. No provision is made for the execution of any written engagement; no particular form of ceremony is prescribed; but the efficiency of the whole is made to depend merely upon the oral declarations of the parties, before sufficient witnesses. In fact, written engagements were not in common use until some time after the establishment of Islamism. — A section of this chapter is occupied throughout with the matrimonial prohibitions and restrictions, with respect to which the Mohammedan and Levitical law have a close affinity. The principal of these restrictions are, that a man shall not marry his relation within the prohibited degrees; that he shall not have more than four wives at a time; and that he shall not marry, together, two women related to each other within the prohibited degrees. — To the political and speculative inquirer the most curious features in this book are, the passages which particularly concern WOMEN, as contained in Chap. II. and III. from which it appears, that the female sex are, among the Mussulmans, invested with many personal rights and independent privileges, such as certainly, in some measure, compensate for the various hard conditions to which law or custom has subjected the daughters of Islam. — These, as they are fully discussed in the body of the work, it is needless to recapitulate. The most striking of them which occurs under this articles is, the liberty allowed to a woman to dispose of herself in marriage independent of her guardians, and the right of option which still remains to one contracted during infancy, after she shall have attained to maturity, which the law fixes at a very early age.* A woman is also entitled to possess her dower, or marriage settlement,

* See Vol. III.
as her own exclusive property, which she may dispose of by gift, will, or other deed, altogether independent of her husband, or of any claims which may lie against his estate.—Chapter VI. exhibits a still more extraordinary regard, in the Mussulman legislator, for the feelings of the sex, upon a point of a very delicate nature, and in which he doubtless consulted the peace of the Haram as much as the dictates of abstract equity.—Concerning this, however, we shall leave the text to speak for itself.

BOOK III. OF FOSTERAGE.

In a state of society where fastidious refinement has not destroyed the genuine feeling of the heart, the tie of fosterage is, next to that of blood, of the strongest and most lasting nature.—Even in the more remote parts of our own country the Nurse is still considered rather in the light of an humble relative than a menial dependent. By the people of Asia this idea is carried still farther; and the nursing is supposed to partake of the very nature of her from whose blood he receives his earliest nourishment. An affinity is therefore created by this circumstance, which operates to render marriage illegal in the same manner as actual consanguinity. Hence the prohibitions occasioned by fosterage are analogous to those set forth in the second section of the preceding book,—to which this is a kind of supplement.

BOOK IV. OF DIVORCE.

The greater variety of matter which this book embraces, and the many deviations which it admits from its main subject, the translator shall not undertake either to account for or to defend.—From the contents of the first six chapters the reader will perceive that the Mohammedan law of divorce bears a strong affinity throughout to that of Moses. In this, as in marriage, no written instrument is required, the repudiation being effected merely by the verbal declaration of the party.—Custom, indeed, and the municipal regulations of most Mussulman countries, following the example of the Jews, have made a writing of divorce, if not an essential, at least a circumstance which it would be highly indecorous to omit. What most forcibly strikes us on the perusal of this subject is the extreme facility with which a husband may rid himself of his female partner,—a facility which, when we consider the too frequent levity and fickleness of Man, seems at first sight calculated to expose the weaker sex to the most degrading insult which malice could dictate, of caprice put in practice.—The Arabian legislator has, however, established so many bars, and pride itself opposes such obstacle as, if they do not completely remedy, at least tend greatly to counteract this apparent defect.—Before a divorce becomes irreversible it must have been pronounced three times, allowing (according to the orthodox form) an interval of a month to pass between each sentence;—or such a period must have elapsed as affords ample room for reflection and repentance, in cases of anger or disgust; and a reversal is, at any time before the expiration of that term, established by either word or deed, denoting a reconciliation. The husband, moreover, unless he can prove gross misbehaviour, must give up the dower.—But the most powerful obstacle to unjust or capaicious repudiation is that part of the law which provides, that if a wife be once completely divorced, the husband cannot take her again, until she be previously married to, bedded with, and divorced by, another man.—To this salutary regulation chiefly is owing the dislike which obtains against divorce in all Mussulman countries, and the dishonour attached to it,—insomuch that the instances of it are very rare, notwithstanding the liberty which is permitted by the Law. The place and title of Chap. XV. would naturally lead us to conclude, that it treats in particular of the alimony payable to a divorced wife during the term of probation. This, however, is by no means the case; for it is made to comprehend those rights of every person which come under the denomination of MAINTENANCE,—not of the wife alone, but also of parent, children, poor or disabled relatives, and slaves.—With respect to domestic arrangements, this is, perhaps, the most useful section of the whole work. It evinces, in many places, a considerable spirit of humanity, and very properly introduces.

BOOK V. OF MANUMISSION.

TENDERNESS towards SLAVES is certainly a prevalent principle in the Mussulman law, notwithstanding some passage which occur in this treatise concerning them are directly repugnant to common feeling, and to the natural rights of MAN.—In the XXIVth chapter of the Koran this tenderness is strongly enforced with respect to certain points in the domestic treatment of them* and it may also be traced in various parts of this Commentary.—It is, indeed, in practice pretty much confined to the slaves professing the Mussulman faith, as it is natural to suppose that the followers of the Prophet do not entertain the same regard towards their bond-servants of other religions. Still, however, we shall be guilty of great injustice, if we form our ideas of Mussulman slavery from the treatment experienced by Christian captives among the barbarians of Tunis and Algiers. The precepts concerning manumission are injunctive with respect to believers only; but those which recommend kindness and good usage apply to all alike. The law in many instances affords them protection against injustice, and declares them to be “claimants of right.” It in some particulars, moreover, provides an alleviation to this otherwise most hopeless and degraded state of Man, unknown to the more polished inhabitants of Europe;—as may be perceived in perusing the laws with respect to Am-Walids, Mokatibs, Modabbers, and Mazoons.—To the free-born denizen of Britain, the very name of Slave carries with it something odious and disgustful: but the Mohammedan bondman, generally speaking, experiences in a very slight degree, if at all, the miseries which necessarily attend that state in some of the dependencies of Europe; where the riches of the community grow out of the incessant labour of wretches, whose shortened date of life is balanced against their earnings by rules of Algebra and calculations of Arithmetic! If the slaves of Mussulman appear, by their conduct, to be deserving of

* The passage referred to treats of matchings slaves who are single:—"Conicorn in marriage) those of them who are single, such as are worthy, of your male and female (slaves); if they be poor, God will enrich them of his bounty."—"Unto such as desire a written covenant (of Kitabat), grant it, if ye see good in them; and give them of the riches of God, which he hath given you," &c.

encouragement, they are frequently treated rather as humble friends and confidents than as servile dependants; and though inhibited from rising in the state, often, in the capacity of Mazoons, amass a degree of wealth which enables them to purchase their freedom.—The subject of manumission is discussed at large in the first five chapters of this book,—Chap. VI. treats of a practice which was common in ARABIA before the time of MOHAMMED, and was confirmed by his precepts. It affords a strong incentive to emancipation, by enabling a master to perform an act of piety which, being posthumous in its effect, cannot injure his circumstances.—Chap. VII. exhibits a branch of that most important article, “the establishment of parentage.” It shows, that the children born to man by his female slaves are as legitimate as those begotten in marriage; and also, that the Mussulman law, like the Roman, does not acknowledge any affinity between a bastard and his father, but throws him wholly upon the mother.

Note.—On turning to Book V. it will be seen that the subject treated of has been omitted, on the ground that slavery having been abolished by Act V. of 1843, there is no use in preserving the law upon the subject, which will be interesting to the antiquarians only and he can find the learning upon the subject in the earlier editions.

BOOK VI. OF VOWS.

Oaths are one of the bonds of society, and in many instances the chief security for public integrity and private property. Perjury, therefore, has in all communities been justly reprobated as a most flagrant crime. It is remarkable, however, that the Mussulman law has instituted no specific punishment for this species of offence, except in the case of slander, the legislator seeming to think the apprehension of punishment in a future state of itself sufficient to restrain men from the commission of it. This is evidently the case with respect to the expurgatory oaths required of accused or suspected persons. In matters of property, indeed, the magistrate is at liberty to punish it by a slight discretionary correction; but in those most enormous instances of it which implicate the life of MAN, the only ill consequence it induces, on discovery, is a fine adequate to the blood thus unjustly shed:—a very trifling atonement certainly! In this defect, however (if it be such), of their law, the Mussulman do not stand alone.

Note.—The law of perjury is now regulated by the Penal Code.

VOL. II

BOOK VII. OF PUNISHMENTS

This book treats only of the punishment incurred by crimes of a spiritual nature, those instituted for offences against person or property being discussed under their respective heads. The punishment for adultery is certainly severe. Yet we will not, perhaps, be forward to condemn this severity, if we compare it for a moment with what is recorded in the twentieth chapter of Leviticus upon the same point.—In fact, from the nature of the evidence required, it was next to impossible that the offence should ever be fully proved, even among the tents of the ARABS; so that the institution of the prescribed punishment was in a great measure nugatory, except in cases of confession by the parties. That those confessions were sometimes made in the early days of Islamism, is a fact; and made, as they were, at the certain expense of life, they afford a wonderful instance of devoted zeal among the first followers of MOHAMMED. Still, however, even in those instances, every means that precaution could suggest is enjoined to avoid the necessity of inflicting the sentence.—The three first chapters of the book relate entirely to whoredom, and the penalties incurred by each species of illegal connexion.—Chap. III. involves some curious matter concerning the retrospective limitations of testimony, which in practice extend to all cases of criminal accusation. Much here occurs, likewise, concerning the general laws of evidence, that may not be deemed unworthy of notice. Chap. IV. containing the penalties of drunkenness, exhibits a degree of lenient indulgence with respect to that vice which we should scarcely expect to meet in a Mussulman law-book, as it hence appears that a man may offend in this way, even to a considerable degree, without any danger of legal cognizance.—Slander, as treated of in Chap. V. comprehends all expressions which may either affect the reputation of a man or woman previously possessed of a fair character, or the legitimacy of their issue; and the punishment has, added to it, an effect equally just and politic, namely, incapacitating the slanderer from appearing as an evidence on any future occasion.—Discretionary correction, which forms the subject of Chap. VI. extends to all petty descriptions of personal insult, even to abusive language. In fact, two thirds of the punishment incurred under the Mussulman jurisdiction at the present day, whether in Turkey, Persia, or India, are inflicted under the name of Tazeer.—We must not pass this book without noticing the extraordinary indulgence shown to slaves, in subjecting them, for all spiritual offences, to only half the punishment of freemen. The reasons alleged for this lenity manifest an uncommon degree of consideration and feeling for the state of bondage.

BOOK VIII. OF LARCENY.

The Translator has adopted the term Larceny, as the title of this book, because that work expresses every species of THEFT, from the most petty to the most atrocious. The uniform punishment annexed to Larceny is the amputation of a limb, unless where the act has been accompanied by murder, in which case the offender forfeits his life by the law of RETALIATION.—Many arguments might be adduced against the law of mutilation in cases of Larceny, founded as well on the inhumanity as the inefficiency and inconvenience of that mode of correction. It is, however, the only method expressly authorized by the text of the KORAN;—and if we consider the force of religious prejudice, and the effect of long habit, it may, perhaps, appear very unadvisable to introduce any hasty alteration in the penal jurisdiction in this particular,—especially as we have nothing better to offer by way of substitute (for surely our penal laws are still more sanguinary!), and also, as the Gentoo laws, with respect to theft are strictly analogous to the Mussulman, in awarding mutilation under certain circumstances.—Chap. VII. of this book is particularly worthy of attention, as it respects the most daring and outrageous breach which can be made against the peace and security of society. To enter fully into the spirit of the text, in this and many other parts under the head of larceny, it is requisite that we keep in mind the peculiar manners of the people in those parts of the world where the Mussulman law operates. It is observable that, at the end of this book, a remarkable instance is incidentally introduced of the forbearance of the law in a case of homicide upon provocation.

NOTE.—Book VIII. has been omitted, as the question of larceny, as now applicable to India, is regulated by the Penal Code, Act XLV. of 1860.

BOOK IX. THE INSTITUTES

This book contains a chief part of what may be properly termed the political ordinances of MOHAMMED, and is useful both in a historical and a legal view,—in the former, as it serves to explain the principles upon which the Arabians proceeded in their first conquests (and in which they have been imitated by all successive generations of Mussulmans), and in the latter, as many of the rules here laid down, with respect to subjugated countries, continue to prevail in all of that description at the present day. The nature and end of those regulations is so fully explained in the text, that they do not require any illustration or comment in this place*.

BOOK X. OF FOUNDLINGS.

One of the earliest and most laudable attempts of MOHAMMED, in the prosecution of his pretended mission, was, to correct certain barbarous practices than prevalent among his countrymen, particularly with respect to infant children, whom it was common for the parents to expose or put to death, where they apprehended any inconvenience from the maintenance of them. The present book is to be considered merely as a comment upon his precepts in this particular.

BOOK XI. OF TROVES.

Book XII. ABSCONDING OF SLAVES.

NOTE.—This has been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XIII. OF MISSING PERSONS.

The rules laid down in these books will be found, in general, strictly consonant to natural justice, and such as prevail (or ought to prevail) in all well-regulated communities.

BOOK XIV. OF PARTNERSHIP.

This Book contains a number of subtle distinctions with respect to property, in many of which acute discrimination seems to be studied

* This book has been omitted, as it has hardly any practical effect; and, in requisite, the former edition can be consulted.
more than practical utility. Several of them the reader may indeed be tempted to consider rather as the scholastic reveries of an abstracted divine, than as flowing from an active intercourse with the world, or dictated by the liberal spirit of commerce. Still, however, it will perhaps be found, that in the mass of speculation much matter is interwoven of a more substantial kind. The Mussulman laws of property (to ascertain which is one great end of the present work) are in some instances defined with considerable precision; and the various subdivision it exhibits to us of representative wealth, as opposed to real, gives us an interesting idea of the refinement which, so many centuries ago subsisted in Mohammedan countries with respect to those particulars.

Book XV. Of Wake or Appropriations.

In all Mohammedan countries (and in none more than in Hindostan) it has been a common practice to dedicate lands, houses; and other fixed as well as movable property to the use of the poor, or the support of religion. The founding of a mosque, the construction of a reservoir, and even the digging a well, for the public use, come all under the same head; and many noble monuments of these kinds are still to be seen in different parts of India the useful effects of benevolence or superstition, in the more flourishing periods of the Mogul empire. That empire has, indeed, long since been hastening to decay; and the monuments of Mussulman piety or magnificence have suffered, with it, a sympathetic dilapidation. Numberless grants of land, however, to pious or charitable uses, have been executed at different times, of which many are still in full force, under the general title of Aima;—and these must give some interest to the subject of the present book, in which the various modes of alienation are discussed with considerable accuracy.

Book XVI. Of Sale.

Book XVII. Of Sirf Sale.

To enter fully into the subjects of these books, would occupy more time and space than is consistent with the brevity of prefatory remark. The observations we have made concerning Book XIV.
will equally apply to these throughout. The book of Sale is swelled by a vast accession of incidental matter. Of these, the most striking is Usury, the subject of Chap. VIII. The Mohammedans, in this particular, closely copy the Jewish law, by which the children of Israel were also strictly forbidden to exercise usury among each other.—To this chapter the book of Sirf Sale may in some measure be considered a supplement, since it seems chiefly calculated to guard and provide against the practice of Usury in the exchange of the precious metals.

Book XVIII. Of Bail.

Under this head are comprehended all sorts of security, whether for persons or property.—This book contains a good deal of practical matter (particularly in the laws concerning guarantees), and is therefore worthy of an attentive persual.
BOOK XIX. TRANSFER OF DEBTS.

Is in some measure supplementary to the former, as the transaction of which it treats is performed by way of giving security to a creditor.

BOOK XX. DUTIES OF THE KAZEE.

The subject of this book is of the utmost importance in all countries, as upon the conduct of the magistrates the welfare and happiness of every society must chiefly depend: and indeed the Mohammedans esteem it of so much importance, that several large works have been written, by their principal law commentators, under this title.—In Chap. I. and II. the proper conduct of a judge, and the behaviour required in him, are briefly defined.—In these, however, as well as in the succeeding chapters, the text wanders strangely from its professed subject, and goes into a variety of matter which would appear to fall more properly under other heads.

BOOK XXI. OF EVIDENCE.

BOOK XXII. OF RETRACTATION OF EVIDENCE.

These are two as useful books as any in the whole work,—and develope some of the most important principles in judicial proceedings.—The last section of Book XXI. shows, that the punishment incurred by perjury are (as has been already noticed) of a very slight nature, and calculated to operate more upon men's feelings than their fears. The reasons for this lenity are of the same description with those urged by our lawyers. Perhaps, indeed, the infamy and perpetual disqualifications to which the witness is subjected by it may operate as effectually as those penalties which the Law prescribes;—but it is certain that false testimony is regarded with less abhorrence by Mohammedans in general than among Christians.

BOOK XXIII. OF AGENCY

BOOK XXIV. OF CLAIMS

In the former of these books nothing very remarkable occurs, the laws with respect to agents being in general analogous to those which obtain in our own courts.—Book XXIV. chiefly relates to the conduct of suits at law and the rules to be observed in administering oaths, &c. It also comprehends much extraneous matter with respect to the various subjects of suits.—Chap. V. treats of a point already mentioned, namely, the establishment of parentage. In all societies where polygamy and concubinage are allowed, this subject must necessarily afford frequent ground for litigation.

BOOK XXV. OF ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

It is only necessary to remark of this book, that Acknowledgment, in the Mussulman Law, has the same effect, in the establishment or transfer of property, as a formal deed.
PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE

BOOK XXVI. OF COMPOSITIONS,

BOOK XXVII. OF MOZARIBAT.

These books contain a quantity of technical matter. Mozaribat seems to have been a device adopted in order to avoid the imputation of usury, by which the monied man was enabled to obtain a profit from his capital without the odium of receiving any interest upon it. This species of contract is in common used in Hindostan.

BOOK XXVIII. OF DEPOSITS.

BOOK XXIX. OF LOANS.

BOOK XXX. OF GIFTS.

These books chiefly consist of plain rules, applied to ordinary cases. It is to be remarked, however, that the Mussulman law, with respect to gifts, differs considerably from the Roman, in leaving to the donor an unrestricted right of resumption.

BOOK XXXI. OF HIRE.

It is a book of considerable practical utility, as it comprehends every description of valuable usufruct, from the hire of land to that of a workman or an animal.

BOOK XXXII. OF MOKATIBS.

BOOK XXXIII. OF WILA.

It is probable that many of the laws in these books have now fallen into disuse, or are confined to Arabia, Persia, and Turkey. The privileges and immunities of Willa, however, still obtain in all Mussulman countries, and are of considerable consequence, as involving many rights liable to become subjects of litigation. The privilege allowed to a slave, of covenanted for and purchasing his freedom, place the Mussulman laws of bondage in a striking, but not a disagreeable light.

NOTE.—This book has also been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XXXIV. OF COMPULSION.

It is in general agreed, by most juridical writers, that a defect of the will, arising from compulsion, is an excuse for any crime committed, and an annulment of any deed executed under it. In the Mussulman code this rule, however, does not invariably hold, as from what occurs under this head it appears, that compelled contracts or other acts are nevertheless valid in their effect; and that offences committed under the influence of fear have still a degree of criminality attached to them.
BOOK XXXV. OF INHIBITION.

The subject of this book comprehends every species of incapacity, whether natural or accidental. The second chapter exhibits one of the most striking features in the institutes of Mohammedanism.—How far legal restrictions upon adult prodigals are calculated for the advantage of the community at large, is not our business to inquire. It is, however, certain, that the imposition of wholesome limitations upon thoughtless extravagance, and every other species of folly, if more generally introduced, would operate powerfully to preserve the property and peace of families, and (perhaps) the virtue of individuals.—The inhibition upon debtors, as contained in Chap. III. is well worthy of attention.

BOOK XXXVI. OF LICENSED SLAVES.

That regulation of the Mussulman law by which a master is empowered to endow his slave with almost all the privileges and responsibilities of a freeman, preserving, at the same time, his property in him inviolate, affords a strong proof of its tenderness with respect to bondage. It in fact places the slave who obtains this advantage rather in the light of an attached dependant than of a mere servile instrument, deprived of privilege, and destitute of volition.

Note.—This book has been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XXXVII. OF USURPATIONS.
BOOK XXXVIII. OF SHAFFA.

The points of discussion which occupy these books are of some importance in every view. The regulations in the former are, for the most part, sanctified by natural justice, and those in the latter, by many considerations of conveniency and expediency. Several particulars which occur in treating of Usurpation must indeed be referred to certain customs prevalent in Arabia. The right of pre-emption enjoyed in virtue of community or contiguity of property, is perhaps peculiar to the Mussulman law. However accommodating to the interests and partialities of individuals, this privilege may nevertheless be considered as liable to some objection, on the score of affording room for endless litigation. Under certain restrictions, it is both a just and a humane institution.

VOL. IV.

BOOK XXXIX. OF PARTITION.

This book relates chiefly to the division of inheritable property. By the Mussulman law, as by the Roman, parceners in an estate may be constrained to make partition of their joint inheritance; for which purpose proper officers are appointed by public authority.—The same rule also extends to other descriptions of partnership property. The principal tendency of the disquisitions under this head is, to show what are proper objects of partition, and in what instances the magistrate is at liberty to compel the parties to accede to the separation.
of their joint possessions.—The laws of usufructuary partition, as contained in Chap. V., possess much curious originality.

Book XL. Compacts of Cultivation.

Book XLI. Compacts of Gardening.

These books are of use chiefly on account of the regulations with respect to landed property which incidentally occur in them. They exhibit the farming of lands in a very imperfect state, and at a time when money had as yet come little into current use. They, however, explain a number of principles upon this subject equally applicable to all ages.

Book XLII. Of Zabbah.

In the Mohammedan as in the Jewish Law, the eating of blood is strictly forbidden, and hence the various rules and precautions are set for under this head. It appears, from some passages, that the Arabian Prophet was desirous of inculcating not only a scrupulous regard to the purity of food, but also a humane and tender attention to the feelings of the animals destroyed for the purpose of supplying it.—This last is indeed a sentiment discoverable in many parts of his precepts.

Book XLIII. Of Sacrifice.

Sacrifice, whether as a memorial or an expiation, is one of the most ancient religious observances which occur in the history of mankind. The particular ceremony which is the subject of this book, was instituted in commemoration of Abraham’s obedience to the Divine command by the intended sacrifice of his son. This son the Arabian commentators make to be their great progenitor Ishmael, and not Isaac, whom they assert to have been promised subsequent to that event. This conclusion they draw from the manner in which the whole circumstance is worded in the thirty-seventh chapter of the Koran, though the passage is certainly very equivocal. The anniversary of this rite falling on the tenth of Zee-al-Hidjic [the month of pilgrimage], it is performed by pilgrims in the valley of Minna, and constitutes one of the prescribed ceremonies of pilgrimage.—It is, however, equally enjoined on all others possessed of the ability; and may be performed by any man at his own habitation. The rules respecting it are few and simple; and are, in fact, of little consequence in a civil light, farther than as they tend to affect property.

Book XLIV. Of Abominations.

A subject which involves a vast variety of frivolous matter, and must be considered chiefly in the light of a treatise upon propriety and decorum. In it is particularly exhibited the scrupulous attention paid to female modesty, and the avoidance of every act which may tend to violate it, even in thought.—It is remarkable, however, that this does not amount to that absolute seclusion of women supposed by some writers. In fact, this seclusion is a result of jealousy or pride, and not of any legal injunction, as appears in this and several other parts of Neither is it a custom universally prevalent in Mahomedan countries.

Book XLV. Cultivation of Waste Lands.

In most Mussulman governments, particular encouragement has been held forth to the reclaiming of barren or deserted grounds, by the powerful incentive of granting to the cultivator a property in the soil.—A considerable portion of this book is occupied with discussions upon the right to water, that element being justly regarded as a most valuable commodity in countries where, from the heat of the climate, the ground is liable, for the greatest part of the year, to excessive drought; and where, of course, the success of tillage must chiefly depend upon an artificial supply of it.

Book XLVI. Prohibited Liquors.

In prohibiting the use of wine (under which term are included all descriptions of inebriating liquors), the Prophet meant merely to restrain his followers from unbecoming behaviour, and other evil effects of intoxication. At first the precept was issued in the Koran simply against drunkenness which amounted only to a prohibition of excess in the use of strong liquors; but this not proving sufficient for the purposes of complete determent, the negative injunction was produced, by which inebriating fluids were altogether proscribed, and declared unlawful. The tendency of this book is chiefly, to exhibit the opinions of their divines concerning what kind of liquors those are which fall under the denomination of prohibited; in which we may trace the rigid scrupulosity of the more early Mussulmans upon this point. At present, however, they are not, in general, very strict observers of the Law in this particular, their modern doctors allowing that fluids various may be drank, either medicinally or for pleasure, provided it be done with moderation, and so as to avoid scandal.

Book XLIX. Offences against the Person.

In determining the measure of punishment for offences committed upon the persons of men, the lex talonis seems at first sight to have been dictated by natural reason, and to be consistent with a justice, as affording the best means of a strict and equal retribution. Accordingly, we find it among the earliest institutes of every society approaching to a state of perfect civilization. Before the time of Mohammed, the administration of public justice being little known in Arabia, personal injuries were a fruitful source of private revenge and civil war, and preserved, among the descendants of Ishmael, a sanguinary ferocity of spirit, which was considered as a virtue rather than a blemish in their character. The Prophet soon perceived it necessary to the completion of his project, to introduce a reform in this particular; and therefore, with a view at once to indulge his countrymen's propensity to revenge, and to preserve the peace of the community, shortly after his flight to Medina (as it is said), revealed at passage of the Koran allowing of retaliation, in which he has nearly copied the law of Moses. As equality is the professed ground of this institution, the Mussulman doctors, in their comments upon it seems, to have followed the literal acception of the text in all cases where the observance of this equality is possible. In practice, however, retaliation is seldom or never inflicted upon a limb or member; but a mulct is imposed in proportion to the injury, and according to the circumstances by which it is excited or attended.—In fact, however equitable this mode of requital may appear in some instances of personal injury, yet, when applied to all without limitation, it certainly involves much gross absurdity and injustice, a charge from which it does not stand acquitted by all the distinctions which the commentators have established concerning it in this book. Hence it is that the Mussulman courts, following the example of the Jews, understand the words of the Koran, in all cases short of life, in the same manner as those do the Pentateuch; that is, not as awarding an actual retaliation, according to the strict literal meaning, but an atonement in exact proportion to the injury.—Thus much with respect to wilful offences. That law by which a man is made responsible in his property for offences unintentional or merely accidental, is certainly, in some instances, rather rigorous. It was, however, well calculated, in an irregular society, and a defective state of civilization, to guard men from acting carelessly, and has a strong tendency to support and inculcate the sacredness of the person of Man.*—

Book L. Of Fines.

Although the manner in which this subject is treated involves a considerable portion of frivolous absurdity, yet we also find, in the course of its discussions, many wise and salutary regulations, both for preserving the security of the person, and the peace and good order of society. We may perceive, from the persual of it, that a man is made responsible not only for his overt acts, but likewise for any injury which may be more remotely occasioned by his carelessness, obstinacy, or wilful neglect. The degree of the fine was originally fixed at a certain amount, that for the life of a man being determined at one hundred camel, and all others at a proportionable rate, according to the injury. In later times, however, the changes in manners, and in the value of property, introduced other modes of ascertaining amercement, and fines came to be levied not only in proportion to the injury sustained, but also according to the circumstances of the case.—Chap. VI. exhibits the only species of infuest admitted by the Mussulman law in cases of uncertain homicide, consisting solely of expurgatory oaths. However well calculated this may have been for the meridian of Arabia or Irak, and for the state of society in those countries at the time these laws were first systematized into a code, it is certainly but a poor device for the detection of guilt or the ascertainment of fact in a well-regulated community.—It is remarkable that a law strictly correspondent to what is mentioned in this chapter formerly prevailed among the Saxons and other northern nations of Europe, where the responsibility for unascertained bloodshed lay with the master of the family, or with the people of the tithing in which the body was found.*

* This subject has been omitted, as it is now dealt with by the Indian Criminal Law.

BOOK LI. THE LEVYING OF FINES.

The subject of this book is purely of a local nature, relating entirely to the levying of fines upon the Arabian tribes for offences unintentionally committed by any individual of them.—These regulations serve to give us a pretty clear idea of the state of society in the native land of Islamism. However useless, and perhaps impracticable, in a more advanced state of refinement, these, as well as many regulations in the two preceding books, were well calculated to reduce a fierce people under the restraints of law and civil government.

Note.—See note to Book XLIX.

BOOK LII. OF WILLS.

With respect to the forms of wills, the same observations occur as have been already made in treating of marriage.—In fact, as writing was formerly very little in use among the Arabs, all deeds are, in the commentaries upon their laws, regarded and mentioned as merely oral. Hence wills, as discussed in this book, are solely of the nuncupative description. The most remarkable features in this book are, the restrictions imposed upon testators with respect to the disposal of their property.

BOOK LIII. OF HERMAPHRODITES.

This book, and the succeeding chapter, which, because of its being detached from any particular subject, is termed chapter the last, are a kind of supplement to the rest of the work. Hermaphrodites are probably a class of beings which exist in imagination rather than in reality. We shall therefore leave this book to speak for itself.
—The last chapter is worthy of particular notice, as (if we except bills of sale and judicial letters) it is the only part of the work in which anything is mentioned concerning forms of writing.

In concluding this short review, the translator esteems it his duty to add, that it is a very imperfect summary indeed of the work which is now presented to the public. The subjects of it would admit of a much more ample discussion.—But to enter into a comparative and analytical survey of topics so numerous and important would of itself require a large volume; and the patience of the reader is perhaps exhausted. The more particular investigation of them we shall therefore leave to his own reflections or inquiries; and hasten to conclude an essay, for the length of which no other apology can be offered, than an anxious wish to forward the chief end of this publication, by throwing some light upon a subject dry in itself, and not without its difficulties, and accommodating it to the preceptions of those whom duty or curiosity may lead to make it an object of their study.

Of the importance of a work in which the translator has borne so large a share, it may not become him to say much; but as the objects of it are of a public nature, and as it has been brought forward in some measure at the public expense, he feels himself called upon to hazard a few words in vindication of its probable utility.

With respect to the immediate end proposed by those who originally projected this translation, all that is necessary to be stated may be resolved into one summary argument. While the Mohammedan Law is allowed to be the sole standard of criminal,* and in a great measure of civil jurisprudence throughout our dominions in India (and it would perhaps be neither prudent nor possible hastily to introduce any other system), it appears indispensably necessary that those who are to protect the rights of the people, and who are responsible for the proper administration of public justice, should possess the means of consulting the principles on which the decisions of the Mussulman courts are founded. This reflection acquires still greater weight, when we consider how very large a portion of subjects under the British government in India are Mohammedans, upon whose attachment to their rulers much of the prosperity of our Asiatic empire must necessarily depend.

The advantages to be derived from a development of the institutes of Mohammed are, however, not confined to the administration of justice in our Asiatic territories. The commerce of Great Britain extends to almost every region where his religion is professed; and as this work is a commentary upon the juridical code of the Ottoman as well as of the Mogul empire, and is applicable to the customs and judicial regulations of Cairo, Aleppo, or Constantinople, as well as of Delhi or Moorsheedabad,—it can scarcely fail to open a source of desirable knowledge to the merchant and the traveller. In a political view, likewise, it is humbly presumed that this work will not be found altogether uninteresting. At the present eventful period, when we have seen new empires springing in to birth, and the old indignantly throwing off the long rivetted chains of despotism, the grandest remaining fabric of Islamism seems hastening to its fall.—In expecting this mighty ruin, we are naturally led to inquire upon what principles the fabric was founded, and to what causes we are to attribute its decay.—Some parts of the following treatise are particularly calculated to assist us in such an investigation. We may there observe that, however sagaciously it might be formed for the sudden extension of dominion, during an age when mankind were involved in the darkest gloom of superstition and ignorance, the Mussulman system, civil and religious, is but wretchedly adapted to the purposes of public security or private virtue. We may observe, with some degree of laudable exultation, its obvious inferiority, in every useful view, to that excellent system which we profess, and which is so admirably calculated to promote the temporal good of mankind, as well as their eternal happiness!

But it is time to close this address. The translator cannot, however, conclude without paying that tribute which justice and gratitude demand.—Concerning the public zeal, the penetrating and comprehensive mind of the Gentleman to whom the work is dedicated, it is unnecessary to enlarge in this place. From him the present translation derives its existence; and the merit of his design received its best confirmation in the continuance of support it experienced from his immediate superiors, as well as from his successors in office.—To the liberal attention and honourable confidence of Sir John MacPherson and his Colleagues in the Bengal government it is owing, that the translator was at all enabled to look forward to the completion of his labours. Yet this attention and confidence, flattering as they were, would not have sufficed to bear him through an arduous and expensive undertaking, had it not been aided by the generous and munificent support of the Court of Directors, whose regard to every effort which may tend to promote the interests of our Oriental dominions has been repeatedly experienced both by himself and others. Conscious of his own deficiencies, he has only to hope it may appear, that what they have liberally granted has been faithfully and diligently employed. He entertains too humble an opinion of his abilities not to be sensible that, with all his assiduity, aided by the many happy suggestions of the worthy and excellent friend who had for some time been his Colleague in the performance, it will still be found far short of perfection.—The chief business of a translator, when engaged in an undertaking of this kind, is scrupulous accuracy, and the only merit he can claim laborious application. The former of these the present translator has endeavoured to preserve, and the latter he presumes to affirm has not been wanting. Nevertheless, there is undoubtedly much room for correction and amendment. The very nature of the work rendered the translation of it a business attended with no common degree of difficulty. Treating of an abstruse science, the technical terms of which but nakedly explained, and frequently not to be met with in any of his guides, all the light the translator could obtain to a knowledge of his subject necessarily sprung out of the text; and consequently, as he advanced, he saw continual occasion for retrospective alterations, which amounted to little less than a repetition of his labour. He found himself therefore frequently at a loss; and repeatedly experienced the truth of an observation made by our immortal Lexicographer,—that "a writer may often in vain trace his memory, at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow."

In confirmation of his wish to render this publication, as much as in his power, worthy of the patronage under which it has been conducted, the translator hopes he may be indulged in the egotism of the remark.—that he has dedicated his three last years unrenitingly; to revision or re-translation.—He now dismisses it with an anxious wish that that patronage may not appear to have been bestowed, or his own efforts applied, in vain!
BOOK I.

OF ZAKAT.

Definition of the term.—ZAKAT, in its primitive sense, means purification, whence it is also used to express a contribution of a portion of property assigned to the use of the poor, as a sanctification of the remainder to the proprietor. It is by some commentators termed the indispensable alms.

CHAPTER I.

Obligation of Zakat and the conditions upon which it is incumbent.—ZAKAT is an ordinance of God, incumbent upon every person who is free, sane, adult, and a Mussulman, provided he be possessed, in full propriety, of such estate or effects as are termed in the language of the law a Nisab, and that he has been in possession of the same for the space of one complete year, which is denominated Hawlan-Hawl. The reason of this obligation is found in the word of God, who has ordained it in the Koran, saying, “BESTOW ZAKAT.” The same injunction occurs in the traditions; and it is moreover universally admitted. The reason for freedom being a requisite condition is, that this is essential to the complete possession of property. The reason why sanity of intellect and maturity of age are requisite conditions shall be hereafter demonstrated. The reason why the Mussulman faith is made a condition is, that the rendering of Zakat is an act of piety, and such cannot proceed from an infidel. The reason for the possession of a Nisab being a condition is that the Prophet has determined the obligation of Zakat upon that amount. The reasons for Hawlan-Hawl being made a requisite condition are twofold: FIRST, because some space of time is necessary to increase* of property, and the law determines this at one year, because the Prophet has declared, ‘ZAKAT is not due upon property until the same shall have been possessed one year by the proprietor;’—SECONDLY, the proprietor of a Nisab is able, within such a period, to obtain an increase from it, since in a year there are four seasons, in each of which it most commonly happens that such property bears a different price; wherefore the rule is determined accordingly. It is to be observed, that some maintain Zakat to be due immediately upon the completion of Hawlan Hawl, and others that it is so through, life.†

Zakat is not due from infants nor from maniacs.—ZAKAT is not incumbent upon infants or maniacs—Shafei declares Zakat to be an obligation connected with property and therefore that it is incumbent upon those, as well as upon other proprietors, in the same manner as subsistence to a wife, and Tythe and Tribute; but to this our doctors reply that Zakat is an act of piety, and, as such, is fulfilled only by being paid with the option of those who are subject to it; and infants and maniacs are not held in law to be possessed of option, this being necessarily connected with reason, which they are not endowed with; but this does not apply to Tribute, as that is a provision arising from

*By increase is here understood that obtained by breeding, where the Nisab consists of cattle, or by profit, where it consists of merchandise.

†That is to say, annually, upon the same property, so long as it remains with the proprietor.
the soul, for the expenses of the state; nor to Tythe, as that is also in some shape of the same nature.

With certain exceptions. If a lunatic have lucid intervals within the year, it is the same as if they happened within the month of Ramzan; that is to say, if he recover his reason within the year, he is subject to Zakat, in the same manner as if he were to recover it within the month of Ramzan, in which case he would have to make up for the days of Lent he had omitted in consequence of his insanity. Aboo Yoosaf has observed, that regard is to be paid to the length or continuance of the lucid intervals; that is to say, if they continue the greater part of the year, the lunatic is subject to Zakat; but if he be insane for the greater part, it is not incumbent upon him. It is to be observed, that original and supervenient insanity are here considered as the same: by original is understood that which appears in a person in infancy, and continues upon him as he grows up to puberty; and by supervenient, that which occurs after a person has attained the years of maturity. It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf that if a person attain maturity in a state of insanity, and then becomes sane, the year is considered to commence from the instant of his recovery, the same as a boy attaining puberty, with whom it is regarded as commencing on the day of his majority.

Not from Mokatib (Zakat is not incumbent upon a Mokatib, he not being completely and immediately possessed of property, since he is still a slave; whence it is that he is not at liberty to emancipate any of his own slaves.

Nor from insolvent debtors.—Zakat is not incumbent upon a man against whom there are debts equal to, or exceeding, the amount of his whole property. Imam Shafee alleges that it is incumbent, because the cause of the obligation, viz. possession of an increasing Nisab, is established. To this our doctors reply that such a Nisab is not possessed by him clear of incumbrance, and is therefore held to be non-existent, the same as water, which, when provided for the sole purpose of drink, Is held to be non-existent with respect to performance of the Tammeeen, and cloth provided for the purpose of apparel, which is held non-existent with respect to the obigation of Zakat. But if his property exceeds his debts, Zakat is due upon the excess, provided the same amount to what is sufficient to constitute a Nisab, and that it be free from incumbrance. By the debts here mentioned are understood those due to individuals; such, therefore, as are due in consequence of vows or on account of expiations, do not forbid the obligation to pay Zakat: pay Zakat in the continuance of the Nisab, as that would be thereby rendered defective: and, in like manner, a debt of Zakat forbids Zakat after the dissolution of the Nisab.

The case of the continuance of a Nisab is, where the proprietor keeps it for two years without rendering any Zakat upon it, in which case no Zakat is due from him on account of the second year; because a Zakat, in the proportion of one for forty, is already due on account of the preceding year, whence the full amount necessary to constitute a Nisab does not remain in the second year: and the case of dissolution of the Nisab is, where the proprietor keeps the same for the full space of one year without paying Zakat, and then disposes of the Nisab, and afterwards becomes possessed of another Nisab, and this also continues in his possession for the complete space of one year; in which case, not Zakat is due upon this second Nisab because a proportion of one for forty is already occupied by the Zakat due on the former Nisab which has been disposed of. Ziffer controverts the rule in both these cases: and it is also said that Aboo Yoosaf controverts it with respect to the second case. The reason why a debt of Zakat thus forbids any further obligation to pay Zakat, is, that the claimant of a debt of Zakat is, in fact an individual, as the claimant thereof, in pastures, is the Imam, and, in articles of merchandize, the deputy of the Imam; and the proprietor of the property, in all other articles, is the Imam’s substitue.

Nor upon the necessaries of life.—Zakat is not due upon dwelling-houses, or articles of clothing or household furniture, or cattle kept for immediate use, or slaves employed as actual servants, or armour, or weapons designed for present use; all these falling under the description of necessaries; neither are such considered as increasing property; and the same of books of science, with respect to scholars, and likewise of tools, with respect to handcrafts; these being to them as necessaries.

Nor upon uncertain property.—If a man have a claim upon another for a debt, and the other dispute the same and some years thus pass away, and the claimant be destitute of proof, and the debtor afterwards make a de-

As in the caravans, where water is provided and carried upon camels for drink, but not for the purpose of purification, which in that or similar situations is permitted to be performed with sand.

*In opposition to God; for, if Zakat were claimed purely as a right of God, the payment of it would be absolutely and unconditionally incumbent.

Because the Imam is always supposed to collect the Zakat upon pastures in person, and that upon merchandise by his deputies, i.e. by collectors placed at particular stations for that purpose.

As the payment of Zakat, upon all other articles, is committed to the proprietor himself.

of declaration is Zakat, obligation man is in being these when thing is traffic acquired. or pyce. in property or only doctors declared, or pur-

posed declaration or acknowledgment publicly, insomuch that there are witnesses of the same there is no obligation upon the claimant to render any Zakat for so many years as have thus passed. This uncertain sort of property is termed, in the language of the law, Zimar: and trove property, and fugitive slaves, and usurped property, respecting which there is no proof, and property sunk in the sea, or buried in the desert and its place forgotten, and property tyrannically seized by the Sultan are all of the description of Zimar; and all these articles are equally exempted from Sadka-fittir. † Ziffer and Shafei maintain, that all these articles are subject both to Zakat, and also to Sadka-fittir, as the cause of the obligation to pay Zakat (to wit possession of a Nisab) is established in each of them, although it was not in the immediate seisin of the proprietor whilst it fell under the description of Zimar, which does not forbid the obligation of Zakat; like the property of a traveller, which if it remain in his house, is nevertheless subject to Zakat, although it be not at the time in his hands. The arguments of our doctors herein are twofold:

First, Alee declared that no Zakat is due upon Zimar property: Secondly, the cause of the obligation to pay Zakat is the possession of property in a state of increase, which cannot be the case but where the proprietor has an immediate power of management over it; but this does not apply to a traveller who has property at home, as he may manage it his agents.

Property buried in the home of the proprietor is not Zimar, because it is easily recovered; but with respect to property buried in any other ground than that on which the house actually stands (such as the garden, for instance) there is a difference among our modern doctors.

It is due upon unquestionable property.—Property which is acknowledged by a debtor to be owing to his creditor is subject to Zakat, whether such debtor be rich or poor, because the recovery of it is possible: or if the debtor dispute the demand, yet here also the property in question is subject to Zakat, provided there be proof sufficient to substantiate the creditor's claim, or that the Kazeel himself be satisfied of the justice of it; because here also recovery is possible.

And if the acknowledging debtor be poor,—that is to say, if the Kazeel declare him insolvent,—yet here also the property in question is subject to Zakat, according to Haneefa, holding that a Kazeel's declaration of the insolvency of a debtor is not approved: but Imam Mohammed maintains that the property in this case is not subject to Zakat, holding a Kazeel's declaration of a debtor's insolvency to be approved.

Aboo Yoosef agrees with Mohammed respecting the validity of a Kazeel's decree of insolvency; but he, at the same time coincides with Haneefa, that the property of which the debt consists is not, in this case, subject to Zakat.

Intention of traffic in property subjects it to Zakat.—If a person purchase a female slave for the purpose of traffic, and afterwards retain her for his own use, declaring his intention, no Zakat is due upon her, because the intention is here connected with the act namely, the relinquishment of traffic in her; and an intention thus declared, when connected with an act, is to be credited:— and if he should afterwards declare a design of trafficking in her; yet no Zakat will be due upon her in virtue of such declaration, until he actually dispose of her by sale, because here the intention is not connected with the act, and consequently she is not held to be a subject of traffic from his declaration, unless he actually sell her, when Zakat is due upon her price.

If a person purchase a thing with an intention of traffic, it is to be considered as an article of traffic, on account of the connection of an intention of traffic with the act, to wit, purchase: contrary to a case where a person obtains possession of property by inheritance, and intends to traffic in the same, such not being considered an article of traffic merely from the intention, since that, in this case, bears no relation to the act.

If a man become possessed of property by gift, or bequest, or marriage or Khoola, or composition for blood, and intend trafficking in the same, it becomes (as is, in virtue of his intention, considered as) an article of merchandise,—according to Aboo Yoosef, he holding the intention here to be connected with the act.

It is related as an opinion of Imam Mohammed, that this property does not become as merchandise, because the intention is not here connected with the act of traffic, which is understood only by purchase and sale; some, however, have related this difference of opinion the reverse of what is here mentioned.

Intention of Zakat, in the payment, necessary to its validity.—The payment of Zakat is not lawful, except under an intention existing at the period of such payment, or at the period of setting apart the proportion of Zakat from the Nisab property, because the rendering of Zakat is an act of piety, to which the intention is essential; and a radical principle of the intention is that it be connected with the payment: but yet, inasmuch as the giving of Zakat to the poor is necessarily an act of frequent repetition and occurrence, it suffices that the intention exist at the period of setting apart the proportion of Zakat (as aforesaid), for the sake of convenience.

* Upon the property which is the subject of the claim.
† For an explanation of Sadka-fittir, see Chap. VIII.

• That is, to the means by which such property was acquired.
Excepting under certain circumstances;—

If a man bestow his whole property in charity, without intention of Zakat, the obligation of Zakat, with respect to him, drops, upon a principle of benevolence, because such obligation extends to a certain part of his property only; and where the whole is thus bestowed, that part is necessarily included; whence it is that there is no necessity for him specifying the same by intention.

If a man give to the poor a portion of his Nisab property, without intention of Zakat, his obligation to Zakat drops with respect to such portion (according to Mohammed), because the part of his property due (on account of Zakat) affects the whole of his Nisab equally;—wherefore, when a part of the Nisab is thus bestowed the proportion due upon such part goes along with it. Abū Yoosaf maintains that the obligation to the Zakat of that portion does not drop, because no part thereof is particularly specified as Zakat, the remainder of the Nisab being the subject from which the obligation is to be discharged: contrary to where the whole Nisab has been bestowed, since there the proportion due on account of Zakat goes, a certiori, as being involved in the whole.

CHAPTER II.

OF ZAKAT FROM SAWAYEEM; THAT IS, HERDS AND FLOCKS.

Definition of Sawayeem.—Sawayeem is the plural of Sayeema; and Sayeema is, by the learned, understood to imply camels, oxen, goats and other animals which subsist for the greater part of the year upon pasture: wherefore, if they live but half the year in pastures, and are fed for the other half upon forage, they do not fall under the description of Sawayeem.* And this chapter is divided into several heads.

One goat due upon five camels, &c.—No Zakat is due upon fewer than five camels; and upon five camels the Zakat is one goat, provided they subsist upon pasture throughout the year; because Zakat is due only upon such camels as live on pasture, and not upon those which are fed in the house with forage.

One goat is due upon any number of camels from five to nine; and two goats are the Zakat on any number from ten to fourteen; and three upon any number from fourteen to nineteen and four upon any number from twenty to twenty-four; and upon any number of camels from twenty-five to thirty-five the Zakat is a Binnit-Makhass, that is a yearling camel's colt; and upon any number from thirty-six to forty-five, a Binnit-liboon, or camel's colt of two years; and upon any number from forty-six to sixty, a Hikka, or four-year old female camel; and upon any number from sixty-one to seventy-five, a Fazeeyat, or five-year old female camel; and for any number from seventy-six to ninety, the Zakat is two camel's colts of two years; and on any number from ninety-one to one hundred and twenty, two Hikkas. These proportions of Zakat upon camels are what were written by the Prophet in his letters and instructions to his public officers and Aumeels. And when the number of camels exceeds one hundred and twenty, the Zakat is calculated by the aforesaid rule; that is to say, where the whole number is odd, and the upper number of the two is five (for instance), the Zakat is one goat for the odd five, and two Hikkas for the one hundred and twenty; and if the excess number be ten, two goats; and if it be fifteen, three goats; and if it be twenty, four goats; and if it be twenty-five, a yearling camel's colt; and if the whole number of camels be one hundred and fifty, the Zakat is three Hikkas; and if the number exceed one hundred and fifty by five, it is then one goat and three Hikkas, that is to say, three Hikka upon the hundred and fifty, and a goat upon the odd five; and upon one hundred and sixty, the Zakat is three Hikkas; and in this manner is the Zakat to be calculated upon every fifty camels exceeding one hundred and fifty,—This arrangement is according to our doctors. Shafei alleges that when the number exceeds the hundred and twenty by one only, the Zakat is three two-year old colts; and if it amount to one hundred and thirty, it is one Hikka and two two-year old colts; after which the Zakat is calculated at a two-year old colt upon every forty camels, and a Hikka upon every fifty: the Prophet, upon a particular occasion, having written to one of his Aumeels to this effect, without making any mention of a goat upon the odd five, and so forth. But our doctors, in support of their opinion, as above, cite the letters of the Prophet to Omar, where he says, upon every five camels the Zakat is one goat.†

Female camels only lawful in the payment of Zakat.—And it is to be observed that, in the payment of the Zakat of camels, females alone are lawful, because males are held to be lawful only in regard to their
I. MISIBLE, Kine

Sect. II. Of the Zakat of Horned Cattle

One yearling due upon thirty kine, &c.—No Zakat is due upon fewer than thirty kine; and upon thirty kine, which feed on pasture for the greater part of the year, there is due at the end of the year a Zakat of one Tubbee, that is, a follower, or yearling calf, male or female; and upon forty there is due one Misna, or calf of two years, male or female, on the authority of the Prophet; and where the number exceeds forty, the Zakat (according to HANEEFA) is to be calculated proportionably to this rule, so far as sixty; that is to say, if there be one animal more than the forty, there is an additional Zakat of the fortieth part of a Misna; and if two, of the twentieth part of a Misna; and so on to the number sixty.—What is here advanced accords with the Mabsoot; and the ground upon which it proceeds is that, in the sacred writings, the Zakat is particularly specified for any number between thirty and forty, and also for those of sixty and above, but none for the numbers between forty and sixty, Hasan states the doctrine of Haneefa to be in this case, that, on the numbers from forty to forty-nine, no excess Zakat whatever is due; and that upon fifty kine the Zakat is one Misna, and the fourth of a Misna, or the third of a Tubbee; because upon every Akid, or drove of even number, in a Nisab of cattle, such as thirty, forty, or fifty head Zakat is due, but not upon any intermediate number.—The two disciples say that no Zakat whatever is due upon any odd number between forty and fifty; and there is also one tradition of the opinion of Haneefa to this effect; and the reason they allege is, that the Prophet said to Muzza, "Take not anything from an Owkas of kine," and he explained an Owkas to mean any number between forty and fifty. And upon sixty kine, the Zakat is two yearling calves, male or female: and upon seventy, one Misna and one Tubbee and upon eighty, two Misnas: and upon ninety, three Tubbees: and upon one hundred, two Tubbees and one Misna: and thus on every ten head, a Misna and a Tubbee alternately, the Prophet having ordained that the Zakat upon thirty kine should be a Tubbee; and that upon forty a Misna: thus, upon one hundred and ten kine, the Zakat is two Misnas and one Tubbee; and upon one hundred and twenty, four Tubbees.

The usual method, however, of calculating the Zakat upon large herds of cattle, is by dividing them into thirties or forties, imposing upon every thirty one Tubbee; or upon every forty one Misna.

BUFFALOES ARE INCLUDED WITH OTHER HORNY CATTLE.—It is to be observed that buffaloes are included with kine in the laws of Zakat, these being also considered as a species of black cattle; but yet, in our country, the buffalo is not regarded as of the black cattle species; whence it is that if a person were to make a vow, saying, "I will not eat the flesh of black cattle," and were afterwards to eat buffalo beef, he would not be forsworn.

Sect. III. Of the Zakat of Goats

One goat due upon forty goats, &c.—No Zakat is due upon fewer than forty goats; and upon forty goats, which feed for the greater part of the year upon pastures, there is due, at the expiration of the year, a Zakat of one goat; and this Zakat suffices for any number from forty to one hundred and twenty; and if the number exceed one hundred and twenty, a Zakat of two goats is due from one hundred and twenty-one to two hundred; and if it exceed two hundred, a Zakat of three goats is due from two hundred and one to three hundred and ninety-nine; and if it amount to four hundred, the Zakat is four goats: and beyond four hundred the Zakat is one goat for every hundred: the Prophet having thus ordained, and all the doctors uniting in this opinion. It is also to be observed, that the same rules of Zakat are applicable to sheep as to goats, the term Ghannem, in the tradition equally implying both species.

KIDS OF LAMBS ARE NOT ACCEPTABLE PAYMENT UNLESS THEY BE ABOVE A YEAR OLD.—In the Zakat of goats or sheep, Sinnees are acceptable payment, but not Juzzas. This is the Zahir-Rawayet. Sinnees are kids which have entered on the second year; and Juzzas are such as have not yet completed their first year.—The two disciples have said that the Zakat may be paid with the Juzzas of sheep; and there is one opinion of Haneefa recorded to this effect; and the reasons are twofold; First, the Prophet has said, "The Zakat upon them consists of Juzzas and Sinnees; Secondly, sacrifice is fulfilled by the immolation of a jussa, and therefore Zakat may be also discharged by it." The ground upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds is also twofold; First, a saying of Alee, "In Zakat nothing is acceptable short of a Sinnee;"—Secondly, in the Zakat of goats it is incumbent to give those of a middling-size, and the juzzas of sheep are not of that standard, being small; whence it is that the Juzzas of goats also are not acceptable in Zakat. With respect to the first reason urged by the two disciples, it may be replied, that by the term Jussa, as mentioned in the tradition, is to be understood the Juzzas of camels, that is, yearling colts

*That is to say, the price of a male is held to be lawful in Zakat, but not the animal and what they say of sacrifice is no rule, as that of a Juzza is approved (not by analogy, but) from the express words of the sacred text.

But males and females are equally acceptable.—In paying the Zakat of goats or sheep, males and females are equally acceptable; the term Shat, in the traditions applying indiscriminately to both genders.

Sect. IV.—Of the Zakat of Horses.

One Deenar per head due upon horses, or five Deenars per cent upon the total value.—Warren horses and mares are kept indiscriminately together, feeding for the greater part of the year on pasture; it is at the option of the proprietor either to give a Zakat of one Deenar per head for the whole, or to appreciate the whole, and give five Deenars per cent upon the total value: and this last is the mode adopted by Ziffer. The two disciples maintain that no Zakat whatever is due upon horses, the Prophet having ordained that Muslims should not be subject to Zakat for their horses or slaves. Hareefah in support of his doctrine, as above, states an ordinance issued by the Prophet, in which he directed that the Zakat upon ordinary horses should be one Deenar, or ten Dirms, per head. And with respect to the ordinance above quoted by the two disciples, that applies solely to war-horses, and not to ordinary cattle.

Zakat not due upon droves consisting entirely either of males or of females.—No Zakat whatever is due upon a Nisab of horses consisting entirely of males, because in that there can be no increase by breeding; and, in like manner, there is no Zakat upon a Nisab consisting entirely of mares, for the same reason.—This is one tradition from Hareefah. There is another tradition from him, however, which says that a Zakat is due upon mares although there be no horses among them, as horses can be occasionally borrowed by the proprietor for the purpose of producing, whence increase may be had: but this is impossible with respect to droves consisting entirely of horses.

No Zakat due upon asses or mules, unless as articles of commerce.—There is no Zakat due upon asses or mules, the Prophet having said, “With respect to Zakat upon asses and mules, I have received no revelation.” But yet, if these animals be as articles of merchandise, a Zakat is due upon them, because, in the present times, Zakat is imposed upon the property involved in them the same as upon any other articles of traffic.

No Zakat due upon the young of herds or flocks until a year old.—No Zakat whatever is due (according to Hareefah) upon the young of goats, kine, or camels, which are under one year; that is to say, if a man were to purchase twenty-five camels’ colts (for instance) or forty kids, or thirty calves, and one complete year should pass from the period of possession, still no Zakat is due; nor does any become due until the expiration of the term of a year after they shall have been grown up.

One camel’s colt due on 25, &c.—Abu Yoosaf holds that Zakat is not due upon fewer than forty kids, or thirty calves or twenty-five camels’ colts; and upon twenty-five camels’ colts there is no Zakat, nor is there any further Zakat due till the number amounts to seventy-six, when the Zakat is two colts; because upon seventy-six Missans a Zakat is due of two Binnit-liboons; and there is no further Zakat till the number amounts to one hundred and forty-five when it is three colts; because upon one hundred and forty-five Missans the Zakat is two Hikkas and one Binnit-makhass. There are other traditions of the opinion of Abu Yoosaf herein; but the above, as being a posterior record, supersedes them.

Case of the payment of Zakat by substitution.—If a person owe, as Zakat, a Misna, and it should happen that he is not possessed of one, having no cattle in his flocks but what are either under or over that description, the officer who collects the Zakat is at liberty either, in the former case to take an animal of the under rate, and the difference in money,—or, in the latter, to take one of a superior sort, paying the difference of value between that and a Misna to the proprietor. It is to be observed that, in the latter case, no constraint is to be put upon the collector, who is at liberty to insist upon either the actual thing due (to wit, a Misna), or the value of one in money, because the acceptance of an animal of the superior sort, on the terms above stated, wears the aspect of traffic; his acceptance of it, therefore, cannot be compelled, insomuch that if the proprietor were to give him no obstruction in taking it, yet he is not considered as being seized of it; but the collector may be compelled to accept of an animal of an inferior sort, and the difference in money, insomuch that if the proprietor merely give no obstruction to the officer, in thus taking the animal and the difference, he (the officer) is considered as being seized of the same; because here the transaction does not bear the aspect of purchase and sale, as the proprietor pays the inferior animal in part of the Misna, and consequently the difference along with it.

Substitution of the value lawful.—If a proprietor, in Zakat, should, in lieu of the actual thing due, pay the value in money, it is approved, according to our doctors; and the same holds good in expiation, or in the payment of Sadka-fittir, or Tythe, or the fulfilment of a vow. Shafei maintains that this is unlawful, because it is not lawful to exchange, for a substitute, anything specified in the sacred writings; as in sacrifice (for instance) where a substitution of value for the victim is illegal. The argument of our doctors is, that God has himself ordained Zakat, and has directed the same to be distributed... in alms to the poor, which plainly indicates that the intent of the institution is merely that the poor should derive a subsistence from it, so as that their wants may be thereby relieved; and to effect this the value will answer equally well with the specific animal, wherefore the substitution of the value in payment of Zakat is legal, the same as in payment of Jazzeyat, or capitation-tax: but this reasoning does not apply to sacrifice as that is an act of piety, to the fulfilment of which the shedding of the blood of the victim is essential, wherefore no conclusion can be drawn from this instance, as there is no analogy between the two cases.

Labouring cattle exempt from Zakat.—Camels and oxen kept for the purpose of labour, such as carrying burdens, drawing the plough and so forth, are not subject to Zakat; neither is any Zakat due upon them where they are fed one half of the year or more upon forage. Malik controverts this doctrine; but the arguments of our doctors herein are threefold; First, the Prophet has expressly ordained that these two species of cattle should be exempted from Zakat under such circumstances; Secondly, the cause of the obligation of Zakat consists in the possession of increasing property and the increase of cattle can be conceived only under two circumstances, that is, their being either kept in pastures, or for the purpose of traffic, neither of which is the case with the cattle now under consideration; Thirdly, in case where the cattle are fed upon forage, the keeping of them is attended with great expense, a circumstance which more than counterbalances any advantage to be derived from their breeding in such a situation, and therefore virtually prevents increase, although it may not actually do so.

Must be paid in animals of a medium value.—The officer, in collecting Zakat, is not at liberty either to insist upon the best or to accept of the worst sort of the property collected upon, but must take what is of a medium standard, because the Prophet has so ordained it; and also, because, in confining the Zakat to property of a medium value, regard is had at once to the interest of both the parties concerned, to wit, the poor and the proprietor.

Law respecting property acquired in the interim between the payments.—Whoever is possessed of a Nisab property, and obtains an addition of the same sort of species within the year, must add it to the Nisab, and pay Zakat upon the whole. Shafei objects to this, maintaining that the supervenient acquisition should not be added to the first Nisab, because the property of which that consists is original and independent with respect to propriety, and is therefore so with respect to Zakat likewise: contrary to acquisition by breed or profit obtained within the year, that being a dependant only of the original property, and, as such, not to be confounded with it. To this our doctors reply, that the reason for supervenient acquisition, by breed or profit, being added to the Nisab is homogeneity in the subject of it; since, where the original and supervenient property are of the same species, it is not easy to discriminate precisely between them, and consequently difficult to ascertain the Hawlan-Hawl with respect to any species of profitable acquisition arising from original property; and as the Hawlan-Hawl is regarded only for the sake of convenience, it therefore appears that homogeneity in the subject is a sufficient reason for the supervenient acquisition being added to the original property; and this reason exists in the present case.

Rules respecting the Afoo.—The two Sheikhs hold Zakat to be due upon the Nisab only, and not upon the Afoo; but Mohammed and Ziffer maintain it to be due upon both the Nisab and the Afoo, that is, upon the whole: the result of which difference in opinion is that, if the Afoo were to perish, and the Nisab to remain, then, according to the two Sheikhs, the whole Zakat that had been before obligatory still remains due; but, according to Mohammed and Ziffer, an adequate proportion of Zakat drops; and, in support of this latter opinion, Mohammed and Ziffer argue that Zakat is due as an acknowledgment for the blessings of Providence, and the Afoo is, a blessing the same as the Nisab; that is to say, they are both equally blessings, wherefore Zakat is equally due upon both. The argument upon which the Sheikhs support their opinion is twofold: First, the Prophet has expressly said, "The Zakat upon five camels is one goat, and Zakat is due upon any further number till it amount to ten;" and in this manner the Prophet has ordained that Zakat upon every Nisab, and forbidden it upon the Afoo; Secondly, the Afoo is a dependant of the Nisab, whence, if a part of the whole Nisab and Afoo were to perish, the loss would be first calculated upon the Afoo, as being the dependant part; as in a contract of Mozaribat, where any accidental loss is first calculated upon the profit, and not upon the capital: and on this ground it is that Hancefa accounts the loss upon the Afoo to the extent thereof, and beyond that upon the Nisab property of the first (or highest) denomination, and beyond that upon the Nisab of the next lower denomination, and so on to the last (or lowest) denomination of Nisab; because the Nisab of the highest denomination is the principal, to which all the inferior Nisabs are dependants; and according to Aboo Yoosaf, the loss is calculated first upon the Afoo, and beyond that upon all the degrees or descriptions of Nisab collectively.

Case of Zakat being levied by the Rebels, or Schismatics.—If the rebels or schismatics overtake any particular tribe of Mussulmans, and take from them the Zakat of their cattle, when these rebels are driven away, the rightful Imam must not impose another Zakat upon that tribe, because it appears from the above circumstances that the Imam has not protected them, and the right of imposing Zakat appertains to the Imam, in virtue of the protection he affords; the learned however have decreed, upon this case, that the tribe in question should repeat their Zakat, and pay it a second time, but not their Tribute, because the latter is declared, in the sacred writings, to be applicable to the use of the warriors who fight their enemies; and hence rebels may not be considered as objects of its application, they also answering this description; whereas the only object of the application of Zakat is the poor, and rebels do not bestow what they may levy upon the tribe, under that denomination, to the use of the poor; wherefore it is necessary that the tribe should again pay Zakat, so as that it may be applied to its proper object; but not their Tribute. Some of our doctors say, that if the aforesaid tribe, at the period of paying Zakat to the rebels, intend in so doing to give them alms, in this case Zakat drops with respect to that tribe, and there is no necessity for them afterwards repeating it: and the giving of Zakat to any tyrant or plunderer whatever is capable of this construction, because persons of this description, whatever wealth they may be apparently possessed of are yet actually poor, on account of the retribution, which lies against them hereafter: but the former doctrine (that the tribe should repeat their Zakat) is preferable to this, because here the Zakat is rendered and applied, a certiori

How far the Toglib tribe are subject to Zakat.—The Zakat of cattle is not incumbent upon an infant of the tribe of Toglib; †and whatever is incumbent upon the men of that race is so upon the women also, because peace was made with them upon those terms, "that they should pay, of all public imposts, double what as paid by Mussulmans;" now the Mussulman women are subject to Zakat, and it follows that the women of the Toglib race, are so in a double proportion; but on Zakat whatever is required of infant Mussulmans, wherefore the infants of the aforesaid tribe are not subject to it.

An accidental destruction of the property induces an exemption from Zakat.—If the property be destroyed, without being consumed by the proprietor after Zakat has become due (that is to say, after the completion of Hawlan-Hawlı), the Zakat upon it drops. Shafei has said that if the property be destroyed after the proprietor has been enabled to pay the Zakat upon it, either by the claimant making his demand of Zakat, or by the proprietor indemnifying the, although such claimant should not have demanded it, in this case the proprietor is responsible for the Zakat, because it was due from him, and he did not pay it, although it was in his power to have done so; moreover, if he should not pay the Zakat upon the requisition of the claimant, this circumstance stands as a destruction of it on his part. The argument of our doctors is, that the Zakat due is a portion or part of the Nisab; and, as its destruction is involved in that of the Nisab, it drops of course, the same as where a slave of Janayat [offence against the person], in which case it is incumbent upon the proprietor to make over that slave to the Walee-Janayat, or person entitled to the composition; but, if the slave should die or be lost in the interim, the proprietor is no longer responsible for the transfer of him, and that consequently drops; and, with respect to the second argument of Shafei, it may be replied, that no person can be considered as the claimant of Zakat except a pauper whom the proprietor may have specified as the object of its application, and the case does not suppose the requisition to be made by such an one. But if the collector demand the Zakat, and the proprietor neglect payment, and the Nisab afterwards perish, there are various opinions among the Hanefite doctors, some alleging that the proprietor of the destroyed Nisab, in that case, still remains responsible for the Zakat due upon it whilst others maintain that, in this instance also, he is not responsible, because the Nisab does not here appear to have been destroyed by him.

A partial destruction includes a proportionable exemption.—If, after Hawlan-Hawlı, a portion of a Nisab (such as a third for instance) should be destroyed, the claim of Zakat is proportionably destroyed, in the same manner as where the whole Nisab is destroyed; in which case the whole Zakat drops.

Zakat may be paid in advance.—If the proprietor of a Nisab should pay the Zakat upon it, before Hawlan-Hawlı, it is lawful, because he has here paid it during the existence of the creative principle of obligation to Zakat, which is understood in his possession of a Nisab; this payment, therefore, is approved, the same as a discharge of a debt, under the existence of its cause; as where a Mohrm, for instance, pays expiation for wounding game whilst animal is yet alive. This doctrine is controverted by Malik.

If the proprietor of a single Nisab should, before Hawlan-Hawl, make payment of Zakat upon the same for a certain number of years in advance, or should pay a Zakat upon a certain number of additional Nisabs, it is approved, because the first Nisab is the original with respect to the cause of the obligation of Zakat, and anything beyond that is as a dependant.

CHAPTER III.

OF ZAKAT FROM PERSONAL EFFECTS.

Sect 1.—Of the Zakat of Silver.

No Zakat due on less than 200 dirms.—No Zakat is due on less than two hundred Dirms, because the Prophet has ordained that there shall be no Zakat upon fewer than five Awkiyat, and an Awkiyat is valued at forty Dirms.

And upon 200 at the rate of two and an half percent.—The Zakat Nisab of silver is two hundred Dirms; and if a man becomes possessed of two hundred Dirms, and the Hawlan-Hawl completed, the Zakat upon it is five Dirms, because the Prophet wrote to Mazz, saying, "Ifon two hundred Dirms take a Zakat of five Dirms; and upon twenty Miskals of gold, half a Miskal."

And at the same rate upon every forty above two hundred.—No Zakat is due upon any excess above the two hundred Dirms, till such excess amount to forty, upon which the Zakat is one Dirm; and upon every succeeding forty the same Zakat is due, but not on fewer than forty. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that a proportionate Zakat is due on whatever excess may occur over and above two hundred Dirms; and Shafeei coincides in this opinion, because in the traditions of Alee it is related that the Prophet has so ordained it; and also, because Zakat is rendered as a return of gratitude for the blessings of Providence; and the reason why it is expressed as a condition, in the beginning of this book, that the property, in order to cause an obligation of Zakat, amount to a Nisab, is that the proprietor may thence appear to be in easy circumstances; but where, from his being possessed of a Nisab, this appears to be already the case, it is not requisite that any excess amount to a Nisab; and hence Zakat is due upon such excess proportionally, whatever its amounts may be.

Objection.—This would lead to a conclusion that, in the Zakat of cattle, the same is due upon any excess under a Nisab; whereas the rule is otherwise, no Zakat whatever being due upon such excess, since that is considered as Afoo, or exempt.

Reply.—Such is the conclusion from analogy; but the excess in cattle is made Afoo, because, if a proportionate Zakat were to be levied upon it, this would necessarily induce a copartnership in the subject, by the proprietor admitting the claimant of Zakat to a share in it;—for instance, the Zakat upon twenty-five camels is one yearling colt; now, if Zakat were due upon excess camels, and the drove consist of twenty-six there would be a Zakat upon this one excess camel of the twenty-fifth part of a yearling colt, which is not payable in any way than by admitting the claimant to a partnership in such colt; and this partnership, being compulsive, is illegal; but plate or cash not being liable to the same objection, a Zakat is due, proportionally, upon any excess whatever over two hundred Dirms.

Rules respecting the calculation of a Nisab of silver.—It is to be observed, that the Nisab of silver of two hundred Dirms is calculated by the Wazn-sebbayat, or septimal weight (which is in the proportion of ten Dirms to seven Miskals), as this was the weight used in the tribunal of Omar, and that of the Dirm is thence established.

Those Dirms in which silver predominates are to be accounted as silver; and the laws respecting silver apply to them, although they should contain some alloy; and the same rule holds with all articles whatever falling under the denomination of plate such as cups, goblets, and so forth; but Dirms, in which the alloy predominates, are not to be accounted as silver, but only as trading property, estimable by its real value, to which alone regard is to be had; and accordingly, if the value of them amount to a Nisab they are subject to Zakat, provided there be an intention of trafficking in them; as is the condition with respect to all other chattles. In all plate, therefore, in which the alloy prevails, respect is to be had to the intention of trafficking in it, excepting where the silver contained in it amounts to a Nisab, in which case the intention of trade is not a condition, nor is any regard paid to the estimated value, because in actual silver no respect is had to either of these. The above case is thus stated; because money always contains a small portion of alloy, as pure silver is unfit for coinage, since, without being hardened by an addition of some baser...
metal, it cannot retain the mint impression; but the alloy is generally in the smaller proportion; regard therefore is had to excess; that is to say, if the proportion of silver be the greater it is accounted as silver but not if the alloy be in greater proportion (that is, in a proportion above a moiety of the whole weight).

Sect. II. Of the Zakat of Gold.

No Zakat due upon less than 20 Miskals; and upon 20 at the rate of two and an half per cent—There is no Zakat on fewer than twenty Miskals of gold, this sum being the smallest that constitutes a Nisab in that metal; and the Zakat upon twenty Miskals of gold is one half Miskal, when the Hawlan-Hawl therein becomes established, on the authority of the tradition before quoted—by the Miskal* here mentioned, is to be understood that which weighs in the proportion of seven Miskals to ten Dirms; and the Miskal consists of twenty Kerat,† and the Kerat of five grains

And at the same rate, upon every four above twenty.—When the quantity of gold exceeds twenty Miskals, on every four miskals of such excess a Zakat of two Kerats is due, because the Zakat due is fourth of the whole, and two Kerats are the fourth of four Miskals and upon any excess short of four Miskals no Zakat is due, according to Hanéefa. The two disciples hold that on every excess there is a proportionable Zakat, the same as mentioned in the preceding section; and the foundation of their difference in opinion is also the same here as was there recited, to wit, Hanéefa holds that broken numbers are free of impost, whereas the two disciples maintain the contrary opinion. The ground upon which Hanéefa proceeds, in the rule here cited, is this: the legal value of a Deenar is ten Dirms, and a Deenar and Miskal are of the same weight. The value of four Miskals in gold is therefore forty Dirms; and consequently no Zakat is due upon fewer than four Miskals, since these stand as the same as forty Dirms: and it has been already shown that nothing short of forty Dirms is subject to Zakat, on account of the tradition of Amroon Bin Khurram, as before recited.

General rule—Zakat is due upon gold and silver bullion, which is termed Tebbur; and in like manner upon ornaments or utensils of gold or silver, whether the use thereof be allowable (such as rings, and so forth) or otherwise.†—Shafet maintains there is no Zakat upon the gold or silver ornaments of women, nor upon rings worn by men, the use of which is allowable, and which are therefore the same in this respect as clothing or articles of apparel. The argument of our doctors is, that the cause of the obligation to Zakat still continues in the present case:—moreover, articles of gold and silver do, in their own nature, afford an argument of increase in the subject, since these metals are brought into use principally for the purpose of facilitating exchanges by traffic, which affords an argument of increase; and it is the virtual and not the actual increase in any subject that creates the obligation to Zakat upon it; contrary to the case of articles of apparel, which afford no argument or probability of increase.

Sect. III. Of the Zakat of personal Chattel Property

Zakat due upon all merchandise—Zakat is due upon articles of merchandise, of whatever description, where the value amounts to a Nisab either of gold or silver, because the Prophet ordained that articles of merchandise should be appraised, and that a Zakat be paid on the same, in the proportion of five Dirms upon every two hundred,‡ as the proprietor has prepared and keeps them with a view to increase, so that they resemble gold and silver, which the law holds to be kept for the same purpose; and, as Zakat is due upon the latter, it is in the like manner due upon the former: but the intention of trade in these articles is made a condition, in order that it may be ascertained that they are kept with a view to increase.

Mode of ascertaining the Nisab of merchandise.—Mohammed says that, in estimating the value of articles of merchandise with a view to the imposition of Zakat upon them, they should be resolved into such Nisab as may be most advantageous to the poor: thus if, in valuing an article by Dirms, it would amount to a Nisab of silver, and in valuing the same by Deenars, it would not amount to a Nisab of gold, it must be estimated by Dirms; and, vice versa, if its value should appear to amount to a Nisab of gold, it is to be estimated by Deenars—The com-

* In the original, personal chattels are expressed by the terms Rakht and Mata, of which it is not easy to give any literal translation; they express, in general, all articles which appertain to personal estate or effects [Mal]: articles of gold and silver, it is true, do also fall under this general description of Rakht and Mata; but they are introduced under a different head, as the laws of Zakat, with respect to them, are of a peculiar nature, and such as do not affect or apply to other articles of personal property.

†To wit, at the rare of two and an half per cent.
piller of the Hedayat observes that there is one opinion recorded from Haneefa to the same effect. Mohammed again, in the Mab-soot, has said that the proprietor of the article has it in his option to estimate it at whatever species of Nisab he pleases, because gold and silver are standards, and in estimating the value of effects are both equally proper.—It is recorded as an opinion of Ahoo Yoosaf, than an article should be estimated by that which it was purchased: then, if it has been purchased with Dirms, it is to be appraised in Dirms; and if with Direrars it is to be appraised in Deenars: and if it should have been purchased with any other than either of these, it is to be estimated in money of the most general currency.—It is on the other hand recorded, as an opinion of Mohammed, that whatever the purchase may have been made with, the estimate is to be in current money, as above; in the same manner as that of property forcibly seized, which is thus estimated in all cases.

Property not exempted by an intervening defect in it.—If a Nisab be complete in the beginning of the year, and also at the end, Zakat does not drop on account of its having been defective at any time within that period;
because it is difficult to ascertain its completeness through the intermediate space;
moved, in the commencement of the year its completeness is requisite, in order to the establishment of the cause of obligation, and so also the close of the year, in order to Zakat becoming due; but it is not so within the interval.

Other chattel property may be united with money or bullion to form a Nisab.—The value of personal effects, or other articles, may be united with gold or silver; that is to say, if (for instance) the proprietor should have effects estimated at the value of one hundred Dirms, and also one hundred Dirms
in money, the value of the effects, as above, must be added to the one hundred Dirms, so as that the whole may make one Nisab; and Zakat is due thereon, because the obligation to Zakat, in such property, is occasioned by the circumstance of its being kept with a view to traffic, although the same in which it is so kept be different with respect to each of the two descriptions of it, traffic in chas-etels being established by the act of the individual, but that in money by the construction of the law.

And also silver with gold.—Gold and silver come in the same manner be united, both being in effect of one nature, as standards of estimation, and the possession of each equally causing the obligation to Zakat.

Gold and silver may be united, according to Haneefa, in respect to their value: but, according to the two disciples, in respect to their parts: and the consequence of this difference of opinion is, that if a man were possessed (for instance) of one hundred Dirms in silver, and five Miskals of gold (the value of which would amount to one hundred Dirms), this person would be subject to Zakat according to Haneefa, but not so according to the disciples; for these latter say that, in ascertaining the Zakat of gold and silver, regard is to be had to the quantity only, and not to the value; whence it is that Zakat is not due upon a vessel of silver, where the weight is short of two hundred Dirms, although the value should be to that amount, or beyond it: Aboo Haneefa, on the other hand, contends that gold and silver are united with each other on account of their homogeneity, which is established between them in respect to their value, but not in respect to their substance.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE LAWS RESPECTING THOSE WHO COME BEFORE THE COLLECTOR.

Declarations respecting property, when made upon oath, to be credited.—If a person come with his property before the collector and say, “It is so many months since this property has come into my possession, and a year has not yet elapsed”; or, “I am indebted so and so” and make oath of the same, the collector is to credit him, and must not exact anything, because this person stands as a defendant denying his obligation to Zakat: and the declaration of a defendant, when supported by his oath, must be credited. So also, if a person were to declare that he had already paid the Zakat upon such property to a former collector, his declaration must be credited, because the collector,
in taking Zakat, acts merely as a Trustee, and the Zakat comes to and remains with him as a deposit; and the declaration of the above person amounts only to his having deposited the trust in its proper place, and this is to be credited, provided there should have been another collector there within the year;
but if, on the contrary, there should have been no other collector on that station within the current year, the affirmation and oath are not to be credited, since, in this case, the falsehood is manifest. And, in like manner, if the proprietor were to declare that he had already paid the Zakat upon such property in his own city, by having there bestowed the same upon the poor, his declaration must be credited, because a proprietor, whilst in his own city, is entrusted with the payment and distribution of the Zakat upon his property, and he continues to be so until he comes forth and brings his property before the collector, when the authority for levying

Zakat rests with the latter, as the property and the proprietor do both then come within his jurisdiction."—In short, in all these four instances, the declaration of the proprietor is to be credited. And in the same manner the declaration of a proprietor, respecting Zakat upon cattle, is to be credited in the three first instances, but it is not so in the fourth, although he should confirm his attestat ion by an oath. Shafei maintains that it is to be credited here also, as the proprietor appears, by the tenor of his declaration, to have rendered the right duly to the claimant.—In opposition to this, our doctors argue that the right of exacting the Zakat upon cattle appertains solely to the Sultan, and the proprietor is not at liberty to preclude the Sultan's right; contrary to the case of property of other nature, such as is termed, in the language of the law, Batena [internal, or domestic], the rendering of the Zakat upon which is committed to the proprietor.—It is to be observed that some have said, respecting cattle, that the Zakat which was paid by the proprietor himself in the first instance is the true obligatory Zakat, and that whatever may be afterwards exacted of him under that denomination, is consequently an oppression; whilst others maintain that this latter is to be considered as the obligatory Zakat, and the former to be held as an act Niff, or gratuitous; and this last doctrine is approved.—Now a question here arises, as the assertion of the proprietor is to be credited, whether he ought to produce his writing of discharge [voucher] or not?—Mohammed, in the Jama Sagheer, has not required this as a necessary condition; but in the Mabsoot he has made it a condition; and this latter opinion (according to a tradition of Hoosn) is that of Aboo Haneefa. The principle of this doctrine is, that as the proprietor pleads a discharge, and as he possesses a voucher of such discharge, he ought consequently to produce it; whilst the principle of the doctrine maintained in the Zahir-Rawayet is that as one writing resembles another writing, they are not admitted as proofs.

In whatever instance the declaration of a Mussulman, with respect to Zakat, is to be credited, that of a Zimmeet must be so likewise, because a Zimmeet is subject to double the impost of a Mussulman; and hence all the conditions which are to be regarded, with respect to the property of the latter, must be equally so with respect to that of the former.

But not those of Aliens.—If an alien appear before the collector of the Sultan with articles of merchandise, it behoves that officer to exact from him what is usually exacted of aliens, without paying any regard to his declarations in those points in which the declarations of a Mussulman or Zimmeet are to be credited, although he should swear to the same, excepting where he declares, concerning his female slaves, that those slaves are his Am-Walids; for, in all other species of property, his affirmation is not worthy of attention, because the impost which is thus levied upon him is not in fact Zakat, but rather a contribution exacted as a return for the protection he receives, and which is requisite for the safeguard of whatever he may possess; it is therefore proper to take from him the impost usually levied upon aliens, except where he declares, as above, with respect to his female slaves, that they are his Am-Walids, which declaration must be attended to and credited; because, if an alien were to declare, concerning any other persons who accompany him, that "they are his children," his declaration is approved; and so, in like manner, with respect to his female slaves, as the rights of the Am-Walid are derived from the establishment of the child's descent, and consequently the female slaves do not appear to be transferable property; and nothing but transferable property is an object of taxation.

From a Mussulman is taken the fourth of the tithe of his property; and from a Zimmeet the half of the tithe; and from an alien the tithe; Omar having instructed his collectors to this effect.

Zakat to be levied on the property of aliens, to the value of fifty Dirms, or upwards.—If an alien should come before the collector with property to the amount only of fifty Dirms, nothing whatsoever is to be exacted of him, except where aliens exact contribution upon an equally small property of Mussulmans; in which case a similar impost must be laid upon this amount, the property of an alien, because what is taken from aliens is merely in the way of reciprocity; contrary to the case of Mussulmans or Zimmees, as what is levied upon them is in fact Zakat, either single or twofold, whence it is indispensable that the property with them amount to a Nisab.—This is the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer. In the Mabsoot, under the title Zakat, it is written that if the property of an alien should be small (that is, short of a Nisab), nothing whatever is to be exacted of him, let the custom of aliens, in this respect, be what it may, because a proportion of property not amounting to Nisab is invariably to be considered as Afoo, or exempt; and also, because a trifle of this sort is not supposed to stand in need of the State's protection, as travellers must necessarily carry with them small sums for the purpose of expenses, and robbers do not pay any attention to such trifles, not considering them objects of their pursuit.

Proportion to be levied upon the property of aliens.—If an alien come before the collector with two hundred dirms, and be uncertain what tax foreigners levy upon a similar property of Mussulmans, in this case the tithe is to be taken; and if it be known that foreign states exact only a twentieth or a fortieth, a similar proportion is to be taken; but if it be known that they take the whole, yet the Mussulman collector must not act accordingly, because this is an act of rapine. And if it be known that they take nothing of the Mussulmans, it is then proper that nothing be taken from them, in order that the Mussulman merchants, travelling into foreign countries, may feel the benefit of impost; and also, because where foreign states observe kindness towards Mussulmans, and exact nothing of them, it is requisite that nothing be exacted of them in return, as it behoves the Mussulmans to preserve a character of benevolence towards all men.

Must not be exacted repeatedly.—If an alien come before the collector, and the latter exact the tithe of him, and he should again pass near the station of the collector, yet nothing more is to be exacted till the completion of the Hawlan-Hawl, because, if the tithes were to be repeatedly levied within the year, the property would be annihilated, and the impost is laid for the purpose of protecting the property; moreover, the protection which is first granted continues until the beginning of a new year, when the Aman, or protection, commences de novo, because it is not permitted to an alien to remain in a Mussulman territory beyond the space of a year. But the tax may be again demanded of him at the expiration of the second year, as this does not tend to annihilate his property. What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that the alien has not returned into his own country within the period of the year, after this payment of the tithe, as aforesaid; but if he should return thither, it is to be again exacted of him upon his re-entering the Mussulman territory, even though he were to go there on the very day of payment, and to come again into the Mussulman territory on the same day, because every time he thus returns into the Mussulman territory, he returns under the virtue of a new protection; moreover, the repetition of exaction upon his return cannot be considered as tending to annihilate his property, since on every return he is supposed to acquire a profit.

Zakat-tithe to be levied on wine.—If a Zimmee, or infidel subject, pass the station of a collector with wine and pork, the collector is to levy a tithe upon the former article, but not upon the latter. By levying a tithe upon the wine, is to be understood (not upon the actual article, but) upon the estimated value of the article. The distinction here made between wine and pork, is taken from the Zahir-Rawavet. Shafei says, that nothing whatever should be levied on either pork or wine, neither being legally subjects of estimation. Ziffer, on the other hand, argues that it should be levied equally upon both, as both do actually constitute property among Zimmees. Aboo Yoosaf also says that the tax should be levied upon both, provided that they be found together upon the Zimmee; but possibly he is here to be understood as making the pork an appendage to the wine, whence it is that he adds "If the Zimmee were to come before the collector with either wine or pork, singly, the tenth would be levied on the former but not upon the latter."—The reasons upon which the Zahir-Rawavet proceeds, in this case, are twofold; First, the estimated value of a thing which falls under the description of Zakat-Kaem stands as the identical fraction of that class; whereas the value of an article belonging to the class of Zakat-Imfel does not stand in place of the identical articles, and wine is of this description; Secondly, the right of exacting the tenth is vested in the collector in consequence of the protection afforded by the state; and a Mussulman has a right to take measures for the preservation of his wine, for the purpose of making vinegar of the same, whence it is also lawful for him to protect the wine of a Zimmee; whereas he is not permitted to take any of his pork, inasmuch that if a Zimmee, being possessed of pork, were to be converted to the faith, it would be incumbent on him to destroy it or throw it away; and a Mussulman not being allowed to take care of his own pork, it follows that he is not competent to the protection of the pork of others; and hence the state not being considered as affording protection to the pork of a Zimmee, no tax can be levied upon it.

In a boy or a woman of the Toghole tribe pass the station of a collector, with property, nothing is to be taken from the former, but he must exact from the latter the usual proportion of persons of that tribe, according to what is said concerning the Zakat of cattle.

If a person come to the collector with one hundred Dirms, declaring that he has another hundred at home, and that the Hawlan-Hawl has elapsed, yet the collector is not at liberty to take Zakat either upon those hundred or upon the other; because the one does not come under his protection, and the other is short of a Nisab.

No Zakat to be levied on Bazat or Mozaribat property.—If a person come to the collector with two hundred Dirms, which are with him as a Bazat, the collector must not impose any Zakat upon it, because this person is not empowered by the actual proprietor to pay Zakat; and so also, if that property were in his hands in the way of Mozaribat. This is the doctrine of the two discipies; and Haneefa has also subscribed to it; and the reason upon which it is founded is that the Mozarib is neither the actual proprietor nor the representative of the proprietor, with respect to the payment of Zakat: wherefore Zakat is not to be required, except where the Mozarib, by the nature of the contract, derives such a proportion of profit from the capital stock entrusted to him as amounts to a Nisab; in which case a proportionable Zakat must be levied, as he is the actual proprietor of such proportion.

Mazon slaves subject to it.—If a Mazon slave, not indebted to any person, come before the collector with two hundred Dirms, the Zakat must be levied. —Aboo Yoosaf says, that it is not known whether Haneeefa ever retracted this opinion, and delivered another (that the collector should not levy Zakat upon a Mazon) or not; but from his subscribing to the opinion of the two disciples in the preceding case (to wit, that no Zakat is to be levied upon a Mozarib), it may be presumed that he has also agreed that none is to be levied upon a Mazon, as he is not the proprietor, but his master, the former having created the power of transaction, with respect to the property in question, so that he stands in the same predicament with a Mozarib. —Some have said, that between a Mazon and a Mozarib there is this difference, that the former transacts with the property on his own account, and hence is subject to its obligations; for, as he cannot have recourse to his master, but may be sold, in order to the fulfilment of such of its obligations as he is legally liable to, it follows that he does stand in need of protection for it upon his own account: contrary to a Mozarib, for he manages the Mozaribat stock in the manner of an agent, and hence whatever may attach to him in the obligations thereof he takes again from the proprietor, wherefore the owner of the property is the person who requires protection for it: and there thus appearing an essential difference between a Mazon and a Mozarib, no inference can be drawn of Haneeafa's opinion respecting the former from what he has conceded concerning the latter.

Unless accompanied by their owner.—It is to be observed that if the master of the Mazon accompany him, the collector must take the Zakat (not from the Mazon, but) from the master, he being the actual proprietor; the Zakat, therefore, is to be taken from him, except where it appears that the slave is indebted to such an amount as comprehends the property in question; in which case no Zakat whatever can be required of the master, since (according to, Haneeafa) the master, in this circumstance has, in fact, no actual property in the Mazon's hands:—

and (according to the two disciples) the right of another is connected with the property, namely, the debt— and consequently no Zakat is payable on it, though holding the debt upon a property forbids the exacting of Zakat.

If a merchant, being in a country where the Schismaticks prevail, go to a collector of the Schismaticks, and there pay the Zakat upon his property, and afterwards come before a collector of the Orthodox, the latter may again exact Zakat of him, because in going before a collector of the Schismaticks, and there paying Zakat, he was in fault.

CHAPTER V.

OF MINES AND BURIED TREASURES.

Distinctions.—There are three legal terms which particularly belong to these subjects, and which are employed for the use of distinction; Madin, Kanz, and Rikaz: by Madin is understood the place in which the ore or metal is naturally produced; by Kanz, treasure, or other property, buried in the ground; and Rikaz applies equally to either, to Madin literally, and to Kanz metaphorically.

Mines subject to a Zakat of one-fifth. —If there be discovered, in Kheraee or Ashooree lands (that is, lands subject to tithe or tribute), a mine of gold, silver, iron, lead, or copper, it is subject to a Zakat of one-fifth, according to our doctors; and this Zakat is termed Khams,—Shafee has asserted that nothing whatever is due upon a mine, because it is free to the first finder indifferently, and is therefore the same as game; but yet if, the metal be produced from the mine, it is subject to Zakat independent of Hawlan-Hawl, that having been constituted as a condition of Zakat merely to afford time for increase, whereas here the identical subject itself (the metal) is increase of property; wherefore the lapse of Hawlan-Hawl is not in this instance required. The arguments of our doctors, on this subject, are twofold:—

First, the ordinance of the Prophet, who directed that upon Rikaz there should be imposed a fifth; and the term Rikaz applies to mines, as was already demonstrated:—

Secondly, the mine, as being discovered in tithe or tribute lands, must at one period have been property of the infidels, and afterwards have fallen into possession of the Musulmans by conquest, wherefore the whole falls under the description of Ghanaemat, or plunder; and one-fifth is due upon plunder:—contrary to the case of game, the property in which cannot be traced to any antecedent proprietor.

Objection.—If the mine be thus resolved into plunder, it should follow that, as such the products of it is the common property of all the warriors.

Reply.—The property of the warriors is

*This is a common practice in all parts of Asia. Treasures are hidden in the ground on the commencement of a war, or other troubles; and it frequently happens that, the depositors perishing, the treasure remains concealed, perhaps, for many years, till it be discovered by accident, and at a time when no legal claimant can be found.

†Literally, a fifth. It is elsewhere translated double tithe.
established in the mine constructively, in virtue of the establishment of their property in the surface of the territory: but the discoverer of the mine is the actual acquirer of it; whereas the property of the warriors is established in one-fifth, their right being only constructive; and that of the discover is established in the remaining four-fifths, as his right is actual; whence it is that those four-fifths are reserved to him.

Case of a mine within a house. If a person discover a mine within the precincts of his own habitation, nothing is due upon it, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold that a fifth is due upon that also, in conformity to the traditional ordinance already quoted, because that applies equally to the present case. Haneefa argues upon this, that a mine is a constituent part of the land in which it lies, as being supposed to have been originally created with it, and nothing being due upon the ground generally, it follows that nothing is due upon a particular portion of it (such as the mine, for instance) because a part does not differ from the whole; contrary to the case of a Kanz, which is no constituent part of the soil, as not having been originally created with it, but deposited there by some person.

Or in lands which are private property — If the said mine be discovered, not actually in the house of the finder, but in lands, subject either to the tribute or tithe, which are his own especial and exclusive property, in this case there are two opinions recorded of Haneefa's doctrine: one, that no Zakat whatever is due, any more than if the mine had been discovered within the house of the finder; another, that a fifth is due upon it: the former of these opinions is mentioned in the Mahsot, and the latter in the Uama Sagheer; and the principle upon which the latter opinion proceeds is, that between a house and lands there is a manifest distinction, because the ground on which a house stands is not supposed to have any way productive of the fruits of the earth; whereas it is that no tax of any kind is levied upon it, so much that, if a date-tree were by accident to grow within a dwelling, and to produce fruit, yet nothing is due upon the fruit), whereas lands, on the contrary, being productive, are not thus exempted from tax and tribute, and consequently a fifth is due upon all mines which are found in them.

And of buried treasures — If a person find a Kanz, or deposit, of buried treasure, a fifth is due upon it, according to the opinions of all the doctors, in conformity to the traditional ordinance already quoted, the expression there used [Rika'] applying to Kanz. It is to be observed, however, that if the treasure in question be coin, bearing the impression of Mussulman money (such as the words of the Creed*), the Kanz stands as a Lookta, or trove-property, the law concerning which are explained elsewhere:—yet, if it bear the impression of infidel coinage (such as the image of a saint or idol), a fifth is due upon it in all cases,—that is to say, whether a person may have found the same in his own grounds, or in those of another, or in common lands which are not the property of any person; and the fifth is thus due upon the authority of the traditional ordinance to which we have just referred.—It is here proper to remark, that if the treasure be found in common land, four-fifths of it appertain to the finder, as having recovered it, because the other warriors had no information concerning it, and of course no share in the discovery; and consequently he has an exclusive right to it:—and the same rule obtains if it be found in appropriated land, whether such be his own property, or belonging to another (according to Aboo Yousaf), because the claim is established in virtue of salvage, or recovery, and the treasure has been recovered by the finder.

Mohammed and Haneefa maintain, on the contrary, that the treasure is the property of him upon whom the Imam had bestowed the lands, originally, at the period of subjugation, who is termed the Mokhuttut-lehoo, or first grantee, upon the principle that whoever has the first exclusive property in a soil is the true proprietor of whatsoever may be contained in it, although he should not have obtained visible possession thereof, —the same as where a person catches a fish with a pearl in its jaw, in which case he becomes the proprietor of the pearl, although he has not actually laid his hands upon it, nor knows of its being in the fish's belly.* And it is further to be observed, that if the first grantee should have sold his lands, yet he does not forfeit his right to any Kanz, or buried treasure, which may be afterwards discovered there, as that does not form a part of the soil, like mines, which as being a constituent portion of it, upon a transfer by sale become the property of the purchaser, that is to say, him beyond whom no antecedent proprietor can be discovered.—And if the treasure should consist of coin, the impression of which is so far effaced as to render it doubtful whether it be infidel or Mussulman property.

*This is a case of some curiosity, and affords an instance (among a multitude of others) of points of law deduced in elucidation of passages to which they do not appear to have an immediate reference.—From the above it appears, that if a man were to catch a fish with a jewel in its belly, and were to sell the fish (not knowing what it contained), he would have a right to recover the jewel of the purchaser.
money, in this case according to the Zahir-Rawayet) it is to be considered as of the former class: some however, have observed that, in modern times, it is held as Mussulman coinage.

Of mines or buried treasure found in a foreign country.—In a Mussulman go under protection into a foreign country, and there find a Rikaz within the house of an infidel, whether it be a Madin or a Kanz, let him deliver the same up to the proprietor, in order that treachery and breach of faith may not be induced; because whatsoever is in that country belongs right to the people of it: but if he were to find the Rikaz in the open country or desert, it belongs to him, no person having any exclusive right in it so as to make his appropriation of it an act of treachery and here the fifth would not be due; as treasure, thus found, does not bear the construction of plunder, the person who finds it standing as a thief, and not as a warrior.

Precious stones not subject to impost.—No fifth is due upon turquoise, such as are found in mountainous places; because a turquoise is a stone; and the Prophet has said, "Upon stones there shall be no Khams."

Quicksilver subject to impost of a fifth, but not pearls or amber.—Upon quicksilver there is due a fifth, according to Haneefa, in his last opinion recorded upon this subject: contrary to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, who proceeds to the effect that Haneefa and Mohammed considered the same to be a seventh, according to Haneefa and Mohammed: Aboo Yoosaf maintains that upon those, as well as upon all gems procured from the sea, there is a fifth; because Omar used to levy a fifth upon amber. Haneefa and Mohammed argue, that the depth of the sea do not come under the description of parts subject to conquest; and hence anything procured hence cannot be defined plunder although it should consist of gold or silver; and the case of Omar levying a fifth upon amber existed only where that article was cast up by the sea upon the shores; and here also they coincide that the fifth may be levied.

If a person find, in common ground, a deposit of chattel property, such as vessels or cloths, the same is the property of the finder; and there is a fifth due upon it, because this comes under the description of plunder, the same as gold or silver.

CHAPTER VI.

OF ZAKAT UPON THE FRUITS OF THE EARTH.

A tithe due upon the product of lands watered by natural means.—Upon everything produced from the ground there is due a tenth, or tithe, which is termed Ashar; whether the soil be watered by the annual overflow of great rivers (such as the Oxus and Shyfoon), or by periodical rains; excepting the articles of wood, bamboo, and grass which are not subject to tithe.—This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that tithe is not due except upon such things as are permanently productive,* which are subject thereto, provided the product amount to five Wusks, or sixty Saa's; and they further hold that herbs are not subject to tithe. From this it appears that the difference of opinion between Haneefa and Ashar is that the latter exists with respect to two points in particular—First, the specification of the quantity as a condition; Secondly, that of permanency in the subject. The argument of the two disciples, with respect to the former of these, is twofold;—First, the Prophet has ordained that there should be no Zakat upon less than five Wusks: Secondly, tithe being as alms, to render it obligatory it is requisite that some Nisab be ascertained and established, so as to confine the contribution to the rich.—The argument of Haneefa is that the Prophet ordained that an Ashar should be levied upon everything produced from the ground, which ordinance is general in its application, and without any specification of quantity; and, with respect to the ordinance quoted by the two disciples, it is to be taken as applying solely to articles of commerce: that is to say that "there is a Zakat upon those articles, as merchandise, where the quantity amounts to five Wusks;" because, in the time of the Prophet, fruits were sold by the Wusk, and the value of a Wusk was estimated at forty Dirms, so that the value of five Wusks was two hundred Dirms, the amount of a Nisab estimated property; and, with respect to their second argument, the obligation to tithe upon the fruits of the earth is connected with what it yields only, without respect to the proprietor (whence it is that a tithe is due upon the product of Wokf-lands), how, therefore, should any regard be had to the description of the proprietor, as being rich? And hence also it is that Hawlan-Hawil is not requisite in the present case, that, having been established for the purpose of ascertaining increase; and the fruit of the earth does itself come under this description—The argument of the two disciples, with respect to the second point is that, the Prophet has ordained that, "upon vegetables (that is, herbs) no alms are due;" and by alms is here to be understood tithes; as Zakat is not forbidden here, since it is due provided the property amount to a Nisab. In reply to these observations, the arguments of Haneefa are twofold;—First, the tradition before quoted; and, with respect to the ordinance adduced by the two disciples, it is to be observed, that by the term Sadka [alms] there mentioned, is to be understood such alms as are taken by the collector, but not that contribution which falls under the denomination of Ashar; and in this Haneefa also agrees, that the collector is not to take

tithe from those articles;—Secondly, articles of product are often cultivated which are not of a permanent nature, such as melons and cucumbers; and these are the increase of the earth: and the cause of obligation to the payment of Zakat upon land is increase; whence it is that the land is subject to tributary tithe. The title is also due: but, with respect to the articles of wood, bamboo, and grass, the ground is not tilled or prepared for the cultivation of them; nay it is usual to clear them away; yet, if a person were to till the ground with a view to the culture of such articles, his land would be subject to tithe.

And an half tithe upon the product of lands watered by artificial means. Land watered by means of buckets, or machinery, or watering camels, are subject to half tithe,—according to Haneefa and the two disciples:—the latter, however, coincide in this, under the restriction, conditional, that the product be of a permanent nature, and that the quantity of product amount to five Wusks; whereas Haneefa does not specify any such condition. The reason why such lands are made subject to half tithe only, is that the expense of tillage greatly exceeds that of land watered by rains, or by the periodical overflow of great rivers.

Rule respecting lands which partake of both descriptions. With respect to lands watered a part of the year by rivers and a part by labour, in regulating their proportion of impost, regard is to be had to the greater portion of the year; that is to say, if the land be such as is watered by rivers for the greater part of the year, the impost is a tithe; but, if it be watered for the greater part of the year by labour, it is only half tithe, or a twentieth.

Aboo Yoosaf has said that, upon every article the amount of which is not estimated by Wusks (such as saffron and cotton), tithe is due, provided its value be equal to that of five Wusks of an article of the lowest value so estimable (such as millet in the present times); because articles, the quantity of which the law does not hold to be estimable by Wusks, can have their Nisab ascertained only by estimation of the value; as is the case with articles of merchandise. Mohammed, on the other hand, alleges that tithe is due upon those articles, provided their quantity amount to the number five of the highest standard of ascertainment of quantity with respect to each; for instance, cotton is weighed by Mans and Hamils, each Hamil containing three Mans; a Nisab of cotton therefore consists of five Hamils; saffron, on the other hand, is weighed by Dirms, Astars, Rutils, and Mans; and the latter being the greatest of these, a Nisab of saffron, consequently, consists of five Mans weight. The reason upon which Mohammed proceeds herein is that the Wusk is constituted the standard of estimation of Nisab in grain & c. only on account of its being the largest standard by which their quantities can be ascertained; and the same principle operates with respect to all other articles.

A tithe due upon honey:—Tithe is due upon honey where it is collected in tithe-lands. Shafei maintains that nothing is due upon honey, because that is a natural production, the same as silk, which being tithe-free, honey is so likewise. The arguments of our doctors are twofold: First, the Prophet ordained that honey should be subject to tithe; Secondly, bees collect their honey from blossoms and fruits, which articles being subject to tithe, it follows that honey, which is extracted from those, must be so likewise; contrary to the case of silk worms, because those feed upon leaves of trees, which are not subject to tithe. Haneefa holds tithe to be due upon honey, whether the quantity be great or small; he not regarding Nisab as essential in this article. Aboo Yoosaf has reported it as an opinion of Haneefa, that the Nisab of honey is to be ascertained by estimate, according to his general tenet upon the subject of Zakat; and he further says, that nothing is due upon honey, unless the quantity amount to ten Kirhs (a Kirh being fifty Mans), because this was the rule by which the tribe of Sywar paid tithe on their honey to the Prophet. Again, it is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that a Nisab of honey consists of five Mans. According to Mohammed the Nisab in honey is five Sirks (a Sirk containing thirty-six Rutils), because the Sirk is the largest standard of quantity in honey, as the Wusk is in grain. And the same of sugar-cane; that is to say, according to Mohammed, tithe is due upon sugar-cane, where the quantity of sugar produced from it amounts to five Sirks.

And upon wild honey and fruits:—Honey and fruits, collected in the wilderness, are subjects of tithe. This is the doctrine of the Zahir-Rawayet. It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that nothing whatever is due upon such articles, because the occasion of obligation to Zakat is the land being of a productive nature, which is not the case in this instance. The principle upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds herein is, that all that is required to constitute land being productive, is the circumstance of its affording produce of any sort; and produce does appear in the articles above mentioned.

And upon all the product of tithe lands, indiscriminately:—Tithe is due upon all the produce of tithe-lands indiscriminately; nor is any deduction to be made on account of the expense of men or cattle employed in tilling those lands, because the Prophet has ordained that dues should be different in proportion to the different lands, and also that lands watered by rain shall be subject to tithe and those watered by labour to half-tithe; wherefore the deduction of expense is needless.
And double tithe upon those lands when held by Toglibee.——Upon tithe lands, possessed by persons of the Toglibee tribe, a twofold Ashar, or fifth, must be levied; and in this all the doctors agree. It is recorded, however, as an opinion of Mohammed, that upon tithe-lands which may have been purchased by a Toglibee of a Mussulman, a single tithe only should be levied; he holding that the imposition upon lands does not suffer any alteration in consequence of a transition of the property.

_Cases of transition of property in land subject to double tithe._——If a Zimmee, or infidel subject, purchase land of a Toglibee, from which double tithe had used to be collected, the Zimmee must also pay double tithe upon it. In this all our doctors coincide, because it is lawful to require twice as much of a Zimmee as of a Mussulman, whenever it is that such an one was to be considered as the collector with his hands, twice as much would be exacted of him as of a Mussulman. And the same rule obtains (that is to say, the same proportion of tithe continues to be imposed upon those lands) where a Mussulman purchases them of a Toglibee; or where a Toglibee, being the proprietor, becomes a Mussulman. Haneefah holds this opinion in all cases, whether the land had originally belonged to a Toglibee, or the Toglibee had purchased them of a Mussulman,—for in either case the rule of double impost continues, with respect to them, where they are purchased by a Mussulman,—because he holds double impost upon those lands to have been already irreversibly established and, consequently that this incumbrance on the lands devolves to the Mussulman purchaser along with the property, in the same manner as obtains in the case of a sale of tribute-lands. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that, in the case here recited, a single tithe only is to be collected from the Mussulman proprietor; nor will the lands, whilst in his possession, be subject to any further impost; because the only principle upon which double tithe had been exacted of the Toglibee was the infidelity of the proprietor; and thus, upon the devolving of the property to a Mussulman, is done away, Aboo Yoosaf, in the Kadlooree, has further said that (according to the Rawayet-Saheeh) the opinion of Mohammed is the same as that here recited. Our author, however, remarks that it is most certain that Mohammed coincides entirely with Haneefah in his general principle, that the impost upon the land continues as before; but he [Mohammed] carries this still further; for, as where a Mussulman proprietor buys lands subject to double impost, of a Toglibee, the same continues upon him, so if a Toglibee were to purchase lands of a Mussulman, subject only to single impost, he will not have to pay any more than the said single impost, since a change in the property makes no alteration with respect to those rules to which the lands are subject.

_Case of a Mussulman._——If a Mussulman sell his lands to a Christian, or to a Zimmee and not a Toglibee, and the Christian aforesaid have seizin of those lands, Haneefah holds that tribute is to be collected from the same, the payment of tribute being a consequence of infidelity. According to Aboo Yoosaf, the double tithe collected therefrom is to be expended upon the objects of the expenditure of tribute, which is a mode of adjustment easier than that of thus exchanging tithe for tribute. Mohammed holds that the lands remain subject to tithe as before; and he moreover maintains that the tithe, collected from these lands, is to be applied to the purposes of Zakat. It is to be observed that, if the Mussulman were to take those lands of a Christian in right of Shaffa, or if the property in them were to revert to the seller, being a Mussulman, on account of the sale having been invalid, in either case the lands remain subject to tithe, as before; in the first instance, because the Mussulman, as Shafee, must effect his purpose (of obtaining the lands in right of Shaffa) by means of a contract of sale with the proprietor, wherefore the transaction here, in fact, amounts to his purchasing the lands; and, in the second instance, because, by the property in the land reverting to the Mussulman proprietor, on account of an invalidity in the sale, the case remains the same as if no transfer by sale had ever been made; moreover the Mussulman's right is in no respect affected by such invalidity, since it is proper that that transaction be altogether disregarded; whence the case remains the same as if no sale had ever taken place; and for all these reasons the land will continue subject to tithe as before.

_Case of a Majoo._——A Majoo does not owe either tithe or tribute for his habitation, because Omar exempted dwellings from all impost. But, if the Majoo were to convert the ground of his habitation into a garden,

BOOK I.—CHAP. VII.] ZAKAT.

CHAPTER VII.

The Disbursement of Zakat, and of the Persons to whose Use it is to be Applied.

The objects of the disbursement of Zakat are of different descriptions: First, Fakeers; Secondly, Miskeens; Thirdly, the collector of Zakat, provided he be not Hashimee; Fourthly, Mokatibs, (upon whom Zakat is bestowed, in order to enable them, by fulfilling their contract of Kitabat, to procure their freedom); Fifthly, debtors not possessed of property amounting to a Nisab; Sixthly, Fee Sabeel Oola [in the service of God]; Seventhly, Ibnus Sabeel, or travellers; and Eighthly, Mowkutfal-kaloob.

And those eight descriptions are the original objects of the expenditure of Zakat, being particularly specified as such in the Koran; and there are, therefore, no other proper or legal objects of its distribution. With respect to land, however (Mowkutfal-kaloob), the law has ceased to operate, since the time of the Prophet, because he used to bestow Zakat upon them as a bribe or gratuity to prevent them from molesting the Mussulmans, and also to secure their occasional assistance; but when God gave strength to the faith, and to its followers, and rendered the Mussulmans independent of such assistance, the occasion of bestowing this gratuity upon them no longer remained; and all the doctors unite in this opinion.

Definition of the terms Fakeer and Miskeen.—By the term Fakeers is to be understood persons possessed of property, the whole of which, however, amounts to somewhat less than a Nisab. By Miskeens is understood persons who have no property whatever. The comment upon the terms Fakeer and Miskeen is recorded from Aboo Haneefa. Some, however, hold the reverse description to be true.

Allowance to the collector.—The Imam is to allow the officer employed in the collection of Zakat as much out of it as is in proportion to his labour: as much, therefore, is to be allowed as may suffice for himself and his assistants; and his allowance is not fixed to an eighth. Shafee argues that Zakat, being appropriated to eight different objects, be—

*Fakeer and Miskeen both apply to persons in want: the distinction between these two terms is fully explained in the definition of them a little lower down.

§The translator is not able to find any precise meaning for this term in the lexicons. By Kuloob is understood an Asil, or original Arabian of the desert, and it is probable that some tribe of these is alluded to in this place.
comes thus divided into eight equal lots, of which one is the right of the collector, who is consequently entitled to an eighth of the whole. Our doctors argue that, as Zakat is paid to the collector, not as alms, but in the manner of a reward for service performed, it follows that the proportion paid him must be whatever may suffice for that purpose; and hence it is that the collector is entitled to pay himself out of the collections of Zakat although he should be rich.*

Definition of other terms.—By the phrase Feear-Rikab, mentioned in the Koran (where it treats of the objects of expenditure of Zakat), is to be understood Mokatib: this definition is taken from Seyid Ben Jeeroo. And by the term Gharumcen, in the same passage, are meant debtors: Shafei says that it means persons who have involved themselves in composing the differences of others. By the phrase Abbo Yoosaf a person, who, by poverty of estate, is incapacitated and cut off from taking a part in the wars of the faith; that is, in the Jihad Farz. Mohammed, on the contrary, argues that the phrase here mentioned applies to a person who, by poverty, is incapacitated from performing pilgrimage: the latter description, however, is necessarily implied and understood in the former; whence the phrase in question may be said to apply to both. It is to be observed that (according to our doctors) no portion of Zakat is to be paid to such persons as are in a state of affluence, none being objects of its application but those who are poor.

By the term Ibnus Sablel [travellers] is to be understood persons, in a strange place, having left their property at home, and who are consequently destitute of means of support.

The seven descriptions of persons here specified are the proper objects of the application of Zakat; and a proprietor (who chooses to disburse his Zakat himself, and not to pay it to the collector) is at liberty either to distribute it, in equal shares, among seven persons of those different descriptions, or to pay the whole to one of them.—This is the opinion of our doctors. Shafei has said that a proprietor is not at liberty himself to disburse the Zakat upon his own property in any other way than bestowing a part upon three individuals of each several description. The arguments on both sides here turn on some peculiarities in the Arabic language. Our doctors take their opinion from Amrou Bin Abbass.

Zakat not to be bestowed upon Zimmees. —It is not lawful to bestow Zakat upon a Zimme, or infidel subject, because the Prophet directed Maaz, saying, “Take Zakat from the rich Mussulmans, and bestow it upon the poor Mussulmans.”—But although infidel subjects are not entitled to share in Zakat, yet other alms may be bestowed upon them in the manner of Sadka, or almssift. Shafei says that they are prohibited from partaking of these also, as well as of Zakat; but our doctors ground their opinion on this point upon a precept of the Prophet, who has ordained that alms should be bestowed upon persons of every religion indiscriminately; and our doctors also allege, that if it were not on account of the directions to Maaz, before quoted, they should deem the bestowing of Zakat upon Zimmees to be legal.

Cases which do not constitute a payment of Zakat. —If a person employ the Zakat upon his property in the erection of a mosque, or the burial of the dead, yet his Zakat is not considered as being thereby discharged, because, in the payment of Zakat, it is established as a principle that it shall be made over to the person or persons entitled to it; and such delivery does not appear in this case.

If Zakat be employed in discharging the debts of a defunct, this is not considered as a payment of Zakat, because delivery does not appear in this instance.

If a person employ the Zakat upon his property in the purchase of a slave, for the purpose of granting him his freedom, this is not discharge of Zakat. Imam Malik maintains that this act amounts to a due discharge of Zakat; because he alleges that the phrase Feear-Rikab, which occurs in the Koran, applies to a slave thus bought and liberated; but our doctors argue that the emancipation of a slave amounts simply to a dereliction of property, and does not in any respect bear the construction of delivery or transfer of possession.

Persons who are not the proper objects of its application.—It is not lawful to bestow any part of Zakat upon the rich, the Prophet having declared that “alms are not lawful to the wealthy.” Shafei extends the use of Zakat to warriors, although they should be rich; but the precept here quoted is in proof against him.

It is not lawful for an owner of property to pay the Zakat upon it to his father, grandfather, or great-grandfather; nor to his son, grandson, or great-grandson; because the use of property between him and those persons is conjunct,—that is to say, each of those relatives is entitled to the use of the other’s property; and hence transfer of property, in its full sense, does not exist in these cases.

It is not lawful for a proprietor to pay the Zakat upon his property to his wife, because the use of property is common between the husband and wife, according to general custom; nor is it lawful for a wife to pay the Zakat upon her property to her husband (according to Haneefa), for the same reason. The two disciples have said that it is lawful to give Zakat to the husband, because the wife of Abd-'Oola-bin-Masood asked the Prophet whether she should give Sadka to her husband?—to which he replied,—"You have two duties, one, that of SADKA, the other, that of RELATIONSHIP."—But to this our doctors reply: from Haneefa, that by the term Sadka, mentioned in this tradition, is to be understood the Sadka Nifil, or voluntary alms.*

It is not lawful for a proprietor to bestow the Zakat of his property upon his own Mokatib, or Am Walid, or Modabbir, because in none of these cases is there a transfer of property, since that which falls to a slave becomes the property of his master;—and a master has, in like manner, a superior right in the property of his Mokatib, whence the master's transfer of property to him cannot be established.

It is not lawful for a proprietor to bestow the Zakat of his property upon his slave, whom he may have partially emancipated, (according to Haneefa) because such a slave is held by him to stand as a Mokatib; but the two disciples maintain that the bestowing of Zakat upon such a slave is 'legal, because they hold this slave to be a debtor to his master.†

It is not lawful to bestow Zakat upon the slave of a rich man, because, if it be made over to the slave, it becomes the property of his master, and the master being rich, the delivery of Zakat to him is illegal. And, in like manner, it is illegal to bestow Zakat upon the child of a rich person, being an infant, since the child is supposed to be rich in the property of the father; contrary to the case of the child of a rich person, being an adult, who is poor, he not being accounted rich in the property of his father, although his subsistence be a debt upon his parents: and also contrary to the case of the wife of a rich person, because she, if she be poor, is not accounted rich in the property of the husband, or in proportion to, or on account of, the subsistence she enjoys from him.

It is not lawful to bestow any part of Zakat upon persons of the tribe of Hashim; the Prophet having said, "O, descendants of Hashim! of a truth God hath rendered unlawful to you the Ghoosala [water dirted by abatement of men, and also their Chirk [fifth] and in lieu thereof he hath ordained to you a fifth of the fifth of all plunder:" and by the term Ghoosala is here to be understood the Zakat upon property, which is not lawful to Hashimees: contrary to Sadka Nifil: and by the term Chirk is to be understood the same. By the tribe of Hashim are here to be understood the families of Alee, and Abbas, and Jafir, and Aklean, and Haris-Ibnal-Mootlib; all these deriving their descent from Hashim the son of Minaf. But by the same Hashim, in the words of the Prophet before quoted, is to be particularly understood Hashim the great-grandfather of the Prophet, who also gives a name to a tribe.*

Zakat is discharged by the erroneous application of it to an improper person.—If a person were to bestow Zakat upon another, erroneously supposing him to be a proper object of its application, and should afterwards discover him to be rich, or a Hashimee, or an infidel,—or, if he should give Zakat to a person in the dark, and afterwards discover that person to be his father, or his son,—in these cases Zakat is considered to be fully discharged, and no longer to remain due.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yousaf has said that, in the cases here recited, Zakat is still held to remain due, because it was in the power of that person to inquire into, and discover the particulars concerning him upon whom he bestowed Zakat previous to making it over to him; and such being the case, where he is guilty of an evident neglect, his act is null, and consequently the Zakat is still a debt upon him; the same as where there are several vessels of water, some clean and others unclean,—one several garments, some pure and others defiled. —in such case, if a person, after due deliberation, select one of the pots of water, and perform his ablution with it, or put on one of the garments, and say his prayers, and he should afterwards appear to have committed an error, a repetition of the prayer or ablution is held to be incumbent upon him. Haneefa and Mohammed support their opinion, in this case, upon a decision recorded of the Prophet in a similar instance; and they moreover argue, that a knowledge of the circumstances of men is only to be formed from conjecture and cannot be easily obtained to a degree of decisive certainty, wherefore the matter is to be taken according to the donor's conception of it; the same as in a case of prayer, where if a man, intending to turn his face towards the Kaba, were to look in another direction, and pray his mistake afterwards appear, a repetition of the prayer is not incumbent upon him. It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa, that Zakat is to be held discharged if thus bestowed by mistake, upon a rich person, but not if bestowed upon a Hashimee, a parent, or a child; but the Zahir-Rauyet accords with what was before advanced.—What is here mentioned proceeds upon a supposition that the Zakat has been bestowed after due deliberation, in consequence of the donor conceiving that the receiver is a proper object of its application.

*In opposition to Zakat, which comes under the description of Saalka Farz, or obligatory alms; and consequently what is quoted above by the two disciples does not in any respect apply to the present case.
†That is for the remainder of his bondage. For a full explanation of this, see Ittak.

*What follows of this passage relates merely to the Arabian tribes, and is therefore quite useless.
tion; but he should not have deliberately, or if, after deliberation, a doubt still remain, the Zakat is not discharged, unless it afterwards appear that the receiver was a proper object of its application.

Unless that person be the slave or Makatib of the donor.—If a person bestow Zakat upon another, and afterwards discover that this other is his own slave or Makatib, this is not held to be a discharge of his Zakat, because, in this case, there is no transfer of property (according to what has been already remarked), and the discharge of Zakat rests upon a complete transfer of it, as was formerly explained.

It is not thought proper to bestow Zakat upon a person possesses of a complete Nisab in any property whatever, such an one being considered as coming under the description of Ghanee [rich], because this is the law term for any person possesses of a Nisab; but the condition on which any person is accounted a Ghanee is, that the Nisab which constitutes his property be exclusive of all demands or incumbrances (such as debts, and so forth); and on this precise quantity of absolute property no Zakat is legally due from the proprietor, the increase thereof (understood in the lapse of Hawlan-Hawl) being a condition of the obligation to Zakat.

Other persons upon whom Zakat may be lawfully bestowed.—It is lawful to bestow Zakat upon a person possesses of less than a Nisab, although he be sound in body and capable of labour, because such an one comes under the description of a Fakeer, who is one of the specified objects of its application, and also, because actual necessity in the situation or circumstances of the object is difficult to be ascertained, and therefore the rule is restricted to that description which affords argument of such necessity; and a deficiency in worldly property, to the amount of a Nisab, affords such argument of necessity with respect to the proprietor.

If a person were to bestow to the amount of two hundred Dirims, or upwards of the Zakat of his property, upon one individual, such a procedure is abominable, but yet is legal.—Iziffer has said that this is illegal; because in the act of bestowing that quantity of Zakat, the person who receives it becomes a Ghanee,* which would induce the idea of Zakat being bestowed upon a Ghanee; but to this our doctors reply, that the opulence of the person in question is an effect of the gift of Zakat to him, and therefore he does not come within the description of a Ghanee until after it has been bestowed, yet, where discharge of Zakat tends to bring any one within the description of Ghanee, it is abominable, the same as prayer when performed, near any filth.

ABOO HANEEFA has said, "I regard it as most laudable to bestow upon a Fakeer, Zakat to such an amount as may preclude him from the necessity of begging for that day."

Zakat of one city not transferable to another except in certain cases.—The transfer of Zakat from one city to another is abominable, it being rather indispensable that the Zakat of every city be bestowed upon the claimants of that city; and also, because in this a regard is had to the rights and Jowar [neighbourhood];—and hence, it is abominable in men to transfer the Zakat upon their property from their own city to another, except either for the use of their relations, or for the purpose of assisting those who may be in greater necessity than the inhabitants of their own city; because in the one case exists the peculiar duty of consanguinity, and in the other the application of relief where it is most required.—But although the transfer of Zakat from one city to another, excepting for the purposes here mentioned, be accounted abominable, yet it amounts to a valid discharge of Zakat because the term Fakeer, mentioned in the sacred writings as one of the proper objects of the application of Zakat, is not local but general.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF SADKA-FITTIR

Definition of the term.—By Sadka-fittir is understood the alms bestowed upon the poor on the Yd-al Fittir, or festival of breaking Lent.

Obligation of Sadka-fittir.—Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon all free Mussulmans possessed of property to the amount of a Nisab clear of incumbrance. The obligation to Sadka-fittir is founded on a precept of the Prophet, who, in a discourse upon the festival of breaking Lent, said, "Let every person, whether infant or adult bestow [upon the poor] half a SAA of wheat, or one SAA of millet or of barley." This saying is recorded by Salha-Adwee, but being of the class of Hidees Ahad,* it establishes only a moral but not a religious obligation.

Conditions of the obligation.—FREEDOM is made a condition, in order that the assignment [of the Saduka] may be complete: and Islam, or profession of the faith, is also made a condition, in order that this donation may bear the construction of an obligation and act of piety, of which infidels are held incapable: and the possession of a Nisab is also made a condition, the Prophet having declared "Alms are not expected to be bestowed but from the ability of the rich." Shafei has said that the Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon every person who possesses property to the amount or value of one day's subsistence for himself and family; but the above precept of the Prophet is in proof against him. — It is to be observed that wealth is determined at the rate of a Nisab, because that is the standard by which the law measures it; but this, with the reserve of its being exclusive of all incumbrances, as whatever may be so occupied is accounted non-existent; but increase in it is not a condition. — There are three things connected with the possession of a Nisab, such as here described; First, prohibition against the acceptance of alms; Secondly, obligation to perform sacrifice; and Thirdly, obligation to bestow Sadka-fittir.

Persons upon whom, or in whose behalf, it is incumbent. — The Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon every individual respectively. Ibn Amir having recorded that the Prophet has constituted Sadka-fittir an absolute injunction [Farz] upon all mankind and both sexes, indiscriminately.

It is incumbent upon a man to discharge the Sadka-fittir in behalf of his children, being infants, because he is their guardian, and their provision is a debt upon him; wherefore the accomplishment of their duties of Sadka must also rest upon him, this being considered as a part of their provision. And, in the same manner, a man must discharge the Sadka-fittir in behalf of his male and female slaves, he being their guardian, and their subsistence depending upon him. What is here advanced proceeds entirely upon a supposition that the slaves are not held by the proprietor merely in the way of traffic; and also that his children are not possessed of any independent property; for, if the children be possessed of property, then Sadka-fittir is to be discharged out of that, according to the two Sheicks. Mohammed contradicts their opinion in this instance. The argument of the two Sheicks is that the lawgiver has considered Sadka-fittir the same as Nifka, and therefore it is to be held as such.

Persons upon whom, or in whose behalf, it is not incumbent. — The Sadka-fittir is not incumbent upon a man in behalf of his wife because his power of guardianship and provision, with respect to her, is incomplete, since a husband is not guardian over his wife any farther than respects the rights of marriage, nor does the provision for her rest upon him any further than with respect to food, clothing, and lodging, which is characterised Rawatib [necessities]. Every thing beyond which he is not accountable for. And, in the same manner, it is not incumbent upon a man to disburse the Sadka-fittir for his children, being adults, although these form a part of his family, because he is not invested with any authority of guardianship over them. — But yet if a man was to disburse the Sadka-fittir on behalf of his wife, or adult children, without their desire, it is lawful, on a principle of benevolence, their consent being by custom understood.

It is not incumbent upon men to pay the Sadka-fittir for their Mokatibs; neither is it incumbent on a Mokatib to pay it on his own account, such an one coming under the description of a Fakere.

Exception. — It is incumbent on men to pay Sadka-fittir on behalf of their Modabbars and Am-Walids, as being invested with complete authority over them.

Not incumbent on behalf of slaves kept as articles of traffic. — It is not incumbent upon men to pay Sadka-fittir on behalf of their male and female slaves, or of their male slaves and female servants, held in sale as merchandise. Shafei alleges that the Sadka-fittir is obligatory upon such slaves, and that the proprietor is to pay it for them; and that the Zakat upon them is due from the proprietor. In short, Shafei holds that Sadka-fittir is due from the slave, and Zakat from their proprietor, on two distinct and separate accounts; and consequently, that this does not induce the idea of a repetition of Sadka upon one and the same property; but with our doctors the obligation to Sadka-fittir, on behalf of slaves, is held to rest upon their owner, the same as Zakat; and consequently, if the payment of the former were incumbent, it would admit the idea of two Sadkas upon one property within the year, which is illegal.

Nor on behalf of a partnership slave. — No Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon any of the proprietors on account of a partnership slave, because none of them, individually, is invested with complete authority over him, nor obliged to furnish his entire provision. And, in the same manner, no Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon any of the proprietors, on account of two or more partnership slaves, according to Haneefa. — The two disciples have said that, in this case, Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon the proprietor; but in such a degree only, with respect to their shares, as may amount to a complete slave or slaves, and not to any fractional part or portion of them: for instance, if there were five slaves held in partnership by two men, each partner would have to pay Sadka-fittir for two slaves, and not for two and a half. — Some, however, have said that the two disciples agree with Haneefa in their doctrine upon this point, because the share of each partner, individually, cannot be sold as a particular slave or slaves, until a partition take place of the partnership stock, and consequently none of them appertains to either partner in particular.

Incumbent on behalf of infidel slaves. — It is incumbent upon Mussulmans to pay the Sadka-fittir for their infidel slaves, on the authority of the tradition of Salba-Adwée, already quoted, because there the term slaves is used generally, and is not restrictively applied to Mussulman slaves: more over in the traditions of Abbas, it appears that the Prophet said "render Sadka-fittir on behalf of every freeman, and also of every slave, be that slave a Christian, a Jew, or a Pagan:" and further, it is incumbent, because the occasion of the obligation is here established, and the proprietor [of the slave] is capable of taking upon him the responsibility for such obligations. Shafei maintains that, in this instance, no Sadka-fittir is due, because the obligation to Sadka-fittir rests upon a slave himself, and not upon his owner; and the former (in the case here supposed) is incapable of such obligation, as being an infidel.

But not on behalf of a slave the property of an infidel. —If the slave be a Mussulman, and his master be an infidel, in this case no Sadka-fittir whatever is due for such slave, according to all the doctors; according to our doctors, evidently, because they hold the obligation of Sadka-fittir, with respect to the slave, to rest upon the master, and here the master is an infidel; and, according to Shafei, because he holds the obligation to rest upon the slave himself, to be discharged by his master; and the master, in the present case, is incapable of discharging it, as being an infidel.

Case of a slave sold with a reserve of option. —If a slave be sold with a reserve of option to one of the parties, the seller or the purchaser, determinable on the ensuing festival of Fittir, in this case the Sadka fittir, on behalf of that slave, is incumbent upon the party to whom he may ultimately belong. —Ziffer alleges that the discharge of the Sadka-fittir rests with the party in whose behalf reserve of option was made a condition, because the authority over that slave is in fact vested in him. Shafei maintains that it rests with him who has possession in the interim, whom he holds to be the purchaser, on this ground, that the furnishing Sadka-fittir is one of the rules of possession, the same as furnishing subsistence. Our doctors argue that the possession of the slave in the present case, is a matter which remains in suspense, since, if he to whom the option was reserved choose to dissolve the sale, the property in the slave reverts to the seller; but, on the other hand, if he confirm the sale and render it valid, the slave becomes the property of the purchaser from the period of the original engagement; and the possession thus remaining in suspense, that which depends upon such possession must remain suspended also; contrary to the case of Nifka, which is requisite from day to day, to supply the wants of nature, and is consequently incapable of such suspension. And if this slave be an article of traffick, the same difference of opinion holds with respect to the Zakat upon him.

Section. —Of the measure of Sadka-fittir and of the Time of its Obligation and its Discharge.

Proportion of Sadka-fittir and the articles in which it may be discharged. —The measure of Sadka-fittir in wheat, or flour or bran, or in dried fruits, is an half Saa; and in dates or barley it is one Saa. The two disciples say that dried fruits are the same as barley in this respect; and there is also one tradition of the opinion of Haneefa to the same effect. —The former is the doctrine recorded in the Jama Sagheer. Shafei says that the measure of a Sadka-fittir, in all the articles here specified, is one Sea; because Aboo Seyid Kadooree remarks that this was the customary Sadka-fittir in all articles in the time of the Prophet. —Our doctors support what was before advanced on the authority of the tradition of Salba Adwée, already repeatedly quoted; and the doctrine of the whole of the opinion of the companions of the Kholfa Rashidine* and others, is consonant to that of our doctors: the tradition, also, of Aboo Seyid, cited by Shafei, implies no more than that, in the time of the Prophet, people were accustomed in giving something over what was obligatory. —The two disciples allege (in support of their opinion, that dried fruits are the same as barley) that Khurma [dried dates] is one species of dried fruits; and they being considered the same as barley, it follows that all dried fruits, as being of one general description, should be subject to the same rule. The argument of Haneefa is, that dried fruits and barley are of a corresponding nature, because as the poor eat the flour of wheat with its bran, so do they dried fruit with its core or stone: contrary to dates, which are the same as barley, in as much as the stones of the one and the bran of the other are thrown away. —Barley-meal is the same as barley; but it is best that, in discharging the Sadka-fittir in the flour or bran of either barley or wheat, attention be paid to the value; that is to say it, for instance, the value of half a Saa of flour be equal to that of the same quantity of wheat, it will suffice to give half a Saa of flour, but otherwise not; and the same with respect to barley-meal. —This is not noticed in the Jama Sagheer, because the value of meal or flour does not commonly fall short of that of the grain, but rather generally exceeds it.

In discharging the Sadka-fittir with bread regard is to be had to the value only; this is approved doctrine.

The half Saa now mentioned is to be ascertained by weight, according to Haneefa; but the two disciples hold that it is to be ascertained by measure.

In discharging the Sadka-fittir, flour is preferable to wheat, and money is preferable to flour according to what is recorded from Aboo Yousaf; because money satisfies the wants most amply, and flour most readily: contrary to wheat, which, after it is bestowed, requires to be made flour before it is fit for use.—It is recorded, as an opinion of Aboo Biker Ayamush, that wheat is preferable either to flour or money, because this is universally admitted to be a proper article in which to discharge the Sadka-fittir, whereas concerning money and flour there are various opinions.

The Saa, according to Aboo Haneefa and Mohammed, consists of eight Rats of the Rials of Irak.—Aboo Yoosuf has said that it is only five Rats and one third; and this is also the doctrine of Shafei: the Prophet having said "Our Saa is smaller than that of others."—The argument of the Tirmichan, in this case, is, that it is recorded by the Prophet, that he performed the Wuzoo by the Midd (which is two Rats), and the Ghosil by the Saa (which is eight Rats); and the Saa of Omar was the same: moreover, this Saa is small compared with that of Hashimee, which was the Saa in common use, wherefore it is lawful to regard that mentioned in the tradition above quoted as the standard in Sadka-fittir.

Time of the commencement of the obligation. The obligation to the performance of the Sadka-fittir commences with the dawn of the morning of the festival of Fittir; that is to say, the arrival of that specified period is a condition of its obligation. Shafei alleges that the obligation commences with the sunset of the last day of Ramzan: and the result of this difference of opinion is, that if (for instance) an infidel were to be converted, and to become a Musulman,—or, if a child were to be born,—on the eve of the festival of Fittir, the Sadka-fittir would be due on account of the convert of the child, according to our doctors; but, according to Shafei, it would not be due: and, on the other hand, if a man's child, or male or female slave, were to die on the last night of Ramzan, Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon him or their account, according to Shafei; but it would not be so, according to our doctors.—The argument of Shafei, in this case, is that the Sadka-fittir is essentially connected with, and bears relation to Fittir [the act of breaking of fast], as the connection of the terms evinces; and the sunset of the last day of Ramzan is the time of Fittir, because the fast may be then broken.—To this our doctors reply, by admitting that the Sadka-fittir is certainly connected with the act of fittir, but the Fittir has reference to the day, and not to the night, whence it is that this period is expressed by the words Yawm-al-fittir [day of breaking fast], and not by the words Lail-al-fittir [night of breaking fast]; and hence it follows that the obligation to the performance of Sadka-fittir if connected with the morning of the festival of Fittir, and not with the eve thereof.

It is most laudable that men discharge their Sadka-fittir on the day of the festival of Fittir, before they proceed to the mosque to perform the prayers of that festival, because the Prophet did thus; and also, because the precept regarding Sadka-fittir was issued with a view that this donation might relieve the wants of the poor, and thereby enable them to enjoy the festival, and to unite in the duties of it with a cheerful mind; and the design is best answered by the donation being made before prayer.

If the Sadka-fittir be discharged previous to the day of the festival of Fittir, it is lawful; because the discharge of an obligation, at any time after the establishment of the cause of the obligation, is legal, in the same manner as that of Zakat previous to the lapse of Hawlan-Hawl.

If a person were not to discharge the Sadka-fittir within the day of the festival of Fittir, yet the obligation still continues, and it is proper that it be made good afterwards, because the obligation of it is imposed with a view to the relief of the poor, which object still remains; contrary to sacrifice, the obligation to which, if it be neglected on the Yawm-al-Nihir [the day of sacrifice, being the tenth of the month Zee-al-Hijlje], drops altogether;—this being merely an act of piety, in which the wants or rights of others are no way concerned.

BOOK II.

OF NIKKAH, OR MARRIAGE.

Definition of the term.—Nikkah, in its primitive sense, means carnal conjunction. Some have said that it signifies conjunction generally. In the language of the law it implies a particular contract used for the purpose of legalizing generation.

Chap. I.—Introductory.
Chap. II.—Of Guardianship and Equality.
Chap. III.—Of the Mihr. or Dower.
Chap. IV.—Of the Marriage of Slaves.
Chap. V.—Of the Marriage of Infidels.
Chap. VI.—Of Kissm, or Partition.

CHAPTER I.

Forms under which marriage may be contracted.—Marriage is contracted,—that is to say, is effected and legally confirmed,—by means of declaration and consent, both expressed in the preterite, because although the use of preterite be to relate that which is past, yet it has been adopted, in the law, in a creative sense, to answer the necessity of the case.*—Declaration, in the law, signifies the speech which first proceeds from one of two contracting parties, and consent the speech which proceeds from the other in reply to the declaration.

Marriage may also be contracted by the parties expressing themselves, one in the imperative, and the other in the preterite: as if a man were to say to another "Contract your daughter in marriage to me,"—and he were to reply. "I have contracted" [my daughter to you]—because his words "Contract your daughter to me" are expressive of a commission of agency, empowering to contract in marriage; and one person may be authorized to act on both sides in marriage (as shall be hereafter explained); wherefore the reply of the father, "I have contracted," stands in the place both of declaration and consent,—as if he had said "I have contracted, and I have consented."

Marriage may also be contracted by the use of the word Nikkah, or marriage,—as if a woman were to say to a man "I have married myself to you for such a sum of money," † and the man were to reply "I have consented," and, in like manner, by the word Tazweej, or contracting in marriage as if a woman were to say to a man "I have contracted myself in marriage unto you," and so forth:—and so also, by the word Hibba, or gift, ‡ as if she were to say "I have bestowed myself upon you," and likewise, by the word Tamleek, or consignment,—as if she were to say "I have consigned myself over to you:" and so also, by the word Sadka, or alms-gift, as if she were to say: "I have given myself as an alms unto you." Shafei is of opinion that marriage cannot be contracted by the words Nikkah and Tazweej, because the term Tamleek (for instance) does not bear the construction of matrimony either in a literal or metaphorical sense;—evidently not in a literal sense, this term never being used to express marriage; nor in a metaphorical sense, because a metaphor is to be understood in a particular sense only from the propriety of its application, which is not the case here, the terms Nikkah or Tazweej implying conjunction (as was before observed), and between the possessor and the possession no conjunction whatever exists. The argument of our doctors, in this case, is that consignment operates as the principle of a right to a carnal conjunction in the subject of it, in virtue of a right in the person (as in the case of female slaves); and the right to carnal conjunction is also established by matrimony; wherefore, as marriage and consignment thus appear to be both principles operating to the same end, the latter may be metaphorically taken for the former.

Marriage may be contracted by the use of the term Beeya, or sale; as if a woman were to say to a man "I have sold myself into your hands," and this is approved, because sale operates as the principle of a right in the person; and a right in the person is the principle of a right to carnal conjunction, whence the propriety of the metaphorical application of sale to matrimony.

According to the Rawayet-Saheeh, marriage cannot be contracted by the use of the term Ijara, or hire—as (if a woman were to say "I have hired myself to you for so much ;")—nor by Bahit, or permission; nor by Ihlah, or rendering lawful; nor by Areet or loan; none of these operating as the principle of a right to a carnal conjunction.—Neither can marriage be contracted by the use of the term Waseeyate or bequest; because bequest does not convey any right of possession until after the testator's death:—and as a contract of marriage in express terms, referring the execution of it to a period subsequent to the decease of either of the parties would be null, so also, in the present case, a fortiori.

Must be contracted in the presence of witnesses.—Marriage, where both the parties are Mussulmans, cannot be contracted but in the presence of two male witnesses, or of one man and two women, who are sane, adult, and Mussulmans, whether they be of established integrity of character or otherwise, or may ever have suffered punishment as slanderers.—The compiler of this work observes that evidence in the essential condition of marriage, the Prophet having declared "no marriage is good without evidence," and this precept is a proof against Malik, who maintains that in marriage notoriety only is a condition, and not positive evidence.

Qualification of a witness.—It is necessary that the witnesses be free, the evidence of slaves being in no case valid, because such are not competent to act in any respect sui juris: and it is also requisite that they be of sound mind, and mature age, because minors or idiots are in capable of acting for themselves; and it is likewise necessary that they be Mussulmans; the evidence of infidels not being legal with respect to Mussulmans.

Persons may witness a marriage, whose testimony would not be received in other cases.—The sex of the witnesses is not an essential condition of their competency, in so much that marriage may be lawfully contracted in the presence of one man and two women; neither is the integrity of the witnesses an essential condition, insomuch that (according to our doctors) a marriage is valid if contracted in the presence of two Fasiks or unjust persons.—Shafei maintains that

*Because the present and future being expressed, in the Arabic language, under one from, a contract expressed in the present would be equivocal.
‡ This, and the two following terms, are such as are used where the woman does not stipulate any dower.

*The word Fasik which throughout this work is used in contradistinction to Adil, has the integrity of the witnesses is an essential condition, because evidence is entitled to reverence and respect, the Prophet having said "pay reverence to witnesses;" and Fasiks are not proper objects of such reverence, but rather the reverse. —To this our doctors reply that Fasiks are competent to act for themselves, and that competence in evidence must also appertain to them. Since they are not incapacitated from acting with respect to others; a Fasik, moreover, is capable of holding the office of a Sultan or an Imam, whence it follows that he is also capable of becoming a Kazee, or a witness.—A person who has suffered punishment for slander, as being still possessed of general competency, is also capable of bearing witness, so far as merely respects declaration and consent in matrimony, but no farther, there being a positive prohibition to the reception of such a person's evidence, which, however, admits of exception in the present case, like that of blind persons, or of the children of the parties, whose evidence, although not admissible in any other case, is yet allowed in marriage.

Infidels may witness the marriage of an infidel woman —If a Mussulman marry a female infidel subject in the presence of two male infdel subjects it is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf and Hineefa. Mohammad and Ziffer maintain that it is not lawful because their testimony, with respect to declaration and consent in marriage, amounts to evidence and the evidence of infidels regarding Mussulmans is illegal; whence it is the same in fact as if they had not heard the declaration and consent of the parties. The argument of the two elders, in reply to this objection, is, that evidence is required in matrimony, not with any view to the ascertainment of a point of property (such as dower), but merely in order to establish the husband's right of cohabitation, which is in this case the object.

The negotiator of the contract may also, in certain cases, be a witness to it.—If a man desire another to contract his daughter (being an infant) in marriage to a third person, and the other should accordingly contract his daughter, upon the spot, to the third person, in the presence of the person so desiring, and the act be witnessed by only one person besides these two, the marriage is lawful; because, in this case, the father, as being upon the spot, is considered as the actual contractor of the marriage [on behalf of his daughter]; wherefore the second person stands merely as the negotiator of the contract, and of course, not appearing as a party in it, is a competent witness with the therefore been rendered, in the translation, unjust, which is indeed the most common acception of the world; it must, however, be understood to relate to a person who neglects decorum in his behaviour and dress, and such other inferior points, rather than to one who is actually known to be dishonest.

other. But, if the father of the infant afore-said should go away, and be not actually present at the execution of the contract, the marriage would be null; because the father, as not being present, cannot be considered as the contractor, that appellation properly applying to the other—who appears to act, in his absence, as his maternal agent on his daughter's behalf; consequently here would be only one competent witness present, and one evidence is not sufficient; whence the marriage would be illegal.—And the rule is the same where a father matches his daughter (being an adult), at her desire, in the presence of one other witness; that is to say, if the daughter be herself present at the execution of the contract it is legal, otherwise not.

Section—Of the prohibited degrees; that is to say, of Woman whom it is lawful to marry, and of those with whom Marriage is unlawful.

It is unlawful to marry a mother, or a grandmother.—A MAN may not marry his mother, nor his paternal or maternal grandmother; because the word of God in the Koran says, "Your AMS (that is, your mothers) AND YOUR DAUGHTERS ARE FORBIDDEN TO YOU;" and the primitive sense of the term AM [mother] being origin or root, the grandmothers are comprehended in this prohibition. The illegality of such a connexion is, moreover, supported upon the united opinion of all our doctors.

A daughter or a grand-daughter.—A MAN may not marry his daughter, on the authority of the text above quoted, nor his grand-daughter, nor any of his direct descendants.

A sister, a niece, or an aunt.—NEITHER may a man marry his sister, nor his sister's daughter, nor his brother's daughter, nor his paternal aunt, nor his maternal aunt; the prohibition of such in marriage being included in the text already quoted.

All the degrees of aunts are also included in this prohibition; to wit, maternal and paternal aunts, as well as the aunts of the father, and the aunts of the mother, both paternal and maternal:—so also the daughters of all the brothers; that is to say, of the full brother, and of the paternal* brother and of the maternal brother; and, in like manner, the daughters of all sisters, to wit, of the full sisters, and of the paternal sisters, and of the maternal sisters; because the terms Amma, Khala, Okh, and Oktb, which occur in the passage of the Koran already cited, apply to all those degrees of kindred.

Or a mother-in-law.—IT is not lawful for a man to marry his wife's mother, whether, he may have consummated his marriage with the daughter or not, the Almighty

*By the terms maternal or paternal applied to brothers and sisters, is to be understood half-brothers or half-sisters by the father's or mother's side.

having prohibited such a connexion in general terms, without any regard to that circumstance.

Or a step-daughter.—NEITHER is it lawful for a man to marry the daughter of his wife; but this only, provided he have already consummated his marriage with the latter, because the sacred text restricts the illegality of this union to that circumstance, wherefore marriage with the daughter of the wife is illegal, where carnal connexion has taken place with the latter, whether the daughter be an inmate of the husband's Haram, or not. It is here to be observed, that the text in the sacred writings which says "YOUR WOMEN WHO RESIDE IN YOUR Haram, BEING THE DAUGHTERS OF YOUR WIVES WITH WHOM YOU HAVE HELD COHABITATION, ARE UNLAWFUL TO YOU," has merely reference to custom, and does not imply that the residence of the daughter in the man's Haram along with her mother is unlawful; for it is usual, when a man marries a woman who has a daughter by a former husband, that the latter accompanies her mother to his house, and is thence considered as one of his Haram.

Or a step-mother, or step-grandmother.—It is unlawful for a man to marry the wife of his father, or of his grandfather, God having so commanded, saying "MARRY NOT THE WIVES OF YOUR PROGENITORS.'

Or a daughter-in-law, or grand-daughter-in-law.—NEITHER is it lawful for a man to marry the wife of his son, or of his grandson, the Almighty having said "WEED NOT THE WIVES OF YOUR SONS, OR YOUR DAUGHTERS WHO PROCEED FROM YOUR LOINS.'

Or a nurse or a foster-sister.—It is not lawful for a man to marry his foster-mother, or his foster-sister, the Almighty having commanded, saying "MARRY NOT YOUR MOTHERS WHO HAVE SUCKLED YOU, OR YOUR SISTERS BY FOSTERAGE,' and the Prophet has also declared, "Every thing is prohibited by reason of fosterage which is so by reason of kindred.'

Or two sisters.—It is not lawful to marry and cohabit with two women being sisters, neither is it lawful for a man to cohabit with two sisters in virtue of a right of possession [as being his slaves], because the Almighty has declared that such cohabitation with sisters is unlawful.

Case of two sisters.—If a man marry the sister of his female slave with whom he has not cohabited, such marriage is approved, the contract being, in this case, entered into by parties competent in every respect. And this marriage being legal and valid, the man must not afterwards hold any carnal connexion with his female slave, even though he should never consummate his marriage carnally with her sister, because a woman stands in law, as Femina Fututa;—neither should the husband indulge in the connubial enjoyment with this wife until he shall previously have rendered her sister [the slave] unlawful to him, and relinquished his right of cohabitation with her, by some means or other, such as emancipating her, or marrying her to another man, in order to avoid the construction of cohabitation with sisters; but having so done, he may afterwards cohabit with his wife; because the breach of the law would ensue, since a female slave is not held in the law, merely as such, to be a Femina Fututa.

Another case of two sisters.—If a man should happen to marry two sisters by two contracts,* and it be not known with respect to which marriage first took place, a separation from both the sisters must ensue; because it is evident that his marriage with one of the two is illegal, but it is impossible to ascertain with which, by reason of ignorance of priority; nor is it conceivable that a judgment should be pronounced legalizing the marriage of either, unspecifed, since the marriage of both remaining unascertained, a rule to make the same valid would be illegal, as not leading to any good or advantage; for the advantage proposed in marriage is procreation, which is unattainable without carnal connexion of the parties; and this connexion with a woman unspecified is inadmissible: moreover, allowing the marriage to be valid, it would be injurious to both, as laying them under the matrimonial restraints without the advantage of the connubial enjoyment, which neither could legally possess; for all which reasons their separation is indispensable. And in this case each sister is entitled to receive an half dower, because, if either could have been proved to be first married, she would have had a claim to her full dower, but the priority of marriage of either remaining unsacertained, the dower is thus divided between them. Some have said that this is only where each of the sisters respectively maintains the priority of her marriage without either being able to adduce any proofs; but that where they both declare their ignorance of such priority, nothing whatever is to be paid to either, until such time as both agree to receive an half dower, as above, because that is due to them in virtue of a priority unsacertained, wherefore it is necessary either that each should respectively maintain her priority, or that both should agree, as above, before any decree for payment of an half dower to each should be passed.—But if each sister maintain her priority, and both produce equal evidence in support of it, an half dower is the right of each, according to all the doctors. A man may not marry an aunt and niece.

—It is unlawful for a man to marry two women, of whom one is the aunt or niece of the other, the Prophet having declared a precept, as recorded in the Zahir-Rawayet, to this effect.

—Or two women related within the prohibited degrees.—It is not lawful for a man to marry two women within such degree of affinity as would render a marriage between them illegal, if one of them were a man,—and for the same reason, because this would occasion a confusion of kindred.

*A man may marry a woman and her step-daughter.—But a man may marry two women; one of them being a widow; and the other the daughter of that widow's former husband by another wife, because here exists no affinity, either by blood or fosterage.—Ziffer objects to this, and maintains that the marriage would be illegal; because, if the daughter were supposed a man, a marriage between her and the widow would be illegal, and these two consequently stand in the same predicament, with respect to each other, as those in the preceding case.

—To this our doctors reply that the illegality there stated is supposed to exist only in cases where this supposition, if applied to either of the women, would render their marriage illegal; but that does not hold in the present instance, for if the widow were supposed to be a man, she could lawfully marry the daughter. And it is moreover related, in the Naki Sahre, that Abdoola the son of Jafir married a wife and a daughter of Alee.

Cases which induce illegitimacy.—If a man commit whoredom with a woman, her mother and daughter are prohibited to him. Shafei maintains that they are not prohibited; because, whoever does not induce Hoormat-Mooshahirat, or ambition, from affinity, as this law of prohibition is a peculiar distinction bestowed upon the servants of God through the divine favour, and whoredom being a crime, cannot possibly induce that which is a favour of God.

—to this our doctors reply, that the carnal act operates as a principle or cause of a mutual participation of blood between the parties concerned in it, in virtue of the child which is, or may be, the fruit thereof, that partaking of the father and the mother respectively, in toto, for it is usually said "This child is the offspring of such a man and of such a woman;" and this participation being thus established between the child and each of the parents respectively, it is virtually so between the parents themselves, because although a portion of the child be a part of the mother, yet it is attributed, in toto, to the father, whence a part of the mother is attributed to him; and vice versa; and a mutual participation of blood being thus established between the man and the woman, it follows that the mother or the daughter of the latter stands as the actual mother or daughter of the man, because the former would be the grandmother of the child produced by such act of whoredom, and is therefore the root of the root of such offspring, and the offspring is the branch of a branch from her; and it is inconceivable that the child should be a branch of a branch from her, unless the fornicator were considered as a branch from her, and the grandmother the root of the fornicator; and the same reasoning applies with respect to the daughter.

If a woman touch a man in lust [i.e. manum fricant, stuprum excitat], the mother and daughter of that woman are thereby prohibited to him.—Shafei says that they are not prohibited. And the same difference of opinion obtains in cases where a man touches a woman in lust; or sees the pudendum of a woman; or where a woman sees the yard of a man in lust: in all which instances our doctors hold that the mother or daughter of such woman are rendered unlawful to the man; but Shafei maintains a contrary sentiment, arguing that seeing or touching do not amount to the absolute act, inasmuch that the usual ceremonies required by the law after the carnal act* are not here necessary.—To this our doctors reply, that such acts as those, being a cause of copulation, stand as that constructively.—It is to be observed, that by touching in lust, with respect to a man, is meant producing a priapism with the hand, or increasing the turgidity of the virile member, by the same means where the priapism already exists.—This is an approved definition of that phrase, as to the term lust, with respect to young men in full vigour and equal to the performance of coition; but with respect to old men, and Ineens (or persons naturally impotent), the exciting of lust amounts only to causing the heart to boil more quickly than usual, or increasing that palpitation where it already exists.—By the exciting of lust in women or eunuchs is understood simply causing a desire of coition, or increasing that desire where it already exists.—These definitions are recited at large in the Fatavee Alumgueere. By seeing the pudendum of a woman is understood; seeing the entrance of the vagina, which is not supposed practicable unless she be in a reclining posture. If a man indulge in lewdness with a woman until he produce an emission, some have said that this occasions Hoormat-Moosahirat, or prohibition from affinity, [with respect to the kindred of that woman;] but it is certain that this does not occasion prohibition, because the man, by producing an ex-vulval emission, manifests that coition was not his intention; wherefore it does not stand as such. And, in like manner, if a man enter a woman in ano, some have said that this occasions prohibition from affinity as such an act amounts to touching in lust; but it is certain that this does not occasion prohibition, because the carnal conjunction of the sexes does not stand as procreation on any other principle than as it may be the occasion of offspring, which it cannot possibly be from the performance of the act as above described.

A man cannot marry the sister of his repudiated wife during her Edit. If a man repudiate his wife, either by a complete or a reversible divorce, it is not lawful for him to marry her sister until the expiration of her Edit. — Shafei maintains that is lawful, because by either of those forms of divorce the former marriage was completely dissolved, insomuch, that if a man were to have carnal knowledge of his repudiated wife during her Edit, knowing the illegality of the same; he would be liable to the punishment for whoredom. — To this our doctors reply, that whatever the nature of the divorce may be, whether reversible or complete, the marriage with the first sister does still, in fact, continue during her Edit, in virtue of the continuance of several of its effects, such as maintenance, and custody, any inability to marry another man; neither does it appear, in the book of divorce, that and punishment for whoredom is specified in the ease of the husband having carnal connexion with his repudiated wife within the term of her Edit; although, according to the book of punishments, he would incur it, because by the act of divorce, the husband’s right of cohabitation is dissolved and consequently any subsequent cohabitation with her would bear the construction of whoredom; but yet his other rights are not dissolved (as was above observed), wherefore, if he were to marry the second sister before the expiration of the former’s Edit, it would amount to a marriage with two sisters at one time, which is forbidden.

Marriage with slaves — A master may not marry his female slave, nor a mistress her bondsman, because marriage was instituted with a view that the fruit might belong equally to the father and the mother, and mastership and servitude are contradictory to each other, wherefore it is not admissible that offspring should thus be divided between the master and the slave.

And with Kitabees. — Marriage with a Kitabee woman is legal, according to the word of God, "Women are lawful to you such as are Mahsanas of the scriptural sects". (the term Mahsana does not, in this passage, imply a Muslimate, but merely a woman of chaste reputation.) — Free Kitabees, and those who are slaves, are equal in point of matrimonial legality, as shall be demonstrated hereafter.

And with Majoees. — It is unlawful to marry a Majoeese woman, God having said "Ye may hold correspondence with Kitabees, but ye must not marry their daughters, nor partake of their sacrifices."

And with Pagans. — It is unlawful to marry a Pagan woman, according to the words of the Koran, "Marry not a woman of the Polytheists until she embrace the faith."

And with Sabeans. — A Mussulman may marry a woman of the Sabeans, she believing the scriptures, and professing faith in the prophets; but if she worship the stars, and believe not in any of the divine scriptural revelations, it is unlawful to marry her — such being isolaters. — The diversity of opinion which is recorded between Haneefa and the two disciples, originates in their different ideas with respect to the Sabeans; each arguing according to his own premises, for Haneefa accounts the Sabeans to be Kitabees; whereas the two disciples consider them as worshippers of the stars.

Marriage during pilgrimage. — It is lawful either for a man or a woman to marry during the Ihram of pilgrimage. — Shafei alleges that it is unlawful. And the same difference of opinion obtains in the case of a Mohrim contracting in marriage a woman to whom he is guardian. — Shafei supports his opinion upon a precept of the Prophet, "Mohrim marry not, nor cause to marry."

— In opposition to this, however, our doctors produce the instance of the Prophet himself, who married Meyemoona whilst he was a Mohrim; and with respect to the traditional precept cited by Shafei, as above, it is to be regarded as solely applying to the act of carnal conjunction, that is to say, the word Nikkah in that sentence is to be construed into Wuttee, — as if he had said, "Let not Mohrimis hold carnal connexion, nor Mohrims admit men to such connexion" — This indeed is rather a weak argument, since the word Nikkah has never been construed into the admitting of man to the commission of the carnal act: but the better principle upon which to answer it is that from the grammatical construction of the sentence, the words of the Prophet may be rendered into merely a negative remark rather than a positive prohibition.

Mosollmans may marry female slaves.—It is lawful for a Musollman, who is free, to marry a slave female, whether she be a Muslima, or Kitabeea, although he be in circumstances to marry a free woman—that is to say, able to pay a dower, and afford an adequate maintenance to such a woman. Shafei says that a man cannot lawfully marry a Kitabee slave, he holding that it is not lawful for a free man to marry any slave except of necessity, because by such an act he incurs the consequence of subjecting a portion of his body to bondage: that is to say, his seed (which is a portion of his body) by entering the womb of a slave, is born in bondage; necessity, therefore, he holds can alone legalize such a marriage, and consequently, the inability to pay the dower and maintainance of a free woman prohibits a freeman from marrying a slave; but from this rule he excepts Muslima slaves.—With our daughters, on the other hand, marriage with female slaves of every description is legal, because the text of the Koran, on which the legality of marriage is founded, extends to all descriptions of women, to slaves as well as to those who are free:—and with respect to what Shafei objects, that "by such an act a man incurs the consequence of subjecting a portion of his body to bondage," it may be replied that by marrying a slave, a man is only withhold from producing free children; but it is not thence to be concluded that he, de facto, subjects a portion of his body to slavery, free nor otherwise; and as a man is at liberty to abstain from producing the child itself (either by not marrying, or by marrying a woman who is barren), it follows that he is certainly at liberty to abstain from producing it in a state of freedom.

A man already wedded to a free woman cannot marry a slave.—It is unlawful for a man already married to a free woman to marry a slave, the Prophet having issued a precept to this effect, "Do not marry a slave upon [along with] a free woman."—Shafei says that the marriage of a slave upon a free woman is lawful to a man who is a slave; and Malik likewise maintains that it is lawful, provided it be with the free woman's consent.—The above precept, however, is an answer to both, as it is general and unconditional:—moreover, the legality of marriage is a blessing to males and females equally, but the enjoyment of it is by bondage restricted to one half, insomuch that slaves can have only two wives, whereas, a freeman may legally have four (as will be explained hereafter), and slavery operating thus restrictively upon males does so equally upon females;—upon the former it operates by a restriction in point of member, as above; but since, with respect to females, this is impossible, it has its effect by a restriction in point of circumstances; for instance, by restricting the legality of the marriage of female slaves to certain particular circumstances, as in the present case, where it is admitted only under the circumstances of the man not having any free wives.

But a man wedded to a slave may marry a free woman.—A man may lawfully marry a free woman upon a slave, the Prophet having so declared:—moreover, a woman who is free is lawful under all circumstances, the principle of restriction before mentioned not operating with respect to such a woman.

If a man marry a slave during the Edit of complete divorce of another wife who is free, it is null, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples allege that it is valid, as under the circumstances now recited it does not amount to marrying a slave upon a free woman; whence it is that if a man were to make a vow that he would not marry another woman upon his present wife, and he were afterwards to divorce his wife, and to marry another woman during her Edit, he would not forsworn. The argument of Haneefa, in this case, is that the marriage with the free wife does still in some shape remain, on account of the continuance of several of its effects; wherefore that with a slave during the term of the free woman's Edit is not admissible, on a principle of caution: contrary to the case of a vow, as recited above, because there the intention of the vower goes only to the expression that he would not introduce another wife to the prejudice of her right of Kissm; but her right of Kissm is annihilated by divorce.

Four wives allowed to freemen.—It is lawful for a foreman to marry four wives, whether free or slaves: but it is not lawful for him to marry more than four, because God has commanded in the Koran, saying "Ye may marry whatsoever women are agreeable to you, two, three, or four," and the number being thus expressly mentioned, any beyond what is there specified would be unlawful.—Shafei alleges a man cannot lawfully marry more than one woman of the description of slaves, from his text, as above recited, that, "the marriage of freemen with slave: is allowable only from necessity;" the text already quoted, is, however, in proof against him, since the term Nissa [woman] applies equally to free women and to slaves.

And two to slaves.—It is unlawful for a man who is a slave to marry more than two women: Malik maintains that it is lawful for a slave to marry as many women as a freeman, he holding it as a principle, that a slave, with respect to marriage, is in every particular the same as a free person, insomuch that (according to him) a slave is authorised to marry whithout his proprietors' consent.—The argument of our doctors, in

A man cannot contract his Am-Walid (being pregnant) to another.—If a man contract his Am-Walid, who is pregnant by him, to another man, it is null, because the Am-Walid is accounted as the FIrash of her master, or partner of his bed, inasmuch that the parentage of her child is established by the law in him, independent of any forma claim or acknowledgment on his part, wherefore, if the marriage were valid, it would induce the existence of a right to cohabitation in two individuals with one and the same woman, a right which is null, as it would occasion a doubtful parentage.

Objection.—The Am-Walid being declared the Firash of her master, it would appear that his marriage of her to another would not be legal, although she were not pregnant.

Reply.—The Firash right of a master in his Am-Walid is of but weak consideration; whence it is, that if he repudiates his child's descent from him, it would become bastardized on the instant, without any asseveration. His Firash right in her, therefore, not being of any account, independent of pregnancy, is not prohibitory to her marriage, unless as connected with that circumstance.

But he may so contract his enjoyed female slave.—If a man have carnal connexion with his female slave, and afterwards contract her in marriage to another man, it is lawful; because an absolute slave is not accounted as a Firash, or partner of her master's bed since, if she were to produce a child, the parentage would not be established in him unless he were to claim it.—But yet it is advisable that the master, previous to contracting her to another person, suffer one term of her courses to elapse, so as to guard against the possibility of his seed mixing with that of the other.—It is to be remarked, in this place, that the marriage of the slave, under the circumstance now mentioned, being valid, it is lawful for her husband to have carnal connexion with her immediately, and before her purification from her first preceding courses, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yosaf.—Mohammed alleges, however, that it will be laudable in the husband to abstain from carnal connexion with her until one complete term of her courses shall have elapsed, because it is possible that there may remain in her womb seed of her master.—wherefore it is requisite that it be purified of that seed, the same as in a case of the purchase of female slave.—The argument of the two Elders, in this case, is that the institute of the law, legalizing her marriage, is in itself a proof that her womb is unoccupied, as the law does not admit any marriage to be legal but under that supposition; wherefore purification, in the present instance, is not made a rule, either laudable or injunctive: contrary to a case of purchase, that of a female slave being held lawful although she be pregnant.

If a man marry a woman, knowing her to have been guilty of whoredom, he may lawfully have carnal connexion with her immediately, before her purification from her courses, according to the two Elders: but Mohammed deems it laudable that he have no such connexion with her until after her purification.—The reasoning of each upon this point is to the same effect as in the preceding case.

An usufructuary marriage is void.—A Nikkah Matat, or usufructuary marriage, where a man says to a woman "I will take the use of you for such a time for so much," is void, all the companions having agreed in the illegality of it. It is related in the Nakl Saheeh, that Ibn Abbas retracted from his first opinion and embraced that of the other companions:—for Ibn Abb is was first of opinion that the usufruct here mentioned is allowable; but Ale: informed him that the Prophet had declared it unlawful, upon which he retracted from his opinion: usufruct being allowable:—and Ibn Abbas having thus retracted, all the companions appear to have agreed concerning its illegality.

And so also a temporary marriage.—A Nikkah Mowokket, or temporary marriage,—where a man marries a woman, under an engagement of ten days (for instance) in the presence of two witnesses,—is null. Ziffer asserts that such marriage is valid and binding, the condition expressed of a specified period for its continuance being of no effect, because a marriage is not to be held null on account of a null or illegal condition therein expressed.—The argument of our doctors is that a temporary marriage is of the same nature with a usufructuary marriage; and in all contracts regard is had to the sense rather than to the latter, wherefore a temporary marriage, is null as well as a usufructuary marriage, whether the period specified be short or long; because the principle on which a contract of marriage falls under the description of Matat, or usufructure is its containing a specificiation of time; and the same is found in a Nikkah Mowokket, or temporary marriage.

Case of a double marriage by one contract.—If a man marry two women by one contract, one of whom is lawful to him, but the other prohibited, his marriage with the one who is lawful holds good, but that with the other is void because in that only a cause of nullity is found: contrary to where a man puts together a freeman and a slave, and sells them by one agreement, as such sale is null with respect to both, because sale is rendered null by an invalid condition, and the consent to the contract of sale is required with respect to the free person, in order to the legality of it with respect to the slave; this is therefore an invalid condition, as shall be demonstrated in treating of slaves,—It is to be observed that the whole of the stipulated dower, in the case now recited, goes to her with respect to whom the marriage is lawful, according to Haneefa.—

With the two disciples, on the contrary, the dower is divided into the proper dower to each, and therefore she with respect to whom the marriage is legal receives the amount of her proper dower, and the remainder drops in favour of the husband; and the same is recorded in the Mabsoot.

Case of marriage by a judicial decree.—If a woman sue a man on a plea of marriage, declaring that such and such a man married her, and produce evidence in proof of her affirmation, and the Kazee accordingly declare her to be the wife of such a man, and it should so happen that the man had never been actually married to that woman, yet he may, after this, lawfully reside with her;—and this is a sign of the authority of a judicial decree (or order of the Kazee) in regard to appearance; and if the woman desire carnal connexion, the man may lawfully hold such connexion with her;—and this is a sign of the authority of a judicial decree in reality.—The authority of the judicial decree extending both to appearance and reality, a tenet of Haneefa; and is also found in a prior opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.—In a more recent opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, and with Mohammad and Sha'fei, it is not lawful for the man to have carnal connexion with this woman, because the Kazee has erred in his proof, as the witnesses bore false testimony, and an error in the proof destroys the authority of the decree in regard to reality; wherefore it is, in some measure, the same as if the witnesses were slaves or infidels, in which case the decree would have no authority either in appearance or reality; and so it would appear in the present instance likewise; but here the decree has authority in regard to appearance, on account that the witnesses gave a true testimony in appearance; yet it has no authority in reality, as their testimony is false in point of fact; whereas, where the witnesses are slaves or infidels, the decree is destitute of authority in appearance also, as the proof remains unestablished even in appearance, since the discovery of their being slaves or infidels is practicable.—The argument of Haneefa is that the witnesses are, held, with the Kazee, to bear true testimony and this is proof, as it is impossible to ascertain whether their testimony be actually true; contrary to the state of bondage, or the infidelity of witnesses, as those are circumstances easily known and ascertained, wherefore their evidence is not proof in any way.—Now the decree being founded on the proof, and the authority of the decree, in respect to reality, being here possible, by previously taking the marriage for granted, as a matter of necessity, it follows that the decree has authority in respect to reality, in order that the contradiction between the two may be obviated in every shape,—for if she were not lawful to him in reality, it would occasion a contradiction between the two, instead of obviating a contradiction; contrary to a case of property claimed generally (that is to say, without any mention of the cause of propriety), such as if a man were to claim a female slave generally, and bring false evidence, and the Kazee decree the slave to the plaintiff, and it afterwards appear that the witness bore false testimony,—for in this case the decree has authority in appearance, but not in reality, because the cause of propriety in the slave are several, such as sale, purchase, gift, and inheritance, and regard cannot legally be had to any one of these as being prior to the other, since no one of them has precedence of the others, and to regard the whole of them as prior, is impossible; wherefore the decree cannot possess any authority [in reality]. Observe that the previously taking the marriage for granted, as a matter of necessity, is on account that a decree signifies the promulgation of a thing which is established, and not the establishment of a thing which is not established—for, if it were not previously taken for granted, it would follow that a decree signifies the establishment of a thing which is unestablished, wherfore the marriage is necessarily first taken for granted; and this is possible in the case of a claim of marriage, but not in a case of general propriety, for the causes of propriety there are multifarious, and no one of these has priority over the other;—in such a case, therefore, the regarding of any one cause of propriety as prior to the others is impossible.

CHAPTER II.

OF GUARDIANSHIP AND EQUALITY.

An adult female may engage in the contract without her guardian's consent.—A woman who is an adult, and of sound mind, may be married by virtue of her own consent, although the contract may not have been made or acceded to by her guardians; and this, whether she be a virgin or a Siyeeba.—This is the opinion of Haneefas and Aboo Yoosaf, as appears in the Zahir-Rawayet.—It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that her marriage cannot be contracted except through her guardian. Mohammed holds that the marriage may be contracted, but yet its validity is suspended upon the guardian's consent: on the other hand, Malik and Shafei assert that a woman can by no means contract herself in marriage to a man in any circumstance, whether with or without the consent of her guardians:—neither is she competent to contract her daughter or her slave, nor to act as a matrimonial agent for any one, so as to enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of her constituent; because the end proposed in marriage, is the acquisition of those benefits which it produces such as pro-creation, and so forth; and if the performance of this contract were in any respect committed to women, its end might be defeated, they being of weak reason, and open to flattery and deceit.—Mohammad argues that this apprehension is done away by the permission of the guardian being made a requisite condition.—The reasoning upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds in this case is that, in marrying the woman has performed an act affecting, herself only, and to this she is fully competent, as being sane and adult, and capable of distinguishing good from evil, whence it is that she is by law capacitated to act for herself in all matters of property and likewise to choose a husband; neither does a woman require her guardian to match her for any other reason than is she may, by that means, avoid the imputation which might be thrown upon her modesty if she were to perform this herself; for all which reasons a woman contracting herself in marriage is valid, independent of her guardian, although it should be unequal match; but yet, in the latter case, the guardian is at liberty to dissolve the marriage.

Unless the match be unequal.—It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, that the marriage is illegal if there be an inequality between the parties.—It is also recorded that Mohammed afterwards adopted the sentiments of the two elders upon this point, and agreed with them, that the marriage here treated of is lawful, and that its validity is suspended upon the approbation of the guardian.

An adult virgin cannot be married against her will.—It is not lawful for a guardian to force into marriage an adult virgin against her consent.—This is the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, who accounts an adult virgin the same as an infant, with respect to marriage, since the former cannot be acquainted with the nature of marriage any more than the latter, as being equally uninformed with respect to the matrimonial state, whence it is that the father of such an one is empowered to make seizin of her dowry without her consent.—The argument of our doctors is that the woman, in this case, is free, and a Mokkatiba (that is, subject to all the obligatory observances of the law, such as fasting, prayer, and so forth), wherefore no person is endowed with any absolute authority of guardianship over her; contrary to the case of infants, over whom others are necessarily endowed with this authority, the understanding of such being defective, whereas that of an adult is held complete, in consequence of her having attained to years of discretion; for, if it were otherwise, she would not be subject to the observances of the law; from all which it follows that this woman is the same as an adult son; and that all her acts with respect to matrimony are good and valid, the same as his with respect to property; neither is her father empowered to make seizin of her dower without her consent expressed of virtually understood, as he is not at liberty to do so where she has forbidden him.

Tokens of consent from a virgin.—Whenever a guardian, being the person empowered to engage in the contract, requires the consent of an adult virgin to a marriage, if she smile or remain silent, this is a compliance; because the Prophet has said, “A virgin must be consulted in everything which regards herself; if she be silent it signifies assent;” and also because her assent is rather to be supposed as she is ashamed to testify her desire; and laughter is a still more certain token of assent than silence; contrary to weeping, as this manifests abhorrence, since tears are most commonly the effect of grief, and not of joy, which is rarely the occasion of them, and therefore not to be regarded. Some have said that if her laughter be in the manner of jest or derision it is not a compliance; nor is her weeping a disapproval, if it be not accompanied with noise or lamentation.

But if a marriage be proposed to an adult virgin by any other than her guardians, or by a Walee Bayeed (or guardian of a more distant degree than her father, brother, or uncles), her silence or laughter are not sufficient, until she shall from her lips pronounce an explicit compliance, because here her silence might be construed to arise from shyness towards such a person as being a stranger, and not from her consent to the match; and if it were even to be considered as a token of approbation, yet, under such a circumstance, it must be regarded as doubtful; but this is not the case if the person who proposes the marriage be acting merely as a messenger from her parent, or other immediate guardian; because to such an one the same signs of assent or dissent suffice as were specified in the preceding case. It is here to be observed that, in requiring the woman’s consent as aforesaid, it is requisite that the husband proposed to her be particularly named and described, so as to enable her to form some idea of him, whereby to ascertain her liking or dislike; but it is unnecessary to name or specify the dower; and this is approved, because marriage may be effected independent of any dower, as that is not essential to it.

If a man contract an adult virgin in marriage to another without her knowledge, upon her receiving intelligence of it the same tokens suffice, to signify her compliance or approval, as were specified in the former case; that is to say, if she laugh or remain silent she consents, or if she weep she disapproves, provided the person contracting on her behalf be her guardian, and as such empowered so to contract; but the contract be entered into by any other than her guardian, her consent is not understood until she shall have expressed the same in terms; and in this, as in the preceding case, the naming and describing of the husband to her is a requisite condition, but not the specification of the dower.—It is to be here observed that, if the person who conveys the intelligence to her be a Fazool (that is, one who is neither an agent nor guardian), number or integrity are conditions essential to the effect; that is to say, the information must be conveyed to her by two persons, or at least by one person of known good repute, according to Haneefa; but if the informer be acting merely as a messenger from the guardian, than neither number nor integrity are conditions; according to all the doctors. There are many cases similar to this with respect to the point at persent in question, such as the recall of an ambassador, and the revocation of the privileges of a Mazon.

Token of consent from a Siyeeba.—If a guardian propose a marriage to a Siyeeba (or woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion), it is necessary that her compliance be particularly marked, such as, “I consent to it,” because the Prophet has said, “SIYEEBAS are to be consulted,” and also because a Siyeeba, having had connexion with man, has not the same pretence to silence or shyness as a virgin, and consequently the silent signs before intimated are not sufficient indications of her assent to the proposed alliance.

Cases under which a woman is still considered as a virgin, in respect to the tokens of consent.—If the signs of virginity in a girl should happen to be effaced, either by leaping or any other exertion, or by a wound, or by frequent repetition of the menses, yet she is still to be considered as a virgin that is, to say, her silence is a sufficient sign of her acquiescence in a marriage proposed, because she is still in reality a virgin, the law accounting every woman such who has not had carnal connexion with the other sex, and consequently subject to the same shyness and reserve, from her not being accustomed to male society.—And if the signs of virginity be effaced even by formication, yet she here also stands as a virgin, according to Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf, Mohammed, and Shafei are of opinion that the silence of such an one is not a sufficient token of consent to a marriage proposed because she is actually a Siyeeba, since she has actually had connexion with man—Haneefa in this case argues that people in general still suppose her to be a virgin, and hence consider her speaking as a breach of decorum, and consequently she will refrain from speech; her silence, therefore, must be held sufficient, lest her delicacy be violated; contrary to a case where a woman has lost her virginity either in an erroneous or an invalid marriage, as such an one would not be held a virgin with respect to the point in question, the law having manifested her carnal connexion, by instituting, in her case, observance which are a consequence of it (such as Edit and Dower), and by establishing the parentage of her child, whereas it recom mends as laudable, the concealment of fornication: this, however, is only where the case is not of a very notorious nature; for if a woman be known to abandon herself to fornication publicly, her silence would not be deemed sufficient.

Case of allegation and denial.—If a man should say to a woman, “You have heard of your being contracted to me by our friends, and remained silent”; and she reply, “No, I refused you,” or, “I disowned,” her declaration is to be credited.—Zifer says that the declaration of the husband is to be credited, on account that silence is the original state of man, wherefore the person who adheres to that is the defendant; and the repulsion of the marriage is supervenient, wherefore the person who adheres to that is the plaintiff; the case is therefore the same as where a person enters into a contract of sale, under a condition of option, and pleads a rejection after the time of option has elapsed and the other denies the rejection,—for in that case the declaration of the case is to be credited, as he adheres to what is original, to wit, silence. Our doctors, on the other hand, say that the husband, in the present case, on account of his plea of silence, pleads the obligation of the contract of marriage and consequently of being the proprietor of the woman’s person;* and that the wife, by pleading the rejection, sets aside the claim of her husband, and must therefore be considered as the defendant, in the same manner as when a depositor pleads the restoration of a deposit, and the proprietor of the deposit declares that he had not returned it to him; because, in such a case, the declaration of the trustee would be credited, since he is in reality the defendant, although in appearance he be the plaintiff, for he frees himself from responsibility, and the original state of man is freedom, and an exemption from responsibility:—it is otherwise with respect to the case of a condition of option in sale, because the obligation of a sale is manifested after the lapse of the time option, and therefore the person who pleads the rejection is plaintiff both in reality and in appearance. But here, if the husband should produce evidence in support of his silence, the marriage becomes established: if, however, he have no evidence, then an oath must not be imposed upon the wife, according to Haneefa.—This is one out of six cases in which an oath is incumbent upon the defendant according to Haneefa, in opposition to the opinion of the two disciples: as will be fully treated of under the head of sales.

Infants may be contracted by their guardians.—The marriage of a boy or girl under age, by the authority of their paternal kindred, is lawful, whether the girl be a virgin or not, the Prophet having declared, “Marriage is committed to the paternal kindred.” Malik alleges that this is a power the exercise of which does not appertain to any of the kindred except the father.—Shafei maintains that it belongs only to her father or grandfather: and he adds that this privilege does not appertain to any guardian whatever with respect to an infant Siyeeba, although he be her father or her grandfather.—Malik argues that power over freemen is established from necessity; but in the present instance no such necessity exists, as infants are not subject to any canal appetite: yet it is vested in a father, on the authority of sacred writings contrary to what analogy would suggest:—but he also says that a grandfather, not being the same as a father, is not to be included with him. Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the guardianship vested in a father is in no respect contrary, but is rather agreeable to analogy; because marriage is a point which involves in it many considerations, both civil and religious; and it is not perfect unless the parties have agreed according to the customary acceptation: and this equality is not always to be found; wherefore authority is vested in the father to contract his children during their minority, lest an opportunity of marrying them equally might be lost.—Shafei argues, that entrusting the power of contracting marriage to any others than the father or grandfather would be oppressive upon the child, since it is to be supposed that no others are equally interested in its welfare or happiness; on which principle it is that kindred of a more distant degree are not empowered to act with respect to the property of infants, a matter of infinitely less importance than their persons, and consequently the acts of such, with respect to the latter, are unlawful a fortiori.—Our doctors argue, that affinity is a cause of affection in other relations the same as in the parents, and in whatever degree that may be defective, a provision is made against any evil consequence, by vesting in the child an option of acquiescence in the match after puberty, which acquiescence is necessary to constitute its validity; contrary to the case of acts with respect to property, because these are capable of repetition, since they are done with a view to the acquisition of gain, which cannot be obtained but by such repetition; and such being the case, if any loss should happen in the property, it is irretrievable; wherefore authority to act in respect to property is useless, unless it be absolute; and absolute authority cannot be established where there is any defect. The argument of Shafei, in support of his second proposition (to wit “that this privilege does not appertain to any guardian whatever with respect to an infant Siyeeba, although he be her father or grandfather”), is, that her becoming a Siyeeba is to be considered as endowing her with sufficient understanding and capacity to act and judge for herself, on account of her being thus accustomed to male society, wherefore the law operates upon this consideration.

*Aral: Booza, i.e. Genitale Mulieris. The phrase here adopted is to be thus understood in marriage and divorce, throughout.
without any regard to the absolute fact of her being endowed with such a portion of understanding or not, as that is a matter which does not readily admit of ascertainment. To this our doctor reply, that the infant requires a guardian whose tenderness and affection must be necessarily admitted; neither can her acquaintance with the other sex be considered as endowing her with any additional portion of understanding in regard to mankind, without concupiscence, which, in a child, does not exist.—It may also be farther observed that the precept of the Prophet already quoted is general and indiscriminate, and therefore includes all relations equally, which makes it a sufficient answer to Malik and Shafei.

Relations stand in the same order in point of authority to contract minors in marriage as they do in point of inheritance; but this authority, in the more distant relatives, is subject to the existence of those of a nearer degree.

Case in which the marriage of infants continues binding after puberty.—If the marriage of infants be contracted by the father or grandfathers, no option after puberty remains to them; because the determination of parents in this matter cannot be suspected to originate in sinister motives as their affection for their offspring is undoubted; whereas the marriage is binding upon the parties, the same as if they had themselves entered into it after maturity.

Case which admits an option of acquiescence after puberty.—But if the contract should have been executed by the authority of others than their parents, each is respectively at liberty, after they become of age, to choose whether the marriage shall be confirmed or annulled.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammad. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that, in this case also, no option remains to them, since he considers all guardians to be the same as parents. To this Haneefa and Mohammed reply, that the more distant the guardians stand in their affinity to the parties, the less warm are their affections supposed to be; whence it is to be apprehended that, in contracting the marriage, self interest, or some other sinister motive, might operate in their minds to the disadvantage of the infant under their guardianship, an evil which is provided against by leaving an option to the infant after maturity.—It is to be observed, however, that this case, applying generally to all except the father and grandfather, includes the mother of the infant, and also the Kazee because the former, as being a woman, is defective in judgment; and the latter, as a stranger to the transaction, and consequently a right of option must be reserved to the infant after maturity.—It is also to be remarked that, in dissolving the marriage, decree of the Kazee is a necessary condition in all cases of option exerted after maturity; contrary to the rule in the exertion of a similar right of option after manumission; that is to say, if a master marry his female slave to any person, and afterwards emancipate her, she will have a right of option upon her emancipation; if she please the marriage continues, but if she disapproves it is dissolved; and the decree of the Kazee is not essential to such dissolution: but it is otherwise in the case of option after maturity; because that option is reserved with a view to guard against a conspiracy to the other rights of the parties, which might occur in a variety of instances, and which if admitted (as, if the marriage were absolute, they must be), would be calculated to introduce many evils into the married state, since the guardian might, for instance, in executing the contract, agree to an inadequate dowry, or to an unequal match; and as the dissolution of the marriage thus tends to affect other rights, a decree of the Kazee is essential therein; but, in the case of the female slave, the right of option after emancipation forms a security against an evident injury to herself as the husband's power over her is extended, and his authority, as well as her obligations, in many respects enlarged, by her emancipation from slavery; whence it is that this right of option is restricted to female slaves only, and does not extend to males, to whom the above principle would not apply; and such being the case, the dissolution of her marriage is to be regarded merely as the removal of a hardship from herself; in which the decree of the Kazee is no way necessary, since all persons are entitled to relieve themselves from evil.

Token of acquiescence after puberty.—If the female, thus contracted during infancy, be of age when the marriage is first mentioned to her, and she upon that occasion remain silent, her silence (according to Haneefa and Mohammad), is to be construed into consent: but if she continue ignorant of the contract, her right of option is still reserved to her, until such time as she is informed of it, and remain silent as above.

—Mohammed, in this case, makes it a condition that the girl be duly informed of the marriage, because she cannot assert her right of option without a knowledge of the circumstance, as the guardian may effect the marriage altogether unknown to her, and it may consequently happen that she never hears of it, and of course she would remain excused (as to her silence) on the ground of ignorance; but he does not make a knowledge of her right of option a condition, because that is an institute of the law, and ignorance is no plea with respect to an institute of the law, with which it is supposed that every person ought to be acquainted; the case is otherwise with a female slave, who being employed in the service of her master has no opportunity to obtain any knowledge of the law, wherefore ignorance of this point is a good plea in favour of the continuance of her right of option.

Circumstances which annul the right of option.—The right of option in a virgin,

after maturity, is done away by her silence; but the right of option of a man is not done away by the same circumstance, nor until he express his approbation by word or by deed, such as presenting her dower, cohabiting with her, and so forth: and in like manner the right of option of the female after maturity (in a case where the husband has enjoyed her before she attained to that state), is not annulled until she express her consent or disapprobation in terms (as if she were to say "I approve," or "I disapprove") or until her consent be virtually shown by her conduct, in admitting the husband to carnal connexion, and so forth.

Degree of the continuance of a right of option after maturity.—The option of maturity of a virgin is not protracted to the end of the assembly; but that of a Siveeba, or a youth, is not annulled even by the rising from the assembly, because the option of maturity is established by consent, on account of the apprehension of the ends of marriage being defeated; and whatever is established by consent is annulled by consent, on account of its advantage being obtained; now the silence of a virgin is consent, but not that of a Siveeba or a youth: wherefore the option of the former is annulled, but not that of the last two: moreover, a Siveeba's option of maturity has not been established by the act of her husband, as is evident; and a circumstance which is not established by the act of the husband is not restricted to that assembly, since that only which is delegated is so restricted, as shall be hereafter demonstrated; & contrary to the option of manumission, as that is not annulled by silence, but is protracted to the end of the assembly, and annulled by the rising from the assembly, because the option of manumission is established by the act of the master, namely, emancipation: & hence regard is had to the Majila in this case, as well as in that of a woman endowed by her husband with an option of divorce.

Separation in consequence of option is not divorce.—A separation between a husband and wife in consequence of option after maturity is not divorce, from whatever side it proceed, because it may with propriety proceed from the wife, whereas divorce cannot. And so also, separation in consequence of option after manumission is not divorce, for the same reason.

Rule inheritance in the marriage of infants.—If a girl who has been contracted in marriage by her guardian, as already stated, should die before she attain maturity, her husband inherits of her: and, in like manner, if a youth so contracted should die before he attains maturity, his wife inherits of him;—and so also, if either should happen to die after maturity, without a separation having taken place:—because the marriage contract was regular and valid as origine, and would remain so, until dissolved to the dissent of one or both of the parties in the event of their arriving at maturity; but this being precluded by the demise of one of them, the marriage continues good for ever; and consequently all the mutual privileges established in the parties by the marriage are irreversibly confirmed by the decease of either of them:—contrary to the case of a marriage contracted by an unauthorized person, where, if either of the parties were to die before assent being duly expressed, the other would not inherit; because, in this case, the existence of the marriage is suspended upon the consent of the parties, and is consequently rendered null by the demise of either previous to or on the declaration of their will in it; whereas, in the other case, the decease of either party, previous to maturity or separation, as aforesaid, does not annul, but rather confirms their marriage.

Persons incapable of acting as guardians in marriage.—Authority to contract others in marriage is not vested in a slave, an infant, or a lunatic, because such persons, being considered in law as incapable of acting for themselves, are incapable, both to exercise any authority over others, a fortiori; moreover, this authority is established in guardians and others out of tenderness to persons who, from their situation, require attention and care (such as infants and lunatics); but this would not be manifested by, committing the execution of marriage, on their behalf, to persons of the above descriptions.*

An infidel cannot be vested with this authority with respect to a Mussulman male or female because the word of God says "He doth not admit infidels to any claim upon believers"; & and, if this authority were vested in in infidels, it would be admitting them to such a claim, and hence also it is, that the evidence of infidels regarding Mussulmans is not admitted; and, upon the same principle, that Mussulmans and infidels cannot inherit of each other.

An infidel is vested with this authority with respect to his children who are infidels, the word of God saying, "Infidels may exercise authority over infidels"—whence it is that the evidence of infidels regarding infidels is admitted, and that in heritance obtains among them.

Maternal relations may act in defect of the paternal.—In defect of paternal relations, authority to contract marriage appertains to the maternal (if they be of the same family or tribe), such as the mother, or maternal uncle or aunt, and all others within the prohibited degrees, according to Haneefas, upon a principle of benevolence.—Mohammed alleges that this authority is not vested in any except the paternal kindred; and there is also an opinion of Haneefa on record to this effect.—Of Aboo Yoosaf two opinions have been mentioned; according to that which most generally received, he coincides with Mohammed; and their arguments on this subject are twofold: First, the Prophet has declared "Marriage contracted to the paternal kindred" (as was before quoted); Secondly, the only reason for instituting this authority is that families may be preserved from improper or unequal connexion; and this guard over the honour of a family is committed to the paternal relatives, whose peculiar province it is to take care that their stock be not exposed to any mean or debasing admixture, so as to subject them to shame.—The argument of Haneefa is, that authority to contract marriage is instituted out of a regard to the interest of the child, which is fully manifested by committing it to persons whose relation to the infant is so near as to render them interested in its welfare.

Or the Mawla of an infant female slave.—If the Mawla* of an infant female slave, having emancipated her, should contract her in marriage, it is lawful, although she have relations within the prohibited degrees upon the spot, provided there be not among them any relations of the paternal description, because the Mawla stands as a paternal relation with respect to her.

Or the Magistrate in defect of a natural guardian.—Where persons are destitute of any natural guardian, the authority of contracting them in marriage is vested in the Imam or the Kazee; because the Prophet has, in his precepts, declared, "Persons being destitute of guardians have a guardian in the Sultan."

Or the nearest guardian present in the absence of others.—If the parents, or other first natural guardians of an infant, should be removed to such a distance as is termed Gheebat-Moonkatat, it is in that case lawful for the guardian next in degree to contract the infant in marriage.—Ziffer and Shafei allege that it is not lawful, because this authority is vested in the first guardian as a right, in order that the family may be preserved from the shame occasioned by the infant forming a degrading connexion; and this being a positive right, cannot be annulled by the absence of the party, as the law does not admit absence to be destructive of a right; and hence it is that if the absent guardian were to contract the infant in marriage on the spot where he may at that period happen to be, it is lawful; moreover, a relation of a more distant degree is not vested with authority in the existence of a nearer relative, since the more distant is precluded by the nearer.—The argument of our doctors is that authority to contract minors in marriage is instituted out of regard to their interest, as was already noticed; whence it is that this authority is not admitted over any, excepting such as are incapable of paying the necessary attention to their own interest; and the regard is not manifested in committing the business of marriage to the nearer guardian, who is absent, as from the exertion of his prudence or good sense no advantage can, in that situation, be easily derived; the authority, therefore, in this case, devolves to the guardian next in degree who is present:—moreover, as, in case the first guardian were to die, or to income, beseech the authority, would devolve to the next in degree, so does it likewise in the present case. And with respect to what Ziffer and Shafei have advanced, that "If the absent guardian were to contract the infant in marriage on the spot where he may at that period happen to be, it is lawful,"—the assertion is not admitted: but even granting this, it is still to be observed, that although the more distant guardian be further removed from the infant in point of consanguinity, yet, being upon the spot, he is enabled to transact for the latter, with the advantage of immediate and local knowledge; and vice versa of the other guardians Thus they stand upon an equal footing with respect to authority; and whoever of them may enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of the infant, the same, holds good, and is not liable to be set aside.

The guardianship over a lunatic woman rests with her son.—If a lunatic woman have two guardians, one her son and the other her father, the authority of disposing of her in marriage rests with the former and not with the latter, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed says that the father is her guardian in this respect, as feeling a more lively interest in her than the son.—The argument of the two Elders is that a son is prior to all others of the parental kindred; and the right of guardianship goes by this right of priority, in preference to affection thus any paternal kinsman (such as the son of the father’s brother, for instance), is in this respect prior to the maternal grandfather, although the natural affection of the latter be admitted to be the strongest.

Section.—Of Kafat, or Equality.

Definition of Kafat.—KAFAT, in its literal sense, means equality.—In the language of the law it signifies the equality of a man with a woman, in the several particulars which shall be immediately specified.
equality necessary in marriage.—In marriage regard is had to equality, because the Prophet has commanded, saying, "Take ye care that none contract women in marriage but their proper guardians, and that they be not so contracted by with their equals; and also, because the desirable ends of marriage, such as cohabitation, society, and friendship, cannot and do not completely ensue by persons who are each other's equals (according to the customary estimation of equality), as a woman of high rank and family would abhor society and cohabitation with a mean man; it is requisite, therefore, that regard be had to equality with respect to the husband; that is to say, that the husband be the equal of his wife; but it is not necessary that the wife be the equal of the husband, since men are not degraded by cohabitation with women who are their inferiors.—It is proper to observe, in this place, that one reason for according to equality in marriage, is, that regard is had to that circumstances in confirming a marriage and establishing its validity; for if a woman should match herself to a man who is her inferior, her guardians have a right to separate them, so as to remove the dishonour they might otherwise sustain by it.

in point of tribe or family—equality is regarded with respect to lineage, this being a source of distinction among mankind; thus it is said, "a Kooraish is the equal of a Kooraish throughout all their tribes"; that is to say, there is no pre-eminence among them, between Hashmees and Niffees, Teye-mees or Adwees; and in like manner they say, "an Arab is the equal of an Arab."—This sentiment originates in a precept of the Prophet to this effect; and hence it is evident that there is no pre-eminence considered among the Kooraish tribes: and with respect to what Imam Mohammed has advanced, that "pre-eminence is not regarded among the Kooraish tribes or families, excepting where the same is notorious, such as the house of the Khalifs," his intention in this exception was merely to show that regard should be had to pre-eminence in that particular house, out of respect to the Khalifet, and in order to suppress rebellion or dissatisfaction; and not to say that an original equality does not exist throughout. The Kooraishees are the descendants of Nazir, son of Kanaan, as is universally known.—Ibn-Hijr has said that the Kooraishees are descended of Kihr the son of Malik. The term Kooraish is a diminutive of Kurshe, which means a body of people, or congregation; and this appellation was originally applied to them, because they were accustomed to trade through different cities and countries, and after being thus scattered, used to re-assemble at Mecca. The Arabs are those who derive their descent from a stock anterior to Nazir, or (according to Ibn Hija) anterior to Kihr.

the Binno Bhala tribe are not the equals of Arabs of any other description whatsoever, they being notorious throughout Arabia for every species of vice; and none of those before mentioned esteem them as upon equality with themselves.

in point of religion.—Mawalees, this is to say, Ajims, who are neither Kooraishees nor Arabs, are the equals of each other throughout, regard not being had among them to lineage, but to Islam.—Thus an Ajim whose family have been Mussulmans in two or more generations is the equal of one descended of Mussulman ancestors;—but one who has himself embraced the faith, or he and his father only, is not the equal of an Ajim whose father and grandfather were Mussulmans; because a family is not established under any particular denomination (such as Mussulman, for instance), by a retrospective of the grandfather.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Muhammed. Aboo Yoosaf says that an Ajim whose father is a Mussulman is the equal of a woman whose father and grandfather are Mussulmans.

An Ajim who is the first of his family professing the faith is not the equal of a woman whose father is a Mussulman.

in point of freedom.—Equity in point of freedom is the same as in point of Islam, in all the circumstances above recited, because bondage is an effect of indigence, and the properties of meanness and turpitude are therein found.

in point of character.—Regard is to be had to equality in piety and virtue, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf; and this is approved because virtue is one of the first principles of superiority and a woman derives a degree of scandal and shame from the profligacy of her husband, beyond what she sustains even from that of her kindred,—Mohammed alleges that positive equality in point of virtue is not to be regarded, as that is connected with religion, to which rules regarding more worldly matters do not apply, excepting where the party, by any base or degarding misconduct such as a man exposing himself naked and intoxicated in the public street, and so forth, may have incurred derision and contempt.

in point of fortune.—Equity is to be regarded with respect to property, by which is understood a man being possessed of a sufficiency to discharge the dower and provide maintenance; because if he is unable to do both, or either of these, he is not the equal of any woman; as the dower is a consideration for the carnal use of the woman, the payment of which is necessary of course; and upon the provision of a support to the wife depends the permanency of the matrimonial connexion; and this is therefore in dispensable a fortiori.—This, according to some, is found in the ability to support a wife for one month only; but others say for a year. By a man possessing sufficient to enable him to discharge the dower, is understood his ability to pay down that proportion of it which it is customary to give immediately upon the marriage, and which is termed BOOK II.—CHAP. II.

Moajil, or prompt; the remainder, termed the Mowjil, or deferred, it is not usual to pay until a future season; and hence it is that the ability to pay that part of the dower is not made a condition.—Aboo Yoosaf teaches that regard is to be had only to the man's ability to support his wife, and not to the discharge of the dower, because the latter is of a nature to admit of being paid in the payment, but not the former; and a man is supposed to be sufficiently enabled to pay the dower where his father is in good circumstances. According to the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed, however, the fortune of the man is to be considered in general (without regard to any particular ability), insomuch that a man who may even be qualified both to pay the dower and to provide subsistence, yet may not be held the equal of a woman possessed of a large property; since men consider wealth as conferring superiority, and poverty as inducings contempt. Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, maintains that wealth is not to be regarded in this respect, since it is not a thing of a stable or permanent nature, as property may be acquired in the morning and lost before night.

And in point of profession.—Equality is to be regarded in trade or profession, according to Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed.—There are two opinions recorded of Haneefa upon this point; and there is also an opinion related of Aboo Yoosaf; that the profession is not to be regarded, unless where it is of such a degrading nature as to oppose an insurmountable objection; such, for instance, as barbers, weavers, tanners, or other workers in leather, and scavengers, who are not the equals of merchants, perfumers, druggists or bankers.—The principle upon which regard is to be had to trade or profession is, that men assume to themselves a certain consequence from the respectability of their callings, whereas a degree of contempt is annexed to them on account of the meanness thereof. But a reason, on the other hand, why trade or profession should not be regarded is, that these are not absolute upon a man, since he is at liberty to leave a mean profession for one of a more honourable nature.

Case of a woman contracting herself on an inadequate dower.—If a woman contract herself in marriage, consenting to receive a dower of much smaller value than her proper dower, the guardians have a right to oppose it, until her husband shall agree either to give her a complete proper dower, or to separate from him.—This is according to Haneefa.—The two disciples maintain that the guardians are possessed of any such authority; and their argument is, that whatever the dower may be above ten Dirms is the right of the woman, and no person is to be opposed in relinquishing that which is her own as where a woman, for instance, chooses to relinquish a part of the dower, after the amount of it has been specifically stipulated. —To this Haneefa replies, that the guardians assume a certain degree of respect and consideration from the magnitude of shame to and its smallness is an occasion of shame to them; wherefore regard is had to that, as well as to equality: contrary to the case of a woman relinquishing compulsion to the effect of her dower after it has been specifically stipulated, because no disgrace falls upon the guardians from such dereliction.

Case of a father contracting his infant child on a disproportionate dower.—If a father should contract in marriage his infant daughter, agreeing to a very inadequate dower; or, if he should contract his infant son, engaging for an extravagant dower, yet this is legal and valid with respect to them.—This, however, is not lawful to any excepting a father or grandfather, according to all the doctors. The two disciples have said that diminution or excess in the dower is illegal only where it is very apparent; that is to say, a contract of marriage, involving any very disproportionate excess or deficiency of dower, is not held by them to be legal; because the authority of a father or grandfather to contract infants in marriage is founded upon the supposition of their regard for the interest of those infants, and therefore where this regard does not appear, the contract is null; and in agreeing for a deficient dower on behalf of a female infant; or for an excessive one on behalf of a male, no regard to their interest whatever is manifested.—Similar to this is a case of purchase or sale; that is to say, if a guardian were, on behalf of an infant, to sell a thing for less than its value, or to buy a thing for more than it is worth, at an excessive disproportion, such sale or purchase would be invalid; and so also in marriage; and hence it is that no person is empowered, with respect to deficient or excessive dowers, excepting a father or grandfather.—To this Haneefa replies, that the law here rests solely upon whatever affords an argument of tenderness for the infant, and that is found in nearness of affinity; and in marriage there are many considerations of more weight and moment than the dower, whereas, in transactions which concern property, that only is a consideration; and where that which is the end appears to be defeated, their authority is done away. But with respect to other than the father and grandfather, no regard is had to affinity as an argument of tenderness in the present case, since that exists in them in smaller degree.

A father may contract his infant child to a slave.—If a man contracts his infant daughter to a slave, or his infant son to a female slave, it is lawful.—The Haneefa observes that this is according to Haneefa, who argues that the father's neglect of equality in this instance must be supposed to arise from some other considerations of greater weight, wherefore the said contract of marriage is lawful; but it should appear that the parent has adopted such a match without any view to a particular advantage, the contract is in that case null: and the two elders coincide with Haneefa in this opinion.—According to the two disciples the contract is illegal, because it involves a twofold disadvantage with respect to the infant;—a want of equality in the first instance; and secondly, a want of residence, as a slave cannot be or remain anywhere but with the owner's consent.

Section.—Of a Power of Agency to contract Marriage.

Agents in marriage, and their powers.—Agents in matrimony are persons employed and authorized by the parties concerned to enter into contracts of marriage on their behalf; and the power so delegated is termed Wikali-util-Nikkah.

It is lawful for a nephew to contract the daughter of his uncle in marriage with himself.—Ziffer alleges that this is unlawful.

In a woman, the authority of a man to contract her in marriage with himself, and he accordingly execute the contract in the presence of two witnesses it is lawful. Ziffer and Shafei affirm that this is illegal, because no person is competent to transfer and make himself the proprietor of that which is transferred; as in a case of sale, for instance, where, if the proprietor constitute a person his agent of sale with respect to any particular property, and the agent sell the same to himself, both the agency and the sale are void, no man being competent to act as the transferrer of property, and to become himself the master of that property.—Shafei, however, alleges that a guardian may lawfully contract his word to himself on the plea of necessity, since, if he were not allowed this privilege, she might never be married; but a mere agent has no such plea because in this case her guardian will contract her.”—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that an agent in matrimony is merely a negotiator, and the obligations of the contract do not, in any respect, affect the contractor of a marriage; neither would any objections which may arise apply to the simple negotiation, but to the rights and obligations which it involves: contrary to the case of sale, as cited by Ziffer and Shafei, because there the agent appears to be acting not merely as a negotiator, but also as a principal, in the contract of sale, and is consequently affected by its obligations. It may be remarked in this place, that as the contractor of a marriage is merely a negotiator, so where a person becomes empowered to contract on both sides, his single declaration “I have contracted,” comprehends both the declaration and the acceptance, and consequently there is in this instance no occasion for two separate sentences.†

* This proceeds upon a supposition that the guardian is not within the prohibited degrees, and that no other proper person offers.

Cases of a contract executed by an unauthorized person.—If a man should contract in marriage the slave of another without the owner's consent, and validity of the deed is suspended upon the will of the Owner; if he approve, it is lawful; if he disapprove, it is null.

In the same manner, if a man contract a woman in marriage without her knowledge in the presence of two witnesses, or if a woman contract a man in marriage without his consent, the validity is suspended upon the same circumstance.—This is an opinion of our doctors; because they hold that in a case of a contract entered into by a Fazoolee or unauthorized person, and to which there exists any person who has a right assent, the same stands as a complete contract, the validity of which is suspended upon that person’s approbation.—Shafei maintains that all acts whatever of a Fazoolee are null; because the use of a contract is for the purpose of establishing its effect, like that of sale, for instance, which is used for the purpose of establishing a right of property, and that of marriage for the purpose of establishing a right of enjoyment; and Fazoolee is incapable of establishing the effect, on account of his want of authority; wherefore the act of the Fazoolee is nugatory.—The argument of our doctors is, that the foundation of the contract, namely, declaration and acceptance, has proceeded from a competent person (that is, from one who is sane and adult), and has reference to its proper subject; neither can any injury be sustained if the contract be executed, inasmuch as there exists, in respect to it, a person who has a right of assent, and who, if he think proper, will signify such assent, and give the contract force, or, if otherwise, will reject it: and in reply to what is urged by Shafei, we observe that the effect of a contract is sometimes deferred to a period subsequent to the time or date of the contract; as in a contract of sale under a condition of possession is deferred until such time as the condition of option drops.

If an unauthorized person say to two persons, “Be ye witness that I have married such a woman who is absent;” and afterwards the woman hear of it, and consent, yet the marriage is void: but if, on the unauthorized person speaking as above, a third person were to say, “I have married that woman to that man,” and the woman on hearing it should consent, the marriage is lawful. And, in like manner, if a woman should say “Be ye witness that I have contracted myself to such a man who is absent,” and the man should afterwards hear of it and consent, the marriage would, notwithstanding, be void; but if, on the woman thus speaking, a bystander were to say, “Be ye witness that I give consent on behalf of such a person;” and the man, on hearing of it, should give his consent, the marriage is valid.

This is the doctrine of Haneefa. Aboo Yoo-saf alleges that if a woman were to say, “I have contracted myself to such a man" (he being absent), and the man, on afterwards receiving intelligence of this, were to declare his assent, the marriage is valid. In short, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, one person is not competent to act as a Fazoolee in a contract of marriage, either on behalf of both parties, or as a Fazoolee on one side, and a principal on the other; whereas Aboo Yoosaf holds a contrary opinion. But, if two unauthorized persons enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of both parties,—that is, to say, one on the part of the man, and the other on that of the woman,—or, if the persons enter into such a contract, one as a Fazoolee, and the other as a principal,—it is lawful, with our doctors (Haneefa, Mohammed, and Aboo Yoosaf). The argument of Aboo Yoosaf, in the case before stated, is that one person may in marriage stand as two, and the declaration of that person may be considered as two declarations* (whence it is that if one person be authorized by both parties, the marriage is effected by his single declaration); and, in the case of an unauthorized person, the only difference is, that the validity of the contract remains suspended upon the ultimate consent of the parties, as in a case of Khoola, where if a man were to declare that "he had repudiated his wife by the form of Khoola for such a consideration" (the wife being absent), and she were afterwards to receive intelligence of this, and to assent, the Khoola is lawful; and so also, in a case of divorce or of manumission, where if a man were to declare that he had divorced his wife for one thousand Dirms (she being absent), and intelligence of this reach her, and she consent,—or, a man declare that "he has emancipated such an one, his slave, for a recompense of one thousand Dirms" (the slave being absent), and the latter, hearing of this assent, the proceeding is lawful.—To this Haneefa and Mohammad reply that, in the case before recited, the declaration of the unauthorized person, "I have contracted such a woman to such a man," or, "I have married such a woman," amounts to a contract on one part only, which is not valid, wherefore the legality of it is not suspended upon the consent of the parties, as its completion rests on the reply, which is not approved unless it proceed from a person present in the assembly or company where the contract is made, and during the continuance of that company; and, like a sale, it is incapable of being protracted to any person, on the contrary, acts on the authority of both parties, the contract is valid, because here his declaration applies equally to both; and where the contract is entered into by two unauthorized persons (acting for, or, as it were, representing the respective parties), it is complete, as it here possesses all the essential properties of contract; and so also in cases of Khoola or of divorce, or manumission for a compensation (as cited by Aboo Yoosaf), because in such instances the declaration stands as a conditional vow on the part of the husband or the master, so as to be binding upon him, and from which he cannot with propriety retract; and hence the engagement is completed solely by him.

*That is to say, "as the proposal and the acceptance," or, in other words, "as the declaration and the consent."
MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER III.
OF THE MIHR OR DOWER.
Marriage without a dower is valid.—A marriage is valid, although no mention be made of the dower by the contracting parties, because the term Nikkah, in its literal sense, signifies a contract of union, which is fully accomplished by the junction of a man and woman; moreover, the payment of dower is enjoined by the law, merely as a token of respect for its object (the man), wherefore the mention of it is not absolutely essential to the validity of a marriage:—and, for the same reason, a marriage is also valid, although the man were to engage in the contract on the special condition that there should be no dower: but this is contrary to the doctrine of Malik.

Ten Dirms the lowest legal dower.—The smallest dower is ten Dirms*—Shafeei says that whatever sum may be lawful as the price of a commodity in purchase and sale, is lawful as a dower, because the dower is the right of the woman, and consequently it must depend upon herself to determine the amount of it. The arguments of our doctors in this case are twofold; First, a precept of the Prophet, which expressly declares, "There is no dower under ten Dirms." Secondly, the law enjoins a dower with a view to manifest respect for the wife, wherefore it must be fixed, in its smallest degree, at such a sum as may be respectable; and this is ten Dirms, that being the lowest amount of a theft inducing the punishment of amputation of a limb, which shows that such sum is the least that can be regarded in an important or respectable light.

Case of a dower of ten Dirms.—If a man assigns, as a dower, a sum under ten Dirms, yet his wife shall receive the whole ten Dirms, according to our doctors.—Ziffer alleges that she shall receive a Mihr-Misl, or proper dower; because where the sum specified is so small as not to bear the construction of a dower, it is the same as if none whatever had been named.—The argument of our doctors is, that the impropriety of naming a stipulating so small a sum is on account of the injunction of the law, which cannot be fulfilled with less than ten Dirms, and the woman will certainly be satisfied with ten Dirms, as she had agreed to accept of less than ten; neither is it proper to take an example, in this case, from that in which no dower whatever has been named, because it may sometimes happen that a woman may grant the right of possession without any return, and out of pure love; but no woman will agree to a trifling return. And here, if the husband were to divorce the wife before consummation, her due on account of the dower is five Dirms, according to our three doctors. Ziffer holds that she is in this case entitled only to a Matat, or present, the same as would be due where no dower had been named.—The meaning of the term Matat shall be hereafter fully explained.

The wife entitled to her whole dower upon the consummation of the marriage or the death of the husband.—If a person specify a dower of ten or more Dirms, and should afterwards consummate his marriage, or be removed by death, his wife, in either case, has a claim to the whole of the dower specified, because, by consummation, the delivery of the return for the dower, namely, the Booza, or woman’s person,* is established, and therein is confirmed the right to the consideration, namely, the dower; and, on the other hand, by the decease of the husband, the marriage is rendered complete, and every thing becomes established and confirmed by its completion, and consequently is so with respect to all its effects.

And to one-half, upon divorce before consummation.—If the husband, in the case now stated, were to divorce his wife before consummation, or Khalwas Saheeh,† she in this case, receives half her specified dower; God having command, saying, "If ye divorce them before ye have touched them, and have already settled a dower upon what ye shall pay them one-half of what ye have settled."

Objection.—It would here appear that the whole dower should of right drop, because the object of the contract reverts to the woman untouched, the same as in sale, where the whole price drops, if the buyer and seller break off the contract.

Reply.—There are two analogical conclusions applicable to this subject; First, what is recited in the above objection: Secondly it would appear that the whole dower is due, because the husband did not make use of his possession, but suffered it to pass from him untouched of his own choice; as in sale, where the whole price of a purchase is due, if the purchaser suffer the goods to perish in the hands of the seller; and these two conclusions directly contradicting each other, they are both abandoned, and we adhere to the sacred text as above.—This case supposes

*The value of the Dirm is very uncertain. Ten Dirms, according to one account, make about six shillings and eighthpence sterling.

†Retirement, solus cum sola, where there is no legal or natural impediments to the commission of the carnal act. It is elsewhere translated, complete retirement.
the divorce to take place before Khalwat, or retirement, because that with a wife is held by our doctors to amount to carnal knowledge, as shall be hereafter explained.

Where no dower is stipulated in the contract, the wife receives her proper dower.—If a man marry a woman without specifying any dower, or on the express stipulation that she shall not have a dower, and he either have carnal connexion with her, or die, she is in that case entitled to her Mihr-Mubin proper dower;—Shafei alleges that where the husband dies, nothing whatever remains due: but many of his disciples and followers admit that the woman’s proper dower is due in case of carnal connexion. The argument of Shafei is, that the dower is purely a right of the woman; whence it is in her power to relinquish it a priori, for the same reason as she is at liberty to remit it afterwards.—To this our doctors reply that in the dower are involved rights of three different descriptions; the First, the right of the husband shall not consist of less than ten Dirms (as has been already said); the Second, the right of the guardians, which is that it shall not be short of the woman’s proper dower; and the Third, the right of the woman, which is that it shall become her property. Now the right of the law and the right of the guardians are to be regarded in the execution of the contract, but not its continuance; consequently, in the continuance, the dower is the right of the woman solely; and hence it is that she is empowered to give it up or relinquish it in the continuance of the contract, but not a priori.

Or a present, in case of divorce before consummation.—If a man marry a woman without any specification of a dower, or on condition that there be no dower, and divorce her before carnal connexion, the woman in this case receives a Matat, or present; God having commanded, saying, “GIVE HER A PRESENT, THE RICH ACCORDING TO HIS WEALTH, AND THE POOR ACCORDING TO HIS POVERTY.” Thus a present is incumbent upon the husband on the authority of the sacred writings:—but this is contrary to the doctrine of Malik.—The Matat, or present, here mentioned, is to consist of three pieces of dress, composed of such materials as are suitable to the woman to whom it is given; and these are, the Dirra, or shift; the Khoomar, or veil; and the Mulhaffet, or outer garment. The quantity is determined at three pieces of dress, on the authority of Aysha and Ibn Abbas.—From the restriction of the present to such materials as are suitable to the woman, it would appear that, in the adjustment, regard should be had to the woman’s state and condition (and such is the doctrine of Koorokhee), because it is a sort of substitute for the woman’s proper dower:—but the more approved doctrine on this point is, that regard be had solely to the state and condition of the husband, because of the words of the sacred text before quoted,—“The rich according to his wealth, and the poor according to his poverty.”—It is to be remarked, that the present must not exceed in value one-half of the woman’s proper dower, or nor be worth less than five Dirms: the same is recorded in the Mabsoot.

Case of dower specified after marriage.—If a man marry a woman without naming any dower, and the parties should afterwards agree to a dower, and specify its amount, such dower goes to the woman, if the husband either consummate the marriage or die; but if he divorce her before consummation, she receives only a present. With Aboo Yoosaf she, in this case, receives one-half of the dower specified (and such also is the opinion of Shafei), because here the dower has been made obligatory and specifically determined, and consequently one-half is due according to the words of the text, “Ye shall pay them one-half of what ye have settled.” The argument of our doctors is that, in the present case, the specification of the dower identifies a thing which was due on account of the contract, to wit, the woman’s proper dower, and as this is incapable of subdivision, consequently that which is its substitute cannot be halved.—With respect to the text above quoted, it is to be regarded as applying solely to what has been agreed to and specified at the period of the contract: this being agreeable to what is customary.

Case of an addition made to the dower after marriage.—If a man make any addition to the dower in behalf of his wife subsequent to the contract, such addition is binding upon him.—This is contrary to the doctrine of Ziffer, as shall be demonstrated in treating of an increase of price in a contract of sale.—But although such after-addition to the dower be thus approved, yet it drops in consequence of divorce before consummation.—According to an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, the woman is entitled to the half of the additional together with that of the original dower.—The cause of this difference of opinion is that, with Haceefa and Mohammed, nothing is halved but what has been rendered obligatory, and specifically determined; whereas Aboo Yoosaf holds that whatever is engaged for after the contract to be the same as that which is made obligatory in the contract, and therefore considers it as subject to the same rule.

A wife may remit the whole dower.—If a woman exonerate her husband from any part, or even from the whole, of the dower, it is approved; because after the execution of the contract, it is her sole right (as was already explained), and the case supposes her dereliction of it to take place at a subsequent period.

Case of Khalwat-Sahih, or retirement.—If a man retire with his wife, and there be no legal or natural obstruction to the commission of the carnal act, and he afterwards divorce her, the whole dower in this case goes to her;—Shafei maintains that she is here to receive no more than her half dower, because the husband cannot obtain possession of the object of the contract but by actual coition; and the right to the dower is not corroborated and confirmed without enjoyment. — The argument of our doctors is, that the woman has completed her part of the contract, by delivering up her person, and by removing all obstructions, which is the extent of her ability; her right to the recompense is therefore confirmed and corroborated; in the same manner as in cases of sale, where, if the seller has offered delivery of the goods sold, and there be nothing to obstruct seisin on the part of the purchaser, and the latter neglect to make seisin, he is considered as having made seisin, and the purchase is afterwards as a trust in the hands of the seller, and the whole of the price is obligatory upon the purchaser.

Circumstances in which retirement does not imply consummation. — If a man retires with his wife whilst one of them is sick, or fasting in the month of Ramzan, or in the Ithram of a pilgrimage, whether obligatory or voluntary, or voluntary retirement at the shrine of the Prophet (termed an Amrit), or whilst the woman is in her courses — this is not regarded as a Khawlat-Saheeh, or complete retirement, insomuch, that if the man were to divorce his wife after such a retirement, the woman is entitled to her half dower only; because all the above circumstances are bars to the carnal act; — sickness, from the weakness and imbecility with which it is attended, or from its rendering the commission of the carnal act injurious to one or the other of the parties; — and fasting in Ramzan because it would induce upon the party a necessity of expiation and atonement; — and pilgrimage, or visitation, because it would induce a necessity of atonement by sacrifice; — and the woman's courses, because they oppose an obstruction both natural and legal.

Exception. — But if one of the parties be observing a Nifl [voluntary] fast only, the woman is entitled to her whole dower, because the breach of such a fast is a matter of indifference; a fast of atonement, or in consequence of a vow, is the same as a voluntary fast in this respect, and for the same reason.

Case of retirement of an eunuch. — If a Majboob eunuch retire with his wife, and afterwards divorce her, she is entitled to her whole dower, according to Haneefa. — The two disciples maintain that the half dower only goes to her, on account that a Majboob is still more incapacitated than a sick person: contrary to the case of an Ineen (or one naturally impotent), because the point of law rests upon the existence of the instrument of generation, which is there found, but not in the former case. — Haneefa on the other hand, argues, that all which is due on the part of the woman is the delivery of her person (by admitting the husband to feel and touch her), and this being, to the extent of her ability, completely performed, it follows that the consideration is completely due to her.

It is incumbent upon the woman to observe an Edit (or appointed term of probation), after the divorce, in all the cases here recited, for the sake of caution, on a principle of propriety, from the apprehension or possibility of her womb being occupied by seed. The Edit is, moreover, a right of the law and of the foetus; and credit is not to be given to the parties that they have not committed the carnal act, because this (in precluding the necessity of Edit) would amount to an extinction of rights (as above specified) distinct and separate from these of the parties; but it is otherwise with the dower, because that is a matter of property, the right in which cannot be decided upon principles of caution (like the Edit), nor under any circumstance admitting of doubt; the dower, therefore, is not due, where retirement is not of the description of Khawlat-Saheeh. Kadooree, in his commentary upon his own work, has observed that, if the obstruction to the carnal act be merely of a legal nature (such as fasting), the observance of Edit is incumbent, because here the natural ability to the performance of the act is supposed: but if the obstruction be of a positive nature (such as sickness or infancy), the Edit is not requisite, because the ability to perform the act does not here exist.

Case in which the present to the wife is laudable, or incumbent. — It is laudable to bestow a Matat, or present, upon every woman divorced by her husband, excepting two descriptions of woman, namely, one whose dower, has been stipulated, and whose husband divorce her before consummation — and one whose dower has not been stipulated and who is also divorced before consummation; for in their behalf a present is not merely laudable, but incumbent. Shafei says, that a present is incumbent in behalf of every divorced woman, excepting one whose dower has been stipulated, and who is divorced before consummation; because the present is made incumbent in the way of a gratuity, or compensatory gift, from the husband, on account of his having thrown the woman into a forlorn state by his separation from her; but, in the excepted instance, the half dower is a substitute for the present, as divorce is here a dissolution of the contract, and the present need not be bestowed repeatedly. The argument of our doctors is, that the present is a substitute for the proper dower in the case of a resigned woman (that is, a woman who resigns herself to her husband without a dower), on account that, as the proper dower drops, the present becomes incumbent; because, in a contract of marriage, a return is essential: the present, therefore, is a substitute for the proper dower and such being the case, it must not be required in addition either of the whole dower, which is the original thing, or to any part of it: whence the present is not incumbent where any part of the dower in due. As to what Shafei advances, that 'the present is made incumbent in the way of a gratuity, or compensatory gift, from the husband, on account of his having thrown the woman into a forlorn state by his separation from her,'—we reply, that this act of his does not amount to an offence, as the husband is privileged by the law to do so, wherefore no recompense is due from him on that account; and hence it is that the present is regarded merely as respectful and laudable.

Case of a reciprocal bargain between two contractors.—If a person contract his daughter, or his sister in marriage to another, on the condition of the other bestowing a dowry or a gift in marriage upon him, so as that such contract shall stand as a return for the other, respectively, both the contracts are lawful. Shafei maintains that both the contracts are null, as they make one half of the woman's person, reciprocally, a dower, and the other half the subject of marriage; because, where the person marries his daughter to the other, and also constitutes her the dower for the other's daughter, it follows that the daughter's person is divided between the other person and his daughter—one half to that person, as husband, in virtue of the marriage, and the other half to his daughter as her dower; and as the matrimonial possession, or propriety, is incapable of being participate (since it is ordained as a complete enjoyment, and not as a participated one), it follows that the bargain is nugatory. To this our doctors reply, that the contract or has named, as a dower, a thing incapable of being so (since a woman's person, in the sense it here bears, is incapable of being the property of a woman);—but yet the contract holds good, and a Mihr Misl, or proper dower, remains due to each of the women, the same as where nun or a hog are assigned as a dower.—With respect to what Shafei urges, that 'the matrimonial propriety is incapable of being participated,'—it is admitted; but this participation is not induced in the present case, as the person of either of the daughters is not made the right of the other daughter in virtue of the contract.

Case of marriage on a condition of service from the husband.—If a free man marry a woman, on the condition, in return of serving her for a stated time (a year, for instance), or of teaching her the Koran, yet her performance is not implied upon him, withstanding, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosof, Mohammad has said that she is, in this case, to receive a sum amounting to the estimated value of his service for one year. But if a slave, by his owner's consent, marry a woman on the same terms, it is lawful and the woman is entitled to the stipulated service only. Shafei is of opinion that the woman is entitled merely to the service whatever may be lawfully required in either of these cases; because return, is capable of constituting a dower, as a mutual exchange may be thereby effected, and consequently the case is the same as if the man had married the woman on condition of a stated service to be performed by another person, or on a stipulation of himself watching her flocks for a stated period. The arguments of our doctors, on this point, are twofold:—First, the possession of a woman's person is not to be sought (that is to say, to desire, it is not lawful), except in lieu of property; but teaching the Koran is not property; neither does usufruct constitute property (according to the sentiments of our doctors), because that is not substantial or permanent, whereas property is a thing of a permanent nature, and what constitutes actual wealth; service therefore, not being property, to seek the possession, of a woman's person, in return for the services of a freeman, in unlawful:—contrary to a case where a slave obtains a woman in marriage on the condition of his serving her, since here possession is sought for that which is actual property, the service of a slave being considered as such because this comprehends a surrender or delivery of the slave's person, and the person of a slave is actual property, and of course the usufruct thereof; wherefore it is analogous to the bestowing of the slave himself as a dower: but with a husband who is free this cannot be the case: Secondly, it is not lawful that a woman should be in a situation to exact the service of her husband who is a freeman, as this would amount to a reversal of their appointed stations. For none of the requisites of marriage is that the woman be as a servant, and the man as the servant served; but if the service of the husband to the wife were to constitute her dower, it would follow that the husband is as the servant and the wife as the served: and this being a violation of the requisites of marriage, is therefore illegal; but it is otherwise with the service stipulated to be performed by another free person, with that person's consent, as this offers no violence to the requisites of the contract; and so also in the case of service of a slave, because the service performed by a slave to his wife is, in fact, performed to his master, by whose consent it is that he undertakes it; and the same with the case of tending flocks, because this is a service of a permanent nature, and admitted to be performed for wives, and therefore does not violate the requisites of marriage; for the service of the husband to his wife, as a dower, is prohibited only as it may be degrading to the former: but the tending of flocks is not a degrading office.

was already observed) that the woman is, in this case, entitled to receive a sum amounting, to this estimated value of the service, because he maintains that what was stipulated (to wit, the service) is properly, but of such a nature as it is not in the husband's power to make delivery of, since by such an act he would violate the requisites of marriage; the case, therefore, is the same as if a man were to marry a woman, assigning, as a dower, a slave, the property of another, in which case he would have to pay the woman the value of such slave, Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, hold that the woman is entitled to a proper dower; because they maintained that the service here stipulated is not property, as a woman cannot legally exact service of her husband, being a freeman, in any situation whatever lest a reversal of stations should be induced, as was just observed; the naming, therefore, of service as a dower, is the same as naming wine, or a hog; for, not being capable of legal delivery, it is not a subject of appreciation; and such being the case, resource is had to the original rule in defect of any dower, and this dictates a proper dower.

Cases of a wife remitting or returning the dower to her husband, either wholly or in part.—If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms, and the woman make seisin of the said thousand, and then present the same to him, and he take possession of such gift, and afterwards divorce her before consummation, the husband, in this case, has a claim upon his wife for five hundred Dirms, because he is not considered, in law, as having received, in the form of the gift, that identical thing which becomes obligatory upon his wife in consequence of divorce before consummation, since money is incapable of identification either in the fulfilment or the annulment of contracts. So also, if the dower consist not of money, but of articles of weight or measurement of capacity, as iron or copper.—But if the wife were to make a gift to her husband of the thousand Dirms, without having herself been in possession of the same, and he were afterwards to divorce her before consummation, in this case neither party has any claim whatever upon the other. This proceeds upon a favourable construction; for analogy would suggest that the husband should receive from his wife the amount of half the dower, because the whole dower remains untouched with the husband in consequence of the gift, which amounted to a discharge, but the wife does not appear to be discharged from what becomes obligatory upon her in consequence of divorce before consummation.—The reason for a more favourable construction of the law upon this point is that the identical thing which becomes obligatory upon the wife in favour of the husband, in consequence of divorce before consummation, has come to him, in his being discharged from half the dower (through the wife's gift), and the end being thus obtained, any difference in the manner in which it is obtained will not be regarded.—that is to say, the end was, that the husband should recover half the dower after divorce before consummation, and that end has been obtained, not indeed through divorce, but through antecedent gift, which answers the same purpose.

If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms and the woman make seisin of five hundred Dirms, and afterwards make a gift to her husband of the whole thousand, as well of the portion in her possession, as of that which she has not received,—or of the latter only,—and the husband afterwards divorce her before consummation, neither party in this case, has any claim upon the other, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples maintain that the husband has, in this case, a claim upon the wife for one half of that proportion of which she had possession; because they conceive of a part from the whole;—that is to say, if the wife were to make a gift of the whole dower to her husband, without having herself made previous seisin of any part thereof, the husband has no claim to resume anything out of it;—and, on the contrary, if she were first to make seisin of the dower, and then to make a gift of the same to her husband, he would have a claim of resumption upon her for one half; and consequently, when she has made seisin of any particular part or portion of it, has a claim of resumption upon her for the half of that part of which she had made seisin; and again, on the other hand, because a gift of any part of the dower to the husband amounts to an abatement with respect to that part, and is therefore altogether excluded from the contract;* and consequently, when the gift is of that half which had remained unseised, it is the same as if the contract had regarded the half only (as where a seller, for instance, makes a gift of half the price of the commodity sold, in which case it is the same as if the price agreed upon were no more than the remaining half) and such being the case, it follows that the proportion of abatement (in consequence of gift) becomes altogether excluded from the dower, and that the half of which seisin had been made stands as the complete dower:—and as, where seisin had been made by the wife of her whole dower, and she had presented the same to her husband, he would still (upon divorce before consummation) have a claim of resumption upon her for one half (as has been shown in

*The phrase in the original is remarkable, "LEHAZA YEWLUKKO B'ASSIL AL AKID,"—"and therefore is connected with the origin of the contract;"—that is to say,—with a period antecedent to the contract, and consequently not included in it. The term here adopted appears to be the clearest by which the translator could express the sense.
If a man marries a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms, and she makes a gift to him of a part less than the half—two hundred, for instance,—and take possession of the remainder, and the husband afterwards divorces her before consummation, he has, in this case (according to Aboo Haneefa), a claim of resumption upon her for such a sum as together with what she had previously bestowed upon him, makes a moiety of the whole, namely (in the supposition before mentioned) three hundred Dirms:—according to the two disciples, on the contrary, his claim of resumption is for the half of what the woman had made seizin of, namely, four hundred Dirms.

The same when the dower consists of effects

—If a man marry a woman on a dower consisting of certain specified effects, and she make a gift of the same to him, either before or after seizin, and he afterwards divorces her before consummation, he, in this case, has no claim of resumption whatever upon the woman—This proceeds upon it favourable to construction.—Analogy would suggest that he should have a claim to the amount of the value of half the effects, because here it becomes obligatory upon the woman to make restitution of half the dower, as was already explained, and she is incapacitated from making restitution by delivery of half the actual effects, in consequence of her gift; wherefore it would appear that she should make it by paying the estimated value of one half.—But the reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this case is, that the husband who is entitled to recover from the woman one half of what she had taken possession of, in consequence of his having divorced her before consummation, has already actually obtained this (through her gift); whence it is that the woman would not be at liberty to give her husband any other thing in lieu of those effects, because the consideration consists of a thing capable of identical specification, and of course the said effects, which have been in possession of the woman, and by her made over in gift to the husband, and constitute a dower of a certain specific description; thus the husband appears to have received that actual thing which had been rendered obligatory upon the wife by divorce before consummation:—contrary to the case of a dower consisting of a debt; for here, if the wife were to make seizin of such debt, and then to make a gift of the same to her husband, and he afterwards divorces her, as above, he would, in this case have a claim of resumption upon the woman, which one half of the dower, because a debt of this nature is, like money, incapable of identical specification:—and contrary, also, to a case where a woman, having taken possession of effects, as a dower (as was stated in the preceding case), sell such effects to her husband, because, in this case, they have come back to him for a consideration and his claim is to the recovery of the half of her dower without any consideration.—And if the dower consist of an animal, or of effects, which are a debt upon the husband,* the rule is the same as in the case of one consisting of specified effects; because the thing seized by the woman is of such a nature as, if she had herself borrowed it, must be restored by her in substance; and articles of this description are all capable of identical specification.

Cases of stipulation in behalf of the wife

—If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms,† on a condition that he is not to carry her out of her native city; or that he is not to marry another woman in his matrimonial connexion with her; and another woman, in this case, if he observe the condition, the woman is entitled to the above specified dower only, as that consists of a sum sufficient to constitute a legal dower, and she has agreed to accept it; but if he should infringe the condition, by either carrying her out of her native city, or marrying another woman, she is in this case entitled to her proper dower, because he had acceded to a condition on behalf for the woman, which was advantageous to her, and that not being fulfilled, the woman is nor supposed to be satisfied with the thousand Dirms, and must therefore be paid her complete proper dower; the same as in a case where a woman had agreed to accept of one thousand Dirms, as a dower, on condition of being treated with reverence, and not subjected to any laborious work; or of being presented with a rich dress, and so forth.

*That is to say, an animal, or effects, which had been borrowed or procured upon credit by the husband.

†This case proceeds on the supposition of one thousand Dirms being of less value than the woman's proper dower.
MARRIAGE.

If a man marry a woman, stipulating the dower at one thousand Dirms, provided he should not carry her out of her native city, but stay and reside there with her,—or at two thousand, if he should carry her thence,—in this case, if he continue to reside with her in the said city, she is entitled to the thousand Dirms only; but if he carry her thence she becomes entitled to her proper dower, where that does not exceed two thousand, nor fall short of one thousand.—This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that both conditions are equally valid, inasmuch that, as if he were to continue to reside with her in the city aforesaid, she would receive the one thousand Dirms only, so if he carry her thence, she becomes entitled to two thousand. Oiffir, on the other hand, maintains that both the conditions are null and that the woman shall, in either event, receive her proper dower, where that does not exceed two thousand Dirms, nor fall short of one thousand.—This case is founded upon what occurs in the book of Hire, where a man says to a tailor, "If you make me up this robe within the day, I shall pay you one Dirm; or if you finish it by to-morrow, you shall have half a Dirms;"—as will be hereafter explained.

Cases of a dower consisting of property unidentified.—If a man marry a woman agreeing to give her, as a dower, either of two slaves unspecified,—as if he were to say "Make one of these two the dower"—and the slaves be of different value,—in this case, where the woman's proper dower is under the rate of the slave of less value, she receives that one; or if it exceed the rate of the more valuable slave, she receives that one; and if it exceed the former, and fall short of the latter, she then receives her proper dower. This is according to Aboo Yoosaf.—The two disciples agree that the least valuable slave goes to her in all these circumstances. But if the husband divorce her without consummation, she in that case becomes entitled to half the price of the least valuable slave only, according to all the doctors.—The argument of the two disciples, in this case, is that the proper dower is not to be held obligatory, unless where the stipulated dower is of such a nature as renders an obligation with respect to that impossible; but it is possible with respect to the least valuable slave, because that one is undoubtedly,* and is therefore obligatory; the same as in a case of Khoolaf or of manumission, for a compensation "of one thousand, or of two thousand," or "of that slave;"* in which case, whatever is the least value named is held to be the compensation either for Khoola or for manumission, as there can be no doubt concerning it; and so in this case also.—The argument of Haneefa, in reply to the two disciples, is that the proper dower is the radical obligation in a contract of marriage, like the price of a purchase, in a contract of sale, as that is the most equitable, being a medium adjustment neither over nor under, and consequently it is not to be deviated from, except in cases where the specification of the dower is perfect and complete; but here the specification is not complete, since neither slave has been particularly mentioned by the husband, in settling the dower, but both indefinitely: contrary to a case of Khoola or of manumission for a compensation, since in neither of these is there any implied obligatory obligation understood, independent of some particular previous agreement; for if a slave were to say to his master, "emancipate me," and the master were to reply "thou art free," or if a wife were to say to her husband, "grant me Khoola," and the husband were to reply, "I have granted Khoola," no obligation whatever would remain upon the slave or the wife; whereas, on the contrary, if a woman were to say to a man, "marry me," and he were to reply, "I have married you," her proper dower would be incumbent upon him; but where the rate of the more valuable slave falls short of the proper dower, the wife has virtually accorded to the abatement; and, in like manner, where the rate of the least valuable slave exceeds the proper dower, the husband has virtually agreed to the excess; and she then receives one or other of the slaves, as the case may be.—It is here to be observed that if divorce take place before emancipation, the wife is to receive from her husband a payment in addition to half the price of the least valuable slave: this is a rule established by custom, and must be complied with, as an obligation on the part of the husband, although the value of the present should even exceed the half price of such slave.

Or undescribed.—If a man marry a woman, assigning her, as a dower, an animal undescribed, it is approved, and the woman shall receive an animal of middling standard; but the husband has it at his option instead of this, to pay her the value of such an animal in money.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this is to be understood only where a man names the species of

*That is to say, although, with respect to the slave of greater value, a doubt might be entertained, yet with respect to the other there can be none, since that is the lowest terms offered by the party himself.

*This relates merely to the point of law in case of vague and indefinite expression; for instance, in Khoola, where the wife may say to her husband, "I will give you one or two thousand Dirms, or either of my slaves, Zeyd or Amir, for my divorce,"—in which case the law always determines the proposed compensation at the lowest value mentioned.
the animal in general, without any specific description (as if he were to say, "I will give you a dower a horse." or "an ass," without describing whether it is to be an Arabee or a T'corkee); but where he does not mention the species of the animal (as if he were to say, "I will give, as a dower, a quadrupled"); it is not lawful, and he in that case becomes liable to make good to the woman his proper dower—Shafei maintains that a proper dower is obligatory in either of the above cases, he holding that nothing is fit to be assigned as dower, in a contract of marriage, but what would he capable of appreciation in a contract of sale; and an animal underscribed, is incapable of appreciation, as being unknown, and consequently cannot constitute a dower.—The argument of our doctors is, that a contract of marriage includes an exchange of property for that which is not property (for the use of the woman's person, which is the return, cannot be termed such); and the law admits that anything may be a debt upon the person, in the course of an exchange, where there is no property in return, as in the case of Deeyat, where an hundred camels are rendered obligatory in law, their description being undefined: the dower therefore to be considered, in this respect, as a property, concerning which the man has taken an obligation upon himself a priori, in the manner of an acknowledgment: now ignorance, with respect to the actual property, does not invalidate an acknowledgment by which a person takes upon himself a priori, an obligation concerning it; as for example, if a person were to acknowledge that he owed a slave, or any thing else underscribed, his acknowledgment would be good, and the specification would rest with him.

Objection.—If the nomination of a dower be to stand the same as an acknowledgment, it follows that the nomination of an animal on account of dower is approved, although the species remain unknown,—the same as in an acknowledgment respecting property unknown,—which is not the case.

Reply.—A knowledge of the species of the animal is made a condition, in conformity with the rule, that a specified dower shall consist of property, the medium of which may be known, for the sake of both the parties; now this cannot be ascertained, except where the species is known, which comprehends a best, a worst, and a medium of the kind, for if this be unknown, the distinction cannot be made, since no medium can be ascertained amidst an infinite variety of species. But (as was already observed) the husband has it at his option, in discharging the dower, either to give the woman a medium animal of the species mentioned, or to pay her the value in money, because the medium cannot be ascertained precisely except by appreciation, and consequently the value of the animal is the standard of payment; and, on the other hand, the actual animal is the standard according to nomination.

If a man marry a woman, assigning her a dower of cloth, undescribed, she, in this case, receives her proper dower. This is where the term cloth alone is mentioned by the man, without any addition; and the reason is, that the species of cloth is here unknown and unascertainable. But if there are a variety of species.—But if he were to name the species of cloth, as if he were to say, "I will give, as a dower, a piece of Hirrooey." this manner of description is approved; and the husband has it in his option either to give a piece of Hirrooey of a middling quantity, or to pay the value in cash, for the reasons already stated. In like manner he has it at his option either to give the cloth or to pay the value, where he has been still more particular, in his description, mentioning the length, breadth, and quality of it, in a way as would suffice in a Sillim sale. This is according to the Zaw Ratwayet, and the ground upon which it proceeds is that cloth is not of the class of things denominated Zawatal-Insal, or things compensable by an equal quantity of the same species. In like manner he shall have the same option where the dower is assigned of goods, the quantity of which is ascertainable by weight or measure, provided he should not have particularly described the quality, but only the species: but if he should particularly describe the quality, he then has no option, and must pay the actual thing mentioned. because, under such description, it becomes a debt upon him, of the specific weighable or measurable articles described.

Case of a dower consisting of unlawful articles.—If a Mussulman marry a woman, agreeing to give her, as a dower, wine or a hog, the woman has her proper dower, because a condition of assenting to receive such articles is invalid; but as a contract of marriage is not rendered null by a nuyatory condition being comprehended in it, it holds good, in this case, though the condition be null: contrary to a case of sale, which is rendered null by an invalid condition. The assignment of the dower in either of the articles aforesaid is disapproved, because what is named is not property with Mussulmans; and on this principle it is that a proper dower becomes due.

Cases of false assignment.—If a man marry a woman, assigning her, as a dower, a cask of vinegar, and the cask should afterwards appear to contain wine, she, in this case, has her proper dower, according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that, in this case, she is to receive vinegar of a medium quality, and the same in quantity as the wine. And if the man were to name, as a dower, a certain specified slave (as if he were to say, "I assign this slave as a dower"), and it should afterwards appear that the person so mentioned as a slave was at that time free, to this case a proper dower is due, according to Haneefa and Mohammed.

Aboo Yoosaf says that here husband owes the estimated value of the free person aforesaid, supposing he were a slave; for he argues that the man has filled the woman with the expectation of a certain property, the delivery of which he afterwards finds impossible; the value therefore is obligatory upon him, or an article similar to that agreed for, if it be of the species of zooatal ismal, as in a case where a man marries a woman on a dower consisting of a specified slave, and the slave dies before delivery—Aboo Haneefa, on the other hand, says, that where nomination and pointed reference* are united, regard must be had to the latter, because indication is more clear and express under the former, and hence the case is the same as if the man had engaged to give, as a dower, wine or a hog.† Mohammed (coinciding with Haneefa with respect to the slave, and dissenting from him with respect to the vinegar, as aforesaid) says that it is a rule, that if the thing named be of the same species with the thing specified by pointed reference, the contract is connected with the latter; but if the thing named be of a species distinct and different from the thing pointedly specified, it [the contract] is connected with the thing named; because indication is more effectual from naming a thing, than it is from pointing that thing out, inasmuch as it is thereby known what that thing is, whereas by pointing it out the substance only is known;—on which principle it is that if a man purchase a ring stone, on the condition of its being a ruby, and it should prove to be only a garnet, the bargain is void, on account of the difference of species; but if a person were to purchase a stone on condition of its being a ruby, and it should prove to be an emerald, yet the bargain would be good, because these are held by lapidaries to be of the same species:—now, in the present instance, the slave and the free person are of one and the same species; the contract, therefore, is connected with the thing identically specified or pointed out, and on this principle her proper dower is due to the woman; but wine and vinegar being of distinct species, and totally different from each other (inasmuch as the latter is lawful in use, and the former prohibited) the contract is there connected with the thing nominally specified, and consequently the woman is entitled to vinegar in equal quantity to the wine.

If a man marry a woman, agreeing to give her, as a dower, two slaves specified, as if he were to say, "I assign, as a dower, those two slaves;" and it should happen that one of the persons so specified as slaves is free, in this case, according to Haneefa, the woman is not entitled to more than the single slave remaining, provided the value be equal to ten Dirms, because the slave is particularly assigned, and where the assigned dower is admitted to be incumbent, this prohibits the obligation to proper dower;—as where a man, for instance: marries a woman, assigning her, as a dower, a piece of cloth of the value of five Dirms, in which case the woman gets the piece of cloth aforesaid— together with five Dirms in money, in such a manner as that the whole shall amount to ten Dirms, being the lowest legal dower, beyond which nothing is incumbent. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that, in this case, the woman gets the slave, together with the amount of the estimated value of the other person, supposing he were a slave, because the man has filled her with expectation of two slaves, the delivery of one of which afterwards appears to be impossible; wherefore the value of the latter is obligatory upon him. Mohammed has said (and there is also one opinion recorded of Haneefa to the same effect) that the woman gets the slave, together with a property sufficient to complete her proper dower, if that should exceed the value of the slave; because, if both the persons named as slaves by the husband, in specifying the dower, were actually free, the whole proper dower (according to Mohammed) would be due; and consequently, where one only is a slave that slave is due, together with such property as (along with the slave) amounts to a proper dower.

A woman is not entitled to any dower under an invalid marriage dissolved by the consummation.—If the Kazee separate a man from his wife, before cohabitation, on account of their marriage being invalid, the woman is not entitled to any part of her dower, because, where the marriage is invalid, no obligation with respect to dower is involved in the contract, as that, in such a case, is also null; nor is the dower held to be due on any other ground than the fruition of the conubial enjoyment, which is not found in the present instance—In the same manner no dower is due after Khalwat saheeh, or complete retirement, because, on account of the invalidity of the marriage, the law does not consider retirement as indicating the commission of the carnal act, and consequently it does not stand as such. It is, however, to be observed that in an invalid marriage a separate dower is not due on account of every repetition of the carnal act, because here the right of possession is doubtful, and the case is therefore the same as where a man has repeated carnal connexion with the slave of his son,—or where a man has repeated carnal connexion with his wife, and it should afterwards appear that he had suspended the divorce of that woman upon whom the circumstance of his marrying her,—in either of which cases one dower only is due, because of a doubt respecting the right of possession; contrary to a case where a man has repeated carnal connexion with the slave of his father, his mother, or his wife and pleads his conception of the same being lawful; for in this case a dower is incumbent upon him for every repetition of the act, because here no doubt exists, as he appears, on every repetition, to have had carnal connexion with a slave who is the absolute property of another:—and, contrary also, to a case where a man has repeated carnal connexion with a female slave held in partnership between himself and another, for in this case an half line is incumbent upon him for every repetition (according to the determination in the Burnhal Aima of Abdul-azeex-Ibn Amrou), because he has every time committed the carnal act in the share of his partner.

*Tasmeeat and Isharet: the former term means simply naming a thing, or (as expressed above) nomination; by the latter is understood pointing a thing out, such as "This slave," &c.

†This is to say, the condition is altogether void, and a proper dower is of course due: for if the man were to say, "I will give as a dower this slave," and the person so spoken of should appear to be free, it is evident (regard being had to the relative "this," deporting pointed reference) that the condition of agreement is ipso facto null, as regarding a thing which does not exist.

But in case of consummation, she is entitled to her proper dower, not exceeding what is specified in the contract.—If a man engage with a woman in an invalid marriage, and have carnal connexion with her, she is in this case entitled to her proper dower: but she is not entitled to more than the specified dower, according to our doctors. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who conceives an analogy between this and an invalid sale, that is to say, in an invalid sale, if the stipulated price of the thing sold be short of its actual value the latter is due to whatever amount; and so also in the present case. The argument of our doctors, in this case, is that the thing which the husband has received (namely, the possession of the woman's person) is not property, and therefore is not appreciable in any other way than by the assignment of a dower; now if a dower assigned should exceed the proper dower, the excess is not incumbent, because of the invalidity of the assignment, for that is a part of the contract, which being invalid, the assignment is so likewise, and, on the other hand, if the dower assigned be short of the proper dower, the difference is not incumbent because, with respect to that, assignment has not been made; contrary to an invalid sale, because there the thing sold is appreciable, and consequently the amount of the return will be adjusted by its value.

*That is to say, if her proper dower should exceed in value the dower specified in the contract, yet the woman is entitled to the specified dower only, and not to her proper dower.

And she must observe an Edit after separation.—The observance of an Edit, after separation, is incumbent upon a woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion in an invalid marriage. And here the Edit is to commence as from the date of separation, and not from that of the last carnal connexion.

A child born in an illegal marriage is of established descent.—The descent of a child born of a woman enjoyed in an illegal marriage is established [in the reputed father], because in this, regard is had to the child's preservation, since if the descent were not to be established, the child might perish for want of care. Mohammed holds (and decrees are passed agreeable to this doctrine) that, in the establishment of genealogy under an invalid marriage, the term is calculated from the first carnal connexion, not from the date of the marriage, because one which is invalid does not give a claim to the carnal act, so as to stand as such, whereas the reverse is the case in a valid marriage, as that establishes such claim: and hence, in the establishment of genealogy, the time is calculated from the date of the marriage.

Rate of the Mīhr Misf, or proper dower.—The Mīhr Misf (or proper dower) of any woman is to be regulated, in its amount or value, by that of the dower of her paternal relations, such as her paternal sister or aunts, or the daughter of her paternal uncles, and so forth, according to a precept of Ibn Mussaad. 'To the woman belongs such a dower as is usually assigned to her female paternal relatives':—moreover, men are accounted of the class of their paternal tribe, and the value of a thing cannot be estimated but by attending to the value set upon its class.

A woman's proper dower is not to be estimated by the dower of her mother or her maternal aunt, where they are not descended of her father's family, on account of the precept of Ibn Mussaad already recorded; yet if her mother should be descended of her father's family (being for instance, the daughter or his paternal uncle), in this case a judgment may be formed from her dower, as being descended from the family of the father.

In regulating the proper dower of a woman, attention must be paid to her quality with the woman from whose dowers the rule is to be taken, in point of age, beauty, fortune, understanding, and virtue, because it varies according to any difference in all these circumstances; and, in like manner, it differs according to place of residence, or time (that is to say, times of trouble and confusion, as opposed to time to tranquility); and the learned in the law have observed that equality is also to be regarded.

*The probable term of pregnancy, by which the child's descent is to be judged of and ascertained. (For a further elucidation of this point see Book of Divorce, Chap. XIII.)

in point of virginity, because the dower is different according as the woman may be a virgin or otherwise.

A woman's guardian may become surety for her dower.—If the Walee (guardian) of a woman become surety for her dower, it is approved, because he is competent to such responsibility (that is, to take such obligation upon himself), and he is surety in a thing which is a legal subject of bail (namely, the dower), since that is a debt, in which bail is approved; and the woman is afterwards at liberty to require her dower either of her husband or of her guardian, as in all other cases of bail; and if the guardian pay the dower, he shall take the same from the woman's husband, where he has become surety at his desire, as is the invariable rule in bail. The bail is like manner approved, if the wife be an infant: contrary to where a father sells the property of his infant child, and becomes bail for the amount which is not lawful, because a guardian is with respect to marriage, a negotiator merely; but in sale, he is the executor of the contract (whence it is that its obligations rest upon him, and its rights appertain to him); and the father's discharge is also approved, if he clear the purchaser of the whole price of the infant's property; and he is moreover at liberty to take possession of the price after the infant shall have attained maturity; wherefore, if his bail were to be approved, it would admit the principle of a man becoming surety in his own behalf, which is absurd.

Objection.—A father is at liberty to take possession of the dower of his infant daughter, in the same manner as of the price of his infant child's property; wherefore if the bail of the father with respect to the dower be approved, it follows that he is bail in his own behalf.

Reply.—The authority vested in a father to take possession of the dower is because of his parental relation, and not on account of his being a party in the contract (for which reason it is that he is not at liberty to take possession of the dower after the maturity of his child), so that he does not in this case, appear to be bail in his own behalf.

A woman may resist consummation until she be paid the prompt proportion of the dower.—A woman may refuse to admit her husband to a carnal connexion until she receive her dower of him, so as that her right may be maintained to the return, in the same manner as that of her husband to the object for which the return is given, as in sale.

A woman is also at liberty to resist her husband carrying her upon a journey until she shall have received her dower of him, for the same reason.

On the other hand the husband has no power to restrain his wife from going on a journey, or from going abroad, or visiting her friends, until such time as she shall have discharged the whole of the Mihr Moajil, or prompt dower, because a husband's right to confine his wife at home is solely for the sake of securing to himself the enjoyment of her person, and his right to such enjoyment does not exist until after the payment of the return for it.

Unless the whole dower be deferable.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the whole dower, or a certain portion of it, being Moajil, or prompt; but if the whole is Moajil, or deferred, the woman is not at liberty to refuse the embraces of her husband, as she has dropped her right by agreeing to make her dower Moajil, - the same as in a case of sale, where if the price of the article sold be made deferable, the seller is not at liberty to detain the article sold on account of the price.

Aboo Yoosaf controverts the doctrine which is here advanced, and maintains that, in this case also, the wife is at liberty to refuse to admit her husband to carnal connexion, as long as he omits to make payment of the dower.

And she may also resist a repetition of the connexion, after consummation, in the like circumstances.—It is further to be observed, that even if the husband should have committed the carnal act, or should have been in complete retirements with the wife, yet the rule is the same; that is to say, she is still at liberty to refuse to admit him to carnal connexion, or to resist his carrying her upon a journey, until such time as she shall have received the whole of her prompt dower from him.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa.

-The two disciples, on the contrary, allege that the woman, in this case, has no such liberty of refusal or resistance, as above, does not cease, according to the united opinion of all our doctors.

But she is, notwithstanding, entitled to her subsistence.—It is proper to observe, that where the woman refuses to admit the husband to a repetition of the carnal act, as above stated, yet she has, nevertheless (according to Haneefa), a claim to her subsistence, as her refusal does not, in this case, proceed from any stubbornness or disobedience since it is not exerted in resistance to a right, but rather in maintenance of one.

-The two disciples hold that she is not entitled to any subsistence; and their argument on this occasion is, that the sole object of the contract has been duly delivered to the husband, either by the single carnal act, or by the single complete retirement, as aforesaid; on which account it is that her right to her whole dower is confirmed and

*That is to say, if the stipulation fixes the payment of the dower at some future period, as a year, or so forth. established, and consequently no right of further detention of her person remains with her: as in a case of sale, where the seller having delivered the article sold to the purchaser, before receiving the price, has no further right over it.—Haneefa, on the other hand, reasons that the woman in resisting refuses and withholds a thing which she has opposed to return to, she has, of course, a right of detention, until such return shall have been duly made to her:
and with respect to what the two disciples allege, that "her right to her whole dower is confirmed and established by the single carnal act, and so forth," it may be replied, that the whole becomes confirmed to her by a single commission of complete retirement, necessarily, because every thing beyond that is then unknown, and consequently cannot obstruct the operation of what is known;
but the right of resistance still remains in case the dower is opposed to the whole, the same as to the single instance, of enjoyment.

The husband obtains full authority over his wife upon payment of her dower.—When the husband has duly paid to his wife the whole of her dower, he is at liberty to carry her wherever he pleases, because the word of God says, "Ye shall cause them to reside in your own habitations." Some have alleged that the husband is not at liberty to carry his wife to another city different from her own, although he should have paid her the whole dower, because journeying and travelling may be injurious to her; but he is at liberty to carry her to the villages in the vicinity of her city, as this does not amount to travelling.

Cases of dispute between the parties concerning the amount of dower.—If a man marry a woman, and they afterwards dispute concerning the rate of her dower, the declarations of the wife is to be credited to the amount of her proper dower, and that of the husband, with respect to any excess. This proceeds upon a supposition of his having had carnal connexion with her; but if he should have divorced her before consummation, his declaration alone is to be credited with respect to the half dower. This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that the declaration of the husband is to be credited, whether before divorce or after, unless where it goes to establish something trifling, that is to say, something so small as is known to be short of what such a woman has a right to expect in marriage according to general usage; and this is approved. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that, in the case in question, the woman is under the stigma for an excess,
and the husband defendant; and the declaration of a defendant, when made upon oath, is to be credited; wherefore that of the husband, in the present incidence, must be so, unless he testify to something so small as that apparent circumstances argue against him; and the ground upon which this proceeds, is that the appreciation of the woman's person is a matter of necessity; and, therefore, so long as it is possible that anything can be decreed from the stipulated dower, the proper dower is not regarded.

The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed in this case is that, in all claims, credit must be given to the declaration of that person whose favour apparent circumstances bear testimony, and apparent circumstances do bear testimony with one who attests the proper dower, as that is the standard object in marriage:—similar to a case where dispute arises between a dyer and the owner of a piece of cloth, concerning the charge for dying, in which case the declaration of that person will be credited in whose behalf the value of the dye or colour bears testimony.*
Concerning what is here advanced, that "if the husband should divorce his wife before consummation, his declaration alone is to be credited with respect to the half dower," it is to be observed that this (which is recorded by Mohammed in the Jama Sagheer and Mabsoot) apparently contradicts what he has advanced in the Jama Kabeer, to wit, that "the woman must, in this case, be decreed a proportionate Matat, or present."—(which is conformable to the inference of Haneefa and Mohammed, who hold that, as a present is due, on account of a contract of marriage, after divorce, the same as a proper dower,
the former dower, the one who divorces, the husband in the former case, as well as the other in the latter;—but this apparent contradiction between the above authorities may be reconciled by advertting to the different manner in which the case is put in them respectively;
thus, in the Mabsoot, the case supposes one thousand Dirms and two thousand,—that is to say, the husband declares that the dower is only one thousand Dirms, and the wife claims two thousand; now the value of a customary present does not equal the half of these sums, of course, to decre a present here would be no advantage to the plaintiff:—in the Jama Kabeer, on the other hand, the case supposes ten Dirms, and one hundred Dirms—that is to say, the husband averts the dower to be only ten Dirms; and the wife claims one hundred;
and her proper present may be estimated, suppose at twenty Dirms; here therefore a proper present may with propriety be decreed to her; and what occurs upon this subject in the Jama Sagheer being destitute of any mention of the amount of the dower, that rests upon what is said in the Mabsoot.

*Because, as different colours bear a different price, the value of the colour used is certainly the only standard by which the amount of the charge for dying can be judged of.

†Arab. Misl: that is, proportionable to her rank and circumstances, in the same manner as the proper dower.
As a more full exposition of the doctrine of Haneeefa and Mohammed, in a case where a dispute arises between the husband and wife concerning the amount of the dower on the continuance of the marriage, let us suppose that the husband declares one thousand Dirms, for instance, and the wife claims two thousand, in which case, if the proper dower of the woman do not exceed one thousand, the declaration of the husband is to be credited; but if it be two thousand, or upward, that of the wife; and whoever of the two produces evidence in support of his or her declaration, the same is to be credited, under either of the above circumstances; and if they both produce evidence under the first of the above circumstances (that is, the woman's proper dower not exceeding one thousand Dirms), the evidence on the part of the wife is to be credited, because by such evidence her right to the excess is established; and if the second (that is, the woman's proper dower being two thousand or upwards), the evidence on the part of the husband is to be credited, because that goes to prove that the wife has made an abatement in her dower; but if the proper dower be one thousand five hundred Dirms, both parties must be required to make oath, after which one thousand five hundred are to be decreed to the woman. This is according to the Takhreej of Razi. Koorkheen says that the oath must be tendered to both parties in all the three circumstances, after which the proper dower must be decreed. All this applies to a case where the husband and wife dispute with respect to the amount of the dower itself, and not with respect to its specification: but if their dispute respect the latter one of the parties asserting that a dower had been named, and the other denying, in this case the proper dower must be decreed, according to all the doctors, that being the original dower, independent of any specification.

Or between one of the parties, and the heirs of the other.—If, after the death of the husband or wife, a dispute should arise between the survivor and the heirs of the deceased, concerning the amount of the dower, the rule in this case is the same as when the dispute arises between the parties during life, because a claim to the woman's proper dower does not cease in consequence of the demise of either.

Or between the heirs of both parties.—And if both husband and wife were to die, and a dispute to arise between their heirs, with respect to the amount of the dower, in this case the declaration of the husband's heirs shall be credited, although they should declare a sum less than the usual and customary dower of such a woman as the wife deceased.

—This is according to Haneeefa. Mohammad holds that the rule is the same here as where the dispute arises between the parties during life.—And if the heirs dispute with respect to the specification of the dower, one party insisting that a dower had been named, and the other denying, the declaration of the latter is to be credited, according to Haneeefa. In short, with Haneeefa, the woman's proper dower is not at all regarded after the decease of both parties, as shall be hereafter demonstrated. The two disciples on the other hand, maintain that the proper dower should in that case be decreed.

The heirs of a deceased wife may take the amount of the specified dower out of the deceased husband's property.—In case of the death of both husband and wife, it belongs to the heirs of the latter to take the dower out of the estate of the husband, where it has been specifically named; but if it should not have been specified, they cannot claim anything whatever, according to Haneeefa. The two disciples maintain that woman's heirs are entitled to her dower in either case,—that is to say, to the specified dower, in the former case, or to the woman's proper dower, in the latter;—in the former, because the specified dower was a debt upon the husband, confirmed by the circumstance of his decease, and consequently must be paid out of his estate, unless it should be known that the wife had died first, in which case the husband's portion of inheritance would drop from the dower [that is, must be deducted from it] on account that he also is an heir;—and, in the latter, because the woman's proper dower had become a debt upon the husband, the same as a specified dower, and therefore does not drop from the estate, unless it was indisputably the custom of his death, any more than where only one of the parties dies.—Haneeefa argues that, in this case, a supposition of the death of both husband and wife affords a conclusion that their peers and contemporaries are already cut off by death, and no longer remain, because it is most probable that they would not both die until after a length of time; and after the lapse of such a period, their peers and contemporaries no longer remaining, from whom can the Kayzee judge of or decide what the value of the woman's proper dower ought to be?—Haneeefa, however, holds that where the husband and wife both happen to die before the lapse of any length of time, so as that their peers and contemporaries are still remaining, her heirs are entitled to her proper dower.

Case of a dispute concerning articles sent by a husband to his wife.—If a husband were to send anything to his wife, and she were to denominate it a present, while he asserts that he has given it in part payment of her dower, in this case the declaration of the husband must be credited, because he is the giver, and consequently must be supposed to know his own intentions best;—moreover, it is evidently the business of the husband to liquidate the obligation which lies against him before he proceeds to perform gratuitous acts; his declaration, therefore, must be credited, except where the thing sent consists of victuals ready dressed for eating (such as roasted, or boiled, or stewed, and so forth), in which case the assertion of the woman... must be credited, because it is usual and customary for husbands to send such articles as presents to their wives, not counting it in the dower; but in respect to wheat or barley, the declaration of the husband should be credited for the reason above mentioned. — Some have observed that articles, the supply of which is generally held incumbent upon the husband, such as shifts, and robes, and veils, are not to be counted in the dower, apparent circumstances arguing against this.

Section.

Of the dower of infidel subjects and of aliens, when none has been stipulated, or when it consists of carrion. — If a Christian man marry a Christian woman without stipulating any dower, or marking it consist of carrion,* such as may be deemed lawful by those of their profession, and have carnal connection with her, or divorce her before consummation, or die and leave her, the woman is not entitled to any dower whatever, although both parties should have embraced the faith within the interim. — And the law is the same where the parties are aliens married on like terms in a foreign country. The opinion of the two disciples concerning aliens is the same as that of Aboo Haneefa; but with respect to Christians, being Zimmees (that is, subjects of the Mussulman government), they hold that the woman is entitled to her proper dower, where the husband either consummates the marriage by committing the carnal act, or dies; and that she is entitled to a present when he divorces her before consummation. — Ziffir alleges that the alien woman is entitled to her proper dower in either case (that is, in the event either of the husband’s death, or of divorce), because the law does not hold it strange to desire marriage but莘自己 return for property, and this rule equally affects Infidels and Mussulmans, as marriage forms a part of the temporal law, the obligations of which extend to all alike. To this the two disciples reply, that aliens do not take upon themselves any obligation to the observance of the laws of Islam, neither are they capable of so doing, on the account of a difference of country: contrary to the case of Zimmees, who are subject to the Mussulman law in all temporal concerns, or acts to which the temporal law has reference (such as whoredom, usury, and so forth), since they are fully capable of taking upon themselves an obligation to the observance of those laws, as being native subjects of the Mussulman country. Haneefa reasons upon this, that Zimmees do not subject themselves to any of the laws of Islam, either with respect to things which are merely of a religious nature (such as fasting and prayer) or with respect to such temporal acts as, though contrary to the Mussulman law, they may hold to be legal (such as the sale of wine, or of swine’s flesh), because we are commanded to leave them at liberty, in all things which may be deemed by them to be proper; according to the percepts of their own faith; wherefore, with respect to all such acts, Zimmees are the same as aliens; but from these is to be excepted whoredom, that being held universally, and by all sects, to be a criminal act; and as to usury, no such thing can have legal existence, it being excepted from all the obligations to which the person can be subject, because of a saying of the Prophet, “Observe that between us, and whosoever takes usury, no engagements exist.” — The compiler of the Hadees remarks that what Mohammed has adapted in the Jama Sagheer, “If a Christian man marry a Christian woman without any dower” — and so forth, may be understood in two ways, one, the absolute exception of a dower (that is especially stipulating that there shall be none); and the other, merely the omitting to mention it in the contract. Some have said, concerning this case, that where the dower is either made to consist of unlawful articles, or is not mentioned in the contract, there are two traditions; according to one, the woman is entitled to her proper dower (as maintained by the two disciples), and according to the other, nothing whatever is due; and it is from this variance on the traditions that the difference of opinion arises between Haneefa and Muhammed.

Of the dower of infidel subjects, where it consists of wine or pork. — If a Zimme marry a Zimmea, making the dower to consist of wine or pork, and one or both should afterwards embrace to the faith, yet the woman is nevertheless entitled to the unlawful article settled upon her, although the conversion take place previous to seisin, provided the unlawful article be identically specified; but if this be not the case, the woman, in the instance of wine, is to receive the estimated value of such wine, or in that of pork, her proper dower. — This is according to Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that the woman is entitled to her proper dower in either instance. Mohammed, on the contrary, maintains that she is in either instance entitled to the estimated value of the unlawful article specified, whatever it be. — The reasoning upon which the opinion of the two disciples proceeds in this case is that by seisin, or possession, the right in the thing possessed becomes fully established and confirmed; seisin, therefore, is the same as when a man is heir to a contract of marriage, since, like that, it produces a right which had not before existed; and consequently the seisin of wine or pork by a Mussulime, as a dower, is illegal, the same as a contract itself, including a specification of such unlawful articles, as a dower; and this, whether those articles may have been identically specified, or only

Neither is it lawful for a Modabbir or Am-Walid to marry without their owner's consent, because his authority with respect to them still exists.

A slave may be sold for the discharge of his wife's dower.—If a slave marry with his master's consent, the dower (to the woman whom he marries) is a debt upon his person, for the payment of which he may be sold, because the debt has become obligatory upon the slave on account of the existence of its cause (namely, marriage, proceeding from a competent person), and the obligation of the debt extends to the master also, he having consented thereto, and accordingly devolves upon him, in order that the creditor may be protected from injury, as in the case of debts contracted by a slave in mercantile dealing.

dower by labour, as not being liable to be sold, because the property in them is not capable of being transferred from one to another; this debt of the dower, therefore; is to be discharged by their acquisitions, so that the wife may not be subject to loss; but their persons are not liable to be attached for payment.

How far a master's desiring his slave to divorce his wife, is an argument of his assent to the slave's marriage.—If a slave marry without his owner's consent, and the latter afterwards should say to him, "divorce" [your wife] or "put her away," his [the owner's] assent to the marriage is not implied, because such a mode of address bears the construction of obstructing or resisting execution of the contract, as the terms divorce and separation apply to that, as well as to the dissolution of the contract of marriage already executed. It is therefore to be thus construed, either because this is suitable to the state of disobedient and refractory slave, or because the prevention of a marriage is an act of less magnitude than the assenting to it. But if the owner were to say to his slave, "reproach her by a divorce reversible," this implies his assent to the marriage, because a reversible divorce is not supposed but in a case of marriage [already executed], wherefore assent to the marriage, is hereby signified.

Obligation of the dower in a case of invalid marriage, contracted by a slave at the desire of his owner.—If a person desire his slave to marry such a female slave, and he accordingly sed her by an invalid marriage, and have carnal connexion with her, Haneefa holds that the slave shall be sold for the discharge of her dower. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that the dower shall be exacted of him (the slave) upon his becoming free.—The foundation of this difference of opinion is that the owner [Haneefa] does not apply equally to a legal and to an invalid marriage, and consequently the debt [of the dower] is upon the owner; but with the two disciples, assent applies to a valid and regular marriage only, wherefore the debt is not upon the owner (whence it is that it may be required of the slave on his becoming free at any subsequent period), for they argue that the intent of marriage is to guard against incontinence, and that end is obtained by regular, but not by invalid marriages, wherefore if a person were to make a vow that he will not marry, his vow applies solely to regular marriage; contrary to a case of sale; that is to say, if a person were to empower another in sale, such power extends both to regular and to invalid sale, a variety of privileges being therein involved, such as the right of emancipation, and so forth. Aboo Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the word "marry" [in the owner's desire expressed to his slave] is general, and is therefore to be considered as having a general application, the same as sale; and there are a variety of points involved in an irregular, marriage, as well as in sale, such as genealogy [of children born in such, marriage], and the obligations to the payment of dower, and to the observance of Edit; and with, respect to the instance of a vow, as produced by the two disciples, it is not admitted as applicable by Haneefa.

Case of an indebted Mazoon, contracted in marriage by his owner.—If a man contract his Mazoon, or privileged slave, who is a debtor, to any woman in marriage, it is lawful; and the wife [in virtue of her right to her dower] becomes a joint creditor with the others; that is to say, the slave is to be sold for the discharge of all debts, and the price arising from the sale is to be divided between his wife and the other creditors, in proportion to their respective claims. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this rule holds only where the marriage has been effected upon a Mihr Misl, or less; but if the dower exceed the Misl proportion, the other creditors are, in that case on an equality with the wife, so far as the amount of her Mihr Misl, or proper dower, and the payment of the excess must be postponed till after the discharge of the debt to the creditors; the ground of which is, that the owner's authority over his slave, with respect to marriage, is founded on his having the property of his person (as shall be hereafter explained), and that right of property still remaining, the marriage of the slave is completely legal and valid.

Objection.—In consequence of the marriage the right of the creditors is rendered null both by design, and in effect; wherefore it would be requisite that, in discharging the debts of the Mazoon, those due to the first creditors ought to be first paid; whereas it is otherwise in this case, for they are all put on an equality.

Reply.—The right of the creditors is not designedly rendered null by the marriage: but the marriage being held valid, the debt of dower is due in consequence of the existence of its cause; and there is nothing to invalidate its existence; the dower, therefore, is the same as a debt of damage;—that is to say, where a Mazoon slave, being already in debt, destroys or wastes the property of a stranger, the latter comes in as a joint creditor; and the slave is as a sick debtor; that is to say, if a sick person, being in debt, marry a woman, she comes in as a joint creditor with the others, to the amount of her proper dower, and so in this case likewise.

A master may withhold permission from his female slave to dwell in the house of her husband.—If a master contract his female slave in marriage to another man, he is not under any obligation to send her to the house of her husband, she still remaining attached in service to her master; and the husband shall be desired to visit his wife at opportune seasons, at her masters house, because his right to her service still remains in virtue of his property in her; and if he were under any obligation to send her to the house of her husband, his right would be rendered null.

And if he so permit, her husband must support her, but not otherwise. — And if the master permits or gives permission to his female slave to dwell in the house of her husband, her subsistence and lodging are incumbent upon the husband; but if he should not permit this, nothing whatever is incumbent, because subsistence is the recompense for the matrimonial restraint; and if she live in the house of her husband, she is under this restraint, but not otherwise. And if the master thus permit her to dwell with her husband, still he is at liberty, notwithstanding, to call for and require her legal service at any subsequent period, because his right of usufruct still continues, in virtue of his possession, and this right is not relinquished by such permission any more than by her marriage.

The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that Imam Mohammed has said, "A master contracting his male or female slave in marriage is lawful," without making any mention of the consent of the slave to such marriage, which shows that this consent is not a condition; and such is the opinion of our doctors, who hold that a master is empowered to contract his slaves in marriage by compulsion; that is to say, that the marriage is such, where it is contracted by the master, holds good independent of their consent. According to Shafei, a master is also empowered to contract his male slave in marriage by compulsion; and there is also an opinion of Haneefa recorded to this effect: this doctrine proceeds upon the principle that marriage is a natural privilege of man, and a slave is a possession of his owner by the laws of property, but not by the laws of nature; whereas the master is not endowed with any absolute authority with respect to his marriage, contrary to the case of a female slave, whose owner, as being entitled to the carnal use of her person, is at liberty to transfer the same to any other. The argument of our doctors on this subject is that a master, in causing his slave to marry, acts with a view to the preservation of his property, because, by marrying, the slave is withheld from the commission of whoredom which is a cause of destruction or damage; the master, therefore, is fully empowered with respect to the marriage of his male slaves, the same as of his females; but he is not thus empowered with respect to his Mokatib, or Mokatiba, because these are, as to their ages, the same as free persons, and their consent is therefore a condition; for if it were otherwise, their privileges and powers of action would be totally annulled.

An owner slaying his female slave before consummation has no claim to her dower. — If a man marry his female slave to another person, and afterwards put her to death, before her husband has had carnal connexion with her, no part of the dower whatever is, in this case, due from the husband, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold that, in this case, the dower is due from the husband, in the same manner as it would be, if the female slave had died a natural death; and the foundation of their opinion is that a person who is slain dies by his own fate, death implying merely the termination of life, and life being terminated by the act of killing. The case, therefore, is here the same as if the female slave had been slain by a stranger; that is to say; if the female slave had been slain by a stranger, her dower would remain due from the husband, and also in the present case. The argument of Haneefa is, that the owner of the slave, who, as being her Mawla, claims the consideration, has by his act prevented the delivery of the return (to wit, the person of woman); and consequently his right to the consideration is extinguished, in the same manner as when a free woman apostatizes; that is to say, if a free woman apostatizes from the faith before she has admitted her husband to the carnal embrace, no dower whatever is due to her, she [by her act of apostasy] having prevented the delivery of the return; and so likewise in the present instance. With respect to what is advanced by the two disciples, that "a person who is slain dies by his own fate," it may be answered, that although this be admitted, yet it holds with respect to a future state only, and not with respect to this world, murder, according to worldly institutes, being in the eye of the law considered as an act of destruction, inducing retaliation, fine, and so forth; and it is therefore to be regarded as an act of destruction with respect to the dower, that also being a temporal institution.

The dower of a free woman is due, although she kill herself before consummation — If a free woman kill herself before she has admitted her husband to carnal connexion, her dower is nevertheless due from him, contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who conceives an analogy between this case and that of a woman apostatizing before carnal connexion, or of a master slaying his female slave; for he argues that no dower whatever is here due from the husband, as the wife to whom the consideration belongs, has by her act of suicide, prevented the delivery of the return. The arguments of our doctors are that, in worldly institutes, no regard is paid to the offence committed by a man upon his own person, wherefore suicide is to be held as dying a natural death, contrary to the case of a man killing his female slave, that being an act to which worldly institutes have regard, and, as such, subjecting the perpetrator of the murder to the performance of acts of expiation.

*On account of the punishment which attends it.
If a man marry the female slave of another and be desirous of committing the act of Azil with her (i.e. emission seminis in ano, vel inter Mamillas), this shall depend upon her master's permission, according to Hanefia; and such also is the Zahir Rawayet. According to the two disciples, the permission to this act rests with the slave, because [as being the man's wife] carnal connexion is her right; but by Azil that carnal connexion which is her right is frustrated. Her consent, therefore, is a requisite condition to the legality of the act; the same as that of a free woman, contrary in the case of a female slave, who is the property of the person having such connexion with her, because carnal connexion is not her right (whence it is that she is not entitled to claim the carnal act of her master or owner); and consequently her consent is not a condition. The principle upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds in this case, is that the act of Azil defeats the intentions of marriage, which is the production of children, and this is a right of the master; whence it is that his consent is a condition, and not that of the slave. And herein appears a distinction between the state of a free woman and that of a slave [in marriage].

A female slave, upon obtaining her freedom, has a right to annul the marriage contract. If a female slave marry with her owner's consent; and afterwards become free, she is then at liberty either to break off the marriage or to continue it, whether her husband be a slave of a freeman, because, upon Barrea (who was a Mokatiba of Aysha) becoming free, the Prophet said to her, "You are now mistress of your own person, and therefore at your own disposal," which tradition evinces that she is at liberty as above, whether her husband be a slave or a freeman, since the cause of her right of opinion, as there mentioned (that is, her being mistress of her own person), exists equally in either case. Shafei maintains that she has no such right of option where her husband is a freeman. The tradition above quoted, however, is in proof against him; moreover, the power of the husband with respect to his wife is greater after her emancipation that it was before, because she was free he had power to pronounce only a double sentence of divorce, whereas afterwards he is authorized to pronounce three divorces, on which account she is justly empowered to set aside the contract of marriage; so as that her husband may not obtain any additional authority with respect to her in consequence of her emancipation. And the rule is the same where a Mukatiba marries with her owner's consent, and afterwards becomes free. Ziffer says that a Mokatiba has no right of option, because the contract of marriage proceeded by, and was executed with, her especial consent, and she receives the dower, and such being the case, she can have no subsequent right of option, contrary to the case of an absolute slave, whose consent in marriage is not regarded. —The argument of our doctors is that the reason for her right of option, (to wit, the accession to the husband, of an additional authority with respect to her) appears in the case of a Mokatiba, the same as in that of an absolute slave, for before freedom the term of her Edit was only two menstruations, and she was subject to no more than a duplicate sentence of divorce; whereas in her state of freedom, her Edit includes three menstruations, and she is subject to three divorces.

But not otherwise—if a female slave marry without her owner's consent, and be afterwards made free, her marriage then becomes legal and valid, because, being of sound mind and mature age, she is competent to the declaration and acceptance; moreover, the illegality of the marriage was on account only of the owner's right, which being done away, it remains lawful; and the woman has no any option, as in the former case, because the marriage is not in this case valid until after emancipation, which consequently occasions no accession of power to the husband; and hence the case is the same as if she were to bestow herself in marriage after emancipation.

Case of a man marrying a female slave without her owner's consent.—If a man marry a female slave, without her owner's concurrence, on a dower of a thousand Dirms, her proper dower being one hundred Dirms only, and he have carnal connexion with her, and her owner afterwards emancipate her, the specified dower goes to him [the owner], because the husband has here obtained possession of an article which was the property of the owner, who is therefore entitled to the return; but if the marriage be not consummated until after emancipation, the specified dower goes to the woman, because in this case the husband appears to have obtained possession of an article which was her property, and she of course is entitled to the return, since the marriage, in consequence of her emancipation, takes effect from the period of the contract; and here the specification of the dower is valid, and that which was specified is incumbent; and accordingly, no other dower is due on account of carnal connexion previous to the efficiency of the marriage, here that has been suspended [upon the event of the owner's approbation, or the slave's freedom], because the marriage, deriving its legality

‡That is, at his instigation.
from the original contract, its efficiency is considered as existing from the instant the marriage takes place; nothing, therefore, but one dower can be due.

Case of a father cohabiting with the slave of his son.—If a father enjoy the female slave of his son, and she produce a child, and he [the father] claim it, the slave becomes his Am-Walid, and he is answerable to his son for her value; but he is not so for her dower, because a father being at liberty to possess himself of the property of his son, whenever that may be requisite to his own preservation, it follows that he may possess himself of her son's slave, where he requires her for the preservation of his progeny, since he thereby provides for his own continuance, he being virtually continued in his offspring; but the preservation of his progeny being a matter of less immediate importance than that of his life, he must pay a price in the case of the slave, which he might take his son's virtuals without paying any price.

—And here the father's property in the slave is established antecedently do his claim of the child, possession being a condition essential to such claim, which does not hold good unless he be either fully possessed of her in all respects, or at least have a right of possession in her; and neither of these exist in him (insomuch that he might legally marry her); — it is therefore requisite that his property in her be considered as existing from a priori; and this being admitted, the father appears to have had carnal connexion with his own slave, and consequently is not subject to the payment of an Akhir. —Ziffer and Shafei maintains that the slave's dower is a debt upon the father; because they hold that his property in her is a consequence of his Isteebad, or claim of the child, — that is, that his right of possession is thereby established the same as in a partnership slave; now the effect of a thing, is not found until after that thing has taken place; and such being the case, as the carnal connexion appears to have been had in the first instance, with the property of another, a dower is due.

Case of a son contracting his female slave in marriage to his father.—If a man marry his female slave to his father, and she produce a child, she does not become Am-Walid to the father, neither is her price a debt against him, because he is answerable for her dower; and the child born of her is free, such a marriage being approved by our doctors. — This is contrary to the doctrine of Shafei, according to whom a marriage of this kind is illegal. The argument of our doctors is, that the slave is not at all the property of the father, because, the son being her proprietor in every respect, it is impossible that the father should be so in any view; the son, moreover, is endowed with privileges [in regard to her] which do not appertain to his father, such as selling or bestowing her in marriage or emancipating her, which evinces that the father is put in any respect her proprietor, although, in a case where he has carnal connexion with her, punishment drops, on account of erroneous possession; and his marriage with her being admitted as legal, the conservation of his deed is effected by means of marriage, [not by means of Isteebad], so that his property in her is no way established [by the circumstance of her bearing a child to him], and consequently she does not become his Am-Walid — And here the father is not answerable for the value either of her or of her child, as he does not become proprietor of either; but he owes her dower, he having taken that upon him by his marriage; and the child is free, because his owner would otherwise be his brother; and he is virtually emancipated of course.

The marriage of a free woman with a slave is annulled by her procuring his emancipation.—If a free woman, being the wife of a slave, should say to the proprietor of such slave, "Emancipate him for me!" for a thousand Dirhams," and he accordingly emancipates him, the marriage is annulled. — Ziffer maintains that it is not annulled. — Our doctors argue, on this occasion, that the slave obtains his freedom from the woman, whence it is that the right of Willa rests with her, and also, that if she were under obligation to perform an expiatory act, and intend her husband's release to stand as such, her expiation is thereby fulfilled. — With Ziffer the emancipation is held to proceed from the owner, because the woman has required him to emancipate the slave "on her behalf," which is absurd, since manumission cannot take effect upon a slave who is not the property of the emancipator; consequently, her requisition being improper, emancipation is to be regarded as proceeding solely from the owner. — Our doctors, on the other hand, say, that there is one mode in which the requisition of the woman may be rendered proper, viz. by considering her property in the slave to have existence previous to emancipation, as an essential (for the right of possession being a condition of the validity of emancipation on her behalf), and such being the case, her requisition "emancipate him, &c." bears the construction of her desiring the owner first to transfer to her his property in the slave for such a consideration, and then to emancipate him "from her," and the reply of the owner, "I have emancipated him," is as if he were to say that he had transferred him, and then set him free "from her;" and upon the woman's property in him being established, it necessarily follows that the marriage is annulled, the marriage of a free woman with her slave being illegal, since possession by right of property is irreconcilable with possession by marriage. — But if the woman were to say to the owner of her husband, "emancipate him from me," without mentioning any consideration, in this case the marriage is not annulled, and the Willa rests with the master. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammad. — Aboo Yoosaf says that this and the preceding case are the same, and that the marriage is here likewise annulled, because in this instance also the transfer must be supposed to have previously taken place (though without any return), in order that the act may be lawful.

Objection — Transfer of property, without a return, amounts to gift, and that is not valid without seisin; now here seisin does not appear; consequently how can the transfer be valid?

Reply — Seisin is not in this case regarded, any more than in Zihar; thus, if the expiration of Zihar were in-cumbent upon any person and he were to desire another to give the victuals, as from him, and the other do accordingly, the gift is understood independent of seisin; and so here likewise — The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that seisin being declared, in the ordinances of the Prophet, to be a condition of gift, cannot be dispensed with; neither can it be established merely by supposing or assuming it, as an essential, because seisin is a sensible act, contrary to law, which is a legal transaction; and in the case of expiration, as cited by Aboo Yoosuf, the poor stand as the deputies of the expirator, in the seisin of the victuals, but the slave (in the case here treated of) cannot stand as the wife's deputy, because nothing is received by him, so as to constitute him her deputy in seisin.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE MARRIAGE OF INFIDELS.

The marriage of an Infidel couple is not dissolved by their jointly embracing the faith. — If an Infidel man and woman marry without witnesses, or whilst the woman is in her Edit from a former Infidel husband, and this be no objection by the rule of their own sect, and they afterwards embrace the faith together, their marriage remains valid. — This is according to Haneefa. — Ziffer maintains the marriage to be invalid in either case — (that is to say, whether it be entered into without witnesses, or whilst the woman is in her Edit from a former Infidel husband), but that Infidels are not liable to be called to an account until they embrace Islam, or until they appear to the law, — that is to say, carry the matter before the judge. — The two disciples coincide with Haneefa in the first case (the defect of witnesses), but agree with Ziffer in the last (the Edit). The argument of Ziffer is that the word of the sacred writings extends to all men alike, and consequently to Infidels; but the parties, as being Zimmies, are not liable to molestation; but this exemption from molestation is an effect of indulgence, and does not proceed from any idea of the marriage being legal and of course, where it becomes a subject of litigation, or the parties become Mussulmans separation must ensue, the illegality of their marriage still remaining. — The arguments of the two disciples are that the illegality of Polyandry is universally admitted amongst Mussulmans, and that Infidel subjects have engaged to follow the temporal law in all such points as are universally admitted; but with respect to the illegality of marriage without witnesses there subsists a difference of opinion among the Mussulmans; and Infidels have engaged only to follow such temporal law of Islam as are universally admitted, and not such as are disputed; hence, in the case of Polyandry a separation becomes necessary, but not in the case of marriage without witnesses. Haneefa argues that the marriage is not rendered illegal by the injunctions of the law, because those injunctions are not addressed to Infidels; neither does any reason exist why the Edit should be obligatory on account of the right of a husband who has no right to the marriage of it; contrary to a case where the Infidel woman is the wife of a Mussulman, because he has faith in the necessity of Edit: and therefore the illegality of her marriage [with the Infidel] should in this case be established, on account of his [the Mussulman's] right; and the marriage being valid ab initio, on account of no illegality appearing therein, continues to exist as such, since testimony is not a condition with respect to the period of its existence; and the circumstances of appeal to the law of conversion to the faith, take place during the existence of the marriage: neither does the circumstance of the Edit forbid the continuance of the marriage; as when a man (in instance) has carnal connubium, erroneously, with the wife of another, in which case an Edit is incumbent upon the woman, but the marriage continues to hold good.

Unless it be a marriage within the prohibited degrees. — If a Majoosee wed his mother or his daughter, and they afterwards become Mussulmans, they are to be separated. This holds with the two disciples, because a marriage within the prohibited degree is universally admitted to be null, on which account the rule extends to Infidels as well as Mussulmans (as before mentioned, from them, in the case of Edit), and the parties, upon their conversion, being necessarily liable to molestation on account of such marriage, it follows that a separation must take place upon that event; and it holds also with Haneefa, because, although such marriage be deemed lawful in the Rawayet Sahel, yet the circumstance of the wife being within the prohibited degrees forbids the continuance of it after conversion, on which account separation is to take place; and to the circumstance of Edit, which (according to Haneefa) does not forbid the continuance of the marriage.

But if one of them only be converted, a separation takes place. — If only one of the parties be converted to the faith, a separa-

[Vol. I.

...tion follows; but if one only appeal, Haneefa holds that separation does not take place: contrary to the opinion of the two doctors, according to whom separation takes place in this case also. —The reason, with Haneefa, for making this distinction between these two cases is, that the right of one party is not invalidated by the appeal of the other, as the faith of the one is not altered by the appeal of the other: but where one of the parties becomes a Mussulman, although the faith of the other be not altered by that event, yet the faith of an Infidel is not sufficient to convert or oppose the Islam of a Mussulman; as Islam is the subject and cannot be subjected. —But where both the parties enter into a litigation, it is universally agreed that separation takes place, because this mutual litigation amounts to both authorizing any third person to effect a separation between them, which if they were to do, the separation so effected would be legal.

Apostates are incapacitated from marrying. —It is not lawful that an apostate marry any woman, whether she be a believer, an Infidel, or an apostate, because an apostate is liable to be put to death; moreover, his three days of grace are granted in order that he may reflect upon the errors which occasion his apostasy; and as marriage would interfere with such reflection, the law does not permit it to him.

In like manner, it is not lawful that a female apostate marry any man, whether Mussulman or Infidel; because she is imprisoned for the purpose of reflection (as above), and her attention to her husband would interfere therewith; moreover, this circumstance of her imprisonment necessarily prevents the matrimonial intercourse; —now marriage is lawful, not in respect to itself, but to its ends, and consequently, where these are defeated, it cannot be deemed in any respect legal.

If either the father or mother be Mussulman, their children are Mussulmans. —Whenever either the husband or the wife is a Mussulman, their children are to be educated in the Mussulman faith. And if either one or other of an Infidel couple become a Mussulman, and they have infant children, those are to be considered as Mussulmans in virtue of the Islam of one of their parents, because this is tenderness to the children.

Or where one is of a superior order of Infidels, and the other of an inferior, their children are of the superior order. —If one of a married couple be a Kitabee, and the other a Majoos, their children are to be regarded as Kitabees, because, in this also there is a degree of tenderness with respect to the children, as a Majoos is worse than a Kitabee. This is contrary to the doctrine of Shafee, who holds the infidelity of a Majoos, and that of a Kitabee, to be equal: but with our doctors a Kitabee is held superior to a Majoos.

Upon the conversion of one of the parties, the magistrate is to require the other to embrace the faith, and must separate them, in case of recusancy. —When the wife becomes a convert to the faith and her husband is an Infidel, the magistrate is to call upon the husband to embrace the faith also; if he accede, the woman continues his wife; but if he refuses, the magistrate must separate them; and this separation, with Haneefa and Mohammed, is a divorce. —In like manner, if the husband become a Mussulman and his wife be a Majoos, the magistrate is to call upon her to embrace the faith also; if she accede, she remains his wife; but if she refuses, the magistrate must separate them; but this separation is not divorce. —Aboo Yoosaf has said that the separation is not divorce in either case. —What is here advanced of the magistrate calling upon the party to embrace the faith, is an opinion of our doctors; —Shafee maintains that the magistrate is not to make any such requisition because this is molestation and we have engaged not to molest Zimmah, as they have entered into a contract of subjection to us.

Objection —It would hence appear that the matrimonial right of possession should not terminate in this case; whereas Shafee also holds that it is terminated.

Reply. —The matrimonial intercourse is not admissible between a Mussulman and an Infidel; for which reason it is that the matrimonial right of possession is terminated on the instant of conversion, where either party embraces the faith, before consummation, because in this case the right has not been confirmed; but, on the other hand, if conversion take place after consummation, the termination is delayed until the end of three menstruations, because the right has on this occasion been confirmed; —as holds in divorce. —The argument of our doctors is, that, upon either party embracing the faith, the ends of marriage are defeated, on account of difference of religion; hence it is absolutely necessary that recourse be had to some means by which a separation may be effected; —now Islam, as an act of piety, is incapable of being rendered a cause of separation; the Infidel party is therefore to be called upon to embrace the faith, in order that the ends of marriage may be answered by conversion, or that a cause of separation may be established in case of refusal. The reason upon which Aboo Yoosaf founds his opinion is that the occasion of separation, to wit, refusing the faith, may proceed from either the man or the woman; a separation, therefore, on account of such refusal, is not divorce, any more than on account of a right of property; —that is to say, if, of husband and wife, either become the owner of the other, a separation ensues; but this separation is not divorce; and so also in the present case. —In reply to this, Haneefa and Mohammed argue that the husband, when he refuses the faith, willfully withholds the customary benevolence from his wife, where he has it still in his power to continue it to her, by becoming... a Mussulman; and such being the case, the magistrate acts merely as his substitute, in effecting the separation; in the same manner as where a husband is impotent, or deprived of his penis; but a woman is not empowered to divorce, for which reason the magistrate cannot be regarded as her substitute in effecting the separation when she has refused the faith.

It is to be observed, that where the separation takes place on account of the woman’s refusal of the faith, she is still entitled to her dower, provided her husband has consummated the marriage, as in this case her right has been confirmed by the carnal act; but if the marriage should not have been consummated she cannot, receive any dower, because the separation has proceeded from her, and her right to the dower is not confirmed; thus the case here is the same as where a woman apostatizes or admits the son of her husband to carnal connexion.

And if the conversion of either happen in a foreign country, separation takes place upon the lapse of the woman’s term of probation.

—If the wife embrace the faith in a foreign country, and her husband be an Infidel,—or, if a foreigner there becomes Mussulman, and his wife be a Majooseea,—the separation between them does not take place until the lapse of three terms of the wife’s courses, when she becomes completely repudiated.

The reason of this is, that Islam cannot be made an occasion of separation (as has been before observed) and requiring the other party to embrace the faith is impracticable, as the authority of the magistrate does not extend to a foreign land, nor is it acknowledged there; yet separation is indispensable for the removal of evil; the condition, therefore, of separation (to wit, the lapse of three terms of the woman’s courses), must stand in the place of separation effected by the magistrate; and in this rule no distinction is made between a woman enjoyed, and one unenjoyed. Shafei holds that there is a distinction, on this occasion, between a woman enjoyed and one unenjoyed, in the same manner as he distinguishes between them when they reside in a Mussulman territory, and one of them embraces the faith; as has been before explained.

If the wife be an alien, she is not to observe an Edit, from separation, in consequence of her husband’s conversion. —When a separation takes place between husband and wife, in consequence of the conversion of the former, and the latter is an alien, she is not subject to any observance of Edit, according to all the doctors. Haneefa holds the rule to be the same, where the woman becomes a convert and her husband is an alien; that is, that the woman, in this case also, is not subject to any observance of Edit but the two disciples maintain that she must here observe an Edit the same as would be incumbent upon her if she were to come into the Mussulman territory; as shall be hereafter demonstrated.

The conversion of the husband of a Kitabee does not occasion separation. —If the husband of a Kitabee become a Mussulman, their marriage still endures, because the marriage of a Mussulman with a Kitabee being legal ab initio, its continuance is so a fortiori.

Case of a convert removing from a foreign land into a Mussulman territory. —If either husband or wife become a convert to the faith in a foreign country, and afterwards remove thence into the Mussulman territory, a separation takes place between them:—this is contradicted by Shafei;—but if either party be brought, as a captive, out of the foreign country, separation takes place between them, according to all the doctors; if, however, both the parties be brought captives together we hold that there is no separation; whereas Shafei says that separation takes place. —Hence it may be collected that the circumstance of the parties residing apart in different countries is held to be a cause of separation by our doctors, but not that of their capture; and that Shafei maintains the reverse of this opinion. —The argument of the latter is that separation of country is a cause of termination of authority, but has no effect in occasioning an absolute separation in this case, any more than where an alien resides under protection in a Mussulman territory, whilst his wife remains in her own country; or where a Mussulman goes under protection into a foreign land, leaving his wife in the Mussulman territory; in neither of which cases would separation take place, and so in this instance likewise:—capture, on the other hand, leads to this, that the captive is the sole and exclusive property of the captor, which cannot be established without a termination of the former’s marriage, as it is on the same principle that a captive stands virtually released from all his debts. Our doctors, in support of their opinion, argue that by operation of country all matrimonial intercourse between the parties, whether actual or consequential, is entirely broken off, and thus this separation resembles illegality by affinity; capture, on the other hand, occasions property in the person, which does not forbid marriage at first, for if man contract his slave in marriage, it is lawful; and so, also, it does not forbid the continuance of the marriage; as in the case of purchase, where if a person should perches a female slave, the wife of another, the marriage does not, on that account, become null, —And in reply to what Shafei has advanced with respect to capture, —it is admitted that this makes the captive the exclusive property of the captor, in respect to substance, but the object of marriage (to wit, the use of the woman’s person), is not substance, and therefore capture does not annul the marriage: moreover, between a protected foreigner and his wife separation of abode does not virtually take place, as his ultimate intention is to return home, whence he may be.
regarded, virtually, as in a foreign country, during his residence in the Mussulman territory.

A woman, retiring from a foreign to a Mussulman country, is at liberty to marry.

If a woman come out of a foreign country into the Mussulman territory, and there become either a Zimme, or a convert to the faith, it is lawful for her to marry;* and Haneefa holds that she is not under any obligation to observe an Edit. The two disciples say that she must observe an Edit, because separation takes place upon her entering the Mussulman territory and she then becomes subject to the Mussulman laws.

The argument of Haneefa is that the Edit is a consequence of an antecedent marriage, enjoined on account of the importance of the matrimonial tie; but this tie is of no importance whatever with respect to foreigners, for which reason it is that Edit is not enjoined upon a woman who is a captive.

But if pregnant, she must wait until her delivery. If the woman in question be pregnant, she must not marry until she be delivered. This is the rule of the Zahir Zawayer. It is recorded from Haneefa that her marriage is approved; but her husband must not have carnal connexion with her until after her delivery, as is the rule with women pregnant by fornication. The ground of the former opinion is that the parentage of the fetus is ascertained [as from some alien] and therefore the former matrimonial tie is regarded, with respect to the establishment of parentage, and must consequently be so, with respect to forbidding her marriage likewise, on a principle of caution.

In a case of apostacy separation takes place without divorce. If an apostate marry without divorce, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed alleges that if the apostacy be on the part of the husband, the separation is a divorce, because he conceives an analogy between this case and that of the husband refusing the faith; for as, in the latter instance, he by his refusal appears wilfully to withhold the customary benevolence from his wife, where he has it still in his power to continue it to her, so likewise in the former, by his apostacy. Aboo Yoosaf holds to his opinion as before recited in the case of refusal. Haneefa makes a distinction between refusal of the faith and apostasy from it; and his reason for this distinction is that apostacy annuls marriage, because the blood of an apostate no longer remains under the protection of the law, and his life is Mobah [free to any one to take; now divorce is used for the purpose of dissolving a marriage which actually exists; and hence apostacy cannot possibly be considered as divorce: contrary to the case of refusal of the faith, because it is on account of the ends of maternity being thereby defeated that separation is enjoined, in that instance, as has been already said; and for this reason it is that the separation is there suspended upon a decree of the magistrate, whereas in apostacy it takes place without any such decree. It is to be observed, however, that if the apostacy be on the part of the husband, his wife is entitled to her whole dower where he has had carnal connexion with her or to half her dower in defect of this; and where the apostacy is on the part of the wife, she is in like manner entitled to her whole dower, if her husband has had carnal connexion with her; but if not, she has no claim whatever either to dower or alimony, because the separation is in this case a consequence of her own act.

But if a man and wife apostatize together, their marriage still continues. If the husband and wife should both apostatize together, and afterwards return to the faith at the same time, their marriage is by a favourable construction of the law, permitted to endure. Ziffer says that it is horn. because the apostacy of any one of them forbids the duration of it, and where that appears in both, it is found in one of them: but our doctors, in support of their opinion, cite an instance recorded to have happen in the time of the blessed companions [of the Prophet], when the tribe of Binney Haneefa, after having apostatized, returned to the faith, and the companions did not direct them to renew their marriage; and their apostacies were all considered as having taken place at the same time, because of the uncertainty of the dates. But if after their joint apostasy, either the husband or wife were singly to return to the faith, their marriage is, dissolved, because here one of them persists in apostacy, and that forbids the continuance of marriage, the same as it does the matrimonial engagement at first.

CHAPTER VI.

OF KISSM OR PARTITION

A man must cohabit equally with all his wives. If a man have two or more wives, being all free women, it is incumbent upon him to make an equal partition of his cohabitation among them, whether he may have married them as virgins or as Siyeebas, or whether some of them be of the former description, and others of the latter; because the Prophet has said, "The man who hath two wives, and who, in partition, inclines particularly to one of them, shall in the day of judgment incline to one side" (that is to say, shall be paralytic); and it is recorded by Aysha that he made such equal partition of cohabitation among his wives,—saying, "O God, I thus make an equal partition as to what is in my power: do not therefore bring me to account for that which is not in my power" (by which he means the affections, these not being optional).

*By Kissm is understood that equal partition of cohabitation which a husband is required, by aw, to make among his wives, where he has a plurality of them.

The wife of a prior marriage, and a new wife, are alive in this respect, because the tradition above cited is general in its application, and also, because partition is one of the rights of marriage, and in these both descriptions of wives are equal.

But the mode of partition is left to himself.—It is left to the husband to determine the measure of partition; that is to say, if he choose, he may fix it at one day of cohabitation with each of his wives, successively, or more; and it is also to be remarked that by the equality of partition incumbent upon the husband is to be understood simply residence, but not coition, as the latter must depend upon the erection of the virile member, which is not a matter of option, and therefore, like the affections, not always in the husband’s power.

Partition, where the wives are of different rank or degree, must be adjusted accordingly.—If a man be married to two wives, one of them a free woman, and the other a slave, he must divide his time into three portions, cohabiting two portions with the former and one with the latter, because the same is recorded of Alee: and also, because, as it is lawful to marry a free woman upon a slave, but not a slave upon a free woman, it hence appears that the rights of the former in marriage are short of those of the latter—And a Mokatiba, Modabbira, or Am-Walid, are, with respect to their right of partition, the same as slaves.

Partition is not incumbent whilst the husband is on a journey.—Women have no right to partition whilst their husband is upon a journey, and hence, during that period, it is at his option to carry along with him whomsoever he pleases; but it is preferable that he cause them to draw lots, and take with him on the journey her whom the lot may happen to fall.—Shafei says that the determination of this point by lots is incumbent upon the husband, because it is recorded of the Prophet, that whenever he intended a journey he caused his wives thus to draw lots.—Our doctors, however, allege that the Prophet’s reason for this was only that he might satisfy the minds of his wives; wherefore drawing lots is laudable merely, because a man’s wives have no claim whatsoever to partition during the period of their husband being on a journey, since he is at liberty not to carry any of them along with him, and consequently it is lawful for him to take any one of them.

The time of a journey is not to be counted against a husband;—that is to say, he is under no obligation, on his return, to make up for the partition lost within that time, by a proportionable cohabitation with the wife or wives whom he may have left at home, they having no claim whatever to his cohabitation with them during such period.

If one wife bestow her turn (of cohabitation) upon another, it is lawful; because Sooolah the daughter of Zooma gave up her turn to Aysha: but if a woman give up her turn, she is not at liberty to resume it, because she drops a right which is not as yet established in her, and absolute dereliction cannot take place unless it be of a right already established,—wherefore her resumption here is as if she were to withhold from bestowing her turn upon the other.

BOOK III.

OF RIZA, OR FOSTERAGE.

Definition of the term.—Riza, in its legal sense, means a child suckling milk from the breast of a woman for a certain time, which is termed the period of fosterage.

Degree of fosterage which occasions prohibition.—Prohibition is attached to fosterage in whatever degree, if it be found within the usual period of infants subsisting at the breast.—Shafei says that prohibition is not established unless the child have sucked the breast at least five different times, insomuch that if an infant were to suck for any particular space of time, whether a day or an hour, uninterruptedly, this would not occasion prohibition, because the Prophet has said, “Sucking, or giving suck, for once or twice, does not render prohibited.”—Our doctors support their opinion upon the authority of the sacred text, God saying, in the Koran, “Your mothers who have suckled you are prohibited unto you;” and also upon a precept of the Prophet, that “whatever is prohibited by consanguinity, is also prohibited by fosterage,” where no distinction whatever is made between a smaller and a greater degree of it.

* Fosterage, with respect to the prohibitions occasioned by it, is of two kinds: First, where a woman takes a strange child to nurse, by which all future matrimonial connexion between that child and the woman or her relations with the prohibited degrees, is rendered illegal; Secondly, where a woman nurses two children, male and females, upon the same milk, which prohibits any future matrimonial connexion between them.
FOSTERAGE.

Objection.—A greater degree of fosterage is essential to the establishment of prohibition, because the latter is here founded solely in an apprehension of a participation of blood, on account of the growth and increasing bulk of the body, which cannot take place without fosterage, in a considerable degree; moreover, it occurs in the traditions that fosterage is the source of a child's growth.

Reply.—Although prohibition be founded in an apprehension of a participation or blood, on account of growth, yet that is a point which is incapable of being absolutely ascertained, and hence prohibition by fosterage is attached, not to the degree, but to the more act of fosterage, which is the occasion of such increase of growth: and with respect to the saying of the Prophet, as mentioned by Shafei, our doctors reply that if the date of conception is fixed, as mentioned in the Nisab quoted was posterior to that of this saying, its authority is thereby superseded, and if it was prior thereto, yet the saying is rejected, because it contradicts the text.

Length of the period of fosterage.—The period of fosterage is thirty months, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold it to be two years, and of the same opinion is Shafei. Ziffer maintains that it is three years, because something in addition to two years is absolutely requisite (according to what shall be hereafter shown), and such a period is fixed at one year, because that space admits of the child's state undergoing a complete alteration. The argument of the two disciples is the word of God, to wit, "HIS TIME IN THE WOMB", and [until] HIS WEANING IS THIRTY MONTHS." Now the smallest space of pregnancy is six months, and hence two years remain for fosterage; moreover, the Prophet has said that "after two years there is no fosterage." The arguments of Haneefa are twofold; first the text already quoted, where it appears that from the mention of two things, one Hamal [or time of gestation], and the other the Fisal [or weaning], for both of which he indiscriminately mentions one period, namely, thirty months, whereas it applies to each in two; the same as in a case of two debts; that is to say, if a man (for example) were to make a declaration that he owed such a person "one thousand Dirms, and five bushels of wheat, payable within two months," this period of two months applies to each debt equally, and so in this case likewise. It may indeed be objected that, admitting this, it would, follow that the time of being in the womb is also thirty months, whereas it is otherwise,—pregnancy being by law restricted to two years; but to this we reply, that there is a cause of restriction short of that period operating upon Hamal (is being recorded in the traditions that a child does not remain in the womb of the mother above two years), whereas there is none upon Fisal, which of course stands as it appears to be: moreover, as a sucking child is nourished at the breast for two years, so is it also after the expiration of that term; for the weaning is not precisely determined to any particular period, but is effected by degrees, as the child insensibly forgets the breast and inclines to other food: it is therefore necessary that some space for fosterage be allowed in addition to the two years, and this additional space is fixed at six months, being the shortest term of pregnancy, as the lapse of that period affords reason for altering the manner of the child's subsistence, because the subsistence of a foetus is irreconcilable with that of a sucking; and with respect to the traditurious saying of the Prophet, as cited by the two disciples, it has been once solemnly to the period of the claim of fosterage; that is to say, it only goes to show that no obligation arises from fosterage; so as to render payment or hire of the same obligatory upon the [child's] father, beyond the space of two years; and the text of the Koran, which says, "MOTHERS SHOULD Suckle THEIR CHILDREN FOR TWO YEARS," has also reference to the period of the claim of fosterage.

Sucking beyond the term of fosterage is not an occasion of prohibition.—If a child continue to suck after the proper period of fosterage is elapsed, prohibition is not hereby established; because the Prophet has declared that there is no fosterage after the expiration of the proper period; and also, because prohibition is not established by any fosterage, except such as is a cause of growth and increase, which are obtained only by

*Arab. Jzeeyat, a term which has no sense in our dictionaries in any manner applicable to the present case. It appears, from the context, to signify a participation of bodily substance, causing two persons to partake of one common nature.

†The Koran was declared by Mohammed to have been delivered down to him in different portions at various times, and those he termed the Noozools, or descents.

†Arab. Hamal. By this is generally understood pregnancy; but as the text here quoted has reference to the child, and not to the mother, the translator is under the necessity of rendering it in a phrase applicable to the former.

*That is to say, it is to be supposed that within the last six months the woman may have conceived, and may, at the end thereof, produce a child; and a woman cannot, without injuring the foetus, give suck to another, either during or after her pregnancy.

†That is to say, if, after the expiration of the proper period of fosterage, another child be brought to the breast, and the former nuraling still continue to suck, these two are not hereby prohibited to each other in marriage, although they would have been so if they sucked together during the fosterage of the first child.
the fosterage within its proper period, since grown up persons would not find any effectual nourishment from sucking.

A child's forsaking the breast before the expiration of the period of fosterage is not regarded; that is to say, if a child withhold from taking its milk before the period of fosterage has elapsed, and there be still milk in the mother's breast, and any other infant suck the milk before the expiration of that period, in this case prohibition by fosterage is established between those children. — This is the Zahir Rawayat —Hasan has recorded it as an opinion of Haneefa, that this is the case only where the first child has not as yet become attached to another species of food, so as to be capable of subsisting altogether without milk; but if the child has adopted entirely another species of food, this circumstance is to be considered as a weaning; and prohibition by fosterage cannot in this case be established, because where the child is attached to such a state that other food suffices, the manner of its subsistence is altered, and that growth and increase which the child derived from sucking is at an end, wherefore the property of participation of blood, which is the occasion of prohibition, is not afterwards found.

Is the sucking of a child, after the expiration of the period of fosterage, allowable or not? — Upon this point there are various opinions; some have said that it is not so, because the act of suckling at all is permitted solely out of necessity, the milk being a constituent part of the woman's frame, the use of any portion of which, except as a matter of necessity, is prohibited; and this necessity ceases upon the expiration of the period of fosterage.

Exceptions from the general rule of prohibition by fosterage — "Whatever is prohibited by consanguinity is so likewise by fosterage" (according to the saying of the Prophet already quoted), except a sister's mother by fosterage, *whom it is lawful for a man to marry, although he cannot lawfully marry his sister's mother by blood, as she must either be his own mother, or the enjoyed of his father, both of whom are prohibited to him; contrary to her mother by fosterage, — A sister's mother by fosterage may be conceived in three different ways: First, where a man has a sister by blood, who has a foster-mother, whom he may lawfully marry; — Secondly, where a man has a foster-sister, who has a mother by blood, whom he may likewise lawfully marry; — and Thirdly, where a male and female infant, between whom there is no affinity, suck at the breast of one woman, and the female infant also sucks at the breast of another woman, in which case the male infant may lawfully marry the last woman, who is the foster-mother of the female infant, that is to say, of his foster-sister.

A man may also lawfully marry the sister of his foster-son, although it be not lawful for him to marry the sister of his son by blood, as she must be either his own daughter, or the daughter of his enjoyed wife, both of whom are prohibited to him.

Case of illegality induced by fosterage. — It is not lawful for a man to marry the wife of his foster-father, or of his foster-son, (in the same manner as he is prohibited from marrying the wife of his natural father, pr. son), because of the tradition before quoted.

Objection — It has been declared, in the sacred writings, that it is lawful for man to marry the wives of their sons by blood should this particular restriction to blood should seem to imply that marriage with the wives of foster-sons was lawful; whereas it is otherwise.

Reply — The restriction above mentioned refers to the exclusion of the wives of children by descent, and not to the exclusion of the wives of foster-sons, for the reasons already mentioned.

Prohibition is attached to the milk of the man (that is to say, to the milk of which he is the cause); if, for example, a woman nurse a female child, the latter is prohibited to her husband, and to his father and son, because the husband, through whom the woman's breasts have been filled with milk, is as a father to that child. — It is recorded, as an opinion of Shafei, that prohibition is not attached to the milk of man; because this prohibition arises from an apprehension of participation of blood; and the milk is a secretion from the blood of the woman; and not of the man. — The arguments of our doctors in this case are threefold: First, the saying of the Prophet, as before quoted, "Whatsoever is prohibited by consanguinity is also prohibited by fosterage," — and prohibition by consanguinity being found in both father and mother, it follows that it is found in both these relations by fosterage; — Secondly, the Prophet once said to Ayasha (who had complained to him of Afla, the brother of Abou Keis, appearing before her whilst she had only a single cloth upon her), "The act of Afla, in thus approaching you, is of no consequence, as he is your paternal uncle by fosterage;" which proves that affinity by fosterage is established on the paternal side, and that as the woman who suckles is the child's mother, so is her husband his father, by fosterage; — Thirdly, the man is the cause of the entrance of the milk into the woman's breasts, and therefore the milk is, out of caution, to be regarded (with respect to the point of prohibition) as deriving its existence from him.

A man may lawfully marry the sister of his foster-brother, it being allowed to him to marry the sister of his brother by blood (that is, the maternal sister of his paternal brother).

*This is a very equivocal and vague expression, as appears by the succeeding definition of the various descriptions to which it applies.
It is to be observed as a rule that when a male and female infant suck from one breast, they are prohibited to each other in marriage, because they have one common mother, and are therefore as brother and sister.

It is not lawful for a female to marry any of the sons of the woman who has suckled her, because they are her brothers, -nor the sons of those sons, because they are her nephews.

It is not lawful for a male to marry the husband's sister of the woman who has suckled him, as she is his paternal aunt by fosterage.

Cases of admixture of the milk with any foreign substance. - If the milk be drawn from the nurse's breast, and mixed with water, prohibition is still attached to it, provided the former exceed the latter in quantity; but if the water exceed, prohibition is not attached. - Shafei maintains that prohibition is attached, in the latter case, because there is actually some of the milk in that water, and therefore it is indispensable to be regarded, especially in a point of prohibition, that being a matter of caution. -To this our doctors reply that anything less in quantity than that with which it is mixed is regarded as virtually non-existent, as in the case of a vow, for instance, where, if a man swear that "he will not drink milk," and he afterwards drink it mixed with a greater proportion of water, he is not forsworn.

If the milk be mixed with other food, prohibition is not attached to it, although the former exceed the latter in quantity. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that if the milk exceed, prohibition is attached. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this opinion of the two disciples proceeds upon a supposition that the milk and victuals do not undergo any culinary preparation after admixture; but that, if they be boiled, or otherwise prepared by fire, all the doctors admit that prohibition is not then occasioned. - The two disciples argue that regard is to be had to that which exceeds (as in the case of mixing milk with water), provided it have not undergone any change by boiling or other cause. - The argument of Haneefa is that the food is the subject, and the milk only a dependent, with respect to the end it is intended for, to wit, sustenance; the case is therefore the same as if the proportion of the food (exceeded that of the milk).

If the milk be mixed with medicine in a proportion exceeding the latter in quantity, prohibition is attached to it, because the milk is designed for sustenance, which is the end, and the purpose of the medicine is only to strengthen the child's stomach, or to forward digestion.

If the milk of the nurse be mixed with that of an animal, in a proportion exceeding the latter in quantity, prohibition is attached. - i.e., but not if the milk of the animal exceeded the other; regard being here had to that which exceeds, as in the admixture of milk with water.

Or with the milk of another woman. - If the milk of one woman be mixed with that of another, in this case Aboo Yooasf holds that regard should be had to the excess. - That is to say, that prohibition is attached to that woman's milk which exceeds the milk of the other in quantity, -because here the two milks, when mixed together, become one substance, and hence the smaller quantity is to be considered (in the effect produced) as a dependant on the greater quantity. - Mohammed and Ziffer contend that prohibition is attached to both milks equally, as both are of the same nature and a thing cannot be said to exceed a homogeneous thing, because the admixture with any article of a homogeneous nature adds to the sum, but does not occasion any destruction or change in the matter; and the end intended is the same in both. There are two opinions recorded from Haneefa upon this subject, one coinciding with Aboo Yooasf, and the other with Mohammed.

Prohibition is occasioned by the milk of a virgin. - If the breasts of a virgin should happen to produce milk, prohibition is attached to it, -that is to say, if a male child were to subsist upon it, the virgin becomes his mother by fosterage, and his marriage with her is prohibited, according to the word of God in the Koran, "Your mothers who have suckled you are prohibited unto you," which text being generally expressed, applies to all women alike; moreover, the milk of the virgin is a cause of growth in the child, which induces an apprehension of participation of blood.

Or of a corpse. - If milk be drawn from the breasts of a deceased woman, prohibition is attached to it. - This is contrary to the opinion of Shafei, who says that in the establishment of prohibition by fosterage, the primary subject of such prohibition is the woman whose milk has been sucked by the child, the prohibition pervading through the medium of that woman to others (her relatives), but, by her decease, the original subject of prohibition is removed, being then a dead substance; whence it is that if a man were then to commit the carnal act with her, he would not be subject to the punishment of fornication, nor would prohibition by affinity be by that act established. The argument of our doctors is that prohibition by fosterage arises from an apprehension of participation of blood, which appear in the increasing growth of the [child's] body, and this last is occasioned by milk; as in the present case.

Cases in which milk does not occasion prohibition. - If a woman's milk be administered to a child in a glyster, prohibition by fosterage is not attached to it. - It is recorded from Mohammed that prohibition is thereby established, in the same manner as BOOK III.—CHAP. I.]

POSTERAGE.

A fast would be vitiated by it:—but the reason of this apparent inconsistency (according to the Zahir Rawayet) is that the cause of violating the fast is the restoration of the body, which is effected by the glyster: whereas the cause of prohibition by fosterage is the increase of the body’s growth, which is not thereby effected, nothing being sustenance to men except what is administered by the mouth.

If a man’s breasts should happen to produce milk, prohibition is not attached to it, because the substance thus produced is not, in fact, milk, and consequently increase of growth is not obtained by means of it.—The principle upon which this proceeds is that milk cannot be secreted in the breasts of any person but one who is capable of childbearing.

Prohibition by fosterage is not attached to the milk of a goat (or other animal) that is to say, if two infants, a male and a female, were to subsist together, upon the milk of one goat, prohibition by fosterage is not established between them, because between mankind and brutes there can be no participation of blood (that is to say, such participation as would occasion affinity) and prohibition by fosterage arises from participation of blood.

Case of one of two wives suckling the other.

If a man marry an infant and an adult, and the latter should give milk to the former, both wives become prohibited with respect to that man (their husband); because if they were to continue united in marriage to him, it would imply the propriety of joint cohabitation with the foster-mother and her foster-daughter, which is prohibited, in the same manner as joint cohabitation with a natural mother and daughter.—It is to be observed on this occasion, that if the husband should not have had carnal connexion with the adult wife, she is not entitled to any dower whatsoever because the separation has proceeded from her, before consummation:—but the infant has a claim to her half dower, the separation not having proceeded from her.

Objection.—The separation proceeds from her, because sucking the milk from the breast was her act.

Reply.—Although the sucking was certainly her act, yet the act of such an one is not considered as destructive of her right, for which reason it is that if she should happen to kill her inheritor, this would not set aside her right of inheritance.—If, moreover, it should appear that the adult had acted with any sinister view of dissolving the marriage, the husband is in this case empowered to take from her the half dower which he pays to the infant; but not unless she have acted with such a view, even though she were aware of the infant being the wife of her husband. It is recorded from Mohammed, that the husband is authorized to take the infant’s half dower from the adult, in either case,—that is to say, whether a dissolution of the marriage may have been her intention po not; but the former (which is the Zahir Rawayet) is the more orthodox opinion, because although the adult has by her act fixed and rendered binding upon the husband the half dower aforesaid (which had before stood within the possibility of dropping*), and her so doing amounts to a damage, yet she here stands (not as the actual perpetrator, but) as the cause of the damage, since the act of giving her milk to the infant is not the occasion of dissolving the marriage any further than as it induces a consequence of joint cohabitation with the step-mother and step-daughter:—moreover, the annulling of a marriage is not what renders a dower obligatory, but is rather the occasion of its drooping; but the half dower is incumbent, in the manner of a Matat, or present, in compliance with established custom; and the annulling of the marriage is the condition of its becoming incumbent; and in this view the adult is the cause of the damage; and as being the cause only, and not the actual perpetrator, transgression is made a condition of her responsibility, the same as in the case of digging a well,—that is to say, if a person were to transgress, in digging a well, by sinking it in another person’s ground, or in the highway, he is responsible for the Deevat of any one who might happen to fall into it, whereas, if the well were sunk in his own ground, he would not be responsible:—now this transgression is not found in the adult, unless where she is aware of the infant being the wife of her husband, and that her view is sucking it is a dissolution of the marriage: but where she is not aware of that circumstance, or being so, yet gives her milk, not with any view of dissolving the marriage, but rather of preserving the infant from perishing, in neither of these cases is transgression supposed to exist; and, in the same manner, it does not exist, if she knew that the infant is the wife of her husband, but be not aware that her sucking it will occasion a dissolution of the marriage.

Objection.—No regard is paid to ignorance of the law in a Mussulman territory; how, therefore, can ignorance be pleaded in her excuse in the present case?

Reply.—Regard is here paid to her ignorance, not in order to avert the sentence of the law (which induces responsibility upon her), but solely to avert the construction of intent of dissolution, or of wilful transgression, to which her act might otherwise be liable, and which being thus disproved, she is exonerated from responsibility as these are the only causes thereof, and neither of them can apply to her.

Evidence to fosterage requires the full—

*That is to say, the obligation of which might possibly have been annulled or cancelled by the occurrence of some accident previous to the payment of it, such as the decease of the infant before consummation of the marriage &c.
number of witnesses.—The evidence of woman alone is not sufficient to establish fostorage; nor can it be established but on the testimony of two men, or of one man and two women.—Imam Malik has said that it may be established on the evidence of one woman, provided she be an Adil, because prohibition is one of the rights of the law, and may therefore be established upon a single information,—as, for instance, where a person purchases flesh meat, and any one bears testimony to its being part of a Majoose sacrifice, in which case prohibition is established with respect to it.—The argument of our doctors is that the establishment of prohibition in marriage is in no respect different from the extinction of a right of possession; and the annulling of a right of possession cannot take place but upon the evidence of two men, or of one man and two women:—contrary to the case of flesh meat, as the prohibition to the eating may be established without affecting the proprietor’s right of possession, it still remaining his property under that prohibition:—the prohibition of this article, therefore, appears to be merely a matter of religion, and in which, consequently, a single evidence suffices.

CHAPTER I.

OF TALAK-AL-SONNA, OR REGULAR DIVORCE.

Distinctions of divorce.—Divorce is of three kinds;—First, the Aksan, or most

*Talak-al-Sonna literally means “divorce according to the rules of the Sonna,” in laudable;—SECOND, the Hoosn, or laudable (which are the distinctions of the Talak-al-Sonna); and THIRD, the Biddat, or irregular.

Talak Ahsan.—The Talak Ahsan, or most laudable divorce, is where the husband repudiates his wife by a single sentence, within a Tohr (or term of purity),* during which he has not had carnal connexion with her, and then leaves her to the observance of her Edit, or prescribed term of probation. This mode of divorce is termed the most laudable, for two reasons:—First, because the companions of the Prophet chiefly esteemed those who gave no more than one divorce until the expiration of the Edit, as holding this to be a more excellent method than that of giving three divorces, by repeating the sentence on each of the two succeeding Tohrs;—Secondly, because in pursuing this method the husband leaves it still in his power, without any shame, to recover his wife, if he so inclined, by a reversal of the divorce during her Edit: this method is, moreover, the least injurious to the woman, as she thus remains a lawful subject of marriage to her husband even after the expiration of her Edit † which leaves a latitude in her favour unreprobt by any of the leant.

Talak Hoosn.—The Talak Hoosn or laudable divorce, is where a husband repudiates an enjoyed wife by three sentences of divorce, in three Tohrs. Imam Malik asserts that this method classes with the Biddat, or irregular, and that no more than one divorce is admitted as unexceptionable, because, as being in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, it is only the urgency of a release from an unsuitable woman that can give a sanction to divorce; and this urgency is fully answered by a single Tohr. The arguments of our doctors on this topic are twofold:—First, a precept of the Prophet delivered to Ebn Amir, “One thing required by the Sonna is that ye wait for the Tohr and pronounce a divorce in each Tohr;”—Secondly, the propriety of a divorce rests merely upon the establishment of the actual urgency itself; that being a matter concealed and unascertained [but by virtual proof,] and the act of proceeding to divorce at a time when the desire of coition with the woman is fresh renewed (to wit, at the recommencement of her Tohr), is a proof of the urgency; opposition to Talak Biddat, which signifies a novel, unauthorized or heterodox mode of divorce: the terms regular and irregular are here adopted as being the most familiar.

†Contrary to any other mode of divorce, as a wife repudiated in any other way cannot be again married to her first husband, unless she be previously married to, and divorced by, another man.
and the repetition of divorce at the two subsequent returns of the Tohr amounts to no more than a repetition of the proof, and is therefore allowed. Some of the learned have said that, in this species of divorce, it is most advisable that the husband delay pronouncing the first sentence of it until towards the termination of the Tohr, so as that the Edit may not be too much protracted; but it is evident that the husband should rather pronounce the divorce at the commencement of the Tohr, because, if he were to delay it, he might probably be tempted to have carnal connexion with the woman in the interim, under an intention of divorcing her, and then divorce her after such carnal connexion, which is forbidden.

_Talak Biddat.—_The Talak Biddat, or irregular divorce, is where a husband repudiates his wife by three divorces at once,—(that is, included in one sentence), or where he repeats the sentence separately, thrice within one Tohr; and if a husband give three divorces in either of those ways, the three hold good but yet the divorcer is an offender against the law.

_Shafeti_ has said that all these three descriptions of divorce are equally exceptional and legal, because divorce is in itself a lawful act, whence it is that certain laws have been instituted respecting it; and this legality prevents any idea of danger being annexed to it: moreover, divorce is not prohibited, even during the woman's courses, the prohibition there applying to the protraction of the Edit, and not to divorce.—Our doctors, on the other hand, say that divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, as it dissolves marriage, an institution which involves many circumstances as well of a temporal as of a spiritual nature; nor is its propriety at all admitted, but on the ground of urgency of release from an unsuitable wife: and there is no occasion, in order to procure this release, to give three divorces at once, whereas there is an excuse for giving three divorces separately in three Tohrs, as this exhibits repeated proofs of the urgency of it:—and with respect to what _Shafeti_ advances, that "the legality of divorce prevents any idea of danger being annexed to it," we answer that the legality of divorce, in one respect (that is to say, inasmuch as it is a destroyer of subjection), does not admit the idea of its being dangerous, but that, in another respect (to wit, its occasioning the dissolution of marriage, which involves concerns both of a spiritual and temporal nature), it must be considered as attended with danger.

The pronouncing for two divorces within one Tohr comes under the description of Bidat, or irregular, the same as that of three divorces, as already estimated.

A_uestion has arisen among the learned, whether the pronouncing of a single divorce irreversible within one Tohr be of the description of Biddat or not?—Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, has said,—"Whoever gives an irreversible divorce, although it be within the Tohr, forsakes the Sonna, as there is no urgent necessity for such a sentence to effect release from the wife, since by the lapse of the Edit that end is obtained;" but again, in the Zeeadat, he says that this method is not to be reprobated, on account of the occasional urgency of immediate release, which by an irreversible divorce is obtained, it not being then suspended upon the lapse of the Edit.

_Points to be attended to in adhering to the Sonna divorce._—Sonna [that is, attention to the mode prescribed by the Sonna] in divorce appears in two shapes, adherence to number, and to time; to the former, by restricting the sentence to that of a single divorce reversible, in which the enjoyed and the unenjoyed wife are the same;—and to the latter (in which the enjoyed wife is solely considered), by pronouncing the divorce in a Tohr during which the husband has not had carnal connexion with her,—because it is the proof of urgency that is regarded; and the act of proceeding to a divorce at a time when the desire of coition with the woman is fresh renewed (as at the recommencement of her Tohr), is the best proof of such urgency: for during the actual time of the courses the woman is not an object of desire, and in a Tohr where she has been enjoyed, desire is lessened towards her. With respect to an unenjoyed wife, the Tohr and the courses are equal,—that is to say, the pronouncing of divorce upon her whilst she is in the latter situation is not irregular, nor reprobated, any more than whilst in the former. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, he considering an unenjoyed wife in the same point of view as one enjoyed:—but our doctors observe that the desire of coition, with respect to an unenjoyed woman, is ever fresh, and is not lessened by the circumstance of her courses, so long as the husband's object (namely, coition), remains unobtained; whereas, with respect to an enjoyed wife, desire is renewed upon the Tohr.

_Description of adherence to the Sonna in repudiating a wife not subject to the courses._—If the wife be a person who, from extreme youth or age, is not subject to the courses, and her husband be desirous to repudiate her by three divorces in the regular way, he is first to pronounce a single sentence of divorce upon her, and at the expiration of one month another, and in like manner a third at the expiration of the next succeeding month; because the term of one month corresponds with a return of the courses, as is mentioned in the Koran.—It is here to be observed that if the first divorce be given in the beginning of the month, the three months from that period are to be counted by the lunar calendar, and if in the middle of it, by the number of days, with respect both to the completion of divorce and of the Edit.—This is the rule with Hanefea.—The two disciples maintain that the second and third months are to be invariably counted by the lunar calendar.
the deficiency of the first month to be taken from the fourth succeeding month, so as to complete it. And it is also to be observed that it is lawful for the husband to divorce this wife immediately after carnal connexion, without the intervention of any time between the embrace and the divorce. —Ziffer says that the husband ought to allow the intervention of a month, because the term corresponds with a return of the courses, and also, because in consequence of the embrace desire becomes languid, and is not renewed until after the lapse of some time. —Our doctors argue that there can be no apprehension of, pregnancy with respect to the woman in question; and divorce, after the carnal embrace, in the case of a woman who is subject to the courses, is not reprobated on any other account than as it induces a possibility of pregnancy, which renders the duration of her Edit dubious, that of a pregnant woman being determined by her delivery, and, of one not pregnant, by courses; and as to what Ziffer alleges, that desire becomes languid in consequence of the embrace, it may be replied, that although this be admitted, yet in the present instance desire is greater than in common cases, as the husband can indulge his carnal appetite with such a wife without any apprehension of her producing children, the support of whom might fall upon him; she therefore is an object of desire to him at all times equally, so that this state [of a woman not being subject to the courses] is the same as the state of actual pregnancy; now it is lawful to divorce a pregnant wife immediately after carnal connexion with her, because no doubt is induced with respect to the duration of her Edit, and the time of pregnancy is a time of desire, as a husband feels desire towards a pregnant wife, either because she produces a child to him, or because the embrace with her does not occasion pregnancy; his desire, therefore, is not lessened towards such a wife by enjoyment.

Or one who is pregnant. —If a man be desirous of repudiating his pregnant wife by three divorces in the regular way [that is, according to the Sonna], he is first to pronounce a single sentence of divorce upon her, and at the expiration of one month another, and in the same manner a third at the expiration of the next succeeding month. This is according to Haneefa and Aboo Yosaf. —Mohammed and Ziffer say that the Talak-al-Sonna, with respect to a pregnant woman, consists in giving her a single divorce only, because divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure; moreover, the only rule instituted by the law, in effecting a triplicate divorce, is that the husband proclaims one divorce, and at the expiration of a month, or the passing of the next courses, another and in the same manner a third at the expiration of the following month or the passing of the next succeeding courses; now the courses do not occur to a pregnant woman, nor does the lapse of a month stand in place of a return of her courses (as with a woman whose youth or age prevents her having them), her whole period of pregnancy being as one long tohr; and hence it follows that it is improper to pronounce more than a single sentence, the rule of the Sonna being restrictive to one divorce in one tohr. —To this Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf reply that, although divorce be in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, yet it is admitted on the ground of urgency, and the lapse of a month is the proof of that urgency, and is therefore to be regarded here, the same as in the case of a woman whose youth or age prevents her having the courses: the foundation of this is that the period in question is such a time as affords a renewal of desire to persons in health and vigour, and therefore the act of divorce being proceeded in at such a season affords proof of the urgency of it, with respect to a pregnant woman, the same as to any other; contrary to a woman whose tohr is long [that is, by constitution or accident prolonged to any unusual length], as the lapse of a month is not a proof of necessity with respect to such an one; this proof of necessity being found in her only on the renewal of the Tohr after the courses, the recurrence of which, with regard to her, is at all times possible, whereas, with regard to a pregnant woman, it is impossible.

Case of divorce pronounced during menstruation. —If a man repudiate his wife during her courses, it is valid; because, although divorce within the term of the courses be disapproved, yet it is lawful, nevertheless, as the disapproval is not on account of any thing essential, but merely because a divorce given during the courses occasions a protraction of the Edit. —This kind of disapproval, or interdict, is termed Niheee-le-ghireeh, and does not forbid legality, whence a divorce given during the courses is valid; but yet it is laudable that the husband reverse it as it is recorded that the son of Omar having divorced his wife during her courses, the Prophet desired Omar to command his son to take her back again; which tradition shows that divorce during the courses is valid, but that reversal is in this case laudable. —This doctrine of the laudability of reversal is maintained by many of our modern doctors; but it is certain that, in this case, reversal is not only laudable, but incumbent, for three reasons: First, in the tradition above quoted, the Prophet desires Omar positively "to command his son," and command is always injunctive; Secondly, the pronouncing of divorce during the courses is an offence, which it is incumbent upon a man to expiate by every means within his power; and this may be effected, in the present instance, by doing away its consequence, namely, the Edit; Thirdly, the protraction of the Edit...
is injurious to the woman, wherefore reversal is incumbent, the order that she may not be subjected to injury;—thus it is indispensably incumbent upon the husband to reverse the divorce, when given during the courses;
after which, when she has become purified
from her courses, and has again had them, he may then either divorce her on the commencement of her second succeeding Tohr, or suffer her to remain. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this last is what is said in the Mabsoot. Tehavee has said that, if the husband choose he may regularly divorce his wife on the commencement of the Tohr immediately succeeding the courses in which he had given divorce, and reversed it, as above, Koorokhee says that what is thus mentioned by Tehavee is the doctrine of Haneefa. That which is taken from the Mabsoot is the opinion of the two disciples, and the ground of it is that the regularity of divorce depends upon the intervention of a complete menstrual discharge between every two sentences; and the first of these is defective, on account of divorce having been pronounced in the middle of it, so that as part had previously elapsed, whence it would appear necessary to complete it from the next following return; but it is not lawful to have regard to one part only of the courses, and not to the other; consequently, regard must be had to the next returning courses in toto.
—The ground of Tehavee’s opinion is that the divorce, with its effects, having been annulled entirely by the reversal, it is the same as if no divorce whatever had taken place during the woman’s courses; and hence it is perfectly regular to pronounce divorce
in the Tohr next immediately succeeding.
If a man were to address his wife, saying,
“You are divorced thrice, according to the Son-na,”—and he have no particular intention in so doing, then supposing the wife to be one with whom he has had carnal connexion, and also subject to the courses, she becomes once divorced in that and each of the two succeeding weeks; and if the husband intended in so saying, either that three divorces should take place collectively upon the instant, or, that a single divorce should take effect at the end of each succeeding month, the divorce, in each instance, takes effect according to his intention, whether she be in her courses or her Tohr at the period of its thus taking effect upon her. And if she be one whose Edit is calculated by months (such as a woman, for instance, whose courses are stopt through age), and the husband have no particular intention in thus addressing her, in this case a single divorce takes effect upon the instant, another at the expiration of a month, and a third at the expiration of the next suc-
ceding month; because the term of a month corresponds, in such an one, with the Tohr of a woman who is subject to the courses, as was formerly observed; or if he intended that three divorces should take place collectively upon the instant, the three take place accordingly, in the manner already stated.
But if the husband were only to say, “You are divorced according to the Sonna,” com-ting the word “thrice,”—in this case the intention of three divorces collectively is not efficient. The proofs and arguments upon this passage are all drawn from the Arabic, and derive their weight from certain peculi-larities in that idiom.

Section

Of the persons who are competent to pronounce divorce—The divorce of every husband is effective, if he be of sound understanding, and mature age; but that of a boy, or a lunatic or one talking in his sleep, is not effective, for two reasons:—First, because the Prophet has said “Every divorce is lawful, excepting that of a boy or a lunatic;”—Secondly, because a man’s competency to act depends upon his possession of a sound judgment, which is not the case with infants, or lunatics:—and one talking in his sleep is the same, in this point, as a boy or a lunatic, since his words in this case are not the result of a deliberate option.

A divorce pronounced by compulsion, is effective—The divorce of one acting upon compulsion, from threats, is effective, according to our doctors.—Shafee maintains that it is not effective, because a person who is compelled has no option, and no formal act of law is worthy of regard unless it be purely optional; contrary to the case of a jester, who in mentioning divorce, acts from option which is the cause of its validity.—Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the person here mentioned pronounces divorce
under circumstances of complete competency [maturity of age and sanity of intellect], the result of which is that divorce takes effect equally with that of a person uncompiled for with him in necessity:—is the reason of its efficiency; and the same reason applies to the divorce of a compelled person, as he is also under necessity of divorce, in order that he may be released from the apprehension of that with which he was threatened by the compeller.—The foundation of this is that the man alluded to has the choice of two evils; one, the thing with which he is threatened or compelled; and the other, divorce upon compulsion; and viewing both,
he makes choice of that which appears to him
the easiest, namely, divorce; and this proves that he has an option, though he be not desirous that its effect should be established, or, in other words, that divorce should take place upon it; nor does this circumstance forbid the efficiency of his sentence: as in the case of a jester; that is to say, if a man pronounce a divorce in jest, it takes effect, even though he be not desirous that it should;
and so likewise the divorce of one who is compelled.

Namely, the necessity of separation from a wife, who may be odious or disagreeable to him.
Or in a state of inebriety, is valid.—If a man pronounce a divorce whilst he is in a state of inebriety from drinking any fermented liquor, such as wine, the divorce takes place. Koorokhee and Teavee hold that divorce ought not to take place in this case; and there is also an opinion recorded from Shafei to the same effect. The argument upon which they maintain this doctrine is that reality of intention is connected with the exercise of reason, which is suspended during intoxication from wine; in the same manner as where a person has taken any allowed but inebriating medicine, such as laudanum, in which case a divorce pronounced would not take effect, and so in this case also. But to this our doctors reply that, in the case now under consideration, the suspension of reason being occasioned by an offence, the reason of the speaker is supposed still to remain, whence it is that his sentence of divorce effect, in order to deter him from drinking fermented liquors, which are prohibited. But yet if a man were to drink wine to so great a degree as to produce a delirium or inflammation of the brain, thereby suspending his reason, and he in that situation pronounce divorce, it will not take effect.

And so also that of a dumb person.—The divorce of a dumb person is effectual, if it be expressed by positive and intelligible signs, because signs of the dumb are authorized by custom, and are therefore admitted to speak in the place of speech, in the present instance in order to answer the necessity of him who makes them. The various species of signs used by the dumb in divorce shall be set forth hereafter.

Number of divorces in respect to free women and slaves.—The utmost number of divorces, with respect to a female slave, is two, whether her husband be a slave or free: and the same, with respect to a free woman is three. Shafei has said that, in the number of divorces, respect is to be had to the state of the man; that is to say, if the husband be free he is empowered to pronounce three divorces, although his wife be a slave; whereas, if he be a slave, he is not authorized to give more than two divorces, although his wife should be a free woman, the Prophet having said "In divorce the state of the husband is to be regarded, and in the Editt that of the wife:"—moreover, personal consequence is an essential circumstance in all points of authority, and that appertains to a freeman in a higher degree than to a slave, whence his authority, is most extensive. The arguments of our doctors are twofold upon this topic:—First, a precept of the Prophet, declaring, "The divorce of a female slave are two, and her Editt is two courses;—Secondly, it is the woman who is the subject of legality, and this legality entitles her to benefits; but slavery entitles only to half of these benefits; hence it follows that the divorce of a female slave should not exceed one and a half, but such subdivision of it being impossible, her divorces extend to two

As to the saying of the Prophet quoted by Shafei, that "in divorce the state of the husband is to be regarded," it means no more than that the efficiency to divorce proceeds from him.

A master cannot divorce the wife of his slave.—The divorce of a slave upon his wife takes place; but that of a master upon the wife of his slave is of no effect, because the matrimonial propriety being a right of the slave, the relinquishment of it rests with the slave, not with his master.

CHAPTER II.

Distinctions.—Divorce (in respect to the execution of it) is of two kinds: Sareeh or express, and Kinayat, or by implication:—and first of express divorce.

The manner of express divorce—Talak Sareeh, or express divorce, is where a husband delivers the sentence in direct and simple terms, as if he were to say, "I have divorced you," or "you are divorced" which effects a Talak Rijai, or divorce reversible,—that is to say, a divorce such as leaves it in the husband's power lawfully to take back his wife at any time before the expiration of the Editt: and these forms are termed Sareeh, or express, as not being used in any sense but divorce; and it appears in the sacred writings that reversal after an express divorce is lawful.—The intention is not a condition of divorce taking place from these forms, for the same reason as was already assigned, to wit because they directly express divorce, as not being used in any other sense.—And it is to be observed that a reversible divorce only is effectuated by these forms, although the intention of the husband be a complete divorce, because his intention is here to effect that upon the instant which the law suspends upon the lapse of the Editt, and is therefore unworthy of regard: and if his intention should be merely to express a delivery from bondage (which the term Talak is occasionally used to imply), and he make a declaration to this effect before the Kazee, it is not admitted, as it disagrees with his apparent design: but yet it is admitted before God, because he intended in those words a meaning which they are capable of bearing: and if his intention be to express a release from bodily labours, his declaration to this effect is not at all admitted, either before the Kazee, or before God, as the word Talak does not bear the construction of release with respect to bodily labour, although it may occasionally bear that construction with respect to bondage: and it is also to be remarked that no more than a single divorce can be effectuated by these forms, although the intention be more.—Shafei alleges that divorce takes place according to whatever the intention may be — The proofs on each side are drawn from the Arabic.

Different formulas of express divorce.—If a man say to his wife, "You are [under] divorce," or "You are divorced by divorce," or, "You are divorced according to divorce, " without any particular intention, or intending thereby one divorce, or two divorces, a single divorce reversible takes place; and if his intention be that divorces a triple or a divorce takes place accordingly — The proofs are drawn on this occasion from the Arabic.

If a man were to say to his wife (as above), "You are divorced by divorcement," and declare that by the word "divorce," he meant one divorce, and by the word "divorcement," a second divorce, his declaration is credited, because each of these words are capable of being construed into an intention of effecting divorce, and hence two reversible divorces take place, provided the woman has been enjoyed by him.

If a man apply divorce to the whole woman, by saying (for instance), "You are divorced," in this case divorce takes place, on account of its application to its proper subject, namely, the woman, the relative "You" implying the woman's person in too; and the rule is the same where he applies it to any particular part or member, from which the whole person is necessarily understood, as if he were to say, "your neck," or "your trunk," or "your head," or "your body," or "your vulva,"—"is divorced,"—for by such words the whole person is implied, the terms trunk and body bearing that sense evidently, and the others in common use; and they moreover occur, both in the tradition, and also in the Koran; and, according to one tradition, the term blood may also be used in the same sense. Divorce takes place also where it is applied to any general portion of the wife, as if the husband were to say to her, "your half," or "your third, is divorced,"—because any general portion is a proper subject of all acts, such as sale, purchase, and so forth, and is therefore equally so of divorce; but the subject in question (to wit, the woman) is incapable ofdivision, and hence divorce is established upon her in too, and is not restricted to the portion mentioned.

Divorce when applied to any specific part or member of the body such as does not (in common use) imply the whole person, is of no effect.—If the husband say to his wife, "your hand," or "your foot, is divorced," divorce does not take place.—Ziffer and Shafei maintain that it does: and the same difference of opinion subsists where the divorce is applied to any other specific member, or organ such as does not imply

*These and the succeeding forms of divorce, literally rendered, are most of them apparently unintelligible, or absurd; they are each, however, to be considered as having some peculiar force or effect, which it is impossible to express, or to convey an idea of, in translation.

the whole person, as the ear or the nose, &c.

—The argument of Ziffer and Shafei is, that those members contribute to the matrimonial enjoyments, such as kissing, touching, and so forth, and whatever is of this description, as being a subject of the laws of marriage, is a proper subject of divorce, and when divorce is applied to it, it takes place upon it, and consequently extends to the whole person, in the same manner as where it is applied to any general portion such as an half, and so forth; contrary to the application of marriage, to any specific member, such as the hand or the foot, in which case the marriage is not valid, because it is not conceivable that legality should be established in that particular member, and extend, in consequence, to the whole person, as the illegality existing in the other members exceeds the legality in that particular member, whereas, the reverse holds in divorce.—To this our doctors reply, that a specific member, such as the hand or foot; not being in itself a proper subject of divorce, the application of that too is null, the same as to a woman's spittle, or to her nails, the ground of which is that the subject of divorce must be something upon which a bond or connexion may exist (as divorce implies the dissolution of a bond or connexion), and there is no bond upon the hand; for which reason it is that the application of marriage to that part is invalid; contrary to a general portion of the body, which being (with our doctors) a proper subject of marriage, the application of that too is valid, and it is consequently a proper subject of divorce also. There is a similar difference of opinion where the divorce is applied to the belly or the back; but it is evident that here divorce does not take place, as these parts are never used to imply the whole person.

A partial divorce is complete in its effect. —If a man pronounce upon his wife an half divorce, one divorce takes place, because divorce is not capable of division, and the mention of any portion of a thing of an indivisible nature stands as a mention of the whole; and the fourth, or fifth, or any other proportion of divorce, is analogous to the half, in what is now said, for the same reason.

Equivocal.—If a husband say to his wife, "you are under three moieties of two divorces," three divorces take place, because the half of two is one, and consequently three moieties of two divorces amount to three.

And if he were to say, "you are under three moieties of one divorce," some are of opinion that two divorces take place, this amounting to one and a half; but others allege that it produces three divorces, because every moiety amounts to one complete divorce, on the principle already stated: various doctors agree in approving the former opinion.

And indefinite form.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce, from one o two," or "between one and two," in this case one divorce takes place; and if he were to say,—"from one to three," or "between one and three," two divorces take place.—This is the doctrine of Haneef—a The two disciples assert that by the first form two divorces take place and by the last three—Ziffer, on the other hand, maintains that by the first form no divorce takes place, and by the second one divorce only, is permissible to analogy, because the boundaries of a thing are not included in the contents; as for example, where a man says, "I have sold such a piece of ground, from this wall to that wall," in which case neither wall is included in the sale.—The ground of opinion of the two disciples is that, in such a mode of speaking, the whole is by custom understood, as for example, where one man says to another, "take of my property, from one Dirm to a hundred," which implies the whole hundred."...The argument of Haneef is that, in this indefinite mode of expression, no particular number is implied, any more than where a man in discourse, says, "my age is from sixty to seventy years," or "between sixty and seventy," by which he means some indefinite term between these two; and in reply to the argument of the two disciples, it is sufficient to observe that the whole is to be understood only where the expression relates to a thing of an indifferent nature, as in the instance cited by them; but divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure; and to what is advanced by Ziffer it may be answered, that it is necessary that the first boundary be in existence, so as that the second may bear a relation to it; but in the present case the first boundary (to wit divorce), is not in being, nor can be so, unless by divorce taking place, which it accordingly does of necessity: contrary to the case of sale, cited by Ziffer as apposite to this because there both boundaries (understood by the two walls) do actually exist previous to the sale. It is to be observed on this occasion, that if the husband, speaking in the second form, intend only a single divorce, it is admitted with God, as he may be allowed to intend whatever construction the words will bear, but it is not admitted with the magistrate as being contrary to apparent circumstances.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced once by twice," intending the multiple or multiplied product thereof, or not having any particular intention, a single divorce reversible takes place. Ziffer says that two divorces take place, such being the number understood from this mode of speaking in arithmetic; and this opinion is adopted by HASN-BIN-ZEED. But if, in speaking as above, he intend to say, "you are divorced once and twice," three divorces take place accordingly, because this way of speaking is capable of that construction, as the word fee [by] has also [in the Arabic] the sense of and if, however, the woman be unenjoyed, no more than one divorce takes place, as in the case where a man says to his unenjoyed wife, "you are divorced once and twice," but if he intend to say, "you are divorced once with twice," three divorces take place, although she should be unenjoyed;—and if he mean to express himself in a sense which implies that the one is contained in the other as if he were to say, "you are divorced once in twice," and divorce takes place, the superadded words in twice being held to be redundant, because divorce is incapable of being a container.*

If a husband say to his wife, "you are divorced twice by twice," intending the multiple; yet no more than two divorces take place. With Ziffer three divorces take place, because from this multiplying mode of expression is to be understood four divorces, and three consequently take place, as being the greatest lawful number.

Divorce with a reference to place.—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced from this place to Syria," a single divorce reversible takes place. Ziffer says that it occasions a complete or irreversible divorce, because, where he thus gives the divorce a description of length, it is the same as if he were to say, "you are under a long divorce," and if he were to say so, a complete divorce would take place, and consequently the same in the present instance. Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the sentence does not affix any description of length to the divorce, but rather the reverse, because when divorce takes effect in any one place it does so in all.

If a man were to say, "you are under divorce in Mecca," divorce takes place upon her immediately in every country; and so also if he were to say, "you are divorced in this house," because divorce is not restricted to any particular place,—and if he were to intend, by thus speaking, that "she shall become divorced if over she should enter Mecca, or that house," his declaration to this effect is admitted with God but not with the KAWZEE, as the tenor of his words apparently contradict this construction.

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce when you enter Mecca," in this case no divorce takes place until she enter Mecca, he having suspended the divorce upon that circumstance.—And if he say, "you are divorced in entering the house," this means "if you enter the house," because the containing particle frequently stands expressive of a condition, and not being applicable here in its containing sense, it necessarily assumes the meaning of a condition.

Of Divorce with a Reference to Time.

If a man say so to his wife, "you are divorced this day to-morrow, or "you are

*The words in the original are, "Ante Talikoon wahdetoon fee Sinnatinee," which is an indefinite or equivocal mode of expression, as the word fee (among various other senses) bears those of by, with, or and, as well as in, which accounts for the distinction here made, and the latitude permitted.
he was married as this day, divorce does not take place at all, because he has here referred divorce to a period in which he was not competent to pronounce it, and therefore his divorce is nugatory, the same as if he were to say, 'you are under divorce before my existence.'—But, in the present case, if he had married her before the time of which he speaks, divorce takes place at the time of his speaking; because, if a man signifies a divorce in the preterite form, it is an indication in the present, and hence the divorce takes place accordingly, this expression being an indication of what is new, and not a relation of what is past, as it does not appear that he pronounced any divorce yesterday, so as that he should now give intelligence thereof.*

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce previous to our marriage with me,"—divorce does not take place, because he applies the divorce to a period which forecloses it, the same as if he were to say, "you are under divorce in my infancy," or in my sleep."

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce upon my not divorcing you," or "when I do not divorce you," and then remain silent, divorce takes place, because he has here applied it to a time which appears the moment he ceases to speak.—But, if he were to say, "you are under divorce if I do not divorce you," divorce does not take place until near the period of his decease, because here the condition does not become established until life be despaired of.

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce, whilst I do not divorce you, you are divorced," she becomes divorced on account of the last repudiation, to wit, "you are divorced."—This is where the last word of the sentence is uninterruptedly connected with the first part of it, and proceeds upon a favourable construction; for analogy would suggest that the first divorce takes place also (to wit, "you are divorced whilst I do not divorce you") and thus both divorces would take place, provided the woman be enjoyed; and such is the opinion of Ziffer; but the reason for the more favourable construction here, is that it is the intention of the vower to fulfil his vow, in such a manner that he may not be foresworn, which is impossible in the present case, unless that portion of time which may enable him to pronounce the divorce be excepted from his speech, "you are divorced whilst I do not divorce you," and being thus excepted, divorce takes place, on account of the words which follow. Cases

The reasoning here turns solely upon certain idiomatical peculiarities in the construction of the Arabic language, in which the preterite is frequently adopted, by the law, in a creative sense. (See book II. Chap. I.)

* This is an Arabic mode of expression, implying no more than that here the particle in is understood.

DIVORCE.

A man says to a strange woman, "you are under divorce the day upon which I marry you," and he afterwards marry her in the night, she is divorced; because by day it is sometime meant the day time, and this sense alone it bears where it relates to a matter, of continuance (such as fasting, for instance), and sometimes it is meant to express time in general, which sense it bears where it relates to a transient or momentary transaction and of this nature is the act of divorce; and consequently by the word day in the present case, is to be understood time generally, applying equally to day and night both — but if the husband were to say that by day he meant the daytime, and not time generally, his declaration is admitted with the Kazee, as he may be allowed to have intended that construction which is applicable to the word day, since, according to custom, day applies to the daylight, and night to darkness.

Section.

If a husband say to his wife, "I am divorced from you," by this nothing is established, although divorce be the intention: but if he were to say, "I am separated from you," or "I am prohibited to you," intending divorce, becomes divorced. — Shafeei holds that divorce takes place in the former instance, but others hold that it takes place in the latter instance, and such is the intention because the matrimonial right of possession is equally participated by the husband and the wife insomuch that the latter is entitled to demand coition of the former, and the former to demand admission to coition from the latter, and the legality of the carnal enjoyment also appertains equally to both; and divorce being used for the purpose of dissolving the right, and the legality, the application of it to the husband holds good, as well as to the wife, and consequently divorce takes place under the first of the above instances, as well as under the second instance. — The argument of our doctors is that divorce is used for the removal of restraint and this is found in the woman, but not in the man (whence it is that a married woman cannot go out of the house); and admitting that divorce were used for the purpose of dissolving the matrimonial right of possession (as advanced by Shafeei, it may be replied that the husband is the possessor of the wife and the wife possessed of the husband [whence the woman is called the married, and the man the married], and consequently possession applies to woman; contrary to separation or prohibition, the first of these being a total dissolution of connexion, and the second of legality, both of which equally appertain to each of the parties: and hence the application of them to either is equally forcible, whereas that of divorce is of no force except when applied to the wife.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced once or not," divorce does not take place. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that the same is said in the Jama-Sagheer; nor is any difference of opinion recorded there. This is what is said by Haneefa, and borne place by Aboo Yoosaf. According to Mohammed (with whom Aboo Yoosaf in another place coincides) a single divorce reversible takes place; and in the book of divorce in the Mobsoot it is recorded that, where the husband says to his wife, "you are divorced once or nothing" a single divorce reversible takes place, according to Mohammed; now between this and the preceding form there is no sort of difference, and consequently, if the case cited in the Jama-Sagheer be the opinion of all the doctors, it follows that there are two opinions recorded from Mohammed upon the point.

— The argument of the latter is that the number is rendered dubious on account of the particle of doubt "or" intervening between the word "once" and the negative "not," wherefore regard to the former drops, and his words remain; "you are divorced:" contrary to a case where he says, "you are divorced or not," in which instance divorce does not take place, since in this last case the doubt exists with respect to divorce itself. — The arguments of Haneefa are drawn from the Arabic idiom.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced after my death," or "after your death;" no consequence whatever ensues from this expression, because, in the first instance, he has applied the divorce to a time which forbids it, since a husband is not competent to the execution of divorce after death; and, in the second, the woman no longer remains a fit subject of it; and both these circumstances are essential to a legal divorce.

Separation takes place upon either party becoming possessed of the other as a slave—If a husband become the proprietor of his wife [as a slave] either wholly or in part, or the wife the proprietor of her husband, separation takes place between them, possession by bondage and possession by matrimony being irreconcilable; in the latter instance, because, if separation were not to take place, it would follow that the wife is at once the possessor and the possessed (she falling under the latter description by virtue of marriage): and, in the former instance, because possession by matrimony is established of necessity, and when the husband becomes actual possessor of his wife’s person, this necessity ceases, and consequently possession by matrimony also.

Or upon a husband purchasing his wife. — If a man purchases his wife [as a slave], and afterwards divorces her, divorce does not take place, because without the continuance of marriage it cannot exist, and in the present case the marriage has ceased in every shape whatever, since it does not continue even with respect to Edit; and in the same manner, when a wife becomes possessor of her husband, either wholly or in part, if the latter were to divorce her, his divorce does not take effect, because in this case also the marriage has ceased, for the reasons before assigned—Mohammad says that in the latter case, divorce having been good because the woman is enjoined an Edit, and hence the marriage continues in one shape; contrary to a case where the husband purchases his wife, for then the marriage totally ceases, because she is not under any obligation of Edit with respect to her husband, who is now her proprietor, and has a right to continue carnal cohabitation with her in that capacity.

The divorce of a wife (being a slave) when suspended upon the emancipation of her owner, takes place upon the occurrence of that condition—if a man marry the female slave of another, and say to her, "you are divorced twice upon the manumission of your owner," and her owner afterwards emancipate her, the divorce takes place; but it is still in the husband's power to reverse it, because he has suspended the divorce upon the manumission of the master, and that is the condition of it (as a condition is a thing not existing at present, but the occurrence of which is probable, and this case actually takes place on manumission, wherefore that is the condition, and divorce is suspended upon it); and divorce taking place after the occurrence of the condition, it follows that it takes place upon her as a free woman, and hence she is not, by two divorces, rendered prohibited* by a rigorous prohibition.

If the person in question were to say to the female slave, his wife, "when to-morrow arrives you are free," in this case it is not lawful for the husband to marry her again, until such time as she has been married to another man, and repudiated by him, and her Edit (which is three terms of her courses) has elapsed.—This is the doctrine of the two Elders. Mohammad says that the husband is at liberty to reverse the divorce, since the execution of the divorce is connected with the master's manumission, because the husband has suspended his repudiation* upon the same circumstance on which the master has suspended his manumission; hence the repudiation is (as it were) associated with the emancipation; and freedom being also associated with the emancipation, it follows that the execution of divorce is, of course, associated with freedom, and the divorce takes place upon the slave after freedom (whence it is that the Edit of the woman here treated of is fixed at three terms of her courses, whereas if she were a slave, her Edit would be two terms only), and such being the case, reversal is approved, in this, as well as in the preceding example. The argument of the two Elders is that the husband has suspended divorce on the same circumstance upon which the master has suspended freedom, and that takes place upon the woman whilst she is a slave, so does divorce likewise; now the slave becomes forbidden [in marriage to her husband], in consequence of two divorces, by the rigorous prohibition, wherefore reversal is not approved; nor does it become lawful to him to marry her till such time as she shall have been possessed by another husband; but this reason does not apply to the Edit, since that is a matter of caution, which is evident from fixing its duration to three terms of the courses, so that the complete fulfilment of it may be indubitable: and with respect to what Mohammad says, that, "as repudiation is connected with freedom, divorce takes place after freedom," it is of no weight, because, if freedom be connected with manumission, on account of the one being the cause of the other, and if the repudiation and manumission be associated together in such a manner that repudiation and freedom must take place at the same time, we reply that divorce is also associated with repudiation, on account of the latter being the cause of the former; whence it follows, that freedom is associated with divorce, and not that divorce takes place subsequent to freedom.

Section.

Of Divorce by Comparison and the several descriptions of it.

The number of divorces may be determined by signs made with the fingers.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce thus," holding up his thumb and fore and middle finger, three divorces take place, because from the holding up of the fingers number is customarily understood, where the sign is associated with a relative to number; and the word "thus" is of this kind; and the fingers held up are three in number, whence three divorces are to be understood:—and if the sign be given with one finger, a single divorce takes place; if with two fingers, two divorces.—It is to be observed that the sign is to be understood from the fingers which are extended, and not from those which are clenched. Some of our modern doctors, however say that, if it be made with the back of the fingers, it is understood from those which are clenched. And if the divorcer were to say, "I have given the signal with the two clenched fingers," whilst at the same time he had actually given it with the extended fingers, his declaration is credited with God, but not with the Kazee; and so also where he says, "I have intended the signal by the palm of my hand, and not by the fingers;" insomuch that two divorces take place [in the first instance, and one in the last, in a religious view; because signs are made with the shu fingers, or the palm of the hand, as well as with the extended fingers, and hence he may be allowed to have intended to express the number of divorce by signs capable of that construction; but it contradicts appearances.

But not unless it to be expressed with a relation to number.—And in the case now under consideration, if the word “thus” be omitted, and the sign be made with the thumb and fore and middle finger, yet one divorce only takes place, because the sign is not associated with the relative, and hence the words only remain, to wit, “you are divorced” from which one divorce only results.

Divorce pronounced with an expression of vehemence is irreversible in its effect.—If a man give to the divorce which he is pronouncing a description of particular vehemence or amplification, as if he were to say, “you are divorced irrevocably” or “you are divorced to a certainty,” an irreversible divorce takes place, whether the wife whom he so addresses may have been enjoyed or not.—Shafei says that the divorce is irreversible where she has been enjoyed, because reversal during Edit, after divorce from a wife which is enjoyed, is not sanctioned by the precepts of the law, and bringing it to its conclusion is contrary to the description of irreversibility is contrary to them; thus a husband is not at liberty to pronounce, upon an unenjoyed wife, a divorce irreversible; the word “irreversibly,” therefore, is nugatory on this occasion, as much as if he were to say, “you are divorced, with this condition, that no right of reversal remains to me.” The argument of our doctors on this point is, that the man has pronounced the divorce under a description which it is capable of bearing because divorce takes place irreversibly upon a wife unenjoyed (and also upon any other, at the expiration of the Edit); and such being the case, the divorce takes place in this case irreversibly upon an unenjoyed wife, the same as upon one unenjoyed, the husband having, by his description, specified a circumstance which is really applicable to divorce. And with respect to the case of reversal being mentioned as an additional condition (as cited by Shafei in support of his doctrine), it is not admitted; because there also a divorce irreversible takes place, where it is pronounced either without intention, or with the intention, of two divorces; but where three divorces are intended, that number must take place, as irreversibility bears the construction of three divorces.

If a man say to his wife, “you are divorced irreversible,” or “you are divorced to a certainty, and intend by his words “you are divorced,” to express one divorce, and by the additional words “irreversibly,” or “to a certainty,” another divorce, two divorces irreversible take place, as these expressions are of themselves capable of effecting divorce.

If a husband say to his wife, “you are under a most enormous divorce,” a divorce irreversible takes place, because divorce is thus described only with a view to its effect in the immediate dissolution of the marriage and hence the description of it by enormity is the same as by irreversibility. And it is the same if he were to say, “a most base divorce,” or “the worst kind of divorce;” and so also if he were to say, “a diabolical divorce, or “an irregular divorce;” because irreversible divorce is restricted to those of the regular description [or Talak-al-Sonna], and consequently all others are of an irreversible nature.—It is recorded by an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that, where the husband says “an irregular divorce,” a divorce irreversible does not follow, unless such be the intention, because irregularity [Bidder] in divorce is of two kinds,—one originating in the circumstance under which divorce is executed (as where it is pronounced upon the wife during her courses),—the other, in the nature of the sentence (as where the husband pronounces the divorce irreversible in direct terms), and hence it is indispensably requisite that the intention be regarded. It is also recorded as an opinion of Mohammed, that from the nature of the descriptions irregular or diabolical, a divorce irreversible takes place, any divorce may be thus described, not with a view to irreversibility, but merely to the irregularity of the circumstances under which it is pronounced (as where it is pronounced upon the woman during her courses), and hence the divorce is not irreversible, unless such be the intention.

If a man say to his wife, “you are under a divorce like a mountain,” a divorce irreversible takes place, according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf holds that the divorce is reversible, because a mountain is a single thing, and hence the comparison of divorce with a mountain gives the former a description of unity. The argument of the other two sages is, that simile, in divorce, is always used in an amplifying sense; and amplification implies irreversibility; whence a divorce irreversible is the effect.

If a man say to his wife, “you are under a most vehement divorce,” or “you are divorced like a thousand,” or “a houseful,” one divorce irreversible takes place, unless his intention be three divorces, in which case three take place accordingly. The divorce is irreversible from the first of these forms, because there is there mentioned under a description of vehemence which occasions irreversibility, as applying something in its nature decisive, and incapable of recall,—whereas, divorce reversible is capable of recall, and therefore the description of vehemence does not apply to it; and it is irreversible from the second form, because this simile sometimes expresses force, and sometimes number (as it is said, for instance, that such a man is like a thousand, by which it is to be understood that he is possessed of uncommon strength), and hence the intention applies with equal propriety to either sense; and where no intention exists, the least extensive meaning of the two is adopted, to wit, one divorce irreversible; and from the third form, because a house may be filled either by the magnitude of its contents, or by the number, and hence the intention ap-
Divorces when pronounced with a simile, is always irreversible.—It is a rule, with Haneefa, that whenever divorce is thus pronounced with a simile, it produces a divorce irreversible, whatever the thing may be with which it is compared, and whether the magnitude of that thing be mentioned or not; it having been before remarked the simile in divorce is always used in an amplifying sense; and amplification implies irreversibility.—Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, holds, that if the magnitude of the subject of simile be mentioned, the divorce is irreversible, but not otherwise, whatever that may be, because a simile may sometimes be introduced merely to express unity; wherefore indefinite comparison is not to be taken in an amplifying sense; but where the magnitude is mentioned, that undoubtedly is to be construed amplification; and hence irreversibility is established.—Again, Ziffer maintains that if the subject of simile be of such a nature as conveys an idea of magnitude, the divorce is irreversible, but otherwise not. Some commentators allege that Mohammed coincides with Haneefa on this point; others, that he agrees with Aboo Yoosaf. The nature of these diversities of opinion is exemplified in a case where a man says to his wife, "you are a divorce like a needle," or "like the size of a needle's eye," or "like a mountain," or "like the size of a mountain," for under the first of these forms the divorce is held to be irreversible by Haneefa alone; under the second it is so with Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, and not with Ziffer; and under the third it is so with Haneefa and Ziffer, and not with Aboo Yoosaf; but under the fourth form it is irreversible with them all.

If a man say to his wife, "you are repudiated by a heavy divorce," or "by a broad," or "by a long divorce," one divorce irreversible takes place; because a thing of which the separation is impracticable is called heavy, and an irreversible divorce is of this kind, inasmuch as the separation of it is difficult; and with respect to those things of which the separation is difficult, it is common to say, "they are long and broad."—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the divorce thus occasioned is reversible, because the descriptions of difficulty, length or breadth, do not apply to divorce, and are therefore nugatory. And if the man should, by any of these sentences, intend three divorces, it is approved because separation is divided into two kinds; the light and heavy, so that when the heavy (which is three divorces) in particularly specified, it is held to be efficient.

Section.

Three divorces take place upon an unenjoyed wife when they are pronounced together, but only the first when they are pronounced separately.—When a man divorces a woman before cohabitation, by saying to her, "you are divorced thrice," three divorces take place upon her, because he has here given three collectively; but if he pronounce the three separately, saying, "you are divorced, divorced, divorced," one divorce irreversible takes place from the first, but nothing from the second or third, because each repetition of the word "divorce" is a separate execution of divorce; and the first of them having already rendered the woman decisively and irreversibly divorced, it follows that the second and third cannot take effect upon her. And it is the same where he says, "you are divorced once and again" (where a single divorce takes place), because the woman becomes completely divorced by the first part of the sentence.

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, "you are divorced once," and the woman should happen to die before the word "once" be pronounced, in this case divorce does not take place, because he has here associated the number with the divorce, which consequently ought to take place accordingly; but the woman dying before the number is mentioned, no subject of divorce remains at the time when it should take place, and hence the execution of it is null; and so also, where he says, "you are divorced twice" or "thrice."

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, "you are divorced once before once," or once, and, after that, again," a single divorce takes place; but if he were to say, "you are divorced once, and previous thereto once," two divorces take place; and so also if he were to say, "you are divorced once after once." The proofs are all drawn, in this case, from the Arabic idiom. And if the man say, "you are divorced once with once," or "once along with once," two divorces take place, because of the associating particle with, which makes the sentence appear as of two divorces collectively. Aboo Yoosaf says that, under the second form, one divorce only takes place; his proof is drawn from the Arabic idiom. In all these instances it is to be remarked, that two divorces would take place upon an enjoyed wife.

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, "if you enter the house you are divorced once and again," and she afterwards enters the house, a single divorce only takes place upon her, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that two divorces take place. But if he were to say, "you are divorced once and again, if you enter the house," and she afterwards enters it, two divorces take place upon her, according to all. And if he declare the same sentence, with a variation in the construction of it, thus, "you are di-

DIVORCE.

[Vol. I.

Vorced once,—and again if you enter the house," Koorokhee has said that here also there is a difference of opinion, one divorce only, taking place with Haneefa, and two with the two disciples. Aboo Lays, however, observes that here one divorce only takes place, according to all the doctors, as under this construction the last member of the sentence is utterly distinct and separate from the first, and this is approved.

In implied divorce,—The second kind of divorce, namely Talak-Kinayat, or divorce by implication, is where a man repudiates his wife (not in express terms), but by the mention of something from which divorce is understood; and divorce does not take place from this but intention or circumstantial proof, because the implication is not used to express divorce alone, since it may mean divorce, and also something else, and hence intention or circumstantial proof is requisite to determine the construction in which it is to be taken.

In implied divorce are three forms which effect a reversible divorce.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that implication is of two kinds. The First is that form which a single divorce reversible takes place; and this consists of three forms of words, to wit,—"Count!"—"Seek the purification of your womb!"—"You are single!"—of the First, because to count means enumeration, and hence the word "count!" bears two constructions, one, "count!" (the courses that are incumbent upon you); and the other, "count! (the blessings of Almighty God);" and if the speaker intend the former meaning divorce is the ascertained construction of the word, in virtue of such his intention: and here the divorce takes place, of necessity, from his having desired her to count her courses, which other is of no force except where he has divorced her, because previous to the sentence her courses was not incumbent upon her, and hence it is the same as if he had said, "you are divorced, and count!" And as this necessity is sufficiently answered by a reversible divorce, a reversible divorce accordingly takes place. And of the Second, because "seek the purification of your womb!" may either mean, "see that your womb be free from progeny, in order to your getting another husband" (since this expressly applies to the same thing as is designed by the preceding word "count!" and therefore may, in the present case, stand instead of it), or it may mean, "see that your womb be free from progeny, in order that I may divorce you; and where the husband intends the former meaning, a divorce reversible takes place, the same as in the preceding case. And of the Third, because "you are single!" may either mean, "you are repudiated by a single divorce" (and where such is the intention, a single divorce reversible takes place), or, in this form such a divorce is effected, or it may mean, "you are single (hating no other along with you)" or "you are single (among women, in beauty, and so forth"). Thus, these words bearing a variety of constructions, intention is essentially requisite to their effect; and it is to be observed that those forms occasion no more than a single divorce, because such forms amount to "you are divorced," and as where the words "you are divorced" are expressly mentioned, no more than a single divorce takes place, so also, in this case, a single divorce only takes place a fortiori, because mere implication is weaker in its effect than the express mention of something.

Seventeen which effect an irreversible divorce.—And from all other implications of divorce besides those three, where divorce is the husband's intention, a single complete (or irreversible) divorce takes place; or if he intend three divorces, three divorces take place; or, if two, two divorces; and these expressions of implication of divorce are as follow:—"You are separated!"—"you are cut off!"—"you are prohibited!"—"the reins are thrown upon your own neck!"—"be united unto your people!"—"you are divorced!"—"I give you to your family!"—"I set you loose!"—"your business is in your own hands!"—"you are free!"—"veil yourself!"—"be clean!"—"so forth!"—"go to!"—"go!"—"arise!"—"seek for a mate!"—all which expressions are implicative of divorce, as each of them bears a construction either of divorce or otherwise; since "you are separated!" may either mean "you are separated (from me in marriage)", or "you are separated (from your family)"; In the same manner, "you are cut off!" may either mean "you are cut off (from marriage)" or "you are cut off (from your family and friends)"; and so also you are prohibited! may either mean "you are prohibited (in marriage)" or "you are prohibited (to me as a companion because of your evil disposition)". In the same manner, "the reins are thrown upon your own neck!" may either mean "you are at liberty to go where you please (as I have divorced you)," or "you may go to visit your parents," and so forth); and so also, "be united unto your people!" may either mean "return to your family (as I have divorced you)," or ("as you are unfit for society on account of the badness of your disposition"). You are void, may, in the same manner, either mean "you are void of (marriage)" or "you are void of (virtue and religion); and so also, I give you to your family!" may either mean, "I return you to your family (as I have divorced you), or, "I return you to your family (on account of your evil disposition, in order that you may remain there"); agreeably to the same mode of reasoning, I set you loose! may either mean "I set you loose (from the restraint

DIVORCE.

those which can be construed into assent only:—and, THIRDLY, those which may be construed either into assent, or into exclamations of contumely and reproach; and, in the first of these situation, divorce does not take place from any of those expressions, but by intention; and if the husband declare that he had no such intentions, his declaration is to be credited, because they all bear a double construction, and hence the intention is necessary to establish the effect; and, in the second situation, divorce takes place in independent of the intention in a legal view, and the declaration of the husband is not to be credited, where he has used expressions bearing a construction of assent only; which are as follow:—

"You are disengaged!"
"You are separated!"
"You are cut off!"
"You are prohibited!"
"Count!"
"Your business is in your own hands!"
"Choose!"

The reason of which is, that the evident meaning of the husband, in using them in reply to a requisition of divorce is divorce, as they do not bear a construction of denial; but if, in this situation, the husband use any of these expressions which may be construed equally into denial or assent, divorce does not take place but by intention; and the declaration of the husband, with respect to his intention is to be credited. The expressions alluded to are as follow:—

"Go!"
"Got up!"
"Veil yourself!"
"Get out!" and so forth;

because these words may all be construed into denial of the request; and as the denial of a request is a circumstance less forcible than the act of divorce, they are rather to be taken in the former sense: but yet, as they also bear a construction of assent they occasion divorce, where such is the intention. Those expressions may be construed into a denial of the request, on account that, "Go!" may mean, "quit thus speaking;" Be gone! and do not talk thus;" and the same of "Veil yourself!" as a direction to put on the veil sometimes implies an order to go away; wherefore it may imply on this occasion, "go away, and leave off speaking in this manner;" and the same also of, "get out!"—but, in the third situation, divorce does not take place without the intention of the speaker, from the use of any expression of implication, except such as may be equally construed into assent, and into exclamations of contumely and reproach; and those are the three following:—

"Count!"
"Choose!"

"Your business is in your own hands!" from all of which, when used in anger, divorce takes place in point of law, independent of intention; and the declaration of the

"I set you loose (to go where you please);" so also, "your business is in your own hands, may either have respect to divorce, or in any other circumstance; and "you are free!" may either imply "you are free (from the bond of marriage)," or, "you are free (as not being a slave)," and as also, "veil yourself!" may either mean "veil yourself (from me as I have divorced you)," or, "veil yourself (that you may not be seen by a stranger);" in the same manner, "be clean!" may either mean, "ascertain whether your womb be free from seed, that you may be enabled to marry with another man, or, "that the descent of a child begotten upon you may be known;" and so also, "go forth!" may either mean, "go forth (as I have divorced you)," or, "go forth (to visit your parents):" and, "go to!"—"go!"—"arise!"—may either signify, "go to (and so forth) as I have divorced you," or, "go to (and so forth) and do not provoke me to divorce you:" so also, "seek for a mate!" may either mean, "seek for a husband, as I have divorced you," or, "seek for a proper compa-tion to sit with you;" since, therefore, all those who admit the construction either of divorce or otherwise, the intention is essential to their effect, except where the husband uses them in reply to a requisition of divorce made by his wife, in which case the Kaszii is to decree a divorce, but yet it does not exist as a divorce between the husband and God, unless such was his intention."

The compiler of the Hedava observes that Kadooree has not made any distinction whatever between these expressions in divorce; on the contrary, he has said, "from all those expressions, when used in reply to a requisition of divorce, divorce takes place, independent of the intention, in a legal view, but not in a religious view," whereas it is not so, this rule being confined to such expressions as are incapable of being construed into a denial of the requisition of divorce.

It is to be observed as a rule, that there are three possible situations in which the person making use of these expressions may stand: FIRST, a general situation, that is, where he is neither swayed by anger, nor by any requision of divorce, but acts from an unbiased volition; SECONDLY, where divorce is the object of course at the time of speaking (as, for instance, where it is demanded of him by his wife); THIRDLY, where he is under the impulse of anger. The expressions of implication are also of three kinds:— FIRST, those which equally bear a construction either of denial or assent:—SECONDLY, to be completely effected on the instant admitting a continuance of connexion with the subject; and it is indispensably necessary that this last species of irreversible separation be also countenanced by the law, in order that the door of separation may not be closed against the husband if he should repent (that is to say, that it may remain in his power again to marry his wife, without her being previously married to another); and also, in order that the woman's delicacy may be preserved from the effect of a divorce, by the man taking her back without the intervention of marriage with another; and such being the case, divorce irreversibly ensues from these expressions. "In reply to the assertion of Shafei, we observe that these expressions are not positively implications, since each of them may be used in its own literal sense; and as to what he further alleges, that "the intention is a condition of their effect" (hence inferring that they are undoubtedly implications of divorce), the inference is not admitted, because the intention is made a condition for the purpose of ascertaining one of two species of separation, and it is thus made a condition for the purpose of ascertaining one of two sorts of a separation which is a separation from marriage, and not for the purpose of divorce taking place: with respect to what Shafei further advances, that "the divorce occasioned by any of those expressions is incomplete in point of number" (hence inferring that they are implications of divorce), we reply that the privity of the number of divorces is not on account of those expressions being implications of divorce, but because divorce is established on account of the connexion of marriage becoming dissolved; that is to say, on account of those expressions the tie is dissolved, which signifies the dissolution of a tie. Wherefore divorce is necessarily established; the inference, therefore, is that the taking place of divorce, is involved; but not that the aforesaid expressions are implications of divorce: —and with respect to what he further says, that "if the husband intend three divorces from the use of any of those expressions, three take place accordingly" (inferring that they are implications of divorce), we reply that the intention of three divorces from these expressions is approved only as three divorces is one species of separation. For separation is of two species,—the mild and the rigorous*), and, where there is no intention of divorce.
tion, the least forcible is established. It is to be observed that an intention of two divorces is not approved with our doctors; contrary to the opinion of Ziffer: but this has already been treated of.

If a man say to his wife, "count!—count!—count!" and afterwards declare that by the first of these words he meant divorce, and by the others the repetition of the woman's course [requiring to its completion] his declaration is credited in point of law, as he appears to have intended these last words in their true sense, it being customary for a husband, where he divorces his wife to desire her to count the course necessary to the completion of her Edit; and hence apparent circumstances bear evidence to his intention; but if he were to confess that in these last words he had no particular intention, three divorces take place, because, from his intending divorce by the first word, it follows that he repeated it a second and third time, in a situation where divorce is the subject of discourse, and this situation proves his intention in these repetitions to be divorce also; wherefore if he were to deny this intention, yet he is not credited, circumstances bearing evidence against him; contrary to where he declares that he had no intention of divorce in any of the three words, for this divorce does not take place at all, because circumstances do not tend to dispute his declaration; and contrary, also to where he declares divorce to be his intention in the third word, but not in either of the two preceding, in which case no more than one divorce takes place, because, as he does not put the construction of divorce upon the two preceding words, it does not appear that divorce was the subject of discourse at the period of his speaking the last. It is to be observed that the declaration of the speaker in denial of his intention is not to be credited, unless it be given upon oath, because he relates what, having passed solely in his own mind, cannot be known to any other person,—and hence he is the Ameen, or inquisitor, with respect to the intelligence he gives; and the declaration of an inquisitor is credited upon oath.

CHAPTER III.

OF DELEGATION OF DIVORCE

Definition of the phrase.—Tafweez Al Talak, or delegation of divorce, is where the husband delegates or commits the pronouncing of divorce to his wife, desiring her to give the effective sentence, and it is comprehended under three different deeds, termed Option, Liberty and Will.

Section 1.

Of Ithtiyar or Option.

Delegation by Option confers on the wife a power of divorcing herself; but this right of option is restricted to the precise place or situation in which she receives it.—If a man say to his wife "choose!" (thereby meaning divorce), or "divorce yourself!" the woman has a power to divorce herself so long as she remains in the precise situation* in which she received it; but if she remove, or turn her attention to anything else, the power thus vested in her is done away, and her option no longer remains, because the exercise of the optional power thus committed to the woman is, by all the companions, to be restricted to the precise situation in which it is received; but also, because this species of delegation is a transfer of power, not a commission of agency, and to give effect to the former, the reply is required on the spot of declaration, the same as in sale, since all the moments of one situation are accounted for a single moment: but a situation may be altered, sometimes by change of place, at other times by chance of employment, because a situation of eating and drinking (for instance) is not that of dispute; and a situation of business, on the other hand, is neither a situation of eating or drinking, nor of dispute.

And is annulled by her removal.—The right of option of the woman is annulled, upon the instant of her rising from her seat, as that circumstance proves her rejection of it; contrary to the case of Sill'im or a Sif sale, which does not become null upon the instant of rising or removing, the cause of in validity there being removal without seinin.

Intention on the part of the husband, is requisite to constitute a delegation.—And where the husband thus addresses his wife, an intention of divorce is a condition requisite to the effect (as mentioned in the preceding chapter) because the word "choose!" is one of the implications of divorce, as it is capable of two constructions, by one it desires the woman to choose herself, and by another to choose her clothes, and so forth: and if she choose herself,† and divorce irrevocable takes place. Analogy would suggest, in this case, that from choosing herself nothing whatever should ensue, although divorce be the intention of the husband, because he cannot himself effect divorce by the use of such words; that is to say, if he were to say to his wife, "I have chosen myself from you," nothing whatever would follow, and consequently how can he give a delegation of this nature?—But here divorce takes place upon a more favourable construction, for two reasons:—First, all the companions agree that divorce takes place from the use of this expression;—Secondly, the husband has it at his option either to continue the marriage with his wife or to put her away and hence it follows that he may substitute her his substitute with respect to that

DIVORCE.

And divorce takes place, although her option of it be expressed in the Mozaree or common tense.—If a husband says to his wife, "choose!" and she reply to him in the Mozaree tense (which, in the Arabic, is common to the present and future), saying "I do (or will) choose myself," divorce takes place, on a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest in this case that no divorce takes place, because, if the woman's reply be taken only in the future, it stands as a promise, and bears that construction also, if taken in the present; and hence divorce does not take place, from her answer amounting only to a promise in the former sense, and from its ambiguity in the latter; as if a man were to say to his wife, "divorce yourself," and she were to reply, Atliko Nafsee ["I do (or will) divorce myself"], which case divorce does not take place, and so in this case likewise: but the reasons for the more favourable construction are twofold:—First, it is recorded that, upon the descent of the passage of the Koran relating to option, viz. O my son! say to your wives, If you desire the life of this world (to the end),—the Prophet said to Aysha, "I have something to mention to you, but do not reply to it until such time as you consult your parents," after which he read to her the above passage, and then gave her an option: and Aysha said, "in such a matter as this I shall not consult my father or mother, but will (or do) choose God and his Prophet," which words the Prophet considered as a reply, importing, "I do choose;"—Secondly, the word Akhtarto ["I do (or will) choose myself"], express the present literally, and the future figuratively, the same as the word Ashado [I do (or will) testify], in giving evidence before a magistrate; contrarily to where a woman answers Atliko Nafsee [I do (or will) divorce myself], for here it is impossible to receive her words in a present sense, as they do not relate to a thing now existing; whereas the expression of Choorto [I do (or will) divorce myself], on the contrary, relates to a thing now present, to wit, the woman choosing herself. Where the husband gives a power of option thrice repeated, and the wife make only a single reply, yet three divorces take place from it, independent of the husband's intention.—If a man say to his wife, "choose!" and she reply, "I have chosen," a divorce irreversible takes place, because the word self here occurs in the words of the husband, and the words of the woman are in reply to him; and hence her words virtually comprehend herself. And, in the same manner, if the husband were to say, "choose an option," and she reply, "I have chosen," a divorce irreversible takes place: the proofs here are drawn from the Arabic. Or by the wife in her reply.—If a man say to his wife: "choose!" and she reply, "I have chosen myself," divorce takes place, where such was the husband's intention because the word self here occurs, in the reply given by the woman, and the expression of the husband bears the construction of that which he intended.

Some grammatical reasoning, incapable of translation, is omitted in this part.
place in either case; but they agree with Haneefa, that the intention is not essential, for the reasons above assigned.—And, in the same manner, if the woman were only to reply, "I have chosen," it is effective of three divorces. And so also, if she were to reply, "I have chosen a choice."—This is admitted by all the doctors; because, where she only says, "I have chosen," it is productive of three divorces, and produces the same additional force when she speaks in a way to give this additional force it produces the same a fortiori.

—And if she were to reply, "I have divorced myself," or "I have chosen myself with respect to one divorce," one divorce reversible takes place.

Where the word "divorce" is mentioned by the husband, the divorce which follows is reversible.—If a man says to his wife, "one divorce is at your option," or "choose with respect to a single divorce," and she reply, "I have chosen myself," one divorce reversible takes place; because the man has given the woman an option so far as one divorce, and expressing it in direct terms (as above) the divorce proceeding from it is reversible.

Section II.

Of Amir-ba-Yed, or Liberty.†

In a delegation of liberty, divorce takes place according to the number mentioned by the wife: independent of the husband's intention: and the divorce which follows is irreversible.—If a man says to his wife, "your business is in your own hands," intending three divorces, and the woman answer, "I have chosen myself with one choice," three divorces take place. The proof of this is drawn from the nature of these expressions in their original idiom.

But if the woman were to reply, "I have divorced myself with one divorce," or "I have chosen myself by one divorce," one divorce only takes place; and this divorce is irreversible, although the reply be delivered in express and not in ambiguous terms, because it bears relation to the words of the husband, which being an implication, amount to a delegation of irreversible divorce, and not of reversible.—The reason why an intention of three divorces is admitted in the present instance, is that the words, "your business is in your own hands," are capable of both a restrictive and an extensive construction, and hence may imply three divorces, as well as one; an intention to that effect therefore holds good, since that is one of the senses in which the words may be taken: contrary to the expression considered in the preceding section, to wit, "choose!" that being incapable of bearing an extensive construction, as was there demonstrated.

Delegation of liberty may be restricted to a particular time, or to several different specified periods of time.—If a man say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands this day, and after to-morrow," the night is not included:—and if the woman reject the liberty, is it in her for this day, it is, with respect to this day, annulled; but it still remains to her for the day after the morrow, because the husband has expressly specified two particular periods, with the intervention of a similar periods to which the liberty does not extend (to wit: to-morrow); and hence it appears that those are two distinct liberties, and the rejection of one does not amount to a rejection of the other. Ziffer says that both amount only to a single liberty, this being analogous to a case where a man says to his wife, "you are divorced this day and the day after to-morrow," which implies one divorce only, and not two (on the idea of one taking place this day, and the other the day after the morrow); and hence, in like manner, one liberty only is implied.—But to this it may be replied, that divorce is not of a nature to admit restriction to any particular time, whereas liberty is capable of such restriction; and hence that which regards the first period mentioned is restricted to that period, and that which respects the second period commences de novo.

If a man say to his wife, "Your business is in your own hands to-day and to-morrow," the night is comprehended in it; and, if the woman should reject the liberty on the instant, it is totally annulled, and does not return on the morrow (according to the Zahir Rawayet), as this amounts only to one liberty, because that between the two periods specified is a similar period intervenes to which the liberty does not extend.

Objection.—Although a period similar to the two specified does not intervene, yet night intervenes, from which it would follow that the liberty given for to-day and to-morrow is not a single liberty.

Reply.—Two distinct liberties are not occasioned by this circumstance, because the intervention of night, although it interrupt or suspend a matter, does not divide or terminate it, as in a public court, for instance, which may, on account of the night coming on, be adjourned, without any actual breach in the series of its proceedings; thus it is the same as if the man were to say, "your business is in your own hands for two days," in which case a single liberty only is understood.

And it is not annulled by the wife's rejection of it until the time or times mentioned be fully expired.—If it is recorded, from Aboo Haneefa, that although the woman should reject the liberty on the instant, yet it still remains with her for the following day, as she is not empowered to reject it (that is to say, she cannot refuse her assent to receiving *Because an express divorce is uniformly reversible unless otherwise specified.
†This is a contraction of Amir-ke-ba-Yed-ke, literally, "your business is in your own hands, i.e., "you are at liberty to do as you please."—The word liberty is adopted singly, for the sake of brevity.
DIVORCE

it), it becoming established in her upon the husband saying, "your business is in your own hands," independent of her consent (as in the direct execution of divorce, for instance, where, if the husband were to say, "you are divorced," divorce takes place independently of the consent of the wife); and such being the case, liberty remains still with her for the morrow, when she may lawfully make use of it by choosing divorce. The ground upon which Zahir Rawayet proceeds, is that as, if she were to choose divorce as this day, no liberty remains with her for to-morrow, so if she reject the liberty this day, no right of choice remains with her for to-morrow, because a person who has a choice of two things is not authorized to choose more than one of them.

It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that if a husband say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands for this day and the same for to-morrow," this amounts to two liberties because here the delegation applies to two portions of time, distinctly and separately expressed: contrary to the preceding case, where the times are not thus discriminated, but are both mentioned, under one head.

The time of it may be fixed for the occurrence of any specified event—if a man say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands on the day on which such an one arrives," and the person mentioned arrive, but his arrival be not known to the wife until night, her right of choice no longer remains, because liberty is a thing of continuance, and hence the word day, with which it is associated, is restricted to the day time, and that having passed away, it discontinues.

It is not annulled by delay (where there is no specification of time), nor until the woman leaves her seat, &c.—If a man say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands," or "choose!" and she delay answering the whole day, and do not rise from her seat, her right of option remains to her so long as she does not employ herself in any other matter. Because a delegation of divorce by the forms of liberty or option is a transfer of power to execute divorce (that is, the husband by that delegation empowers his wife to give divorce, as persons are termed empowered who act for themselves, and the act of the woman here is pronouncing divorce upon herself, wherefore this property is supposed to reside in her),—and in transfer of power a privilege of reply continues to the end of the situation of declaration, as has been demonstrated in the beginning of this chapter. And if the woman hear the declaration, respect is had to the situation in which she hears it; but if she should not hear it, respect is, in that case, had to the situation in which she is informed of it, because, as we know, Amir-ba-Yed, or liberty, be a transfer of power to execute divorce, yet the property of suspension is also allowed to exist in it, as it is a suspension of the event of divorce upon the act of the wife in pronouncing it, and hence it comprehends two things, a transfer of power, and a suspension;—in the sense of a suspension, it continues in force beyond the Majlis, or continuance of the situation of declaration, to the Majlis or situation in which the woman understands or is informed of it, where it is absent, or in the sense of a transfer of power, it is annulled, on her rising from her seat, where she is present; but the situation of the husband is not regarded, because the suspension, is absolute with respect to him; contrary to a case of sale, as in that the declaration of sale does not remain in force beyond the Majlis of declaration, since in a sale the Majlis or situation of the seller is regarded as well as that of the purchase: and the retraction of the seller, at any time previous to this consent of the purchaser is admitted, as sale, is merely of a transfer of property, in which suspension is not of all understood; now since it appears that the situation of the wife alone is regarded, and not that of her husband, we must recollect that her situation may be altered in various ways sometimes by removal from one place, to another, and sometimes by her employing herself in any other matter, as was previously stated.

But it is annulled on the instant of her rising from her seat.—The option of a woman who is left at liberty to choose is annulled on the instant of her rising from her seat, as this act proves rejection, because by getting up the attention is deranged and withdrawn from the present subject: contrary to a case where she delays answering for a whole day, for instance, and does not rise from her seat, nor employ herself in anything else; for here her option remains to her, as a Majlis or situation is sometimes of a short and sometimes of a long duration, wherefore her right of option continues until such time as something appears sufficient to terminate the Majlis, or to prove rejection. And here it is to be observed, that by employing herself in anything else is to be understood such a thing as is, in its nature, terminative of her situation, and not any general thing.

It is not annulled by a change of posture from a mere active to a mere quiescent position.—If the woman be standing, at the period of receiving the liberty of option from her husband, and afterwards sit down, her option remains, and is not annulled, as her sitting does not imply rejection, but rather the contrary, since her attention is thereby more collected.—And the rule is the same where the woman, being seated, leans upon a pillow, or having leaned upon her pillow (at the time the husband speaks), sits up without a pillow, because these are no more than changes from one mode of sitting to another, and do not import rejection any more than where a person sitting upon one part changes and sits upon another.

Our author remarks that this is the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer, and is most approved.—It is elsewhere said, that where the woman is sitting up without a pillow, and then leans upon a pillow, option no longer remains, as this shows an indifference respecting it amounting to a rejection.

The use she may signify her wish to consult her friends, without prejudice to her right of option,—if the woman, on receiving a liberty of opinion, say that she wishes to see her father in order to consult him, or to get witnesses, in order to have their evidence, her option remains, because counsel is expedient in every business, and witnesses are requisite to controvert the husband's denial of the fact; and hence neither of these wishes expressed on her part is a proof of rejection.

If the woman be riding upon a quadruped or in a camel-litter, and stop the animal on her husband's offer of liberty, still the right of option is not annulled; but if she proceed upon her journey, it is annulled because the going on or stopping of the animal is the same with those acts in the woman, since its motions depend upon the rider.

A boat or ship is the same as a house, as by the going on of the vessel the woman's option is not annulled; because its motion does not always depend upon the person whom it carries.

Section III.

Of Masheeta or Will

Where a man empowers his wife to divorce herself in express terms, the divorce which follows is irreversible.—If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself," not having any particular intention, or intending one divorce, and the woman reply, "I have divorced myself," a single divorce reversible takes place; and if she were to say, "I have given three divorces," three accordingly take place; where such is the intention of the husband: the reason of this is that divorce, being a general expression, takes place in the lowest species; but as, like other generic nouns, it also applies to the whole, an intention of three divorces is admitted: and, where there is no particular intention, a single divorce reversible takes place, because the power of divorce is delegated to the wife in express terms, and express divorce occasions a divorce reversible. If the husband should in this case intend two divorces it is not admitted, because a generic noun does not bear that construction, where the woman is free; but, if she be a slave, an intention of two divorces is admitted, that being considered as the whole, with respect to her.

Although her reply be expressed in the form of an irreversible divorce,—"I have divorced myself,"—and she reply, "I have separated myself," a divorce reversible takes place, because separation is of the same nature with divorce; since, if a husband were to say to his wife, "I have irreversibly separated you [from me], intending divorce, a divorce irreversible takes place; and, in the same manner, if the woman were (as here) to say, "I have separated myself," and her husband reply, "I have consented thereto," she becomes irreversibly divorced; and hence the expression of the woman, I have irreversibly separated myself, stands the same as the husband's delegation, which is of simple divorce; but here the description of irreversibility which the woman has added to the simple divorce is held to be nugatory: and the simple divorce only takes place; contrary to a reply of option, for if she were to answer, "I have chosen myself," no divorce whatever would take place, as these words are not of the same nature with divorce, for which reason it is that if a man were to say to his wife, "I have chosen you," or "choose!" intending divorce, no divorce whatever takes place; and in like manner, if the woman were to speak first, saying, "I have chosen myself," and her husband reply, "I have consented," no divorce whatever takes place; yet it is an universally received doctrine, that if the woman say, "I have chosen myself," in reply to a delegation of option, divorce takes place; but the words of the husband in the present case, namely, "divorce yourself," is not a delegation of option, and hence the reply of the woman, as above stated, "I have chosen myself," is nugatory.

It is recorded, as an opinion of Haneefa, that in the present case divorce does not take place from the reply of the wife, "I have separated myself," because the woman acts contrary to the power vested in her, by taking upon her to pronounce a thing different from that delegated to her by her husband, as the expression "separated" is different from divorce, the one being implicative and the other express; and the husband delegated express divorce only.

The power, when thus granted, cannot be retracted.—If a husband say to his wife, "divorce yourself," he is not at liberty to retract, as his expression involves a vow, because he has, in this instance, suspended divorce upon the execution of it by his wife, and a vow is an obligatory act, for which reason a man is not allowed to recede from it. If, however, the woman rise from her seat, or remove from the place, the words of the husband, as above, transferring the power of divorce to her, are annulled, their force being confined to the situation where the offer is made:—contrary to where he says to her, "divorce your Zirra [fellow-wife]," as

*Literally, "his words express (or amount to) (a Yameen)," that is to say, suspend the matter spoken of upon the occurrence of some condition on the event of which that matter takes place, independent of any further volition on the part of the speaker; and it is therefore, with respect to him, absolute and un retractable. Yameen is here translated vow, as the above is one definition of vow."
this is a commission of agency, which is not restricted to place, and may be therefore re-acted to the constituent whenever he pleases.

The power may be granted generally.—If a husband say to his wife, "divorce yourself when you please," she is at liberty to divorce herself either upon the spot or at any future period, because the word when extends to all times; and hence it is the same as if he were to say, "divorce yourself at whatever time you like."

If a man say to another, "divorce my wife," the person thus addressed may divorce her either upon the spot at any other time, and the husband may also retract, because this is a commission of agency, and therefore is not absolute, nor restricted in point of place; contrary to where he says to his wife, "divorce yourself," this being a transfer of power, not a commission of agency, as the woman thus addressed acts from herself and not from another. But if a man say to another, "divorce such an one my wife," (adding) "if you please," the man is empowered to divorce the wife upon the spot only; and here the husband cannot retract.

-Ziffer says that this and the proceeding case are alike, the addition of "if you please" in the one instance, or the omission of it in the other, making no difference, because the person so commissioned afterwards acts from his own will, like an agent in sale, to whom it may have been said, "sell this thing if you please." The argument of our doctors is that the words of the husband are a transfer of power, as he suspends the divorce upon the will of the person whom he addresses, and he is the principal who acts from his own will; divorce, moreover, admits of suspension, whereas sale does not.

A wife empowered to give herself three divorces may give herself one divorce.—If a man say to his wife, "give yourself three divorces," and she give herself one divorce only, it takes place accordingly, because, having been empowered so far as three divorces, it necessarily follows that she is enabled to give a single one.

But, when empowered to give herself one divorce only, she cannot give herself three. —If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself once," and she give herself three divorces, nothing whatever takes place, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that a single divorce takes place, because the woman has done that to which she was empowered, together with that to which she was not empowered; and hence it is analogous to a case in which a husband says to his wife, "I repudiate you by a thousand divorces" where three divorces take place, because he has pronounced that to which he is empowered along with that to which he is not empowered; consequently the former takes effect, but the latter is nugatory; and so likewise in the present case.—The argument of Haneefa is that the wife has, in this case, attempted to do an act, the power of doing which has not been delegated to her by her husband, and hence she appears to divorce herself, first, and not in reply to the desire expressed by him, as he has empowered her so far as one divorce only, and between three divorces and one there is contradiction, the word three expressing a compound number, and one a single unit; contrary to where a man pronounces a thousand divorces upon his wife, as here three take place, because he acts in consequence of the desire of another; and contrary also to the preceding case (viz. where the husband desires his wife to repudiate herself by three divorces, and she declares one only), for here one divorce takes place on account of her being empowered so far as three: whereas, in the present case, she is not empowered so far as three, and having acted contrary to the power vested in her, what she does is nugatory.

Where the wife's reply disagrees with the husband's declaration in respect to the nature of the divorce, it takes place according to his declaration, not according to her reply.—If a man desire his wife to repudiate herself by a reversible divorce, and she divorce herself irreversibly, or the contrary, that mode of divorce takes place which was desired by the husband: thus, if a man say to his wife, "give yourself one divorce reversible," and she reply, "I have given myself a divorce irreversible," a divorce reversible takes place, because the woman has declared a divorce in express terms, but with an additional description, and the latter is nugatory, as being contrary to the desire expressed by the husband; but the former (which is in its nature reversible) takes place, as being in conformity to the husband's desire; and, on the other hand, if the husband say to his wife, "give yourself one divorce irreversible," and she reply, "I have given myself a divorce irreversible," a divorce irreversible takes place, because the description of reversibility attached to the divorce by the wife is nugatory, since the husband, having himself affixed a description to it, does not require more of his wife than simply divorce, without any description; hence it is the same as if she had pronounced the divorce itself in a defective way: thus the divorce takes place under whatever description may have been affixed to it by the husbad, whether reversible or irreversible.

Where the power is conditional upon the pleasure of the wife, it is annulled by her reply disaccording with the husband's declaration.—If a man say to his wife, divorce yourself thrice, if you please," and she give herself one divorce, no effect whatever follows, because the meaning of his words is
"If you desire three divorces, repudiate yourself," and the woman giving one only, it appears that she does not desire three, and hence, the condition not being fulfilled, the divorce does not take place.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself once, if you please," and she give herself in the same words, according to Haneefa, because a desire of one divorce only is essentially different from a desire of three, this being analogous to a case of execution as before mentioned, that is to say, as the execution of three divorces in that instance was demonstrated to be a sensible contradiction to that of one; so, in the present instance, a wish for three is contradictory to a wish for one; and, from the woman pronouncing upon herself three divorces, it appears that she was not desirous of one; and hence the condition is not fulfilled. The two disciples say that one divorce takes place on this occasion, because a desire for one divorce is comprehended in a desire for three, on the same principles as the execution of three divorces comprehends that of one (agreeably to their doctrine before mentioned); and hence the condition is virtually fulfilled.

And so also, by her suspending her will upon that of her husband.—If a man make a delegation of divorce to his wife, by saying to her, "you are divorced if you be desirous of it," and she reply, "I am desirous, if you desire it," and he reply, in return, "I am desirous," (intending divorce), the delegation is void, because the husband has suspended the divorce upon the will of the women where that is unrestricted, that is to say, independent of anything else; but, from the conversation, it appears that she suspends her will upon that of her husband, and hence the condition of divorce, namely, the independent will of the woman, is not fulfilled; thus she does not act from option; and the delegation is void of course. The words of the husband, in the last reply, namely, "I am desirous," are not effective of divorce, although such be his intention, because there is no mention whatever of divorce in the words of the woman, from which the husband's wish to that effect might be inferred in his answer, and the intention alone does not suffice, as it has no operation with respect to a thing not mentioned; whereas, if he were to say, "I am desirous of your divorce," it takes place if he so intend it, because he in this case appears to give divorce de novo, as a desire expressed with respect to any thing implies the existence of that thing, and hence his expression, "I am desirous of your divorce," is as if he were to say, "I cause your divorce," which takes place; contrary to what would follow, if he were to say, "I intend your divorce," in which case divorce would not take place, because an intention expressed does not imply the existence of the thing intended.—If, moreover, in the case now recited, the woman were to reply, "I am desirous if my father be so," or, "if such a circumstance happen" (meaning a circumstance which does not yet exist), and the father afterwards signify his desire, or the circumstance upon which she has suspended the divorce come to pass, yet divorce does not take place, and the delegation is void: but if she in saying, "if such a thing happen," mean a thing which has already passed, divorce takes place, because suspension upon a condition already fulfilled amounts to immediate or unsuspended divorce.

When the power is expressed with an unrestricted particle (in respect to time), it is perpetual, extending to all times, and places.

—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced when you please," or, "whenever you please," and she reject his offer, saying, "I am not desirous of it" her rejection is not final, for here the power vested in her is not confined to the place or situation where it is delegated, on which account she is at liberty to use it either there or elsewhere, because the terms when and whenever are used with reference to all times, and extend to every time indiscriminately, and hence the sense of the expressions, "when you please," and "whenever you please," is "at whatever time you please," and they are, therefore, not confined to place. And if the woman reject at present, still it is not a final rejection, because her husband has empowered her to divorce herself at whatever time she pleases, wherefore the power does not apply to the time when she does not please.—But it is to be observed that, the woman is not it this case authorized to pronounce upon herself more than one divorce, because the words when and whenever apply to all times, but not to more than a single divorce; thus she is authorized to divorce herself at whatever time she pleases, but not to pronounce divorce as often as she pleases.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced as often as you please," she is at liberty to divorce herself at all times, until three divorces, because the expression "as often as" admits a repetition of the act;—but it is to be observed that this suspension of divorce upon the woman's will is restricted solely to the marriage at present existing, and does not extend to that which may afterwards occur; and hence, if the woman give herself three divorces, and be again married to the same man, after being rendered lawful to him, and then pronounce divorce upon herself, it does not take place, because a marriage has then occurred de novo;—and it is also to be remarked that the woman is not at liberty to pronounce the three divorces upon herself in one sentence, because the expressions "as often as," implies unity, and does not admit of the circumstances to which it relates being taken collectively, and hence it is lawful for the woman to pronounce three divorces upon herself at three separate times, but not at once.

But not when it is expressed with an unrestricted particle in respect to place.—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced wherever you please." Yet the woman cannot divorce herself but in that place; and if she rise from her place before she pronounces it, her will is not regarded afterwards, because the words wherever, or whatsoever, are adverbs of place, and divorce has no connexion with place; the word wherever is therefore nugatory, and the will only remains, which is confined to the precise place, contrary to the case of time (that is, where the husband says, "when you please"), to which divorce has a relation, as it may take place at one time and not at another, and hence the mention of time in divorce is regarded, whether it be particular, as "you are divorced to-morrow;" or general, as "you are divorced when you please."

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced how you please," and she remain silent, a divorce reversible takes place, whether she be desirous of one, or if she is reluctant, and say, "I am desirous of one divorce reversible," and the husband reply, "such also is my desire," divorce takes place accordingly, because a conformity is established between the will of the wife and the intention of the husband; but where the wife desires three divorces, and the husband only one divorce irreversible, or the contrary, a divorce reversible takes place, because her act is rendered nugatory by the non-conformity of her will with that of her husband, and his words (viz. "you are divorced"), remain, which are effective of a divorce reversible; but if the husband have no particular intention, the will of the wife alone is regarded, insomuch that, whether she desire three divorces, or only one irreversible divorce, it takes place accordingly, in the opinion of our modern doctors, as this is what a right of option requires.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, says that the taking place of one divorce independent of the will of the wife, as above, is the doctrine of Haneefah; but that, with the two disciples, divorce does not take place so long as the woman does not divorce herself; thus she has her option of either one divorce reversible or irreversible, or of three divorces; and the same difference of opinion subsists with respect to manumission; that is to say, if a master say to his slave, "you are emancipated how you please," the slave is free upon the instant, according to Haneefah; whereas, according to the two disciples, he is not free, so long as he is not desirous of being so.—The argument of the latter is that the husband has delegated to his wife power to effect divorce upon herself under whatever description she pleases, whether a single divorce reversible, or irreversible, or three divorces; and hence it is indispensably requisite that the divorce itself be also suspended upon her will, so that a will shall be confirmed to her in all circumstances that is, both before carnal connexion and after it; for, if the divorce itself were not suspended upon the will of the wife, it would follow that the wife could have no will with respect to the description of the divorce before carnal connexion, as before consummation she cannot give herself three divorces, since in such case the wife becomes irreversibly repudiated by a single divorce before the passing of her Edit, and no longer remains a subject of divorce.—The argument of Haneefah is that the word "how" implies a requisition of description; now delegation of the description of a thing requires the existence of the subject of it, and divorce cannot have existence but by taking place.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced by as many as you please," or 'by what you please," she is empowered to divorce herself by whatever number she pleases, as the expression as many as and what are used with relation to number; and hence the husband appears to have delegated a power to the woman with respect to whatever number she may approve. If, however, she rises from her place before pronouncing any divorce, the delegation is void; or, if she reject, her rejection is final, because this sort of singular delegation does not argue or admit a repetition of the act; and the address implying a thing required to be immediately determined upon, consequently demands an immediate answer.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself what you please, out of three," she is empowered to give herself one or two divorces, but not three, according to Haneefah.—The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that she may give herself three divorces, if so inclined.—The arguments on both sides are drawn from the Arabic.

CHAPTER IV.

OF DIVORCE BY YAMEEN OR CONDITIONAL VOW.

Definition of the term Yameen with respect to divorce.—By Yameen is here understood the suspension of divorce upon a circumstance which bears the property of a condition, and this suspension is termed Yameen, because Yameen, in its primitive sense, signifies strength or power; and the suspension is a motive to the suspender to be strong in the avoidance of the condition in such a manner that he may not be subjected to the consequence or penalty, which is divorce or manumission.

Divorce pronounced with a reference to a future marriage, takes place upon the occurrence of such marriage.—Where a man refers to annexes divorce to marriage (that is, suspends it upon marriage), by saying to a strange woman, "if I marry you, you are divorced," or by declaring "any woman whom I may marry is divorced," in this case divorce takes place on the event of such marriage—Shafei maintains that divorce does not take place, the Prophet having said that
IV. there is no divorce antecedent to marriage.—
The argument of our doctors is that the annexing of divorce to marriage is a Yameen, or suspension, as appears from its containing a condition and a consequence, and present authority is not requisite to its propriety, because the divorce does not take place until the occurrence of the condition, at which time the authority necessarily takes place;
and the end which it answers, before the occurrence of the condition, is, that it restrains the vower from marrying that woman, as his meaning in the expression is, "I will not marry you, or, if I do, you are divorced."
With respect to the saying of the Prophet cited by Shafei, it goes to the prohibition of immediate divorce only, and not of that which is suspended upon the occurrence of a future possible event.

Or upon the occurrence of any other circumstance on which it may be conditionally suspended.—If a man annex divorce to a condition specified, by saying to his wife, "if you enter this house you are under divorce," the divorce takes place upon the occurrence of the condition. This is universally admitted by the learned, because of the existence of the matrimonial authority, at the time of the husband's declaration; and it is evident that this declaration remains in force until the condition be accomplished.

Provided it be pronounced during an actual,
or with reference to an eventual, possession of authority.—But the annexing of divorce to marriage is not lawful, unless the vower be either authorized at the time, or annex divorce to a future possession of authority;
as it is indispensably requisite that the penalty be a thing of probable occurrence, in order that the apprehension of it may operate on the fear of the vower, and that thus the property of a Yameen (viz. restraint from the apprehension of penalty), do really exist at the time of declaring the condition, in virtue either of present authority, or of a reference to a future authority.

Objection.—What is now said appears to contradict the doctrine advanced in the preceding case, of a man annexing divorce to marriage, by saying to a strange woman, "if I marry you, you are divorced," for in that case he is neither in present authority, nor does he annex divorce to the future possession of it.

Reply.—Although he does not annex the divorce to an existing right, yet he annexes
it to the cause of a right which may exist, (namely, marriage*), and annexation to the cause is the same as to the right itself, because in the former the latter is involved.—

But if a man say to a strange woman, "if you enter such an house you are divorced," and afterwards marry her, and she then enter the said house, divorce does not take place, because in this case, he is neither invested with any present right, nor does he

*Marriage being the cause of the right to
divorce.

annex the divorce either or a future right or to the cause thereof.

Five conditional particles of various effect. —
The conditional particles are as follows, viz.: "if," "when," "whenever," "when-soever," and "as often as."—Of these the partile "if" is solely conditional; in the use of the others condition is implied.—And under the four first of these expressions, upon the condition being fulfilled, the Ya-meen, or vow, is completed, and no longer exists; that is to say, if the condition should again occur, the penalty is not incurred a second time, because the words above mendioned do not involve all future acts of the kind expressed in the condition, nor do they demand a repetition of the penalty; and hence, where the act which constitutes the condition is once found to occur, the condition is fulfilled, and no longer remains; and the vow does not continue in force without the condition; but from this rule must be excepted the expression "as often as," which applies universally, and such being the case, it is requisite that the penalty be repeatedly incurred:—in every case, therefore, where divorce is the penalty derived from the use of "as often as," it repeatedly takes place upon the recurrence of the condition.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced as often as you enter the house," and she enter it three times, and then marry another man, and afterwards again marry her first husband, and the condition should then occur, divorce does not take place, as no penalty remains on account of its having been completely incurred in the three divorces which followed the repetition of this act in the first marriage; and as the continuance of a Yameen, or conditional vow, depends upon the continuance of the condition and the penalty, when these no longer remain the vow discontinues also.

If the words "as often as" be introduced
"in reference to marriage, by a man saying,
"as often as I marry any woman she is divorced," divorce takes place upon every instance of his marrying afterwards, though he should marry the woman a second time, after her having been in the interim married to another, because here the penalty is ref erred to the power he possesses of divorce, which is a consequence of marriage; and as this power is not restricted to any particular instance, but invariably accompanies every marriage, it follows that the penalty must take place upon every occurrence of the condition.

A conditional vow of divorce is not annulled by the extinction of property. —
A conditional vow of divorce is not annulled by the extinction of the right; that is, if a man say to his wife, "you are divorced, when you enter this house," and the afterwards give her one or two divorces, and her Edit be completed, the force of the vow still continues under the extinction of right occasioned by such divorce; because the condition specified, namely, her entrance into the house, has not yet been accomplished, and therefore still continues to exist; and the penalty remains, because of the continuance of its subject; wherefore the vow also continues: thus, if the condition take place during the existence of right, the vow is accomplished and divorce takes place, because of the occurrence of the condition, and because the subject is liable to the penalty; and if it occur under the extinction of right, as above, the vow is done away, on account of the condition having occurred: but no divorce takes place, because in this case the woman is not a subject of divorce; for a subject of divorce is a woman who is a property according to the right of marriage.

Case of a dispute between the parties concerning the occurrence of the condition.—If a husband and wife differ concerning the condition, the former ascertaining that it had not occurred, and the latter that it had, the declaration of the husband is to be formed upon the production of proof in support of her allegation, because the husband is as the defendant, denying the existence of divorce, and the consequent extinction of his right; whereas the wife is as the plaintiff, affirming it. This relates to a case where the condition is of such a nature that its occurrence may be ascertained by other means than by the testimony of the wife herself; but if it be of such nature that no evidence but her own is competent to the ascertaining of the condition, her declaration is to be credited in preference to that of her husband. This, however, holds with respect to herself only, and not with respect to any other woman; for if a man say to his wife, "upon the coming on of your courses you are divorced, and also such an one my other wife," and the woman afterwards declare her menstruation to have commenced, divorce takes place upon her only, and not upon the other wife. This proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that divorce does not take place upon her either, because she is in this case in the character of plaintiff, affirming the occurrence of the condition, and the consequent divorce, and the husband is as the defendant, denying; and the declaration of a plaintiff is not to be credited but upon proof; but the reason for the more favourable construction of the law in this instance is that the woman is inquisitor with respect to herself, as occurrence of her courses cannot be known but through her; and hence her declaration is credited on this occasion as well as in cases of Edit, or carnal conjunction; that is to say, if a woman, having been divorced, should declare that "her Edit having passed, she had then been married," the husband, had then divorced her, and that her Edit from that husband had also elapsed," this her declaration is credited, so as to render her lawful in marriage to her first husband; and in the same manner the declaration of the wife is credited with respect to herself in the present instance; but it is not so with respect to the other wife, because this one is only in the character of a witness with respect to the other, and the declaration of a single witness is not to be credited, especially where she is liable to suspicion, which must be the case in the present instance, on account of the enmity subsisting between her and the other, from the latter being her Zirra, her fellow-wife; whence her declaration respecting such an one is not credited.

In the same manner, if a man say to his wife, "if you be desirous that God should torment you with hell fire, you are divorced, and this my slave to free," and she reply, "I am desirous of such torment," or if he should say, "if you love me you are under divorce, and this my other wife along with you," and she reply, "I love you," in both cases divorce takes place upon the woman who is addressed in these terms; but the slave is not emancipated in the instance, nor is the fellow-wife repudiated in the latter, on the reasons mentioned in the preceding case.

Objection.—It would appear that divorce ought not to take place in the former of these instances, as the falsehood of the woman's reply is evident, since no one can be supposed desirous of hell fire.

Reply.—The falsehood is not certain, as it is possible that her hatred of her husband may be sufficiently violent to induce her to wish for a release from him at the expense even of infernal torments. But notwithstanding that the penalty (to wit, divorce) be annexed to her reply, with respect to this woman, although she speak falsely, yet with respect to the other person who is named, divorce or manumission are not so annexed, and consequently that person is unaffected by it.

Rule in case of divorce suspended upon the courses.—If a husband suspend divorce upon the coming of his wife's courses, saying, "upon the coming of your courses you are divorced," and she afterwards perceive the signs of the menstrual discharge, the divorce does not take place until the discharge shall have continued for three days, as that which terminate within a less time is not a regular discharge; but where the discharge has continued for three days, divorce is decreed from the period of its commencement.

But if a man say to his wife, "you are divorced upon one term of your courses," she is not repudiated until she become clean from her next succeeding courses, and her Tohr, or term of purity, arrive; because by one term of the courses is to be understood a complete menstruation, and menstruation is not complete until and return of the term of purity.

And if he say to her, "you are divorced when you fast a day," she becomes divorced on the sunset of the first day on which are fasts: but if he only say, "you are divorced when you fast," her divorce takes place from the first time that she begins a fast. The proofs are drawn on this occasion from the term of those expressions in the original idiom.

If a man say to his pregnant wife, "if you bring forth a male child you are divorced once, and if a female, twice," and she should happen to produce twins, a son and a daughter, and it be unknown which of them was first born, the Kazee is here to decree a single divorce; but caution dictates that it be regarded as two divorces—in this case the woman's Edit, or term of probation, is accomplished by her delivery; for if she brought forth the son first, a single divorce would take place, and her Edit would be accomplished by the birth of the daughter, after which no other divorce could take place on account of the birth of the latter, as the accomplishment of the mother's Edit includes a complete dissolution of her marriage, under which divorce cannot take place; and, on the other hand, if she brought forth the daughter first, two divorces take place, and her Edit is accomplished by the birth of the son, after which no other divorce could take place, for the same reason; hence, in the first instance, one divorce only would take place, and in the second two divorces; but in the present case the second divorce is not decreed, on account of the doubt 'in which the matter is involved; yet (as was already observed) caution dictates that this be considered as amounting to two divorces.

Case of divorce suspended upon acts which admit of frequent repetition.—* If a man say to his wife, "if you converse with Zeyd and Amroo, you are under three divorces," and he afterwards give her a single divorce, and she become separated by the accomplishment of her Edit, and she then converse with Zeyd, and afterwards again marry her former husband, and then converse again with Amroo, she falls under two divorces together with the first.—If all three divorces, Ziffer maintains that on this occasion no divorce whatever takes place.—This case may be considered in four different views:—First, where both the conditions appear, to wit, converse with both Zeyd and Amroo, within marriage, in which case divorce would follow evidently;—Secondly, where both conditions appear without marriage, in which case divorce does not take place, the reason of which is also evident;—Thirdly, where the first condition exists within marriage and the second without,* in which case likewise divorce does not take place, as that penalty cannot follow without the existence of the marriage;—and, Fourthly, where the first condition exists without the marriage, and the second within it;—and this is the case concerning which Ziffer differs from our doctors.—The argument of Ziffer is, that as the existence of marriage is conditional to the divorce taking place at the time of the occurrence of the last condition, so it is in the same manner conditional at the time of the occurrence of the first condition, because they are both (with respect to the rule of divorce) as one thing, since that divorce cannot possibly take place without the concurrence of both of them. To this our doctors reply that the case now under consideration is a vow, which, being an act affecting the maker of it, rests upon his competency; now the existence of marriage, at the period of suspension (that is, of making the vow), is made conditional, in order that the penalty may to a certainty ensue at the period of the conditions specified taking place: and, in the present case, marriage actually existing at the period of suspension, the vow holds good; and the existence of marriage is the condition conditional at the time of the condition being completely fulfilled, in order that the penalty may take place within marriage; because this penalty is divorce, which cannot take place but within marriage: but, in the present case, the time of the occurrence of the first condition is neither a period within which the vow has any force, nor in which the penalty can take place; wherefore that interval is considered merely as the time of the continuance of the vow, to which the existence of marriage is not absolutely necessary, as it depends upon the vow, a vow being an act peculiarly affecting the maker of it, as was already remarked.

Case of a man first procuring a conditional divorces, and then repudiating his wife by two express divorces.—If a man say to his wife, "if you enter this house you are under three divorces," and he afterwards repudiate her by two express divorces; and her Edit be fulfilled, and she be afterwards married to another man, and he have carnal connexion with her, and divorce her, and she be then

*That is to say, where the first occurs within the first marriage and the second intermediately between the dissolution of that and the commencement of the second marriage.
†That is to say, where the first occurs immediately between the dissolution of the first marriage, and the commencement of the second, and the second within the second marriage.
‡This and the following are termed cases of obliteration. They are more fully treated under the article Aila.

married to her first husband, and after that enter the said house, three divorces take place upon her, according to the two Elders.*—Mohammed says that no more can take effect upon her than the one divorce remaining after the two which she had already received, as above; and such also is the opinion of Ziffer. The foundation of this difference, in point of doctrine, is that the two divorces are held, by the Elders, to have been entirely annihilated by the circumstances of the intervening marriage, and hence the first husband still continues empowered with respect to the three divorces [conditionally declared as above] upon the woman returning to him; contrary to Mohammed and Ziffer, who hold that they are not annihilated, and therefore that in such event he continues empowered only with respect to the remainder of the three (as shall be hereafter explained). The effect of this difference of opinion appears in a case where a husband, having suspended one divorce upon the circumstance of his entering a certain house, afterwards repudiates her by two divorces, and the woman, after having married another man, returns to her first husband, and then enters the house, in which case she falls under the rigorous prohibition, according to Mohammed, the two former divorces not having been annihilated by the intermediate marriage; but, in the opinion of the two Elders, she does not fall under the rigorous prohibition, as they conceive the two former divorces to have been annihilated.

Or by three express divorces.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under three divorces if you enter this house," and he afterwards repudiates her by three express divorces and she marry another man upon the expiration of her first divorce, and after being divorced by him be again married to her former husband, and then enter the said house, no effect whatever ensues—Ziffer says that three divorces take place, because three divorces are suspended generally upon the condition, whether in virtue of the right from the present existing marriage, or of that which recurs after the intervening marriage with another; and the expression is general, and not restrictive; hence, therefore, the occurrence of the three suspended divorces may still be conceived possible after the three divorces before given; for which reason the vow also continues in force, as the permanence of that is implied in the possibility of such occurrence. The argument of our doctors is that the penalty does not consist of three divorces generally, but of the three suspended divorces, with respect to which the husband is authorized, in virtue of the present existence of marriage, because he has imposed the vow upon himself for the purpose of determent, and it is only the three divorces therein mentioned which can operate in that way, not those with respect to which he may be authorized by a subsequent marriage, an event the occurrence of which is not probable, the chances being so much against it; and the penalty consisting of those three particular divorces being done away by the three divorces (in consequence of which the subject of divorce no longer remains), the vow is also done away: but it would be otherwise if, after a vow expressed as above, the husband were to repudiate his wife by a single irreversible divorce, for there the vow remains in force, because of the permanence of its subject.*

Case of divorce suspended upon carnal connexion with the wife.—If a man say to his wife, "when I have carnal connexion with you, you are under three divorces," and he afterwards have carnal knowledge of her, divorce takes place upon the instant of such carnal connexion taking place; and here, although he should not immediately cease such connexion, yet he does not become liable for either a fine or a proper dower; but the fine or dower becomes obligatory upon him if, after the shortest cessation, he should again have carnal connexion with her. This is analogous to a vow made with respect to a female slave; for if a master say to his female slave, "when I have carnal connexion with you, you are free," and he afterwards have carnal knowledge of her, she is emancipated on the instant of such connexion; yet she has no claim to a fine, although he should not immediately cease; but if, after a cessation, he again renew the connexion, she has then a claim to a fine. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet;—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that a fine is due where he delays, although he should not entirely retreat and again renew the connexion, because this amounts to carnal connexion after divorce or emancipation, on account of his continuing the connexion: but punishment is not due, since the whole is only one act. In which, it is the commencement affords no cause for punishment, so neither is punishment incurred by the accomplishment of it; but yet the fine is incumbent, as the commission of the carnal act upon a prohibited subject cannot be free from both punishment and fine. The grounds on which the Zahir Rawayet determines in this case, is that by Jama [the carnal act] is understood the commencement of the act: and continuation not commencement; wherefore carnal connexion de novo is not implied; contrary to a case of cessation and renewal, because in that case the connexion takes place after divorce; but yet, even in this instance, punishment is not incurred; on account of the doubt occasioned by the unity of place and of passion; but such being the case, the fine is incumbent, as the commission of the carnal act upon a prohibited subject cannot be free both from punishment and fine.

If moreover, in the case now recited, the husband had suspended a reversible decree upon his commission of the carnal act, the divorce is virtually reversed by his d'lay, agreeably to Aboo Yoosaf; but if he cease and again renew, it is then reversed, according to all the Doctors.

Section

Of Istisna: that is, Reservation or Exception Divorce, with a reservation of the will of God does not take place.—If a man say to his wife, you are divorced (adding) if it please God without any stop between, divorce does not take place, because the Prophet has said, "whosoever makes a vow of divorce or manumission, saying, IF IT PLEASE God, he cannot be forsown;" and also, because the husband has here introduced the words "if it please God," in the form of a condition, and hence the divorce is suspended upon the will of God, and does not take place until the occurrence of the condition: but the will of God, not being known, nothing can be decreed which is suspended upon it. And here, as the suspension destroys the effect of the preceding words, it is a condition that the same follow then connectedly, and without pause, as in other similar cases: and the words "if it please God," are here said to be introduced in the form of a condition, because they are not actually conditional, as by a condition is understood a thing not at present existing, but the future occurrence of which is conceivable; wherefore a thing now existing cannot be in a condition; nor a thing the existence of which is impossible; and the will of God is of one or other of those descriptions.

Unless it be pronounced with a pause between the divorce and the reservation.—What is here said proceeds upon a supposition that the words, "if it please God," follow the preceding words immediately, and without separation, by a pause; but if the man should first say, "you are divorced," and remain a moment or two silent, and then say, "if it please God," the virtue of the former words is established, because in that case the additional words come in as a retraction from the first words which is not held legal.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced, if it please God," and she die before the utterance of the latter words, divorce does not take place, because on account of the reservation, "if it please God," the words preceding do not stand or operate as a desire expressed.

Objection.—As death prevents divorce, that is to say, as it is an account of death that divorce cannot take place, it follows that the same circumstance in the present case precludes the words, "if it please God," and thereby prevents them from operating to annul the first words in their effect, and thus it would appear that on account of the woman's dying as above, the divorce should take place upon her, she not having expired until after the words, "you are divorced," and before the utterance of the reservation, "if it please God.

Reply.—Death operates to the prevention of divorce on account of its cutting off the subject of it; but it does not prevent the effect of the reservation in the present case, as the validity of reservation depends upon that of the declaration, which rests upon the husband, who is still living; but it would be otherwise if he should die before having uttered the reservation, as in that case it is not added to the preceding words.

Divorce pronounced with an exception in point of number takes place accordingly.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under three divorces all but one," two divorces, take place; and if he say, "all but two," one divorce takes place; for it is a rule that this figure of speech termed Istisna, is expressive of a remainder from the whole of a given number from which an exception is made; and this is approved, because there is no difference whatever between a man's saying (for example), "I owe such an one nine Dirms," or, "I owe such an one ten Dirms all but one;" wherefore this mode of speaking by the exception of a part from the whole is approved, because it amounts to a mention, simply, of what remains after the exception is made, as in the present instance.

But the exception of the whole from the whole is disapproved, since, after exception of the whole, nothing whatever remains the mention of which might be established; and hence, if a man say to his wife, you are under three divorces all but three, the three divorces take place upon her, because the exception of a whole from a whole is nugatory, and therefore not admitted to have any effect.

And here, as in the preceding cases, the exception is of no effect, unless it be immediately connected with what goes before namely, the sentence of divorce.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE DIVORCE OF THE SICK.

A wife divorced by a dying husband inherits if he die before the expiration of her Edit.—If a man lying on his death-bed, re-

*By the Mussulman law, a woman, on the death of her husband, is entitled to an inheritance from his estate; but it is possible that the husband may sometimes be induced, from personal dislike or other motive, where he finds himself dying, to repudiate his wife, in order to exclude her from her right of inheritance, in the event of his death; an injustice which the rules and cautions laid pudiate his wife either by one irreversible divorce, or by three divorces, and die before the expiration of her Edit, she is still entitled to her inheritance from his estate: but if he should not die until after the accomplishment of her Edit, she has no claim. Shaferi maintains that she is not an inheritor in either case, as the matrimonial connexion, which was the cause of her inheritance, is dissolved by the divorce; whence it is that if this man were to repudiate his wife by an irreversible divorce, and she were to live within her Edit, before the decease of her husband, the husband does not inherit of her, the matrimonial connexion which was the cause of that relationship which entitled to inheritance no longer remaining. To this our doctors reply that the matrimonial connexion at a time of a mortal illness is a cause of inheritance with respect to the wife: but where the husband is desirous of defeating this right by giving an irreversible divorce, his intention is resisted, by postponing the effect of his sentence of divorce to the expiration of his wife's Edit, in order to shield her from injury, and such procrastination is possible, as a marriage is accounted still to subsist during the Edit, with respect to various of its effects, such as the obligations of alimony, residence, and so forth: and hence it may lawfully be accounted to continue in force with respect to the woman's inheritance; but, as soon as the Edit is accomplished, a further procrastination is impossible, because the marriage does not then continue in any shape whatever. The case, however, is very different where the wife happens to die before her husband (as mentioned by Shaferi), for in this instance the connubial connexion is not a cause of inheritance in the husband (in virtue of his right as connected with her property), because she was not sick but in health at the time of his pronouncing divorce and the connexion is dissolved with respect to his right; especially where he himself manifests his desire that it should be so, by pronouncing upon her an irreversible divorce; since as the connexion would be dissolved though he were not desirous of the annulment of his right, it follows that it is so where he is desirous, a fortiori. The mode in which the connexion may be dissolved without the consent of the husband is by the wife, upon her death-bed, admitting the son of her husband to carnal connexion and dying within her Edit, in which case the husband would not inherit of her, the matrimonial connexion with respect to him becoming null, notwithstanding he does not consent to such annulment.

Unless she be divorced at her own request, or by her own option, or for a comp. nsa down in this chapter are intended to counteract and guard against; some of them are also designed to counteract any fraudulent collusion between the wife and her dying husband, to the prejudice of his heirs.

Annulment.—If a woman require her husband, who is sick, to repudiate her by an irreversible divorce, and he accordingly pronounce the same upon her,—or, if he desire her to choose, and she choose herself,—or, if she procure divorce of him in the manner of Khoola, that is, for a compensation, and he afterwards die before the expiration of her Edit,—she does not inherit of him, because the only reason for postponing the effect of the divorce is a regard for her right, to the destruction of which she in this case consents. But if she require him to repudiate her by a reversible divorce, and he pronounce three divorces upon her, she inherits, because a reversible divorce does not dissolve the marriage; and hence her requisition of such a divorce does not imply her consent to the destruction of her right.

In case of any possible collusion between the parties, by the husband, after a declared divorce, acknowledging himself indebted to her, or bequeathing her a legacy, she receives whatever may be of least value, inheritance, debt, or legacy. If, as a man upon his death-bed, declare that he had repudiated his wife by three divorces, at such a time, during health, that her Edit had passed, and she confirm this, and he afterwards make an acknowledgment of his being indebted to her in a certain sum, or bequeath her a legacy, she will, in the event of his decease, be entitled to that sum of the three which is the least, the legacy, the debt, or her proper inheritance: that is to say, if her heritance be of smaller amount than the debt or the legacy, it goes to her, and so of the others. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples say that the acknowledgment or bequest are either of them legal, and therefore that the woman is entitled either to the whole of the acknowledged debt, or to the entire legacy (provided that does not exceed the third, or disposable proportion of his property), as the case may be. And if the husband, in conformity with the requisition of his wife, pronounce three divorces upon her on his death-bed, and afterward acknowledge himself indebted to her in a certain sum, or bequeath her a legacy, she is in this case entitled to whatever is of least value, the debt, the legacy, or the inheritance, according to all, except Ziffer, who says that she is entitled to the whole bequest (not exceeding the third of property), or to the whole of the debt acknowledged, because her right to inheritance being annulled by her requisition of divorce, the obstruction to the legality of the acknowledgment or bequest (namely, the matrimonial connexion), is removed. The argument of the disciples, with respect to this former case, is that when the husband and wife agree respecting his having divorced her, and her

*This, which is termed Sila Mal, is fully explained in the Book of Wills, Vol. IV.
Edit having passed, she from that period becomes a stranger to him, and he no longer remains liable to suspicion (that is to say, in the present case, suspicion of his preferring her before his other heirs, and giving her more than her right, which is inheritance), whence it is that his evidence to her advantage is credited: and it is also lawful for him to pay her his Zakat, or to marry her sister, or for her to marry another man: contrary to the second case, as there the Edit still remains unaccomplished, and the continuance of that affords ground for such suspicion: now the subject of suspicion is a circumstance as yet concealed and unknown, wherefore the ground for suspicion is regarded, and not the actual fact suspected or apprehended; and as the continuance of the Edit affords ground of suspicion, the effect of suspicion is established, namely, the invalidity of acknowledgment, or bequest; and hence also is established the incredibility of the evidence of husband or wife respectively each other: as well as the incredibility of evidence, in respect to relations either by blood or by marriage; since marriage and affinity are grounds of suspicion. The agreement of Hafseela is that suspicion exists in either instance; in the second, because a woman may choose divorce, in order to open to her the door of acknowledgment, or bequest, so that she may receive more than her proper inheritance: and in the first, because it may happen that the husband and wife may form a collusion, and agree to hold forth their separation and the completion of her Edit, in order that he may be enabled to favour her, by giving her more than her just inheritance; and the suspicion is confirmed where to subsequent acknowledgment or bequest appears to be of more value than the inheritance, on which account it is that such excess is rejected, and the rule dictates that she shall receive the smallest of the three, the debt, the bequest, or the inheritance.—It is here to be observed that no suspicion exists respecting the proper amount of the woman's inheritance, that being adjusted in proportion to the whole property inherited, according to established rules.—Neither are Zakat or evidence subjects of suspicion, as a husband and wife are never known to from a collusion for the purpose of enabling him to give her the Zakat upon his property, to be bear evidence in and matter affecting her.

Divorce pronounced in a situation of danger cuts off the wife from her inheritance, unless the danger be imminent or certain.—If a husband being in a besieged town, or in an army, repudiate his wife by three divorces, she does not inherit of him in the event of his death, although that should happen within her Edit:—but a man engaged in flight, or a criminal, carrying to execution, were in such situation to pronounce three divorces upon his wife, she inherits where he dies in that way, or is slain; for it is a rule that the wife of a Faar (or Evader*), inherits of him, upon a favourable construction of the law; and his evasion cannot be established but where her right is inseparable connected with his property, which is not the case, unless he be [at the time of pronouncing divorce] sick of a dangerous illness (appearing from his being confined to his bed, and other symptoms), or in such other situation as affords room to apprehend his death: but it is not established where he pronounces divorce in a situation in which his safety is more probable than his destruction:—thus, a man who is in a fort or town besieged, or one who resides in an army, cannot be said to be in any imminent danger, the former of these situations being designed for security against the enemy, and the latter to repel his attacks;—whereas one engaged in flight, or carrying to execution, is in circumstances of imminent danger; and consequently the evasion is established in the latter circumstance, but not in the former.—There are various cases recorded corresponding with these at present recited, and which proceed upon the same rules.—It is to be observed however, that what is here said, viz; "where he dies that way, or is slain," shows that there is no essential difference between the two cases where he dies in the way mentioned, or in any other way, the same as a husband confined to a sick bed, who happens to be slain.

A conditioned divorce pronounced in sickness, does not cut off the wife from her inheritance, unless the condition be her own act. —If a man, being in health, say to his wife, "when the first of such a month arrives"—(or)—"when your enter this house"—(or)—"when such and one repeats every day prayers"—(or)—"when such one enter this house,"—"you are under divorce," and the thing mentioned take place at a time when he is sick, she does not inherit of him:—but if he were to make such a condition upon his death-bed she inherits in all these cases except one, namely, "when you enter this house."—It is to be observed that the suspension now treated of are of four different kinds:—First, where divorce is suspended upon the arrival of a specified time;—Secondly, where it is suspended upon the act of a stranger;—Thirdly, where it is suspended upon the act of the husband himself;—and Fourthly, where it is suspended upon the act of the woman: and each of these again are of two descriptions; one, where the suspension is declared in health, and the condition occurs in sickness; the other, where both take place in sickness. In the two first instances, namely where the husband suspends the divorce upon the arrival of a specified time, by saying, "when the first of such a month arrives you are under divorce." or where he suspends it upon the act of a stranger, by saying, "when such an one enters the house," (or) "when such an one repeats evening prayers," if the suspension and the condition both occur in sickness, the woman is entitled to inherit of her husband; because his intention here appears to be evasion, from the circumstance of his suspending divorce at a time when the wife's right is inseparably connected with his property; but if the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, the woman does not inherit of him.—Ziffer says, that in this last case also she inherits because whatever is suspended upon a condition takes place on the occurrence of that condition, and is than like the fulfillment of a promise; and also, because in this case divorce occurs during sickness. The argument of our doctors is that the antecedent suspension induces divorce at the time of the occurrence of the condition consequentially, but not designedly, and injury is not established but from design; the act of the husband, therefore, is not to be set aside by the annulment of its effect, namely, non inheritance.—And, in the third instance (that is where the husband suspends the divorce upon his own act), he is considered as an Evader, and the woman inherits of him, whether, the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, or both occur in sickness; and also, whether the act be of an avoidable or an unavoidable nature; the reason of which is, that the husband on this occasion evidently designs to defeat his wife's right, whether by the suspension, or by producing the condition during a mortal illness.

Objection.—It would seem that the husband is not an evader where the condition is an act of an unavoidable nature.

Reply.—In the case now under consideration, the act of condition be unavoidable by him, yet it is in his power to avoid the suspension of divorce upon that act, and hence his act is set aside, in order that the woman may not be injured.

Provided that act be of an unavoidable nature.

And in the fourth instance (that is, where the husband suspends divorce upon an act of the wife), if the suspension and condition both occur in sickness, and the act be of such a nature as may be avoided by the woman (such as drinking, or prayer, or conversing with her parents), she is entitled to inherit of her husband, as she is compelled to performance of such acts. since, if she were not to perform them there is fear of her perishing either in this world or the next; and the consent cannot exist where she acts from unavoidable necessity; but if the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, and the act be of a nature avoidable by the woman, she does not inherit, for evident reasons. And where the act is of an unavoidable nature, the rule is the same, with Mohammed and Ziffer (that is, she does not inherit), because, on this occasion, no act appears on the part of the husband, after the connexion of the wife's estate with his property.—With the two Elders, on the contrary, she does inherit, because the husband in this case obliges her to the commission of that act, and for that reason the act becomes his own, she being only as his instrument; as in a case of compulsion, a compellee being one who is straitened between two things; in which predicament the wife here stands, since, if she perform the act of condition, she sustains the injury of divorce, and if she refrain she is in danger of perishing either here or of hereafter.

Where recovery intervenes between a sick bed divorce and the death of the husband, the wife is cut off from inheritance.—If a man pronounce upon his wife three divorces in sickness, and afterwards recover his health, but happen to die before the expiration of her Edit, she does not inherit.—Ziffer says that she inherits, because the husband in this case appears to have intended evasions but to this our doctors reply that the sickness in which divorce was pronounced having been removed by the intermediate recovery of health, the last sickness which follows, is the same as health, whence it appears that her right is not connected with his property and therefore the husband is not an evader in divorcing her.

And so also where her apostacy intervenes.

—If a sick person pronounce three divorces upon his wife, and she afterwards apostatize from the faith, and again return to it, and the husband then die before the expiration of her Edit; she does not inherit of him.

But not where her incest intervenes.—If, however, she were not to apostatize, but should admit the son of her husband to carnal connexion, she inherits.—The difference between those two cases, that by apostacy her capacity of inheritance is destroyed; whereas, by admitting the son of her husband to the commission of the carnal act it is not so, for although this renders her prohibited to her husband, yet it does forbid her competency of inheritance, since prohibition and inheritance may be united in the same person (as, for instance, in a mother or a sister), wherefore she inherits in this case; but it would be different is she were to admit the son of her husband to carnal connexion during the existence of marriage, because separation is the consequence, whence it appears that she consents to the destruction of the matrimonial connexion, which is the occasion of her inheritance, whereas, if she admit the son of her husband, to carnal connexion after the latter having pronounced three divorces upon her, pro-
CHAPTER VI.

OF RIJAAT, OR RETURNING TO A DIVORCED WIFE.

Definition of Rijaat.—Rijaat in its primitive sense means restitution; in law it signifies a husband returning to, or receiving back, his wife after divorce, and restoring her to her former situation, in which she was not liable to prosecution from the passing of its decrees, or of the sentence corresponding with their periods, and which she recovers by Rijaat; this is the definition of it in the Jana Ramiz; from what occurs respecting it in the present work, it appears simply to mean the continuance of marriage.

A man may return to a wife repudiated by one or two reversible divorces.—If a man give his wife one or two divorces reversible, he may take her back at any time before the expiration of her Edit, whether she be desirous or not, G.1 having said in the Koran, "Ye may retain them with humanity," where no distinction is made with respect to the wife's pleasure; or otherwise; and by the word retain is understood a continuance of the marriage (whence the term retain is applied to it), and this cannot be established but during the Edit since after that is past the marriage no longer remains.

Rijaat is of two kinds, express and implied.

—Rijaat is of two species: the first is termed express, where the husband says, for example, "I have returned to (or taken back) my wife, or addresses the same to her personally; and the second implied, where he has carnal connexion, or takes conjugal liberties with her, such as viewing those parts of her which are usually concealed, and so forth. This second description of Rijaat is according to our doctors. Shafei says that the Rijaat is not approved, or regular, but where it is expressly pronounced by the husband (providing he be able to speak), because Rijaat stands as a marriage de novo, and (according to him) carnal connexion with the wife is in this case prohibited, on account of its legality having been annulled by the divorce, which is a dissolution of marriage, for it would appear that the marriage is itself dissolved by a divorce, although it be of the reversible kind, were it not that the law there leaves to the husband an option of Rijaat, which is the sole reason why he confines its effect to the prohibition of carnal connexion, and does not extend it to a dissolution of the marriage itself. The argument of our doctors is that that by Rijaat is understood a continuance of the marriage, as was before explained; and this may be shown by an act, as well as by words, for acts sometimes evince continuance, as in the case of abolishing the option of a seller, that is to say, in the same manner as the abolition of an option of a seller (which is the continuance of property) is proved by an act, so also in the present case; now acts peculiar to marriage are signs of the continuance of it; and the carnal connexion, or other acts, as before stated, are

*That is to say, forces her to require her husband to verify his accusation by a Laan, or solemn asseveration, before the magisttate, which, if he does so, occasions divorce.

peculiar to marriage, especially in the case of free women, since, with respect to them, they cannot be lawful but through marriage, and, with respect to female slaves, they are sometimes lawful by right of marriage, and sometimes by right of possession; contrary to touching, or looking at the pudenda of a woman, without lust, because that is sometimes lawful without marriage, as in the case of a physician or midwife; and the sight of other parts than the pudenda sometimes happens to people who reside together and if a wife resides with her husband during her Edit, if such an accident were to happen Rijaat, he might then give her another divorce to her injury, as it would protract her Edit.

The evidence of witness to Rijaat laudable, but not incumbent.—It is laudable that the husband have two witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat; yet if he have no witnesses the Rijaat is nevertheless legal, according to one opinion of Shafi—Malik holds that it is not lawful without witnesses, God having so commanded, saying, in the Koran, "RETAIN THEM WITH HUMANITY, OR DISMISS THEM WITH KINDNESS, AND TAKE THE EVIDENCE OF TWO WITNESSES OF YOUR OWN PEOPLE, AND SUCH AS ARE OF JUST REPUTE;" where, the imperative being of injunctive import: the taking of evidence appears to be incumbent. To this our doctors reply, that in all the texts which occur concerning Rijaat it is mentioned in the Malik, and not under any restriction of being witnessed; moreover, by Rijaat is to be understood (as was before stated) the continuance of marriage, to which evidence is not a necessary condition; as in a case of Aila, for instance, where it (the Aila or vow of abstinence) is done away by the carnal act, to which there are no witnesses; but yet the taking evidence to Rijaat is laudable, for the greater caution, so as to put it out of the power of any person to contradict it. With respect to the sacred text quoted by Malik, the taking of evidence is mentioned injunctive, but in a recommendatory sense: for in this instance retaining them, and separating from them, are connected by the intermediate particle "or," the text saying "RETAIN THEM, OR DISMISS THEM, AND TAKE TWO WITNESSES," &c., from which it appears that the calling witnesses is laudable only, and not injunctive, in the present case, because, in separation, it is held to be laudable only by all the doctors.

The wife, should have due notice of it.—It is also laudable that the husband give his wife previous information of his intention of Rijaat, lest she fall into sin: for, if she be not aware of his intention, it is possible that she may marry another husband after the accomplishment of her Edit, and that he may have carnal connexion with her by an invalid marriage, which is prohibited.

A declaration of previous Rijaat, made after the expiration of the Edit, is to be credited where both parties agree in it.—If, after the accomplishment of the woman's Edit, her husband were to declare that he had taken her back before the expiration of it, and she confirm this, Rijaat is established; but if she deny the fact, her declaration is credited, because the husband in this case pretends to have performed an act which is not at present in his power, and his declaration is therefore liable to suspicion, and is not to be credited unless that be removed by the woman's confirmation. It is to be observed that the oath of the woman (according to Haneefa) is not necessary. This is one of the six cases of Isthillaf,* which are discussed at large in the Book of Marriage.

But not when they disagree.—If a man, having repudiated his wife by a reversible divorce, afterwards say to her "I take you back," and she reply, "my Edit, is past," the Rijaat is not valid, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that it is valid, because it occurs within the Edit, that being accounted to continue until the woman gives notice of its completion; and in this case the Rijaat takes place before such notice; hence also it is that if the husband say to her, "I have divorced you," and she reply, "my Edit is passed," still divorce takes place. The argument of Haneefa is that the Rijaat appears to occur after the completion of the Edit because the wife is trustee with respect to her declaration of her Edit being completed: and as to the case of a declaration made by the two disciples, it is not admitted by Haneefa, for divorce in such a circumstance, according to his opinion, would not take place: admitting, however, that it did take place, it may be replied that divorce takes place from the declaration of the husband, after the completion of the Edit (by his saying "that he had divorced her during her Edit"), because this a severity upon himself, and may therefore be allowed credit, contrary to returning to a wife, as that cannot be established by a declaration made after the expiration of the Edit, since such declaration affects another person.

The declaration of wife who is a slave must be credited respecting the termination of her Edit.—If the husband of a female slave, after her Edit is past, declare that he had taken her back during her Edit, and her owner confirm his declaration, but she herself deny it, she is to be credited, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that the confirmation of her owner is to be credited, because her person is his property, and hence he makes a declaration in favour of the husband, respecting a thing which is his particular right; this, therefore, is analogous to a case where a master makes a

Some doctors have delivered it as the opinion of the two Elders, that the power of Rijaat terminates upon the conclusion of prayer, whereafter it does not terminate until the conclusion, in order that the rule respecting the repetition of prayer may be fulfilled.

Where the woman, in performing ablution, omits any part of her person, if it be a complete limb (such as the hand or foot, for instance), or more, the power of Rijaat does not terminate; but if the part omitted be less than a limb (a finger, for instance) it terminates. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this rule proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law; for analogy would dictate, in this case, that if a

*According to the Mussulman law, no religious act can be performed without a previous purification, by ablation, where water is to be had, or, in defect of water, by teyum-mim, that is, rubbing the hands, face, and other parts of the body, with sand or dust. A woman; while in a state of impurity, is incapable of any religious act; and hence this formal purification is requisite upon the stoppage of the menstrual discharge. The point upon which the case here considered turns is whether, as the teyummim is only a substitute for ablation, the power of Rijaat continues until her repetition of prayer, or whether it terminates immediately upon the performance of that act.

†That is, as the ablation is in this case incomplete, the power of Rijaat does not terminate until prayer; but when that is repeated, it terminates of course—the woman's purification being then fully ascertained.

*See Book II. Chap. III
complete limb be through forgetfulness omitted, the power of Rijaat discontinues, because the woman has performed the ablation upon the greatest number of her limbs, and the rule of the whole applies to the greatest number; whereas, on the other hand, in the omission of any part short of a complete limb, it would suggest that the power of Rijaat still remains, because the laws respecting Janayat and the courses do not admit of division, and hence, where the power of Rijaat remains with respect to a part, it continues with respect to the whole, as in the liberty of prayer, for instance; in short, analogy requires that the rule be the same in both cases; but the reason for a more favourable construction is that there is an essential difference in the two cases, because any part short of a complete limb soon becomes dry, especially in hot weather; and hence it is not certain but that part may have undergone ablation together with the rest, for which reason it is here said that the Rijaat terminates: whereas a complete limb does not quickly become dry; and neither can the omission of a large portion of the person, in ablation, be ascribed to forgetfulness. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the omission of ablation with respect to the mouth or nostrils is the same, as with respect to a complete limb; but it is elsewhere recorded from him that these stand the same as any part short of a complete limb (and of this opinion is Mohammed), because there is a difference of opinion concerning the divine injunction directing the ablation of those parts.

A husband may take back an enjoyed divorced wife, provided she be delivered of a child within such a time as establishes him in Rijaat, if a man divorces a wife who is pregnant, or who has brought forth a child, and declare that he has never had carnal connexion with her, he is nevertheless at liberty to take her back, because where the pregnancy appears within such time as renders it possible to be derived from him, to him it is to be ascribed; and this circumstance proves his connexion with her, whence a right of Rijaat is established in him, as the divorce thus appears to be reversible, and in the same manner where the parentage of the child born of her is established in him, his connexion with her is also established; and it thus appearing that she has been enjoyed by him, the divorce is consequently reversible; and his declaration is in either case null, as the law denies it, because, by ascribing the woman's pregnancy, or the birth of the child, to the carnal act of the husband, it establishes her marriage, and consequently his right of Rijaat, a fortiori: It is to be observed that by the husband divorcing a wife who has brought forth a child is here meant divorce after delivery; for if the child were born after the divorce, the Edit would be thereby accomplished and the power of Rijaat would terminate of course.

A man acknowledging that he had never consummated with his divorced wife has no power of Rijaat, although he has been in retirement with her.—If a man retire with his wife in such a way as amounts to a Khalwat Saheeh, and afterwards divorce her, declaring that he has not had carnal connexion, he has no power of Rijaat, because that would have been confirmed to him by his commission of the carnal act; but he acknowledges that this has not taken place, and hence his declaration is credited, as it apportions the prejudice of his right: and the law does not on this occasion deny his declaration, because a woman's right to her stipulated dower is founded upon her making delivery of her person, and not upon her husband's seisin of it; contrary to the former case, as there the law is repugnant to the husband's declaration.

If a man divorce his wife after a retirement, and again take her back, and afterwards assert that he has not had carnal connexion with her, and she should be delivered of a child within a day short of two years after divorce, the Rijaat is valid notwithstanding his assertion, because the parentage of the child is established in him, as the woman had not declared the completion to her Edit, and a child may be supposed to continue so long in the womb, whence the husband is considered as having had carnal connexion with her before divorce, because if her pregnancy were ascribed to such connexion after divorce, the marriage stands dissolved on the instant of divorce, on account of its not having been then consummated: and of course the subsequent carnal connexion is unlawful; and Mussulmans are not supposed to commit any unlawful acts.

Rijaat may be established by the birth of a child.—If a man suspends the divorce of his wife upon the circumstance of her producing a child, and she be delivered of a child, and again of another within not less than six months after, although it were more than two years, Rijaat is established, provided the woman have not declared the completion of her Edit, because divorce taking place upon the woman in consequence of her first delivery, Edit was incumbent upon her; and her second child must be supposed to pro-

*To understand the scope of this case, it is requisite to advert to one of the fundamental laws of divorce,—that a divorce pronounced upon a woman with whom the husband has not had carnal connexion is, in all cases, irreversible. The case here considered supposes the husband to have repudiated his wife by a sentence of divorce undefined, that is, without specifying whether it is reversible or irreversible: for if he were to declare it under the latter description, it holds so at all events.

*That is to say, the man is considered as having taken back his wife. (See the beginning of this chapter.)
ceed from an embrace of the husband during the Edit, which act on his part amounts to a formal reversal of the divorce.

If a man say to his wife, "every time that you produce a child you are under divorce."

and she be delivered of three children at three separate births, that is, within not less than six months of each other, Rijaat is established by the birth of the second child and in the same manner by that of the third, because, upon the birth of the first, divorce takes place, and Edit is incumbent, and upon that of the second Rijaat is established, for the reason before observed, that it must be supposed to proceed from an embrace of the husband during the Edit; and a second divorce takes place, because the husband has suspended divorce upon child birth with the expression, "every time that," and Edit is incumbent in consequence of this divorce; and by the birth of the third, Rijaat is again established, for the same reason as above, and a third divorce takes place in the same manner as the second; and in this case the Edit is to be counted by the courses, because the wife was not pregnant, but subject to courses, at the period of each divorce taking place upon her.

A woman under reversible divorce may adorn herself.—It is allowed to a woman under reversible divorce to adorn herself as she is lawful to her husband on account of their marriage still holding: and as Rijaat is laudable, and her adornment of her person may excite him to it, the action is therefore permitted by the law.

A man must not approach a reversible divorced wife without giving her intimation.—It is not proper for a man, having a wife under reversible divorce, to approach her without previous intimation, or letting her hear his footsteps:—this is where he has no intimation of Rijaat; because a woman is sometimes undressed, and it might happen that if he were to come upon her unawares he would see parts of her, the sight of which occasions Rijaat; and this not being his intention, he would give her another divorce, which would protract her Edit.

A divorced wife cannot be carried upon a journey until Rijaat be established.—A man cannot carry with him, upon a journey, a wife whom he has repudiated by a reversible divorce, until he have called witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat.—Ziffer says that the husband has such a power, because their marriage still holds; which is the reason why he may lawfully have carnal connexion with her, according to Hanefa.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold.—First the word of God, who has said, "TAKE THEM NOT FORTH FROM THEIR DWELLINGS," where the text applies to the woman under reversible divorce, the carrying of whom upon a journey is the removal of them from their dwellings, and is therefore illegal;—Secondly, the only reason why the effect of a sentence of reversible divorce is postponed to the accomplishment of the Edit is, the possible intention or wish of the husband to take back his wife; but where he does not do so before the Edit is accomplished, it appears that he had no such wish or intention, in which case it would be evident that the sentence took effect upon the instant of his pronouncing it and that the wife was consequently separated from that period; for if the effect of the sentence were in reality restricted to the completion of the Edit, another Edit would then always be requisite after the first; and hence, as it appears that the wife is, in effect as a stranger to her husband, from the time of the sentence of divorce, it follows that he has no authority to carry her forth; whence it is here said that he cannot carry her upon a journey until he has calle witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat:—in which case the Edit is annulled, and his authority re-established.

Cohabitation is not made illegal by a reversible divorce. Carnal connexion with a wife is not rendered illegal by a reversible divorce, according to our doctors. Shafei maintains that it is rendered illegal thereby, since the connubial connexion is dissolved because of the appearance of wife who terminates marriage, namely, his sentence of divorce. The argument of our doctors is that the connubial tie still continues, insomuch that the husband is at liberty to take back his wife, even against her will, because a right of Rajaat is reserved to him out of tenderness, in order that he may be enabled to recover his wife when he becomes ashamed of having divorced her: and this necessarily implying that he is empowered to recover her, his being so proves that Rijaat is a continuance of the marriage, and not a marriage de novo, as a man cannot marry a woman against her will. With respect to what Shafei advances, that "the connubial connexion is dissolved on account of the appearance of that which terminates marriage, namely, his sentence of divorce, it may be replied that the effect of the terminator is postponed to the completion of the Edit, according to all the doctors, out of tenderness the husband, as above.

Section.

Of Circumstances which render a divorced Wife lawful to her Husband.

A man may marry a wife repudiated from him by one or two irreversible divorces.—In a case of irreversible divorce, short of three divorces, the husband is at liberty to marry his wife again, either during her Edit, or after its completion, as the legality of the subject still continues, since the utter extinction of such legality depends upon a third divorce; and accordingly until a third divorce take place, the legality of the subject continues.

Objection.—If the legality of the subject continue, it follows that it is lawful for any other person besides the husband to marry the wife during her Edit.

Reply.—Her marriage with any other during her Edit is forbidden, on account of its inducing a doubtful parentage; but if the husband marry her, this objection cannot exist.

But if by three divorces he cannot marry her until she be previously married to another man,—if a man pronounce three divorces upon a wife who is free, or two upon one who is a slave, she is not lawful to him until she shall first have been regularly espoused by another man; who, having duly consummated, afterwards divorces her or dies, and her Edit from him be accomplished, because God has said "if he divorce her, she is not, after that, lawful to him." (that is after a third divorce) "until she marry another husband." And here two divorces to a slave are the same as three to a free woman, because the legality of the subject had by half its force in a slave, on account of her state of bondage; and hence it would follow, that, such an one, a divorce and a half stands the same three divorces to a free woman, but as divorce is incapable of subdivision; two divorces are allowed. As to what is said, that the second husband duly consummating is a condition, it is founded on the text here quoted, in which the word Nikah [marriage] implies carnal connexion, as it bears two meanings, by one of which it signifies carnal conjunction, and by the other the legal union of the sexes and it is on this occasion taken in the former sense; but ever admitting that the word Nikah, in the text, meant simply the marriage contract, yet the condition is established up on a well-known tradition of the Prophet who being questioned concerning person a power of marrying again a wife who, after he had repudiated her by three divorces, had been married to another man, and when after retiring with her, and lifting her veil, that man had divorced, replied "the woman is not lawful to her first husband until she has tasted the embrace of the other," but the condition requires only the entrance of the penis into the vagina, and not the emission of seed, as the above tradition implies the entrance generally, whence that only is understood.

Nature of the consummation. In the second marriage which renders a divorced wife again lawful to her first husband,—A third divorce by the husband is the same as a full grown man with respect to legalizing; that is to say, if a man give his wife three divorces, and she after her Edit, marry with a youth under maturity, and he perform the carnal act with her, she when [in case of his death or divorce] becomes lawful to her first husband because the condition, namely, entrance, in virtue of a regular marriage, is necessarily supposed to be fulfilled, Malik says that the carnal act of a full grown man is the condition, because unless he be arrived at maturity, the woman's testing (that is enjoying pleasure from his embrace, which is the condition, is not fulfilled; but the cases before recited in the book of marriage disprove this distinction of Malik. It is to be observed, that it is recorded in the Jama Saghier, that a boy under puberty but who is such as to be able to perform the carnal embrace is termed a Moorahick; and where such an one has carnal knowledge of his wife, ablation is incumbent upon her, and is thereafter rendered lawful to a former husband, if he should have repudiated her by three divorces; and the carnal embrace of such an one is implied from the circumstance of his having a priapism and desire. It is also to be observed that ablation is made incumbent upon the woman, in the present case, only on account of the entrance of the boy's penis into her vagina existing an emission seminal on her part, the necessity thereof with respect to her being solely in consequence of her full puberty; but it is not incumbent upon the boy, he not being subject to the necessity of such observance; but yet it is required of him, that he may be habituated to a laudable custom.

A female slave, whom her husband has repudiated by two divorces, is not rendered lawful to him by the carnal embrace of her master, because that which is essential to her legality (namely, marriage) does not exist here.

The second marriage, when contracted under a legalizing condition, is disapproved but yet the woman is rendered legal by it to her first husband.—If a man marry a woman whose husband had repudiated her by three divorces, under a condition of rendering her lawful to her former husband, as if he were to declare to her,—"I marry you under a condition of rendering you lawful to your former husband, or, as if she were to say to him,—"I marry with you under the condition of my becoming lawful to my former husband."—this is an abominable marriage, because the second husband is here treated of a Mohullil, or legalizer, and the Prophet has said, "let the curse of God fall upon the Mohullil and the Mohallil-ee-hoo": but nevertheless, if the parties contract a marriage under this condition, and the man divorce the woman after carnal connexion, she, upon the completion of her Edit, becomes lawful to her former husband, as there undoubtedly exists a consummation in a regular marriage, which is the cause of legality, and the marriage is not invalidated by the condition. It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf that such a marriage is null, as it falls under the description of a Nikkah Mowokket, or temporary marriage, because the words of the husband, "I marry you under a condition of rendering you lawful to your former husband," imply, "I marry you until the time of our having carnal connexion, and not for an indefinite time, and therefore the same as where a man says to a woman, "I marry you for a month," and so forth; and the marriage being invalid, the woman cannot by that means be rendered lawful to her former husband; but in reply to this our doctors urge that the restriction of the marriage to any specified time is not expressly mentioned by the parties, nor does the man here marry the woman under any other condition than that of doing by her any marriage requires; and hence it does not come under the description of a temporary marriage. It is recorded from Mohammed that the marriage is legal and valid, for the reasons before mentioned; but yet the woman is not thereby made lawful to her first husband, because the second husband here endeavors to precipitate a thing which the law postpones (for the law postpones her legality, to her former husband to the death of her present), and therefore meets a due return in the defeat of his design (to wit, legalizing the woman to her former husband); in the same manner as in the murder of an heir apparent; that is to say, if any person, by his inheritance, he is thereby cut off from inheritance, as having attempted to precipitate that which the law has postponed, and thus meets his punishment in the defeat of this design (to wit, immediate inheritance); and so also in the present case.

The first husband, recovering his wife by an intervenient marriage, recovers his full power of divorce over her.—If a man repudiates his wife by one or by two divorces, and, her Edit being completed, she be married to another man, and afterwards return to her former husband, he becomes again authorized so far as three divorces, the one or the two divorces formerly pronounced upon her by him having been cancelled and obliterated by her marriage with the second husband, in the same manner as three divorces would have been.* This is the doctrine of the two Elders, Mohammed says that marriage with a second husband does not obliterate any thing short of three divorces. The proofs on either side are drawn from the Arabic.

The wife’s declaration of her having been legalized is to be credited.—If a man pronounce three divorces upon his wife, and she afterwards declare that “her Edit having been duly accomplished, she has been married to another man, and enjoyed and divorced by him, and that her Edit from him is elapsed,”—her former husband may lawfully admit her avowal, and marry her, provided that from the period of his divorcing her such a space of time have elapsed as affords a possibility of this having been the case, and that he actually believe her assertion to be true; because the substance of the woman’s assertion is either a matter of mere temporal concern, (as not comprehending) any merit or demerit before God), or it is a matter of religion (on account of legality being suspended upon it), and the declaration of a single person, either in matters of a temporal or spiritual nature, is worthy of credit; and the confirmation of her assertion is not forbidden or reprobated, where the space of time which has intervened admits the possibility of its truth.—The learned differ concerning the shortest period which admits of this possibility, as shall be fully explained in treating of Edit.

CHAPTER VII.

OF AILA.

Definition of the term.—AILA, in its primitive sense, signifies a vow. In law, it implies a husband swearing to abstain from carnal knowledge of his wife for any time above four months, if she be a free woman, or two months, if she be a slave.

The mode in which Aila is established.—If a man swear that he will not have carnal connexion with his wife,—or, that he will not have such connexion with her within four months,—an Aila is established; because God has said, “WHERE A MAN MAKES A VOW [AILA] WITH RESPECT TO HIS WIFE, HE MUST STAY FOUR MONTHS,”—to the end of the verse.

In breach of Aila expiration is incumbent.—If a man, in a case of Aila, have carnal knowledge of his wife within four months after, he is forsworn in his vow, and expiation is incumbent upon him, this being incurred by the breach of his vow; and the Aila drops, as his vow is cancelled by the breach of it.

But if it be observed, a divorce irreversible ensues at its termination.—But if he have not carnal knowledge of her for the space of four months, a divorce irreversible takes place, independent of any decree of separation from the magistrate. Shafei says that a decree of the magistrate is requisite, because the husband here withholds her right (namely carnal connexion) from his wife, and hence the magistrate acts as his substitute, in effecting a separation; as in the case of enuchs and impotent persons, in short, according to Shafei, a right to demand separation rests with the woman, in the same manner as in the case of her marriage to one who is impotent or an ennuh; and in consequence of a decree of the magistrate she becomes repudiated by a divorce irrver-

*That is to say, one or two divorces are obliterated, the same as three would be, had that been the number formerly pronounced by him. It is necessary to observe that this case involves a principle in divorce which is nowhere expressly mentioned: namely, that the same woman is not a legal subject of more than three divorces to any one man, and consequently, that a man who repudiates his wife by two divorces (for instance), if he marry her again, unless the intervention of another husband obliterates these two, has no power beyond one divorce in the second marriage.
sible. — The arguments of our doctors are twofold: — FIRST, the husband, in abstaining from carnal connexion for the space of four months, acts unjustly towards his wife, by withholding from her that which is her right, for which the law makes him a due return,
in depriving him of the benefit of marriage upon the expiration of that term; and this is an opinion recorded from Othman, and Alee, and Abdoola-Ibn-Mussaood, and Ab-doola-Ibn-Abbass, and Abdoola-Ibn-Aumroo, and Zeyd-Ibn-Sabit: —SECONDLY, in times of ignorance* an Aila stood as a divorce, and the law afterwards constituted it a divorce postponed to the period of four months:
—Now, if a man swear to abstain for four months, his vow drops at the expiration of that term; that is, if the same man should afterwards marry and cohabit with the same woman he is not forsown, because the vow was temporary; but if he should have sworn to abstain for ever, his vow continues force, because it is general (that is to say, is not restricted to four months), and no violation appears by which it might be cancelled yet divorce does not take place upon it repeatedly, unless where marriage is repeated, because, after separation, the withholding of the woman's right cannot be supposed to exist: but if, after separation, the vower were to marry her again, the Aila returns;
and consequently, upon carnal cohabitation in this marriage, he would be forsown; or if he abstain, an irreversible divorce again takes place upon him, at the expiration of four months, as before, because the obligation of the vow continues, on account of its being general, and in consequence of the man marrying her again her right to carnal con-exion is established, and of course his injustice in withholding it from her. — And here it is to be observed that the recommencement of the Aila is to be counted from the date of the second marriage; and if this man were again a third time to marry her, the Aila returns, and occasions an irreversible divorce at the expiration of four months, in case of the husband refraining from carnal connexion for that term, for the reasons already stated.
—What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the vower marrying the woman again without the intervention of her marriage with another man; but if, in the interim, she had been married to another man, divorce would not take place in consequence of the vower abstaining from carnal connexion for the space of four months, in the second marriage, because the vow is confined in its effect, to divorce in the first or original propriety;† the Aila in the present case, being the same if the husband were to suspend divorce upon his abstaining from carnal cohabitation for the space of four months,
where the effect is restricted to the propriety
then existing, and so in this case likewise.—
This case is grafted on the case of obliteration, concerning which there is a difference of opinion between Ziffer and our doctors:
and that case is where a man, having said to his wife, "if you enter this house you are under three divorces," afterwards repudiates her by an express sentence of three divorces, and she is again married to him, and then enters the said house, from which no divorce takes place, according to our doctors, whereas Ziffer holds that divorce takes place: as was recited at large in a former chapter. — But observe that, in the case now under consideration, although divorce do not take place, yet the obligation of the vow remains, as it was general, and continues uncancelled by any breach of it: and hence, if the man should ever have carnal connexion with his wife at any subsequent period, expiation is incumbent upon him; on account of this breach of his vow.

A vow of abstinence for a term short of four months does not constitute Aila. — If a man make a vow to abstain from carnal knowledge of his wife for less than four months (as if he were to restrict it to two or to three months), it is not an Aila, because Ibn Abbas has said that Aila is not occasioned by a vow of abstinence from carnal connexion with a wife for a period short of four months; and also, because a husband who abstains from the embrace of his wife for the space of four months or upwards;
has no obstruction to plead, that being the longest space during which any obstruction is supposed to exist;* but an obstruction tolerated by her marriage with another. In short, the propriety, or peculiar right, of a husband is a priciple which is alive in the actual existence of marriage, and is not annihilated, but remains dormant, or ques-tient, under a termination of it by divorce;

and hence it is that, where a man marries a woman, after having repudiated her, he is said to attain a revival of propriety, not a propriety de novo. Many of the most important and (apparently) unaccountable laws of divorce are to be traced to this source. In the present case the Aila is said to have been restricted in its effect to the vower's original propriety, and consequently, in its effect, recurs upon every revival of that propriety by marriage; but it being abrogated by the woman's intervenion marriage with another, the vower's subsequent marriage with her is an attainment of propriety de novo, in which the vow cannot operate.

*That is, before the establishment of the Mussulman faith.
† When a man marries a woman, his milk (which, is here and elsewhere rendered propriety, or right; that is, peculiarity of possession) continues with respect to her, notwithstanding divorce, until it be abro-

be understood pregnancy for the last four months, during which it is not deemed lawful for a husband to have carnal connexion with his wife.
may continue for a time short of four months and consequently divorce will not take place from a vow of abstinence for that time.

If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, "by God I will not have carnal connexion with you for two months, nor for two months after that," Aila is established. The proofs of this are drawn from the Arabic. But if a man swear that "he will not have carnal connexion with his wife for two months," and then remain silent for a day, and the next day again swear that "he will not have carnal connexion with her for two months, after the other two," Aila is not established, because the second vow is distinct and separate from the former, the husband, upon his making his first vow, being prohibited from carnal connexion for two months, and upon making the second, four months, excepting the day on which he remained silent, whence the term of four months complete (being the space of time requisite to constitute Aila) is not included in this vow. For it is, that "he will not have carnal connexion with his wife for a year, excepting a day," Aila is not established. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who places the excepted day at the end of the year, conceiving this to be analogous to a case or hire; that is to say, if a man agree to let or hire a house to another for a year excepting a day, the day excepted is transferred to the end of the year, and so in this case likewise; and the exception being transferred to the end of the four months the complete term of an Aila is involved in the vow. The argument of our doctors is that the term Mawalee [maker of an Aila] is applied only to one who cannot have carnal connexion with his wife for the space of four months without incurring a penalty, such as expiation for instance; but in the present case the husband may have carnal connexion with his wife without incurring any penalty, because the day excepted is not particularly specified, contrary to a case of hire, where the excepted day is transferred to the end of the year, from necessity, as the contract, or engagement of hire, would without that be void, on account of ignorance; whereas this is not the case in a vow. But if, after this vow, the man were on any particular day to have carnal connexion with his wife, and four months or upwards of the year still remain, Aila is established, as the exception then drops.

If a man, being in Baara, and his wife in Koofa, swear that he will not go to Koofa, Aila is not established, because he can still have carnal connexion with his wife, without incurring any penalty,* by bringing her from Koofa to the place of his residence, and there enjoying her.

A vow of abstinence under a penalty anomadexed, constitutes an Aila.—If a man make a vow, annexing to his breach of it pilgrimage, fast, alms-gift, manumission, or divorce, by saying to his wife, "If I have carnal connexion with you, I am under an obligation to fast,"—or "to give alms,"—or "to perform a pilgrimage,"—or "such and such a man, my slave, is free,"—or "you are divorced,"—or "such and such a man, my wife is divorced,"—Aila is established, as in this case an obstacle is opposed to the commission of the carnal act from the terms of the vow, in the mention of the condition and the penalty, the several penalties above mentioned amounting to prohibition, as the incurring of any of them is attended with trouble or injury. Aboo Yoosaf objects that suspending the manumission of a slave upon the commission of the carnal act does not amount to an Aila, as it is possible for the husband to evade the penalty, by first selling the slave, in which case he might yet commit the act of carnal connexion without incurring any penalty. To this Haneefa and Mohammed reply that the sale of the slave is not a matter of certainty, as a purchaser is not always found, and hence this objection is of no weight.

Aila holds respecting a wife under reversible divorce.—If a man make an Aila with respect to a wife under reversible divorce, the Aila is established; but if with respect to one under irreversible divorce, it is not established, because the connubial union still subsists in the former case, but not in the latter; and in the sacred writings the same is declared to be a subject of a vow of abstinence who is the wife of the wovener.

But drops on the accomplishment of her Edit.—If a man make an Aila with respect to a wife under reversible divorce, and her Edit be accomplished before the expiration of the term of Aila, the Aila then drops, as the woman (becoming totally separated by the completion of her Edit) no longer remains a subject of it.

An Aila made respecting a woman before marriage, is nugatory.—If a man say to a strange woman, "By God I will never have carnal connexion with you,"—or "you are to me like the back of my mother,"* and he afterwards marry her, neither Aila nor Zihar are established, as these expressions are ipso facto null, the woman, at the time of his addressing her in these terms, not being a subject of either one or the other, since none are so but wives; but yet if a man marry a woman after having vowed in this manner, and have carnal knowledge of her, he must perform expiation on account of breach of his vow, which is still binding upon him.

*A species of abuse, by which, in times of ignorance, the wife stood virtually divorced. Since the propagation of the faith, it only occasions the wife to be prohibited to her husband until such time as she shall perform an expiation. See article Zihar.
THE term of Aila, with respect to slave, is two months, this being the space of time fixed for her final separation; thus the term of Aila of a slave is half that of a free woman, as well as her Edit.

An Aila made respecting a wife at a distance may be orally rescinded.—If, at the time of making an Aila vow, there should exist any natural or accidental impediment to generation on the part of either the man or the woman (such as the former being sick, or the latter being impervia coeundi, or an infant incapable of the carnal act—or their being at such a distance from each other as does not admit of their meeting during its term), it is, in this case, in the man's power to rescind his Aila, by saying "I have returned to that woman," upon which the Aila drops.—Shafei says that Aila, cannot be rescinded but by the carnal act (and such is likewise the opinion of Tehavee), because, if the above declaration of the husband amounted to a rescindment, it would follow that a breach of the vow is therein established, and consequently that expiration is incumbent; whereas this is not the case.

The argument of our doctors is that, the Mawalee, having wronged his wife by a vow prohibiting his carnal connexion with her, it remains with him to make her such satisfaction as circumstances admit of, by a verbal acknowledgment; and the wrong being thereby removed, he is no longer subject to the penalty annexed to it, namely, divorce.

It is to be observed that if the obstruction to generation, in the case under consideration, be removed during Aila, and after the Mawalee's oral rescindment as above such rescindment is null, and his commission of the carnal act is then requisite to rescind it, as he is here enabled to employ the actual means, whilst the end remains as yet unattained.

An equivocal expression of divorce, takes effect according to the husband's interpretation of his intention.—If a man say to his wife, "you are prohibited to me," let him be asked concerning the intention of these words: and if he say, "my design, in those words, was to express a falsehood," his declaration is to be credited, as his intention coincides with their actual tenor. (Some have said that his declaration is not to be credited before the Kazee, * as his speech is apparently a vow, since the rendering prohibited that which is lawful amounts to a vow.) And if he say, "I intended divorce," and single divorce irreversible takes place, except where he designed three divorces in which case three divorces take place, as was stated in treating of Talak Kinayat, or divorced by implication; and if he say, "I intended Zihar," Zihar is accordingly established with the two Elders. Mohammed says that this is not Zihar because it is essential to Zihar that the husband compare his wife to his own relation within the prohibited degrees, which is not the case in this instance.—The argument of the two Elders is that he has declared prohibition generally; and Zihar also involves a sort of prohibition (namely, the prohibition of carnal connexion, until after expiation), and a circumstance generally expressed is capable of bearing a restricted construction.

—And if he say, "I intended prohibition," or "I had no particular intention," his speech amounts to a vow, and consequently an Aila is established from it, because a vow is the original thing (with our doctors) in rendering prohibited that which is lawful, as shall be demonstrated in treating of vows. Some doctors construe any expression of prohibition into a divorce, where there is no particular intention, as being agreeable to custom.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF KOOOLA.

Definition of the term.—Kooola, in its primitive sense, means to draw off or dig up. In law it signifies an agreement entered into for the purpose of dissolving a connubial connexion, in lieu of a compensation paid by the wife to her husband out of her property.

—This is the definition of it in the Jama Ramoz.

Reasons which justify Kooola, or divorce for a compensation.—Whenever enmity takes place between husband and wife, and they both see reason to apprehend that the ends of marriage are not likely to be answered by a continuance of their union, the woman need not scruple to release herself from the power of her husband, by offering such a compensation as may induce him to liberate her, because the word of God says "No crime is imputed to the wife or her husband respecting the matter in lieu of which she hath released herself," that is to say, there is no crime in the husband's accepting such compensation, nor in the wife's giving it.

Which occasions a single irreversible divorce.—And where the compensation is thus offered and accepted, a single divorce irreversible takes place, in virtue of Kooola; and the woman is answerable for the amount of it, because the Prophet has said that Kooola effects an irreversible divorce: and also, because the word Kooola bears the sense of divorce, whence it is that it is clas ed with the implied expressions of it, and from an implied divorce a divorce irreversible takes place;—but intention is not essential to Kooola, because by the mention of a compensation, the act is in the independent of it:—and also, because it is not to be imagined that the woman would relinquish any part of her property but with a view to her own safety and ease, which is not to be obtained but by a total separation, What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition

of the aversion being on the part of the wife, and not on that of the husband; but if it be on the part of the husband, it would be abominable in him to take any thing from her because the sacred text is DESIRous OF changing (that is, repudiating one wife and marrying another), take not FROM her ANY thing:’—and also because a man, by divorcing his wife from such a desire of change, involves her in distress; and it behoves him not to increase that distress by taking her property. If, moreover, the aversion be on the part of the woman, it is abominable on the husband to take from her more than what he had given or settled upon her namely, her dower. (According to the Jama Sagheer, if the husband take from her more than the dower, it is strictly legal, as the text of the Koran already quoted is expressed generally, but the former opinion is founded on a tradition of the Prophet, to whom a woman having mentioned her hatred of her husband, he advised her to give up her dower, as a compensation, to induce the husband to divorce her, to which she replied, ‘I will give that and more!’ but the Prophet answered, ‘not more!’—and here the aversion was on the part of the woman).—But yet if the husband should take more than the dower, it is approved in point of law;—and so also, if he were to take any compensation, where the aversion is on his part, because the sacred text, goes to establish two points; one, the lawfulness of Khoola in a judicial view; and the other, its admissibility between the parties and God Almighty; now from the tradition which has been recited, appears that where the aversion is on the part of the wife, a Khoola for more than the dower is disapproved; and, on the other hand, the text before quoted shows that if the aversion be on the part of the husband, he should not take any thing, and consequently not more than the dower a fortiiori; wherefore the ground of admissibility is abandoned, on account of the contradiction between the tradition and the text; and practice is established upon the other remaining ground, namely the lawfulness of Khoola in a judicial view.

The wife is responsible for the compensation.—If a husband offer to divorce his wife for a compensation, and she consent, divorce takes place, and she becomes answerable for the compensation; because the husband is empowered, of himself, to pronounce either an immediate or a suspended divorce, and he here suspends the divorce upon the assent of the woman, who is at liberty to agree to the compensation, as she has authority over her own person, and the matrimonial authority, like retaliation, is one of those things for which a lawful compensation is lawful although it do not consist of property; and the divorce is irreversible for the reason already assigned, and also because Khoola is understood to be an exchange of property for the person; and upon the husband being vested with a right in the property, the woman; in return, is vested with a right in her own person, in order that an equality may be established.

Difference between a wife requiring Khoola in lieu of an unlawful article and requiring divorce in lieu of the same in express; and if the thing offered to the husband in return for Khoola be not lawful property (as if the woman were to desire him to grant her Khoola in lieu of wine or a hog, and he consent, saying, ‘I agree to a Khoola in lieu of such wine,’ or so forth; a divorce irreversible takes place, but nothing is due to the husband: but if a compensation for divorce consist of a thing not lawful property (as if the woman were to desire her husband to divorce her for a cask of wine, and he consent, saying ‘I divorce you in consideration of such wine,’ and so forth), a reversible divorce takes place. —The reason, or divorce taking place in both instances: that the husband has suspended it upon the consent of the woman, which is already testified; and the difference between the case of Khoola and that of divorce is that, in the former, the compensation being null, the word used by the husband [Khoola] remains, and that, as being a Kinayat, or implied sentence, is effective of irreversible divorce; whereas, in the latter the word divorce is express, and consequently occasions reversible divorce only. —And the husband has here no claim upon his wife, because she has not named any appreciable article, which might be the means of deceiving him; and also, because if the thing named be particularly specified by her, it cannot be lawfully made incumbent upon her in favour of her husband, on account of his being a Mussulman; and in the same manner, it cannot be made incumbent if it be not particularly specified, as in that case she does not charge herself with it:—but it is otherwise where she specifies a thing under a false denomination (as if, for instance, she were to make a proposal of Khoola to her husband, by saying, ‘divorce me for this cask of vinegar,’ and he agrees, and she afterwards appear to contain wine), for in this case he had a claim upon her for an equal quantity of vinegar of the medium standard, because her naming an appreciable article has been the means of deceiving him; —and it is also contrary to a case in which a master emancipates his slave, or constitutes him a Mokatib, in return for a cask of wine, for than the emancipated person is responsible to his emancipator for the amount of his estimated value as a slave, because the owner’s property in his slave is a thing which bear a certain estimable value inherent in which he therefore cannot be supposed willing to relinquish gratuitously; whereas the property in the wife’s person is not to any estimable value in the circumstance of the dissolution of the connubial right, as the only reason for its being so, in the attainment of such rights, is its importance, and consequent title to respect, when it is that the attainment of that right without a return is not countenanced by the law; but the relinquishment of that right being in itself a manifestation of such respect, there is then no occasion to impose upon any one an obligation of property for the purpose of manifesting it.

The compensation for Khoola may consist of anything which is lawful in dower. If a woman is capable of being accepted as a dower, is also capable of being accepted as a compensation for Khoola since whatever is capable of being a proper return for that which is appreciable (namely, the woman's person at the time of its coming into property), must, in a superior degree, be capable of being a compensation for a thing not appreciable (namely, the woman's person at the time of the destruction of property).

Case of Khoola required in lieu of property unspecified.—If a woman say to her husband, "Grant me Khoola for what is in my hand," and he agree, and it should afterwards appear that she had nothing in her hands divorce, takes place; but nothing remains incumbent upon the woman, as she has not deceived her husband by any specific mention of property: but if she were to say "grant me Khoola for the property in my hand," and he agree accordingly, and it should appear that she had nothing in her hand, she must in this case return to him her dower, because she has deceived him by a specification of property which did not exist; and hence he does not appear to consent to a relinquishment of the connubial propriety without a return, and the woman cannot be legally bound to give the thing specified, or its value, as its kind or species is unknown; neither can she be laid under any legal obligation to render the estimated value of her person, that is, her proper dower, because, in the circumstance of the destruction of the connubial propriety, that is not appreciable; it is therefore fixed that there remain incumbent upon her whatever the husband may have given in lieu of his attainment of the propriety, in order that thus he may be shielded from injury. —If, moreover, a woman say to her husband, "grant me Khoola for the Dirms in my hand," and he agree and it afterwards appear that she had nothing in her hand, he has a claim upon her for three Dirms. —The proofs are here taken from the Arabic.

Case of Khoola in lieu of an absconded slave.—If a man enter into an agreement of Khoola with his wife, in lieu of an absconded slave, on the condition that, if the slave be recovered, she shall make him over to the husband, but if not, she shall not be answerable; yet she is not released from responsibility, and it remains incumbent upon her either to make delivery of the slave or of his value, because an agreement of Khoola is of a reciprocal nature (whence it is requisite that the recompense be received on the part of the husband); and the condition of release from responsibility agreed to by the parties is disapproved, and consequently void; but yet the Khoola is not so, as it is not rendered void by involving an invalid condition. Analogous to this is a case of marriage;—for if a man marry a woman, agreeing to give, as her dower, an absconded slave on the condition that if he be recovered he shall be made over to her—but if not, that the husband is not to be answerable: yet the husband is not released from responsibility, and it remains incumbent upon him either to deliver to his wife the slave specified when able so to do, or to pay her his price.

Cases of Khoola granted for a specified sum. —If a woman say to her husband, "divorce me thrice for one thousand Dirms," and he pronounce a single divorce, there remains incumbent upon her one third of the thousand Dirms, because, in requiring three divorces for the whole sum, she has required each divorce, separately, for the third of that sum. —It is however to be observed that the single divorce pronounced in this case is irreparable, as being given in lieu of property.

If a woman say to her husband, "divorce me thrice, upon my paying you one thousand Dirms," and the husband give her one divorce, nothing is incumbent upon the woman, according to Haneefa, and the husband is at liberty to take her back. The two disciples say that a divorce irreversible, takes place in return for one third of the thousand Dirms because the expression "upon payment of" is the same as the word, "for" in contracts of exchange. The argument of Haneefa is that the expression "upon payment" is a condition, and the thing conditioned cannot be divided according to the parts of the condition itself; contrary to the word "for" as that is used to express a return, and as the property is not due, divorce express (and consequently reversible) remains.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself thrice, for (or upon payment of) one thousand Dirms:" and she pronounce upon herself one divorce, no effect whatever takes place, because the husband is not desirous that she should become separated for any thing short of the whole sum specified; contrary to a case where the proposal comes from the wife (as in the preceding instance), because, as she there appears to be desirous of procuring separation from her husband at the whole expense specified, it follows that she is willing to procure it, at the third of that expense only, a fortiori.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced upon payment of one thousand Dirms," and she agree, divorce takes place upon her, and the husband has a claim upon her for the thousand Dirms, in the same manner as where a man says, "you are divorced for one thousand Dirms," and the wife consents, in which case divorce takes place, and one thousand Dirms are incumbent upon her: but it is to be observed that in both cases the woman's assent is a condition because the words of the husband, "you are divorced for one thousand Dirms," mean, "you are under divorce in return for one thousand Dirms.
due from you to me,"—and his words, "you are divorced upon payment of one thousand Dirms," mean "you are under divorce on condition that one thousand Dirms be due from you to me," and the return cannot be made incumbent upon her without nullifying it, because a circumstance suspended upon a condition cannot take place until the condition be previously fulfilled, wherefore the effect in this case depends upon her agreeing to what is proposed. And here the divorce is irreversible, for the reason already stated.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced, and there is against you a thousand Dirms," and she consent,—or, if a man say to his slave, "you are free and there is against you a thousand Dirms," and the slave assent,—the slave is free, and divorce takes place upon the wife, but nothing remains incumbent upon either; according to Haneefa:—the rule is also the same if they were not to assent. The two disciples say that the sum specified is incumbent upon them, where they assent; but that, if they do not assent, neither divorce nor emancipation take place; for they argue that the latter part of the husband's address is such as is used in bargains of exchange; and a contract of Khoola, or of Kitabat, being a contract of exchange, is therefore to be considered as such:—as in hire, for instance, where if a man say to another, "carry this burden, and there is a Dirm for you," the same as if he were to say, "carry this burden for a Dirm." To this Haneefa replies that the latter part of the sentence has a separate and detached sense, and therefore is not connected with the preceding part, unless there be something to show that it is so;—but here nothing exists to evince such connexion, because divorce and manumission are frequently produced without any substantial return:—contrary to cases of sale, or of hire, as neither of these are to be conceived without a substantial compensation.

A proposal of Khoola made to the wife, with a reserve of option to the husband, is invalid. If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced for a thousand Dirms, on a condition of option to me (or, to you) for three days," and she consent, the option is invalid, where it is reserved to him, but valid where it is reserved to her; and if she rejects his proposal within the three days, the Khoola is null: but if she do not reject it within that time, the divorce takes place, and the sum specified by the husband becomes incumbent upon her. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples say that the option is null in either case, and that divorce takes place upon the woman, and the sum specified becomes incumbent upon her, because option is used for the purpose of dissolving a contract, or other agreement, after it has been concluded; and not for preventing the execution of it; and the act of the man, or of the woman, implying proposal on the part of the former, and acceptance on that of the latter, does not carry with it dissolution on either part; his proposal does not, as it is a Yameen, or suspending vow, on account of its involving a condition (namely, the suspension of divorce upon the woman's consent); and a vow is in itself incapable of effecting dissolution; nor does her acceptance, as that is the condition of the vow and as the vow is in itself incapable of effecting dissolution, so is the condition; and such being the case, the reserve of option on either part null.—The argument of Haneefa is that Khoola is on the part of the woman stands as a sale, since it is a transfer of property for a return, and accordingly, if it proceed first from the wife, by her saying to her husband, "divorce me in return for one thousand Dirms, on a condition of option to me (or, to you) for three days," and she afterwards retract before her husband signifies his consent, her retraction is approved, on which account it is restricted to that Majlis, or situation, and does not extend beyond it,—that is, if she rise from her seat before her husband signifies his assent, it becomes null: the condition of option in it therefore, when proceeding from the wife, is approved; but when it proceeds from the husband, the condition of option is not approved, because it is then a vow, wherefore his retraction of it is not approved, and it continues in force beyond the Majlis; and as it is a vow on the part of the husband, he can have no option, since a vow does not admit of option. Let it be also observed that the case of a slave, with respect to manumission, is the same as that of a wife, with respect to divorce:—that is to say, manumission for a consideration is an exchange, on the part of a slave, that same as divorce for a return, on the part of a wife.

The assertion of the husband respecting Khoola is to be credited. If a man say to his wife, "I yesterday divorced you for a thousand Dirms, but you did not consent," and the woman reply that she did consent, the assertion of the husband is to be credited: but if a man say to another, "I yesterday sold you this slave for a thousand Dirms, but you did not consent," and the other reply that he did consent, the assertion of the purchaser is to be credited. The reason of the difference between these two cases is that divorce for a compensation is a vow, when proceeding from the husband, and his acknowledgment of his having made the proposal does not necessarily imply an acknowledgment of the condition having taken place; as the vow holds good independent of that circumstance, whereas sale cannot be effected without the consent of the purchaser, and hence an acknowledgment of sale necessarily implies an acknowledgment of that circumstance without which sale cannot exist, namely, consent, and the seller's denial of that circumstance is a contradiction to his previous acknow-
A mutual discharge leaves each party without any claim on the other.—A Mobarat, or mutual discharge (signified by a man saying to his wife, "I am discharged from the marriage between you and me," and her consenting to it), is the same as Khoola,—that is to say, in consequence of the declaration of both, every claim which each had upon the other drops, so far as those claims are connected with the marriage. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. Mohammed says that nothing is done away by either except what is particularly mentioned by both the husband and the wife. Aboo Yoosaf unites with Mohammed, as to the Khoola, but with Haneefa as to the mutual discharge.—The argument of Mohammed is that mutual discharge and Khoola are contracts of exchange, in which the circumstances specifically stipulated are also regarded, and not those which are not stipulated. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that the word Mobarat, from its grammatical implications, bears a reciprocal sense, and therefore requires that the discharge be equally established on both sides; and this is general; yet the discharge is in this case restricted to those rights connected with marriage, as the design proves it to be so; but Khoola only requires that the woman be freed from the restraint of her husband; and as that is obtained by the dissolution of the marriage, it does not require that all its effects be terminated. The argument of Haneefa is that Khoola bears the sense of separation, and that is general, the same as a mutual discharge, and consequently marriage is thereby terminated, together with all its rights and effects, the same as by a mutual discharge.

Khoola entered into by a father on behalf of his infant daughter is invalid.—If a father transacts a Khoola with the husband of his infant daughter, agreeing to pay the consideration out of her property, the Khoola is not valid with respect to her, because this exhibit no regard for her interest, as her person is not appreciable in the dissolution of a marriage, whereas the consideration is so: contrary to marriage (as where a man contracts his infant daughter to another) for that is valid, because the woman's person, on entering into a marriage, is appreciable, and the woman's person not being appreciable in the dissolution of a marriage, the Khoola of a wife sick of a mortal illness is considered as proceeding from third of her property: but being appreciable upon entrance into a marriage, if a man sick of a mortal illness were to marry a woman on a proper dower, it is considered as coming from the whole of her property.—The Khoola, therefore, being illegal, the dower of the infant does not drop, nor does the husband acquire any right to her property.—There are two traditions upon this matter, with respect to the set of the father occasioning divorce in this instance: according to one, other it does not; the former, however, is the better opinion, because the Khoola is a suspension of divorce upon the consent of the father, which is the same as upon any other condition.

Unless he engage to hold himself responsible for the compensation.—If a father transacts a Khoola on the part of his infant daughter for a certain sum, engaging to hold himself responsible for the payment, then this Khoola is valid, and if the sum specified becomes incumbent upon him, because the engagement even of a stranger for the consideration of Khoola is valid, and consequently that of a father in superior degree: in this instance also the infant's dower does not drop, as the father has no authority with respect to the relinquishment of it.

Or refer it to his daughter's consent.—And if the father were to stipulate that his daughter is to be responsible for the sum specified, this will depend upon her consent where she is competent (that is, capable of comprehending the nature of the transaction, and pronouncing upon them); and if she consent, divorce takes place, on account of the condition being fulfilled upon which it is suspended: but the sum specified (or consideration) is not incumbent upon her, as an infant is incapable of undertaking the discharge of any pecuniary obligation: and if the father consent on his daughter's behalf, there are two traditions concerning it:—according to one, divorce does not take place until she shall exentually express her consent; and according to another, divorce takes place independent of it; but here the compensation agreed for is not incumbent upon her at all events.—And in the same manner, if a father, transacting a Khoola on the part of his infant daughter, agree that the compensation shall consist of her dower, and he happen not to be surety for the same, the validity of the Khoola depends upon the daughter's consent, which if she declare, divorce takes place; but yet her dower does not drop: and also, if the father consent on his daughter's behalf, there are two traditions concerning it, as already stated: if however, he be surety for the dower, amounting to one thousand Dirms (for instance), divorce takes place, because the condition (namely consent) is satisfied; and five hundred Dirms only are incumbent upon him, according to a favourable construction of the law. Analogly would suggest that he is liable for the whole thousand, upon this ground, that where an adult woman transacts Khoola on her own behalf, before consummation of marriage, for any specified sum (say one thousand Dirms), and her dower be also one thousand, the whole sum is incumbent upon her, and is discharged by five hundred dropping from her dower, and her paying the other five hundred out of her own property:
— but according to the more favourable construction of the law, nothing whatever is incumbent upon her, because the intent of the husband, in the transaction, is merely to free himself from the obligation of her dower; and this end being obtained, nothing beyond that remains incumbent upon her.

CHAPTER IX.

OF ZIHAR

Definition of the terms.—The word Zihar is derived from Zihar, the back.—In the language of the law it signifies a man comparing his wife to any of his female relation, within such prohibited degree of kindred, whether by blood, by fosterage, or by marriage, and renders marriage with them invariably unlawful, as the Prophet thus addressed the women of the Arabian idiom, "you are to me like the back [Zihar] of my mother." It is essential to Zihar that the person compared be the wife of the speaker, insomuch that Zihar does not apply to a female slave; and competency to pronounce Zihar appertains only to one who is a Mussulman, of sound mind, and mature age, that pronounced by a Zimme or an infant being nugasory; and its effect is to prohibit the person who pronounces it from carnal connexion with his wife, until he shall have performed an expiation.

Zihar prohibits carnal connexion until expiation.—If a man say to his wife, "you are to me like the back of my mother," she [wife] becomes prohibited to him, and his carnal connexion with her is unlawful, as well as every other conjugal familiarity, until he perform expiation for the same as is enjoined in the sacred writings.

Nature and duration of Zihar.—In times of ignorance (that is, before the establishment of the Mussulman faith), Zihar stood as a divorce; and the law afterwards preserved its nature (which is prohibition), but altered its effect to a temporary prohibition, which holds until the performance of expiation, but without dissolving the marriage.—
The reason for this is that Zihar is an offence, as being a declaration founded upon a falsehood, and which amounts to a disowning or denyng of the wife; and therefore finds its proper punishment in her being rendered unlawful to him who pronounces it, by a prohibition which cannot be removed but by his performing expiation; and as carnal con-exion becomes prohibited by Zihar, so do all its accompanying privileges, such as kissing, touching, and other familiarity, lest the husband be tempted to the commission of the carnal act; in the same manner as is the rule with respect to relations within the prohibited degrees, with whom not only the carnal act itself, but also every familiarity which leads to the commission of it, are prohibited: contrary to that respecting women fasting, or in their courses, with whom although the commission of the carnal act itself be prohibited, yet other liberties are not so, as those situations are perpetually recurring to them and if such a rule were to hold, it would operate as an absolute continual restraint upon them; whereas with respect to women under Zihar, or within the prohibited degrees, this is not the case.

If the prohibition occasioned by Zihar be violated, yet no additional penalty is incurred.—If a man, having produced Zihar upon his wife, have carnal connexion with her before he make expiation, it behoves him to respect and pray forgiveness from God; but nothing is incumbent upon him, except the expiation on account of his Zihar,
as before, and that he refrain from any repetition of the carnal act with her until he perform such expiation. because it is related of the Prophet that he thus commanded one who had committed the carnal act with his wife after Zihar, and before expiation from which tradition it appears that nothing more is incumbent (in consequence of the commission of the carnal act before expiation), for if it were so, the Prophet would somewhere have mentioned it.

Zihar cannot occasion divorce.—Let it be observed that from the words of the husband,
"you are to me like the back of my mother,"
nothing but Zihar is established, because the term employed expressly signifies Zihar;
and if he should intend divorce by it, yet that does not take place, as the law of divorce is broken through in this particular,*
and consequently Zihar does not admit of divorce being intended by it.

Zihar is established by a comparison with any part of the body which implies the whole person.—If a man say to his wife, "you are to me like the belly of my mother," or
"the thigh," or "the pudendum,"—Zihar is thereby established, as Zihar signifies the likening of a woman to a kinswoman within the prohibited degrees, which interpretation is found in the comparison being applied to any of the parts or members improper to be seen.—And Zihar is in the same manner established, by the likening of the wife to any other kinswoman within such prohibited degree as that marriage with them is at all times unlawful, such as sisters, and aunts, and foster-mothers, who are invariably prohibited, as well as a natural mother. And so also it a man say to his wife, "your head is to me like the back of my mother," or "your pudendum," or "your waist,"—because by these the whole person is figuratively expressed; and so also if he were to say, "your half or your third," because in this case the effect is established in a

*That is to say, Zihar has been made, by the law, a thing distinct and separate from divorce, and subject to a rule peculiarly aplicable to itself.
diffusive portion* and consequently extends to the whole person, because, as the diffusive portion of any thing is a proper subject of all other acts such as purchase, sale and so forth, so is it of divorce; but divorce being that half of divorce, is necessarily established in the whole person; and as Zihar resembles divorce it therefore, like divorce, extends to the whole also.

A general comparison takes effect according to the husband's explanation.—Where a man says to his wife, "you are to me like my mother," it is requisite that his intention be examined into, so as to discover the true predication in which the wife stands; and if he declare that his meaning was only to show respect to his wife, it is to be received according to his explanation, because in speech respect may be expressed by a general comparison; or, if he declare his intention to have been Zihar, that is accordingly established, for here appears a comparison with the whole person of his mother, in which her back is included: but as that is not expressly mentioned, the speaker's intention is requisite to establish it; and if he declare his intention to be divorced, a divorce irreversible takes place, as his comparing his wife with his mother is likening her to one who is prohibited to him, and is therefore the same as if he were to say, "you are prohibited to me," thereby intending divorce;—but if he declare his intention to have been Zihar, the question is whether Zihar nor divorce are established (according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf), because the address bearing the construction of respect, must here be taken in that sense, as being of less importance than any other. Mohammed says that Zihar is established independent of intention, because a comparison of the wife with a limb or member of the mother occasioning Zihar, it follows that, where it is made with the whole, Zihar is established a fortiori.—With Aboo Yoosaf if the intention of the husband be merely prohibition, and Zihar is said, Aila only is prohibited, because the prohibition by Aila is less rigorous than by Zihar.—With Mohammed, on the contrary, Zihar is established: his argument is taken from the Arabic.

And the same of a comparison in point of prohibition.—If a man say to his wife, "you are to me prohibited, like my mother," intending either Zihar or divorce, it takes effect according to his intention, as this address may be taken in either sense,—in that of Zihar, as being a comparison,—and in that of divorce, as expressing prohibition; strengthened by the comparison. In this case, however, if he have no intention, according to Aboo Yoosaf, Aila is established,—and, according to Mohammed, Zihar,—as in the preceding case.—And if he say, "you are to me prohibited like the back of my mother," and thereby intend divorce or Aila, yet nothing but Zihar is established, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples say that whatever he may intend is established, as prohibition equally implies either Aila or divorce; according to Mohammed, however where divorce is the intention, no Zihar is established; whereas, according to Aboo Yoosaf, divorce and Zihar are both established together (that is, divorce is established on account of the intention, and Zihar on account of the term Zihar [back] being expressly mentioned, as was stated in its proper place)—The argument of Haneefa is that the words above recited expressly signify Zihar, and therefore do not bear any other sense; and the word prohibited, which is introduced there, relates solely to the prohibition by Zihar, as prohibition is of various kinds of which that by Zihar is one, and is on this occasion preferred, on account of the accompanying comparison with the back of the mother, and all other kinds of prohibition being only constructive, and that by Zihar positive, the prohibition to which the word "prohibited" alludes, is to be taken as relating to the Zihar only.

Zihar has no effect upon any but a wife.—Zihar is not established with respect to any but the wife of the speaker, insomuch that if a man pronounce a Zihar upon his female slave, it has no effect for various reasons. First, God has said, "Declare Zihar upon their women,"—where, by women is understood wives; secondly, the legality of a female slave is that of a secondary or dependent nature, and that of a wife of a primary or original nature, and hence those two persons must not be confounded; Thirdly, Zihar is an imitation of divorce, and divorce does not take place upon a slave.

If a man marry a woman without her consent, and pronounce a Zihar upon her before that be obtained, and she afterwards signify her consent, the Zihar is established, because the husband, in making the comparison, said no more than what was at that time strictly true, and hence what he says does not amount to a disowning or denying of her.

Objection.—It would here appear that the validity of the Zihar remains suspended upon the woman's consent to the marriage, in the same manner as the manumission of the purchaser of a slave from an usurper rests upon the consent of the proprietors (that is to say, where a person purchases a slave of the usurper of him, and emancipates him, the validity of his emancipation depends upon the proprietor's assenting to the sale), because Zihar is a right of possession by marriage, in the same manner as manumission is a right of possession by right of property.

Reply.—The validity of the Zihar is not suspended upon her consent of the marriage, because Zihar is not one of the rights of marriage, as it has no place in the ordinances.
of the law,* whereas matrimony has a place in them, and that which is not of the law is incapable of appertaining as a right to that which is one of its ordinances; contrary to the case of manumission proceeding from the purchaser of a slave out of the hands of his usurper, as manumission is a right of property.

Zihar collectively pronounced takes place upon every individual to whom it is addressed.

—Where a man addresses all his wives collectively, saying, "ye are to me as the back of my mother," Zihar is established with respect to every one of them, he having on this occasion applied the Zihar to them all indiscriminately, as in divorce, where if a man direct a sentence of divorce to the whole of his wives collectively, it takes place upon the whole. And here an expiation is incumbent upon him, on account of each wife respectively, because prohibition has been established with respect to each; and expiation is ordained for the purpose of terminating and abolishing the prohibition; and where that is numerous the expiation must be so likewise, according to the number of prohibition; contrary to a case where a man, pronounce an Aila (or vow of four months' abstinence from carnal connexion) upon all his wives collectively, and break his vow by having carnal knowledge of them within the four months, for here a single expiation only is incumbent upon him, because in this case expiation is incumbent upon him, out of respect to the honour and greatness of the name of God; and his name, in a vow of Ali, is mentioned once only, as it is pronounced by the man saying to all his wives, "by God I will not have carnal connexion with you."

Section.

Of Expiation.

A Zihar may by expiated by the emancipation of a slave, &c.—The expiation of a Zihar may be effected by the emancipation of a slave; or if, from not being possessed of such slave, this mode be impracticable, it may be effected by a fast of two months successively† or if the state of the health do not admit of such fast, by the distribution of victuals to sixty poor men; because a passage which occurs in the Koran, respecting expiation, demonstrates the obligation of performing it in one or other of those ways: but the expiation is supposed to precede a man's touching his wife, after having pronounced a Zihar upon:—in expiation by manumission or fasting this is evident, because the text relates to that; and so also in expiation by the distribution of victuals to the poor;—because by expiation prohibition is terminated, wherefore it is necessary that the expiation be first made in order that carnal connexion may be lawful.

The emancipation of a slave of any description suffices.—It suffices for an expiation that a slave be released, whether that slave be an infidel or a Mussulman, an infant or an adult a male or a female, because the word Rakba, in the Koran, applies equally to all of these, as it signifies one who is possessed, in right of property, by another, under any description whatever.—Shafei says that the emancipation of an infidel does not suffice as an expiation, because this is a right of God, which cannot lawfully be expended upon one who, as being an infidel, is his enemy; like Zakat, which is a right of God, and the disbursement of which upon infidels, as being the enemies of God, is therefore illegal. To this our doctors reply, that the emancipation of a slave (Rakba) is what is mentioned in the text, and that is fulfilled by the manumission of an infidel and as to what Shafei advances, of expiation being a right of God, and therefore not to be expended upon his enemies, it may be replied that the intention of the expiation is to render the slave equal to the fulfilment of such duties as relate to God, that is to say, of Zakat, pilgrimage, bearing evidence, fighting for the faith, magistracy, and so forth; and if the slave be not a Mussulman and continue an infidel after manumission, thereby enhancing his crime of infidelity, and precluding himself from receiving those advantages which he was qualified to enjoy through his freedom, it is to be attributed to the error of his choice, and not to any defect in the act of the expiator.

Unless such slave be defective in one of his faculties—It is not sufficient, as an expiation, to emancipate a slave who is blind, or maimed of both the fellow-members, whether hand or foot, because here such a slave is utterly deprived of one of his bodily endowments either of seeing, carrying, or walking, and the privation of any one advantage in a slave renders the manumission of him insufficient as an expiation, since a person in such a state is accounted dead; but where the privation is not entire it does not forbid the validity of the expiation, and hence it suffices for that purpose to emancipate a slave who is blind of one eye or maimed of one hand or foot, or of a hand and foot, from opposite sides, as this amount not to an absolute privation of one of the advantages, but only to a defect: the case, however, is otherwise where he is maimed of a hand and an foot upon the same side, for in this case his emancipation would not suffice, as this amounts to a privation of the advantage of walking, since, without the assistance of the hand upon the same side, that is impracticable.

The emancipation of a deaf slave suffices.—It suffices, as an expiation, to emancipate a deaf slave Anaology would suggest that th's is not sufficient, as the slave is here deprived of one faculty; but it is admitted as sufficient, upon a favourable construction of the law, as the radical faculty still continues, since one who is considered as deaf may yet be capable of hearing what is spoken aloud: if, however, he cannot hear at all (as where a person is born perfectly deaf), his emancipation does not suffice.

But not that of one who has lost both his thumbs.—It does not suffice, as an expiation, to emancipate a slave who has lost both his thumbs, as his power of carrying, which is one of his bodily endowments, is in that case destroyed.

Or who is insane.—Neither does it suffice to emancipate a slave who is insane, because no use is to be derived from the members of the body unless they be informed with reason, and therefore a privation of reason amounts to a privation of all the corporal endowments. Unless it be an occasional insanity only.—But if the slave be one who is insane only at intervals, his freedom suffices for an expiation, as in this circumstance there is not the utter privation of the faculty, but only a defect in it, which does not prevent the sufficiency.

Nor of a Modabbir, or Am-Walid or Mokatib, who has paid part of his ransom.—It does not suffice, as an expiation, to emancipate a Modabbir, or Am-Walid, as such are eventually entitled to their freedom, and hence their bondage is incomplete; and so also of a Mokatib who has fulfilled his contract of Kitabat in part, because in this case his freedom must be accounted as in return for the part of his ransom already received, and consequently does not suffice for an expiation, as that is an act of piety, in which speciality is essential.—It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa that the release of this Mokatib is sufficient, as bondage is found to exist in him in every shape, and accordingly the contract of Kitabat admits of being annulled; contrary to Am-Walids and Modabbers, as a Tadbeer or Isteelad cannot be cancelled.

If a person who pronounces Zihar emancipate, for expiation, a Mokatib who has not paid any part of his ransom, it suffices.—Shafei says that it does not suffice, because the Mokatib is a claimant of freedom, in virtue of the contract of Kitabat, and is therefore the same as a Modabbir.—The argument of our doctors is that bondage exists in a Mokatib in every shape, because the contract of Kitabat is capable of annulment; and also, because the Prophet has declared "a Mokatib is a slave as long as a single Dinar remains due from him."

That procured for a parent or child suffices.—If a man purchase his father or his son intending expiation thereby, it suffices.—Shafei says that it does not suffice; the same difference of opinion subsists in the case of expiation of a Yameen, as shall be recited at large in treating of vows.

But not that of a share in a coparcenary slave.—If a man, being rich, emancipate his half of a coparcenary slave, and then indemnify his partner for the value of the remainder, this does not suffice for an expiation with Haneefa.—The two disciples hold that it suffices, because the expiator, becoming possessed of his partner's share by indemnifying him, does in effect emancipate a slave who is entirely his own property: but it were otherwise if the expiator be poor, as in this case it is incumbent upon the slave to perform Siayet, or emancipatory labour, for the partner's share; and hence the emancipation is, so far, for a return. The argument of Haneefa is that in this case the emancipation is defective in the proportion of the partner's share, until the transition of the property to the emancipator be effected by his indemnifying the other partner, and this circumstance forbids its sufficiency for an expiation.

The partial emancipation of a sole slave (when followed by the emancipation of the remainder) suffices.—If a man emancipate half of his own slave, as an expiation, and afterwards emancipate the remainder for the same purpose, it suffices, as this amount to no more than emancipating him by two sentences instead of one; and the defect which appears in the second half on account of the first half being already free is not regarded, since this defect has been induced upon the expiator's property, in consequence of his emancipating it on account of expiation: and a defect like this is not regarded: but is considered in the same light as when a man having thrown a goat on its side for the purpose of sacrifice, happens to direct his knife in the animal's eye, so as to render it defective, which is not regarded, the sacrifice of the goat being still lawful, as the defect has befallen the property on account of sacrifice: contrary to the preceding case, because there the defect appears in the property of the other partner.—This proceeds upon the tenets of Haneefa.—With the two disciples manumission is indivisible, and consequently the emancipation of a half is, in effect, the emancipation of the whole slave, so that it is not considered in that instance as proceeding from two sentences.

But not if carnal connexion take place between the two emancipations.—If a man emancipate half his slave, as an expiation of Zihar, and then have carnal connexion with the wife upon whom he had pronounced the Zihar, and afterwards emancipate the other half, it is not valid as an expiation, according to Haneefa, because he holds that manumission admits of division, and the condition of its sufficiency, in the sacred writings, is that it be performed before the man touch his wife; but here the emancipation of one half takes place on touching.

With the two disciples, on the contrary, the emancipation of an half amounts to an emancipation of the whole, wherefore the emancipation in this case appears to take place upon the whole; before touching.

Zihar may be expiated by fasting two month
DIVORCE.

-If the person pronouncing a Zihar be not possessed of a slave, his expiation may be made by fasting for two successive months, provided those do not include the Ramzan or the festival of Fittir, nor the days of Nihrf or Tashreek. The fast must be successive (that is, uninterrupted), because it is thus expressed in the text; and it is a condition that the Ramzan be not included, because the abstinence observed in that period is not counted in expiation; for if it were to be so counted, this would in effect induce the annulment of a thing ordained by God; and it is also a condition that the festival of Fittir, and the days of Nihr and Tashreek, be not included, as (these being ordained festivals) any extraordinary abstinence in them is forbidden.

But if carnal connexion take place during the fast, it must be commenced de novo. — If the expiation be either wilfully or through forgetfulness, in the night, or, from the latter cause, in the day time, should during the term of expiation have carnal connexion with the wife upon whom he had pronounced the Zihar, he must again begin the fast anew, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf says that it is not incumbent upon him to begin it again, as his connexion with the wife does not amount to an interruption of the fast, since that is not broken by it; and if it be said that one condition of the fast is that it precede touching, it may be replied that a compliance with that injunction is here rendered impossible; he therefore holds that it must in this case suffice that a part of it precede touching, for if the fast be commenced anew (as in the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed), if follows that the whole would be subsequent to touching. — The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the conditions of making expiation by fast are twofold: — one, that the fast precede touching; — another, that the two months be exempt from touching; and the second of these being violated by the connexion, the circumstance with respect to which the condition was made is not fulfilled, and therefore the fast must be commenced anew, because though the observance of the first condition be now rendered impossible, yet still it remains in his power to perform the expiation in such a way as may fulfil the second condition of it.

If the expiator willfully break his fast in the day time, within the two months, either with or without excuse, he must commence it anew, according to all the doctors, as this is an interruption of the fast, a condition of which is that it be for two months successively; and this being still in his power it is therefore incumbent upon him.

Fasting the only mode in which a slave can expiate Zihar.—If a slave pronounce a Zihar upon his wife, a fast of two months successively is the only mode of expiation which is allowed him, because he is incapable of possessing any thing in his own right as a proprietor, and consequently cannot expiate in any other way. — And here, if the owner of this person were to release another of his slaves, or to distribute victuals to sixty poor men, on his behalf, yet it does not suffice, as a slave, being incapable of possessing property, cannot be regarded as a proprietor, from his master's consignment or transfer of it.

Zihar may be expiated by the distribution of alms. — If the person pronouncing a Zihar be incapable of observing a fast (from the illness of his health or other cause), it is incumbent upon him to give victuals to sixty poor men, God having said, "Where a man cannot fast, let his expiation be made by distributing victuals to sixty poor men." — By the term victuals is here understood half a Saaf of wheat, or one Saaf of barley or dates, or the value thereof in money; because the Prophet has said, "for each pauper there is half a Saaf of wheat;" — and also, because regard is here had to the removal of want from each for one day, and consequently the proportion to each is determined by the Sadka Fitter, or alms given on the festival breaking Lent. — Observe that what is here said, "or the value thereof in money," is the opinion of our doctors, as has been related at large in the book of Zakat. And if the expiator bestow one Man of wheat, or two Mans of Barley, or dates upon the poor, it suffices, since this fulfils the design, as wheat and barley are of one and the same genus or nature, in respect to food, and consequently to compensate the defect in one grain by an addition of the other is lawful, and connexion cases where a man fasts, and at the end of a month becomes incapable of continuing the fast, on account of sickness, for here the expiation would not be effected by giving victuals to thirty paupers, because fasting and victuals are not homogeneous, and consequently the completion of one by means of the other is insufficient.

If the person pronouncing a Zihar desire another person to distribute the victuals for him as an expiation, and the latter do so, it suffices, as this amounts to borrowing so much; and the pauper to whom the person so commissioned gives the victuals appears first to make seisin of them in behalf of the expiator, and then to receive them on his own account; thus the expiator is first seised of the property, and then makes it over to the pauper.

If the pronouncer of a Zihar feed sixty paupers morning and evening it suffices, where they are filled, whether they eat more or less.—Shafei says that this does not suffice, as it is requisite that the victuals be regularly consigned to sixty poor men, the same as in Zakat and Sadka Fitter, because in consigning, their wants are more effectually relieved than by feeding, which is only an act of permission, and consequently cannot stand for consignment.—The argument of our doctors is that the word Itaam, or feeding is what is mentioned in the text, and the literal meaning of that is to give a power over food, which is found in permitting to eat, the same as in consignment: but in Zakat and Sadka Fitter; consignment is essentially requisite, and mere permission does not suffice, because there the gift is incumbent, and by gift, consignment is understood. In short, with respect to what is mentioned in the sacred ordinances of the law under the term victuals, permission is sufficient, but in what is mentioned under the terms of gift or payment, consignment is a condition.

If, among the sixty paupers thus fed morning and evening there by an infant newly weaned from the breast, it does not suffice, as the expiation is not in that case completely performed, a child of this description not being yet able to eat a full proportion of victuals.

Witris barley-bread is requisite that some provision be bestowed such as is usual to eat with bread, as the appetite cannot be satisfied with that alone; but with wheat-bread this is unnecessary.

If victuals be given to one pauper for sixty days, it suffices, because the relief of want is what is required, and want recurs every day, wherefore giving it to the same person a second day amounts to giving it to a second pauper.—But if the victuals be given at once to a single pauper, it does not suffice:—yet if they be given to him at sixty separate times within the day it suffices, according to some; but others allege that it does not suffice.

Carnal connexion during expiation by alms does not require that the alms be distributed anew.—If the person pronouncing a Zahir have carnal connexion with his wife within the time of his performance of expiation by alms, as above, still it is not necessary that he should recommence, as it is not set forth as a condition in the word of God that this species of expiation should precede touching; but it nevertheless behoves him not to touch her until he shall have made expiation; as it is possible that in the interim he may be enabled to perform that by the manumission of a slave, or by fasting for two months, in which case this would induce expiation by those methods after touching, contrary to the injunction of the text.

If a man, as an expiation for two Zihars, distribute to each of sixty paupers a double proportion of victuals (suppose one Saa of wheat to each), yet this does not suffice for more than one Zihar, according to the two Elders.—Mohammed says it suffices for both.

—But if the victuals he bestowed in this way upon sixty paupers, as an expiation for the breach of a fast, and for Zihar, it suffices for both.—The argument of Mohammed is that what is bestowed upon the paupers aforesaid suffices for the performance of both expiations, and the persons upon whom it is bestowed are also proper subjects of both expiations, and consequently the act is effectual for two expiations, in the same manner as where the occasions of expiation are different (as in the case of expiation for a breach of fast and a Zihar), or where the expiations are separately performed. The argument of the two Elders is that the intention, where things are of one and the same nature, is nugatory: but regard is had to it, when things are different in nature, because a respect to intention is ordained, in the case of distinction between different things; and hence, if atonement were due from a person for the neglect or omission of two days' fast, in the month of Ramzaan (as a Thursday and a Friday for instance), and the person by fasting afterwards two days intend atonement, it suffices although the days on which he thus fasts be not the same with the days of omission, because the thing is essentially the same; contrary to where a person owes one day's fast for atonement, and another day's fast in pursuance of a vow,—for then a distinction is necessary, because of the difference between the things; now as the intention, where the things are of the same nature, is nugatory, and as the thing bestowed is capable of constituting a single expiation only (because half a Saa of wheat to each pauper is ordained as the smallest amount sufficient towards expiation, wherefore the expiation is vitiated by being under, but not by exceeding, the prescribed quantity), it follows that the distribution of victuals as aforesaid is effectual towards one expiation only, the same as where a single expiation only is intended:—contrary to where the victuals are bestowed at separate times, because giving a second time is the same as giving to another pauper.

If the man upon whom two expiation of two Zihars are thus incumbent emancipate two of his slaves, it suffices, although he have no specific intention as to either the slaves or the Zihars, respectively;—and in like manner, if he fast for four months, or distribute victuals to one hundred and twenty paupers, it suffices, because, as the thing is the same, specific intention is not requisite.

If moreover, this man emancipate a single slave in part of expiation of two Zihars, it rests with him to specify to which of the two he intends the manumission of that slave to apply: but if he were thus to emancipate a slave in part of expiation of a Zihar, and of a Murder, it is invalid with respect to either.
Ziffer says, that the emancipation of a single slave is totally ineffectual in either case.—Shafei, on the other hand, maintains that it is equally efficient in both cases, the specification resting with the expiators, because all expiations are of one and the same nature with respect to their end, which is the covering of criminality, but as intention with respect to things similar in nature, is unavailable, the simple intention remains; and as (if that were expiation) the expiator is at liberty to specify which expiation the act is to apply, so here also.—The argument of Ziffer is that the expiator in this case appears to have emancipated half his slaves on account of one Zihar, and consequently, that he is not at liberty afterwards to specify his emancipation as applying to either Zihar in particular, after having granted it as applying to both, since he then possesses no further option.—Our doctors argue (with Shafei) that specification with respect to things similar in nature, is unavailable, and consequently, wherefore simple intention remains; but where this are different in nature (such as the emancipation of a slave, as an expiation for Zihar, and also for homicide), the specification of intention is available; and the intention being approved, the emancipation of the slave does not apply wholly either to the expiation for Zihar or to the expiation for homicide.—As to what Shafei advances, that all expiations are of one and the same nature, in regard to their end, it may be replied that a difference of nature between the expiations, in the present case, subsists in regard to the different occasion of them, although in respect to their end they be of one and same nature.

CHAPTER X.

OF LAAN, OR IMPRECAITION

Definition of the term.—Laan, in the language of the law, signifies testimonies confirmed by oath, on the part of a husband and wife (where the testimony is strengthened by an imprecation of the curse of God, on the part of the husband, and of the wrath of God on the part of the wife), in case of the former accusing the latter of adultery.

A man accusing his wife of whoredom must verify his charge by an imprecation.—If a man slanders his wife (that is to say, accuse her of whoredom), or deny the descent of a child born of her by saying, ‘this is not my child,’ and she require him to produce the ground of his accusation, imprecation is incumbent upon him, provided both parties be competent in evidence—that is, of sound mind, adults free, and Mussulmans, and that the woman be of a description to subjects her slanderer to punishment (that is, married,*) for if she be not such (as if she have been for instance, enjoyed under an invalid marriage, or delivered of a child whose father is unknown), the man is not under any obligation to make an imprecation, although she be a person competent in evidence.

Conditions under which the imprecation is incumbent.—Laan, according to the tenets of our doctors, is a testimony confirmed by oath, as was before observed; and it involves, on the part of the husband, if his accusation be false, the curse of God, which stands as a substitute of punishment for slander;—or, on the part of the woman, the wrath of God, which stands in the place of punishment for whoredom, if it be true:—it is therefore requisite that the parties be both competent in evidence, as the ground thereof is testimony; and it is also requisite that she be of a description to subject her slanderer to punishment, as the Laan, with respect to the husband, stands as a substitute of punishment for slander (whence the necessity of her being a married woman): and Laan is incumbent on account of the denial of a child, because the husband, in denying the child’s descent, accuses his wife by implication.

Objection.—The denial of the child’s descent does not positively imply an accusation of the wife, as it is possible that the child may not have been begotten by the husband, and yet that the wife is not an adulteress (as where a man, for instance, has had carnal connexion with another, and a child is produced from it, in which case the child is the undoubted progeny of another), and hence, in his denial of its descent from him, the husband speaks truly, without any accusation of adultery against the wife being implied.

Reply.—This possibility is of no weight, because a stranger, if he were to deny the descent of child from the known and reputed father, is held to be a slanderer notwithstanding this possibility; and so in this case only.—It is also a condition of imprecation that the wife require her husband to produce the ground of his accusation, as this is her right, the demand of which is necessary; as well as that of all other matters of right; and if he decline it, the magistrate must imprison him until he either make an imprecation, or acknowledge the falsity of his change, by saying, “I falsely attributed adultery to her,”—as this is a right due from him to his wife, and which it is in his power to render her, wherefore he is to be imprisoned till such time as he does what is incumbent, or acknowledges his falsity, so that the occasion for the imprecation may be removed (that is, the condition of imprecation, namely, the mutual change of falsehood), because imprecation is not incumbent except where each changes the plea of the other with falsehood, after the husband having produced against his wife an accusation of adultery. And the husband having made an imprecation, the same is then incumbent upon the wife, it being so ordained in the Koran (but imprecation commences with the husband, as he in this case appears as the plaintiff); and if she decline making imprecation, the magistrate is to imprison her till such time as the either agrees to make it, or to acknowledge her husband’s veracity, this being his right incumbent upon her, and which she is able to render, wherefore she is to be imprisoned until she renders it.

Not incumbent upon slaves or infidels.—If a slave, or an infidel, or one who has suffered punishment as a slanderer, accuse his wife of whoredom, punishment for slander is due upon him, because here imprecation is impossible, and consequently its original is due, and this punishment for slander, that being, the original ordinance in this case, according to the word of God.—If men accuse married women of whoredom, and produce not four witnesses, scourge them with eighty stripes; no imprecation is the substitute of punishment for slander; and where the substitute cannot be had, the original is due.

Nor, where the wife is a slave, an infidel, or a convicted slanderer.—If the accuser be a person competent in evidence, and his wife be a slave, or an infidel, or a Kitabeea, or one who has suffered punishment as a slanderer, or of the description of those whose accusers are not liable to punishment as a slanderer, and who are of the description of those whose accusers are not liable to punishment as a slanderer, then the wife is to be separated, and the husband is to receive the due of her, which he is entitled to, and the wife is to be imprisoned until he releases her.

Objection.—It would appear that in this case punishment for slander is due upon the husband, as imprecation is a substitute for that, and where the substitute cannot be had, it follows that the original is due.

Reply.—Punishment is not due upon the husband, as he is capable of imprecation, the obstacle to which exists in this case on the part of the wife, and this circumstance precludes punishment, in the same manner as where she acknowledges the truth of the accusation. The foundation of this is a saying of the Prophet, namely, There are four descriptions of women with respect to whom imprecation is not incumbent, Jews and Christians married to Musulmans, and slaves married to freeman, and free women married to slaves.

Nor where both parties are convicted slanders.—If the accuser and his wife be persons who have both already suffered punishment for slander, punishment is due upon the former, because in this case a reason is found against imprecation the part of the accuser, he being incapable of making it.

Form of imprecation and the manner of making it.—The manner of imprecation is as follows:—The Kazee first applies to the husband, who is to give evidence four several times, by saying, I call God to witness to the truth of my testimony concerning the adultery with which I charge this woman; and again, a fifth time, may the curse of God fall upon me if I have spoken falsely concerning the adultery with which I charge this woman,—after which the Kazee requires the woman to give evidence, four separate times, by saying, I call God to witness that my husband’s words are altogether false, respecting the adultery with which he charges me, and again, a fifth time, may the wrath of God light upon me if my husband is just in bringing a charge of adultery against me,—Hasan records it as an opinion of Haneefa that the husband should, in making the imprecation, address himself in the second person, saying by God I speak truly concerning the adultery with which I charge you, because the use of the second person does not admit the possibility of the address affecting any other. The reason for the form, as above stated, is that the relative, when joined to the third person, removes doubt.

When both parties have made imprecation a separation takes place.—And both parties having made imprecation in this manner, a separation takes place between them; but not until the Kazee pronounces a decree to that effect.—Ziffer says that separation takes place upon the imprecation, independent of any judicial decree, because a perpetual prohibition is established by it, the Prophet having said, the two who make imprecation can never come together, which proves their separation, as the Prophet’s forbidding their ever coming together after imprecation expressly declares this. And argument of our doctors is that as, in consequence of the establishment of a prohibition between them, the retaining of the woman with humanity is impossible, it is incumbent upon the husband to divorce her on a principle of benevolence; but if he decline doing it, then behoves the Kazee to issue a decree of divorce, as the Kazee is the substitute of the husband in this matter for the purpose of removing injustice: and a proof of this is that Abeemar divorced his wife after imprecation, in the presence of the Prophet, which shows that the marriage still continued, and was not virtually dissolved by the imprecation, otherwise the Prophet would have prevented him from pronouncing divorce. Observe that the separation here mentioned is an irreversible divorre, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, because the act of the Kazeed must be referred to the husband, as in cases of impotence.

The husband, on receding from his imprecation, may again marry his wife.—Iff, after imprecation, the husband should acknowledge that his accusation was false, by saying, "I falsely laid adultery to her charge," he becomes privileged with respect to her, that is to say, it is lawful for him to marry her as well as any other person. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yousaf says that she is for ever prohibited to him, and that he cannot marry her,—the Prophet having said, "two who make imprecation can never come together," which shows the separation established between them to be perpetual: wherefor his marriage with her is illegal.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the husband's acknowledgment is a retraction from his evidence (that is, from has imprecation), and evidence is by subsequent retraction rendered null and of no effect: and as to the saying of the Prophet above cited, it means that the parties cannot come together as long as they both persevere in their imprecation; but after the husband's acknowledgment, the imprecation no longer remains either in substance or in effect, and consequently they may then come together.

Imprecation occasions a decree of bastardy.—If a husband accuse his wife, by denying her child, it is requisite that the Kazeed issue a decree denying the descent of the child from him and affixing it upon the mother; and the manner of the imprecation is that the Kazeed first makes the husband give evidence saying, "I testify in the sight of God that I speak truly concerning the matter I have brought against her, in denying the child;" after which he makes the wife give evidence in the same manner, saying, "I call God to witness that he speaks falsely concerning the matter he has brought against me, in denying the child." If a husband accuse his wife both by bringing a charge of adultery against her, and also by denying a child born of her, it is necessary that both these circumstances be mentioned in the imprecation, after which the Kazeed is to issue a decree, denying the descent of the child from the husband, and fixing it upon the mother, because the Prophet, once so decreed upon such an occasion, and also, because the design of the imprecation in this case is to bastardize the child, wherefore a decree must be passed agreeably to the design of it.

A decree of separation between the parties comprehends a decree of bastardy in respect to child.—It is recorded as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf that, in a decree of separation, a decree of bastardy is not compre-handed, but that it is requisite that the magistrate first effect the separation, and then say, "I throw the child upon the mother, and remove it from the father's house," because separation may sometimes take place without affecting the descent of children, as where a man accuses of adultery a wife who has children, in which case a separation is established by imprecation, but bastardy is not induced upon the children; the Kazeed's mention of bastardy is therefore requisite.

A husband receding from imprecation must be punished for slander.—If a husband, after imprecation, contradict himself, by acknowledging that he had accused his wife falsely, let the magistrate punish him, because he then acknowledges himself liable to punishment; and it is afterwards lawful for the husband to marry her again (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), because having once suffered punishment for slander, competency to make imprecation no longer appertains to him: and the prohibition which is the effect of the imprecation is removed. In the same manner, if the husband and wife make imprecation, and the husband afterwards accuse of adultery a strange woman, who is married, and suffer punishment on that account, it then becomes lawful for him to marry his wife again for the reason aforesaid. And so also, if the wife, after divorce in consequence of imprecation, be found in adultery, and suffer correction from the Kazeed on that account, it then becomes lawful for the husband to marry her again, as a competency to make imprecation no longer appertains to her.

Imprecation not incumbent where the husband or wife is an infant, or an idiot.—If a man accuse his wife, she being an infant or an idiot, imprecation is not incumbent upon the parties, because the accuser of such a person is not liable to punishment for slander unless he be a stranger; imprecation, therefore, is not incumbent in the accusation of such wives by their husbands, as it is the substitute of punishment for slander. And the rule is the same where the husband is insane, or an idiot, because such an one is not competent in evidence.

Or where the husband is dumb.—If a dumb person accuse his wife, imprecation is not incumbent, because imprecation is not incumbent unless the accusation be expressed in terms, as is the case in slander, where punishment is not incurred unless the accusation has been expressly made.—Shafeei opposes this; for he holds that punishment is due upon the accusation of a dumb person, and consequently, that imprecation is incumbent, because his signs are the same as the words of one who has the power of speech; but the argument of our doctors is that the signs of a dumb person are not altogether free from doubt, and punishment is removed by any circumstance of doubt.

*That is, without her being previously married to another.

† That is, bastardizing it.

*Meaning, children already born, before the period of the husband's accusation.
Or where the accusation is indirectly insinuated.—If a man say to his wife, "your pregnancy is not of me," imprecation is not incumbent.—This is the opinion of Haneefa and Ziffer: and the reason upon which they found it is, that the circumstance of pregnancy does not admit of being positively certified, whereby the husband's words do not convey an immediate accusation. The two children by such an imprecation is incumbent in this case, provided the woman be delivered of a child within six months; and it is this which is meant by what is said in the Maboot that "the existence of pregnancy at the time of accusation may be certified;" but to this we reply that where the accusation cannot be immediately established, it must remain suspended upon a condition, in the same manner as if the husband were to say to his wife, "if you produce a child it is not mine;" and the suspension of accusation upon this condition is nugatory.

But if he were to say to her, "you are an adulteress, your pregnancy proceed from adultery," imprecation is incumbent upon both parties, as accusation is here established in the mention of adultery. Yet the Kazee is not in this case to issue any decree affecting the descent of the foetus.—Shafei says that a decree of bastardy must be pronounced, because the Prophet decreed a bastardy in the instance of Hilll, who had accused his pregnant wife.—The argument of our doctors is that the effect of a decree of bastardy cannot take place until after delivery, since before delivery there is a possibility of doubt respecting the pregnancy; the Kazee, therefore, is not to decree a bastardy.—As to the decree of the Prophet quoted by Shafei, it is possible that the Prophet may have been certified of the woman's pregnancy by inspiration.

Imprecation made posterior to the birth of a child does not affect that child's descent—If a husband deny the descent of the child upon the near approach of birth, or at the time when it is usual to receive congratulations, and to purchase clothes and make preparation for it, his denial holds good, and imprecation is incumbent upon him on account of it; but if he do not deny it until afterwards although imprecation be here also incumbent, yet the descent of the child remains established in him.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa.—The two disciples say that the denial is admitted during labour, as it is admitted within a little time, but not within a long time, and hence a distinction is made between the short period and the longer, by the time of labour, as the pains of labour are among the effects of breeding. The argument of Haneefa is, that it is impossible to lie at any time, because time is fixed for the purpose of consideration, and mankind vary in the length of time necessary for that purpose; wherefore regard is had to a thing which shows the child to be his, namely, his receiving the usual congratulations, or remaining silent at the time of such

CHAPTER XI.

OF IMPOTENCE

An impotent husband must be allowed a year's probation after which separation takes place.—If a husband be Irneen [impotent], it is requisite that the Kazee appoint the term of one year from the period of litigation, within which if the accused have carnal connexion with his wife it is well; but if not, the Kazee must pronounce a separation, provided such be the desire of the wife, because the same is recorded from Ale, and Omar, and Ebu Musood,—and also, because the woman is entitled to the carnal enjoyment, and it is possible that the husband may be incapacitated from the performance of that act, not only by a radical infirmity, but also by some supervenient and accidental cause, whence it is necessary that some certain term be appointed, in order that the true reason of his inability may be ascertained; and this term is fixed at one year because that contains four seasons, and diseases are principally occasioned by an excess either of heat, cold, dryness, or humidity, qualities which are peculiar to each season respectively; and it is probable that one of these four may particularly agree with the man's condition, so as by its influence to dissipate his disease; thus it may be ascertained, when a year has completely elapsed, whether his inability proceeded from any radical infirmity, in which case, it is impossible to retain the wife with humanity,* and hence it is incumbent upon the husband to separate from her, upon a principal of benevolence: but if he should not do so, the Kazee is in that case to pronounce a separation, as his substitute; yet it is requisite that the woman desire such separation, as is her right. — The separation here mentioned amounts to the execution of a single divorce irresolvable, because the act of the Kazee is attributed to the husband, whence it is the same as if he had himself pronounced such a sentence upon her. Shafei alleges that this separation is an annulment of the mar-rriage: but with our doctors marriage is held to be incapable of being annulled of itself, although it may be annulled by effect, in the same manner as in the case of a husband's apostacy. And this separation amounts to an irreversible divorce, not a reversible, because the intent of it is the woman's relief from a hardship, which cannot be effected but by complete divorce: for if we were not so, it would still remain in the husband's power to reverse it, which would defeat the design.

And the wife retains her whole dower, if
the husband should ever have been in retirement with her. — The wife, in the case here mentioned, is entitled to her whole dower; if
the husband should ever have been in retirement with her, because retirement with an Inneen is accounted a Khalwat Saheeh, or complete retirement, as well as with any other person; and an Edit is incumbent upon her, as was mentioned in a former place. What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the husband acknowledging that he has not performed the carnal act with his wife.

But the wife's claim of separation may be here defeated by the husband swearing that he had enjoyed her. — But if he controvert her plea, asserting that he has copulated with her, and she has been married as a Siyeeba, his affirmation upon oath is to be credited, because he is the defendant against her claim of separation, and the affirmation of a defendant must be credited when given upon oath: moreover, the instrument of generation is originally created free from inability or disease, and it is natural that he should perform the carnal act where no obstruction exists: and the declaration of a person is to be credited when apparent circumstances bear testimony to his veracity, and where he rests his cause upon the nature of things. If, therefore, the husband shall make oath, the wife's right of separation is thereby defeated; but if he decline this, the term of a year is then to be appointed as

*Alluding to the words of the Koran before mentioned.

—Where the term of a year is appointed for the trial of a man charged with impotence by a wife whom he had married as a virgin, and he declares, at the expiration thereof, that he has had carnal connexion with her within that interval, and she denies this, she is then to be examined by some of her own sex; if they pronounce her to be still a virgin, she has it at her option either to separate from her husband, or to continue with him, because the testimony of the examiners is confirmed by her virginity, that being the original state of every woman; but should they declare her muliebrity, the husband is then to be required on the other hand to make oath which if he decline, she has an option, as, above, her plea being strengthened by the circumstance of his declining to swear; but in the case where she has no option, if more she was a Siyeeba originally (that is at the time of marriage), and the husband declare that he has had carnal connexion with her within the year of probation, and she deny this, his declaration upon oath is to be credited.—that is to say, the oath is to be tendered to him, which if he take, she has no option; but if he decline it, she has then an option as already stated. And here, if she choose to continue with him, she has no subsequent option, as by so doing she manifests an assent to the relinquishment of her right.

The year of probation to be calculated by the lunar calendar.—The year of probation appointed by the Kazee in cases of impotence is to be counted by the lunar calendar; this is approved; and the days of the courses, and of religious fasts (such as Ramzan), are therein included, as these occur in all year alike, nor can a year pass without them; but the days of sickness of either party are not included, as a year may pass exempt from such an occurrence.

A husband cannot annul the marriage, where the defect is on the part of the wife — If the defect be on the part of the woman, the husband has no right to annul the marriage. — Shafei maintains that he may annul it, and put her away, on account of any of the five following defects, namely, leprosy, scrophula, madness, Ritik, or Karrn, because some of these (such as the two latter) are obstructive of generation; and others (such as the three former) are causes of natural and insuperable aversion, as is confirmed by a tradition of the Prophet, who has said, "flee from lepers as ye would from a WILD BEAST." — The argument of our doctors is that if the enjoyment of the wife's person were to be totally precluded by any circumstance (such as insanity, for instance, by mere retirement), yet the marriage is not annulled, but is rather established and confirmed, inasmuch that the whole dower remains due; and hence, where such privation of the connubial enjoyment is merely dubious, on account of its being occasioned only by a defect in the subject, it remains unannulled, a fortiori, upon this ground, that the design of matrimony is to legalize generation, and the connubial enjoyment is the advantage proposed in it; and the ability to perform the act, where any natural obstruction exists, may be obtained, as in a case of Ritik or Karrn (for instance) which are to be remedied by chirurgical operations; and in all other cases the ability is evident.

A wife cannot sue for a separation on the ground of her husband being leprous, scrophulous, or insane. — If the husband be lunatic, leprous, or scrophulous, yet his wife has no option, as in cases where he is an eunuch, or impotent. This is according to Haneefa and Abou Yousaf. Mohammad says that she is entitled to an option, in order that she may remove an evil from herself; contrary to the case of a husband, he having it in his power, in similar circumstances, to relieve himself by divorce. — The argument of the two Elders is that in marriage no right of option originally exists, for if this were allowed, it would operate to the destruction of the husband's right; and it is admitted in the case of eunuchs, or of persons naturally impotent only, because the circumstance of natural or accidental infirmity tends to defeat the end for which marriage was instituted; but with persons of the descriptions now under consideration this reason does not hold, as the husband who labours under any of those defects is still capable of generation, whence an evident difference appears between the two cases.

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE EDIT.

Definition of the term.—By Edit is understood a woman in consequence of the dissolution of marriage after carnal connexion: the most approved definition of Edit is, the term by the completion of which a new marriage is rendered lawful.

The Edit of a divorce of a free woman is three menstruations. — When a man repudiates his wife, being a free woman, either by a reversible or an irreversible divorce, or when separation takes place between a husband and wife, without divorce, after carnal connexion, the Edit, or woman's term of probation, consists of three terms of her courses, provided she be one who is subject to the menstrual discharge, God having so commanded in the Koran. — The separation which takes place between a married couple, independent of divorce, bears the same construction as divorce, because the Edit is made incumbent in a case of divorce for the purpose of ascertaining whether the woman be pregnant, and the same necessity occurs where separation takes place between a husband and an enjoyed wife without divorce.

The separation without divorce may be occasioned either by a woman admitting the son of her husband to carnal connexion, or by her apostatizing from the faith.

And of one not subject to courses, three months: and of one who is pregnant, the term of her travail. — The Edit of a woman who, on account of extreme youth or age, is not subject to the menstrual discharge, is three months, because God has so ordained in the sacred writings. — The Edit of a pregnant woman is accomplished by her delivery, whether she be a slave or free, because God, in the sacred writings, has so ordained respecting woman in that situation.

That of a slave is two menstruation. — The Edit of a female slave is two terms of her courses, because it is thus mentioned in the traditions, and also, because bondage is restrictive to the half, whence it would appear that the Edit of a slave should be only one term and a half of her courses, but the menstrual discharge being incapable of subdivision, the half is, of necessity, made a whole term, and hence the Edit of such an one is two terms; and it is to this that Omar advert, where he says, "I would if possible fix the Edit of a female slave at one and an half of her courses."

And of one not subject to courses a month and an half. — Where the female slave is one who from extreme youth or age is not subject to the menstrual discharge, her Edit is one month and an half, because time being capable of subdivision, the term is fixed at the half on account of her bondage.

Edit of widowhood—The Edit of a free woman upon the decease of her husband is four months and ten days. Such being the term mentioned in the Koran:—and that of a female slave in the like circumstance is two months and five days, bondage being restrictive to the half.

Case of Edit of widowhood after divorce.

If a man divorce his wife upon his deathbed, so as she still inherits of him.* Haneefa and Mohammed say that her Edit, in consequence of his decease, is four months and ten days, if she complete three terms of her courses within that period; but if the three terms be not accomplished, as requiring a longer time (five months for instance), her Edit is in that case three terms of her courses, whatever time those may require. In short, here are two terms; one, that of four months and ten days; and the other, that of three menstruation; and whichever of these is the longest, the same is the term of Edit. —Aboo Yoosaf says that the Edit of this woman is three menstruations. —This difference of doctrine obtains where the sick person has repudiated his wife by one divorce irreversible, or by three divorces:—but where the divorce is reversible, the Edit is four months and ten days, according to all the doctors. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf, in support of this doctrine, as above, is that the marriage had been dissolved and terminated by the divorce, previous to the decease of the husband, and the Edit of divorce is three terms of the courses, whence such is the Edit incumbent in the present case, as that of four months and ten days (being the Edit of women) required only where the marriage was dissolved by the husband’s decease; but in the present case it was dissolved before his death, by divorce. To this indeed it may be objected that, if the marriage be dissolved before the husband’s decease, it would follow that the wife cannot inherit:—but the marriage is accounted to hold, in respect to inheritance only, and not so as to alter or affect the Edit:—contrary to where a dying husband repudiates his wife by a reversible divorce; her Edit in that case being universally held to be strictly an Edit of widowhood, since the marriage actually continues in every shape. —The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the marriage being here accounted to continue with respect to inheritance, is also accounted to continue with respect to Edit; and hence the longest of the two is regarded.

If a man be put to death for apostasy, so as that his wife inherits of him, the same difference of opinion obtains respecting her Edit as is above recited.—Some commentators allege that her Edit is held to be three terms of her courses by all the doctors, as her marriage is not accounted to continue to the time of her husband’s decease with respect to inheritance, since a Mussulman woman cannot inherit of an infidel; but yet the wife does here inherit, because her claim to inheritance is established upon the instant of her husband’s apostasy;—her Edit, therefore, is three terms of her course.

A female slave, emancipated during Edit, must observe the Edit of a free woman. —If a master emancipate his female slave, whilst in her Edit from a reversible divorce, she is in that case under Edit as a free woman, and must count it accordingly:—because, in reversible divorce, so long as the Edit is unaccomplished, marriage continues in every shape:—but if a master emancipate his female slave, whilst in her Edit from a divorce irreversible, or from the deceased of her husband, her Edit is not affected or altered by such emancipation:—that is, it does not become the Edit of a free woman, because her marriage has been completely dissolved by the irreversible divorce, or by the husband’s death.

Rule of Edit of a woman past bearing.—

If an Ayeesa* be in her Edit, counting it by months, and the menstrual discharge should chance to appear upon her, in this case all regard to that portion of the Edit which has been counted by months drops, and her Edit commences de novo, to be counted by the terms of her courses. —The compiler of this work observes that this is where the Ayeesa had been subject to the courses before she became hopeless of children, as in this case her despair is done away; and this is approved, because it is evident that months, with respect to such a woman, are not the absolute substitutes of Edit:—but if an Ayeesa be one to whom the menstrual discharge had never occurred before, and be in her Edit, counting it by months, and see the appearance of the sanguinary discharge, regard to the term of the Edit which has been counted by months does not drop, because the counting by months is the original rule with respect to such a woman, and not merely the substitute for her courses.

If a woman be in her Edit counting it by the term of her courses and after two of those they should stop, and she become an Ayeesa, her Edit commences de novo, to be counted by months, and all regard to the courses drops, so as that the substitute (which is months) and the original (which is the courses) may not be confounded.

Rule of Edit in an invalid marriage.—

The Edit of a woman wedded by an invalid marriage is counted by her courses, both in case of her husband’s death, and also of a separation taking place between them; and so likewise that of a woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion erroneously; because in those cases, the Edit is incumbent

*See Chap. IX

*Literally, a despairer, that is, a woman whose courses are stopped, and who is consequently supposed to be past child-bearing.
merely for the purpose of ascertaining whether the woman be pregnant, and not as a right of marriage; and as the courses are the means of ascertaining the state of the womb, the Edit of those women is to be counted by their returns.

Edit of an Am-Walid.—If the master of an Am-Walid should die, or emancipate her, her Edit is three terms of her courses.—Shafei says that her Edit is only one term, as it is incumbent upon her on account only of the extinction of the owner's propriety, and consequently no more is requisite to effect it than what may suffice to cleanse her womb.—The argument of our doctors is, that Edit is incumbent upon her on account of the extinction of Firash (for she is the partner of her master's bed), and is, therefore, the same as that used in the dissolution of marriage;—moreover, Omar has said, "the Edit of an Am-Walid is the term of her courses."—If the Am-Walid be not subject to the menstrual discharge, her Edit is three months, the same as that of a married woman.

Edit of the widow of an infant.—If an infant die; leaving a wife pregnant, her Edit is accomplished by her delivery, according to Haneefa and Mohammad. Aboo Yoosaf says that it is four months and ten days (and such also is the opinion of Shafei), because the pregnancy cannot be attributed to the infant, and is, therefore, with respect to him, the same as if it had taken place posterior to his decease.—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed herein are twofold: First, the word of God, who has said in the Koran, "a woman, if he be pregnant, must wait until her delivery,"—which is generally expressed, and therefore applies to the woman here treated of; Secondly, the Edit of a woman whose husband dies is (in case of her pregnancy) fixed at the remaining term of her travail, whether that be short or long; now the Edit of a widow is not designed for the purpose of ascertaining the state of her womb; for if it were so, it would not be determined by the lapse of time (supposing her to be one who is subject to the menstrual discharge), but by three terms of her courses: whereas we see that the law fixes it at four months and ten days, although she be a woman of that description; but it is made incumbent merely as a fulfilment of one of the rights of marriage; and the same reasoning applies to the wife of the infant in question, although her pregnancy be not attributed to him: contrary to where pregnancy takes place, subsequent to the infant's decease; for here her Edit of four months and ten days having commenced, is not afterwards to be altered by her subsequent pregnancy; but in the case now under consideration, the Edit of the term of travail was due from instant that Edit become incumbent; hence there is an evident difference between the two cases; and consequently there is no analogy between them. The pregnancy is determined to have taken place after the death of the husband, where the woman is not delivered within less than six months from the date of the husband's decease.—This is the approved rule. Some have said that it is so judged only where she is delivered within not less than two years. But if a husband, being adult, should die, and his wife be delivered of a child at any time between six months and two years from the period of his decease, her Edit is accomplished by her delivery, because the pregnancy is in this case attributed to the husband, and hence is accounted the same as if it had existed at the period of his decease.—Observe that the parentage of a child born of the wife of an infant cannot be established in the infant, whether her pregnancy had appeared during his life, or not until after his decease, because an infant, not being possessed of seed, cannot be conceived capable of impregnating a woman; and marriage is not held to be a substitute for seed, except where the existence of seed on the part of the man may be supposed.

Edit of divorce of a menstruous woman,—If a man divorce his wife whilst in her courses, that term is not to be counted in her Edit, because the Edit is fixed at three complete menstruations, and if the above were to be counted, it would induce a deficiency, as part of that had passed previous to divorce, and therefore cannot be included.

Edit of a divorced woman who has connexion with a man during the term of her Edit of divorce.—If a man have erroneous carnal connexion with a woman in her Edit from divorce, another Edit becomes incumbent upon her, and the two are blended together,—that is to say, her ensuing courses are accounted in both Edits; and if the former Edit should be accomplished before the latter, the accomplishment of that still remains incumbent upon her. This is the opinion of our doctors. Shafei mainains that two Edits cannot be blended together, because the Edit is an act of piety (as it restrains from taking another husband, and so forth) and two acts of piety are not permitted to be united in one account; as in fasting for instance, where no part of the abstinence of one day can be put to the account of another.—The argument of our doctors is that the design of the Edit is to ascertain the state of the womb, and as that is answered by a single Edit, the two Edits may be counted together; and piety is not the design of the Edit, but rather a dependant on it;

*Firash literally means a bed, whence it is metaphorically used to express a right of cohabitation or concubinage: it is so used in the sense of a wife or a concubine, whence it is here and elsewhere translated partner of his bed.

*That is, cannot be held to amount to a virtual establishment of parentage.
whence it is that the Edit may be accomplished, even without the knowledge of the woman, merely by her refraining from going abroad, or from marrying another husband, or by the consummating her marriage with him during the term of Edit.

Edit of a widow who admits a man during her Edit of widowhood.—If a man have carnal connexion with a woman who is in her Edit from the death of her husband, she is to complete that of four months and ten days, being the Edit of widowhood; at the same time counting such terms of her courses as may occur within the remainder of that time, so as that the two Edits may be counted together as far as is possible.

The Edit of a widow, or a divorced wife, may be accomplished without her knowledge.

—The Edit of divorce commences immediately upon divorce, and that of widowhood upon the decease of the husband; if, therefore, a woman be not informed of her widowhood or divorce until such time as the term of Edit be passed, her Edit is then accomplished, because the occasion of Edit being incumbent is widowhood or divorce, and it is therefore held to commence upon the occurrence of the occasion.—Our modern doctors have decreed that the Edit of divorce should not be held to commence until the divorce be publicly declared, in order to guard against anything between the parties; as it is possible that a husband and wife might privately agree to declare a divorce, and pretend that Edit had already past, so as that, by this means, the marriage being dissolved, he might be enabled to acknowledge a debt in her favour, or make her a bequest of more than her proper inheritance.

Edit from an invalid marriage.—In an invalid marriage the Edit commences immediately upon the Kazzee's decree of separation, or upon the determination of the husband, expressly signified, to refrain from carnal connexion.—Ziffer says it commence from the date of the last carnal connexion from parties because, in an invalid marriage, it is the carnal connexion which gives occasion for it, and not the marriage.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold:—First, every instance of carnal connexion occurring in an invalid marriage stands only as one single act, as they all proceed from, and originate in, one contract (whence it is that one dower suffices for the whole): wherefore, until the actual separation, or determination signified, as above, Edit cannot be established, for in every previous instance of carnal connexion it is possible that the same may be repeated; and hence, so long as the separation of Edit determination do not exist, no particular instance of the carnal act can be positively termed the last:—Secondly, the last instance of carnal connexion cannot be ascertained to be the last, but by the husband's signified determination to refrain for the future, since permission on the part of the woman, and ability on that of the man, in a matter of so concealed and doubtful a nature as carnal connexion, stand as a continuance of it, and any other man who may be desirous to marry the woman will require to know the effect of the Edit; it is therefore requisite that something known and visible be substituted for the which is concealed, so as that such visible circumstance may afford a standard whereby to determine.

A woman's oath confirms the accomplishment of her Edit.—If a woman under Edit should declare that it is accomplished, and her husband deny this, her declaration upon oath is to be credited, because she is confided in this point and he has thrown an imputation upon her veracity; she is therefore to swear in the manner of a plaintiff.

Case of a woman re-married after divorce and again repudiated.—When a man having repudiated his wife by an irreverible divorce, marries her again during her Edit, and afterwards divorces her before consummation, a complete dower is in this case incumbent upon him, and upon the woman an Edit de novo, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf,

—Mohammed says that no more is incumbent upon the man than an half dower, nor upon the woman that the accomplishment of her first Edit, because the second divorce is a divorce before consummation, and, therefore does not require either that he should pay a complete dower, or that he should observe a new Edit; nor does he think himself bound with respect to her, but that she complete the first Edit incumbent in consequence of the first divorce; for the obligation upon the woman to complete her first Edit disappeared upon the husband marrying her again; but this last marriage being done away by his divorcing her a second time, her obligation to the completion of her first Edit recurs. The argument of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf is that the second divorce is, in fact, given after carnal connexion, since the woman is still actually within the seisin of the man in consequence of such connexion formerly had upon her, the effect of which is once again the Edit; and where he marries her again during her Edit, she being still within his seisin, such possession is the substitute of that which appertains to him in virtue of the second marriage; as in the case of an usurper, who if he make purchase of the article usurped whilst it is within his seisin, is held to be seised of the purchase on the instant of the execution of the contract of sale; it is therefore evident that the second divorce is a divorce after carnal connexion.—Ziffer says that no Edit whatever is incumbent upon the woman, because, the former Edit is kept in consequence of the marriage and therefore cannot recur; and no Edit is due on account of the second divorce, as that is a divorce before consummation: but the arguments of the two Elders, as above recited, are a sufficient reply to this.

If a Zimmee, or infidel subject, repudiate his wife who is also an infidel subject, no Edit is incumbent upon her: and the same rule applies to an alien woman who having been converted to the faith, comes from the foreign into the Mussulman territory: it is therefore lawful for such women to marry before the expiration of the term of Edit, unless they be pregnant. This is the opinion of Haneefah with respect to such infidel subjects as do not hold or believe in the obligation of Edit. The two disciples say that Edit is incumbent upon women of either description:—upon infidel subjects, because they have bound themselves to the observance of all such things as appertain to the temporal law; and upon aliens who, having embraced the faith, come into the Mussulman territory, because it is so upon such women on other accounts, such as the death of their husbands, or the in admitting the son of the husband to carnal connexion, and is therefore equally obligatory on account of separation of country;—contrary to the case where a man, being converted to the faith, comes from a foreign into a Mussulman territory, and his wife remains in the foreign country; for upon him no Edit is incumbent, as the obligation of it cannot reach or effect her in a foreign land.

The argument of Haneefah with respect to infidel subjects is that they not being under any obligation in respect to the ordinances of the law, the obligation of the Edit, as a right of the law, cannot be conceived to affect them; nor can it be supposed to do so on account of the right of the husband, as he does not hold or believe in the obligation of it, and his arguments with respect to alien woman are twofold:—First, God has commanded Mussulmans, saying, Ye may marry foreign women, who being converted to the faith, come into the territory of the believers; secondly, wherever the Edit is incumbent, the right of man is connected with it; but a Hibree, or alien, is not considered as man, but as mere matter (whence it is that he is made a property or slave).—But where the woman is pregnant the Edit is incumbent, on account that the foetus of which she is pregnant is of established descent.—It is recorded from Haneefah that it is lawful to marry such women, being pregnant, but that the husband must refrain from carnal connexion until after delivery, in like manner as in the case of women pregnant and by whoredom. The former, however, is the better opinion.

Section.

Of Hidad, or Mourning.

Definition.—By Hidad is understood a woman abstaining from the use of perfumes, such as scented or other oils; or of ornaments, such as dying the edge of the eyelids with antimony, and so forth, except on account of some particular pre-text, or (as is said in the Jama Sageer on account of aches or pains which those application may remedy.

*Mourning is incumbent on the death of a husband—Hidad, or mourning, is incumbent upon a woman whose husband dies, where she is of mature age and a Mussulma, because the Prophet has said, "It is not lawful for a woman who believes in God, and a future state, to observe Hidad for more than three days on account of the death of any one except her husband;" but for him it is incumbent upon her to observe Hidad for the space of four months and ten days.

Although he die during the wife's Edit from irreversible divorce.—Our doctors say that it is equally incumbent upon a woman whose husband dies whilst she is under repudiation by irreversible divorce.—Shafci asserts that it is not incumbent upon her, because the sole intention of its institution is to signify grief for the decease of a husband who has faithfully adhered to the marriage contract until death; but there is no cause of grief for the demise of one who had, during life, thrown his wife into difficulty and perplexity by divorce. The arguments of our doctors, in support of their opinion, are twofold. First, the Prophet forbade women under Edit dyeing their hands with Henna, as it is a species of perfume; secondly, mourning is incumbent as a sign of grief for the loss of the blessings of matrimony, which is not only the means of her support, but also of the preservation of her chastity; and an irreversible divorce is a more complete termination of those blessings than even death itself, since it is lawful for a woman to perform the last offices of ablation, and so forth, to the corpse of a deceased husband from whom she is not irreversibly divorced, whereas it is not lawful for her to perform those offices to the corpse of one from whom she is completely divorced; whereas in this case, mourning is incumbent.—It may here be observed that mourning is incumbent for two reasons: first, as it is a manifestation of grief (as was mentioned above); secondly, because ornamenting or setting off the person by the use of the above articles is a means of exciting the desires of men, and to a woman under Edit marriage is forbidden, wherefore she must refrain from the use of such things, lest she fall into that which is prohibited.—It is recorded, in the Nakl Saheeh, that the Prophet would not permit women under Edit to use antimony upon their eyelids, or to anoint themselves, as the former is an ornament, and the latter is one way of using perfume. By what is said in the definition of Hidad, in the beginning of this section, viz., "abstaining from perfumes, and so forth, except on account of some particular pre-text," is to be understood the use of those is lawful, where there is any sufficient reason for it, as they are then used of necessity; but it is requisite that the intention [of the mourner] in the use of them be medicine, and not ornament.

If a woman be accustomed to the use ofunctions, in such a manner that there might be an apprehension of her health suffering from the same case, provided the cause for apprehension be in her conception apparent and evident, it is lawful to continue the use of them, because things of which occurrence is strongly apprehended by her are considered as actually existing and established, and in the same manner, she may wear warm furred or velvet garments, where there is a necessity; but it is in no way lawful for her to use Henna, because of the precedent of the Prophet before recited: nor to wear cloth dyed with saffron, before that gives a perfume.

Mourning not incumbent upon infidel women or infants (but it is incumbent upon slaves).—Mourning is not incumbent upon an infidel woman, as she is not bound to the observances required by the law; neither is it incumbent upon infants or girls under age, for the same reason; but it is incumbent upon female slaves, being bound to the observances of the law in all such points as do not affect the right of their owner, which is the case with mourning; it is to be observed, however, that the mourning, with respect to female slaves does not include a prohibition from going abroad, since this would be an infringement upon the proprietor's right, which precedes the right of God, as the individual is necessitous, whereas God, is not so.

Nor upon Am-Walid, nor upon widows from invalid marriage.—Mourning is not incumbent upon an Am-Walid under Edit from the decease of her proprietor; nor upon a woman under Edit who has been contracted in an invalid marriage, because, with respect to such women, the blessings of marriage cannot be said to perish so as to afford a reason for the manifestation of grief, moreover, ornaments and the use of perfumes, and so forth, are in their original nature allowable: and where no special reason appears for the prohibition of them, they necessarily continue to be so.

Proposing for a woman during her Edit is disapproved.—It is not decent in any person publicly or expressly to solicit or seek connexion with a woman under Edit; but it matters not if this be done in an indirect and ambiguous manner: yet they should not pass any secret promise of marriage to each other, this being forbidden in the Koran.—The ambiguous mode of proposal above mentioned is described by Ebn Abbas to be, that the man in the woman's presence may declare his wish to marry, in general terms without any particular application.

Rules for the behaviour of women during Edit.—It is not not lawful for a woman under divorce to go abroad, either in the night or day, whether the divorce be reversible or irreversible, because the word of God in the Koran forbids them from appearing abroad: but a widow is at liberty to go forth during the whole day, and for a short season of the night also; yet she must not pass the night anywhere but in her own apartment. The reason of this indulgence is that as a widow has no provision from her husband's property, it may be necessary that she should go forth to seek for a subsistence, and it may sometimes happen that she is detained abroad a considerable time, perhaps till after nightfall, whence the extension of the liberty to a part of the night; but it is otherwise with a woman under divorce, as she is entitled (during Edit) to a subsistence from the husband. Yet if a woman were to enter into an engagement of Khoola with her husband, making the consideration for Khoola to consist of her subsistence during her Edit, some say that she is at liberty to go during the day, while others maintain that she has no liberty of going forth whatever, as the loss of alimony during Edit is a consequence of her own voluntary act, wherefore the prohibition, which is right of the law, still continues in force.

It is incumbent upon a woman under Edit that she observe and accomplish the same in the place where she was resident at the period of divorce taking place, or of the husband's decease, whether that be her own accustomed dwelling, or a house where she may be upon a visit (that of her parents, for instance), because this is so ordered in the Koran; and it also appears in the traditional precepts of the Prophet that he said to a woman whose husband was slain, "stay in your own house until your Edit be accomplished.

A widow may remove from her husband's house, if inconveniently situated there.—If the apartment allotted to a widow, in the house of her deceased husband, be not sufficiently spacious for her accommodation, and it should happen that the heirs of the deceased may exclude her from the other parts of the house, it is then lawful for her to remove elsewhere, because she has here an excuse, and any good pretext suffices in all matters appertaining to the spiritual law, of which description is Edit; the case is therefore the same here as where the woman has reason to fear thieves in her own house, or where there is an apprehension of its falling, or where she holds it by hire, and is unable to pay the rent: all which circumstances are a sufficient case of removal as well as in the present case.

A wife under irreversible divorce must be accommodated with a separate apartment—Where a husband and wife are separated by irreversible or triplicate divorce, it is requisite that there be a curtain or partition between them; and there is no objection to their continuing to reside in the same house, provided this be attended to, as the husband has himself declared her to be prohibited to him: but if he be a dissolve person, one who has no command of his passions, and of whom it may be apprehended that he will commit with her that which is unlawful, it is in this case expedient that she remove to another house (since there it evidently a sufficient excuse), and that she continue there until the accomplishment of her Edit; it is better, however, that the dissolute husband leave her in his house, and remove to another himself.—It is laudable in the parties, whether the husband be dissolute or otherwise, to engage a female friend to reside in the house with them, who may be able to prevent any improper connexion.—If the dwelling house be so small as not to admit of their residing in it under these precautions, it is then necessary that the wife remove elsewhere; but it is better that the husband remove, and leave her to reside in the house. All this proceeds upon a supposition of the husband's having no more than one house.

Rule respecting a wife divorced upon a journey.—If a woman accompany her husband upon a journey, or on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and he give her three divorces upon the way, or die, leaving her in an uninhabited place, she must return to her own city, provided the distance be within three days' journey, because it is not to be considered as going abroad, but rather as a consequence of her having before gone abroad; but if the distance exceed three days' journey, she is then at liberty either to return home, or to proceed upon the pilgrimage, whether her guardian be with her or not.—The compiler of this work observes that this is only where she is left within three days' journey from Mecca, where her stay would be more dangerous than her proceeding; but her return to her own city is preferable, in order that she may there accomplish her Edit in the house of her husband.—But if, in the case under consideration, the divorce or death occur in a city, or other inhabited place, the woman must not go forth from that place until her Edit be accomplished, after which she may leave it, provided she be accompanied by any male relation within the prohibited degrees.—What is here advanced is the doctrine of Haneefi.—The two disciples say that, if the woman be accompanied by a relation within the prohibited degrees, she may leave the place before her Edit be past: for they argue that she ought to be allowed to return home, in order that she may relieve herself from the disagreeable circumstance attending her residence in a strange place, and also from the derangement and trouble of a journey, because these are sufficient pretexts, and the impropriety of her travelling is removed by the circumstance of her relation accompanying her.

To this Haneefi replies that Edit affords a stronger reason against removal than even the want of a relation's protection, as a woman may lawfully go to any distance within a day's journey, without being accompanied by a relation, whereas this is not lawful for a woman under Edit: and where it is unlawful for a woman to go to any greater distance, unaccompanied by a relation, it is for one under Edit, a fortiori.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF PARENTAGE.

A child born after six months from the date of a marriage upon which is suspended a conditional divorce, is the lawful offspring of such marriage.—If a man make a declaration saying, "if I marry such a woman she is divorced," and he afterwards marry her, and she produce a child after six months from the day of the marriage, the parentage of the child is established in him, and the dower is incumbent upon him; the former is established because the wife is in this case considered as a participant of his blood at the period of conception, as having brought forth a child at the expiration of six complete months from the date of the marriage, a time considerably posterior to the divorce, since that takes place immediately after the marriage, wherefore the conception must be considered as having taken place prior to the divorce, that is, within the marriage.

Objection.—It is not to be imagined that conception should take place at the time of marriage, as it is a consequence of the carnal act, which happens posterior to it; how therefore, can it be established that the conception took place before divorce, since the latter occurs upon the instant of the marriage?

Reply.—Conception may be imagined upon the instant of the marriage, as it is possible that the man may marry the woman whilst in the commission of the carnal act, and consequently, that marriage and conception may have taken place at the same instance, and as genealogy is a matter, the establishment of which is of great moment, this supposition has therefore been adopted: and the dower is incumbent, because the descent of the child being established in him, he is virtually held to have cohabited with his wife; and it is due on account of consummation.

The parentage of a child born two years after reversible divorce is established in the divorce.—If a man repudiate his wife by a divorce reversible, and she bring forth a child at the end of two years, or more, from the time of the divorce, the parentage of the child is established in him, and the divorce is reversed, provided she had not before declared the accomplishment of her Edit, because it is possible that her pregnancy may have taken place during Edit, as the Tobar (or term of purity) of some woman

* This means any time between six months and two years from the date of the marriage as the former of these is held to be the shortest, and the latter the longest possible term of pregnancy.
Book IV.—Chap. XIII.

DIVORCE.

is much longer than that of others, which circumstance may have protracted its connunciation: but if she be delivered of a child within less than two years from the divorce, she becomes completely separated from her husband, on account of the completion of her Edit by delivery; and in this case also the parentage of the child is established in the husband, because it is as possible that the conception may have taken place previous to divorce (that is, within the marriage), as it is that it may have taken after divorce (that is, within the Edit): but yet reversal is not established, because, as it is possible that conception took place after divorce, so it is also possible that it took place before divorce: wherefore reversal cannot be established, on account of the doubt which exists on this point: but where the woman is not delivered until after two years, reversal is established, as the conception is posterior to divorce, and must be attributed to the husband, since no charge of adultery has been advanced against the wife, wherefore it is evident that he has had connexion with her during Edit, a circumstance by which reversal is established.

And so also of the child born within two years after triplicate or irreversible divorce.

—If a man repudiate his wife either by three divorces, or by an irreversible divorce, and she be delivered of a child within less than two years from the period of the divorce, the parentage is established in him, as it is possible that the pregnancy may have existed at that time; and the right of cohabitation does not positively appear to have been dissolved previous to pregnancy, whence the parentage is established in this manner for the sake of care.—But if the delivery were not to take place until after the expiration of two years from the period of separation, the parentage of the child is not established, as pregnancy in that case evidently appears to have taken place posterior to divorce, and consequently the child cannot be supposed to be begotten by the man in question, since to him carnal connexion with the woman is unlawful: yet
if he claim the child as his own, the parentage is established in him, as he here takes it upon himself, and it may be accounted for by supposing him to have had connexion with the woman, erroneously, during her Edit.

And so likewise of a child born of a wife under age within nine months after either irrescible or irreversible divorce.—If a man repudiate, by an irreversible divorce, a wife who is under the age of puberty, but yet such an one as may admit of carnal con-nextion, and she bring forth a child after the expiration of nine months from the time of divorce, the parentage of the child is not established in him; but if the delivery be within less than nine months, it is established.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf says that the parentage is established in the man, although the child, should not be born within less than two years from the period of divorce, because she was under Edit, and it is possible that the pregnancy may have existed at the time of the divorce, and she not have declared the accomplishment of her Edit, wherefore this infant wife is the same as a full-grown woman.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the Edit, of the wife is in the case appointed to be counted by months, therefore it is established at the expiration of three months, by the rule of the law, independent of any declaration on her part; —if, therefore, she be delivered of a child within less than six months from the end of that term which completes her Edit,

the parentage of the child is established;
but, if she bring not forth until after that time, the parentage is not established, as it appears to have been begotten at the time when she was not a partner of the husband's bed, for the case of a girl irresceivably divorced under puberty, and consequently must subject to the marriage discipline and whose Edit is therefore completed by the lapse of time, namely, three months, wherefore it is not possible that pregnancy should have existed at the time of divorce; and the right of cohabitation appears to have undoubtedly expired before pregnancy, so that the descent cannot be established. And if the wife under these circumstances be repudiated by a reversible divorce, the rule is the same (with Haneefa and Mohammed) as before recited. Aboo Yoosaf says that the parentage of the child is established in the husband if it be born within twenty-seven months from the time of divorce, as it must be allowed that he may have had connexion with her at the latter end of the term of three months, which constitutes her Edit, and she be delivered within the longest term of pregnancy admitted by the law, namely two years. But if the infant wife declare her pregnancy to have taken place during Edit, the rule is then the same as with respect to grown women; that is to say, the parentage of the child is established in the husband, and her puberty is proved by her own affirmation.

The parentage of a child born of a widow within two years after the decease of her husband is established in him.—If a widow bring forth a child, the parentage is established in her husband, provided the delivery happen within two years from the time of his decese.—Ziffer says that if she be not delivered until after six months from the time of the completion of the Edit of widowhood,
in this case the parentage cannot be established, because her Edit, upon the lapse of four months and ten days, is completed by the ordinance of the law, as the Edit is, by the law, fixed to that time, and is therefore the same as if she were to declare the accomplishment of her Edit, as in the case of the infant before mentioned.—Our doctors, on the other hand, say that the Edit of the Edit in question is not absolutely fixed at four months and ten days, but has also another mode of completion, namely, delivery since marriage with an adult woman is con. sidered as a cause of pregnancy; contrary to the case of a girl under puberty, because the natural state of such an one is an incapacity to bear children, as an infant is not a subject of impregnation until she attain maturity, and concerning the maturity of the infant there is a doubt.

And so also of a child born within six months after the wife declaring her Edit to have expired. If a woman under Edit declare the same to be accomplished, and be afterwards delivered of a child within less than six months from the time of her declaration, the parentage of the child is established, as it is evident that her declaration was unfounded, and is consequently null: but if she be delivered after six months from the time of her declaration, the parentage is not established, because nothing appears in this case to annul her declaration, as it is possible that her pregnancy may have occurred after that.

Whatever be the occasion of the Edit. This reasoning applies to every woman under Edit, whatever the occasion may be, whether divorce reversible or irreparable, or the decease of her husband; or of whatever description or nature, whether it be counted by months, or by the return of the courses.

The birth must be proved by evidence. When a woman under Edit is delivered of a child, the parentage is not established, (according to Haneefa), unless the birth be proved by the evidence of two male witnesses or of one male and two females. This is a rule where there is no apparent pregnancy, or where the same is not acknowledged by the husband; but if the pregnancy be apparent, or the husband have acknowledged it, the parentage is established independent of the testimony of witness. The two disciples maintain that, in all cases, the parentage is established upon the testimony of one woman,—because the husband's right of cohabitation still continues during Edit, and it is this right which occasions the fixing of the parentage of a child upon the husband, wherefore nothing more is required that some person prove the birth, and the identity, by testifying: "This is the child of which such a woman was delivered,"—and thus much may be sufficiently proved by the testimony of a single woman, in the same manner as it is during marriage, in a case where the husband disputes the child's identity. Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the Edit is accomplished by the woman's declaration of delivery; but the mere completion of Edit is not proof, and the descent still remains to be first established, for which reason it is that complete proof (that is, the testimony of two men, or of one man and two women) is made a condition; but it would be otherwise if the pregnancy were apparent, or acknowledged by the husband, and in this case the parentage is established prior to the birth: and the child's identity is there ascertained by the identity of one woman,—the midwife, for instance.

The parentage of child born of a widow, when uncontroverted, is established, in her deceased husband, independent of evidence. If a man under Edit from the death of her husband bring forth a child and declare it to be his, and the heirs confirm his assertion, though no person hear evidence to the birth, the child is held to be descended of the husband, according to all our doctors. This, with respect to inheritance, is evident, as inheritance is a sole right of the heirs, and consequently their testimony or acknowledgment is to be credited in every matter which affects it. A question, however, may arise in the case whether the parentage of the child be by such testimony established with respect to others than those heirs: and upon this the learned in the law observe, that if those heirs be persons of a description capable of being admitted as witness, the parentage is established with respect to all others as well as themselves, because their testimony amounts to proof, for which reason some doctors require that their confirmation of the woman's assertion be delivered in the form of evidence, but the necessity of this is denied by others, because the establishment of parentage, with respect to the rest of mankind, is a necessary consequence of its establishment with respect to the immediate heirs of the deceased by their confirmation; and where a matter is once fully established upon any particular ground, no necessity exists for any further conditions with respect to its establishment.

A child born within less than six months after marriage is not the offspring of that marriage; but if after six months it is so, independent of the husband's acknowledgment; or upon the evidence of one witness the birth where he denies it: and Lean is incumbent, if he persist in his denial; and the wife's testimony is to be credited in respect to the date of the marriage. If a man marry a woman, and she bring forth a child within less than six months after the marriage, the parentage of the child is not established in the husband, as pregnancy in that case appears to have existed previous to the marriage, and consequently cannot be derived from him; but if she be delivered after six months, it is established, whether he acknowledge it or not, because then the marriage appears to have existed at the time of impregnation, and the term of pregnancy is complete. If, moreover, the husband deny the birth, it may be proved by the evidence of one woman, after which the parentage is established in virtue of the marriage; and such being the case, if he persist in denying the child, imprecation becomes incumbent, because his denial then amounts to an imputation on his wife's chastity, since it implies a charge of adultery against her. And if, upon the birth of a child, a dispute were to arise between the husband and wife, he asserting that he had married her only four months before, and she maintaining that they had been married six months, the declaration of the wife is to be credited, and the child belongs to the husband, because such circumstances testify for the wife, as it appears that her pregnancy has been a consequence of marriage and not of whoredom. — A question has arisen among our doctors whether the woman's assertion is to be credited without being confirmed by oath? The two disciples hold that it requires her oath; but Haneefa maintains the contrary opinion.

Divorce suspended upon the birth of a child cannot take place on the evidence of one woman to the birth.—If a man suspend divorce upon the circumstance of his wife's bearing a child, by saying to her, "upon being delivered of this child you are divorced," — and a woman afterwards give testimony to her being delivered, yet divorce does not take place according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that divorce takes place, because the evidence of a single woman stating in all such matters as are improper to be held by men; and the evidence of one woman to a birth being admitted, it is also to be admitted with respect to whatever proceeds from the birth, which in the present instance is divorce. — The argument of Haneefa is that the woman, in this case, stands as a plaintiff for penalty against her husband, and he appears as the defendant, wherefore her claim cannot be established but by complete proof. — The foundation of this is that the evidence of a woman is admitted with respect to child-birth from necessity only, and has therefore no effect with respect to divorce, since that is a matter altogether distinct from child-birth, and unconnected with it, although such connection appear to exist from the peculiar circumstances of the present case. But if the husband acknowledge the pregnancy, divorce takes place upon the woman independent of the evidence of others, according to Haneefa. — The two disciples hold that in this case also the testimony of the midwife is necessary, because proof is indispensable to the establishment of a Dawee Fins, or claim of penalty, and the evidence of the midwife amounts to proof, according to what was before said. — The arguments of Haneefa are twofold; — First, the acknowledgment of pregnancy amounts to an acknowledgment of that which pregnancy induces, and extends thereto, and that thing is child-birth; Secondly, the husband, in acknowledging the pregnancy, declares his wife a trustee, as the child is a deposit in her possession, and consequently her word is to be credited in the surrender of the deposit, as much as that of any other trustee.

The term of pregnancy is from six months to two years. — The longest term of pregnancy is two years, because of the declaration of Aysha, "the child does not remain in the mother's womb beyond two years:" and the shortest term is six months, because the sacred text says, "the whole term of pregnancy and weaning is thirty months;" and Ibn Abbas has said that the term of suckling is two years, wherefore six months remain for the pregnancy. — Shafei has said that the longest term of pregnancy extends to four years; but the text here quoted, and the opinion of Ibn Abbas as above, testify against him. — It is probable that Shafei may have delivered this opinion upon hearsay, as this is a matter which does not admit of reasoning.

Case of a man divorcing a wife who is a slave, and then purchasing her.—If a man marry a female slave, and afterwards divorce her, and then purchase her, and she be delivered of a child within less than six months from the day of purchase, the parentage is established in him; but if she be delivered after six months, the parentage is not established; because, in the first instance, the child is considered as born of a woman under Eduit, conception appearing to have taken place before purchase; but in the second instance, it is regarded as slave-born, as the length of the term of pregnancy here admits of conception being referred to a time subsequent to purchase; and the child thus appearing to be born (not of a wife, but) of a slave, his acknowledgment requisite to the establishment of its parentage. — What is not advanced proceeds upon the supposition of the slave being repudiated by a single divorce, reversible or irreversible, or by Khoola; but if she be repudiated by two divorces, the parentage of the child is established, if it be born within two years from the date of the divorce, because in this case she is rendered unlawful to her husband by the rigorous prohibition, whence the pregnancy can be referred only to a time previous to divorce, since, under such a circumstance she is not rendered lawful to the man by his subsequent purchase of her.

Miscellaneous cases — If a man say to his female slave, "if there be a child in your womb it is mine," upon a woman afterwards bearing testimony to the birth, the slave becomes Am-Walid to that man, because all that is requisite is to prove the child's identity, by showing that "such a woman has been delivered of such a child," — and this is sufficiently ascertained by the testimony of the midwife, according to all our doctors.

In a man say of a boy, "this is my son," and afterwards die, and the mother declare declaring herself to be the wife of the deceased, she must be considered as such, and the boy as his child, and they both inherit of him. It is recorded in the Nawadir that this rule proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, for analogy requires that the woman should not inherit, since descent is established not only in virtue of a valid marriage, but also of an
DIVORCE.

A. invalid marriage, or of erroneous carnal connexion, or of possession by right of property, and therefore the main's declaration that "this is his son" does not amount to an acknowledgment of his having married the mother; but the reason for a more favourable construction of the law here is, that the case supposes the woman to be one whose freedom and maternal right in the child are matters of public notoriety, and the validity of a marriage is ascertained by circumstances. But if the woman be not known to be free, and the heirs of the husband maintain that she is only an Am-Walid, she is not entitled to any inheritance, because the mere appearance of freedom (supposing the case to occur in a Mussulman territory), although it defend the party from slavery, is not sufficient to establish a claim of inheritance.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF HIZANIT, OR THE CARE OF INFANT CHILDREN

In case of separation, the care of the infant children belongs to the wife.—If a separation take place between a husband and wife, who are possessed of an infant child, the right of nursing and keeping it rests with the mother, because it is recorded that a woman once applied to the Prophet, saying: "O Prophet of God! this is my son, the fruit of my womb, cherished in my bosom and suckled at my breast, and his father is desirous of taking him away from me into his own care;"—to which the Prophet replied, "thou hast a right in the child prior to that of thy husband, so long as thou dost not marry with a stranger:"—moreover, a mother is naturally not only more tender, but also better qualified to cherish a child during infancy, so that committing the care to her is of advantage to the child; and Siddeek alluded to this, when he addressed Omar on a similar occasion, saying, "the spittle of the mother is better for thy child than honey, O Omar!" which was said at a time when separation had taken place between Omar and his wife, the mother of Assim, the latter being then an infant at the breast, and Omar desirous of taking him from the mother; and these words were spoken in the presence of many of the companions, none of whom contradicted him—but the Nifka or subsistence of the child is incumbent upon the father, as shall be hereafter explained. It is to be observed, however, that if the mother refuse to keep the child, there is no constraint upon her, as a variety of causes may operate to render her incapable of the charge.

Order of precedence in Hizanit, after the mother.—If the mother of an infant die, the right of Hizanit (or infant education) rests with the maternal grandmother, in preference to the paternal, because it originates in, and is derived from, the mother; but if she be not living, the paternal grandmother has then a right prior to any other relation she being as one of the child's mothers (whence it is that she is entitled to a sixth of the effects of a child of her son, which is the mother's share); and she must, moreover, be considered as having a more tender interest in her own offspring than any collateral relation. If there be no grandmother living, in this case a sister is preferable to either a maternal or paternal aunt, as she is the daughter of the father and mother, or of one of them, whence it is that she would take place of the aunts in inheritance—(according to one tradition, the maternal aunt is preferable to a half-sister by the father side, the Prophet having said, "the maternal aunt is as a mother").—A full sister, also, has preference to an half-sister, maternal or paternal; and a maternal sister to a paternal sister; because the right of Hizanit is derived to them through the mother. The maternal aunt has preference to the paternal, because precedence is given, in this point, to the maternal relation. The same distinction also prevails among the aunt as among the sisters;—that is, she who is doubly related has a preference to her who is singly related; thus the maternal aunt, who is full sister to the mother precedes an half-sister, maternal or paternal; and, in the same manner, a maternal sister precedes a paternal sister; and so also of the paternal aunts. If, however, any of these women, having the right of Hizanit, should marry a stranger, her right is thereby annulled, an account of the tradition before quoted, and also because, where the husband is a stranger, it is to be apprehended that he may treat the child unkindly; where the woman, therefore, who has charge of an infant marries, it is neither advantageous nor advisable that the infant remain with her, unless the person she marries be a relation—as where the mother, for instance, having charge, marries the child's paternal uncle, or the maternal grandmother marries the paternal grandfather,—because these men, being as parents, it is to be expected that they will behave with tenderness:—and so also of any other relation within the prohibited degrees, for the same reason.

Any woman whose right of Hizanit is annulled by her marrying a stranger recovers the right by the dissolution of the marriage, the objection to her exercise of it being thereby removed.

In defeat of the maternal, it rests with the nearest paternal relation.—If there be no woman to whom the right of Hizanit appertains, and the men of the family dispute it, in this case the nearest paternal relation has the preference, he being the one to whom the authority of guardian belongs (the de-

*This must mean, in case of the mother's death.
Degrees of paternal relationship are treated of in their proper place: but it is to be observed that the child must not be entrusted to any relation beyond the prohibited degrees, such as the Mawla or emancipator of a slave, or the son of the paternal uncle, as in this there may be apprehension of treachery.

Length of the term of Hizanit. — The right of Hizanit, with respect to a male child, appertains to the mother, grandmother, or father, until he become independent of it himself, that is to say, become capable of shifting, eating, drinking, and performing the other natural functions without assistance; after which the charge devolves upon the father, or next paternal relation entitled to the office of guardian, because, when thus far advanced, it then becomes necessary to attend to his education in all branches of useful and ornamental science, and to initiate him into a knowledge of men and manners, to effect which the father or paternal relations are best qualified. (Koaf says that the Hizanit with respect to a boy, ceases at the end of seven years. as in general a child at that age is capable of performing all the necessary offices for himself, without assistance). — But the right of Hizanit with respect to a girl appertains to the mother, grandmother, and so forth, until the first appearance of the menstrual discharge (that is to say, until she attain the age of puberty), because a girl has occasion to learn such manners and accomplishments as are proper to women, to the teaching of which the female relations are most competent; but after that period the charge of her properly belongs to the father, because a girl, after maturity, requires some person to superintend her conduct, and to this the father is most completely qualified. It is recorded from Mohammed that the care of a female child devolves upon the father as soon as she begins to feel the carnal appetite, as she then requires a superintendence over her conduct; and it is universally admitted that the right of Hizanit of girls is restricted to that period, with respect to all the female relations except the mother and grandmother. It is written in the Juma Sagheer, that the right of Hizanit, with any except the mother or grandmother, discontinues upon the girl becoming capable of performing natural offices without assistance, because no other is entitled to require any service of her (whence it is that they cannot hire her as a servant to others), and such being the case the end (namely, the girl's education) cannot be obtained: but it is otherwise with the mother or grandmother, as they are invested with a legal right to require her services.

A slave has the right upon obtaining her freedom. — If a man contract his female slave or Am-Walid, in marriage to any person, and she bear a child to her husband, and the master afterwards emancipate her, she then becomes (with respect to the child) as a free woman; that is, upon becoming free she obtains her right of Hizanit which had not existed while she was a slave, because her service, as a slave, would necessarily interfere with the proper discharge of the duties of Hizanit.

And also an infidel mother the wife of a Mussulman. — A Zimmera, or female infidel subject, married to a Mussulman, is entitled to the Hizanit of her child, although he be a Mussulman like the father; but this only so long as the child is incapable of forming any judgment with respect to religion, and whilst there is no apprehension of his imbibing an attachment to infidelity; but when this is the case, he must be taken from the mother, because, although it be for the child's advantage to be under her care until that period, his remaining longer with her might prove injurious.

Children after the term of Hizanit, remain solely under the care of the father. — A boy or girl, having passed the period of Hizanit have no option to be with one parent in preference to the other, but must necessarily thenceforth remain in charge of the father. Shafei maintains that they have an option to remain with either parent, because of a tradition cited by Shafei, it may be observed that, in the instance there referred to, where the Prophet gave a boy his choice, he first prayed to God to direct him therein, and the boy then chose, under the influence of the Prophet's prayer.

Section

A mother cannot remove with her child to a strange place. — If a divorced woman be desirous of removing with her child out of a city, she is not at liberty to do it; but yet if she remove with her child out of a city, and go to her native place, where the contract of her marriage, was executed, in this case her removal is lawful, because the father is considered as having also undertaken to reside in that place, both in the eye of the law, and according to common usage, for the Prophet has said, "Whoever marries a woman of any city is thereby rendered a denizen of that city;" and hence it is, that if an alien woman were to come into the Mussulman territory, and there to marry an infidel subject, she also becomes an infidel subject; it is to observed, however, that

this rule does not apply to an alien man, that is to say, if an alien man were to come to marry a female subject, he is not thereby rendered a subject; for if he choose, he may divorce this wife and return to his own country.

If a divorced woman be desirous of removing with her child to a place which is not the place of her nativity, but in which her marriage contract was executed, she is at liberty to do it. This demonstrated by Kadooree in his compendium, and also accords with what is related in the Mabsoot. The Jama Sagheer says that she may take her child thither, because where a marriage contract is executed in any place, it occasions all the ordinances thereof to exist and have force in that place, in the same manner as sale amounts to a delivery of the article sold in the place of sale; and a woman's right to the care of her children is one of the ordinances of marriage, wherefore she is entitled to keep her child in the place where she was married, although she be not a native of that place. The principle upon which the Mabsoot proceeds in this case is, that the execution of a contract of marriage in a place merely of casual residence (such as the stage of a journey, does not constitute it a home, according to general usage; and this is the better opinion. In short, to the propriety of the woman carrying her child from one place to another, two points are essentially requisite one, that she be a native of the place to which she goes; and the other, that her marriage contract has been there executed; this, however, means only where the places are considerably distant; but if they be so near that the father may go to see his child and return the same night, there is no objection to the wife going to the other place with the child, and there remaining; and this, whatever be the size or degree of the places, whether cities or villages; nor is there any objection to her removing from the village to the city or chief town of a district, as this is in no respect injurious to the father, and is advantageous to the child, since he will thereby become known and acquainted with the people of the place; but the reverse [that is, her removal from the city to a village], would be injurious to the child, as he would thereby be liable to acquire the low manners and mean sentiments of villagers; wherefore a woman is not at liberty to carry her child from a city to a village.

CHAPTER XV.

Of Nifka, or Maintenance

Definition of the term.—NIFKA, in the language of the law, signifies all those things which are necessary to the support of life, such as food, clothes, and lodging: many confine it solely to food.

Section I

Of the Nifka of the Wife.

The subsistence of wife is incumbent upon her husband.—When a woman surrenders herself into the custody of her husband, it is incumbent upon him thenceforth to supply her with food, clothing, and lodging, whether she be a Mussulman or an infidel, because such is the precept both in the Koran and in the tradition; and the maintenance is a recompense for the matrimonial restraint: whence it is that where a person is in custody of another on account of any demand, or so forth, his subsistence is incumbent upon that other,—as when a public magistrate, for instance, is imprisoned on account of any mal-administration in his office, in which case his subsistence must be provided from the public treasury; and as the authorities upon which this proceeds no distinctions between a Mussulman and an infidel, the rule holds the same with respect to either in the present case.

In proportion to the circumstances of the parties.—In adjusting the obligation of the Nifka, or maintenance of a wife, regard is to be had to the rank and condition both of her and her husband: thus if the parties be both wealthy, he must support her in an opulent manner: if they be both poor, he is required only to provide for her accordingly; and if he be rich, and she poor, he is to afford her a moderate subsistence, such as is below the former and above the latter. The compiler of this work says that this is the opinion adopted by Khasaf; and that decrees pass accordingly. Koorokee is of opinion that the rank and condition of the husband alone is to be regarded (and such also is the doctrine of Shafei), because the sacred text says, 'LET HIM SUPPORT HER ACCORDING TO HIS ABILITY.'—The ground of Khasaf's opinion is a tradition respecting the Prophet, who, on a woman applying to him for his judgment upon this point, said to her, 'take from the property of your husband whatever may suffice for the subsistence of yourself and your child in the customary way;' for which it appears that the circumstances of the woman are to be regarded as well as those of the man, for maintenance is incumbent only so far as may suffice for the purpose intended by it, and as a woman in mean circumstances has no occasion for the same subsistence as one who is accustomed to live in affluence, such is (with respect to her) unnecessary; and as to the text above quoted by Shafei, it means no more than that if the woman be in affluent circumstances, and her husband otherwise, he shall suppose her according to his ability, and the remainder, or difference, shall be a debt upon him. By the expression 'customary way,' in the tradition, it is meant to be understood a middling or moderate way, that is, a medium between the circumstances of the wife and those of the husband where the former happens to be rich.
and the latter poor; and as the Prophet in his decision left this to the judgment of the parties themselves, the proportion is not specifically determined by the law.—Sh. fi. has so determined it, saying that the Nifka or maintenance incumbent upon a husband in behalf of his wife, if he be opulent, is two Mids, or about one thousand Dirms annually.—If he be poor, one Mid: and if in middle circumstances, one and a half: this, however, is not admitted, because a thing declared to be incumbent “so far as may suffice” cannot be legally fixed at any specific rate, as the proportion must necessarily vary according to circumstances.

And this, although she withhold herself on account of her dower.—If a woman refuse to surrender herself to her husband, on account of its not having been paid to her, her maintenance does not drop, but is incumbent upon the husband. She must not yet be possessed within his custody, since her refusal is only in pursuance of her right, and consequently the objection to the matrimonial custody originates with the husband.

But not if she be refractory.—If a wife be disobedient or refractory, and go abroad without her husband’s consent, she is not entitled to any support from him, until she return and make submission, because the rejection of the matrimonial restraint in this instance originates with her; but when she returns home, she is then subject to it, for which reason she again becomes entitled to her support as before. It is otherwise where a woman, residing in the house of her husband, refuses to admit him to the conjugal embrace, as she is entitled to maintenance, notwithstanding her opposition, because being then in his power, he may, if he please, enjoy her by force.

Or an infant incapable of generation.—If a man’s wife be so young as to be incapable of generation, her maintenance is not incumbent upon him, because although she should be within his custody, yet as an obstacle exists in her to the carnal embrace, this is not the custody which entitles to maintenance, that being described “custody, for the purpose of enjoyment,” which does not apply to the case of one incapable of the act:—contrary to the case of the sick woman, to whom maintenance is due, although she be incapable, as shall be hereafter demonstrated.—Shafei says that maintenance is due to an infant wife, because he holds it to be a return for the matrimonial property, in the same manner as it is with respect to a slave for the property in his personal service. To this however, our doctors reply that the dower is the return for the matrimonial property, and one thing does not legally admit of two returns; wherefore, in the case of an infant wife, the dower is due but not maintenance.

But it is due to an adult wife from an infant husband.—But if the husband be an infant incapable of generation, and the wife an adult, she is entitled to her maintenance at his expense, because, in this case delivery of the person has been performed on her part, and the obstacle to the matrimonial enjoyment exists on the part of the husband. It is not due where the wife is imprisoned for debt.—If a woman be imprisoned for debt, her husband is not required to support her, because the objection to the matrimonial custody does not in this case originate with him, whether her imprisonment be owing to herself (as in a case of willful delay and contumacy) or otherwise (as where she is poor and unable to discharge the debt).

Or forcibly carried off.—And, in the same manner, if a woman be forcibly seized and carried off by any person, she has no claim to maintenance from her husband; and so also, if a woman go upon a pilgrimage, under charge of a relation within the prohibited degrees,—because she is not then in custody of her husband, and her not being so is occasioned by her own voluntary act.

Or goes upon a pilgrimage.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that a woman upon a pilgrimage is entitled to a maintenance from her husband, as her undertaking the indispensible pilgrimage is a sufficient pretext for her leaving him; but he allows her only a Nifka-Hizr, or support as in a settled place; and not a Nifka-Sifr, or support as upon a journey; as the former only incumbent upon the husband, not the latter.

Unless she be accompanied by the husband.—If the husband accompany his wife upon her pilgrimage, her maintenance is then incumbent upon him according to all our doctors, because in this case she continues in his custody; but she is entitled to Nifka-Hizr only, not to a Nifka-Sifr, as he is not the occasion of her travelling, whence it is that he is not obliged to furnish her with a conveyance.

It continues during her sickness.—If a woman fall sick in her husband’s house, she is still entitled to a maintenance. This is upon a principle of benevolence, as analogy would suggest that she is not entitled to maintenance where she falls sick so far as to be incapable of admitting her husband to the conjugal embrace, since in this case she cannot be deemed in custody for the purpose of enjoyment; but the reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this case is, that she still remains in custody, as her husband may associate and indulge in connubial tie with her, and she may continue to superintend his domestic concerns, and the obstacle to carnal enjoyment is (like the men- *Dirms have varied in their value at different times, from twenty to twenty-five passing current for a Deenar. The sum here mentioned is from about eighteen to twenty-two pounds sterling.

*Arab Hidj-Farz.—It is incumbent upon all Mosalmtes to perform at least one pilgrimage to Mecca, and this one is reckoned among the Firayez, or sacred ordinances, whence the above epithet.
DIVORCE.

It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that if a woman deliver herself into the custody of her husband, and then fall sick, she is still entitled to maintenance; but if she fall sick first, and then deliver herself to him, she has no claim to maintenance until her recovery, as the surrender of her person is not in this case complete; and the learned in the law admit this to be a proper distinction.

The maintenance of the wife's servants is incumbent upon her husband, as well as that of the wife herself, provided he be in opulent circumstances, because he is obliged to provide his wife's maintenance, "so far as may suffice" (as aforesaid), and it is not sufficient, unless her servants also be supported, they being essential to her case and comfort; but it is not absolutely incumbent upon him to provide a maintenance for more than one servant, according to Haneefa and Mohammad. Aboo Yoosaf says he must provide main servants, as one is required for service within the house, and the other out of doors—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed on this point are twofold:—First, one servant may answer both purposes, whence two are unnecessary; Secondly, if the husband were himself to undertake all the services required by the wife, it would suffice, and a servant would be unnecessary; and, in the same manner, it suffices if he constitute any single servant his substitute therein; wherefore a second servant is not requisite. The learned in the law say that the rate of maintenance due from an opulent husband to his wife's servants is the same as that due from a poor husband to his wife,—namely, the lowest that can be admitted as sufficient—Haneefa says that a husband who is poor is not required to find maintenance for his wife's servants; and this is an approved doctrine, as it is to be supposed that the wife of a poor man will serve herself. Mohammed holds that it is due from a poor husband, in the same manner as from one more opulent.

If the husband be poor, the magistrate must empower the wife to raise subsistence upon his credit.—If a husband become poor, to such a degree as to be unable to provide his wife her maintenance, still they are not to be separated on this account, but the Kazee shall direct the woman to procure necessities for herself upon her husband's credit, the amount remaining a debt upon him.—Shafei says that they must be separated, because whenever the husband becomes incapable of providing his wife's maintenance, he cannot "retain her with humanity" (as is required in the sacred writings), and such being the case, it behoves him to divorce her; and if he decline so to do, the Kazee is then to effect the separation as his substitute, in the same manner as in cases of emasculation or impotence: nay, the necessity for this is more urgent in the present instance than in either of those cases, as the maintenance is indispensable. To this our doctors reply that if a separation take place the right of the husband is destroyed in toto, which is a grievous injury to him; whereas, if the wife be desired to procure maintenance for herself upon his credit, his right is by this means preserved with the smallest possible injury; wherefore they are not to be separated, but the wife shall be directed to take up the articles necessary for her subsistence upon his credit, as was already stated:—but the wife is in this case restricted in her expenses to a rate which must be determined by the Kazee.

At a certain specified rate.—The Kazee cannot act as the substitute of the husband in effecting a separation here, as in cases of emasculation or impotence, because property in marriage is only a dependant, or secondary consideration, the primary object being procreation, and that which is a dependant merely cannot be put in competition with the original intent, upon which it is to be supposed it is that the Kazee is empowered to effect a separation in either of the other two instances, as there the original intent is defeated; but it is not so in the present case. The advantage of the Kazee desiring the woman to procure a maintenance upon her husband's credit, and of his fixing the rate thereof, is that she is thereby enabled to make her husband responsible for the amount; for if she contract any debt without this authority, the creditors claim lies against her, and not against her husband.

To be varied according to any change in his circumstances.—If the husband were in indigent circumstances at the time of the Kazee authorizing the wife as aforesaid, and he have consequently determined her maintenance at the rate of poverty, and the husband afterwards become rich and she sue for a proportionable addition to her maintenance, a decree must be given in her favour, as the rate of the maintenance differs according to the poverty or opulence of the husband.

Arrears of maintenance not due unless the maintenance have been decreed by the Kazee or the rate of it previously determined on between the parties.—If a length of time should elapse during which the wife has not received any maintenance from her husband, she is not entitled to demand any for that time, except when the Kazee had before determined and decreed it to her, or where she had entered into a composition with the husband respecting it, in either of which cases she is to be decreed her maintenance for the time past, because maintenance is an obligation in the manner of a gratuity—by a gratuity is understood a thing due without a return, and maintenance is of this description, it not being held (according to our doctors) to be as a return for the matrimonial propriety; and the obligation of it is not valid but through a decree of the Kazee, like a gift, which does not convey a right to possession but through seisin, which establishes possession: but a composition is of equal effect with a decree of the Kazee, in the present case, as the husband, by such composition, makes himself responsible, and his power over his own person is superior to that of the magistrate—This reasoning does not apply to the case of dower, as that is considered to be a return for the use of the wife’s person.

Arrears of a decreed maintenance drop in case of the death of either party.—If the Kazee decree a wife her maintenance, and a length of time elapse without her receiving any and the husband should die, her maintenance drops; and the rule is the same if she should die; because maintenance is a gratuity, respecting which the rule is that it drops in consequence of death, like a gift, which is annulled by the decease of the donor or donee before seisin being made by the latter.—Shafei says that the maintenance is in all circumstances to be considered as a debt upon the husband, in conformity with his tenet, that it is not a gratuity but a return, wherefore it cannot drop like demands of the former description.—This was before replied to.

Advances of maintenance cannot be reclaimed.—If a man give his wife one year’s maintenance in advance, and then die before the expiration of the year, no claim lies against the woman for restitution of any part of it.—This is the doctrine of Haneefas and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed says that she is entitled only to the proportion due for the term past, from beginning of the year till the husband’s decease, the remainder being the right of his heirs; if, therefore, the difference remain with her in substance, she must restore it; or, if it do not remain, she is responsible for the value (and this also is the doctrine of Shafei, and the same difference of opinion obtains in respect to clothes and apparel), because the wife in this case has received in advance the return for the matrimonial confinement, to which she has a claim, in virtue of such a confinement, but her claim is annulled by the husband’s decease, since she no longer remains confined, and consequently the return is annulled in proportion to the annulment of her claim, in the same manner as the stipend of a Kazee.—The argument of the two Elders is that the maintenance is a gratuity, of which the claimant has already taken possession; and restitution of a gratuity cannot be demanded after death, the virtue of it being completed by that event, as in a case of gift; whence it is that if the maintenance were to perish in the woman’s possession, without her consuming it, no part of it can be demanded of her, according to all the doctors, whereas, if it were a return, it might be demanded in a case of destruction, as well as in one of consumption, nor would there be any difference between the two.—It is recorded from Mohammed that if the proportion advanced do not exceed that of one month; no restitution is required, as this proportion is inconsiderable, and stands as an allowance for present use.

A slave may be sold for the maintenance of his wife, if the latter be free.—Is a slave marry a free woman, her maintenance is a debt upon him, for the discharge of which he may be sold; but this is only provided the marriage was with his owner’s consent, as her maintenance being due from the slave the obligation to it must ultimately affect his owner; the debt is therefore charged to the slave, in the same manner as one contracted in trade by a Mazoon, or privileged slave; but his owner is at liberty to redeem him by discharging the debt, because the woman’s right extends to her maintenance only, not to the slave’s person: and if the slave die, her right to any arrear of maintenance drops (and so also where he is killed), since it is a gratuity, as was already stated.

A husband must maintain his wife, being a slave, were she resides with him.—If a man marry the female slave of another, and her owner give her permission to reside in her husband’s house, her maintenance is incumbent upon the husband, because she is then within his custody: but if she have not permission to reside with her husband, he is not responsible for her maintenance, as in this case her custody is not established.

The term here applied to the permission granted by the master [taboweeat] means not only liberty to reside in the husband’s habitation, but also an exemption from all service; wherefore, if any service be afterwards required of her, the maintenance from the husband drops, as custody which is the ground of her right to maintenance from him, necessarily ceases on such an occasion.

It is lawful for the master to require the service of his female slave, although she have granted her leave to reside with his husband, because such leave is not binding upon him, as is demonstrated in its proper place.

But it is to be observed that if the female slave voluntarily perform her master’s service, without his calling upon her, her right to maintenance from her husband does not drop.

And the same of Am-Walids.—These rules apply equally to Am-Walids as to absolute slaves.

Section II.

A wife must be accommodated with a separate apartment.—It is incumbent upon a husband to provide a separate apartment for his wife’s habitation, to be solely and exclusively appropriated to her use, so as that none of the husband’s family, or others, may enter without her permission and desire, because this is essentially necessary to her, and is therefore due the same as maintenance, for the word of God appoints her a dwellings-house as well as a subsistence; and as it is incumbent upon a husband to provide a habitation for his wife, so he is not at liberty to admit any person to a share in it, as this would be injurious to her by endangering her property, and obstructing her enjoyment of his society; but if she desire it, the husband may then lawfully admit a partner in the habitation, as she by such a request voluntarily relinquishes her right; neither is the husband at liberty to intrude upon his wife his child by another woman, for the same reason.
DIVORCE.

If the husband appoint his wife an apartment within his own house, giving her the lock and key, it is sufficient, as the end is by this means fully obtained.

But under the control of her husband, with respect to visitors, &c—A husband is at liberty to prevent his wife’s parents, or other relations, or her children by a former marriage, from coming in to her, as her apartment or habitation is his property, which may lawfully prevent any person from entering; but he cannot prohibit them from seeing and conversing with her whenever they please, for if he were to do so, it would induce Katta Rihm, or a breach of the ties of kindred, and their seeing or conversing with her is in no respect injurious to him. Some have said that he cannot prohibit them from coming in to her, any more than from conversing with or seeing her, but he may prevent them from residing with her, as this might cause disturbance and inconvenience. Others have said that he cannot prohibit his wife from going to visit her parents, nor prevent the parents from visiting her every Friday; neither can he forbid her other relations from visiting her once a year; and this is approved.

Maintenance to the wife of an absentee is decreed out of his substance.—If a woman’s husband absent himself, leaving effects in the hands of any person, and that person acknowledge the deposit, and admit the woman to be the wife of the absentee, the Kazee must decree a maintenance to her out of the said effects; and the same to the infant children of the absentee, and also to his parents. And the rule is the same if the Kazee himself be acquainted with the above two circumstances, where the trustee denies both or either of them.—The argument upon which this proceeds is that where the above person acknowledges the woman to be the wife of the absentee, and also, that he has property of the latter in his hands, such acknowledgment amounts to an avowal of her being entitled to receive her right out of the said property, without the husband’s consent, as a woman is authorized to it by law.

Objection.—If a woman be decreed her maintenance out of the effects of her absent husband, in consequence of the trustee’s acknowledgment, this admits the judgment of a magistrate against an absentee, which is illegal.

Reply.—The order of the Kazee is not in this case directly against an absentee, but only virtually, and by implication, because the above person is the Zoo-al-Yed, or immediate possessor of the property, and the acknowledgment of such one is to be credited in anything affecting his trust, but more especially in the present case, since if he were to deny either the marriage or the deposit it would not be in the woman’s power to sue him, for if she do so, and produce witnesses in support of her plea, their evidence could not be received, as a trustee cannot be sued on a plea of marriage; nor can the woman appear as a plaintiff against him with respect to the property in his hands, since she is not the husband’s agent: and the trustee’s acknowledgment being credited, the Kazee, in consequence of it, issues a decree for the wife’s maintenance, which must affect the husband of course; and the decree of a Kazee, affecting an absentee in this way, is approved.—If, moreover, the property of the absentee be in the hands of the person aforesaid in the way of Mozaribat, or as a debt, the rule holds the same as if it were a deposit.

Unless that be of a nature different from what is necessary to her support.—What is now said supposes the property to be of the same nature with the woman’s right, such as money, grain or cloth: but where it is otherwise, a maintenance must not be decreed out of it, because, in this case, it cannot be furnished from it but by selling a part, and defraying the expense of it out of the amount; and all our doctors agree that the property of an absentee cannot be sold.——Haneefa is of this opinion, because the Kazee cannot sell the effects even of a person on the spot, but must require him to sell them, and discharge the maintenance with the amount; and consequently he is prohibited from selling the property of an absentee, a fortiori. The two disciples also are of the same opinion, because, although they hold that the Kazee may dispose of the property of a person on the spot, for the discharge of his wife’s maintenance, without his consent, yet this is only where he refuses to do so; but the property of an absentee cannot be thus disposed of, as his refusal is not known.

But she must give security that she has not already received anything in advance.—When the Kazee decrees a woman her maintenance out of the effects of her absent husband, it behoves him to take security from her for whatever she receives for the indemnity of the absentee, as it is possible that she may already have received her maintenance in advance, or that she may have been divorced, and her Edit be passed; and the Kazee must also require her to make oath that she has not received any part of her maintenance in advance: contrary to a case where the Kazee makes a distribution of inheritance among present heirs, according to evidence, and they do not deny any knowledge of another heir, for in this case he does not require a similar security from them on behalf of another heir, who may hereafter appear, because the Makfoo-le-hoo, or surety, is that unknown and undefined; but in the present case the surety is known, being the absent husband.

*Although, by the customs of the east, men are not permitted to enter into the women’s apartments without especial permission, yet it is not uncommon to converse with a woman through a curtain, or (as some part of this passage seems to imply) through a gate.

It can be decreed only to the wife, infant children, or parents of the absentee—A Kazee cannot decree maintenance, out of the effects of an absentee, in behalf of any but those already mentioned (namely, the wife, infant children, and parents of the absentee), as they alone are authorized to receive a maintenance independent of any decree of the Kazee (that, in the present case, being only in aid of their right), whereas the other relations within the prohibited degrees are not entitled to any maintenance without a decree of the Kazee previously obtained for that purpose, as the obligation of it with respect to them varies according to circumstances, wherefore the Kazee decreeing it to them would amount to a judgment against an absentee, which is not allowed.

No decree can be issued against an absentee's property upon the bare testimony of his wife.—If the Kazee himself be not assured that the woman is the wife of the absentee and the trustee factor, or debtor, do not acknowledge her to be so, and she should offer to produce witnesses to prove that she is so,—or, if the absentee should not have left any effects and she offers to prove her marriage by evidence, with a view to obtain a decree authorizing her to procure a maintenance upon the absentee's credit; still the Kazee cannot issue a decree accordingly, because this would be a judgment against an absentee, which is inadmissible.—Zifler says that it is the duty of the Kazee to hear the proofs, and (although he cannot decree the marriage to be thereby established) to order her a maintenance, as this is a tenderness due to her, and no injury to the absentee; because, if he should afterwards appear and confirm her assertion, she has only taken what was her right,—or, if he should deny the marriage, an oath will be tendered to her (in case of her having no witnesses), and if she decline swearing, his assertion remains established; but if she prove her assertion by evidence, her right is established; and if she cannot produce any proof, and he swear she or her bail then remain responsible. The author of this work says that it is the duty of the Kazee, in the present instance, to decree maintenance to the absentee's wife, from necessity.

Section III

A divorced wife is entitled to maintenance during her Edit.—Where a man divorces his wife, her subsistence and lodging are incumbent upon him during the term of her Edit, whether the divorce be of the reversible or irreversible kind.—Shafei says that no maintenance is due to a woman repudiated by irreversible divorce, unless she be pregnant.

The reason for maintenance being due to a woman under reversible divorce is that the marriage in such a case is still held to continue in force, especially according to our doctors, who on this principle maintain that it is lawful for a man to have carnal connexion with a wife still repudiated.—With respect to a case of irreversible divorce, the arguments of Shafei are twofold: First, Kattima Bint Kays has said, "My husband repudiated me by three divorces, and the Prophet did not appoint to me either a place of residence or a subsistence; "—Secondly, the matrimonial property is thereby terminated, and the maintenance is held, by Shafei, to be a return for such property (whence it is that a woman's right to maintenance drops upon the death of her husband, as the matrimonial property is dissolved by that event); but it would be otherwise if a woman repudiated by irreversible divorce be pregnant at the time of divorce, as in this case the obligation of maintenance appears, in the sacred writings, which expressly direct it to a woman under such a circumstance. The argument of our doctors is that maintenance is a return for custody (as was before observed), and custody still continues, on account of that which is the chief end of marriage, namely, offspring (as the intent of Edit is to ascertain whether the woman be pregnant or not), wherefore subsistence is due to her, as well as lodging, which last is admitted by all to be her right; thus the case is the same as if she were actually pregnant; moreover, Omar has recorded a precept of the Prophet, to the effect that "maintenance is due to a woman 'divorced thrice during her Edit':"—there are also a variety of traditions to the same purpose.

No maintenance due to a widow.—Maintenance is not due to a woman after her husband's decease, because her subsequent confinement [during the term of Edit, in consequence of that event] is not on account of the right of her husband, but of the law, the Edit of widowhood being merely a religious observance, whence it is that the design of ascertaining the state of her womb is not in this instance regarded, and accordingly the Edit is not counted by the menstrual terms, but by time; maintenance is moreover due to a woman from day to day, and the husband's right in his property ceasing upon his decease, it is impossible that any maintenance should be made due from what is, after that event, the property of his heirs.

Nor to a wife in whom the separation originates.—When the separation originates with the woman, from anything which can be imputed to her as a crime, such as apostatizing from the faith, or having carnal connexion or dalliance with the son of her husband, she has no claim to maintenance during it, since she has deprived her husband of her person unrighteously, in the same manner as if she were to go out of his house without permission.

Unless it originate in a circumstance not criminal —But it is otherwise where the separation originates with the woman from a circumstance which cannot be imputed to her as a crime, as in a case of option of puberty or manumission, or of a separation demanded by her on account of inequality, in all which cases she remains entitled to maintenance during it, as she has here legally withdrawn herself from her husband, in the same manner as where she keeps herself from him on account of non-payment of her dower.

A wife who apostatize has no right to maintenance. —If a woman under triple divorce apostatize from the faith, her maintenance drops; but if one in the same circumstance commits the son of her husband to carnal connexions, still her right to maintenance continues because here the divorce has not been caused by the apostasy or the incest of the woman; but the apostate is imprisoned until such time as she may repent; and a husband is not under any obligation to provide a maintenance for his wife if she be a prisoner whereas a woman who admits the son of her husband to carnal connexion is not liable to imprisonment on that account; which makes an essential difference between the two cases.

Section IV.

A father must provide for the maintenance of his infant children. —The maintenance of infant children rests upon their father; and no person can be his associate or partner in furnishing it (in the same manner as no person is admitted to be associated with a husband in providing for the maintenance of his wife), because the word of God, in the Koran, says, "THE MAINTENANCE OF THE WOMAN WHO SUCKLES AN INFANT RESTS UPON HIM TO WHOM THE INFANT IS BORN" (that is upon the father), from which it appears that the maintenance of an infant child also rests upon the father, because, as maintenance is decreed to the nurse on account of her sustaining the child with her milk, it follows that the same is due to the child himself a fortiori.

A mother is not required to suckle her infant. —If the child be an infant at the breast, there is no obligation upon the mother to suckle it, because the infant's maintenance rests upon the father, and in the same manner the hire of a nurse; it is possible, moreover, that the mother may not be able to suckle it, from want of health or other sufficient excuse, in which case any constraint upon her for that purpose would be an act of injustice.

Except where a nurse cannot be procured. —What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of a nurse being easily procured; but where this is not the case, the mother may be constrained to take that office upon herself, lest the infant perish.

The father must provide a nurse. —It is the part of a father to hire a woman to suckle his infant child, as this is a duty incumbent upon him; and it is necessary that the nurse so hired stay with or near the mother, if the latter desire it, as the child must be with its mother, she having the right of Hizanit. But he cannot hire the child's nurse in that capacity. —But it is not lawful for the father to hire the mother of the child as its nurse, if she be his wife, or divorced from him; and in her Edit — because, although suckling her child be not incumbent upon a mother in point of law, yet it is so in point of religion, the word of God in the Koran saying, "IT BEHOVES MOTHERS TO SUCKLE THEIR CHILDREN"; and a mother is excused from this duty only on the supposition of incapacity; but if she agree to perform it for a compensation, this is an acknowledgment of her capacity, making the duty incumbent upon her without consideration however. This rule obtains (as above observed) where the mother is either actually the wife of the father, or reversibly divorced from him, and in her Edit, in which case the marriage still continues in force; and (according to one tradition) this also is the rule where the mother was in her Edit from irreversible divorce; but another tradition says that such a person may be lawfully hired by the father as a nurse, because her marriage no longer remains in force. —The argument in favour of the former tradition is that the marriage still continues in force with respect to some of its obligations, such, as the provision of food, lodging, and so forth. Yet he may hire any other of his wives for that purpose. —But a father may lawfully hire, to suckle his child, one of his wives, who is not the child's mother, as suckling it is not a duty incumbent upon her.

Or the child's mother, after the expiration of her Edit. —He may also lawfully hire the mother of the child herself for this office, where her Edit from divorce has been completed, because when that is past the marriage no longer remains in force in any respect, and the woman may then be hired as well as any indifferent person. —In this case, however, if the father offer to hire any strange woman to suckle his child, and the mother offer to perform that office either for the same hire, or gratis, she has the prior right, as it is to be supposed that she feels a tenderness for the child beyond any other person, wherefore regard for the child dictates that it should be committed to her in preference to any other. But if the mother require higher wages than the stranger, the father cannot be compelled to give her a preference, as this would be unjust.

Difference of religion makes no difference as to the obligations of furnishing maintenance to a wife or child. —The maintenance of an infant child is incumbent upon the father, although he be of a different religion: and, in the same manner, the maintenance of a wife is incumbent upon her husband, notwithstanding this circumstance;—the first, because the word offspring, in the sacred text (as before quoted) is of general application, and also because the child is a partaker of the father's flesh and blood, and consequently is a part of him;—and the second, because the occasion of the obligation of maintenance (namely, a valid marriage) may exist between a Mussulman and an infidel woman.

The maintenance of children incumbent upon the father only where they possess no independent property.—It is to be observed that what has been asserted respecting the maintenance of infant children being incumbent upon the father, obtains only where the child is not possessed of any property;—but where the child is possessed of property, the maintenance is provided from that, as it is a rule that every person's maintenance must be furnished from his own substance, whether he be an infant or an adult.

Section V.

A man must provide a maintenance for his indigent parents.—It is incumbent upon a man to provide maintenance for his father, mother, grandparents, and grandmothers if they should happen to be in necessitous circumstances, although they be of a different religion—for his father and mother, because the text of the Koran, upon this point, was revealed respecting the father and mother of a Mussulman, who were infidels:—and for his grandparents and grandmothers because a grandfather is as a father, and a grandmother as a mother; the former being vested with the authority of a father, in all points of guardianship and inheritance, in defect of the father, and the grandmother being the mother's substitute, in defect of her, with respect to Hizanit, and so forth: but their poverty is made a condition of the obligation, because, they be possessed of property, their maintenance must be provided from that, rather than from the property of any other person:—and difference of religion is no objection, with respect to grandparents, because of the text above mentioned.

Difference of religion forbids the obligation to the maintenance of any relations except a wife, parents, or children.—It is to be observed, however, that in the case of difference of religion, a man is under no obligation to provide maintenance for any except his wife, his parents, grandparents, children, and grandchildren, to all of whom it is due, notwithstanding this circumstance:—to the wife because (as was already stated) the cause of the obligation of maintenance to her is custody for the purpose of enjoyment under a valid contract; and the establishment of this cause does not depend upon unity of sect or religion, as it perfectly exists where the wife is a Christian (for instance) and her husband a Mussulman:—and to the parents and others, as enumerated above, because, between the child and parent exists a common participation of blood, and he who participates of another's blood is, in fact, the same as the participatee himself; and as a man's infidelity is no objection to his providing his own maintenance out of his own property, it follows that the same circumstance can be no objection with respect to one who is a part of him.

And to those also it is not due if they be aliens.—But if those relations be aliens, their maintenance is in no degree incumbent upon a Mussulman, although they be Moostanim,* because the lawgiver has forbidden us from showing kindness to those with whom we are at war on account of religion.

Christian and Mussulman brothers are not obliged to maintain each other.—There is no obligation upon a Christian to provide maintenance to his brother, being a Mussulman; neither is a Mussulman under any obligation to provide for the maintenance of his brother, being a Christian; because (according to what appears in the sacred text) maintenance is connected with inheritance; and as a Mussulman and infidel cannot inherit of each other, it follows that the maintenance of either is not incumbent upon the other:—it is to be remarked, however, that this rule does not obtain with respect to the other effects of consanguinity; for if a Mussulman become possessed of his Christian brother, as a slave, the latter is virtually emancipated, on account of nearness of kindred, notwithstanding the difference of religion.

The maintenance of a parent is exclusively incumbent on the child.—The maintenance of a father and mother is incumbent upon their child alone, wherefore no man can be his partner or associate in furnishing it to them, because parents have a right in the property of their child (according to various well-known traditions), which they have not possessed with respect to that of any other person; and also, because the child is more nearly related to his parents than to any other person whatever. The maintenance to parents is equally incumbent upon a daughter as upon a son, according to the Zahir-Rawayet; and this is approved, because the principle upon which the obligation of it is founded applies equally to both.

Maintenance to other relations, besides the wife, parents, or children.—It is a man's duty to provide maintenance for all his infant male relations within the prohibited degrees, who are in poverty; and also to all female relations within the same degrees, whether infants or adults, where they are in necessity; and also to all adult male relations, within the same degrees, who are poor, and disabled, or blind: but the obligation does not extend beyond those relations, because the duties of consanguinity are not absolutely incumbent towards any, excepting the nearer (or Karrebat) degrees of kindred, and do not extend to the more distant degrees, as this would be impracticable: on this occasion, moreover, the necessity is made a condition of the obligation; and tenderness of sex, or extreme youth, or debility, or blindness, are evidences of this necessity, since persons from these circumstances are rendered incapable of earning their subsistence by labour; but this rule does not apply to parents, for if they were to labour for a subsistence, it would subject them to pain and fatigue, from which it is the express duty of their child to relieve them; and hence it is that maintenance to parents is incumbent upon the child, although they should be able to subsist by their own industry.

* That is, residing in the Mussulman state under a protection.
DIVORCE.

Maintenance is due to a relation within the prohibited degrees, in proportion to inheritance; in other words, upon him who has the greatest right of inheritance in the said relation's estate, the largest proportion of maintenance is incumbent upon him who has the smallest right, the smallest proportion, and so of the others, because it is said in the Koran, "THE MAINTENANCE OF A RELATION WITHIN THE PROHIBITED DEGREES RESTS UPON HIS HEIR," and the word heir, shows in adjusting the rate of maintenance the proportion of inheritance is to be regarded.

A father and mother must provide a maintenance to their adult daughters (and also to their adult sons who are disabled), in proportion to their respective claims of inheritance.—The maintenance to an adult daughter, or to an adult son who is disabled, rests upon the parents in three equal parts, two-thirds being furnished by the father, and one-third by the mother, because the inheritance of a father from the estate of his son or daughter is two-thirds, and that of a mother one-third. The compiler of the Hedava remarks that this is the doctrine of Khasaf and Hasan. According to the Zahir-Rawayet, the whole of the maintenance to these rests upon the father, the word of God being thus expressed, "THE MAINTENANCE OF CHILDREN RESTS UPON THOSE TO WHOM THEY ARE BORN" (as was before mentioned), and the person to whom they are born is the father, wherefore their maintenance rests upon him, in the same manner as that of his infant children: but the former doctrine proceeds upon the idea of there being two points which make an essential distinction between infant children and adults, with respect to the father; FIRST, a father is invested with the authority of guardianship over his infant child; Secondly, the maintenance to his infant child is expressly declared to rest solely and exclusively upon him; but with adults it is otherwise, as a father has no right of guardianship over them, wherefore the mother is to assist him in furnishing their maintenance in case of necessity; and as, in the maintenance of other relations, the proportion of inheritance is regarded, so in the present case, in conformity with that rule.

Sisters must furnish maintenance to an indigent brother in the same proportion—The maintenance of a brother, in poverty, rests upon his full paternal and maternal sisters, in five shares, according to their degree of inheritance; that is to say, three-fifths must be furnished by the full sisters, one-fifth by the paternal sisters, and one-fifth by the maternal. It is to be observed, however, that to the obligation of furnishing maintenance to a poor relation, the capability of inheritance only is a condition, and not the prior or more immediate right: thus if a poor man have a rich maternal aunt, and also a rich paternal uncle's son his maintenance rests upon the former in preference to the latter, although the latter would inherit of him in preference to the former, for this reason, that a maternal aunt is within the prohibited degrees, whereas a cousin-german is not. Thus, the maintenance of a relation within the prohibited degrees is not incumbent upon his heirs, if they be of a different religion because in this case, they are incapable of inheriting from him, which is the condition of the obligation.

A poor man is not required to support any of his relations except his wife or infant children.—The maintenance of relations within the prohibited degrees is not incumbent upon a person in poverty, because it is an obligation (like the other duties of consanguinity) which cannot be fulfilled by one who, on account of his situation, has a claim to that very assistance from others. But this argument does not hold with respect to a wife or infant child, for whom it is incumbent upon a man to provide subsistence notwithstanding his poverty, because in marrying he subjects himself to the expense of maintaining his wife, as otherwise the ends of marriage would be defeated, and his child from participation of blood, is a part of himself (as was before observed), for whom it is therefore his duty to find support as much as for himself.

Definition of the term rich, as here used.—Abu Yoosaf defines the term rich, as used in this chapter, to apply to a person possessed of property to the amount of a single Nisab. Mohammed says that it means a person possessed of property above what may suffice to support himself and family one month: or whose superfluity from his daily earnings enables him to afford it, because the obligation, in acts of piety, depends upon the ability generally, and not upon any special degree of it. Nisab being a proportion invested merely for convenience; decrees, however, pass according to the former opinion. By the Nisab here mentioned is understood that which is so small as to prohibit almsgiving: for instance, two hundred DIRMS: and Hawlan Hawl, or possession for a year, is not a condition of it: whence, if a man were, from a state of poverty, to become possessed of two hundred Dirms as this day, the maintenance of his poor relations becomes immediately incumbent upon him.

Maintenance to the parents of an absentee may be decreed out of his effects.—If an absentee be possessed of property, a maintenance for his parents may be decreed out of it, for the reason already mentioned; and if a father were to sell his absent son's effects, for the purpose of providing his maintenance, it is held by Haneefa to be lawful, on a principle of benevolence; but he cannot lawfully sell his lands. The two disciples say that the sale of his effects is also illegal; and this is conformable to analogy, because a father has no absolute authority over his adult son. Therefore, it is not empowered to sell his effects in his presence on any pretence, nor to do so in his absence, but for the discharge of debts which he may incur; but if the son does not apply the same reasoning as to the mother. The reason for the more favourable construction, as adopted by Haneefa, is that a father is authorized to take charge of his absent son's effects; for as the conservation of an absentee's property is allowed to devolve upon his executor, it must be admitted that it appertains to his father in a superior degree, as he is more immediately interested; and the sale of moveable property is one part of conservation; wherefore the father is at liberty to sell his absent son's moveable property; but this reasoning does not apply to lands, these not being subject to conservation, as they do not require it; neither does it apply to any other than a parent, as the more distant relations are not endowed with any absolute authority whatever over an infant, nor with any power of conservation over the effects of an adult. And where a father thus sells the property of his absent son, if the price he receives for it be of the same nature with his right (namely, maintenance), he is at liberty to take his right therefrom; and in the same manner, if a father dispose of the effects or lands of his infant son, he is at liberty to take his maintenance out of the price, that being of the same nature with his right.

The parents of an absentee may take their maintenance out of his effects; but a trustee cannot provide it in that manner without a decree.—If the effects of an absent son be in the hands of his parents, and they take their maintenance from them, they are not responsible, as what they take in this manner is their right, a maintenance being their due, independent of any decree from the Kazee but if the effects be in the hands of a stranger, and he furnishes the maintenance to the parents therefrom, without a decree from the Kazee, he is responsible, as he in that case takes upon him to dispose of the property of another without authority, since he is no more than merely the absentee's agent for conservation (contrary to where he acts under the Kazee's orders, in which case he is not responsible, as these are absolute and indispenable); and being thus responsible, he has no right to seek indemnification from the parents, because in assuming the responsibility, he, in fact, becomes proprietor, and then appears to have given the property to the parents gratuitously.

Arrear not due in a decreed maintenance.—If the Kazee decree a maintenance to children, or to parents, or to relations within the prohibited degrees, and some time should elapse without their receiving any, their right to maintenance ceases, because it is due only so far as may suffice, according to their necessity (whence it is not so to those who are opulent), and they being able to suffer a considerable portion of time to pass without demanding or receiving it, it is evident that they have a sufficiency, and are under no necessity of seeking a maintenance from others; consequently, the Kazee decrees a maintenance to a wife, and a space of time elapses without her receiving any, for her right to maintenance does not cease on account of her independence, because it is her due, whether she be rich or poor.

Unless where it is decreed to be provided upon the absentee's credit.—What has been observed on this occasion applies to cases only in which the Kazee has not authorized the parties to provide themselves a maintenance upon the absentee's credit: but where he has so authorized them, their right to maintenance does not cease in consequence of a length of time passing without their receiving any, because the authority of the Kazee is universal, and hence his order to provide a maintenance upon credit is equal to that of the absentee himself, wherefore the proportion of maintenance for the time so elapsed is a debt upon the absentee, and does not cease from that circumstance. The time here meant is any term beyond a month; and if the time elapsed be short of that term, maintenance does not cease.

Section VI.

Maintenance of slaves incumbent upon their owner.—The maintenance of male and female slaves is incumbent upon their owner, because the Prophet has said concerning them "they are your brethren, whom God has placed in your hands, wherefore give them such food as ye yourselves eat, and such raiment as ye yourselves are clothed with, and afflict not the servants of your God;" if, therefore, the owner do not provide their maintenance and they be capable of labour, they must be permitted to work for their own subsistence, as this is tenderness not only to the slaves, but also to his master, being equally advantageous to both; since the life of the slave is thereby preserved, at the same time that the owner's property in him continues unaffected. But if the slave be incapable of labour (as where a male slave, for instance, is deprived of the use of his limbs, or where a female is unfit to hire on account of extreme youth or tender habit), the owner must then be compelled either to provide their maintenance, or to sell them, because slaves are claimants of right notwithstanding their bondage, and by sale their right is obtained, at the same time that the owner's right is also preserved to him by his acquisition of an equivalent in the price for which he disposes of them.—This rule does not hold with respect to other living property (such as horses, and so forth), because cattle are not claimants of right, and consequently the owner is not compelled to an alternative with respect to them, as in the case of slaves: but yet men are directed to furnish their cattle with subsistence on a principle of piety, as the neglect of this is cruelty towards the creature, and at the same time destructive of property, which is forbidden by the Prophet.—Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that the owner of cattle may be compelled to furnish them a proper and sufficient subsistence: but it is the more approved doctrine that he is not liable to any compulsion on that head.

Oath [of a sinful nature] are the three kinds.—Oaths are of three different kinds:—First, Ghamoos; Second, Moonakid (which is also termed Makoodat); and Third, Lighoo.

Perjury.—A YAMEN GHAMOOS signifies an oath taken concerning a thing already past, in which is conveyed an intentional falsehood on the part of the swearer:—and such an oath is highly sinful; the Prophet having declared — "whosoever swareth falsely, the same shall God condemn to hell,", KAFARA, or expiation, is not incumbent (that is to say, is of no avail) in a Yameen Ghamoos; but a repentance and despopulation of the anger of heaven are incumbent.—Shafei alleges that expiation is incumbent, because that was ordained for the purpose of doing away any disrespect shown to the name of God, which is sinful; and this disrespect is evident in a Yameen Ghamoos, as it is calling God to witness to a falsehood; a Yameen Ghamoos is therefore the same as a Yameen, Moonakid; and as, in that, expiation is incumbent, so in this likewise The argument of our doctors is that a Yameen Ghamoos is a crime of great magnitude (or deadly sin),—and expiation is an act of piety (whence it may be fulfilled by fasting, and intention is a condition of it): but there is no expiation for a deadly sin, and consequently there is none for a Yameen Ghamoos: contrary to the case of a Yameen Moonakid, as that falls under the class of Mobah, or things indifferent.

Objection.—The description of Mobah, or indifferent, applies to things in which there is no offence: now as a Yameen Moonakid is of an offensive nature, how can it be Mobah?

* Literally, a false oath, or perjury.—It is here proper to observe that the distinctions explained in this chapter relate solely to such oaths or vows as, being false or broken, are sinful, and consequently supposed to excite the divine anger, which must be appeased by expiation; contrary to true oaths, or to vows duly fulfilled; as the former of these are frequently required for the sake of justice, and the latter are permitted, whence neither an oath nor vow, simply as such, can be supposed to require expiation.

Reply.—The offence, in a Yameen Moonakid, occurs subsequently to the declaration of it, and is occasioned by a disrespect shown by the vower to the name of God, of his own free option; whereas the offence, in a Yameen Chamoos, exists from the first: and surmounting the case, a Yameen Chamoos is not to be confounded with a Yameen Moonakid.

Contracted vows (when not fulfilled).—A Yameen Moonakid* signifies an oath taken concerning a matter which is to come.—Thus a man swears that he will do such a thing, or he will not do such a thing; and where the pronouncer fails in this—that is, where he does not act according to the obligation of his oath)—expiation is incumbent upon him: and this is established upon the authority of the sacred writings.

And inconscionable oaths.—A Yameen Lighoo is an oath taken concerning an incident or transaction already past, where the swearer believes that the matter to which he thus bears testimony accords with what he swears, and it should happen to be actually otherwise: and from the divine mercy it may be hoped that the swearer will not be condemned for such an oath, since God has declared, in the Koran, "I will not call you to account for an inconscionable oath." An instance of Yameen Lighoos is where a person sees Amroo passing at a distance, and supposing him to be Zeyd, says, "by God that is Zeyd!"

Expiation is incumbent, whether the vow be wilful or compulsory, or although the oath be taken under a deception of the memory.—A Wilful vow, and a compulsory vow, and an oath taken under a deception of the memory, are all the same, and on account of each expiation is incumbent,† because the Prophet has said, "there are three points of serious import, the sporting with which is also serious, to wit. marriage, divorce, and a vow."—Shafel, controverts this doctrine.—His arguments will be hereafter recited at large under the head of Ikrah, or compulsory process.

The violation of a vow, whether by compulsion or through forgetfulness, requires expulsion.—If a man do a thing which breaks his vow, either by compulsion, or through forgetfulness, these are both the same, and expiation is incumbent upon him in either case, because the specified act which is the condition of expiation is not made void by the circumstances of compulsion or forgetfulness:—and so also, if the thing should be done by a maniac or an idiot,—because there likewise the condition is actually fulfilled.

Objection.—Expiation is not incumbent but for the purpose of obliterating a sin now no sin can be imputed to maniacs or idiots, as such are not made answerable; it would therefore follow that expiation is not incumbent upon them.

Reply.—Although expiation be intended for the purpose of expunging sin, yet the obligation of in this case rests upon the argument of a sin (namely, the breach of a vow), and not upon the actual sin itself, so that, wherever the breach of a vow appears, expiation is incumbent.

CHAPTER II.

OF WHAT CONSTITUTES AN OATH OR VOW, AND WHAT DOES NOT CONSTITUTE IT.

An oath may be expressed by using the name of God, or any of his customary attributes.—Yameen (that is, an oath or vow) is constituted by the use of the name of Almighty God, or of any of those appellations by which the Deity is generally known and understood, such as Rihman and Rishem.* An oath may also be expressed by such attributes of the Deity as are commonly used in swearing, such as the power, or the glory, or the might of God, because an oath is usually expressed under one or other of those qualities; and the sense of Yameen, namely, strength, is by this means obtained, since as the swearer believes in the power, glory, might, and other attributes of the Deity, it follows that the mention of these attributes only is sufficient to strengthen the resolution in the performance of the act vowed, or the avoidance thereof.

Excepting his knowledge, wrath, or mercy.

—If a man swear "by the knowledge of God," it does not constitute an oath, because an oath expressed by the knowledge of God is not in use; moreover, by knowledge is frequently implied merely that which is known; and in this sense the word knowledge is not expressive either of the name of God, or of any of his attributes.—In the same manner, should a person swear "by the wrath of God," or "by the mercy of God," it does not constitute an oath, because an oath is not commonly expressed by any of these attributes: moreover, by the word Rihmat [mercy] is sometimes understood rain, and heaven is also occasionally expressed by that term; and by the word Ghazb [wrath] is understood punishment; and none of these are either appellations or attributes of the Deity.

It is not constituted by using any other name.—If a person swear by any other name than that of God,—such as the Prophet, or the holy temple, this does not constitute an oath,—as the Prophet has said, "if any man among ye take an oath, he must swear by the name of God, or else his oath is void." If a person also swear by the Koran, it does not constitute an oath, although the Koran be the word of God, because men do not swear by the Koran. The compiler of the Hadeya observes that this is where the swearer only says "by the Prophet," or "by the temple," or "by the Koran;" but if the swearer say, "if I act contrary to what I now say, may I be deprived of the Prophet," or "of the temple," or "of the Koran;" this constitutes an oath, because such privation would reduce the swearer to the state of an infidel, and the suspension of infidelity upon a condition amounts to Yemen.

Particles of swearing: An oath is confirmed by the use of the particles of swearing and these (in the Arabic) are three, namely, the letters, waw, and be, and te, as oaths are commonly repeated and understood under this form; and in this sense these particles occur in the Koran. Let it also be observed that the particles of swearing are sometimes understood, though not expressed, that is, are omitted in the expression, although implied in the sense; and this constitutes an oath: as if a man were to say, "God, I will not do this: because [in the Arabic] it is common to reject the particle for the sake of brevity: sometimes indeed the letter lam is used for the swearing particle, as it is capable according to (Mooktarf) of being substituted for be.

Swearing by the truth of God is not an oath.—Haneefa alleges that if a man should swear "by the truth of God," this does not constitute an oath, and in this Imam Mohammed coincides. There are two opinions of Aboo Yoosaf recorded at this point: according to one it is not an oath; but according to the other it is an oath. Because truth is one of the attributes of the Deity, signifying the certainty of the divine existence, and hence it is the same as if the swearer were to say, "by God, truth!" and as oaths are common under this mode of expression, an oath is here constituted. The argument of Mohammed and Haneefa is that the term "the truth," as here expressed, relates merely to the identity of the godhead as the object of obedience, and hence an oath thus expressed appears to be taken by that which is neither an appellation nor an attribute of God. The learned, however, say, that if a person express himself thus, "by the truth, I will do so and so," this constitutes an oath, because the truth is one of the attributes or proper names of God. But, if a person were to say "I will do this truly," it does not amount to an oath, because the word truly can only be taken, in this case, as a corroboration or confirmation of the promise contained in the speech, being the same as if he were to say "I shall do this indeed."

The expressions "I swear," "I vow," or "I testify," constitute an oath, without the name of God.—If a man say, "I swear," or "I vow," or "testify," whether the words "by God" be superadded or not, it constitutes an oath, because such words are commonly used in swearing: the use of them in the present tense is undisputed; and they are also sometimes used in the future tense, where the context admits of a construction in the present; and attestation amounts to an oath, as in that sense it occurs in the sacred writings: now swearing by the name of God is both customary and conformable to the divine ordinances, but without the name of God it is forbidden; when it so occurs, therefore, it must be construed into a lawful oath: hence, some say, that intention is not requisite in it; others, however, allege that the intention is essential, because the words here recited bear the construction of a promise,—that is, they admit of being received as applying to the future, and also of being taken as a vow without the name of God.

If a person, speaking in the Persian language, were to say, "I swear by God," it amounts to an oath, because the idiom confines the expression solely to the present; but, if he were to say, "I swear," or "I swear by the divorce of my wife," this is not an oath as an oath is not so expressed in practice.

Swearing by the existence of God makes an oath.—If a man, in swearing, say, "by the age," or "the existence" (of God), it constitutes an oath, because the age or existence of God signifies His eternity; which is one of His attributes. [Several] other forms of swearing are here recited, but of no consequence, as their validity or nullity depends altogether upon certain peculiarities in the Arabic idiom.]

A vow may be contracted by the imposition of a conditional penalty.—If a person should say, "if I do this may I be a Jew," or "a Christian," or "an infidel," it constitutes an oath, because, as the swearer has made the condition a sign of infidelity, it follows that he is conscious of his obligation to avoid the condition; and this obligation is possible, by his making it an oath, in such a way as to render unlawful to himself that which is lawful. —And if the oath relate to any thing which he has done in the time past, as if he were to say, "if I have done so..."

*That is, the superaddition of the expression, "by God," must be understood in it, so as to make it appear an oath made conformably to the divine ordinance, lest the swearer, by swearing in a way that is forbidden, be found guilty of an offence.

*Each of these letters, prefixed to the name of God, is expressive of the English by.
†A celebrated Arabic grammarian and rhetorician.
may I be a Jew," or "an infidel," and so forth, this is a Yameen Ghamoos, or perjury. The swearer is not, however, in this case made a Jew or an infidel, because the words, "may I be an infidel" (and so forth), relate to some future indefinite period. Some, on the contrary, have alleged that he becomes actually as an infidel, because the penalty which the swearer impicates upon himself relates to the present instant of his testimony, being the same as if he were to say, "I am a Jew, &c. But the fact is, the swearer does not become a Jew or infidel in either of the case before us (that is, in that of a vow with respect to the future, or an oath regarding the past), provided he consider this merely as a form of swearing; but if he believe that by thus swearing he fully subjects himself to the penalty expressed, he suffers accordingly, in either instance, because he appears consenting to infidelity, on account of having ventured upon a thing by the commission of which he conceives that he may be rendered an infidel. If a person say, "if I do thus, may the anger of God fall upon me," this does not constitute a vow, as not being a customary mode of expression for that purpose. And so, also, if a person were to say, "may I be an adulterer," or "a drunkard," or "an usurer," because these are not generally understood or received as form, of swearing.

CHAPTER III.

OF KAFARA, OR EXPIATION. §

A vow may be expiated by the emancipation of a slave; the distribution of alms. —The expiation of a vow is effected by the emancipation of a slave; and the emancipation of such a slave as suffices in Zihar, suffices also in the case of a vow: —or if the swearer choose, let him clothe ten paupers, giving to each one piece of cloth, or more (the smallest quantity to each is as much as is necessary in prayer); —or if he please, let him distribute victuals among ten paupers, the same as in the expiation of Zihar —All these modes of effecting the expiation of a vow are authorized in the Koran, according to the words in the text, —"the expiation thereof may be effected by feeding ten poor persons with such food as is usually consumed in your families, or by clothing ten poor persons, or by the release of a slave." It is manifest, therefore, that, in the present instance, one of these three modes is indispensable.

Or fasting. —But if the delinquent (from his poverty, or other cause) should not be able to effect his expiation in any of these three modes, he may do it by fasting three days successively. Shafei says that he has an option; if he think proper, he may fast for three days successively, or for any three separate days, —because the words of the Koran are, "if he be unable to do this, let him fast for three days," which expression is general. —The Haneefite doctors, in support of their opinion upon this point, quote the authority of the reading of Abdool Ibn Massaood, who expounds the text to mean three days successively; and this accords with what occurs in the Hadeez Mashhoor. —With respect to what has been said of the smallest quantity of cloth sufficient in expiation it is recorded from Imam Mohammed. —Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf assert that the smallest quantity of cloth proper upon this occasion is as much as may be sufficient to clothe nearly the whole body; for a mere Shilwar is not sufficient; and this is the more authentic doctrine; because one who is only thus clothed is regarded as naked. —That portion of cloth, however, which may not suffice in regard to clothing, may be sufficient in eating, according to its value: that is, if a person were to bestow, as an expiation, such a quantity of cloth as, although it may not suffice for the proper clothing, yet is equal in value to the feeding of ten poor men, it suffices as a feeding expiation, whether such may have been the intention or not. —Thus, if the person to make expiation were to give to each poor person the half of a proper dress (for instance), this would not be sufficient for an expiation by clothing; but if the value of the cloth thus distributed to each be equal to the price of three pounds of wheat, it suffices as an expiation by feeding.

Previous expiation does not suffice. —If a person perform the expiation before the violation of his vow, it does not suffice. —Shafei maintains that it suffices, where the expiation is effected by means of property, and not by fasting, because the expiater makes his atonement posterior to the occasion of it, (narrowly, his vow), and hence the case is the same as that of a pilgrim performing expiation for wounding game. —that is, if the pilgrim perform expiation after the act of wounding, it suffices; and so also in the present case. The argument of our doctors is that expiation is ordained as an atonement for offence; but in the case before us no offence has yet appeared. —In reply to what is advanced by Shafei, they observe that the vow is not the occasion of the offence, as nothing can be considered in any degree the occasion of an offence, but what necessarily leads thereto, and a vow does not necessarily lead to its own violation, but is rather prohibitory of it; hence the vow is not the cause of the offence in the present instance; contrary to the case of the pilgrim, adduced by Shafei, in which the wound inflicted upon the deer leads to its destruction, by ultimately occasioning its death; hence it is to be understood that whatever the expiater may have given to the poor before the violation of his vow, he must not take back again, because this is alms, and it is not lawful for a man to take back his alms.

A sinful vow must be broken and expiated. —If a man bind himself, by a vow, to the commission of a sin, as if he were to swear, "by God I will not pray," or "I will not converse with my father," or "I will murder such an one in such a month," it is incumbent upon him to violate his vow, and perform an expiation, because it is recorded in the traditions that if a man vow a thing, knowing that the neglect is preferable to the fulfilment, he ought to act accordingly, performing an expiation for the breach of his vow.

The vows of infidels, being nugatory, cannot be held as violated. —If an infidel should make a vow, and afterwards violate the same, either as an infidel or as a Musulman, (supposing him to have been converted to the faith in the interim), still he is not forswn, because he was not competent to make a vow; as a vow is contracted (that is, is made binding) by a reverence for the name of God, and the vow, whilst he was an infidel, cannot be supposed to have entertained any reverence for the name of God: —an infidel, moreover, is not competent to the performance of expiation, as that is an act of piety.

* In reciting these forms of vows the address ["by God," or "I swear" &c.] is for the sake of brevity, omitted; it is always, however, to be understood.
and there are decrees upon record to this effect. It is also proper that the same rule should hold where the vow is pronounced in the Persian tongue, for the sake of general application. Let it be observed, however, that if a man were to say, "whateover I have in my right hand is unlawful to me," there is a difference among casuists concerning the effect of it; some doctors say that the intention is a condition, whilst others maintain that it is not so; it is evident, however, that divorce takes place from it, independent of the intention, on account of custom.

A vow is binding without any condition annexed.—If a person express a vow in general terms, that is, not suspended upon a condition as if he were to say, "I shall fast upon such a day for the sake of God," he is bound to the observance thereof, because it is said, in the traditions, "whoever makes a vow, and specifies it, he is bound to the observance of what he has so specified." If a person suspend a vow on a condition, and afterwards occur, he is bound to the performance of what he has vowed; and expiation is here of no avail, because the tradition above recited is general—that is, applies to a suspended as well as an unsuspended vow; and also, because a vow suspended upon a condition becomes, upon the condition taking place, the same as one of immediate performance.—It is recorded of Haneef, that he receded from this doctrine, alleging that if a man were to say (for instance), "if I do so, I am under obligation to perform a pilgrimage," or "to fast a year," or "to bestow all my property in alms," and then perform an expiation for his vow, it suffices; and such is the opinion of Mohammed. If, however, the vow should not make an expiation, but perform the thing which he had specified, he is discharged from the obligation of that also, provided the condition be of such a nature as that the vower had no intention it should ever take place. The reason of this is that, where the condition is of the description now mentioned: the speech of the vow was, as aforesaid, bears the sense of a Yameen, or suspended vow; and also of a Nuzzr, or absolute vow:—evidently of a Nuzzr, because such a form of words is commonly used to express a Nuzzr; and also of a Yameen, because the design of the person, in so speaking, is to restrain himself from doing the act which constitutes the condition; and such being the case, it remains at his option either to perform expiation, regarding his words in the light of a Yameen, or to perform the condition specified, regarding them in the light of a Nuzzr: it is otherwise, however, where the thing conditioned is not of the above-mentioned description, but is actually intended by the speaker.—as where a man (for instance) says, "if God grant me a recovery from this illness, I am under an obligation to perform a pilgrimage," for here expiation does not suffice, but it is incumbent upon him to perform the actual thing specified, because in this case the words do not bear the sense merely of Yameen, but also of an absolute vow of performance:—and this distinction is approved.

A vow pronounced with a reservation of the will of God is null.—If a person make a vow of any thing, adding, "if it please God," as if he were to say, "by God I will do this, God willing," he cannot be forsworn, because the Prophet has said, "he who vows any thing, adding, 'if it please God, cannot be forsworn.'"—It is to be observed, however, that it is a condition that the words "God willing," do follow in immediate connexion with the words preceding, because if they be pronounced separately, after having uttered the vow, it is a retraction; and a retraction in Yameen is not lawful.

CHAPTER IV.

OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO ENTRANCE INTO, OR RESIDENCE IN A PARTICULAR PLACE.

A vow against entering a house is not violated by entering a mosque, church &c.—If a person make a vow, that "he will not enter any house," and he should afterwards enter a mosque, or synagogue; or church, he is not forsworn, because a house is a place built for the purpose of dwelling in (that is of sleeping, &c.), and buildings of the above description are not designed for this purpose:—the rule is also the same, if the swearer should enter a porch or portion before the door of a house for the same reason. Some have asserted that if the portico be inclosed, in such a manner, that when the front door is shut, a person may be said to be in the house, the swearer by entering such portion violates his vow, it being customary for persons to reside and sleep in such a place; If the swearer also enter an Iwan, he is forsworn, because that is designed as an occasional residence in the hot weather, and is a species of dwelling as much as a summer or winter residence. Some have conceived that this is the case only where the Iwan has four walls [that is, where it is a complete quadrangle]: this distinction is made, because those buildings in Koofa, and other parts of Arabia, are generally so constructed: whereas, with us [that is, in Hindostan and Persia] they have commonly three walls only, being quite open in front, and therefore are not to be considered as a house.—Others, however, say that entering a lawn is a violation of the vow, whether it be constructed of three walls or of four; and this is approved.

* An Iwan is an open gallery or balcony, on the top of or adjoining to an house, the roof of which is generally supported by, piers or pillars, for the benefit of the air in the hot season.
A vow against entering a Serai is not violated by entering a ruin.—If a person swear that “he will not enter into a place” that is, into a Serai, and he afterwards enter a place which is desolate and in ruins, he is not forsworn: but if a person swear that “he will not enter such a place,” the place being then in a good and habitable state, and he should enter it after it had fallen to ruin, and been laid level with the plain, he is forsworn, because the term Daar, among both the Arabs and Persians, means any particular place, as with them it is common to say, “such a Daar is peopled,” or “such a Daar is desolate (that is, abandoned);” now an edifice is the description of the term Daar, and this description is regarded in the first of the above cases, but not in the last.

If a man take an oath saying, “I will not enter into this Daar;” and the said place should afterwards become ruined and desolate, and should again be rebuilt, or repaired, and the swearer should after that enter it, he is forsworn, according to what was before observed, that the as well on Daar will continue to be applied to the plae and murder after the destruction of the edifice which stood upon it.—but if this place, after having been ruined and desolate, should be rebuilt as a mosque; bath, or dwelling-house, and the swearer should, after that, enter it he is not forsworn because in any of these cases the term Daar is no longer applied to the place, as it is then called by another name, such as mosque, and so forth: and the same rule holds where this person enters that place after the destruction of such mosque, bath, or other public building, as may in the interim have been erected there, because the place will not recover its original name after such destruction.

A vow against entering any particular house is not broken by entering it when in ruins.—If a man swear “he will not enter such a dwelling-house,” and he should enter therein after it has been destroyed or become desolate, he is not forsworn; because the term dwelling-house is abrogated, as no person then dwells in it; whereas, if the roof only should have fallen in, and the walls remain, and he were then to enter it, he would be forsworn, because it is still considered as habitable, and the place does not lose its appellation of a dwelling-house [Bait] from that circumstance. In the same manner he is not forsworn where, the house having been destroyed and laid level with the plain, another house is built upon the same spot, and he then enters this house—because the term dwelling-house, as applied to the former house, was rendered inapplicable by the occurrence of its ruin.

A vow against entering a house is not violated by going upon the roof, or entering the portico, &c.—If a man swear that “he will not enter a certain house,” and he afterwards go on the top of the house, from the outside, he is forsworn, because the roof is a part of the house. Some have said that, with us, he is not forsworn.—In the same manner, he is forsworn if he enter the portico only of the house specified in the vow.

The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this case admits of a distinction; thus, if the portico be such as that, if the door be shut, it forms a part of the house, and it be covered in, he is forsworn, but if otherwise, he is not forsworn.—If he stand under the arch of the doorway he is also forsworn, provided the arch be so constructed as that when the door is shut it becomes included as a part of the house; but if the arch be so situated as that, after shutting the door, it is not included as a part of the dwelling, he is not forsworn, because the door is designed as a protection to the house; so that whenever the archway is not, by shutting the door, included as a part of the house, but is without the door, it is evident that it is not included in the house.

Case of vows respecting abstinence from a thing in which the vower is at present engaged.—If a man should swear “I will not enter into this house,” and that he should, at the time of swearing thus, he is not forsworn by sitting down in that house, nor unless he go out of the house, and again enter it. This is upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that the vower is forsworn, because the effect of the commencement of the act and of its continuance is one and the same; and as he would be forsworn by the commencement of the act, so he is by its continuance; but the more favourable construction is that, admitting the effect of the commencement and the continuance to be the same, yet this can only be where the act is of such a nature as to be capable of continuance, which the entrance into a place does not allow, as the word entrance simply implies passing from without to within.

If a person swear that “he will not put on a particular garment,” and should happen to have the said garment upon him at the very time of his so swearing, and should forthwith take it off, he is not forsworn. And so also a person riding upon a mule [or other beast] if he takes an oath, saying, “I will not ride upon this animal,” and should forthwith alight, he is not forsworn. In the same manner, a person residing in a house, if he swear that “he will not live in this house,” and thereupon begin to remove out of it, he is not forsworn.—Ziffer maintains, however, that the swearer, in the last of these instances, is forsworn, as the circumstance upon which the violation of his vow is suspended (namely, his residence in the house), does already exist, however short the time may be. Our doctors argue that a vow is imposed with a view to the fulfilment of it, and therefore, that in the present instance, such a space of time as admits of the fulfilment must be excepted from the vow; and hence, if the swearer make any delay he is forsworn, because such acts as are here mentioned are capable of continuance, as a man may, with propriety, say, "I rode a whole day," or "I wore such a robe for a day:" contrary to the act of entrance: as a man could not say, "I entered for a day:" and the possibility of continuance in such acts being thus proved, it follows that the effect of the commencement and the continuance is one and the same:—but if the swearer should here purely intend the commencement of the act, and say that his design was to vow that "he would not ride again" (for instance), his declaration is to be credited, as his words admit of that construction.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not reside in this house," and he should himself leave the house, his family and effects still remaining in it, although he may have no intention of returning to reside there, yet he is forsworn, because he is still supposed to be an inhabitant of that house, from the continuance of his family and effects continuing therein: as merchants, who reside in the Bazaars [that is, have shops there], say, notwithstanding, "they reside in such a street," meaning the residence of their families.

A vow against residing in a city is not broken by the vower's family continuing there.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not reside in this city," and he go forth from it resolving not to return thither, although his family should still continue to reside there, yet he is not forsworn, and his observance of the vow does not depend upon his carrying his family and effects out of that city according to what is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, because (contrary to the preceding case) he is then no longer considered as an inhabitant thereof in the customary acceptance:—and a village is (in the Rawayet Saheeh) declared to be the same as a city, with respect to this rule:—Haneefa observes, upon the preceding case, that the removal of the whole of the effects from the house is necessary, insomuch that if even a single nail of the vower's property be left therein, he is forsworn,—because, as his residence in that house was understood from the whole of his effects being there, so will it still be understood whilst any part of them remains therein.—Aboo Yoosaf alleges that the removal of a principal part of them is sufficient, because the removal of the whole is sometimes impracticable. Mohammed says that the removal of such quantity only is necessary, as might be sufficient for housekeeping, because anything beyond that is not of a residentry nature; and the learned have agreed that this is the most laudable distinction.—It is here requisite that the swearer remove to another house, without delay, in order that he may observe his vow; for if he should not remove into another house, but into the street or a mosque, the learned in the law say that he does not fulfill his vow; the reason of which is that if a person were to remove out of a city with his family, so long as he does not fix upon another place of abode, his first residence remains with respect to prayer:—whence, if he return to his former abode, he is still accounted an inhabitant; and the same holds good in the present case.

OF VOWS RESPECTING VARIOUS ACTIONS;
SUCH AS COMING, GOING, RIDING, AND SO FORTH.

An evasion of a vow is a violation of it:—If a man swear that he will not go out of the mosque, and afterwards desire another to carry him forth from it, and the other do so, he is forsworn, because an act performed by the direction or any person is attributed to the director, and it is here, therefore, the same as if he had mounted a beast, and rode out upon it: but if another person were to carry him out of the mosque by compulsion he is not forsworn, because the act of a person compelling cannot be attributed to the person who is forcibly compelled, as he gave no direction in it.—If, moreover, a person should carry out the swearer with his will, but without his direction, he is not forsworn (according to the Rawayet Saheeh), because his removal cannot here be established, as it can only be so by the the circumstance of his directing or desiring it, and not by his will alone; and his desire or direction do not appear.

If a man swear that he will not go forth [from his house] except to a funeral and he afterwards go to attend the funeral, and some other business should then occur to him, and he go upon that business, he is not forsworn, because the act of going to the funeral was excepted from his vow, and his motions after that are not forgoing, as by going forth is understood removing from the inside of a house to the outside.

If a man swear, saying, "I will not go forth towards Mecca," and he afterwards go forth with a design of going to Mecca, and return, he is forsworn; because his going forth with a design of going to Mecca (which is the condition) is here found, since, by going forth is understood removal from the inside of the house to without, which has here occurred. But if he should have sworn, saying, "I will not come to Mecca," and he afterwards go towards Mecca, and return, he is not forsworn, nor until such time as he actually enters Mecca, because coming implies arriving, and that has not taken place. If a man swear also, "that he will not go towards Mecca," some lawyers say that the case will be the same as the last recited, whilst others assert that it corresponds with the preceding case; this last however, is the more approved doctrine, because going implies removal, and arrival is not necessary to constitute removal.

An underlying vow of performance is not violated until the death of the vower.—If a man make a vow that "he will go to Mecca," and he should not go to Mecca during his life, he is forsworn: but he will not be accounted forsworn until after his death, because whilst life remains there is a hope of his fulfilling his vow.

Vows made with vow of prevention.—If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, "if you go out unless by my permission, you are divorced," and he should afterwards once grant such permission, and the woman go out accordingly, and she should again go out without the husband's permission, the consequence of his vow is incurred (that is the woman becomes divorced), because permission is requisite each time that she goes out, as he excepted from his vow the act of her going out with his permission, and any other act of going out beyond that is included in the inhibition, wherefore the consequence is induced by her going forth without his permission—if the vower explain, saying, "I intended one permission only," his declaration is to be credited in a religious view, but not in point of law, because, although his words, as above, are capable of this construction, yet it is contrary to their apparent tendency.

Case of a vow express generally, but restricted, in its sense, to some particular occasion.—If a woman be desirous of going out, and her husband say, "if you go out you are divorced," and she thereof sit down, and afterwards go out, the consequence is not induced—that is, divorce does not take place:—and so also, if a man be desirous of beating his slave, and another vow, "if you beat him, such an one my slave is free," and the man, desiring only for a momentary space, beat his slave, the slave of the other person does not become free. The reason of this is that the design of the speaker in what he vows is to prevent that going forth of the woman, or that which (according to what then appears) the woman or the master is intent upon doing, and of course the vow is restricted to that beating, or that going forth, as the foundation of the vow rests upon what appears at the particular crisis.—This species of vows is termed Yameen Fowr, or a sudden vow.. And Haneefa is the first who makes any mention of this kind of vows. Formerly vows were described as of two species, one general (as where a man says, "I will not do so")—and the other restricted (as where a man says, "I will not do so this day")—but Haneefa deduced from these a third, saying, "the third sort is that which is general with respect to the words, but restricted with respect to the sense.

If a man invite another to sit down and eat breakfast with him, and the other make a vow, saying, "if I eat breakfast my slave is free," an! he should then proceed to his own house, and there eat his breakfast, he does not incur the penalty of his vow, because what he said, as being an answer, relates solely to the speech of the other person, and is therefore construed as regarding that breakfast to which the other had invited him. But if the person thus invited were to answer, "if I eat breakfast this day my slave is free,"—upon his breakfasting either there or elsewhere at any time during that day the penalty is incurred, because here he has superadded to his reply the expression "this day," and hence what he has said is rendered a separate sentence and not a reply.

If a man swear that he will not ride upon the beast of any other person, and he should afterwards ride upon a house, the property of one of his slaves, who is a Mazoon, he is not forsworn (according to Haneefa), whether such Mazoon be involved in debt or not.*

If the Mazoon, however, should be very much involved in debt, the vower is forsworn, although he should not intend it, as the master, in such case, is not held (by Haneefa) to be possessed of any property in the animal. If, on the contrary, the debts of the Mazoon be of trifling consequence only, or if he should not be in debt at all, the master is not forsworn, where he does not intend it, because, in either case, he is himself the virtual proprietor of the animal:—but the animal is held to belong to the Mazoon, both in the eye of the law, and also by common usage, and hence concerning his belonging to the master there is no doubt; wherefore his intention in the act is requisite. Aboo Yoosaf says that he is not forsworn in any of those cases, unless he be so intentionally, because whether the animal be the property of the master or not is dubious. Mohammad, on the other hand, says that he is forsworn, although he be so unintentionally, since the animal is his property, as the two disciples hold that debt is in no respect repugnant to a slave being the property of his master.

CHAPTER VI.

OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO EATING OR DRINKING.

Vows with respect to eating dates.—If a person swear that "he will not eat of such a date-tree," his vow relates to the fruit of that tree only, because he has referred his

*Because all the effects of his slave are virtually his own property, provided the slave be not involved in debt.
VOWS.

Vow to a thing which is not eatable, namely, the tree: wherefore his vow is metaphorically taken to regard the article which is the product of the tree, namely, the dates; and the subject admits the metaphor, as the date-tree is the cause as that article existing. But it is a condition that the dates do not undergo any change by a new operation; for if he were to drink a Nabbeeza, (or infusion) prepared from these dates, or juice expressed from them, yet he would not be forsworn.

A vow of abstinence from anything is not broken by eating that thing when it has acquired a new description.—If a man swear that “he will not eat of those Boosrs” (half-ripe dates), and should afterwards eat of them when they have become ripe, he is not forsworn; and so also, if he should swear that “he will not eat of those Ritbs” (ripe dates), “nor drink of this milk,” and he afterwards eat of these milk together, after the Ritbs shall have become mellow and the milk coagulated; because the description of half-ripe or of ripe is the motive for the vow, and those descriptions are no longer applicable; end in the same manner, the milk being in the state of milk is the motive of the vow, wherefore the vow is taken respecting it in that state; milk, moreover, is ranked among eatables, wherefore by milk is not understood anything which may be produced from it. It is otherwise where a man swears that “he will not converse with such an infant,” or “with such a youth,” and he converses with the infant after he becomes a man, or with the youth after he has become aged,—for here he is forsworn; because refraining from converse from a Mussulman is forbidden by the law, whether such Mussulman be an infant or a youth; hence the descriptions of infancy or adolescence are not regarded, in the eye of the law, as motives of the vow; consequently the vows understood to respect such a person; and the vower is accordingly forsworn if he converse with that person after he arrives at years of maturity.

Or denomination.—If a person swear that “he will not eat of such a kid,” and he should eat thereof after the said kid shall have become a goat, he is forsworn, because the description of kid, in such an animal, is not the motive of the vow, since a person who avoids eating the flesh of kids, still more avoids eating the flesh of goats.

If a man make a vow that “he will not eat Boosrs (unripe dates), and should afterwards eat Ritbs (ripe dates), he will not be forsworn, because Ritbs are not Boosrs.

If a person make a vow that “he will not eat Ritbs or Boosrs,” and he should afterwards eat Mozzennibs (dates which are beginning to ripen), he is forsworn, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that he is not forsworn by eating Boosr-Mozennibs, in a case where he may have sworn not to eat Ritbs; neither does he violate his vow by eating Ritb-Mozennibs, in a case where he has made a vow against eating Boosrs; because Ritb-Mozennibs are termed Ritbs, and Boosr-Mozennibs are termed Boosrs. Thus it is the same as if a man were to make a vow with respect to buying—that is, if a man were to swear that he will not this day buy Ritbs (or ripe dates), and he should afterwards on that same day purchase Mozzennibs (or half-ripe dates), he is not forsworn; and so in this case likewise. The argument of Haneefa on this point is that Ritb-Mozennibs are such as rather incline to Boosrs and Boosr-Mozennibs are the reverse—that is, such as rather approach to Ritbs), wherefore eating either of those is eating Boosrs or Ritbs, and the vow regards one or other of them:—contrary to the case of buying, as the buying relates to every species, wherefore the inferior species is a dependant of the superior.

If a man vow that “he will not buy any ripe dates,” and he should afterwards purchase a cluster of unripe dates, among which there may chance to be some ripe, he is not forsworn, because the purchase relates to the whole, and the smaller quantity is a dependant of the greater; but, if the vow were made with respect to eating, he is forsworn, because the eating of them relates to from time to time, wherefore the vow regards every one of them. This case is therefore the same as if a man were to vow that he would not purchase any barley, and he should afterwards buy wheat, having among it some grains of barley, in which case he is not forsworn; but if he should vow that he would not eat any barley, and he should afterwards eat wheat, among which are some grains of barley, he is forsworn, for the reason here stated.

If a man vow that “he will not eat flesh” and he should afterwards eat the flesh of fish, he is not forsworn, on a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that he is forsworn, because the meat of fish is termed flesh, and so it is denominated in the Koran, as in the above case; but there is no favourable construction of the law is that the meat of fish is only termed flesh metaphorically, as flesh is produced from blood, and there is no blood in fish, on account of their inhabiting the water. If the vower, on the contrary, were to eat of the flesh of a hog or a man, he would be forsworn, because that is actually flesh, although the use of it be forbidden, and a vow is sometimes made with respect to forbidden things; and in like manner he is forsworn if he were to eat of the liver or the paunch of any animal, because that is in reality flesh, as being produced from blood, and is, moreover, used in the same manner as flesh. Some say that, in our times, the vower is not forsworn by eating of liver or paunch, as these articles are not among us account flesh.

If a person swear that “he will not eat or buy fat” (that is tallow), he is not forsworn by eating or purchasing fat, unless it be the fat or tallow of the belly. The two dis-disciples allege that the swearer would violate his vow by purchasing or eating the fat of the back, because the peculiar quality of tallow, which is melting in the fire, exists in this species, as well as in that of the belly. The argument of Haneefa is that the fat of the back is in reality flesh, as being produced from blood; and it is not, therefore, used as flesh, and hence the flesh derives its value and goodness; for which reason a person eating it would violate his vow, where he had sworn not to eat flesh, and is not forsworn by selling the fat of the back, where he had sworn that "he would not sell fat." Some allege that this difference subsists only where the vower hast sworn concerning fat, but not where he has sworn concerning tallow, as if it were never used in the way of flesh.

If a man makes a vow that "he will neither eat nor buy flesh or fat," and he should afterwards eat or purchase the fat or tail of a sheep, yet he is not forsworn, because this part is altogether distinct from both flesh and fat, as not being used for the same purpose as either of them.

If a man swear that "he will not eat of this wheat," he does not violate his vow, unless he chew it; and if he should eat bread made of the wheat, he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that by eating the said bread he is forsworn, since by the terms of the vow is also understood wheaten bread, according to common usage. The argument of Haneefa is that, the eating of wheat is a thing actually practised, as men eat wheat boiled and dressed in other modes, and the literal acception must (according to its tenets) always be preferred to the metaphorical, although that be sanctioned by custom. If the swearer should chew the wheat, the two disciples coincide in opinion with our doctors, that he is forsworn; and this is approved, since the eating of the wheat comprehends the chewing of it, in the common form of Metonymy, as where a man vows that he will not set his foot in the house of such a person, and afterwards enters that house, in which case he is forsworn, whether he rides into the house, or goes in on foot.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not eat of this flour," and he should afterwards eat bread made thereof, he is forsworn: because flour is not eaten in its simple state, and hence it is construed to mean such articles of food as are prepared from it. If, on the contrary, he were to eat the actual flour, he is not forsworn; and this is approved, because here it is certain that the words were intended in their metonymical sense, and with that sense the eating of flour in its simple state does not accord.

If a person swear that "he will not eat bread," by this is to be understood, such bread as is commonly eaten in that place; and this is, in general, either wheaten or barley bread, one or other of which is almost universally used. If, also, the swearer should eat walnut or almond bread in Irak*, he is not forsworn; because such bread is not common in that region; whereas, if he were to eat such bread in Tabristan †, or any other place where it is the usual diet, he would violate his vow.

If a person swear that "he will not eat Shawa" (or its like), then the oath relates to the flesh of the stew, and not to the vegetables or eggs that may be mixed with it; because the term Shawa means the meat of the stew, and is therefore to be construed in its literal meaning, unless where the swearer may have intended by the word Shawa to express and include the above mentioned articles also, when the abstinence ought to be conformable to the intention.

If a person swear that "he will not eat Tabbeekh" (or boiled meat), his vow respects boiled flesh. This proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, according to general usage, and the ground of it is, that the unrestricted sense of Tabbeekh cannot be admitted on account that this would preclude the vower from the use both of food and of medicine, which is not his design. The term Tabbeekh, therefore, is here construed to mean the particular thing usually understood by it (namely, flesh cooked in water), unless where the intention of the vower may have extended farther, as if he were to declare that he meant thereby every species of boiled provisions—for here this declaration is to be credited, since this is a violence to himself, and a man is empowered to inflict penalties upon himself. If, moreover, in this case, the vower were to sup of the broth of flesh-meat he is forsworn, because it partakes of the quality of flesh, and broth is also termed Tabbeekh, wherefore he would be forsworn, "as having eaten Tabbeekh."

If a person vow that "he will not eat any Ras [head], by this is to be understood the head of an animal, as usually prepared for cookery, and exposed to sale. It is written in the Jama Sagheer, that if a person swear that he will not eat Ras, by this is understood the heads of cows, bullocks, and goats, according to Haneefa;—but that the two disciples hold it restricted to the heads of goats. This diversity of opinion, however, arises solely from the difference of times; for in the time of Haneefa the words Ras was used to express the heads of both kinds; but in the time of the two disciples, the heads of

The argument of Haneefa herein is that Idam implies that which is eaten as a dependant, and dependancy is actually found in a case of admixture where it stands in the place of bread; and it virtually exists where the article used is of such a nature as never to be eaten alone. With respect to what Aboo Yoosaf alleges of Idam being derived from Mowademit, or congeniality, it may be replied that such congeniality is completely found in admixture: — and vinegar, or other similar fluids, are never eaten alone; but mixed with bread or other food; and salt, also, is not usually eaten alone; and it, moreover, is liable to melt; wherefore it is a dependant (contrary to the case of flesh, and other corresponding substances, which are frequently eaten alone): — and hence by eating these, the vower is not forsworn, unless where he intends such articles in his vow, for this is a violence to himself, and a man is empowered to inflict penalties upon himself. It is to be observed that oranges and dates are not considered as Idam: this is approved.

If a person make a vow that, "he will not eat Ghadd" [dinner], by this is understood eating at any time from daybreak till noon; as by Asha [supper], is understood what is eaten between meridian prayer and midnight, because any time after the sun's declination from the meridian is the time of Asha. Some assert that this was the distinction among the ancients; but that with the moderns the time of Asha is from afternoon prayer; and the morning meal is that which may be eaten between midnight and day, break, because the morning is from midnight until daybreak. — It is to be observed that where a person makes a vow against eating dinner or supper, a full and entire meal is to be understood of either, such as is customary: this will, of course, be regulated by the usual quantity of those meals in different countries respectively; but, to violate the vow, more than half the usual quantity must be eaten.

If a man make a vow, saying, "if I clothe myself, or eat, or drink, my slave is free," and he should explain his intention, in the first of these articles, to regard a particular kind of cloth only, his declaration is not to be credited either with respect to a decree of the Kazee, or in a religious view (and the same is to be observed with respect to the two other articles of eating and drinking); because intention is not approved unless it be expressed, and the cloth, or so forth, are not mentioned in the vow. — If a man, also, were to make a vow, saying, "if I put on a robe," or "eat food," or "drink wine,—my slave is free," and he afterwards say that he meant this robe and not that robe, or so forth his declaration is not to be credited in point of law: but it is to be credited in a religious view, because the words robe, food, and wine, are here mentioned; but yet an intention of discrimination with respect to them contradicts appearances, wherefore his declaration is not to be credited as far as regards a decree of the Kazee.*

Vows respecting drinking out of a fountain or vessel.—If a person were to make a vow that "he would not drink out of such a fountain," and afterwards lift water out of the fountain in a cup, and drink, he is not forswn,—nor unless he lift it with his mouth (that is, drink it without a vessel), in which case he would be forswn.—The two disciples say he is forswn if he drink it out of a cup, as this is the usual mode of drinking. Haneefa's arguments are deduced from the Arabic.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not drink of the water of such a fountain," and afterwards drink the water of the fountain out of a vessel, he is forswn, because the water of the fountain, after being taken up and drank, is still referred to the fountain, which is the condition; he is therefore forswn as much as if he were to drink water out of a stream which runs from the fountain.

If a man make a vow, saying, "If I do not drink, this day, of the water which is in this vessel, my wife is divorced" and it should so happen that there is no water in it, he is not forswn; and so also (according to Haneefa and Muhammed) if there be water in the vessel, and it should chance to be spilled before the night of that day, Aboo Yoosaf says that he is forswn, in either case, upon the close of that day;—and the same difference of opinion subsists where a man makes a vow to God (that is, where he says, "by Go 1 will drink of the water which is in this cup this day); for it is a rule with Aboo Yoosaf that the possibility of fulfilling the vow is not a condition, either of the obligation of the vow, or of its continuance;—whereas, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, the possibility of fulfilment is a condition of the obligation of the vow, and also of its continuance, because a vow is taken with a view to its accomplishment, and it is therefore requisite that the accomplishment be possible and conceivable, so as to be obligatory.—The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is, that although the accomplishment of the vow be impossible, yet its substitute (namely, expiation) is possible, wherefore such a vow may be lawfully taken, inasmuch as it is the occasion of expiation: but to this we reply that it is requisite that the original act be practicable, so as to render the taking of the vow valid, since, if the original act be practicable, how can the vow be taken so as to give occasion for a substitute?—and hence it is that a Yameen Ghamoos (or false oath made respecting a thing already past) cannot be taken in such a manner as to occasion expiation.—If, moreover, in the case now under consideration, the words "this day" should not have been mentioned, but the vow be general, as if the man had said, "If I drink not of the water in this vessel, my wife is divorced," and there should happen to be no water in the vessel, he is not forswn, according to Haneefa and Mohammed; but with Aboo Yoosaf he is forswn, upon the instant.—But if there be water in the cup at the time of speaking, and it be spilled before night, the vow is forswn, according to all our doctors.—Aboo Yoosaf makes a distinction between an unrestricted and a restricted case; for he says that, in the restricted case, the vow is forswn after the day is closed; but, in the unrestricted case, he says, when he instant he ceases from speaking: the reason of which distinction is that, as the specification of a time is made for the purpose of extention, the act does not become absolutely incumbent until the last instant of the time; and hence the vow is not forswn until then; but in the unrestricted case, the fulfilment is incumbent on the instant the person ceases from speaking, which, being impossible, the vow is forswn on the instant. —Haneefa and Imam Mohammed also make a distinction between the restricted and the unrestricted case; for they say that where the vow is general, and there is water in the vessel, and it happens to be spilled, the vow is forswn; but not where the vow is restricted; the reason of which distinction is that, in the unrestricted case, the fulfilment is incumbent on the instant the person ceases from speaking; and the fulfilment being defeated, by the thing no longer remaining, respecting which the vow was taken, the vow is forswn, because the thing vowed is in this case defeated subsequently to the time when fulfilment was incumbent; in the same manner as if the vow shoule happen to die, and the water remain in the cup, in which case he would be forswn:—but, where the vow is restricted, the accomplishment is not absolutely incumbent, until the last instant of the time specified; but the accomplishment is then impossible, because the water, which was the subject of it, no longer remains: and where the accomplishment is no longer possible, it is not incumbent: wherefore the vow becomes null, as much as if there were no water whatever in the vessel.

*That is, if a man, having made such a vow, were afterwards to perform any of the acts therein specified, pleading that he made his vow under a restrictive intention, and that the water he has drunk, or the robe he has put on, were meant as exceptions therefrom, the possibility of the truth of this declaration is to be admitted; but yet the Kazee (who can judge only from appearances) must decree the emancipation of the slave.

A vow made respecting an absolute impossibility is held as violated upon the instant.—If a person make a vow, saying, "I will, by some means or other, ascend to heaven," or, "I will, somehow, convert this stone into gold," this constitutes a vow,* and the vow

is forthwith forsworn.—Ziffer says that this does not constitute a vow, since ascending to heaven, or turning stone into gold, are impracticable, in the usual nature of things, and therefore are the same as things actually impossible.—The argument of our doctors is that the fulfilment is here actually practicable, because it certainly is possible to ascend to heaven, as we know that the angels of God ascend the skies; and in the same manner it is possible that a stone may be converted into gold by the Almighty exerting his power for that purpose: now the thing vowed being possible, the vow is contracted so far as to give occasion for expiation; and the vow is forthwith forsworn, because of his inability, in the ordinary nature of things, to execute the thing which he has undertaken; in the same manner as if a vower were to die before the accomplishment of his vow, in which case he would be forsworn, although it be possible that he may yet be restored to life: contrary to the case of the vessel of water, because the drinking of the water undertaken to be drank is not possible in either of those cases, and therefore the vow is null.

CHAPTER VII.
OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO SPEAKING AND CONVERSING.

A vow against speaking to such a person is violated by speaking to him within hearing distance, although he be asleep.—If a person makes a vow, saying, "I will not speak to such an one," and he should afterwards speak to that person while asleep, from such a distance as may be within his hearing, he is forsworn; because he has spoken to that person, and the words have reached his ears; although, in consequence of being asleep, he may not have heard them, and it is therefore the same as if he had called to that person from a place within his hearing, and the person be not sensible of his addressing him through inattention. In some passages of the Mabsoot it is said that it is conditional to the violation of the vow that the person sleeping be awakened by the words spoken (and in this opinion our doctors coincide); because, if he be not awakened, it is the same as if the speaker had called to him from a place so distant as not to be within hearing, in which case he would not be forsworn, and so here likewise. Case in which the violation of the vow depends upon the meaning of the terms used in it.—If a man make a vow that, "he will not speak to such an one without his permission," and the person mentioned should permit him to speak accordingly, but the vower be not certified thereof until after he shall have spoken to him, he is forsworn; because the term Izn [permission] is deviated from the word Azan, which signifies indication; or if it signifies a thing received by the ears, which can only be done by hearing, Aboo Yooasf says that he is not forsworn, because Izn signifies licence, which is fully understood by tacit consent alone; that is (like the will), it does not depend upon anything else: for instance, if one were to swear that "he would not speak to such a person without his will," and the person should will his speaking to him, but the vower be not certified thereof until after he has spoken, yet he is not forsworn, because the will is fully established by the person being merely willing, and does not depend upon anything else. But to this we reply that the will is merely an act of the person, and is not merely so, for the reasons above stated.

Case of a vow against conversing with a person for a specified time.—If a person make a vow, saying, "I will not speak to such an one for a month," it is to be understood from the time of making such vow, because if he were not to mention the words for a month, the vow would take place as a perpetual relinquishment of converse with the person mentioned; the mention of a month, therefore, is for the purpose of excluding from the vow anything beyond one month, and hence that which is connected with the vow must be included in the vow, from the argument of the state in which it is pronounced, as being a state of anger, since the reason for the observance of the vow is the anger which occurs to the vower at the instant, for which reason converse with the person mentioned is prevented from that instant. It would be otherwise if a man should say, "by God I will fast for a month," because, if the words "for a month," were not mentioned, yet the vow would not take place as including a perpetual fast; the mention of a month, therefore, is merely for the purpose of restricting the fast to a month; and as the month is indefinite, and not specified, the specification of it is left to the vower.

Repetition of prayer, &c., at the stated seasons, does not violate a vow of silence.—If a man make a vow that "he will not speak," and he afterwards read the Koran at the stated periods of devotion, he is not forsworn; but if he should, at any other time, read the Koran, he is forsworn. The same rule also holds with respect to the Tasbeeh,† Tahleel † and Takbeer,‡—that is is contracted; that is to say, is valid in its effect, and binding upon the vower. The expression, as above, is preferred by the translator, as being more familiar to an English reader.

*Calling upon the name of God in prayer by saying, "BEEM ALLAH in the name of God,"

†Repeating the Kalma, or creed, "THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD, &c."

‡Magnifying God (in prayer) by saying "ALLAHOO AKBERO!" [God is greatest to say, he repeat any of these at the stated time of prayer, he is not forsworn; but if he should repeat them at any other time, he violates his vow. This proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that the vow is forsworn in either case (and such is the opinion of Shafei), because reading the Koran, or repeating the Tasbeeh, and 13 forth, are all actual exertions of the speaking faculty.—The argument of our doctors is that prayer does not come under the description of speech, either generally, or in the construction of the law. The Prophet having said, "These prayers which I teach are not capable of being construed as containing any of the words of men."—Some have said that in our days the vower would not be forsworn, even at any other time than the stated periods of prayer, because the person who repeats those things is not said to be speaking, but reciting; and deeds pass accordingly.

A vow made respecting the day extends to the night also.—If a man were said, 'On the day [Yawn] upon which I speak to such an one, his wife is divorced,' this extends both to the day and the night. Because the word day where it comes in context with a thing which is not a matter of continuance, means time generally; and as speaking to a person is not a matter of continuance, by the word day it is understood time in general.—But if the swearer should declare that his intention in the vow was confined to the daytime in particular, his declaration must be credited with the Kazee, because the term Yawn is used also in this sense.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that his declaration not to be credited with the Kazee as it is contradictory to general usage.—But if the vower should, in the place of the word day, use the word night, by saying, 'On the night [Lail] on which I confess,' and so forth, by this to be understood night only, because the positive meaning of the term Lail is night, in the same manner as the positive meaning of the term Nihar is day; but no instance is known of Lail being used to express time generally.

Case of a vow of inhibition restricted to a particular occurrence.—If a person say, "If I speak to Zeyd, unless a certain person come, his wife is divorced," and he should afterwards converse with Zeyd, before the coming of the other person, he is forsworn,—but, if after, he is not forsworn.—In the same manner, if the swearer were to express himself, "If I speak to Zeyd untill such an

one shall have arrived" or "unless by permission of such an one," or "until the permission of such an one,"—his wife is divorced,—and he should afterwards converse with Zeyd, before the arrival or before permission obtained, of the other person, he is forsworn:—but, if after, he is not forsworn; because the revocation or permission is the termination of the vow, which remains in force until the termination, but discontinues upon that taking place; and he cannot be forsworn after the vow is completed.—In the case here stated, if the person named should happen to die, the vow ceases: contrary to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, for with him the vow does not drop, but the vower is forsworn if ever he should speak to Zeyd.—The argument of Haneefaa and Mohammed is that the thing prohibited by the tenor of the oath is conversation with Zeyd; and this, by his death, being rendered impossible, the vow drops of course: but with Aboo Yoosaf the possibility is not a condition, whence, upon the death of Zeyd the vow becomes perpetual.

A vow against conversing with a person described is (in relation to another) not violated by conversing with that person after the description (with respect to the other) is done away.—If a man make a vow, saying "I will not speak to the slave of such a person," without intending any particular slave,—or, if he should express his vow, "I will not speak to the wife," or the friend of such a person," and the person should sell his slave, or repudiate his wife, or fall at enmity with his friend, and the vower afterwards converse with either of these, he is not forsworn, because his vow is taken as regarding a circumstance which has its existence in a matter relative to the person named, whether that matter be relation by right of property, as in the case of the slave; or relation by connexion, as in the case of the wife, or the friend; and when that matter no longer remains, the vower cannot be forsworn. The compiler of this work observes that what is here said is taken from the Jama Sagheer; and other authorities agree with it, in respect to the relation by right of property: but in respect to the relation by connexion the vower would be forsworn, according to Mohammed, because such relation is purely of an indicative nature, and is not to be taken in a restrictive sense, since the case admits the design of the vower to be a renunciation of conversation with those persons, as either of them is capable of being held an enemy from injuries received but not because of the relation in which they stand to the person named; the continuance of that relation, therefore, is not a condition; and hence the effect is connected with the identical person of either, as in a case of pointed reference;—that is, if a person say, "I will not converse with this friend, or with this wife, of such a person," and he should converse with them after the falling out with the friend, or the divorce of the wife, he is not forsworn: and so here also.—The reason for what is recited in the Jama Sagheer is that it is possible that the design of the vower may be to quit conversing with those persons on account of the relation in which they stand to the person named (whence he has not mentioned them with any pointed reference), and it is also possible that the design may be merely to quit conversing with those persons; thus a doubt exists, whether the relation be the motive to the vow or not; and such being the case, the vower is not forsworn by conversing with any of those persons after the dissolution of the relation in which they stood to the person named.—If, moreover, the man should have made his vow with respect to a person paticularly specified, by saying, ‘I will not converse with this slave of such an one,’ or ‘his wife,’ or ‘this friend’ (and so forth), and he should converse with such after the slave shall have been sold, or the wife divorced, or the friend at enmity, he is not forsworn in the case of the slave, but he would be so in the case of the wife or the friend.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammad says that he is forsworn in the case of the slave likewise; and such also is the opinion of Ziffer. And if a man were to make a vow, saying, ‘I will not enter into this house of such an one,’ or ‘I will not ride upon this beast of such an one,’ and he should enter the house, or ride upon the beast, after the owner has disposed of them, the same difference of opinion prevails among the doctors as is above stated.—The argument of Mohammad and Ziffer is, that the mention of the relation of the slave to his owner is for the purpose of indication; but pointed reference is more forcible, in indication, than the relation which a thing bears to another, as that altogether obviates doubt: wherefore regard is had to pointed reference alone, and the mention of the relation is nugatory, in the same manner as in the case of the wife or the friend.—The argument of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf is that the moving cause of the vow, in the case of the slave, the house, or the animal, is some property which is to be found in the person to whom they have reference; because the house or the animal are incapable of being of themselves held in enmity; and so also the slave, as he does not stand in a rank sufficiently respectable to admit his being an object of enmity: wherefore the quitting from converse from those is on account of a property which is to be found in the proprietor of them; and hence the vow is restricted to the continuance of the right in the owner; contrary to a case of relation by connexion, such as the relation of the wife or the friend; as enmity and separation from them may be the design, for which reason the mention of the relation in which they stand to the person named is merely for the purpose of indication; and it is evident that the moving cause of the vow, with respect to them, is some property which is to be found in themselves, and not in the person to whom they have reference; because they are mentioned with a pointed reference: contrary to the case of the slave, the house, or the animal, as in those cases the thing mentioned is incapable of being of itself held in enmity, unless on account of some property to be found in the person in reference to whom it is mentioned, namely, the proprietor.

If a man make a vow, saying, ‘I will not speak to the owner of this turban,’ and the owner of the turban should afterwards sell it, and the vower should thereafter converse with the said person, he is forsworn; because here the mention of the relation of the thing to the person is purely for the purpose of indication, since men do not fall at variance with turbans; and hence it is the same as if he had spoken with a pointed reference to the owner of it, by saying, ‘I will not speak to this owner of the turban,’ in which case he would be forsworn; and so here likewise.

A vow against conversing with such a youth is violated by conversing with him after manhood.—If a person make a vow, saying ‘I will not converse with this youth,’ and he should afterwards converse with him when he has arrived at an advanced age, he is forsworn; because the effect is connected with the person mentioned; as a descriptive expression is not necessary to specify a person who is present, and the description of youth cannot be considered as the motive to the vow.

Section.

Vows respecting converse with a reference to it man.—If a person make a vow, saying, ‘I will not converse with such an one for a time’ [Hyne]; or ‘for a space of time’ [Ziman], by these modes of expressing time is to be understood six months; because Hyne sometimes means a short space of time, and sometimes forty years; and it also is sometimes used to express a few months, and the space of six months is a medium between these extremes; wherefore, by the term Hyne is here to be understood six months. The principle upon which this proceeds is that a very small space of time cannot be designed for the purpose of conversation, as prevention may apply to a little space of time, in common usage, wherefore in such a case a vow a unnecessary for prevention; and a very long space of time is not designed for prevention, as that stands as a perpetuity; moreover, if he had omitted all mention of time, by not introducing the word Hyne, his vow would be taken as meaning to quit converse with the person named for ever; but as he mentioned time, it appears that his design is not perpetual; since if it were so, he would have omitted the word Hyne, or have used the word Abid [for ever]; and such being the case, it is ascertained that his intention in the word Hyne is six months:—and so also of the word
Ziman, as that is used in the same sense with Hyne.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that the vower had no particular intention: but if he should have intended to express any particular space of time, it is to be understood according to his intention, because that is the literal meaning of the words aforesaid. *

If a person make a vow in the following terms, saying, "I will not speak to such an one for days" [Ayam]—by the word Ayam, it is to be understood three days: but if he should use the restricting article, saying, "I will not converse with such an one for the days" [Al-Ayam], by this is understood ten days, according to Haneefa, and a week according to the two disciples. If the vower, also, were to express himself, "I will not speak to such an one for months" [Shoohor], by this is understood ten months, according to Haneefa, and a year according to the two disciples:—and if he should vow, saying, "I will not converse with him for weeks" [Juow ] or "for years" [for Sohoor time],—by Jooma (according to Haneefa) is understood ten weeks, and by Soontaine ten years; but the two disciples understand by either of these the whole life of the swearer. The arguments here, on both sides, are deduced from certain grammatical points in the Arabic.

If a man make a vow with respect to his slave, saying, "if you serve me for many days [Ayampoo Kaseeritoon], you shall become free,"—by many days (according to Haneefa) is understood ten days, because ten is the greatest number comprehended in the term Ayam, which is the plural of Yawm. The two disciples, on the other hand, say that by the words many days are to be understood seven days only, because anything beyond is an excess. Some have asserted that if a man were to make this vow in the Persian tongue, by many days is understood seven with all our doctors; because in the Persian language there is no difference between more than ten days and less than ten, for men say, "ten days or more," without expressing day in the plural.†

* Some grammatical controversy here follows respecting the word Dehr, which does not admit of an intelligible translation.
† This and the preceding case turn upon certain points of grammar. In the Arabic language are four sort of plurals, which are termed plurals of paucity: some of the commentators suppose (with Haneefa) that this species of plural expresses any number up to ten, whilst others explain (with Mohammed) that the utmost number which can be expressed by it is seven. In the Persian language a noun is always expressed in the singular when preceded by a plural numeral, although it consequently has a plural signification.
the person endowed with it is removed, cannot possibly be established to one who is dead. The term Walid, therefore, expressed in the vow, is restricted to the living description; in the same manner as where a master says to his female slave, "whenever you are delivered of a living child, such child is free," and the slave is delivered of a dead child, and afterwards produces a living one; in which case this living one is free; and so here likewise. It is otherwise where divorce or manumission has been suspended upon the birth of a child, for there the divorce or manumission so suspended takes place; as in this instance it is not requisite that the birth be restricted to the living description, since the life of the child is not necessary to the divorce of the wife, or the manumission of the slave.

Case of a vow of freedom to the first purchased slave. If a man say, "the first slave that I purchase is free," and he should afterwards buy a slave, such slave is free, because the word first points to the prior single slave, which applies in this instance; but if the vow, in such a case, were to purchase two slaves together, and afterwards a third, none of these slaves is free, because singularity does not apply to the third slave, wherefore he is not the first. If, however, this man had said, "the first slave that I purchase singly is free," the third slave would be liberated, because here the vow has intended singularity at the time of purchase, and this one is the first with respect to such singularity.

Case of a vow of freedom to a last purchased slave. If a man say, "the last slave that I buy is free," and he should purchase a slave, and then die, yet the slave so purchased is not free; because the term the last applies to the individual adjunct, and as no other has preceded this one, he cannot be considered as adjunct; but if the vowere to die after having purchased another slave, this slave is free, as being the individual adjunct. It is to be observed that this second slave is free (according to Haneefah) from the day of purchase; and being free from the date of the purchase, the same is regarded as from the whole of the property of the deceased, on account of his having released him during health. The two disciples say that he is emancipated upon the death of that person, and hence it is regarded as from the third of his property only, on account of the deceased having emancipated him upon his deathbed: for they argue that the posteriority of that slave cannot be fully established, until such time as it becomes certain that no other can be purchased after him; and this is not possibly be determined but by death; hence the condition is found upon the master's decease, and the freedom of the slave is therefore also established upon that event. The argument of Haneefah is that the posteriority of the slave is ascertained by the master's decease, but the description of posteriority applies to him from the period of the purchase. The suspension of a triplicate divorce upon posteriority is also subject to the same differences of opinion; in other words, if a man vow, "the last woman I marry shall be thrice divorced," and he first marry one woman, and afterwards another, and then die, three divorces take place upon the second wife according to Haneefah inasmuch that she cannot inherit the deceased; but according to the two disciples the three divorces take place upon her from the day of her husband's decease, and consequently she does inherit of him.

Case of a vow of freedom to whoever of his slaves shall congratulate the vower on the birth of a child. If a man say, "whoever of my slaves congratulates me upon the delivery of my wife shall be free," and afterwards several of his slaves successively should inform him of his wife's delivery, the one who first brought him the intelligence only is free; because by Bisharit (which is here rendered congratulation) is meant any intelligence which works a change upon the countenance, whether that intelligence be agreeable or otherwise (but yet in common usage, it is requisite that the intelligence be agreeable), and this description is fully found only in the first intelligence, not in the second, or third, because no change is by that wrought upon the countenance. If, however, the slaves all bring him news together, they are all free, as the Bisharit then proceeds equally from all.

The emancipation of a slave, in consequence of a vow, does not suffice for expiation. If a man were to say, "If I purchase a slave he shall be free," and he afterwards purchase a slave, with a view, by his release to effect the expiation of a vow, this does not suffice for expiation; because it is requisite that the intention of expiation be associated with the occasion of manumission, which is not the case here, as the vow is the cause of manumission in the present case, and at the time of making it expiation was not the intention of the vower; and as to the purchase of the slave, that is not the occasion of the manumission, but rather the condition of it.

But the emancipation of a father, in consequence of purchase, suffices. If a man purchase, as a slave, his own father, with a view to the expiation of a vow, it suffices, with our doctors. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer and Shafei, who contend that the act of purchasing a father is the condition of manumission, and not the occasion of it, as the occasion of it is relationship (for purchase is at once a transfer of right of property, and manumission is a destruction of that right, and each of these is repugnant to the other, wherefore it is impossible that purchase should be the occasion of manumission); and it thus appearing that the cause of the manumission is relationship and not purchase, the intention of the manumission is not associated with the cause of it.—The argument of our doctors is that the purchase is blended with the manumission, as the Prophet has said, 'no child makes such effectual a return to his parent as one who, finding his parent the slave of another, purchases, and thereby emancipates him,'—which proves that the Prophet constituted the purchase itself a manumission, as there is here no other condition of manumission except purchase, according to all the doctors.

The emancipation (by purchase), of a female slave, by a person to whom she stands in the relation of an An Walid does not suffice.—If a man purchase, as a slave, a woman who has borne him a child, with a view to the expiation of a vow, it does not suffice. The nature of this case is thus. A man marries the female slave of another, and she produces a child. It is said to him, 'If at any time hereafter purchase you, you shall become free, as an expiation of my vow,' and he afterwards purchase her, when the woman becomes forthwith released, because of the occurrence of the condition upon which her emancipation was suspended; but this does not suffice for the expiation of a vow, because the slave is a claimant of freedom in virtue of Istehladi, and hence her freedom is not purely in consequence of the vow, and therefore does not suffice for the expiation of a vow. This case is contrary to one where a man says to a female slave, who has not borne a child to him, 'If I purchase you, you shall become free as an expiation of my vow,' and he afterwards purchase her; for in this case the slave becomes free, and her freedom suffices for an expiation of his vow, because the slave is not in this instance a claimant of freedom on any other ground, she being emancipated purely, in consequence of the vow, and not of anything else; and the intention of expiation is found associated with the occasion of the manumission;—she is therefore emancipated, and it suffices for an expiation.

Case of a vow of freedom to a female slave on condition of concubinage.—If a man says 'If I make a concubine of a female slave, she shall be free,' and he should afterwards make a concubine of any female slave, his own property, she is free accordingly: because the vow has been taken with respect to a slave, he being the property of the vow. The principle upon which this proceeds is founded on the grammatical construction of the vow's words in the original Arabic; and it is accounted for thus:—the expression "a female slave," in the case in question, is indefinite, and an indefinite noun is comprehended, in an instance of prohibition, in the way of general individuality;* now here this expression stands in the place of a prohibition, with regard to the design (as the design of the vow is to prohibit himself from concubinage), and such being the case, the expression "a female slave" applies to every slave individually. If, however, the vow were to purchase a slave, and make her his concubine, she would not become free. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, for he maintains that she also becomes emancipated; because, as it is not allowed to a man to make a concubine of any woman who is not his property, it follows that the mention of concubinage is equivalent to the mention of a right of property; being the same as if a man were to say to the wife of another, "if I divorce you, my slave is free," which is equivalent to his saying: "if I marry you, and afterwards divorce you,"—and so forth;—because, as divorce cannot take place without property by marriage, the mention of divorce may be said to amount to a mention of marriage:—and so also in the present case. The arguments of our doctors on this point are, that a vow of manumission is not of any effect, excepting in a case of actual right of property, or where it is referred, either to the right of property itself, or to the cause of the right; and not one of these is found in the present case. There is a case of a woman who made concubinage, because Haneefa and Mohammed define concubinage [Tesirree] to signify merely "a man's keeping his slave up, and providing a dwelling for her, and preventing her from going abroad, and bearing children with her, whether they be the children born of her or not;" (Aboo Yoosaf holds that the claim of children is also a condition, as a concubine is, in general usage, one whose children are claimed);—and no one of these particulars is a cause of right of property. Yet a right of property being requisite to concubinage, must, in the present instance, be taken for granted, as an essential, from the necessity of the concubinage (which is the condition) being legal: this right of property (however, is taken for granted only so far as is necessary, and does not appear with respect to the consequence (namely, emancipation), because whatever is established merely from necessity, does not pervade beyond the point of necessity. With respect to the example of divorce, cited by Ziffer, it may be replied that the consequence induce (namely, emancipation) is there admitted only on account of the vow being made with respect to actual property (for the vower); and the marriage, which is there taken for granted, as a necessary inference, is so only with respect to the condition (namely, divorce), but not with respect to the consequence; insomuch that if the man were to say to the strange woman, "I will divorce you, you are divorced thrice," and he afterwards marry her, and divorce her, yet three divorces do not take place as the condition had not been declared either under as actual right of property, or in reference to such right, as to the cause of it:—this case, therefore, is analogous to the case, in question, for this reason, that in both of them the establishment of the condition is merely for the purpose of admitting that, but does not pervade to the admission of the consequence.

A general vow of freedom to slaves includes every description of them.—If a man say, "every person my property is free," his Am-Walid, and Modabbirs, and Abidas, all become free accordingly, because the reference to a right of property with respect to them is complete, as all these are the actual property of the swearer: but his Mokatibs do not become free, unless such be the intention, because absolute possession does not apply to a Mokatib, whence it is that his master is not the proprietor of his acquisitions, and also that it is not lawful for a master to have carnal connexion with his Mokatiba: contrary to a Modabbira, or Am-Walid:—reference to a right of property, therefore, with respect to a Mokatib, is incomplete and deficient, for which reason intention is requisite.

Case of a vow of divorce indefinitely expressed.—If a man having three wives, say of them, "this one is divorced, or this, or this," divorce takes place upon the last wife; and it remains in the choice of the husband to declare and specify which one of the other two should become divorced, whether the first, or the second; because the vow, as above expressed, is the same as if he had said, "one of you two is divorced,—and also this one."—The ground of this is found in the grammatical construction of those words in the Arabic.—In the same manner, if a master should say, with respect to three slaves, "this one is free,—or this one,—or this one,"—the last becomes free, and it remains at the option of the master to specify which of the others shall be free, the first or the second.

CHAPTER IX

OF VOWS IN BUYING, SELLING, MARRIAGE, AND SO FORTH.

A vow against the performance of certain acts is not violated by procuring on agent to perform those acts.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not sell, or purchase, or hire, or let out at rent," and he should afterwards appoint any person his agent, to buy, or sell, or so forth, he is not forsworn; because the agent is the contractor, and not his constituent, insomuch that all the rights of the contract appertain to the agent, not to his constituent (whence, if the vower himself were a party to the contract he would be forsworn); and such being the case, the condition of violation, namely, the contract of the principal, is non-existent, nothing attaching to him, excepting only the effect of the contract, not the contract itself. He is, therefore, not forsworn, excepting where he so intends (as this is injurious to himself), or where the principal is a person of high rank, and consequently is not accustomed himself to make contracts, in which case he would be forsworn by directing another to act for him; because a vow is made for the purpose of restraining from the commission of some customary act; and it is usual for such a person to transact all concerns of purchase or sale by commission: hence where he gives his orders to another respecting such transactions, and the other executes those orders, he is forsworn.

Except in a case of marriage, manumission, or divorce.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not marry," or "divorce my wife," or "liberate my slave," and he should afterwards commission another person to perform any of these acts for him by a power of agency, and the said agent do so accordingly, the vower is forsworn; because the agent in such concerns acts merely as the negotiator, or in the manner of a messenger, whence it is that he does not refer such acts to himself, but to his employer, to whom the rights thereof appertain, and not to the agent. Here, however, if the vower were to declare that his intention in the vow was restricted to such marriage, divorce, or manumission, as might be executed by himself alone, yet his declaration is not to be credited with the Kazee: but it is credited with God.—The reason of this shall be explained in a subsequent case.

Or any act, the rights of which solely appertain to the vower.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not beat my slave," or "I will not kill my sheep," and he should afterwards order another to do either of these, and the other act accordingly, the vower is forsworn; because a master has authority to beat his own slave, or to slay his own sheep, and is therefore entitled to authorize another to do so; and the advantage thereof results to him; whence he may be said to be himself the executor of either of these acts, because the rights of them do not in any respect appertain to the person so ordered.—But if the vower should explain that his intention was to restrain himself from the performance of such acts as executed by himself; his declaration is to be admitted by the Kazee: contrary to the preceding case of divorce, &c, where the declaration is not credited by the Kazee. The reason of this difference is that divorce merely signifies a speech which goes to the repudiation of a wife, and a commission to effect divorce resembles such a speech; as the vow therefore extends to both of these, where the vower's intention was that he would not pronounce a divorce himself, he must have intended a particular restraint only, from a thing which was general in its application [his vow], and hence his declaration, although it be admitted with God, is not to be credited by the Kazee, as it contradicts appearances:—out the beating of the slave, or the slaying of the sheep, on the other hand, are perceptible acts, visible in their effects, and are immediately referable to the director of them in the way of an efficient cause (since he [the vower] is the slayer or slayer) and such being the case, where he intended, by his vow, to restrain himself from the commission of those acts with his own hands he intended what is the literal meaning of the words of his vow; his declaration, therefore, is credited with God, and with the Kazee also.

Nor by employing another to do thing, where the advantage results solely to the subject of the vow.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not beat my child," and he should afterwards order another to beat the child, and the other should beat it accordingly, the vower is not forsworn; because the advantage of the beating, namely, instruction, results to the child, and hence the act of the person directed must not be referred to the director. It is otherwise where a person directs another to beat his slave, for there the advantage (namely obedience) results to the director, in consequence of his order, and hence the act of the person directed may be said to be the act of the director.†

A vow of freedom conditioned upon the sale of a slave takes place on the instant of sale, and the sale is null.—If a person make a vow saying, "if I sell this slave he is free," and he afterwards sell that slave under a condition of option,† he [the slave] is free, because the conditions of his freedom (namely, sale and possession) being both accomplished, the consequence, which is emancipation, takes place; and the sale is not (or, sale) but also, if a person, bargaining for a slave make a vow saying, "if I buy this slave he shall be free," and he should afterwards buy that slave under a condition of option, the slave is free; because the condition of his freedom, namely, purchase and possession, are both accomplished.—If, according to the tenets of the two divisions, is this the case, because the freedom of the slave is suspended upon the act of purchase, and the condition of option on behalf of the purchaser does not with them prevent the establishment of the purchaser's possession; and so also, according to the tenets of Haneefa, because the freedom in the case in question is suspended by the suspension of the vower, and a thing suspended becomes the same as a thing prompt, up in the condition being found; and, as if, after purchase, under a condition of option, the buyer were to emancipate his slave promptly, the slave would become free by possession being first established in the purchaser as an essential, so also in the present case.

Divorce suspended upon the not selling of a slave takes place on emancipation or Tadbeer.—If a man make a vow saying, "If I do not sell this slave (or this bondmaid) my wife is divorced," and he should afterwards emancipate the slave or the bondmaid, or should grant to either a Tadbeer, divorce takes place upon his wife, because the condition, namely, his not selling them, is fully accomplished, as sale cannot now possibly take place, since the slave or bondmaid mentioned, in consequence of the act of manumission or Tadbeer, remain no longer subjects of sale.

A vow of general divorce in reply to a wife charging her husband with bigamy, takes place upon her in the same manner as upon the test.—If a woman say to her husband, "you have married another woman, in addition to me," and the husband, in reply, make a vow saying, "every wife I have is divorced," a divorce takes place (on the decree of the Kazee) upon the wife who has asserted as above.—This is the Zahir-Rawayet.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosef that the wife here mentioned does not become divorced, because the words of the husband, as above recited, are to be considered merely as a reply to the woman, and must be received as such: moreover, the design of the husband in so speaking, may be merely to please and soothe his wife; and as this would be effected by the divorce of his other wives, the divorce is restricted to the other wives only.—The ground upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds is that the husband's expression is general, as he has introduced the word "every" (which argues generality), in addition to the simple reply, whence it appears that his intention is generally, and not specially: and it follows that the sentence must be received as a speech de novo, and not as a reply.—In reply to the arguments of Aboo Yoosef, it is to be observed that the words of the husband admit of being construed into a design of terrifying and frightening the woman, on account of her having upbraided him with that which it is lawful for him to do: and, under such a construction, the restriction to the other wives is not admissible.—If the husband were to declare that his intention respected only the other wives, he is to be credited with God, but not with the Kazee: because he has intended a particular thing by a general expression, and his words admit of being taken in this sense; but it contradicts appearances: his declaration, therefore, is to be credited in a religious view, but not in point of law.

* A long case is here omitted, as it is purely of a grammatical nature, turning entirely upon the different effects of the Arabic particle Lam, according to its different position in construction, and consequently does not admit of an intelligible translation.

CHAPTER X.

OUR VOWS RESPECTING PILGRIMAGE, FASTING, AND PRAYER.

Case of a vow of Masha.—If a man make a vow “to perform a Masha [pedestrian pilgrimage] to the temple of God,” it is incumbent upon him to perform a pilgrimage to the Kaba on foot,—or that he make the visitation termed Amrit; and if he choose he may ride on his pilgrimage, or Amrit;—but he must in this case perform a sacrifice. This is on a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that neither pilgrimage nor Amrit are rendered incumbent upon him, he having engaged no farther than to walk to the temple on foot, which is not incumbent as an act of piety, but is merely an indifferent act; neither is going on foot the original design, that being simply the performance of pilgrimage or Amrit—The reasons for the more favourable construction here are twofold:—First, Alee has declared that, in a vow if this nature, either pilgrimage or Amrit are incumbent upon the swearer:—Secondly, from the expression aforesaid either pilgrimage or Amrit are universally understood; and hence it is the same as if he had said, “I owe a visitation to the temple on foot,” wherefore it is incumbent upon him to perform his pilgrimage or Amrit on foot, or that, if he choose to perform it on horseback, he also perform a sacrifice.

Case of a vow of manumission suspended upon the non-performance of pilgrimage.—If a man make a vow saying, “if I do not perform a pilgrimage this year, such an one my slave, is free,”—and after the lapse of that year a dispute should arise between the master and the slave,—the slave alleging that the master had not performed the pilgrimage, and the master alleging that he had performed it, and the slave’s witnesses bear testimony in this manner,—“that if the master had performed, within that year, a sacrifice at Koofa,” the slave (according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf) is not emancipated.—Imam Mohammad says that the slave is emancipated, because the witnesses have testified to the master having performed sacrifice at Koofa, which is a well-known act, and which necessarily implies that he has not performed pilgrimage, and hence the condition of the penalty (namely, non-performance of pilgrimage) is fulfilled.

Case of a vow against fasting.—If a man makes a vow that he will not fast, and he should afterwards intend a fast, and keep the same a short time, and then break his fast within the same day, he is forsworn on account of the condition of violation being fulfilled; because the word Sawm [fast] signifies abstinence from those things the use of which breaks a fast kept with a pious intent, which in this case is evident.

Case of a vow against prayer for a day.—If a man makes a vow that “he will not fast a day,” and he afterwards intend a fast, and observe the same for a few hours (for instance), and then break his fast, he is not forsworn, because he intended such a fast as is regarded in the law, and that is not completed until it be accomplished by the ending of the day; moreover, the full time of a day is expressly mentioned in his words, “I will not fast a day,” and therefore it is to be so understood.

Case of a vow against praying.—If a man makes a vow that “he will not pray,” and he should alter that stand up and perform Kiraat [reading the Koran], or Rookoo a submissive posture used in prayer], he is not forsworn: but if he perform the Soojda along with those other ceremonies, he is forsworn. This proceeds upon a favourable construction,—The suggestion of analogy is that he would be forsworn in consequence of beginning to pray, from the correspondence of this with a case of fasting; that is, if a man make a vow that “he will not fast,” and he should afterwards keep a religious fast, he would be forsworn upon the commencement of it; and so also in the present case. The reason of this is that a person upon beginning to pray, is termed a Moosillee, or praying person, in the same manner as one beginning a religious fast is termed a Sayim, or faster; but the reason for a more favourable construction is that a prayer implies and includes a variety of ceremonies, such as standing, kneeling, and prostration;—and hence, until the whole of these be performed, it is not termed prayer: contrary to fasting, as that consists of only one single observance, namely, abstinence.

If a man vow that “he will not perform prayer according to the ordinance of the law,” he will not be forsworn upon praying, until he come to that part of the ceremony which requires the second genuflection; because, by the above mode of expression he appears to mean that kind of prayer which is regarded in the law; and the smallest degree which constitutes that is two genuflections, as the Prophet has forbidden short or interrupted prayer.

CHAPTER XI.
OF VOWS RESPECTING CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS.

Vow of a husband against wearing cloth of his wife’s manufacture—If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, “if I put on any of your work (that is, cloth made of thread of your spinning), such cloth is Hiddee (that is, an offering at the shrine of the Prophet),”
and that man should afterwards buy cotton, and his wife spin it into thread, and of that thread cloth be woven, and the man put on the same, it is incumbent on him (according to Haneefa) to make an offering thereof at Mecca. The two disciples have asserted that it is not incumbent upon the vower, in the case in question, to make an offering of his cloth, unless where the thread has been spun of cotton which was his [the vower’s] proerty at the time of his making the vow; for they contend that a Noozr, or devoting vow, is not valid, unless it respect actual property, or be pronounced in a way which has reference to the cause of a right of property; and neither of these are existent in this case, as the vower putting on the cloth, or the woman spinning the thread of which it is composed, are not causes of a right of property to the vower. The argument of Haneefa is that it is customary for a wife to spin her husband’s cotton, and whatever is customary, the same is meant and intended;
and the act of the wife, in spinning the cloth,
is a cause of the husband’s right in it;* here therefore, appears a reference of the Noozr, or devoting vow, to the cause of a right of property, wherefore the vow is valid; and hence the vower is forsworn upon the wife spinning cotton which was his property at the time of the vow.†

If a man make a vow that “he will not sleep on such a bed,” and he should afterwards sleep thereon, it having a sheet, blanket, quilt, or so forth, spread over it, he is forsworn; because such covering is also an appertenance to the bed, and hence sleeping on the covering may be said to be sleeping on such bed. But if another bed be laid upon the bed which is the subject of the vow, and the swearer sleep thereupon, he is forsworn, because a thing cannot be an appertenance to a similar thing, and hence sleeping upon this bed is not to be accounted sleeping upon the other.

If a person swear that “he will not sit upon the ground,” and he should afterwards sit upon a carpet or mat spread thereon, he is not forsworn; because a person in such case is not said to be sitting on the ground.
It is otherwise where the skirts of his garment only are between the ground and him, as his garment is merely an appertenance to himself, and hence is not to be considered as the thing upon which he sits.

If a man vow that “he will not sit upon such a seat,” and he should afterwards sit thereupon when there is a covering spread upon it, he is forsworn; because the person who sits upon that covering is considered as the occupier of that seat, in common usage, as this is the usual way of sitting upon a bench, or other raised seat. It is otherwise where the seat which is the subject of the vow has another seat set over it, and the vower sits upon the upper seat, for then he is not forsworn, because the second seat is a fellow to the first, and a thing cannot be an appertenance to a similar thing (as has been already observed); sitting upon the second seat, therefore, is not to be accounted the same as sitting upon the first which was the subject of the vow.

CHAPTER XII.
OF VOWS CONCERNING STRIKING, KILLING, AND SO FORTH

A vow made against striking a person is not violated by striking that person when dead; and the same of a vow against clothing.
—If a person make a vow, saying [to another], “if I strike you, my slave is free,” and the vower should strike that man after his death, he is not forsworn; because striking is restricted to life, as being the name of an action which gives pain, and excites the feelings of the person struck, which is not possible with the dead. So also, if a man were to say to another, “if I clothe you, my slave is free,” and he should after his death clothe him, he is not forsworn; because by clothing, when it is indefinitely expressed, is meant a complete transfer of property in the article of clothing, and this transfer cannot be made to a defunct; unless when the vower by clothing simply meant covering, in which case he would be forsworn, for here he intends his words in a sense which they are capable of bearing.). Some doctors say that, if a person were to make a vow in the Persian tongue, saying to another, “if I clothe you, my slave is free," and he should clothe that person after his death, he is forsworn; because by this, in the vulgar idiom, is meant simply covering)

Speaking to, going to.—In the same manner, if a man were to make a vow, saying to another, "if I speak to you, my slave is free," or "if I come to you," and so forth, and he should speak to, or go to, that person after his death, yet he is not forsworn; because the intent of speaking is to impart ideas, which death prevents the possibility of; and "coming to th.: dead" implies a Zeeart, or visitation, which is not to the dead, but to the shrine or mausoleum of the dead.

Or washing a person.—If a man make a vow, saying to another, "if I wash you, my slave is free," and he should wash that person after his death, he is forsworn; because to wash simply signifies to ablate with a wish to purification, which takes place in the ablation of the dead.

A vow against beating is violated by any act which causes pain, unless that act be committed in sport.—If a man make a vow that "he will not beat his wife," and he afterwards pull her hair, or seize her by the throat, or bite her with his teeth, he is forsworn; because beating is the term for an act which causes pain, and pain is excited by the acts in question. Some have asserted that if these acts are done in the course of mutual playing and dalliance, that vow is not forsworn; because under such circumstances these bear the construction of jests, and not of beating.

Vow of slaying a person who is already dead incurs the penalty.—If a man say, "if I do not slay such an one, my wife is divorced," and the person mentioned be not living, and the vower himself knew this, he is forsworn: because he here makes his vow respecting that life with which God may inspire the deceased anew; and as this is possible, his vow stands valid: and he is then forsworn, because the slaying of that person is in the common course of things impossible. If, however, the vower be not aware of that person's being already deceased, he is not forsworn, because he has here made his vow respecting that life which he supposes to be existing in such a person, but which, in the common course of things, is no longer conceivable. There is a diversity of opinion between Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf concerning this case, from the analogy it bears to the case of the vessel of water; that is, if a man were to vow, "if I do not drink out of this cup my wife is divorced," and there should happen to be no water in the cup, he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, on account of the invalidity of the vow, from the impossibility of fulfilling it: but according to Aboo Yoosaf he is forsworn; because he does not hold the possibility of fulfilment to be a condition of the validity of the vow; and so also in the present case. In the case of the vessel of water, however, there is no distinction made with respect to knowledge; that is the vower (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) is not forsworn, whether he be aware of the cup having no water in it or not; and this is approved. It is otherwise in the case in question, for there a distinction made, as has been already mentioned.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF VOWS RESPECTING THE PAYMENT OF MONEY

Difference, in a vow, between the terms shortly, and in a length of time.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will discharge my debt to such an one shortly," this means within less than one month; and if he say, "I will discharge my debt due to such an one in a length of time," this means more than a month; because any space within a month is accounted a short time, and a month or any term beyond it is accounted a long time; and hence it is that where two friends meet after a long separation, one will say to the other "I have not seen you this month!" and so forth.

A vow to discharge a debt is fulfilled by discharging it in light or base money, or in money belonging to another.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will discharge my debt, owing to such an one, this day," and he pay the debt upon that day accordingly, and some of the money in which he has paid it should afterwards prove light, or base, or the right of another person, yet the vower is not forsworn; because lightness is only a defect, which does not destroy the specie (whence it is that if one of the parties, in a contract of Sirf sale, should, through negligence, receive base metal in return for pure metal, the exchange is completely fulfilled—and so also, the seller is fully paid his price, in a contract of Sillim sale, where he receives base coin in place of pure coin)—and such being the case, the condition of fulfilment (namely the payment of the debt) is accomplished: the vower, therefore, is not forsworn: the receipt of the money, also, where it is the right of a third person, is valid nevertheless, and the fulfilment thus established is not afterwards affected by the restoration of the same to that third person. (If, however, any of the money, after payment, should appear to be composed of pewter, or tin, the vower is forsworn; because those metals are not regarded as specie, whence, if through negligence they should be accepted in a Sillim or Sirf contract it is not a lawful payment.)

Or by means of liquidation.—If, also, the vower should sell his slave to his creditor, within the course of the day, in lieu of the debt, and the creditor accept of the same, the fulfilment of the vow is accomplished; because liquidation is one mode of discharging debts;—that is, the debt due to one party ceases in lieu of the debt due to the other (for the creditor is responsible for whatever he receives, as he received it on its own account by becoming proprietor of it, and as such an obligation is imposed upon the creditor in behalf of his debtor as already rests upon the debtor in behalf of the creditor); a mutual liquidation, therefore, takes place between them, and the debt of each is remitted in lieu of the debt of the other. (This mode of discharging the debt by liquidation is because the actual discharge is inconceivable, as the debtor does not here offer anything but substance, and the right of the creditors is not to substance, but is merely to the debt which has been incurred by the other; and hence the learned in the law say, "a debt must be discharged with its like." Liquidation, therefore, for being one mode of discharging debt, the fulfilment of the vow, in the case in question, is established, because the liquidation is established upon the instant of the sale of the slave.

Objection.—The liquidation being established upon the instant of sale, why is the purchaser's seisin of the slave made a condition?

Reply.—Seisin is made a condition in order that the debt due to the seller, namely, the price of the slave, may be fully confirmed and established, because although it be incumbent upon the purchaser from the instant of sale, yet it stands within the possibility of ceasing, as it is possible that the article sold may perish before seisin; but by seisin the debt is fully confirmed and established upon the purchaser.

But not by the gift of the creditor.—If the creditor make a gift of the debt to the debtor within the course of the day, the fulfilment of the vow is not established; because repayment has not taken place; and also, because the discharge of the debt is an act of the debtor alone, and the gift of the debt implies that the creditor relinquishes his right to it, which is an act of the creditor, and not of the debtor, wherefore the condition of fulfilment (namely, the act of the debtor) is not accomplished. It is here to be observed, however, that although the fulfilment be not accomplished, yet the vow is not forsworn, but the vow becomes void: because the vow was restricted to that day, and the creditor having remitted the debt within that day, the swearer is thereby effectually precluded from the fulfilment of his vow before the expiration of its term, which does not take place until the end of the day, whence the vow become void, in the same manner as in the case of the vessel of water.

A vow not to accept reimbursement of a debt in partial payments is not violated until the whole debt shall have been so received.—If a debtor were to make an offer, saying to his creditor, "I will discharge my debt to you, by partial payments," and the creditor should reply, with an oath, saying, "I will not thus receive my due by accepting part, and not the whole," and he should afterwards take a part of the debt, yet he is not forsworn so long as he receives not the whole debt thus by partial payments; because here the point which produces a violation of the vow is the receiving the whole debt, but in partial sums, and that has not taken place.

If the debt consists of articles computable by weight, and the vow is to accept payment by two or more weighings thereof, in such a manner as not to be employed in any other concern between these two weighings, he is not forsworn, although this be a partial mode of receiving payment, because the receipt of the whole at once is sometimes in any common way impossible, and hence any debt of this description is an exception from the present case.

If a creditor make requisition from his debtor of a part of what is due to him, suppose two hundred Dirms, and the debtor reply that "he has not so much money," and the creditor disbelieves him, and he answer, "if I possess more than one hundred Dirms, my wife is married," and it should happen that he is, at the time of saying this, possessed of fifty Dirms only, he is not forsworn; because this design, in this declaration, is merely to express, his denial of being possessed of more than one hundred Dirms; and also, because his exception of one hundred Dirms, involves an exception of every component part or proportion of one hundred; and fifty is one of these proportions; wherefore fifty also are excepted, and hence he is not forsworn. And the rule is the same if instead of "more than one hundred Dirms," he should say, "other than one hundred Dirms," or "beyond one hundred Dirms."—because all these terms equally express exception.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF MISCELLANEOUS CASES

A vow against doing a thing, unrestrictedly pronounced, operates as a perpetual inhibition.—If a man making a vow, saying, "I will not do so and so," it is necessary that he for ever abstain from the commission of that act, because he has expressed the negative of the act generally, and hence the prohibition is general, in consequence of the negative being unrestrictedly expressed.

A vow of performance is fulfilled by a single instance of performance. If a man make a vow that "he will do such a thing," and he should once do it, his vow is fulfilled, as he has not undertaken more than the commission of that act in one single instance unspecified, because such is to be understood from the words by which he binds himself, fulfilment is therefore established, upon his once performing a single instance of the act.

*See Chap. VI., ante p. 162.
saying, "I took it for the owner,"—and the owner denying this,—indemnification is due, according to Hanefia and Mohammed, Aboo Yoosaf says that indemnification is not due, and that the finder's declaration is to be credited, as appearances testify in his behalf, because it is probable that his intention was virtuous, and not criminal. The argument of Hanefia and Mohammed is that the finder has already acknowledged the fact which occasions responsibility (namely, his taking the property of another), and afterwards pleads a circumstance in consequence of which he is discharged from responsibility, by declaring that he had taken the property for the owner: but as this is a doubtful plea, he is not discharged from responsibility: and with respect to what is urged by Aboo Yoosaf, that "appearances testify in the finder's behalf," they say that in the same manner as appearances argue that the finder took the property for the owner, so do they likewise argue that he has taken them for himself, as it is probable that a person who performs acts with respect to property does so for himself, and not for another; and hence, as appearances on both sides lead to opposite conclusions, they are for both sides dropped.

The trove is sufficiently witnessed by the finder's notification of it to the bystanders—In calling people to witness it suffices that the finder say to the bystanders "If ye hear of any one seeking for this trove property, direct him to me;"—and this, whether the trove property consist of a single article, or of numerous articles, because, as the term Lookta is a generic noun, it applies either to a single article, or to several different articles.

A trove under ten dirms must be advertised for some days, and one above ten dirms, for a year—If the trove property be of less value than ten dirms, it behoves the finder to advertise it for some days—that is, for so long as he deems expedient,—but if it exceed ten dirms in value, he must advertise it for the space of a year. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this is one opinion from Hanefia. Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, maintains that the finder should advertise it for the space of a year, whether the value be great or small (and such is also the opinion of Shafei), as the Prophet has said "the person who takes up a trove property must advertise it for a year,"—without making any distinction between a small property and a great property. The reason for the former opinion is that the fixing it at the space of a year occurred respecting a trove property of the value of one hundred dirms, which are equal to a thousand dirms; now ten dirms, or anything above that sum, are the same as a thousand dirms with respect to the amputation of a thief's hand, or the legalizing of generation,* whence it is enjoined to advertise a trove property for a year, out of caution; but anything short of ten dirms does not resemble a thousand dirms with respect to any of those particulars, whence this point is left to the discretion of the finder of a property of that value. Some allege that the approved opinion is that there is no particular space of time, this being left entirely to the discretion of the finder, who must advertise the trove property until he see reason to conclude that it will never be called for by the owner, and must then bestow it in alms. All that is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that the trove property is of a lasting and unperishable nature: but if it be of a perishable nature, and unfit to keep it must be advertised until it is in danger of perishing and must then be bestowed in alms. It is proper to remark that the finder must make advertisement of the trove property in the place where he found it, and also in other places of public resort, as by advertising it in such places it is most probable that the owner may recover it.

A trove of an insignificant nature may be converted by the finder to his own use.—If the trove property be of such a nature as that it is known that the owner will not call for it (such as date-stones, or pomegranate skins), it is the same as if the owner had thrown it away, insomuch that it is lawful to use it without advertisement; but yet it still continues the property of the owner, as transfer to a person unknown is not valid.

If the owner do not in due time appear, the finder may either bestow the property in alms, or keep it for the owner.—If the finder duly advertise the trove property, and discover the proprietor, it is well:—but if he cannot discover him, he has two things at his option;—if he choose; he may bestow it in alms, because it is incumbent to restore the property to the owner as far as may be possible, and this is to be effected either by giving the actual property to the owner, where he is discovered or by bestowing it in alms, so as that a return for it (namely, the merit) may reach the owner, as he will assent, upon hearing of its having been so bestowed or if the finder choose, he may continue to keep the property, in hopes of discovering the owner and restoring it to him.

Where the trove has been bestowed in alms, the owner may either ratify the alms-gift.—If the finder of a trove property discover the owner, after having bestowed it in alms, the owner has two things at his option:—if he choose, he may approve of and confirm the charity, in which case he has the merit of it; because, although the finder has bestowed it in alms by permission of the law, yet as the owner has not consented to it, so doing the alms-gift remains suspended upon his consent to it: as the pauper, however, becomes endowed with the property in question previous to his consent, it does not remain suspended upon the continuance of the subject* (contrary to a case of sale by an unauthorized person; in other words, if an unauthorized person execute a sale, the validity of it depends upon the continuance of the subject;† that is, upon the property sold, because the purchaser does not become endowed with it until after consent):

Or take indemnification from the finder.—On, if the owner choose, he may take an indemnification from the finder, because he has bestowed a property upon the poor without consent of the proprietor.

Objection.—It would appear that indemnification is not in umbent upon the finder, as he has bestowed the property in alms, and the consent of the law does not impose the obligation of responsibility, in the same manner as where a person eats the property of another when perishing with famine; for in this case he owes indemnification, although he be permitted by the law to eat another's property in such a situation; and so also in the case in question.

Or from the pauper upon whom it has been bestowed.—On, if the owner choose, he may take indemnification from the pauper, where the trove property has perished in his hands,—because he has taken possession of the property of another person without his consent.

Or, if still existing, may claim restitution of it.—On, if the property be remaining in the hands of the pauper, the owner may take it from him, as he thus recovers his actual property.

Objection.—It has been already stated that the pauper becomes endowed with the property previous to the owner's consent; whence it would appear that the owner has no right to restitution.

Reple.—Establishment of property does not oppose a right to restitution; in the same manner as a donor is at liberty to resume his gift, although the donee have become proprietor upon taking possession of it.

Stray animals ought to be secured and taken care of for the owner.—It is laudable to secure and take care of strayed cattle; such as oxen, goats, or camels. Malik and Shafei maintain that where a person finds strayed camels or oxen in the desert,† it is most eligible to leave them, the seizing of them being abominable; and concerning the securing of strayed horses there is the same difference of opinion. The argument of Malik and Shafei is that illegality is originally connected with taking the property of another, which is not allowable except where there is apprehension of its perishing if it be not taken; but where a trove property is of such a nature as to be capable of repelling beasts of prey (such as oxen, who may repel them with their horns, or camels and horses, who may repel them with their hoofs or their teeth), there is little apprehension of its perishing: it is still however to be suspected that it will perish, and hence it is declared abominable to secure it, and most laudable to leave it.* The argument of our doctors is that the animals in question are trove property, and there is reason to apprehend their perishing, whence it is laudable to secure and adverties them, in order that the property may be preserved, in the same manner as the securing of strayed goats is laudable according to all.

But he is not responsible to the finder for the subsistence, unless it be furnished by order of the magistrate.—If, moreover, the finder give subsistence to troves of this description without authority from the magistrate, it is a gratuitous act, because of his not possessing any authority: but if he give subsistence by order of the magistrate, it is a debt upon the owner, because the magistrate is endowed with authority over the property of an absentee for the purpose of enabling him to act with kindness to the absentee; and the giving of subsistence is a kindness on some occasions as shall be demonstrated elsewhere.

Who, if they be fit for hire, must direct them to be hired out for that purpose. If the question respecting the subsistence of the troves be brought before the magistrate, he must inquire into the particulars; and if the troves be capable of hire (such as horses, camels or oxen), he must order them to be hired out, and subsisted from their hire, because in this case the animals continue the property of the owner without subjecting him to any debt (and a similar judgment must be passed with respect to fugitive slaves):

Or, if unfit, to be sold and the price retained for the owner.—But if the troves be unfit for hire (such as goats or sheep), and it be apprehended that, if the finder were to subsist them, the subsistence would equal their value, the magistrate must direct them to be sold, and the price to be kept in such a manner that the troves may be virtually pre-

* "Upon the continuance of the subject."
That is, upon the continuance of the property in the hands of either the donor or the proprietor.
† That is, upon the continuance of the property, which is the subject of the sale, in the hands of the owner.
‡ Arab. Sihra. This is the term applied in general to the extensive and barren deserts of Arabia; it also means any waste or unenclosed land.

* This is strange reasoning; it may perhaps have some reference to predestination; i.e. as those animals seem destined to perish, it is impious to attempt to prevent this destiny.
† By the term kindness is here and elsewhere meant a due attention to the interest of the party concerned.
served, in their value, because the preservation of them in substance is impracticable.

Unless he think fit to order them a subsistence, which is in that case a debt upon the owner.—If, however, the magistrate deem it fit to give subsistence; he must adjudge subsistence to be given, making the same a debt upon the owner of the animals,—because the magistrate is appointed for the purpose of exercising humanity and kindness; and the giving of subsistence is a kindness both to the owner and to the finder;—to the owner, because his property is thus preserved to him in subsistence; and to the finder, because the subsistence he furnishes is thus made a debt upon the owner.

But subsistence must not be ordered for more than a few days—The learned in the law, however, have said that the magistrate is to issue the order for subsistence only for the term of two or three days, in hopes that the owner may appear; and that if the owner shall not appear, he must then order the troves to be sold, because to afford subsistence to them for a continuance would be to eradicate the property, whence there would be no kindness in affording them subsistence for a long term (that is, for a term beyond three days).

Nor unless the finder produce evidence in proof of the trove.—It is observed, in the Mabsoot, that the production of evidence is requisite,—that is, the magistrate is not to give an order for subsisting the animal, except where the finder produces evidence to prove that "such an animal is a trove;" and this is approved, because it is possible that he may have obtained possession of the animal by usurpation, and in a case of usurpation the magistrate does not give an order for subsistence, but directs the thing usurped to be restored to the owner, except in a case of deposit, which cannot be proved without evidence; the production of evidence, therefore, is essentially requisite, in order that the actual state of the case may be ascertained.

Objection.—Evidence is not admissible without an adversary; and in the case in question there is no adversary:—how, therefore, can evidence be admitted?

Reply.—The evidence, in the present case, is not required for the purpose of a judicial decree, so as to make the existence of an adversary a necessary condition.

If the finder have no evidence, the order for subsistence must be conditioned upon the veracity of his declaration.—If the finder say: "I have no evidence of the animal being with me as a trove," still as it is apparent that it is a trove, the magistrate must say, "Subsist this animal, provided your declaration be true!" and then, if the finder's declaration be true, he will have a claim upon the owner for the subsistence but not if he be an usurper.

The finder has no claim upon the owner for the subsistence, unless the magistrate expressly declare, in his order, that the owner is responsible for the same;—It is here necessary to remark that what is advanced above, that "the magistrate must adjudge subsistence to be given, making the same a debt upon the owner of the animals," plainly implies that the finder will have no claim upon the owner for such subsistence, upon his appearing at a time when the trove has not yet been sold, unless the magistrate, in his decree, direct that "he shall have such a claim upon him;"—but if the magistrate should not thus have rendered the subsistence a debt upon the owner, the finder would have no claim upon him for it:—this is approved doctrine. Some say that the finder has a claim upon the owner for the subsistence, where he furnishes it by order of the magistrate whether the magistrate may have explicitly declared the same to be a debt upon the owner or not.

But he may detain the trove from the owner until he be paid for the subsistence:—Upon the owner appearing, the finder is at liberty to detain the trove, until he pay him for the subsistence; because the finder has preserved the trove, and kept it alive by subsisting it. The case is therefore the same as if the owner had obtained his right of property through the finder; and consequently the trove resembles an article of sale; that is, in the same manner as the seller is entitled to detain the article sold until the purchaser produce the price, so also, the finder is entitled to detain the trove until the owner produce an equivalent for the subsistence. The finder, moreover, resembles a person who apprehends and brings back a fugitive slave, that is, in the same manner as that person is entitled to detain the slave on account of a recompense (since it may be said that he has preserved him), so also, the finder is a liberty to detain the trove on account of the subsistence to be afforded to it, since he has thus preserved it alive.

If, however, the trove perish in the finder's possession after detention, he has no claim.—It is to be observed that the debt for subsistence is not extinguished by the circumstance of the trove perishing in the hands of the finder, before his detention of it: but it is extinguished by the trove perishing in the hands of the finder, before his detention of it: but it is extinguished by the trove perishing in the hands of the finder, before his detention of it; and as debt is extinguished by the destruction of the pledge, so in the same manner the debt for subsistence is extinguished by the trove perishing after detention.

TROVES of unlawful articles are to be advertised and disposed of in the same manner as those of lawful articles.—TROVES of lawful articles and of unlawful are the same, in this respect, that the finder is to advertise them for a year. Shafei contends that an unlawful article is to be advertised until the owner appear, because the "Troves of a ROMANCE thing is not lawful to any but the MOONSHID" (that is, the claimant or the owner): and it thus appearing that the trove is unlawful to any except the owner, it is indispensable that
The argument of our doctors is that possession or seisin is a right which may be desirable, in the same manner as actual property in a thing, wherefore no person is entitled to claim the possession of it but through proof, that is, through evidence, in the same manner as no one is entitled to claim the property in it, but through evidence—"but yet it is lawful for the finder to surrender the trove to the claimant, upon his describing the tokens, because the Prophet has said, "If the owner appear, and describe the thing which contains the trove, and the quantity of the contents, let the finder surrender it to him:"—that is, it is allowable to surrender it to him; for the ordinance here is merely of a permissive nature, since it appears, in the Hadees Mashhoor, that the claimant must produce evidence, and the defendant must swear,—which evinces that the command contained in this saying is of a permissive and not of an injunctive nature, otherwise it would not be incumbent upon the claimant to produce evidence.

The finder surrendering a trove upon description of the tokens, without evidence, must take security from the claimant.—When the claimant describes the tokens of the trove, without producing evidence, and the finder surrenders it to him, it is incumbent on the finder to take security from him out of caution; and concerning this point there is no difference of opinion (according to the Rawayet Saheeh) because here the finder requires the security for himself.† This is contrary to the case of security required in behalf of an absentee heir;—that is, where the Kazee distributes the effects of a person deceased among such of his heirs as are present,—in this case there is a difference of opinion concerning his requiring security of the present heirs, in behalf of an absent heir, provided such should hereafter appear; for, according to Haneefa, security is not required in behalf of the absentee heir, but according to the two disciples security is so required.

The finder is not to be compelled to surrender the trove, although he acknowledge the right of the claimant.—If any person claim a trove and the finder verify his claim, yet some say that the Kazee must not compel him to surrender the trove—similar to the case of an agent empowered to take possession of a deposit; in other words, if any person plead that "he is an agent empowered to take possession of a deposit from such a person," and the trustee verify his declaration, yet he is not compelled to surrender the deposit to the agent; and so here likewise. Some, on the contrary, say that compulsion

* Literally, "advertise the bag or purse containing the trove, and its tying and then advertise the trove for a year.
† As he still has a claim of restitution, (See Vol. II., p. 212.)

‡ The difference here turns solely upon the sense in which the term Moonshid is to be taken. Moonshid literally signifies a person who points to the place where any thing is lost,—a description which applies equally to the loser or the finder. Shafei takes it in the former sense, and Haneefa in the latter.
may be used, because in the case in question, the owner is a person unknown, whereas, in the case of a deposit, the owner of the deposit is a person who is known, whence the possessor cannot be compelled to surrender it to the agent, he not being the owner.

A trove cannot be bestowed in alms upon a rich person.—The finder must not bestow the trove in alms upon a rich person, because the Prophet has said, “If the owner of a trove property appear, BESTOW IT IN ALMS;” and it is not lawful to bestow alms upon an opulent person; a trove, therefore, resembles Zakat.

Nor can the finder (if rich) lawfully convert it to his own use.—If the finder be in opulent circumstances, it is not lawful for him to derive any advantage from the trove. Shafei affirms that this is lawful, because the Prophet said to Yawabee, who had found an hundred deenars, “If the owner come, surrender the trove to him; but if not, make use of it;”—and yet Yawabee was in opulent circumstances. Moreover, the use of the trove is allowed to the finder, where he happens to be in indigent circumstances, only in order that this permission may be a motive to him to take up the trove, in such a manner that it may be preserved; in other words, the finder, in hope of this advantage, will take up the trove from the ground, and it will thus be preserved from perishing. Now, the poor and the rich are both alike in this particular; and consequently, the finder who is rich may lawfully convert it to his own use, in the same manner as one who is poor. The argument of our doctors is that a trove is the property of another, and hence it is not allowable to derive an advantage from it without his permission, because the passages in the sacred writings which prohibit the enjoyment of another’s property are generally expressed.—The use, moreover, is, permitted to the poor (contrary to what analogy would suggest), in consequence of the saying of the Prophet already mentioned, and of the opinion of all the doctors; and therefore, any others than those remain under the original predicament, which is an inhibition of the use.—With respect to what Shafei urges (that “the use of the trove is allowed to the finder where he happens to be in indigent circumstances, only in order that this permission may be a motive to him to take up the trove, so that it may be preserved, in which particular the rich and the poor are both alike”), we reply that this reasoning is not admitted: because a rich person may sometimes take up a trove from the ground under the idea that he may himself possibly become a pauper within the term prescribed for advertisement and a poor person, on the other hand, may sometimes neglect to take up a trove under the idea that he may, possibly become rich within that term; what Shafei urges, therefore, under this idea, is no ground of argument. With respect to the instance adduced of Yawabee, it is to be considered that he converted the trove to his own use by permission of the Imam; and the use of a trove, by permission of the Imam, is lawful.

The finder, if poor, may convert the trove to his own use, or, if rich, may bestow it upon his poor relation.—If the finder of a trove be poor, he need not hesitate to make use of the trove, since in such a disposal of it a kindness is performed both to the owner and to the finder.† Upon the same principle, also, it is lawful to bestow it upon any other poor person; thus if the finder be rich, and his parents, children, or wives poor, he may bestow the trove in alms upon them, for the reason above alleged.

OF MAFKOODS, OR MISSING PERSONS.

Definition of Mafkood.—Mafkood, in its literal sense, means lost and sought after. In the language of the law it signifies a person who disappears, and of whom it is not known whether he be living or dead, or where he resides.

When a person disappears, the Kazee must appoint a trustee to manage his affairs.—If a person disappear, and it be not known whether he be dead or alive, or where he resides, the Kazee must appoint some person to look after his property; and to manage his affairs, and maintain his rights: because the Kazee is appointed for the purpose of attending to the interests of all such as are unable to attend to their own concerns; and as a missing person is of this description (whence he stands in the same predicament with an infant or an idiot), it is for his interest to appoint a person to look after his property and manage his affairs.

Who is empowered to take possession of all acquisitions arising to him.—By what is above stated, that “the person appointed by the Kazee shall maintain the rights of the missing person,‘ is meant that this person shall take possession of all acquisitions arising to the missing person from his tenements, lands, or effects, and also of such debts as are acknowledged by his debtors;—and that he shall also prosecute for debts owing in consequence of

*Afterhaving duly advertised it, as before directed.
†Because the finder thus obtains a relief from his wants, and the owner has the merit of the charity.
contracts entered into by himself* and which are disputed by the debtor, as the rights of the contract appertain to him, he being the contractor.

But cannot prosecute for disputed debts, or deposits.—But he is not to prosecute on account of debts owing in consequence of any contract entered into by the missing person, and which are disputed by the debtors; nor can he prosecute for the missing person’s share in lands or effects, in the hands of a third person, who disputes the same: because he is neither the principal, nor the deputy of the principal, being no more than merely an agent for seisin on the part of the Kazee, who is not empowered to prosecute, according to the united opinion of our three doctors; —for their only difference of opinion is with respect to an agent for seisin appointed by the proprietor himself, in a case of debt whom Haneefa holds to be empowered to prosecute, whereas the two disciples deny him this power.—The reason of this is that if it were lawful for the Kazee’s agent for seisin to prosecute, and he were to prosecute accordingly, and the debtor to produce evidence proving that the missing person had already received the debt, or discharged it, the Kazee must necessarily pass a decree accordingly, and neiis would be a decree against an absentee, which is unlawful.—It is not lawful for him, therefore, to prosecute, except where the Kazee is of opinion (with the sect of Shafei), that it is lawful to pass a decree against an absentee, and he directs accordingly, in which case it is lawful, because a decree is of which it is passed in any case concerning which there is a difference of opinion.†

Objection.—The point upon which the difference of opinion rests, on the present occasion, is the decree itself; and hence the case requires that the validity of the decree be suspended upon the warranty of another Kazee.‡

Reply.—The decree itself is not what the difference of opinion rests upon in the present instance, but the cause of the decree, namely, the evidence, the point of difference being, merely, whether evidence, where there is no actual prosecutor, amounts to proof? —and where the Kazee is of opinion that the evidence amounts to proof, and directs accordingly, his decree is legal and valid.

The missing person’s perishable effect must be told.—It is to be observed that if there be, among the effects of the missing person, articles, of a perishable nature (such as fruit, and so forth) the Kazee must sell them: because, as the preservation of them both in substance and in effect is impracticable, they are to be preserved in effect.

But not those which are unperishable.—But he is not to sell any articles not liable to perish, either on account of subsistence, or for any other purpose, because the Kazee is invested with authority, with respect to an absentee, for the conservation of his property and hence it is incumbent upon him to preserve it in substance where that is practicable.

Subsistence must be afforded, out of the effects, to the parents and children of the missing person; and to all others who, with a decree, were entitled to it during his presence.—The Kazee is to give subsistence to the wife and children of a missing person out of his property. This rule is not restricted to his immediate children, but extends to all related to him in the time of paternity, such as the father, the grandfather, the son’s son, and so forth; for it is a rule that every person entitled to a subsistence from the property of the missing person whilst he was present, independent of an order from the Kazee (such as his infant children, and adult daughters, or adult sons who are disabled) must in his absence be furnished with a subsistence, out of his property, by the Kazee: —but to those who, whilst the missing person was present, had no right to subsistence independent of an order from the Kazee (such as brothers, sisters, or maternal uncles or aunts), no subsistence is, in his absence, to be furnished by the Kazee, because these are entitled to a subsistence only through a decree, and a decree against an absentee is illegal. By the property of the missing person, as here mentioned, is meant money, because the right of the above persons is meat and clothing, and where those are not to be found among the missing person’s effects, there is a necessity for the Kazee to decree the value; and the value consists of cash. Bullion (that is, uncoined gold and silver) is in this respect subject to the same rule with cash, since that also admits of being given as value, in the same manner as cash. This is where the Kazee has money in his hand.

Where there are no effects in the Kazee’s hands, he may, furnished with a decree, pay the subsistence of a missing person. —If, however, there be no money in his hands, but there happen to be some in trust, in the hands of another persons,—or a debt owing from some other person, the Kazee is in that case to provide the subsistence from such deposit or debt, where the trustee or debtor acknowledges the deposit or debt, and also the marriage or parentage. This acknowledgment, however, is necessary only where these points are not fully known to the Kazee; for if they be fully known to him, the acknowledgment is not requisite.—If, on the other hand, some of these points be known (such as the debt and the deposit), and others unknown (such as the marriage or the parentage), or vice versa, in this case the acknowledgment is requisite with respect to that which is unknown; this is approved. If the trustee or debtor furnish the subsistence without an order from the Kazee, the trustee is responsible for such disbursement, and the debtor is not discharged from his debt, because in so doing they have not paid anything either to the owner or to his representative; contrary to where they furnish subsistence by order of the Kazee, because he appears as representative of the owner.

If the trustee or debtor deny the deposit or debt, together with the marriage and parentage, or if they deny the marriage and parentage only, in this case the person entitled to subsistence cannot be admitted, as plaintiffs, to prove and establish those points which the trustee or debtor denies; because a claim is not admitted, unless it be laid against either the principal, or his representative; and the principal, in the present instance, is absent; and the debtor or trustee are not either actually or virtually his representative?—they evidently are not actually so, because he has not constituted any person his agent; nor are they virtually so, because, in the prosecution of the plaintiff's claim against the absentee, the specification of the occasion of the claim is no good plea for the establishment of his right (not subsistence from the property in the debtor's or trustee's hands).—since, in the same manner as subsistence is due from that property, it is also due from any other property belonging to the missing person; the debtor or trustee are therefore not virtually the missing person's representatives.

The Kazee cannot effect a separation between a missing person and his wife.—The Kazee is not empowered to effect a separation between a missing person and his wife. Malik maintains that, at the expiration of four years the Kazee may pronounce a separation, after which the wife is to observe an edit of four months and ten days, such being the edit of widowhood.—and she may then marry whoever she pleases; because Omar thus decreed with respect to a person who disappeared from Medina; and also, because a missing person, by his absence, obstructs

*Meaning, the circumstance of "the trustee or debtor having property belonging to the missing person in his hands," which is not admitted as a plea on behalf of the plaintiff, since his subsistence is equally due from any other part of the missing person's property, the woman's right:—the Kazee, therefore, must pronounce a separation between the parties after the lapse of a certain time, because of the analogy this case bears to that of Aila, or of impotence;—that is to say, in the same manner as, in a case of Aila, an irreversible divorce takes place at the end of four months, on account of the husband, by Aila, obstructing his wife's right,—and in the same manner also as in a case of impotence, the Kazee pronounces a separation at the end of the year, on account of the husband thus obstructing his wife's right,—so likewise, in the case in question, the Kazee must pronounce a separation, for the same reason:—and the case of absence being equally analogous to a case of Aila and of impotence, the length of the term is adjusted with a regard to both, by adopting the number four from Aila, and the term year from impotence, so as to make practice in this particular accord in the same manner with the other two. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold: first, the prophet once declared, with respect to the wife of a missing person, "She is his wife until such time as his death or divorce shall appear:" and Alee also said, with respect to the wife of a Mafkood, "She is a mourner, wherefore she must be patient, until she be perfectly informed of his death, or of his having divorced her."—Secondly, the existence of the marriage is notorious; and as the mere disappearance of the husband is not a sufficient cause of separation, and his death be a matter of uncertainty, it follows that the marriage cannot be dissolved, because of the doubt. With respect to the authority of Omar, as cited by Malik, we reply that he afterwards adopted the opinion of Alee, and to what he further urges respecting the analogy between the case in question, and a case of Aila, it is not admitted; because Aila, in times of ignorance, was an immediate divorce, but the law afterwards constituted it a deliberate divorce; and hence it is that Aila occasions a separation. In the same manner also the analogy urged by him between the case in question and a case of impotence is not admitted; because where a husband disappears, it is possible that he may reappear, whereas it is not possible that an impotent person should recover his virility after his impotence has continued for above a year.

The missing person is to be declared a defunct:—When one hundred and twenty years shall have elapsed from the day of the missing person's birth, he is to be declared defunct. — The compiler of Hedaya remarks that Hassan has related this as an opinion of Haneefa. According to the Zahir Rawayet, this point is to be determined by the decease of the co-evals of the missing person, or of his equals — that is, those who are known to resemble him in health and habits of body. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the term is one hundred years. — Some of the learned, again, fix it at ninety years. Analogy requires that the term should not be fixed at any particular period, such as one hundred years, or ninety years, since to fix a time merely from judgment or opinion is illegal: but yet it is requisite that it be fixed by some specific standard, such as the demise of the missing person’s co-evals, because, if no criterion whatever was established, his decease could never be declared.

At the end of ninety years from his birth. — The benevolence of the law, however, suggests that the term be fixed at ninety years, as this is the shortest fixed term mentioned; and it is difficult to ascertain anything by the circumstances of the demise of the missing person’s co-evals or equals.

When his wife is to observe an edit of widowhood. — Upon the death of the missing person being duly declared, his wife must observe her edit for four months and ten days from the date of the declaration, such being the edit of widowhood.

And his property is divided among his living heirs. — And his property is to be divided among such of his heirs as are then living; the case, therefore, is the same as if he had actually died upon the instant of the declaration, and hence any person who died previous to the declaration does not inherit of him.

A missing person’s right of inheritance from a relation cannot be established during his disappearance. — If the relation of a missing person die during his disappearance, the missing person is not an heir, because his existence at the time is established merely from circumstances, as having been once known, and consequently accounted to continue so long as nothing appears to the contrary. Now mere circumstantial evidence is but weak, and therefore incapable of constituting proof to a claim (that is, to the establishment of a thing as yet unestablished); although it constitute proof sufficient for repulsion (that is to say, to prove the continuance of a thing already established).

But his portion is held in suspense. — With respect to the expression “ the missing person is not an heir,” it means that, whatever may be his portion of inheritance, he does not obtain a property in it, but it is held in suspense; because his being in life is doubtful; and this is a sufficient cause of suspense.

And at the end of the ninety years (if he do not appear in the interim), is divided among the other heirs. — If, therefore, he afterwards appear to be living, it goes to him; but if there be no evidence of his being in life when ninety years have elapsed, his portion, which has been so suspended, is then to be distributed among those who were heir, and the original proprietor at the period of his demise, as in the case of embryos in the womb. In the same manner, also, if a person make a bequest to a missing person, and the testator die, the bequest does not take place, but is held in suspense, because bequest stands upon a similar footing with inheritance.

Disposal of inheritance in case of a co-heir. — It is a rule that if there be another heir beside the missing person who is not entirely precluded by the missing person, but whose right is diminished by his intervention, this heir is to receive that which is the least of the two portions of inheritance and the remainder is held in suspense. If, on the other hand, there be an other heir, who is entirely precluded by the missing person, no part of the inheritance is to be paid to him, but the whole portion of inheritance must be held in suspense. An example, in illustration of this case, is as follows: — A person dies, leaving two daughters, and a son who has disappeared; and also a son’s son, and a son’s daughter; and his estate is in the hands of a stranger: and the above heirs and the stranger, all agree that the son of the deceased is a missing person; and the two daughters demand their inheritance; in which case they are paid their moiety out of the deceased’s estate, as this is their undoubted share: but the other moiety, which is the portion of the missing person, is held in suspense, and no part of it paid to the son’s children, because they are entirely precluded by the missing person if he be living, and are therefore not entitled to receive the inheritance, because of the doubt; and this remaining moiety is not to be taken out of the hands of the stranger, unless he be discovered in some dishonest practices — Opposite to the example of the missing person is the case of a foetus in the womb, for whom a child’s inheritance is reserved, according to an opinion upon which decrees are passed. If, also, there be another heir beside the foetus, who is not in any circumstance precluded, nor his portion altered by the intervention of the foetus, his complete portion is paid to him: but if this heir be such as is entirely precluded by the intervention of the foetus, nothing whatever is paid to him. Thus, if a man die, leaving a maternal sister and a pregnant wife, the thing whatever is paid to the sister, as she is entirely precluded from inheritance by the intervention of a child whether male or female. If, on the other hand, the heir be one whose share is altered by the intervention of the foetus, in this case the smaller of the two portions is paid to him, as this smaller share is his undoubted right, in the same manner as in the case of a missing person. For instance, a man dies, and leaves a pregnant wife, and a mother who acknowledges the pregnancy, in which case the wife is paid an eighth and the mother a sixth; because, if the foetus be born alive, the wife would receive an eighth, and the mother a sixth; but if it be not born alive, the wife would receive a fourth, and the mother a third. A sixth and an eighth are therefore paid immediately, as these are their portions at all events.

BOOK XIV OF SHIRKAT, OR PARTNERSHIP

Definition of Shirkat.—Shirkat, in its primitive sense, signifies the conjunction of two or more estates, in such a manner, that one of them is not distinguishable from the other. The term Shirkat, however, is extended to contracts, although there be no actual conjunction of estates, because a contract is the cause of such conjunction. In the language of the Law it signifies the union of two or more persons in one concern.

Partnership is Lawful.—Partnership is lawful, because in the time of the Prophet men were accustomed to have transactions in partnership, and the Prophet confirmed them therein.

And of two kinds; by right of property and by contract.—Partnership is of two kinds, shirkat Milk, or partnership by the right of property, and Shirkat Akid, or partnership by contract.

Partnership by right of property is either optional, or compulsory; and does not admit of either partner acting with respect to the other's share. Shirkat Milk applies where two or more persons are proprietors of one thing; and it is of two different natures, optional and compulsory: optional, where two persons make a joint purchase of one specific article; or where it is presented to them as a gift, and they accept of it; or where it is left to them, jointly, by bequest, and they accept of it; or where they both obtain possession, by conquest, of one specific article in an enemy's country; or where they unite their respective properties in such a way is that one is not distinguishable from the other (such as the mixture of wheat with barley); or where it may be difficult to distinguish them (as in a mixture of wheat with barley); and compulsory, where the properties of two persons become united without their act, under such circumstances as render it difficult or impossible to distinguish between them; or, where two persons inherit one property. In this species of partnership, therefore, it is not lawful for one partner to perform any act with respect to the other's share, without his permission, each being as a stranger with respect to the other's share. It is, however, lawful for either partner to sell his own share to the other partner, in all the cases here stated:—and he may also sell his share to others without his partner's consent, excepting only in cases of association or a mixture of property, for in both these instances one partner cannot lawfully sell the share of the other to a third person without his partner's permission. The distinctions upon this point are related in the Kafayat-al-Mooniihee.

Partnership of contract—Shirkat Akid or partnership by contract, is effected by proposal and consent,—that is, by one person saying to another, "I have made you my partner in such a property," &c. and the other replying, "I consent," and it is a condition of the contract that the concern respecting which it is made be of such a nature as to admit of delegation, in order that the acquisition arising from it may be participated in by both parties, and that thus the effect or design may be established,—in other words, that the acquisition may become equally the property of both.

Is of four descriptions, by reciprocity, in traffic, in arts, and upon personal credit.—Partnership by compact is of four kinds, viz:

I.—Shirkat-Mofawizat, or partnership by reciprocity.
II.—Shirkat-Aiman, or partnership in traffic.
III.—Shirkat-Sinnaia— or partnership in arts.
IV.—Shirkat-woodjoo, or partnership upon personal credit.

Description of partnership by reciprocity. —Shirkat-Mofawizat, or partnership by reciprocity, is where two men, being the equals of each other, in point of property privileges, and religious persuasion, enter into a contract of co-partnership:—because this species of partnership is an universal partnership in all transactions, where each partner reciprocally commits the business of the partnership to the other, without limitation or restriction: for the term Mofawizat, in its literal sense, means equality.

It requires equality in point of capital:—It is therefore indispensable that a perfect equality exist throughout, in the property, that is, in the partnership capital, such as dirms and deernars.—(No regard, however, is paid to an excess in anything beyond the partnership capital, such as goods or effects, lands, or debts.)

And of privileges:—In the same manner, it

* The commentators define it partnership in purchase and sale. The term does not admit of any literal translation.
is indispensable that an equality exist with respect to privileges;* because, if either partner were endowed with privileges not vested in the other, there could be no perfect equality.

And similarity of religion and of sect.—In the same manner also, equality is indispensable in point of religion and of sect, as shall be hereafter demonstrated. Partnership by reciprocity is lawful, upon a favourable construction;—but, according to analogy, it is unlawful. This, also, is one opinion of Shafei. Malik says, "I know not what Moffawizat is!"—Analogy would suggest that a partnership of this description is unlawful,—because it includes a power of agency with respect to an unknown subject, and also an obligation of security with respect to a thing underfined; and as each of these, individually, is illegal: it follows that, when united, they are illegal a fortiori. The reason for a more favourable construction upon this point is that the Prophet has said, "Enter into partnerships by reciprocity, for in that there is great advantage." In this manner, also, men had transactions together, no person forbidding them Analogy, therefore, is abandoned. Ignorance; moreover, in the contract in question, is lawful as a dependant of another circumstance,—that is, as a dependant of equality;—in the same manner as in a contract of Mozarabat, where the contract comprehended a commission of agency for the purchase and sale of article unknown, which commission is in itself illegal, but is nevertheless lawful in a contract of Mozarabat, as a dependant of the contract; and so also in the case in question.

The term reciprocity must also be expressed in the contract.—A contract of reciprocity is not complete unless reciprocity be expressly mentioned in it, by the parties declaring "we are partners, in a partnership by reciprocity,"—because the conditions of it cannot otherwise be known. If however, in entering into such a contract, they declare all the conditions of it, the contract is lawful, although the term reciprocity be not particularly expressed in it, because regard is had to the sense, and not to the letter.

It is lawful between free adults, whether Mussulmans or Zimmee.—A contract of reciprocity is lawful between two adults who are free, whether they be both Mussulmans, or both Zimmee, since, in either case, an equality exists between the parties. If one of them, also, be a scriptural Zimmee,† and the other a Pagan, the contract is lawful, because infidelity is one general description with respect to faith, and hence equality in point of religion exists in this instance.

It is not lawful between a slave and a free man or an infant and an adult.—A contract of reciprocity is not lawful between a slave and a freeman or between an infant and an adult; because equality does not exist in those instances;—as an adult freeman is competent to transact business, and to give bail whereas a slave is not competent in either of those points but by consent of his master; and an infant is not at all competent to give bail, nor to transact business, but by permission of his guardian.

Or a Mussulman and an infidel.—A contract of reciprocity is not lawful between a Mussulman and an infidel, according to Haneefa and Mohammad Aboo Yoosaf alleges that it is lawful, because equality exists between those in point of agency and bail, since in the same manner as it is lawful for a Mussulman to be an agent or a surety, so is it also for an infidel: and with respect to those particular transactions which are lawful to one of those, and not to the other (such, for instance, as dealings in wine or pork), they are not regarded, in the same manner as a similar difference is not regarded where a Haneefite enters into a contract of reciprocity with a follower of Shafei, for here the contract is lawful, notwithstanding the different tenets of those sects respecting wilful dealings in the offspring of Tasseemas,* which are held to be lawful by the followers of Shafei; but which are deemed illegal by the Haneefites, as being (according to them) forbidden. Such a contract, however, between a Mussulman and a Zimmee is nevertheless abominable (according to Aboo Yoosaf); as Zimmee frequently enter into engagements of an unlawful nature, in consequence of which a Mussulman might fall into what is prohibited. The argument of Haneefa and Muhammed is that the two persons in question are not upon an equality in point of power of action,—because, if a Zimmee purchase wine or pork with the capital stock, the purchase is valid, whereas, if a Mussulman were to purchase these articles it is invalid: hence the parties are not upon an equal footing in point of transaction.

Nor between two slave, two infants, or two Mokatibs.—A contract of reciprocity is not valid between two slaves, two infants, or two Mokatibs, because a contract of reciprocity is founded upon each party being surety for the other, and the bail of such persons is invalid. It is to be observed, however, that on all occasions where a contract of reciprocity proves invalid from the non-existence of some of its conditions, and those conditions are not requisite in Ainan (or partnership in traffic), the contract of reciprocity becomes a contract of partnership in traffic because of the existence of all the conditions requisite in such a contract.

It comprehends both agency and bail.—A contract of reciprocity comprehends the properties both of agency and bail. It comprehends the property of agency, because if each of the contracting parties were not the agent of the other, the end (namely, a mutual participation of property), would be defeated. It comprehends the property of bail, because if each party were not surety for the other, the equality, in certain particulars essential to traffic (such as the demand of payment from either of them for purchases made by the other), could not exist.

A purchase made by either partner is participated between both; except in articles of subsistence.—Whatever is purchased by either of two partners under a contract of reciprocity is participated of by both, except the food and clothing purchased by the partner for himself and his family:—because a contract of reciprocity requires that both parties be upon a perfect equality: and as each is the other's substitute in all dealings, is follows that a purchase made by one is equivalent to a purchase by both. This, however, is exclusive of such articles as are here excepted (which exception proceeds upon a favourable construction), as the articles in question must be excluded from a contract of reciprocity, necessarily, because there is perpetual occasion for them: for one partner cannot be made answerable for the other's wants; neither can one of them expend the property of the other in the supply of his own wants; yet the purchase of these articles is indispensable; and, on account of this indispensable necessity, the food and other articles mentioned appertain solely to the purchaser. (Analogy would suggest that those articles also are participated in by both partners, in conformity with what was before advanced, that "a contract of reciprocity requires that both parties be upon a perfect equality.")

The seller of the food or clothing is, however, at liberty to take the price of his commodity from either partner, as he pleases; from the purchaser, evidently, since it was he who bought the article; and also from the other partner, since he is surety for the purchaser; and in this last case the other partner takes from the purchaser a moiety of what he has paid to the seller, as having discharged a debt of the purchaser out of property common to both.

A debt incurred by either partner is obligatory upon the other.—Whatever debt is incurred by either of two partners in reciprocity, for a thing in which partnership holds, the other partner is responsible for the same, in order that equality may be established. Of those things in which partnership holds are sale purchase, and receipt of hire or wages:—and of those in which partnership does not hold are marriage, and divorce for a compensation, composition for blood wilfully shed, and composition for a subsistence, and offences against the person.

Bail for property, engaged in by either partner, is binding upon the other:—If a partner in resiprocitv become, in behalf of a third person, surety for property to a stranger, it is binding upon the other partner likewise, according to Hanefis. The two disciples allege that it is not binding upon the other partner: because a person's becoming surety for another is a gratuitous act* (whence it is that the bail of an infant, a Mazoon, or Mokatib, is invalid:—and also; that if a person give bail upon his deathbed it is valid with respect to a third of his property only):—and as becoming surety is a gratuitous act, it is equivalent to the act of granting a loan, or giving bail for the personal appearance of any one; † in other words, if one of two partners in reciprocity were to grant a loan to a stranger out of the partnership stock, it does not affect the other partner, insomuch that the right of exacting repayment rests solely with the lender, as lending is a gratuitous act:—and in the same manner, if one of two partners in reciprocity become bail for the personal appearance of any one, a requisition for the production of the person bailed cannot be made to the other partner;—and so likewise in the case in question. The argument of Hanefis is that bail for property is gratuitous in its principle, but in its consequence induces a kind of obligation or contract; because in consequence of the bail, the surety is entitled to exact of the person bailed whatever he pays to his creditor, provided the bail had been given with his concurrence. It is therefore comprehended in a contract of reciprocity, with regard to its continuance (and the circumstance of its continuance is the point in question, as we say "it becomes binding upon his partner after becoming so upon himself"). With respect to what the two disciples urge, that "a person's becoming safety for another is a gratuitous act:—whence the bail of an infant, a Mazoon, or Mokatib, is invalid:—and consequently, that it is not comprehended in a contract of reciprocity," we reply that a contract of bail entered into by incompetent persons is invalid in its principle; but in the case in question it is binding upon the other partner in the circumstance of its continuance only. Bail, therefore, with regard to its continuance, as being an act of exchange, bears a relation to traffic; and traffic is comprehended in a contract of reciprocity. If a dying person, on the other hand, enter into a contract of bail, it is valid with respect to a third of his property, in regard to its execution, as well as its continuance. Thus bail for property is not of a gratuitous nature in its continuance, whereas bail for the person, on the contrary, is gratuitous, both in its execution and its continuance. Hence bail for property in no respect analogous to bail for the person. As to what the two disciples further urge, that "if one of two partners in reciprocity were to grant a loan to a stranger out of the partnership stock, it does not affect the other partner, as lending is a gratuitous act"—it is not admitted: because it is recorded from Haneefa, that the act of lending does affect the partner: if, however, it even were admitted by Haneefa, as not affecting the other partner, we reply that a loan in money is equivalent to the act of lending any article of goods or effects; and hence the property paid to the lender by the borrower may be said to be the same identical property which he had borrowed, and not a compensation for it (whence a stipulated time or place of repayment are not valid in it), and therefore, that lending does not bear the property of exchange.

Unless it be engaged in without consent of the suretee.—All which is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the bail for property having been contracted with the concurrence of the person bailed. If, however, it be entered into without his concurrence, it is not binding upon the other partner (according to the Rawayet Saheeh of Haneefa), because in a bail so contracted the property of mutual obligation or exchange does not exist in its continuance. Let it be observed also, that indemnification for usurped property, or indemnification for damages, stand on the same ground as bail for property, these are of retributive nature in their principle.

An accession of property to either partner by gift or inheritance resolves a partnership by reciprocity into a partnership in traffic.—It is a property of such a nature as that partner (according to the Rawayet Saheeh of Haneefa), because in a bail so contracted the property of mutual obligation or exchange does not exist in its continuance,—or, if any person present him with such property, by gift, and he take possession of it,—the contract of reciprocity is null, and the partnership becomes a Shirkat Ainan, because equality in point of property (such as is capable of constituting capital stock) is a condition essential to a contract of reciprocity throughout, and this does not exist in the present case, as the other partner is not a participator in the property so acquired by gift or inheritance. no principle of partnership therein appearing with respect to him. The partnership by reciprocity, however, is resolved into a Shirkat Ainan, or partnership in traffic, as the case admits of such a partnership, equality not being essential thereto; in reciprocity, on the other hand, it is essential, and consequently reciprocity no longer continues. The reason of this is that a contract of reciprocity is not of an absolute nature: now, in a contract which is not of an absolute nature, the rules which govern its continuance and commencement are the same: hence an increase of the capital stock of either part) during its continuance is equivalent to an inequality in its commencement; and as an inequality of capital, in the commencement of a partnership of reciprocity, is prohibitory to contracting it, so, in the same manner, such inequality taking place during its continuance prohibits it;—the contract of reciprocity, therefore, terminates.

Unless the property be of a nature incapable of continuing stock.—If one of two partners in reciprocity inherit goods or effects, these are his sole property; but the contract of reciprocity does not become null (and the same rule also obtains if one of them inherit land): because, as those articles are incapable of constituting capital stock, equality with respect to them is not a condition.

Section.

Partnership by reciprocity cannot be contracted but in cash.—Partnership by reciprocity cannot be contracted but in dirhms, deenars, or fluctuating values. Malik alleges that such a partnership is lawful in goods and effects, and also in all articles estimable by weight (or measurement of capacity, where the species is the same, because a partnership so contracted respects a known and specified capital whence those articles are equivalent to money. It is otherwise in a contract of Mozaribat: for that is restricted solely to cash, the legality of it being contrary to analogy, since under this species of engagement a profit is acquired on property concerning which there is no responsibility (as the manager is not responsible for the money that is loaned), and the Prophet has forbidden the acquisition of gain upon property in which there is no responsibility; the contract, therefore, must not go beyond what is prescribed by the law; and the only thing in which the law declares Mozaribat to be lawful is cash. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, if a contract of reciprocity, in goods and effects, were held to be legal (as maintained by Malik), it would necessarily induce a profit upon a property concerning which there is no responsibility; because, upon each partner in reciprocity selling his own particular capital (consisting of goods and effects), if the goods of one partner produce a greater price than the goods of the other, the excess of profit upon the goods of the former would be due to the latter; and this would be a profit from property for which the person who gains by it is not responsible, and in which he has no right; because in this instance the contract is connected with actual goods, and not with the semblance of them, such as debts; and the goods are a trust in the hands of each partner respectively;—whence it is evident that a profit is induced upon property concerning which there is no responsibility. It is otherwise with cash, because whatever either partner may purchase with the capital stock, consisting of cash, the purchase thereof is not connected with the actual capital, but with its semblance, namely, debt (since the price of it is a debt);—now the purchase being connected with the semblance of the capital (namely, debt, and the other partner also being liable to be called upon for it (as a contract of reciprocity involves mutual bail), it follows that the consequence objected (of profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility) is not induced, since this is a property in which there is responsibility. Secondly, The first transaction in goods and effects is the sale of them; and the first transaction in cash is purchase made with it:—now a person selling his property under the condition of being his partner in the proceeds is unlawful, since this is enduring, with a right of property in the debt, and an endowment of right in a debt, made to any other than the debtor himself, is illegal: on the other hand, his making a purchase with his own property, under the condition of another being his partner in the article purchased, is lawful, since this is enduring with a right of property in an actual substance, and not in a debt.

And copper coinage is comprehended under the head of cash—Falos-Rabittah, or fluctuating copper coin, are connected with dirms and deenars [cash], as a lawful current, in the same manner as gold and silver coin. Mohammed is of this opinion, because he holds that falos are cash, inasmuch that they cannot be particularized by specification; whence it is that if any person were to purchase an article, for certain falos, he is at liberty to give any other falos in place of them; and also, that two specified falos cannot be sold for one falos, according to what is established. According to the two elders, partnership, or Mozaribat, are not lawful in falos, although they be current, as the valuation of them fluctuates from time to time, and they thence become the same as goods or effects. * Abou Yosaf is elsewhere said to entertain the same opinion with Mohammed upon this point. It is also recorded, from Haneefa that a contract of Mozaribat is lawful in current falos; but not a contract of reciprocity. Thus partnership by reciprocity is not lawful in any thing beyond dirms, deenars, and current falos.

vided the partnership be contracted previous to the union or admixture of stocks, in which case it is illegal, and each partner receives the profit arising from his own particular commodity, and the loss upon it also falls on him. If, also, two persons mix homogeneous stocks, and then enter into a contract of partnership, Aboo Yoosaf holds the rule to be the same, and that a partnership by right of property is here established, not a partnership by reciprocity. Such, also, is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet. According to Mohammad, the contract of partnership, in this instance, holds good.

Or (according to Mahammed) in homogeneous stocks, after admixture.—The result of this difference of opinion appears where the property of both partners is equal, and they stipulate a larger profit to one, and a smaller profit to the other:—for in this case, and also to Aboo Yoosaf, each is to receive in proportion to his property, and he in whose favour the larger profit has been stipulated is not on that account entitled to receive any excess; but, according to Mohammad, each is to receive agreeably to what was stipulated. The ground upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds is that articles of weight and measurement of capacity, and so forth, are distinguishable by specification after admixture, in the same manner as before. The argument of Mohammad is that the articles in question are in the same shape, value; for if a person where to sell goods for such articles, so that the price of the goods (consisting of those articles), is a debt upon the purchaser, it is lawful; and, in another shape, they are subjects of sale, as admitting of specification; attention, therefore, is paid to both these circumstances, with respect to situations both of admixture and of non-admixture: in other words, partnership in them, before admixture, is unlawful, as they are then subjects of sale; but after admixture it is lawful, as they then constitute value: contrary to that case of goods and effects of any other description, since these are not value in any shape.

It cannot be contracted respecting heterogeneous stocks—if the stocks [of the respective parties] be of two different species, such as barley and wheat, or olives and pepper, and the proprietor unite them, and then enter into a contract of partnership, it is unlawful according to all our doctors. The reason for this distinction, according to Mohammad, is that whatever is mixed, of one species, is Zootal Irsal; and whatever is mixed, of two different species, is Zootal Keem: now as things of different species, when mixed together, are Zootal Keem, ignorance exists with respect to them (because, it is requisite that appraisers fix the value of them), and they are therefore incapable of constituting capital stock, in the same manner as any other goods or effects:—a partnership in them is consequently invalid; and such being the case, they become subject to the rules in admixture of property, as treated of under the head of Decrees, in the Jama Sagheer and which shall be fully set forth (in this work when we treat of deposits).

Partnership by right of property is affected by each partner selling one half of his stock to the other.—Where two persons are desirous of entering into a contract of partnership in goods and effects, each must sell one half of his own goods in lieu of one half of the goods of the other, so that a Shirkat-Milk, or partnership by right of property may be established between them: and then let them enter into partnership by compact.—(Our author remarks that in this instance a partnership in right of goods is established, but that a partnership by reciprocity is not lawful, as goods and effects are incapable of constituting stock in such a partnership) With respect to what is advanced above, that "each partner must sell one half of his own goods in lieu of one half of the goods of the other." It means, that each is thus to sell a moiety of his goods to the other, provided the value of the goods of each be equal. If, however, the value of the goods of each be different it is requisite that he whose goods are of least value sell such a portion as may suffice to establish a partnership; for instance, if the value of

† Before the respective proportion of each partner, in the capital stock, can be ascertained.
‡ The arguments throughout this and the preceding passages are so much involved in subtle distinction and perplexing casuistry, and are in many places so little capable of an intelligible translation (from the impossibility of rendering clearly the technical terms which so frequently occur in them), as greatly to obscure the matter. The principle upon which the whole turns is that 'a partnership by reciprocity cannot be entered into with respect to any articles which are not standards of value,' and the question is 'what articles these are which may be considered as standards?'—which some of the doctors confine solely to cash in the precious metals: others extend it to bullion; and others, again, to copper coins [fallos]; whilst some include grain, contending that this is a standard of value, and may therefore be used to represent property, in the same manner as cash.
partnership in traffic, it is lawful that the stock of each partner be equal, and that the profit unequally shared.—that is, that it be stipulated that the profit to one partner exceed the profit to the other. Ziffer and Shafei maintain that this is not lawful; for if, with equality of stocks, an inequality of profit be admitted, it induces a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility; because, if the capital appertains to the two in equal shares, and the profit be divided into three lots (for instance), the share in the larger proportion of profit is entitled to a superior profit without any responsibility, since the responsibility is in proportion to the capital;—and also, because a partnership in the profit exists in virtue of partnership in the capital (according to their tenets, whence they likewise hold the aumixture of the property to be condition);—the profit upon the property, therefore, is the same as increase of living stock; and each is consequently entitled thereto, in proportion to his original right of property in the capital. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, the Prophet has said, “The profit between them is according to their agreement, and their loss in proportion to the property of each respectively.” Where no distinction is made between the equality or inequality of their properties:—Secondly, in the same manner as a person is entitled to profit in virtue of property, he is also entitled to it in virtue of labour (as in a case of Mozarib at for instance): it may also sometimes happen that one of the partners is more skilful and expert in business than the other, and consequently, that he will not agree to the other sharing equally in the profit wherein it is requisite that one have a larger share than the other. It would be otherwise if the whole profit were restricted to one of the partners, because in this instance the contract is not a contract of partnership: neither is it a contract of Mozaribat, for if, in Mozaribat, the whole profit be assigned to the manager, it is a loan; or if to the proprietor of the stock, it is a Bazat. With respect to what is object by Ziffer and Shafei, that “if, with equality of stocks, an inequality of profit be admitted it induces a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility,”—we reply that a contract of partnership in traffic resemble a contract of Mozaribat, in this particular, that each party respectively manages with the stock of his partner; and it also resembles partnership by reciprocity, both with regard to its name (as being a partnership), and likewise with regard to the conduct of it, because both partners act in it. In consideration, therefore, of its resemblance to Mozaribat, we determine that it is lawful to stipulate a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility; and, in consideration of its resemblance to partnership by reciprocity, we determine that, if it be stipulated that both partners shall act...
A person may engage a part only of his property in it. It is lawful for either party, in partnership in traffic, to engage in the contract with respect to a part of his property only, and not the whole, because an equality in point of stocks is not essential to it, since the term Ainan does not require it. The stock can only be such as is lawful in reciprocal partnership. — Partnership in traffic is not valid except in such property as is lawful in partnership by reciprocity.

But the respective stocks may be heterogeneous. — It is lawful for two men to engage in a partnership in traffic, where the stock of one party consists of dirms, and that of the other party of deenars, or where on one side it consists of white dirms, and on the other of black dirms. Ziffer and Shafei allege that this is illegal. The difference of opinion founded on a difference of sentiments respecting the admixture of stocks for, according to those two doctors, the subsistence of the capital is essential to the partnership; and that cannot take place where the two stocks are heterogeneous. This point will be more fully treated of hereafter.

Debts only can be claimed from the partner who incurs them. — Where one of two partners in traffic makes a purchase, the demand for the price lies against him, and not against the other partner (because as has been already demonstrated, the contract of partnership in question comprehends agency, but not bail, and the agent is the original with respect to rights). If, however, it be not known whether he has paid the price out of the partnership stock, or out of his own property, except from the declaration of the purchaser himself, it is in this case incumbent upon him to produce proof; because the purchaser here advances a claim for property against his partner; and the partner resists his claim: and the declaration of a defendant (delivered upon oath), is to be credited.

The contract is annulled by the loss of the whole capital; or of the stock of either partner in particular. — If the whole partnership stock or the stock of either partner in particular, perish before any purchase be made, the contract of partnership is annulled: because, in a contract of partnership, the subject of the contract is property (that being specified in a contract of partnership, in the same manner as in a deed of gift, or a will), and, in consequence of the destruction of the subject the contract is dissolved, in the same manner as in sale. It is otherwise in Mozaribat, and singular agency, because in those the dirms or deenars cannot be identified by specification, or in any other mode than by actual seisin. The agency herein mentioned is restricted to the singular description, for the purpose of distinguishing it from the agency implicated in a contract of partnership or of pawnage, because that is annulled by the dissolution of the partnership or the pawnage, as a thing which is comprehended in it, and is annulled by the dissolution comprehended in. An example of singular agency is where a person commissions another to purchase him a slave (for instance), in which case, if he give the agent money for that purpose, and the money perish in the agent's hands, yet the agency is not annulled. "It is otherwise." (says Fakr-al-Islam, in his commentary on the Zeadat), "in cases of Mozaribat and partnership, because the dirms and deenars are in both identified by specification, inasmuch that if the money be lost before delivery, the Mozaribat is annulled." This is contradictory to what our author has above advanced, that, "in Mozaribat and singular agency, the dirms and deenars cannot be identified by specification, nor in any other way than by actual seisin." It is, however, probable that there are two opinions recorded on the point. What is above said, that "if the whole partnership stock, or the stock of either partner in particular, perish before any purchases be made, the contract of partnership is annulled," is evident, where the whole stock of both partners perishes, and where Mozaribat is, of course, in sale annulled, because the partner whose property has not perished had agreed to the other participating in his property for no other reason than that he should also participate in the other's property; but, upon this being rendered impossible, he will not agree that the other should participate in his property.

And (in the last case) the loss falls entirely upon the partner to whom such stock had belonged. — The contract, therefore, is void, as its continuance is useless: and, to whomsoever the destroyed property belonged, the loss affects him only, and not the other, whether it perish in his own hands, or in the hands of his partner: if in his own hands evidently: and also, if in the hands of his partners. stock and the stock of either partner in particular, perish before any purchase be made, the contract of partnership is annulled: because, in a contract of partnership, the subject of the contract is property (that being specified in a contract of partnership, in the same manner as in a deed of gift, or a will), and, in consequence of the destruction of the subject the contract is dissolved, in the same manner as in sale. PARTNERSHIP partner, because it is a trust in the hands of that person.

Unless it had perished after admixture. — It is otherwise, however, where the stock perishes after admixture: for in this case the loss falls upon the partnership stock generally, since, as the property of each is no longer distinguishable, it follows that the loss must after both.

A purchase made by one partner, where the stock of the other afterwards perishes, is participated in by both; and the partnership continues in force, agreeably to the contract. — If one of the partners in question make a purchase with his own stock, and the stock of the other afterwards perish before he has made any purchase with it, in this case the thing purchased by the first partner is in partnership between the two, agreeably to stipulation, because, as partnership subsisted between them at the time of the purchase, the article purchased become a subject of partnership between them at that time; and the effect is not altered by the destruction of the other’s property after the purchase. This partnership in the purchase is a partnership by contract (according to Mohammed), insomuch that, whoever of the two sells it, the sale is lawful. Hassan-Ibn-Zeeyad alleges that the partnership is merely a partnership by right of property, but in so much that it is not lawful for either partner to sell more than his own share, because the contract of partnership was dissolved in the present instance, in consequence of the destruction of stock, in the same manner as where the destruction takes place before any purchase being made; nothing, therefore, remains except the effect of the purchase, namely, right of property [in the thing purchased], and hence it is a partnership by right of property. The argument of Mohammed is that the contract has been completely fulfilled with respect to the article purchased, and consequently cannot be rendered void by the destruction of property not after such completion. It is to be observed that, in the case now under consideration, the purchaser is to take from his partner his proportion of the price [of the article purchased], because he bought a moiety of it by agency, and paid the price out of his own substance, as was before mentioned — What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the purchase made by one partner having been effected before the destruction of the other’s stock.

But if it perish before the other’s purchase, that continues between them under a partnership by right or property. — If, however, the stock of one partner first perish, and the other partner then make a purchase with his own substance; and it should have been expressly agreed, in the contract, that each is to act as an agent on behalf of the other, in this case whatever the purchaser may have bought is divided between the two, according to their previous stipulation; because, although the contract of partnership be annulled, yet the agency, which was expressly mentioned in it, continues in force; the purchase is therefore participated in by both, in virtue of the agency; the connexion continues a partnership by right of property; and the purchaser is accordingly to take from his partner his proportion of the price, for the reason before stated.

Unless there be no mention of mutual agency in the contract; for in this case it belongs solely to the purchaser. — If, on the other hand, the partnership only be mentioned in the contract, and nothing expressed in it respecting each partner acting as an agent on the other’s behalf, the article purchased by one partner appertains solely to him; because, if the article were participated between the two, it could be so only in virtue of the mutual agency implicated in the contract; but, that being annulled, the power of agency implicated in it is also annulled. It is otherwise where the parties have expressly mentioned a mutual power of agency; because in this case the agency is not annulled by the annulment of the partnership, as agency is here one especial design of the contract, and is not merely implicated in it.

Partnership holds without admixture of stocks — A partnership is legal, although the parties should not have mixed stocks. Ziffer and Shafei maintain that it is illegal, because the profit is a branch of the stock, and the branch is not to be participated in except where the original stock itself is also participated, which cannot be so but by coalescence or admixture. The ground upon which they proceed is that in the connection of partnership, the stock is the subject of the contract (whence it is that the partnership is referred to the stock, by each partner saying to the other, “I make you my partner in such stock,” — and also, that the specification of the capital is an essential), — and, such being the case, it is indispensably requisite that the stock be participated in by both. It is otherwise in Mozaribat, as that is not partnership, since it implies nothing more than that, as the manager is to act for the proprietor of the stock, he is consequently entitled to a share in the profit, as wages on account of his labour, which is different from the case in question where the profit is a branch of the stock, and not wages for labour. This is a grand leading principle with Ziffer and Shafei, insomuch that (arguing upon this ground) they allege it to be indispensable, in a contract of partnership, that the stock of both partners be of the same species; for, if otherwise (as where one is possessed of dirma and the other of deena), they hold that the contract is invalid because of the capital not being participated in by both; and they also allege (upon the same principle) that mixture is an essential; and likewise, that it is unlawful to stipulate an excess of profit to either partner, where their stocks are equal, as the profit is a branch of the stock; and also, that partnership in arts and trades is illegal, as in the case there is no stock (as shall be hereafter explained). — The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.

FIRST, partnership in profit is referred to the contract and not to the stock; because as the contract is termed "a contract of partnership," it is indispensable that the property of the term partnership exist in it; and, such being the case, it follows that the adixture is not essential. SECONDLY, as the money [of which the stock consists] is not specified, the profit is not derived from the capital nor indeed from anything else than the transactions [which are had with the stock]; because each party is a principal, with respect to one half of the stock and an agent with respect to the other half and, as it hence appears that partnership may be established, in point of transaction, without admixture of stocks, it follows that it may also be established in the thing which accrues from transaction (namely the profit). without such admixture: and, as the contract of partnership thus becomes similar to a contract of Mozaribat, a similarity of species in the stocks and an equality of profit, are not essentials, although the stock of each be equal. A partnership in arts is also lawful on the same principle.

Partnership does not admit a specification of profit in behalf of either partners — A contract of partnership, which stipulates any particular sum out of the profit for one of the partners, is unlawful, as this condition is a means of destroying partnership, since it is possible that no more profit may be acquired altogether, than the sum so stipulated. Correspondent to this is a case of cultivation; that is to say, where the parties, in a compact of cultivation, stipulate a particular quantity of produce to one of them (that is, to the cultivator or to the landlord), the compact is invalid; because such a stipulation is a means of destroying partnership; and in cultivation it is essential that the produce of the land be equally participated between those persons.

Either partner may make over his stock, in the manner of a Bazat. — Each of the partners, in a contract either of reciprocal partnership or of partnership in actual stock, is at liberty to give his stock in the manner of a Bazat; because it is customary so to do in contracts of partnership; and also, because either partner is at liberty to hire any person to work for the acquisition of profit; and as the acquisition of profit without any return is still less objectionable than hiring with the same view, he is consequently authorized to adopt the other mode a fortiori.

Or lodge it as a deposit. — In the same manner, also, either of them is at liberty to lodge this capital as a deposit, as this is customary, and sometimes necessary, among merchants.

Or entrust it to the care of a manner, by Mozaribat — Each of them is also at liberty to give his capital in the way of Mozaribat, because, as Mozaribat is subordinate to partnership either by reciprocity or in traffic, it follows that a contract of partnership comprehends Mozaribat. It is recorded from Haneefa that a partner has not this in his power, because Mozaribat is also a mode of partnership. The former opinion, however, is according to the Mozaribat, and the latter to the Mozaribat, which is now approved, because partnership is not the design of a contract of Mozaribat, the only view in it being the acquisition of profit. It is therefore lawful to give the capital in the way of Mozaribat, in the same manner as it is lawful for the proprietor of the stock to hire a labourer with wages. It is lawful, indeed, in a superior degree, because, where the Mozarib manages, and no profit is acquired, there are no wages owing to him from the proprietor of the stock, whereas, in a case of hire, where the hired person manages the stock and no profit is acquired, wages are nevertheless due to him from the hirer. It is otherwise with respect to a contract of partnership, for neither party is at liberty to engage in such a contract with a third person, with regard to the capital, because a thing cannot be a dependant of a similar thing.

Either partner may also appoint an agent on his own behalf. — Either of two partners, by reciprocity, or in traffic, is at liberty to constitute a Person his agent to transact for him, because the appointment of an agent for purchase and sale is a dependency of traffic; and contracts of partnership are formed for the purpose of traffic. It is otherwise with an agent for purchase, for he is not at liberty to constitute another person his agent, to make the purchase on his behalf, as the appointment of an agent for purchase is a particular contract, the end of which is the acquisition of some specified and existent article, and a thing cannot be the dependant of its similar.

Each partner holds the stock in the manner of a trust. — The possession of each of two partners, by reciprocity or in traffic, over the partnership stock, is the possession of a trust, since each possesses the property with consent of the proprietor, for this reason, that he is to give something in lieu of it, in the same manner as where a person takes possession of a thing with a view to purchase it (not because it is a pledge, as in pawnage); the stock is therefore a deposit.

Description of partnership in arts.—Shirkat Sinnai, or partnership in arts (which is also termed Shirkat Takabbal"), signifies where two tailors, or two dyers (for instance), become partners, by agreeing to work and to share their earnings in partnership; which is lawful according to our doctors Ziffer and Shafei, that this is unlawful; because the design of partnership is a participation of gain between the parties, and the partnership in question is not calculated to answer this end, since a capital is indispensable, as partnership in profit is founded on partnership in stock (according to their tenets, as before set forth), and in the case in question there is no capital. The argument of our doctors is that the design of the contract in question is the acquisition of property, which is attainable by each party constituting the other his agent; because upon each becoming agent on the part of the other with respect to one half, and a principal with respect to the other half, a partnership is established in the property to be acquired.

It is not requisite that the parties both follow the same trade or reside in the same place.—Unity of trade and of dwelling place are not essentials in this species of partnership. Malik and Ziffer controvert this; for according to them unity of trade and of residence are essentials.

Objection.—It was before mentioned that, according to Ziffer, partnership in arts is unlawful; but here it appears that he holds it to be lawful; which is a contradiction.

Reply.—There are two reports of the opinion of Ziffer upon this point. That before recited is confirmable to one report; and what is now mentioned is according to another report.

The argument of Ziffer in support of his latter opinion is, that if the parties be of different trades (such as where a dyer and a bleacher become partners), each will be at a loss with respect to the business undertaken by the other, as that is not his trade; the end of partnership, therefore, cannot be obtained: in the same manner, also, if their places of residence be different, each is at a loss with respect to the business of the other. The argument of our doctors is that the cause of the legality of the partnership (namely, the acquisition of property) is in no way affected by unity of trade and place of residence, or the reverse:—it is not affected by unity of trade, or the reverse, because an appointment of agency made by agreement, with respect to any business, is approved, whether the person who undertakes it be able to execute it in a good and sufficient manner or not at all, since the person who so agrees is not under any obligation to perform the business himself, but is at liberty to appoint any other person to perform it; and as each party has in his power thus to appoint a person to perform the business in question, the contract is consequently valid: whether it is affected by unity of place, or the reverse, because, if one of the two partners work in one shop, and the other in another shop, yet it is evident that no difference whatever is thereby created in essential circumstances.

It admits an inequality of profit.—It is to be remarked that if, in the case now under consideration, the partners stipulate to perform equal labour, and to divide the acquisition arising from it in three lots, the same is lawful, upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that this is unlawful, because the responsibility is in proportion to the labour, whence, if this stipulation were admitted, it would induce a profit from a matter concerning which there is no responsibility: any excess to either party, therefore, is unlawful in the present instance, in the same manner as it is unlawful in a Shirkat Woolu, or partnership upon credit (as shall be hereafter demonstrated). The reason for a more favourable construction is that what each of the partners takes he does not take in the manner of profit; as gain does not bear the denomination of profit except where the stock and the gain are of the same nature; but they are not of the same nature in the case in question, because the capital, in this instance, is industry, and the profit substance the property so acquired, therefore, is not profit, but merely a return for industry; now industry is appreciable by means of estimation; and consequently, where both partners agree to receive a certain specific proportion, such proportion is an estimate of the industry of each respectively: the excess, therefore, is not unlawful with respect to him in whose behalf it is stipulated. It is otherwise in a partnership upon credit, because in that instance the gain is of the same species with the capital (as both consist of substance); and profit is established where the capital and the gain are of the same nature: and as profit on property concerning which there is no responsibility is unlawful, except in a contract of Mozaribat, it follows that it is unlawful in a contract of partnership upon credit: the case in question, therefore, is in no respect analogous to a case of partnership upon credit.

The work agreed for by either partner is binding upon the other; and either is at liberty to call upon the employer for payment.—In a partnership in arts, whatever work one partner agrees to is incumbent upon him, and also upon the other partner, insomuch that the employer may require the perform-

Literally "a partnership by mutual agreement."
Governance of it from either; and each is entitled to demand payment from the employer for the business performed. Upon the employer, also, thus paying either, he is thereby discharged of all demands. This is evident where the partnership in arts is of a reciprocal nature (by both partners being upon an equality with respect to those particulars in which equality is requisite in a contract of reciprocity); and where the partnership in question is not of a reciprocal nature, but in the manner of a partnership in traffic, the same is admitted, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest otherwise: because the partnership has been contracted in general terms, without any mention of hail; and hail is not one of the articles of a partnership in traffic: it would therefore follow that the employer is not empowered to require the performance of the business from either of them indifferently; and also, that they are not both empowered to require payment from the employer—and likewise, that the employer is not discharged from all demands; by paying either indifferently. The reason for a more favourable construction is that the partnership is an occasion of responsibility; that is, in consequence of the partnership, the performance of work is incumbent upon the parties; whence any business engaged in by either is incumbent upon the other also; and the other is accordingly entitled to the payment. as one of them engaging to perform any work equally affects the other: for if the other also were not subject to this obligation, he would not be entitled to payment: the partnership in question, therefore, is equivalent to a partnership by reciprocity, with respect to the obligation of work, and the taking possession of the payment for it.

Description of partnership upon credit.—Shirkas Wajdooh, or partnership upon credit, is where two persons, not being possessed of any property, become partners by agreeing to purchase goods jointly, upon their personal credit* (without immediately paying the price), and to sell them on their joint account. This species of partnership is termed Wajdooh, for this reason, that no person can purchase articles upon credit but one possessed of personal notoriety [Wijahit] among mankind.

It may include reciprocity—it may lawfully constitute a partnership by reciprocity: because each partner may become both bail and agent for the other. Where, therefore, two persons, capable of bail, make a purchase of any article, on condition that it shall be held between them in equal shares, introducing the term "by reciprocity" into their agreement, it is a contract of reciprocity. If on the other hand, they express their agreement merely in general terms, it is a Shirkat Ainan, or partnership in traffic, because, when thus generally expressed, it is conducted in the manner of such a partnership. The legality of the partnership in question is according to our doctors. Shafei alleges that it is illegal. The arguments on both sides have been already recited.

Each partner is agent for the other.—In partnership upon credit, each partner is agent on behalf of the other, with respect to what he purchases;—because any act which affects another is unlawful, except it be performed in virtue either of agency or of authority;* and as authority does not exist in the present instance, agency is certified.

The profit of each partner must be in proportion to the share of each in the adventure. —If the partners agree that what they purchase shall be held between them in equal shares, and that the profit also shall be equally divided, it is lawful: but it is not lawful, in such a case, to stipulate an excess of profit to one of them. If, however, they agree that what they purchase shall be held between them in three lots, and that the profit also shall be divided into three lots,† it is lawful. In short, if the profit be in proportion to the right of property it is lawful, but otherwise not. The reason of this is that men are entitled to profit only on account of stock, management, or responsibility; thus the proprietor, of a stock, is entitled to profit in virtue of the stock; a manager in virtue of his management; and a master artisan, who employs a scholar or apprentice at half wages or third wages (for instance) is entitled to the profit arising from his work in virtue of his responsibility for such work (whence it is that if a person say to another. "Transact with your own stock on condition that the profit be mine," it is unlawful, because in such a case, no one of the above particulars exists). As men, therefore, are entitled to profit only on some one of these three principles, and as, in a partnership of credit, the title to profit is in virtue of responsibility (as aforesaid), and as also responsibility attaches in proportion to the right of property in the thing purchased: it follows that whatever exceeds the profit in virtue of such right of property is a profit upon a thing concerning which there is no responsibility. Now the stipulation of profit from a thing concerning which there is no responsibility is not valid except in a contract of Mozaribat; and a partnership upon credit has not the property of a contract of Mozaribat. It is otherwise in a partnership in traffic, as that has the property of a contract of Mozaribat, inasmuch as each partner in traffic transacts business with the stock of the other partner, in the same manner as a manager transacts with the stock of the proprietor, whence a partnership in traffic is, in effect, a Mozaribat.

BOOK XIV. PARTNERSHIP 229

Section.
Of Invalid Partnerships.

Partnership does not hold in articles of a neutral nature.—Partnership is not lawful in wood, grass, or game. If, therefore, two persons enter into a contract of partnership with respect to such articles, and afterward collect wood, or grass, or kill game in hunting, the wood or grass so collected, or the game so killed, by either of them, belongs to him solely, and not to the other partner. The same holds in cases where two persons enter into a contract of partnership, with respect to any other articles of a neutral nature (such as fruit collected from the trees of the forest, which are common property), because a contract of partnership comprehends a commission of agency; and the appointment of an agent for procuring things of a neutral description is null, because the instructions of a constituent to this effect are invalid, since an appointment of agency signifies an endowing with authority to transact concerning a matter originating in the constituent only, and not of the agent; but it is otherwise in the case in question as the agent is here himself to take the neutral article without the instruction of his constituent, and consequently is incapable of appearing as his deputy concerning it. In short, a right of property in a neutral article is established only by the acts of taking and putting it in custody.

Unless they be taken possession of jointly,—If, therefore, both partners take it jointly, it is equally in partnership between them, as they are both equally entitled to it. But if one of them only exerts himself in taking it, the other doing nothing, it belongs wholly to the one who acts: if, on the other hand, one be the chief actor, and the other only an assistant (as where one plucks the fruit, and the other collects it,—or, where one both plucks and gathers it, and the other carries it away), in this case the assistant is to receive wages in proportion to his labour.—This is according to Mohammed. (Aboo Yoosaf alleges that this rule holds only where the wages do not exceed half the value of the article in question; but that, if the wages exceed this, one half of the value only is paid to the assistant, because, as he had agreed to accept one half of the article specified, his right fails with respect to any larger proportion.)

Nor in this instance, where the means of acquiring them are different.—If one man possesses a mule, and another a Mashack (or leather bucket, such as is used in drawing water) and they enter into a contract of partnership in drawing water, by agreeing that whatever may be acquired thereby shall be in partnership between them, such partnership is invalid, the whole acquisition going to the person who actually draws the water; and if this be the owner of the mule, he owes the other the adequate hire for the bucket; or, if it be the owner of the bucket, he owes the other an adequate hire for the mule. The reason of the partnership being invalid is that it is contracted with respect to an article of a neutral nature (namely, water), and is therefore unlawful. The hire of a mule or the bucket is due, because the neutral article (namely, the water) becomes the property of the person who drew it; and as he derives an advantage, under an invalid contract, from the property of another person (namely, from his mule or his bucket), it follows that he owes that for the same.

The profit to each partner must be in proportion to the stock.—In all cases of invalid partnership, the profit is in proportion to the stock; any stipulation, therefore, of an excess of profit to either partner is null. Accordingly, if the stock be between the partners in equal shares, and they agree to their profit being in three lots, such agreement is null, and the profit must be equally divided; because, as the profit which accrues is a dependant of the stock, the degree of it must be in proportion to the stock, in the same manner as, in a contract of cultivation, the grain which is reaped is a dependant of the seed. The reason of this is that a claim to an excess profit can exist only in virtue of a previous specific agreement; but in the case in question this agreement has become invalid in consequence of the invalidity of the contract of partnership itself; the claim, therefore, remains in force only in proportion to the capital stock.

A contract of partnership is annulled by the death or apostasy of either partner.—If one of two partners die, or apostatize, and be united to a foreign country, the contract of partnership is annulled; because a contract of partnership comprehends an appointment of agency, which is essential to the existence of partnership, for the reasons already assigned; now agency is annulled by death; and it is also annulled by the circumstance of desertion to a foreign country during apostasy, where the Kazee issues a decree in consequence of such twenty to thirty yards, in an inclined plain; and over the well is erected a frame or cross price, furnished with a pulley, through which a line runs, having suspended at one end a large leather bucket (Mashack); the other end is fastened to traces, in which a mule, bullock, or other animal, moving to and fro on the inclined road, by this means draws the water.

* Water is in many parts of Asia procured from draw-wells, sunk to a considerable depth. From the edge of such wells a road is constructed or cut, going off from desertion, because that is equivalent to death: upon the agency, therefore, being annulled, the contract of partnership is also annulled.

Whether the survivor be aware of that event or not.—It is also to be observed that the surviving partner being aware of the decease of his fellow, or otherwise, makes no difference whatever with respect to the dissolution of the partnership; because as, in the case in question, the survivor is virtually discharged from the agency by the decease of his partner, it is not essential that he be informed of that event. It is otherwise where one of two partners breaks the contract of partnership, for the effect of such a breach depends upon the knowledge of the other partner, as the breach is a designed dissolution of the contract.

Section.

A person cannot pay Zakat upon his partner's property without his permission.—It is not lawful for either partner to pay the Zakat upon the other's property without his permission, as the payment of Zakat is not a branch of traffic.

Case of mutual permission to pay Zakat.—If each of the partners give a general permission to the other to pay the Zakat upon his property, and each should afterwards first pay the Zakat upon his own particular share in the stock, and then pay Zakat upon his partner's share, in this case he who last paid the Zakat is responsible, whether he be aware of the other having already paid it or not. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that he is not responsible, where he is not aware of that circumstance. What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of each partner having paid the Zakat upon their respective shares of stock successively, and not altogether; for where they have paid it altogether, each is responsible for the other's proportion of it. A correspondent difference of opinion obtains where any indifferent person directs another to pay the Zakat upon his property, and the other accordingly pays the Zakat upon his property after the person who so directed him had already paid it: for, according to Haneefa, the person acting under such direction is responsible, whether he pay the Zakat with a knowledge of the above circumstance, or otherwise. The two disciples, on the other hand, maintain that he is not responsible unless he pay it, having a knowledge of that circumstance, as he has acted by direction, and consequently cannot be held answerable. They admit, indeed, that it may be objected that what the person acting under with direction pays is not Zakat,* and consequently he ought to be responsible:—but to this they reply the order which the person in question received was not in fact an order to pay so much Zakat, but rather, merely, an order to transfer so much to the poor, since the payment of actual Zakat is not within his province, as this is connected with the intention of the principal, and no more can be required of the person so directed than what is within his province and ability:—the person in question, therefore, stands in the same predicament with one who is directed to perform sacrifice on behalf of another, in a case of detention; thus, if a person engaged in the ceremonies of pilgrimage were to fall into the hands of an enemy, and to direct any other person to perform sacrifice at the temple on his behalf, and the other perform sacrifice accordingly, after the principal had been released from the enemy, and had completed his pilgrimage, yet he does not bear the loss,* whether he be aware of the detention having ceased, or otherwise. The argument of Haneefa is that the person in question has been directed "to pay Zakat," and as what he pays is not in fact Zakat, it is evident he has acted contrary to the orders of his principal, whose design in giving such orders was to discharge himself from an obligation incumbent upon him (for it is evident that his sole view in subjecting himself to such an expense is to ward off the divine anger attending the neglect of Zakat);—now, as (in the case in question) this design has been fully answered by the payment of the principal himself, it can no longer be so by the payment of his substitute, and hence it follows that the substitute is discharged from his commission, whether he be aware or not, because this is a virtual discharge, and to that knowledge is not essential. With respect to the case of sacrifice under a circumstance of detention, as adduced by the two disciples, some in reply to it allege that the principle there advanced is not generally admitted, as concerning that also there is a difference of opinion. Others, again, maintain that there is an essential difference between that case, and the case under consideration. The reason they give for this difference is, that sacrifice is not incumbent upon the detained person, as he is permitted to delay it until his detention shall cease. The payment of Zakat, on the other hand, is incumbent, whence the design in appointing an agent to pay it is to discharge an obligation; and as this design is not fulfilled, it follows that the agent has no credit for his payment, and that what he pays is a waste and destruction of the property of his

*That is to say, the expense attending the sacrifice (although it be insufficient and nugatory under such a circumstance), nevertheless falls upon the director, not upon the person directed.

†As it has been already fulfilled by the payment of the principal himself.
principal, for which he is consequently responsible. The case of sacrifice under a circumstance of detention, therefore, is not analogous to the case now under consideration, as accident in such a circumstance is merely lawful but not incumbent, and hence the sacrifice performed by the delegate is not to be regarded as a waste and destruction of the property of his principal, for which reason he is not responsible.

A female slave, purchased under a contract of reciprocity, becomes the property of that partner who with permission of the other, has carnal connexion with her.—If one of two partners by reciprocity permit the other partner to purchase a female slave with the partnership stock, and to have carnal connexion with her, and the other act accordingly, in this case the slave appertains to the purchaser, and he is not responsible for anything. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that the other partner is entitled to take half the price of the slave; because the purchaser has paid for the slave out of the partnership stock, and consequently his partner has a right to be repaid his share in the same manner as in the purchase of victuals or clothing (that is, as, where one of two partners by reciprocity purchases victuals or clothing, paying the price out of the partnership stock, the other partner is entitled to take half the price from the purchaser, so also in the case in question). The ground upon which this proceeds is that the slave in question has become the sole and exclusive property of the purchaser because of the necessity of legalizing generation; and as the price is due in proportion to the right of property, it follows that the price of the slave is solely and exclusively due from the purchaser. The argument of Haneefa is that the slave has fallen into the possession of both partners, a certiorari; according to what partnership requires (for they cannot alter the requisites of partnership): the slave is property of both in the same manner as if no permission had been given: now the permission implies that the person who grants it makes a gift of his share to the purchaser for carnal connexion is lawful only in virtue of right of property: and there is no mode of establishing that in the present case but by gift: because sale cannot be supposed on this occasion, as the establishment of a right of property by sale would be repugnant to the requisites of a contract of partnership; for if the partner were to sell his share to the purchaser, still that share is in partnership between the two, and does not become part of the stock. His share, therefore, is made the property of the purchaser by gift implied in the permission granted to the purchaser to have carnal connexion with the slave. It is otherwise with respect to victuals and clothing, because, as these are excepted from the contract of necessity, they are the sole property of the purchaser in virtue of the spirit of a contract of purchase and sale; he, therefore, must pay half of the price on the death of his partner, because he has discharged a debt due from himself [for the above articles] out of the partnership stock, whereas, in the case under consideration the purchaser discharged a partnership debt, which was equally due from both partners, for the reasons already alleged.

But the seller may take the price from either.—It is to be observed that, in the case in question, the seller of the slave is at liberty to take the price from either partner, according to all our doctors, because this price is a debt incurred by an act of traffic. A contract of reciprocity, moreover, compels the seller to declare and hence the price of the slave resembles (in this respect) the price of victuals or clothing.

BOOK XV.

OF WAKF, OR APPROPRIATIONS.*

Definition of Wakf; and various opinions respecting it—Wakf, in its primitive sense, means detention. In the language of the law (according to Haneefa), it signifies the appropriation of any particular thing in such a way that the appropriator's right in it shall still continue, and the advantage of it go to some charitable purpose, in the manner of a loan. Some give it as the opinion of Haneefa that, as the advantage of a thing is a nonentity, and as the alms-gift of a nonentity is invalid, it follows that appropriation is utterly illegal. † It is, moreover, recorded in the Mabsoot that Haneefa held appropriation to be invalid. The most approved authorities, however, declare it to be valid according to him; but since he is a loan) it is not of an absolute nature, I the appropriator is held to be at liberty to resume it, and the sale or gift of it is consequently lawful. According to the two disciples, Wakf signifies the appropriation of a particular article, in such a manner as subjects it to the rules of divine property, whence the appropriator's right in it is extinguished, and it becomes a property of God by the advantage of it resulting to his creatures.—The two disciples, therefore, hold appropriation to be absolute; and, consequently, that it cannot be resold or disposed of by gift or sale; and that inheritance also does not obtain with respect to it. (There is, indeed, one point upon which the disciples differ in opinion: for, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the appropriation is absolute from

* Meaning always of a pious or charitable nature.
† That is, has no force in law.
‡ That is, it is not irrevocable.
the instant of its execution: whereas Mohammed holds it to become absolute only on the delivery of it to a Mootawalee, or procurator:*—as will hereafter appear.) Thus the term Wakf, in its literal sense; comprehends all that is mentioned both by Haneefa and by the two disciples. Now, such being the case, no preference can be given to the tenets of one party over that of the other, as drawn from the meaning of the term: this preference, therefore, must be given as drawn from arguments. The arguments of the two disciples upon this subject are twofold.
First, when Omar was desirous of bestowing in charity the lands of Simag, the Prophet said to him, "You must bestow the actual land itself, in order that it may not remain liable to be either sold or bestowed, and that inheritance may not hold in it—Secondly, there is a necessity for the appropriation being absolute, in order that the origin of it may result for ever in the appropriator; and this necessity is to be answered only by the appropriator relinquishing his right in what he appropriates, and dedicating it solely to God; which dedication, as being agreeable to the law, in the same manner as that of a mosque, must therefore be made in the same mode. The arguments of Haneefa concerning it are various. First, the Prophet has said, "Property cannot, after the decease of the propriator, be detained from division among his heirs" (in other words. appropriations are not absolute, but inherent), Shirrab moreover says, "the Prophet determined the sale of an appropriation to be lawful,"— which is as much as to say, that "before the promulgation of the law by the holy Mohammed (on whom be the blessing and peace of God) appropriotions were absolute; but our law has rendered them otherwise."—Secondly, the appropriator's right in the article appropriated must still continue in force, for this reason, that it is lawful for the creatures of God to derive an advantage from it, either by tillage (if it consist of land), or by residence (if it consist of dwelling-houses): for if no one had any right in it, any acts with respect to it would be unlawful, in the same manner as with respect to a mosque. It is, therefore, evident that a right of property in it still continues:
and it is also evident that this right of property must rest with the appropriator, and not with any other person, as he alone is entitled to expend the revenue arising from it upon the objects of the appropriation, and to appoint a procurator over it: but yet, as the term Wakf implies giving in charity, the use of it resembles that of a loan. Thirdly, the appropriator wishes to apply the revenue arising from what he appropriates to some charitable purpose in perpetuity which is impossible, unless his right of property in it continue. Fourthly, it is impossible that the appropriator's right of property in the Wakf should be extinguished, during its existence; without its becoming the property of some other person, as the law does not admit the idea of a thing, during its existence, going out of the possession of one appropriator without falling into the possession of another propriator, Wakf, therefore, in this particular resembles a Sayeeba. (A Sayeeba is a female camel, set at liberty in pursuance of a vow (as where a man says, "if I return home from this journey," or, "recover from this disorder a certain female camel of mine is Sayeeba,) which the owner prohibits himself from any further use of : in the same manner, or as a Baaheera, or as a dairi, which after producing ten colts, it was customary in times of ignorance, then to set at liberty, rendering it unlawful to be used or eaten.) Appropriation, in short, resembles the pagan act of setting a camel at liberty, in this respect, that the thing appropriated does not go out of the right of property of the propriator:—in other words, if a man constitute his quadrupled a Sayeeba, still it continues his property; and so also, if a person appropriate his lands or quadrupled. It is otherwise in a case of manumission, as that is a dereliction of property. It is other-wise, also, in the case of a mosque, as that is dedicated purely to God (whence it is unlawful to derive any advantage from a mosque), whereas in a case of appropriation, the right of the individual still continues in force, and that, consequently, is not dedicated purely to God.

Alienation of the article appropriated is completed by a decree of the magistrate, and the declaration of the appropriator, or the consignment of it to a procurator.—It is reported by Kadooree, from Haneefa, that the appropriator's right of property is not extinguished, except where the magistrate issues decrees, or where the appropriator himself suspects it upon his decease, by declaring "When I die, this house is appropriated to such a purpose" (and so forth). Aboo Yoosaf alleges that his right of property is extinguished upon the instant of his saying "I have appropriated"—(and such also is the opinion of Shafei); because that is a dereliction of property, in the same manner as manumission. Mohammed says that it is not extinguished until he appoint a procurator, and deliver it over to him: and decrees are passed upon this principle. The reason of this is that the right of God cannot be established in an appropriated article but by implication, in the consignment of it to

* Literally, a person endowed with authority; the term procurator is adopted by the his creature (as a transfer to the Almighty, who is himself the proprietor of all things, although it cannot be effected actually and expressly, but may be so dependantly);—it therefore becomes subject to the rules of divine property dependantly, and consequently resembles Zakat and alms-gift. With respect to what is reported from Haneefah, that the appropriator's right of property is extinguished by a decree of the magistrate,—our author remarks that this is approved doctrine, as such a decree removes all difference of opinion. With respect, however, to what is further reported from him, that the appropriator's right of property is extinguished in consequence of his suspending that, upon his decease, it is altogether unfounded, as his right of property cannot be extinguished but by his bestowing the subject of the article for charitable purposes in perpetuity, in which case it is the same as a bequest of perpetual usufruct:—in this instance, therefore, his right of property becomes extinct, and the appropriation is absolute.

A decree of the magistrate fixes an appropriation; but the decision of a referee does not fix it.—It is related, in the Fatavee Kazee Khan, that judicial decrees are issued on the subject of appropriations only in cases where a person having appropriated a particular article, and delivered it over to a Moostwalee or procurator, is afterwards desirous of resuming it; and the latter disputes the resumption, on the plea of the appropriation being absolute; and they carry the matter before a Kazee, who decrees it to be absolute—Concerning a case where the parties authorize any third person to decide upon this point, and he decides the appropriation to be absolute, there is a difference of opinion; it is certain, however, that such a decision is not binding upon parties.

Case of an appropriation made upon a death bed.—If a person make an appropriation upon his death-bed. Tehavee reports that, according to Haneefah, it stands in the same pre-lacment with a bequest after death, (that is to say, is absolute): contrary to an appropriation made during health, which is held by Haneefah not to be an absolute nature. The true statement, however, is that the appropriation in question is not absolute, according to Haneefah; but it is absolute, according to the two disciples with this distinction, however, that the appropriation here treated of is regarded as from the third of the appropriator's estate, whereas an appropriation made during health is regarded as from the whole of the appropriator's property.

The appropriator's right of property is destroyed: but without a transfer of that right to any other person.—Upon an appropriation becoming valid (that is, absolute, according to the various opinions of our doctors, as here stated, according to Haneefah, in consequence of the appropriator's declaration, and the magistrate's subsequent decree—and according to Aboo Yoosaf, by his simple declaration,—and according to Mohammad, by his declaration and delivery to a procurator), it passes out of the possession of the appropriator; but it also belongs to the property of any other person; because, if this were the case, it would follow that it is not a state of detention, out may be sold in the same manner as other property; and also, because if the person or persons to whom it is assigned were to become the proprietor of it, it would follow that it could not afterwards pass out of his possession in consequence of any condition stipulated by the former proprietor, whereas it is not so, for if a person were to appropriate a dwelling-house (for instance) to the poor of a particular tribe, and the property of any one of these were afterwards removed, the right in it passes to the others, which it could not do if this person were a proprietor.

Any undefined part of a thing may be appropriated.—The appropriation of an undefined part or portion of any thing is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammad alleges that an appropriation of this nature is unlawful, because as actual possession is held by him to be an essential (by the procurator taking possession of the article appropriated), so, in the same manner that without which possession cannot take place is also an essential, namely, division; and this can only be in a thing capable of division. (With respect, however, to a thing incapable of division, the appropriation of an indefinite portion of it is held to be legal by Mohammad also as he conceives an analogy between this and a gift, or charitable donation). The ground upon which the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, proceeds is, that the separation of an indefinite part of any thing is indispensable to the taking possession of it; but as the taking possession is not (according to him) essential in a case of appropriation (whence the means of taking possession is also unessential) it follows that the appropriation of an indefinite part of any thing is held by him to be lawful. From this rule, however, he excepts a mosque, or burying-ground, the appropriation of any undefined portion of which is unlawful, although it be of an indivisible nature; because the continuance of a participation in any thing is repugnant to its becoming the exclusive right of God; and also, because the present discussion supposes, the place in question to be incapable of division, as being narrow and confind, whence it cannot be divided but by an alternate application of it to different purposes, such as its being applied one year to the interment of the dead, and the next year to tillage, or, at one time to prayer, and at another time to the keeping of horses which would be singularly abominable. It is, however, a negel or appropriation of anything else than a mosque.

—Such as the half, or the fourth, of a field, house. &c. or burying ground; because the appropriation of an undefined portion of any other matter, where it is of an indivisible nature, is decreed to be lawful by all our doctors, as it may be hired (for instance), and the parties may divide the rent.

Case of appropriation of land, where an indefinite portion of it afterwards appears to be the property of another person.—If a person appropriate land, and it should afterwards appear that an indefinite portion of the land (such as the fourth) was the property of another person, the appropriation is void with respect to the remainder also, according to Mohammed: because, in this instance, the separation into indefinite divisions is associated with the appropriation, which is consequently invalid, in the same manner as a gift. It is otherwise where a donor resumes a part of his gift; or where the heirs of a donor, who had not the gift upon his death-bed resume two-thirds of his gift after his decease: for if a person, upon his death-bed, make a gift or appropriation of the whole of his property, and the heirs resume two-thirds, still the gift or appropriation are not rendered void, because, in this instance, the separation into indefinite divisions is supervenient, and not associated; that is, at the time of the gift or appropriation, the article was not divided into undefined portions, but became so afterwards. If, however, it should appear that an estate is as a portion of the land, of a specific and not an undefined nature, in this case the appropriation is not void with respect to the remainder, because of no indefinite division existing in this instance: and gifts and charitable donations are also subject to the same analogy.

The objects of an appropriation must be of a perpetual nature.—An appropriation is not complete, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, unless the appropriator destine its ultimate application to objects not liable to become extinct; as where, for instance, a man destines its application ultimately to the use of the Poor (by saying, "I appropriate this to such a Person, and after him to the Poor").—because these never become extinct. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that where the appropriator names an object liable to termination (as if he were to say, "I have appropriated this to Zeyd), it is valid, and after the death of Zeyd it passes, as an appropriation, to the Poor, although the appropriator had not named them. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed upon this point is that appropriation requires an extinction of right of Property. Without a transfer of it; and as this, like manumission, is of a perpetual nature, it follows that if a thing be appropriated to a finite object, the appropriation is imperfect; whence it is that an appropriation is rendered void by making it temporary, in the same manner as a sale is made void by limiting its duration.

Objection.—This is the opinion of Haneefa, that the right of property becomes extinct without "a transfer of it," contradicts what was formerly said, that, "according to Haneefa, in appropriation, the right of property is not extinguished."

Reply.—There are two reports from Haneefa upon this subject. One of them is that which was before stated. Another makes the opinion of Haneefa to agree with that of Mohammed. Some also allege, in reply to this objection, that what is here advanced from him proceeds from a supposition of the magistrate having decreed the appropriation to be absolute, under which circumstance it passes out of the possession of the appropriator according to all our doctors.

The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that the design of the appropriator is to perform an act of piety acceptable to God; and this is fully answered in either case; because piety on some occasions may consist in the appropriation of an article to a terminable object,—and it may at other times consist in the appropriation of a thing to an interminable object:—The appropriation, therefore, is equally valid in both instances; now some say that perpetuity is essential to it. Aboo Yoosaf, however, does not consider the mention of perpetuity as an essential, as the terms appropriation or charity do clearly argue thus much, according to what was before advanced, that "Appropriation, like manumission, signifies an extinction of a right of property without a transfer of that right." According to Mohammed, on the other hand, the mention of perpetuity is an essential; because appropriation is a charitable donation of the use of a thing, or of actual product; and as these are sometimes temporary and sometimes perpetual, the general mention of it cannot be understood as a perpetuation: it is therefore indispensable that perpetuity be expressly mentioned.

Appropriation of immovable and of movable property.—The appropriation of land is lawful; because several of the Prophet's companions appropriated their lands; but the appropriation of movable property is altogether unlawful, whether purposely, or as a dependant. This is the opinion of Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that if a person appropriate lands, together with the cattle and slaves attached to them, it is lawful; and the same of all instruments of husbandry; because those are all dependants of the soil in the fulfilment of the design. The appropriation of these, therefore, as dependants of the land, is lawful; for many things are admissible dependantly, which are not so positively; thus the sale of wine (for instance) by itself is unlawful; whereas, along with land it is lawful,—and in the same man-

*Arab, Akkar: meaning any immoveable property whatever, whether lands or tenements. Zimeen is the term in the Persian version and the translator therefore renders it land throughout.
nor the appropriation of the beam of a house is unlawful, whereas along with the house it is clearly legal. The opinion of Mohammed, also, accords with that of Aboo Yoosaf in this point, because as he holds the appropriation of moveables to be lawful merely in virtue of the appropriator's declaration, it follows that he admits the declaration of them as a dependant to be legal a fortiori. Mohammed is also of opinion that if a person appropriate horses, camels, or arms, to carry on war against infidels, it is lawful;—in which opinion (as lawyers report), Aboo Yoosaf coincides with him. This proceeds upon a favourable construction; for analogy would suggest that such an appropriation is unlawful, for the reasons already alleged. The reason for a more favourable construction, however, is that the Prophet once said, "KHALID has appropriated his horse and armour in the way of God; and TELLHA has appropriated his horse in the way of God."—According to Mohammed, the appropriation is lawful of all moveables, the appropriation of which is commonly practised, such as spades, shovels, axes, saws, plarks, coffins (and their appendages) stone or brassen vessels, and books: but according to Aboo Yoosaf it is unlawful; because analogy cannot be abandoned but on the express authority of the sacred writings: and as horses and armour only are there mentioned, the admission must be restricted accordingly. Mohammed says that analogy may be abandoned on account of utility, (as in arts or manufactures, for instance); and utility exists in the articles in question. It is, moreover, recorded of Nasser Ibn Yehee, that he appropriated his books, as concerning that to be analogous to the appropriation of a KORAN (in other words, as the appropriation of a KORAN is lawful, so also is the appropriation of any other book): and this is approved, because other books as well as KORANS are kept for the purpose of reading and instruction. Most lawyers have passed decrees according to the opinion of Mohammed in this part cular. It is written in the Fatavee-Kazee-Khan that there is a difference of opinion between the Elders concerning the appropriation of book.—Fikke Abooal-Seyb, however, holds it to be lawful; and decrees pas accordingly.

The appropriation of articles in which it is not customary is unlawful—It is not lawful to appropriate moveables, the appropriation of which is unusual or uncommon, according to our doctors. Shafei asserts that the appropriation is lawful of everything which admits of the use without a destruction of the subject, or of everything lawfully saleable. He does not point out which resemble land, horses, or arms. The argument of our doctors is that appropriation requires propriety, according to what has been already stated; and this cannot exist in moveables, since these are not of a lasting nature; analogy therefore suggests that the appropriation of moveables in general is unlawful:—it is admitted, however, in some articles (although contrary to analogy), because of the traditions already recorded,—and in other articles (such as axes, saws and so forth), because of utility: but the appropriation of furniture, clothes, and salves, is unlawful, as being contrary to the suggestions of analogy, because they have neither tradition nor utility to support the legality, and therefore resemble dimes and denars. With respect to what Shafei has advanced that "those articles are analogous to lands, horses, and armour," we reply that no analogy can be admitted between them; because land endures perpetually; and horses and armour are instruments of war against infidels, which is among the highest religious obligations, whence the propriety of propriety exists. The appropriation of these articles in a much stronger degree than in the appropriation of other moveables;—the analogy, therefore, is not allowed.

An appropriation cannot be sold or transferred.—Upon an appropriation becoming valid and absolute, the sale or transfer of the thing appropriated is unlawful, according to all lawyers: the transfer is unlawful, because of a saying of the Prophet, "Bestow the actual land itself in charity, in such a manner that it." An appropriation, therefore, is incapable of sale or transfer, upon becoming valid and absolute.

But it may be divided off, where it consists of an undefined part of anything.—If, however, the appropriation consist of an undefined part of anything, and (in conformity with the doctrine of Aboo Yoosaf) become absolute, and the partner require it to be divided off, such division is lawful; because division implies separation and distinction. In all things, indeed, except those which are computable by weight or measure, exchange chiefly prevails: in appropriation, however, a superior regard is had to separation and distinction, in order that the appropriation may be valid: the dividing it off, therefore, is not to be regarded in the light of a sale or transfer, and is consequently legal.

If a person appropriate his share in partnership lands, he must divide it off and detach it from those of his partner; because he alone has authority to do this during his life, or his executor, after his decease. If on the other hand, a person appropriate the half (for instance) of his own land, in this case the Kazee is to divide it off, and alienate it from the appropriator—(for the appropriator may sell one half (for instance) of his land to any other person, and then divide off the portion appropriated and alienate it from that person, and afterwards re-purchase the remainder from the purchaser*);—for the appropriator is not at liberty himself to divide off the portion of land which he has appropriated, or to separate it from that portion which he has not appropriated, because one person is incapable of himself making a division, and thus giving to himself, since division can take place only between two.

*This is, in waging war against the infidels.

*This is merely a device, for the purpose of obviating legal objections.

In case of dividing it off, the payment of a balance made by the appropriator is lawful; but if made to the appropriator, it invalidates the appropriation. If in dividing off appropriated land, any balance occurs (as where a person appropriates his share in partnership land, and he and his partner accordingly make a division of the land, and the share of one of them proves defective, and the other makes up the difference by a payment in money), it is unlawful, where this balance is paid to the appropriator, as the sale of an appropriated article is unlawful: but if it is the appropriator who pays the balance, it is lawful and what he gets in return is his property; if, therefore, he be desirous of having it divided off from the part he has appropriated, he must refer the matter to the Kazee, in order that he may separate the portion appropriated from what he [the appropriator] gets in return for the balance.

The income of an appropriation must be expended (in the first instance) upon keeping it in repair. It is incumbent that the income of an appropriation be in the first instance expended in the repairs of it, whether the appropriator may have stipulated this or not; because his design was that the income should serve as a perpetual fund, and as a perpetual income cannot be drawn from the article appropriated unless it be preserved in continual repair, that is a necessary attendant upon it; and also, because all acquisition must be attended with expense—in other words, he who enjoys the profit must also bear the loss. In short, upon the person to whom the advantage of a thing accrues, he must refund the inconveniences attending it; and such being the case, it follows that the repair of an appropriation resembles the subsistence of a slave whose service has been bequeathed to any one, for the subsistence of such slave rests upon the legatee of usufruct. If, therefore, the appropriation be to the poor, and the requisition of repairs from them be impossible (because of the appropriation itself being their sole dependence) the repairs must be afforded out of the income arising from it.

Unless the appropriator be rich, in which case he is answerable for the repairs—It, however, the appropriation be to some particular person, in the first instance, and after him to the poor, the repairs are in this case due out of that person’s property (but he is at liberty to furnish the means out of whatever part of his property he chooses), during his life; and in this case no part of the income is laid out in repairs because the requisition from the person who enjoys the benefit is in such instance possible, since he is specified and known.

But in such a degree only, as may suffice to preserve it in its original state. It is to be understood, however, that the repairs are to be made out of the property, only in such a degree as may be requisite to restore it in the state in which it was appropriated; if, also, it fall to ruin [or run waste] it is to be restored to the state in which it was appropriated, because the income of it was made over to others, and was to be derived from it as in that state, and not as in any superior state; and as such income is the right of him to whose use it is appropriated, it is not lawful, without his permission, to expend it in repairs to a degree beyond the original state of the appropriation. Some are also of opinion that the same rule obtains where the appropriation is to the poor at large, and not to any particular individual, that is to say, the income is not to be expended in repairs beyond the original state of the appropriation. Others allege that this is lawful. The former, however, is the better opinion; because the income arising from an appropriation is expended in the repairs of it only from the necessity of preserving it as it was originally and there is no necessity for repairs beyond what may suffice for this purpose.

The repairs of a house are incumbent upon the individual occupant pro tem po re. If a person appropriate a house, with this condition, that his son or any other person shall reside therein during life, the repairs are incumbent upon him who has the right to inhabit it, because he who enjoys the profit must also bear the loss (as has been already stated), and the case consequently resembles the subsistence of a slave whose service has been bequeathed to any person by his master.

Or if he neglect this, the magistrate must let the house, and furnish the repairs out of the rent. It, therefore, the person in question refuse or neglect to repair the house, or be incapable of so doing, from poverty, the magistrate must in this case let it, and provide for the repairs out of the rent; and must return it to him upon the repairs being completed: because by this means attention is paid to the rights both of the appropriator and of the person to whose use it is appropriated, if it were not duly repaired, the tenement would be lost, and the rights both would be consequently destroyed: the repair must therefore be provided out of the rent, in order that the rights of the parties may be secured.

But the occupant is not liable to any compulsion. It is to be observed, however, that where the person to whom the article is appropriated refuses to make the repairs, he is not to be compelled, because the repairs would be at his loss, his case being the same as that of the proprietor of the seed, in a contract of cultivation, who, if he refuse to cultivate the land, is not liable to any compulsion, as the cultivation cannot be effectuated without the loss of his property, namely, the seed.

*Arab. Tameer; meaning, the rendering a place habitable, by cultivation, if it be land, or by rebuilding, &c., if it be houses.

Objection.—Upon the occupant refusing to make the repairs, it would appear that the magistrate should not return the house to him after the repairs are completed: because, as he thus assented to the destruction of his right, and attention to that is unnecessary.

Reply.—The refusal of the occupant to repair the house does not argue his assent to the destruction of his right as there is a doubt with respect to the motive of his refusal, since it is possible that he has refused merely on account of the expense to his property; his right, therefore, is not destroyed because of the doubt.

And none can let the house but the magistrate—It is proper to observe that it is not lawful for the occupant to let the house, since he is not proprietor. The magistrate, on the contrary, possesses a general power, as being the agent of the community.

Decayed materials are to be used for repairs.—Such buildings or materials of an appropriation as become damaged or useless must be employed by the magistrate in the repairs of it, where necessary; and if these be not immediately necessary, he must keep the articles in question until such time as occasion offers when he must employ them in making the necessary repairs: as repairs are required from time to time, in order that the appropriation may be continually preserved, and the design of the appropriator answered. If the materials of the decayed place be damaged so much as to render it impracticable to employ them in the repairs (by the timbers being broken, for instance), it is incumbent on the magistrate to sell them, and expend the price in such repairs: but it is not lawful for him to give them to the occupant, because the timbers, and so forth, are constituent parts of the actual appropriation, in which no person has any right,—their right being merely to the use, and not to the thing itself.

Case of appropriation, with a reserve of the use to the appropriator during life.—If a person appropriate a house (for instance), with a reserve of the income to his own use during life, and after his death to go to the poor; this is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf. Our author remarks that this is deemed lawful by Aboo Yoosaf; but that, judging from the opinion of Mohammed and the appropriator’s own case, this is the opinion of Hillal Kazee and Shafei respecting it. Some allege that the difference between Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed upon this point is occasioned by their difference of opinion concerning the necessity of consignment; for, according to Mohammed, the consignment of the appropriation to the

Mootwalee, or procurator, is an essential, and consequently it is unlawful for the appropriator to reserve the income to himself: according to Aboo Yoosaf, on the contrary, this is lawful, as he does not hold the consignment to a procurator to be an essential. Others, again, allege that their difference upon this point is not occasioned by their difference upon any other point, but is merely an original difference of opinion with respect to the present case itself. This difference of opinion between disciples subsists in every case that is, whether the appropriator reserve the whole or a part only of the income to himself during life, and after his death to go to the poor. If, also, the appropriator reserve the whole or part of the income from his appropriation to the use of his Am-Walids, or his Mocabirs, during their lives, and after their deaths destined it to the poor, some say that this is lawful according to all our appropriators. Others, however, in this instance also, the above difference of opinion obtains; and this is approved, because his reserving the income to their use for their lives is equivalent to his reserving it to his own use. The argument in favour of Mohammed’s opinion is that appropriation is a gratuitous act, effected in the transfer of a property to God; by delivering over the thing appropriated to a Mootwalee or procurator (for a transfer to the Almighty, who is himself the proprietor of all things, although it cannot be effected actually and expressly, yet may be so dependently: and the reserving of the whole or part of the income arising from it to his own use is repugnant to this, because, the delivery cannot be made to himself. The case, therefore, resembles the reserve of an alms-gift,—and also the reserve of a part of a mosque:—in other words, if a person were to assign certain property to the poor, stipulating at the same time, that his right in part of it should continue, the alms under such a condition are unlawful;—or, if the founder of a mosque stipulate that his right in a part of the mosque shall continue, this opposes the legality of the whole foundation—and so also in the case in question. The arguments of Aboo Yoosaf upon this point are threefold, First, the Prophet was accustomed himself to consume the revenue arising from what he had appropriated. Now the use would not at any rate be lawful, unless the appropriator had previously stipulated it for himself at the time of appropriation: the Prophet consuming the revenue therefore, argues that it is lawful for an appropriator to reserve that to his own use. Secondly, appropriation implies the owner of a property destroying his right in that property by a transfer of it to God, under some pious intention (as was formerly stated; and such being the case, where an appropriator reserves a part or the whole of the revenue arising from what he appropriates to his own use, it follows that; in so doing; he reserves to himself a thing which is the property of God (not that he reserves to himself what is his own), and a person's reserving to himself a thing which is the property of God is lawful; thus, if a man build a caravansera, or construct a reservoir, or give ground for a burial-place, reserving to himself the right of residing in the caravansera, or of drinking water out of the reservoir, or of interment in the burial-place, it is lawful;
and so likewise in the case in question.
Thirdly, the design, in appropriation, is the performance of an act of piety; and piety is consistent with the circumstance of a person reserving the revenue to his own use, as the Prophet has said, "A man giving a subsistence to himself is giving alms."*

Or, with a reserve of a liberty to change the subject.—If the appropriator reserve to himself a right of changing the lands he appropriates for any other lands, at pleasure, it is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf, Mohammed maintains that the appropriation itself is valid, but that the condition reserved is void, because the condition does not prevent an extinction of right of proerty; and the appropriation is consequently complete, because of the extinction of this right; but not the condition, as being invalid, is void, in the same manner as the reserve of a right of change, in the foundation of a mosque, is void.

Or, with a reserve of a right of option.—
If the appropriator reserve to himself a right of option with respect to his appropriation, for three days, by saying (for instance) "I appropriate this house to such and such purposes, with this condition, that I shall have a right of option for three days; according to Aboo Yoosaf, both the appropriation and the condition are lawful. According to Mohammed, on the contrary, the appropriation is null. Their difference of opinion upon this point originates in the difference of their doctrine respecting a reserve of the revenue of an appropriation to the use of the appropriator:
for as, according to Aboo Yoosaf, an appropri-ator may lawfully reserve to his own use, during life, the revenue arising from what he appropriates, it follows that he deems it lawful that the appropriator reserve a right of option for three days, for the purpose of consideration. Mohammed, on the other hand, holds that the possession of a Moot walee, or procurator, is an essential, and as a reserve of option prevents possession from being completely taken, it follows that,
according to him, the appropriation is void.
An appropriation, moreover, is not complete without the will of the appropriator; and where he makes a reserve of option, this cannot be ascertained, it follows that the appropriation is void; had being once vo.d, its validity cannot afterwards be restored by the condition ceasing to operate.

Or with a respect of authority.—If a person appropriate land, with a reserve of his authority over it, it is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf. Our author remarks that Kadooree has expressly declared this. Such also is the doctrine of Hilal; and it is indeed, the generally received opinion. Hil-al particularly mentions it in treating of appropriations. Some doctrs allege, that if the appropriator particularly stipulate a reservation of authority over the lands, this authority remains to him accordingly; but not unless it be particularly stipulated by him. Our modern doctors, however, consider it as very doubtful whether this be an opinion of Mohammed, because it is a tenet of his that delivery into the hands of a procurator is essential to the validity of an appropriation: and where such delivery takes place the appropriator can no longer possess any authority over it. According to the tenets of Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, the delivery to a procurator is not an essential, and consequently the authority remains with the appropriator, although he should not have so stipulated. What was mentioned above, concerning the opinion of Mohammed, that "where the delivery to a procurator takes place, the appropriator can no longer retain any authority over the appropriation," applies to a case where the appropriator had not stipulated any reservation of authority to himself at the first:— for if he had stipulated this at the time of making the appropriation, his authority is not rendered void by delivery to a procurator, because as his authority continues where he stipulates it in behalf of another, it follows that, where he stipulates it in behalf of himself, it continues a fortiori.—The arguments in support of the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf (which is the most generally received doctrine), are twofold. First, the procurator enjoys his authority, only on behalf of the appro-piation, in consequence of his reservation;
and it is impossible that the appropriator himself should not be possessed of any authority, at the same time that another person enjoys an authority held on his behalf.—Secondly, the appropriator stands in a nearer relation to what he appropriates than any other person, and it is consequently proper that he possess an authority over it; in the same manner as where a person builds mosque, in which case the business of repairing it, as well as the appointment of all the officers, &c, appertain solely to him; or as where a person emancipates a slave, in which case the Willa appertains solely to him, as he stands in a nearer relation to the slave than any other person.

If, however, the appropriator who makes this condition (namely, a reservation of authority to himself), be a person of infamous character and unworthy of confidence,
the magistrate may take the appropriation of two stories, making the under storey a mosque, and the upper storey a dwelling, or vice versa,—with the door of the mosque towards the public road, and detach the mosque from its own property [in the manner before described]. He is moreover entitled to liberty to sell it;—or, if he die, the mosque is an inheritance:—as the mosque does not in this instance, appertain solely to God, because of the individual’s right in it still subsisting. This, however, is only where the dwelling has not been constructed merely for the purposes of the mosque: for if it have been constructed for the purposes of the mosque (as in the great mosque at Jerusalem), the appropriation is absolute, Hasan reports from Haneefa, that if the lower storey be a mosque, and the upper story a dwelling, the former continues for ever a mosque; because a mosque is one of those things which are designed to continue in perpetuity, and an under storey answers this purpose better than an upper storey. The reverse of this is reported from Mohammed, because reverence is indispensably due to a mosque and whatever an upper storey is constructed over a mosque, for the purpose either of dwelling in or of letting out to hire: this reverence cannot be observed. It is recorded, also, that when Aboo Yoosaf went to Bagdad and beheld the narrow and crowded condition of the place, he held the appropriation to be lawful and absolute in either case,—that is, whether the mosque be in the lower storey and the dwelling in the upper, or vice versa,—but this he admitted out of necessity. The same is recorded of Mohammed, when he went to Rai, and for the same reason.

If a person convert the centre hall of his house into a mosque, giving general admission into it, still it does not stand as a mosque but remains salable and inheritable: because a mosque is a place in which no person possesses any right of obstruction; and wherever a man has such a right with respect to the surrounding parts, the same must necessarily affect the place inclosed in them. This place, therefore, cannot be a mosque: besides, it is necessarily a thoroughfare for the family, and consequently does not appertain solely to God. It is reported from Mohammed that the centre hall of a house, thus constituted a mosque, cannot afterwards be given away, sold, or inherited. He consequently considers it to stand as a mosque; and Aboo Yoosaf is of the same opinion, because, as the person in question was desirous, that this place should become a mosque, and as it cannot become so without a road or entrance into it, the road is included without specification, in the same manner as in a case of hire.

Ground appropriated to building a mosque cannot be sold or inherited.—If a person appropriate ground for the purpose of erecting a mosque, he cannot afterwards resume or sell it, neither can it be inherited, because this ground is altogether alienated from the right of the individual, and appertains solely to God. The reason of this is that all things whatever are originally the property of the Almighty. When therefore the individual relinquishes his right in the ground, it reverts to its original state, and his power over it terminates, in the same manner as a master's power over a slave terminates in consequence of manumission, and cannot be resumed.

* A mosque cannot, in any instance, revert into the property of the founder.—If the place in which a mosque is situated should become deserted or uninhabited, insomuch that there is no farther use for the mosque, no person coming to worship therein, still it continues to stand as a mosque (according to Aboo Yoosaf), and does not revert to the founder; because, as he had put it out of his own possession, it cannot again become his property. Mohammed alleges that the mosque again becomes the property of the founder, or of his heirs, in case of his decease: because he had erected it for the purpose of public worship: and as that has ceased, the mosque is in the same predicament with the materials for building a mosque. In other words, if there be no farther occasion for materials (such as bricks and so forth) designed for the erection of a mosque, they revert to the founder, and so also in the case in question. This, however, is a conclusion which does not accord with the doctrine of Aboo Yoosaf for he holds that where there is no farther occasion for those materials in the construction of this mosque, they must be carried to another.

Cases of appropriations made to the use of the community at large.—If a person construct a reservoir for public use, or a caravansera for travellers, or erect a house upon the infidel frontiers for the accommodation of the Mussulman warriors in their excursions (which is termed a Ribat), or dedicate ground as a burying-place, his right of property therein is not extinguished until the magistrate issue a decree to that effect; because no termination of the proprietor's right takes place in this instance, insomuch that he may still lawfully continue to use those things (by residing in the house or Ribat, or drinking water out of the reservoir, or interring in the burial-place). It is therefore requisite either that the magistrate issue a decree, in order to complete the alienation, or that the founder himself refer the appropriation to his decease, in order that it may stand as a bequest, and become absolute upon that event, in the same manner as in the case of an appropriation made to the use of the poor. It is otherwise in the case of a mosque, because in that instance no right of usufruct remains to the founder, as the mosque appertains solely to God independent of any magisterial decree. All that is here advanced is according to Haneefa. Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that the person's right of property ceases on the instant of his saying, "I have made this for such and such purposes" (of residence, interment, or so forth), because with him it is a rule that appropriation is absolute and that consignment is not a condition of it. Mohammed maintains that as soon as people drink water out of the reservoir, or enter the caravansera, or warriors take up their residence in the Ribat, or interment takes place in the burying-ground, the proprietor's right is extinguished; because consignment (which he holds to be a condition) is established by such acts, as the consignment of anything must be made in the mode proper to that thing. It is sufficient also (according to him) if these acts he performed by, or with respect to only a single individual; because as the whole community cannot appreciate those acts, regard must necessarily be had to them as performed in any single instance. Wells and fountains are also subject to the same rule.

They may be consigned to a procurator.—If, in the cases last recited, the founder consign the article to a Mootwalee or procurator, such consignment is approved, because the procurator is in the character of a deputy, and the act of the deputy is the act of the principal. With respect to a mosque, indeed some allege that the delivery of it to a procurator is not a complete consignment, because there is no business for a procurator in a mosque. Others again say that consignment is established, as it is necessary in a mosque, that there be some person to keep it in order, and lock up the doors; the consignment of a mosque, therefore, to a procurator is approved. Some also assert that a burying-ground is considered in the same light as a mosque in this particular, because the procurator of a burying-ground is an office not in use. Others, again, maintain that it resembles a reservoir, or caravansera; if therefore, it be delivered to a procurator, consignment is established; because such an appointment is valid, although it be contrary to general usage.

Appropriations may be consigned to the prince of chief magistrate.—If a man, having a house in Mecca, appropriate it to the accommodation of pilgrims, or if a person, having a house in any other place, appropriate it to the accommodation of the poor, or mendicants, or, having a house upon the frontiers, dedicate it to the accommodation of the Mussulman warriors and their cattle, or dedicate the revenue from his lands to the support of the warriors in the way of God, and make over or consign those houses or lands to the prince (who is empowered to act in those particulars) such consignment is lawful. If, therefore, the person in question be afterwards desirous of revoking his appropriation, he cannot lawfully do so, for the reasons before alleged. The revenue arising from the lands, however, is lawful to the poor only, and not to the rich; but the use of any of the other articles (such as residing in the caravansera, or drinking water from the well, fountain, or reservoir) are lawful to rich and poor alike. The reasons of this distinction are twofold. First, people in general, in the appropriation of a revenue, intend only the relief of the needy, whereas, in that of the other articles, the accommodation of rich and poor is equally indented. Secondly, the articles of drink and lodging are requisite equally to the rich and to the poor; but in the article of pecuniary assistance, the rich are not necessitous, on account of their wealth, whereas the poor are necessitous.

Definition of the terms used in sale.—Beeya, or sale, in the language of the Law, signifies an exchange of property for property, with the mutual consent of the parties. Shirra signifies purchaser. The seller is termed Bayee: the purchaser Mooshterree: the thing sold Mooba: and the price Simmin.

Sale is contracted by declaration and acceptance.—Sale is completed by declaration and acceptance, the speech of the first speaker, of the contracting parties, being termed the declaration, and that of the last speaker the acceptance. Thus, if Zeid should first say to Omar, “I have sold to you a particular article belonging to me for ten dirms,” and Omar should then say, “I have bought that article belonging to you for the said price,” the speech of Zeid is in that case termed declaration, and that of Omar the acceptance. If, on the contrary, Omar should first say to Zeid, “I have purchased a particular article belonging to you for ten dirms,” and Zeid should then say, “I have sold the same to you for the said price,” the speech of Omar is in this case termed the declaration and that of Zeid the acceptance.

Expressed either in the preterite or the present.—It is a necessary condition that the declaration and acceptance be expressed (in the presence that preterite tense is indicative, for if either be expressed in the imperative or future the contract is incomplete. Thus, if the seller should say to the purchaser, “Buy this article belong to me for ten dirms,” and the purchaser reply, “I have bought the said article for ten dirms,”—or if the seller should say, “I have sold this article to you for ten dirms,” and the purchaser reply, “I will purchase the said article for ten dirms;”—in neither case would the sale be binding.

Or by any expressions calculated to convey the same meaning.—It is to be observed that in the same manner as a sale is established by the words “I have bought,” or “I have sold: so also is it established by an other words expressive of the same meaning:—as if either of the parties, for instance, should say, “I am contended with this price,” or “I have given you this article for a certain price:” or “take this article for a certain price;” because, in sale, regard is had to the spirit of the contract, and the particular use of the words bought and sold is not required; whence it is that sale may be contracted simply be a Taata or mutual surrender, where they seller gives the article sold to the purchaser, and the purchaser in return gives the price to the seller, without the interposition of speech. Some have alleged that this mode of sale by a mutual surrender is valid with relation to things of small value; but not otherwise. It is, however, certain that sale by a mutual surrender is valid in every case, as it establishes the mutual consent of the parties.

Objection.—It would appear that the sale, as recited above, to be rendered complete by the words “Take this,” &c. is not valid, as it was before declared to be a necessary condition that both declaration and acceptance should be expressed in the present or preterite tense indicative, and neither of them in the imperative.

Reply.—In this case the words “Take,” &c. are not of themselves declaration, but merely indicate the existence of a declaration in the preterite tense:—as if the seller had first said, “I have sold this thing:” and were then to add, “Take this,” &c., for the command is consequent to the declaration.

The acceptance may be deferred until the breaking up of the meeting; whether the declaration be made personally.—If either of the parties makes a declaration, it is in the power of the other to withhold his acceptance or refusal until the breaking up of the meeting; and this power is termed the option of acceptance.* The reason of this is that if such a power did not rest in

* Arab, Khair-al-Kabool. one of the parties, it must necessarily follow that the sale would take effect without his consent. As it is observed, in this instance, that as the declaration is not of itself sufficient to complete the contract, the person making the declaration is at liberty to recede from it.

Or by letter. or message.—If either the buyer or seller should send a letter or a message to the other, that other has the power of suspending his acceptance or refusal until he leave the place or meeting where he received such message or letter.

An offer made by the purchaser cannot be restricted by the seller, to any particular part of the goods.—If the purchaser make a declaration of his purchase of merchandise at a particular price, the seller is not in that case entitled to construe his acceptance as limited to a part of the merchandise only at a rate proportionate to the declaration for the whole;—and, in the same manner, if a seller should make a similar declaration, the purchaser is not at liberty to construe his purchase after that manner;—because this is a deviation from the terms proffered;
and also because the declarer has not expressed his assent thereto.

If the buyer or purchaser oppose a particular rate or price to particular parts or portions.—If the person who makes the declaration should specify a particular rate, opposed to particular parts of the merchandise, the acceptance may be limited. Thus if a person should say, "I will sell this heap of grain for ten dirms," the purchaser, if he declare his acceptance, is not in that case at liberty to limit his purchase to half the grain for five dirms; whereas, if the seller should say, "I will sell this grain at the rate of one man for da dirm," the purchaser after declaring his acceptance, may limit his purchase to what quantity he may desire.

If the acceptance be not expressed in due time, the declaration is null.—If either a seller or purchaser make a declaration, and one of the parties quit the place before any acceptance be expressed, the declaration so made is void.

Declaration and acceptance, absolutely expressed, render the sale binding.—When the declaration and acceptance are absolutely expressed, without any stipulations, the sale becomes binding, and neither party has the power of retracting unless in a case of a defect in the goods, or their not having been inspected. According to Shafei, each of the parties possesses the option of the meeting (that is, they are each at liberty to retract until the meeting break up and a separation take place), because of a saying recorded of the Prophet "The buyer and seller has each an option until they separate." Our doctors ceptance, is an injury to right of one of values, and it be impossible to ascertain the one of most common use, the absolute expression of dirms in this case renders the sale void, because the price being thereby rendered uncertain, a contention must necessarily ensue: still, however, if the parties choose to remove the cause of contention by voluntarily fixing the rate, the sale is valid.

Grain may be sold for other grain of a different species. It is lawful to sell wheat or other kind of grain either by means of measurements or by conjecture, provided it be in exchange for a different kind of grain; because the Prophet has said, "Sell any thing that is in exchange for a different kind, in whatsoever manner you please and without regard to the equality;" and also, because the uncertainty in this case proves no bar to its delivery. It is not lawful, however, to sell grain in exchange for the same kind, by conjecture, because this is of an usurious nature.

Goods may be sold by a weight or measurement which is not of any particular standard. —It is lawful, in this case, to use the measure of a particular vessel of which the exact capacity may not be ascertained, or the weight of a particular stone, the exact weight of which is not ascertained, because the uncertainty in this case cannot be productive of contention, since neither of these instruments of estimation may be used and the delivery take place immediately after; and it is not probable that the vessel or stone should be lost or destroyed in the interval between the measurement and the delivery, the only case in which a contention could arise.

Except in a case of Sillim sale. —A measurement of this kind, however, is not allowed in Sillim sales (that is, where the price is advanced, and the merchandise delivered afterwards), because in such case there is a probability of the vessel or stone being discovered during the long interval that takes place between the conclusion of the contract and the delivery of the goods; in which case, as the parties had no other criterion (during the existence of the stone or vessel) than their eyesight to judge from, a contention might afterwards arise as to the size or weight of the stone or vessel.

A sale fixing a particular price to each particular part or portion of goods, in the gross, extends only to one such part. —If a person sell a heap of grain, by declaring, "I have sold this heap at the rate of one dirm for every Kafeez," this sale takes place in one Kafeez only; nor can it extend beyond that quantity, unless the seller should explain, in the same meeting, the sum of the Kafeez’s. The two disciples are of opinion that the sale of the whole is valid in both cases,

The reasoning of Haneefa is that it is impracticable to extend the sale to the whole of the heap, because both the goods to be delivered and the price to be received are in this case uncertain; it must therefore be construed as existing in one Kafeez, the only ascertained quantity. It is rendered valid, however, with respect to the whole quantity, by the removal of the uncertainty, that is, by the seller either explaining the total, or ascertaining it by measurement during the meeting. The argument of the two disciples is, that the power of removing the uncertainty rests with the parties; and that the uncertainty, in this case, ought not to be deemed a bar to the validity of the sale; in the same manner as it is not a bar where a person sells one slave out of two, leaving it in the option of the purchaser to fix one either of them.

And a sale expressing the whole quantity, in this way, is altogether void, unless the amount of the whole be particularly specified. —If a person say, "I have sold my flock of goats at the rate of one dirm for each," the sale in that case is altogether invalid, in other words, it is not extended even to one goat, according to Haneefa; and in the same manner, the sale is altogether invalid if a person sell cloth at the rate of one dirm the yard, without explaining the number of yards; and the same of every other article, such as wood, pots, or the like. The two disciples are of opinion that in all these cases, the sale is valid with respect to the whole quantity, because the removal of the uncertainty is in the power of the parties; and also, because such uncertainty does not prevent the validity of the sale, as is demonstrated in the preceding case. The arguments of Haneefa in support of his opinion are also the same as those advanced by him in the preceding case; —in which, however, he has admitted the validity of the sale with respect to one Kafeez of wheat, because all Kafeez’s of wheat bring the same, no contention can arise in the delivery; whereas, in the case in question, the different articles, comprehending in themselves unequal units, the delivery could not be made without contention.

If the quantity agreed for fall short, the purchaser may either take it, or undo the contract. —If a person purchase a heap of grain for one hundred dirms, on the condition of the heap amounting to one hundred Kafeez’s, and it be afterwards discovered to fall short of that amount, in this case the purchaser has the option of either taking the actual amount, at a rate proportioned to the terms of the contract, or of undoing the contract entirely; because a branch of the terms takes place before the deed is rendered complete since, in order to render the deed complete, it is necessary that the actual quantity stipulated be taken possession of.

But, if it exceed, the sale is valid to the amount of the quantity bargain for. —If on the other hand, the heap be afterwards found to contain an excess beyond the stipulated amount; the sale is valid with respect to the amount of the one hundred Kafeez's, and the excess continues the property of the seller; because the sale is restricted to a specific quantity; and the excess is not included in the description, so as to be a dependant thereof, and not a separate article.

If the quantity be of a nature capable of specification and fall short, the purchaser may either take it, or undo the bargain. If a person sell a piece of cloth for ten dirms, on the condition of its contents amounting to ten yards, or a piece of ground for one hundred dirms, on condition of its measuring one hundred yards, and a deficiency afterwards appear, the purchaser has in that case the option either of cancelling the bargain entirely, or of taking the ground, or cloth thus defective, at the stipulated price; for the specification of yards is a mere description of the length and breadth; and no part of the price is opposed to the description of the wares; in the same manner as in cases with respect to animals; in other words; if a person purchase a goat, which afterwards appears to want an ear, he would have the option of taking the defective goat for the price stipulated, or of undoing the bargain; but he would have no right to diminish the price on account of such defect, because no part of the price is opposed to the goat in particular, so as to admit of any deduction in account of its deficiency; and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise in the preceding case, relative to wheat; because there the deficiency comes under the head of the quantity and not the description of the wheat; and the price being opposed to quantity, a proportionate diminution is accordingly made from it. Still, however, the purchaser has the option of undoing the contract if he please, on account of the difference from the terms; his consent having been given to the purchase of one hundred Kafeez's.

But if it exceed, the sale is binding to the amount agreed for. If however, the ground or the cloth should prove larger than the description, in this case the excess becomes the property of the purchaser, and no option remains to the seller, because (as has been already explained) the specification of yards relates merely to description and not to substance. The case, in short, becomes the same as if he had sold a slave on the supposition of his being defective, but who afterwards proves to be perfect.

If the quantity be so expressed as to relate both to measure and to substance, the purchaser may either stand to or undo the bargain, whether it exceed or fall short of the amount specified. If a person sell a piece of cloth, by declaring, "I have sold this piece of cloth, which measures one hundred yards, at the rate of one dirm for each yard," and a deficiency should afterwards appear, in this case the purchaser has the option, either of taking it, with a proportional deduction from the price, or of dissolving the contract entirely; because, although the specification of yards comes under the head of description, yet in this case the yards are considered as relating to the substance of the cloth, an opposite price being paid for the yard; therefore the seller having opposed the price to each of them, which renders each (as it were) a separate piece of cloth. Besides, if the seller should take the defective quantity at the rate proposed for the whole, it would follow that the terms of the contract (namely, the payment of one dirm per yard) did not take place; if, on the other hand the amount of the cloth exceed one hundred yards, the purchaser has, the option, either of taking the whole, at the rate of one dirm for each yard, or of dissolving the bargain: for although he has an advantage in the receipt of more cloth than he bargained for, yet this being tempered with a loss, in the necessity it lays him under of paying an additional sum, he is therefore left at liberty either to abide by the contract on these conditions, or to undo it.

The sale of a specific number of yards of a tenement is null; but not the sale of a share. If a person purchase ten yards of a house or bath measuring one hundred yards, such purchase is invalid, according to Haneef's, whether the buyer may or may not have known the measurement of the whole house. The two disciples maintain that it is valid. If, on the contrary, a person purchase ten shares of a house or bath containing one hundred shares, it is valid, in the opinion of all our doctors. The argument adduced by the two disciples in support of their opinion is, that ten yards of house or an hundred yards in capacity are in fact the same as ten shares out of an hundred shares. Haneef's, in support of his doctrine, argues that a yard, in its original meaning, is a stick applied to the purpose of measurement; but it is also used to denote the thing measured, and the thing so measured must be relative and not an abstract idea of the mind, such as a share; now it is impossible, in this case, to render such yards relative, since there exists an uncertainty, as no mention is made of the particular side of the house from which they have been measured: and such uncertainty would occasion contention between the parties. It is otherwise with respect to shares, for these are abstract ideas of the mind and not undefined relatives: and although, of consequence, an uncertainty exist with respect to them also, yet such uncertainty cannot occasion a contention, since the possessor of ten shares of a house may either enjoy them indefinitely, or may receive his share according to the mode prescribed in the division of joint property.

The purchase of a package of cloth is null, if it contain more or less than the quantity of pieces agreed for. If a person purchase of package containing cloth, on condition of there being ten pieces in it, and it afterwards appear that there are nine or eleven pieces in it, the sale is invalid, because of the uncertainty, with regard to the price, in the one case, and to the merchandise in the other; for in case of there being nine pieces, as the price of the piece wanting is unknown, that of the remaining nine is of consequence also unknown; and where, on the other hand, there is one too many, it is unknown which are the specific ten that ought to be delivered.

_Unless the seller previously specify the price of each particular piece._—If, however, the seller should explain the price of each piece of cloth, and there be too few, the sale is valid; but the purchaser has the option of undoing it if he pleases; whereas, if there be too many, it is invalid, because of the uncertainty with respect to the goods, as it would be impossible to ascertain the particular ten that are included in the sale. —So we have said that in case of deficiency also the sale is invalid, according to Haneefa. But this is unfounded.

A _sale is null in toto, if the description of the goods we at all fallacious._—If a person sell two pieces of cloth, on the condition of their being Heratee, and one of them afterwards prove to be Murwalee.* in that case the sale is completely invalid, that is, does not hold good even with respect to the true one; although the seller should have specified the prices of both; for when the seller joined together both pieces in the declaration of a sale of Heratee pieces, he, as it were, established a condition that the purchaser should accept a piece of Murwalle which being a false condition, the sale is therefore annulled.

_Case of the purchase of a piece of a cloth at so much per yard._—If a person purchase a piece of cloth, on the condition of its measuring ten yards, and at the rate of one dirham for each yard, and the measurement afterwards prove to be ten yards and a half, or nine yards and a half; in this case the purchaser (according to Haneefa) must pay ten dirhums in the first instance, and nine in the second; still having the option to undo the contract if he please. Aboo Yoosaf asserts that if the purchaser choose to abide by the contract, he must pay eleven dirhams in the first instance, and ten in the second. The opinion of Mohammed is, that in case the purchaser chooses to abide by the contract, he must pay ten and a half dirhams in the first instance, and nine and a half in the second; because the measurement of a yard having been fixed at one dirham, it necessarily follows that half a yard must be rated at half a dirham. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is that as the price of each yard was fixed at one dirham, it follows that each yard becomes virtually a distinct piece of cloth; and as one of these proves defective, it follows that the purchaser has the option either of undoing the bargain, or of taking the goods according to the terms of the contract. The arguments adduced by Haneefa in support of his opinion are, that the specification of yard is considered as referring to the description, and not the real quantity of the thing, excepting only where the price of each given measurement is specifically stipulated as a condition of the contract. Now, as in the case in question, the rate is opposed to each completed yard, but not to any smaller quantity, it follows that such smaller quantity must be considered as remaining in its original form.—that is, as applying merely to description, and therefore cannot involve an additional payment. Some have observed that in coarse cotton cloths, of which the extreme and interior parts are of a similar texture, it is not lawful for the purchaser to take any excess beyond the terms of the contract; as it may be cut off and restored to the seller without any injury to the piece, in the manner of things usually by weight; and hence the learned deem it lawful to sell even a single yard of it.

_In the sale of a house the foundation and superstructure are both included._—If a person sell the place of his abode (in other words, his house), the foundation and superstructure are both included in such sale, although they may not have been specified by the seller; because they are comprehended in the common acceptance of the term; and also, because, being joined to the ground in the nature of fixtures, they are considered as dependant parts of it.

_In the sale of land, the trees upon it are included._—In a sale of land, the trees upon it are included, although they be not specified, because they are joined to it, in the same manner as foundation and superstructure in the preceding case.

_But not the corn._—In a sale of ground, the grain then growing on it is not included, unless particularly specified by the seller; because it is joined to the ground, not as a fixture, but for the purpose of being cut away from it, in the same manner as goods of any kind which may have been placed upon it.

_Nor, in the sale of a tree, is the fruit then upon it included._—So also, if a person should sell a tree on which fruit is growing the fruit belonging to the seller, unless it had been specifically included in the sale; because the Prophet has said, ‘‘If a person sell a date tree with fruit upon it, the fruit belongs to the seller, unless the purchaser should have stipulated its delivery to him as a condition of sale.’’ Besides, although the fruit be, in fact, a part of the tree, yet as it is intended to be plucked and gathered, and not to be suffered to hang on the tree, it is therefore the same as grain.

_But the purchaser must immediately clear these away._—It is to be observed, however, that in the sale of a tree with fruit, or of ground with grain upon it, the seller must be immediately desired to clear them away, and deliver the property to the purchaser; because, in these cases, the property of the purchaser and seller being implicated together, it becomes incumbent on the seller to clear away what belongs to him; in the same manner as if he had placed any of his goods upon the ground in which case the clearance of them would have been requisite. Shafei maintains that in both these cases the grain and the fruit must be suffered to remain until they become ripe, because then it is only a period stipulated for the delivery of the things sold, and that period ought to be extended to the complete growth and maturity of these vegetables; in the same manner as in the case of a lease of ground, where if, at the expiration of the lease, the grain on the ground be green, it is suffered to remain until it ripen. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the obligation is the same on a lessee; and if he be permitted to extend the lease on account of the unripeness of the grain, he must, however, pay additional rent for it, which in effect substitutes for the delivery; and the substitute is in effect the same as the thing itself. It is to be observed that in the sale of a tree, the fruit is not included, whether it be of an appreciable nature or otherwise, unless it be specifically mentioned.

In the sale of ground, the seed sown in it is not included—If a person sell a piece of ground in which seed has been sown, but of which the growth has not appeared above ground, in this case the seed is not included in the sale. If the apparent growth should have taken place though not in such a degree as to render the vegetable of any value, in this case there is a difference of opinion.

Some allege that the vegetation is not included in the sale: and others, that it is. This difference of opinion has its foundation in the different sentiments which the parties entertain with regard to the validity of the sale of vegetation, prior to its being fit to be cut down by the hook, or used by animals in the way of forage: for those who consider the separate sale of such vegetation to be valid, are of opinion that is not included; whilst those who consider the sale of it as invalid, are of opinion that it is included in the sale of the ground.

The time-product is not included, in the sale of land or trees, although the rights and appendages be expressed in the contract.—

Grain and fruit are not included in a sale of ground, or of a tree, although the purchaser and seller specify the rights and appendages (in other words, although the seller declare, "I have sold this ground, in this tree, with all its rights and appendages"), because grain and fruit do not fall under these descriptions. (The rights of a thing are those which we can enjoy, and which form the principal object of possession, such as a watercourse or a road: the appendages are things from which we derive use; but which are more particularly considered as dependant parts; such as a cook-room, or a house for keeping water.) In the same manner, if the seller should say, "I have sold this tree, or this piece of ground, with every thing small and great of its rights and appendages which I possess in it" still neither the fruit nor the grain is included in it.

Nor unless all its dependencies be generally expressed.—If however, he should say, in a general manner, "I have sold this tree (or this piece of ground), with every thing great and small which I possess in it," in this case the grain and the fruit are necessarily included in it.

Nor can any product be included after being gathered or cut down.—It is to be observed that grain which has been cut, or fruit which has been plucked, cannot by any construction whatever be included in the sale, unless expressly mentioned as such.

Fruit may be sold upon the tree in every state of growth.—The sale of fruit upon a tree is valid, whether the strength of the fruit be ascertained or not; but that is, whether it may or may not have reached such a degree of strength as may preserve it from common accidents; because fruit is a property of certain value, either immediately, in case of its being ripe, or hereafter, in case of its being in an unripe state (some have said that the sale of fruit in a weak state is invalid: the first doctrine is however, the most authentic: and the sale of fruit in an absolute manner being valid, the purchaser must immediately take it from the tree, whether this be particularly expressed as a condition in the sale or not.

But if the contract involve any condition not properly appertaining to sale, it is null.—If, however, the condition of suffering the fruit to remain on the tree be stipulated, the sale is null, because such a condition is illegal, since it implicates together the right of property of the two parties, which is repugnant to the nature of sale; and every condition of this kind invalidates the sale. Besides, in this case, it must necessarily follow that one deed is interwoven with another; in other words, that either a loan or a lease is implicated with the sale which is unlawful. In the same manner, the sale of grain, with a stipulation of leaving it on the seller's ground, is unlawful, and for the same reason. The same rule also obtains (according to Haneefah and Abou Yooosof) where the fruit or corn has attained its full growth, as this implicates the right of property of two parties. Mohammad is of opinion that, in this instance, such a condition is lawful, because of the existence of the whole of the thing in question; whereas, in the former case, the part of the property which afterwards vegetated was not in being at the time of the conclusion of the deed, and the implication of a condition with regard to a nonentity being illegal, the sale is therefore null.

The additional growth of fruit purchased on the tree, if suffered to continue upon it, by consent of the seller, is the property of the purchaser.—If a person purchase fruit upon the tree before it had reached its full growth, in an absolute manner (that is without stipulating the condition of its remaining upon the tree until it become ripe), and afterwards, with the permission of the seller, suffer it to hang on the tree, in this case the additional growth becomes his lawful property. If, however, he act in this manner without the consent of the seller; he must then bestow the difference in charity, as being the produce of the property of another without the consent of that other. If, on the other hand, the sale should have taken place when the fruit had attained its full growth, and the purchaser suffer it to remain until it become ripe, he is not on that account required to bestow any thing in charity, because in this instance a change from one state to another takes place without any increase being made to the substance.

And so also if the purchaser take a lease of the tree—If a person, having in an absolute manner purchased fruit which had not attained its full growth, should afterwards suffer it to remain on the tree till it become ripe, by taking a lease of the tree till that period, in this case the increase of substance is lawful to him, because the lease is null, on account of a want of precise knowledge with respect to the period of it.—and also, on account of its not having been warranted by absolute necessity, since it was in the power of the leases to have purchased the tree itself:—and the lease being null, there remains only the consent of the seller, to which regard must be had.

But this rule does not hold with respect to grain purchased upon the ground.—It is otherwise where a person purchases grain upon the ground, and having then taken a lease of the ground until the grain be capable of being cut down, suffers it to remain until that time: for the increase of substance is not in such case lawful to him, since the lease so made is invalid, and an invalid lease is the occasion of baseness and abomination.

Any new fruit which may grow in the interim is the property of the seller and purchaser. If a person, in an unconditional manner, purchase fruit upon a tree which had not completely vegetated, and afterwards, before he had received a formal seizin of it, new fruit should grow, in this case the sale is invalid, because of the impracticability of delivery on the part of the seller, from the impossibility of distinguishing between what was the subject of the sale and what was not. But if new fruit should appear after the seizin of the purchaser, such fruit is in an equal degree the right of both, because of its intermixture with the property of both. The assertion of the purchaser, however, with regard to the quantity, is credited, because the fruit is in his possession. (The sale of artichokes or melons which are growing is subject to the same law as that of fruit growing upon trees).

Rule in the purchase of vegetable sold on a tree.—If a person wish to purchase fruit, artichokes, or melons, and afterwards to have it in his power to let them remain until they become ripe, or until they shall yield a new crop, so as to have a lawful claim to the property, the expedient to be practised, in order to render such conduct legal, is to purchase the tree or bed itself, and after clearing it of the fruit when ripe, to undo the contract of sale with regard to the tree or bed.

If a person should sell fruit, with a reservation of a specific number of Ratsls of it, the sale is invalid, whether the fruit be upon the tree or off it; because although the reservation be itself specific and known, yet the residue is unknown. It is otherwise where a reservation is made of a specific tree; because there the remainder is known, being obvious to the eye.—Our author remarks that this doctrine is conformable to a tradition of Hasan, adopted by Tahavee: but that such a sale is valid, according to the Zahir Rawayet, and also in the opinion of Shafei, because it is a rule that whatever may be lawfully sold, separately, may also be lawfully excepted from a deed of sale. Thus the sale of one Kafeel from a heap of grain being lawful, the exception of it is also a lawful act.—It is otherwise with respect to a fetus in the womb, or any particular member of an animal: because as the separate sale of such subjects is illegal, so also is the reservation of them.

Grain may be sold in the ear, or pulse in the husk.—The sale of wheat in the ear, or of beans in the husk, is valid: and the law is the same with respect to rice or rape seeds in the husk. Shafei is of opinion that the sale of green beans in the husk, or of walnuts, almonds, or Pistachio nuts in the shell, is not valid; but with respect to wheat in the ear, he has given two opposite opinions. All these sales are, however, valid in the opinion of all our doctors. The reasoning of Shafei is that the subject of the sale, in these cases, is hidden within a thing of no value in itself namely, the husk, and that therefore the case becomes the same as if a goldsmith should sell a heap of earth mixed with particles of gold, in exchange for another heap of a similar nature, which is invalid. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.

First, the Prophet has said, " The sale of fruit upon the tree, or of grain in the ear, is invalid, unless it approach to a state of ripeness." Secondly, wheats is an article capable of yielding advantage; and hence the sale of it in the ear is valid in the same manner as that of barley, the one being an appreciable article as well as the other. It is otherwise with gold dust, for the sale of

• The consent of the seller is here presupposed; for neither of the parties can undo a sale without the consent of the other. This expedient is therefore suggested on a supposition of the future undoing of the sale being equally agreeable to both parties.

† Whence it may be inferred that the sale, in the ear, or upon the tree, is admissible.
that, mixed with earth, is lawful from the possibility of its being usurious.

The sale of a house includes the fixtures and their appendages.—If a person sell a house, of which the locks are not of the hanging but of the fixed kind, in this case, the keys of such locks are considered as included in the sale; because the locks themselves are included in the house, in consequence of their being fixtures; and the sale of a lock includes the key, without its being expressly stipulated, because it is considered as a constituent part of it, since a lock without a key is of no use.

The seller must defray the expense of weighers, tellers, measurers, and money-essayers—The wages of the measurer of the goods, or of the essayer of the money, must be paid by the seller:—the wages of the measurer, because, as measurement is essential to enable the seller to deliver over the goods; the wages of the essayer attending to the organization of the money, that falls properly upon him (and so also, the wages of weighers or tellers)—and the wages of the essayer, because of a tradition, delivered by Ibn Roostim, that such is the doctrine of Mohammed; and also for this reason, that the essay of the money takes place after the delivery, when it becomes the business of the seller to have it essayed, in order that he may distinguish what is his right and what is not; and that he may ascertain the bad coin in order to reject them. Ibn Soomi relates it as the opinion of Mohammed that the purchaser should defray the wages of the essayer, because he stands in need of ascertaining the good dirms which he has stipulated to deliver, and the good dirms are known by means of an essayer, in the same manner as quantity by means of a measurer.

But the charge of weighing the price must be defrayed by the purchaser.—The charge of weighing the price is due by the purchaser, because he is under the necessity of delivering it to the seller, and the delivery is completed after ascertaining of the weight. In a sale stipulating immediate payment, the purchaser must first deliver the price to the seller, because his right (namely, the goods sold) is of a fixed and determinate nature, whereas the price is not so; and it is therefore incumbent on him, in order that both parties may be on a part to deliver the price to the seller, which fixes and determines it: for it cannot be determined but by delivery.†

* Meaning properly, some person who is employed as a sworn or professed measurer.
† Thus if the price stipulated be ten dirms, and the purchaser be required to deliver ten or more sand dirms (for example) in this case, although the number ten be determinate, yet the units to compose that number and to be taken from a great number, are not specific and determinate, until actually delivered. This doctrine is frequently and particularly enlarged upon in the sequel of this book.

In barter or exchange, the mutual delivery must be made by both parties at the same time.—In a sale of goods for goods, or of money for money, it is necessary that both parties make the delivery at the same time; because being on a par in point of certainty and uncertainty, there is no necessity for a prior delivery.

CHAPTER II.

OF OPTIONAL CONDITIONS.

Definition of the term.—An optional condition is where one of the parties stipulates it as a condition that he may have the option, for a period of two or three days, of annulling the contract if he please.

A condition of option may be lawfully stipulated by either party.—The stipulation of a condition of option, on the part either of the seller or purchaser is lawful: and it may be stipulated to continue for three days or less; but it must not be extended beyond that term; because it is related that Hooban having been defrauded in several of his bargains, the Prophet addressed him thus, "Hooban, when you make a purchase bar deceit, and stipulate a condition of option." Provided it exceed not the term of three days.—An optional condition, stipulated to remain in force for a period exceeding three days, is unlawful according to Haneefa; and Ziffer and Shafei are of the same opinion. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that it may be stipulated to continue to any length of time whatever: because it is related that Ibn Omar extended it to two

* Arab. Khiar-al-Shirt. In contracts of sale there are five different options: These are, 1st. Option of acceptance. 2. Optional conditions. 3. Option of determination. 4. Option of inspection, and 5. Option from defect. An option of acceptance is a liberty which either of the parties: in a contract of sale, has of withholding his acceptance, after the tender of the other, until the breaking up of the meeting. An optional condition is where one of the parties stipulates a period of three days before he gives his final assent to the contract. An option of determination is where a person, having purchased one out of two or three homogeneous things, stipulates a period to enable him to fix his choice. Option of inspection, is the power which the purchaser of an unseen thing has of rejecting it after sight. Option from defect is the power which a purchaser has of dissolving the contract on the discovery of a defect on the merchandise. The translator has thought it proper, in this note, to bring into one point of view an explanation of the several kinds of option, as it may possibly tend to give a clearer idea of them than what could be collected from the scattered definitions of them as they occur in the course of the work.
months; and also because it is ordained, by the law, for the purpose of answering the necessities of man, in enabling him to consider and set aside what is bad; and as a period of three days may not be sufficient for this purpose, the indulgence is therefore extended with respect to the merchandise, in the same manner as with respect to the price. The argument of Haneefa is that an optional condition is repugnant to the nature of the act, which fixes an immediate obligation on the parties, and is allowed only because of the saying of the Prophet already quoted: whence it cannot be extended to a period beyond what has been there specified.

If it exceed three days, and the stipulating party declare his acceptance before the expiration of the third day, the sale is lawful —although a conditional option beyond three days be not permitted, still if such a condition be stipulated, and the person making such stipulation, before the lapse of the three days, declare his acceptance of the contract, the sale is in that case valid, according to Haneefa. Ziffer, however, is of different opinion; for he argues that the sale being invalid from the beginning, on account of the illegality of the condition, it cannot be afterwards rendered valid by the removal of such condition. The arguments of Haneefa on this point are twofold. First, as the acceptance of the sale was declared before the lapse of the three days, the cause of its invalidity has not begun to operate. Secondly, the sale is rendered valid on the fourth day; and as the acceptance is declared before that period, the sale is consequently kept free from any cause of invalidity. From this second argument some have considered that the invalidity of the sale does not take place until the commencement of the fourth day; whilst others (finding their opinion on the first argument), hold that the contract was invalid from the beginning: but is afterwards rendered valid by the removal of the cause of its invalidity previous to its operation.

The payment of the price may be substituted as the condition. —If is lawful for a person to make a purchase on this condition, that "if in the course of three days he do not pay the price, the sale shall be null and void." If, however, instead of three days he stipulate four, the sale is not valid, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed is of opinion that it is valid, whether he stipulate four days or more. All our doctors, however, agree, that in case of such a stipulation having been made, if the purchaser in the mean time pay the price, previous to the lapse of the third day, the sale is valid. The reason of this is that a condition of this nature is of the same nature with an optional condition, because in the case the purchaser cannot furnish the price, the seller stands in need of a power to annul the act. As, moreover, Haneefa holds that a sale is in valid, where the condition of option extends beyond three days, but may afterwards be rendered valid by a formal confirmation previous to the lapse of the third day, so also in the case in question. As Mohammed, on the contrary, holds that the extension of the condition of option beyond the third day is lawful, so also in the present instance. Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, although (contrary to analogy) he holds the extending of a condition of option beyond three days to be lawful, because of a tradition which he quotes to this effect, yet is of opinion that the same extension is unlawful in the present instance (arguing from analogy), as there is no tradition in support of it. There is another explanation, from analogy, with respect to this case, which has been adopted by Ziffer, to the following effect, that, in the sale in question, an invalid dissolution has been stipulated (for the dissolution is invalid, as it depends upon a condition); and as a sale is rendered void by the stipulation of a valid dissolution, it follows that by the stipulation of an invalid dissolution it is rendered void a fortiori. The reason, however, for a more liberal construction in this particular is, that the condition here stipulated is considered as an equivalent to a condition of option, as has already been explained.

The seller, by stipulating a condition of option, does not relinquish his property in the article sold —If the seller stipulate a condition of option, the right of property over the goods does not in that case shift from him, because the completion of the sale depends on the mutual consent of the parties, and the condition of option evinces that the seller has not completely consented. If, therefore, under these circumstances, the seller should emancipate a slave whom he had in that manner sold, the emancipation would hold good. —Neither is the purchaser in such a case entitled to use or employ the goods, although he should have taken possession of them with consent of the seller. —If, after the purchaser had possessed himself of the goods, they should perish or be destroyed previous to the expiration of the period of optional condition, he becomes in that case responsible for the value; because by the destruction of the goods the sale is annulled (for the execution of it rested only on the consent of the seller; and where the subject of it is lost, the execution of it becomes impossible; and it is null of course); and as the goods were in possession of the purchaser with a view to purchase (which circumstance renders a purchaser responsible for the value), he is responsible accordingly. If, on the other hand, the goods be lost in the possession of the seller, the deed is null, and no judgment is incumbent on the purchaser, in the same manner as in the case of an absolute sale, which is a sale where no condition is stipulated.

But the property in it devolves upon the purchaser where the stipulation is made on his part; and he is consequently responsible for the loss of the goods.—If the condition of option be stipulated by the purchaser, the right of property over the goods shifts from the seller, because the sale is rendered complete on his part. The right of property, however, although it shift from the seller, does not vest in the purchaser, according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that the purchaser becomes the proprietor; for, if this were not the case, it must necessarily follow that, after it moved from the seller, it would remain subject to no person; and this is a state not supposed by the law. The arguments of Haneefa on this point are two-fold. First, as the right of property with respect to the price has not shifted from the purchaser, it follows that if the right of property with respect to the goods also vest in him, the property with respect both to the thing purchased and the return for it is concerned in one person, which is absolutely illegal. Secondly, if the right of property with respect to the goods were to vest in the purchaser, it might frequently happen that the goods would, in the interval, before the completion of the sale, be made away without any intention on the part of the purchaser (as if the purchaser had bought a slave related to himself within the prohibited degrees); and as the sale object of the reserve of option is the benefit of the purchaser, in allowing him time for consideration, it follows that if the right of property were to vest immediately in him, he might be deprived of the advantage which is the object of the reserve of option.

If the purchaser have the option, and the goods be injured or destroyed in the interim, he is responsible for the price.—If the merchandise, where the stipulation of option is on the part of the purchaser, perish or be destroyed, the purchaser is in that case answerable for the price, in the same manner also, if the goods receive an injury, the purchaser is responsible for the price; because the goods, after purchase and injury, cannot be returned. And the sale consequently becomes binding. The purchaser, therefore, is responsible for the price in either instance, for destruction necessarily implies previous injury; and hence in a case where the purchaser is utterly destroyed, the sale first becomes binding and complete, and the destruction takes place afterwards.

But if it rest with the seller the purchaser is responsible for the value only—And as, in a case of injury, the payment of the price becomes obligatory, so also in a case of destruction. It is otherwise where the merchandise perishes in the possession of the purchaser when the option had been stipulated by the seller; for in this case the purchaser is answerable only for the value; because the circumstance of the injury does not render the restitution impracticable, since the seller, in that case, had the option either of taking the merchandise thus injured, or of rejecting it, if he please; as the optional condition remains with him: and hence, as the sale does not become binding on the occurrence of the injury, if the seller choose to confirm it, the purchaser in that case only pays the value of the injured merchandise.

Right of option, in the purchase of a wife, is not affected by cohabitation with her in the interim of option.—If a person purchase his own wife, with a reserve of option for three days, in this case the marriage subsists during that interval, as the right of property does not take place because of the optional condition; and if he have carnal connexion with her during that interval, the condition of option is not thereby annulled; because he has it still in his power after such connexion, to undo the sale, since his cohabitation with her is the exercise of a right in virtue of his marriage, and not of his right of property. If, however, his wife be a virgin, his cohabitation with her annuls the condition of option, and establishes the sale, as it is a damage to her, and a diminution of her value. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples are of opinion that the husband becomes immediate property of his wife by the optional purchase, whereas the marriage is immediately annulled. If, therefore, he should have cohabitation with her, he cannot afterwards reject her, although she may have been a woman; because the marriage being null, the cohabitation was not in virtue of marriage, but of property. This difference of opinion between Haneefa and the two disciples, respecting the property vesting immediately in a conditional purchaser, has given rise to opposite decisions in a variety of different cases. Of this number are the following:

Case of optional purchase of a slave related to the purchaser.—If a person make an optional purchase of a slave related to him within the prohibited degrees, the emancipation, in the opinion of the two disciples, takes place immediately; whereas, according to Haneefa, it does not take place until after the confirmation of the contract.

And of a slave optionally purchased under a vow of emancipation.—If, also, a person make a vow to emancipate a slave whenever he becomes proprietor of one, then, according to the two disciples, if he make a conditional purchase of one, the emancipation takes place immediately; whereas, according to Haneefa, it does not take place till after the confirmation.

Or of a menstruous female slave—If, also, a person make an optional purchase of a female slave, and her monthly courses happen during the term of option, these courses are included in the prescribed term.

*In which case the slave would become immediately free.
†And not for the price set upon it in the

*That is to say, not a virgin.
of abstinence, according to the two disciples; whereas, according to Hanefi, they are not included. If and if the purchaser, availing himself of his optional condition, should return her to the seller, the seller need not observe the prescribed term of abstinence, according to Hanefi; whereas, the two disciples hold that such observance is incumbent on him.

Or of a pregnant wife — If, on the other hand, a person makes an optional purchase of his own wife, and if she, during the interval of option, bring forth a child, she is not an Am-Walid to the purchaser, according to Hanefi; whereas, according to the two disciples, she is so. If also, a person makes an optional purchase, of merchandise, and having with the consent of the seller, received possession of it, afterwards give it in deposit to the seller, and it be lost in the interval, according to Hanefi, the trust is null and void, as the deposit was not the property of the purchaser, and therefore he is of opinion that the loss results to the seller; whereas the two disciples, holding she said deposit to be valid, are of opinion that the loss results to the purchaser agreeably to the law of deposits.

Optional purchase made by a privileged slave.—If, on the other hand, a privileged slave makes an optional purchase, and the seller, during the interval of option, exempt him from the payment, in this case, according to Hanefi, the condition of option remains in force; because if he should return the merchandise, it follows that he does not choose to accept of the property, and a privileged slave has the power of accepting or rejecting as he pleases; but, according to the two disciples, the condition of option is annulled by the exemption of payment; because (in their opinion) the property having vested from the beginning, it follows that if he were to return the merchandise to the seller, it would be in effect a gift to him, and a privileged slave has not the power of making a gift.

Case of optional purchase of wine by a Zimmee, who in the interim embraces the faith.—If, moreover, a Zimmee purchase spirituous liquors from a Zimmee, on a condition of option, and the purchaser, in the interval, become a Mussulman, in this case, according to the two disciples, the condition of option remains no longer in force, because the purchaser having (agreeably to their tenets) become proprietor of the liquor, it follows that if he were permitted to reject it, he would create in another a right of property with respect to liquors, which no Mussulman is allowed to use. According to Hanefi, on the contrary, the sale becomes void, because the purchaser (agreeably, to his tenets), not being then the proprietor and the circumstance of becoming a Mussulman putting it out of his power to become the proprietor by removing the condition, the sale is of necessity annulled.

The possessor of option may annul the sale with the knowledge of the other party, or confirm it, with his knowledge.—In case of a sale on a condition of option, it is lawful, according to Hanefi and Mohammed, for the party possessing the option to annul the contract within the stipulated period, or to confirm it; which latter he may do without the knowledge of the other party: but it is not lawful for him to annul it without the knowledge of the other party; and such, also, is the opinion of Shafei. The argument of Aboo Yousaf is that the party possessing the option may annul the contract without the knowledge of the other: and such, also, is the opinion of Shafei. The arguments of Hanefi and Mohammed are, that a contract of sale involves the rights of both parties, and that the annulment of the sale by one party only is an exercise of a right partly belonging to the other, whilst at the same time such exercise may eventually be attended with a loss to the other; for supposing the possessor of the option to be the seller, and that he annul the sale without the knowledge of the purchaser, and the purchaser, in the mean time, in the confidence of the sale being complete, take possession of the merchandise, then, in case of its destruction, he must of consequence be responsible for it; or, supposing the purchaser to be the possessor of the option, and that he annul the sale without the knowledge of the seller, then an eventual loss may result to the seller, as it is possible that, on the presumption of his goods being already sold, he may enquire out another purchaser. Hence as such an exercise, on the part of either, of the right of the other, may be attended with an eventual injury, the annulment of an optional sale is therefore made to rest upon the knowledge of the other party. This case, in short, resembles the dismissal of an agent; for if a person, having appointed an agent, should afterwards dismiss him without his knowledge, it would not be valid until the agent was himself informed of it; and so also in this case in question. It is otherwise with the confirmation... sale; as the exercise of such a right by one party only does not entail an injury. The assertion of Aboo Yoossi that "the possession of the option, if not by the party who took the annulment, is vested on the part of the other," is not admitted; for how can the other, who does not himself possess such power, bestow it upon the possessor of the option?

And even if he annul it without the other's knowledge, and the other be informed before the expiration of the term, it is valid.—If the person possessing the option annul the sale without informing the other party, and such knowledge, nevertheless, reach him before the expiration of the stipulated period, then, because of his acquirement of such knowledge, the annulment is rendered complete. If, on the other hand, it should not have reached him until the expiration of the stipulated period, then the annulment is rendered complete, because of the expiration of the stipulated period.

A right of option, in sale, cannot descend to an heir.—If a person possessing the right of option in a sale should die, the sale is then complete, and the right of option becomes void, and does not descend to his heirs, — Shafei maintains that the option descends to the heirs, because, being a fixed and established right, it cannot be inherited, in the same manner as an option in case of defect, or an option of determination. The arguments of our doctors are that an option is in reality nothing but desire, or disposition, which is not capable of being transferred from one to another; and nothing but what is capable of devolving from one person to another can be inherited. — It is otherwise with respect to option in case of defect, as that is granted to the heir, because of his right to obtain possession of a thing whole and complete, in the same manner as the option would be inherited, if the same were an option of determination, or may be the heir, in that case, to the whole thing, because of his right of inheritance, whereas, if option is capable of being a subject of inheritance. It is otherwise, also, with respect to an option of determination, as the heir becomes the proprietor in that instance, because of the mixture of property, and not because of his right of inheritance.

A right of option may be referred to a third person.—If a person, in purchasing any article, stipulate the option of another person, in this case, provided either the purchaser or the possessor of the option confirm the sale, it is valid; but if either of them annul it, it becomes void. The reason of this is, that the stipulation of the option of another is admitted, upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that it is inadmissible, and such is the opinion of Ziffer, because option being one of the articles of the contract, it follows that the stipulation of it for another, who is not one of the contracting parties, is illegal, in the same manner as if it were stipulated that some other than the purchaser should pay the price. — The arguments of our doctors are, that the establishment of the right of option in one who is not a party to the contract is by way of appointment from him to act as his substitute. In this case, therefore, the option is vested both in the party and in his substitute: and consequently, it is lawful for either of them to confirm or annul the contract.—If one of them should confirm, and the other annul the contract, in this case the first of these acts which may have been performed becomes valid. If both should have been performed at the same time, then (according to one tradition) the act of the contracting party is valid; — or (according to another) the validity of the annulment is preferred to that of the confirmation. The principle on which the first tradition proceeds is that the act of the contracting party is of superior force to that of a substitute who derives his authority from him; and the principle on which the second tradition is founded is that annulment is of superior force to confirmation, because annulment may take place after confirmation, but confirmation cannot take place after annulment. Some have asserted that the first tradition is conformable to the doctrine of Mohammed, and the second to that of Aboo Yoossi; — arguing from their different decisions in the case of an agent of sale and his constituent: for if both of them should at the same time sell the same thing to different persons the sale of the constituent is valid, according to Mohammed, whereas, according to Aboo Yoossi, both sales are valid; but the article sold must be divided between the two purchasers.

Case of selling two slaves, with a condition of option with respect to one of them.—If a person sell two slaves for a thousand dirms, stipulating an optional condition with respect to one of them, the case admits of four different statements. — I. Where the seller does not oppose a specific price to each of the slaves, nor specify the one respecting whom the optional condition is to operate; and this is illegal, because of the uncertainty both as to the subject of the sale and the price: for as the slave, concerning whom the condition of option is stipulated, is not (as it were) included in the sale, and as he is not specified, it follows that the other, who is the subject to the sale, is also unknown— II. Where the seller sets a particular price upon each of the slaves, and also specifies to which the condition of option relates; and this is valid, because of the certainty with respect to the subject of the sale and the price.

Objection.—It would appear that the sale is in this case illegal; because the slave who is the subject of the condition is not, in effect, included in the sale; and, as both are joined together in one declaration, it follows that the acceptance of the sale with relation to what is not the subject of it becomes a condition of the validity of the sale with regard to what is: it being the same, in short, as if a person should join a freeman and a slave in one declaration of sale, which is illegal, because the acceptance of the sale with regard to what is not capable of being the subject of it (namely, the free man) is here made a condition of the validity of the sale with respect to the slave; and this condition is the cause of annulling the sale: it therefore follows that the sale is in the same manner invalid in the case in question, as the same condition (which occasions an annulment of the sale) is equally induced in this instance.

Reply.—The sale, in the case in question, is lawful; because, although the acceptance of the sale, with respect to the slave concerning whom the option is stipulated, be a condition of the validity of the sale with respect to the other slave also, still such condition does not annul the sale, since the optional slave is a fit subject for sale: it is therefore, in fact, the same as if a person were to join a Moddabir and an absolute slave in one declaration; and as the sale is in that instance valid, so also in the case in question:—contrary to where a seller joins a slave and a freeman in one declaration: because a freeman is not a fit subject of sale.

III. Where the seller opposes a particular price to each slave, but does not specify to which of them the condition of option relates.—IV. Where the seller specifies the slave to whom the condition of option relates, but does not oppose a specific price to each of them. In both these cases the sale is invalid, because of the uncertainty of the subject of the sale in the one instance, and of the price in the other.

Option of determination.—If a person purchase one of two pieces of cloth for ten dirhms, on the condition of his being at liberty for three days to determine on the particular piece which he may approve, such sale is valid; and the condition so stipulated is called an option of determination.

It extends to a choice out of three, but, not out of more.—A sale is in the same manner valid, where a person purchases, with a reserve of option, out of three pieces; but it is not lawful to purchase, in that manner, one out of four pieces. What is here advanced proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that the sale is not lawful in either of these three cases, because the subject of sale is uncertain; and such also, is the opinion of Ziffer and Shafei. The reason for a more favourable construction is, that optional conditions have been ordained for the benefit of man, in order that he may thereby be enabled to set aside the bad, and to choose the good for himself: it is, moreover, evident that man stands in need of commodities of this nature, in order that he may be enabled to show the merchandise to some person in whose judgment he confides; or if an agent be employed that he may show it to his constituent; and this the seller would not permit him to do unless such a condition were stipulated. This species of sale therefore, being in effect the same as an optional one, it follows that it is in a similar manner lawful. This necessity on the part of man, however, is fully answered by means of three pieces, as this number comprehends the three qualities of good, bad, and medium; and there can be no uncertainty with respect to the subject of the sale, in this species of contract, to occasion contention, as regard is had solely to price on which the purchaser determines.

Objection.—Why then is it not lawful with respect to four pieces, as in that case also no contention would take place?

Reply.—Although, in this case also, there would be no uncertainty with regard to the subject of the sale, to occasion contention, yet the efficient cause of the legality (namely, the necessity of man) does not here exist, and it is therefore unlawful.

An option of determination may involve a condition of option. Some have observed that, in a case of option of determination, a condition of option is also indispensable; and that is recorded in the Jama Sagheer.

Others, again (following the Jama Kaber), say that the condition of option is not requisite; and hence it is inferred that what has been recorded in the Jama Sagheer is that such a condition often takes place; but that it is absolutely necessary.

But the term for making the determination must not at all events, exceed three days.—It is to be observed, however; that if, in a sale stipulating an option of determination, it should not be thought necessary to insert a condition of option, the period for determining the choice must in that case, according to Haneefa, be limited to three days: but according to the two disciples it may be fixed to whatever period they please.

Of the articles referred to the purchaser's choice, one is the subject of the sale. And the others are as deposits. It is also to be observed that in case of option of determination, the subject of the sale is one piece of cloth (for example), and the other piece is a deposit in the hands of the purchaser.

If, therefore, one of the pieces be lost or spoiled the sale takes place with respect to it in exchange for the stipulated price; and the other price is as a deposit; because it is impossible to reject the piece which is lost or spoiled. If, on the other hand, both pieces be lost at the same time, the purchaser must in that case pay the half of the price of each, because the determination of purchase not having been made with respect to either of the pieces. It follows then, that the sale and trust operate indeterminably with respect to each.

And both may be returned in case of a condition of option. If besides the option of determination, a conditional option be also stipulated, the purchaser is in that case at liberty to ret in both pieces

*Arab. Khiai-ai-tayeen

The heir of the person endowed with an option of determination may return one of the two articles referred to the purchaser's choice in case of his death.—If a person possessing an option of determination should die, his heir is empowered to return one of the articles; for an option of determination (as has been before explained) necessarily descends to an heir, because of the implication of his property with that of another; whence he is not, in his option of determination, restricted to three days—if, on the contrary, a person recently possessed of a power of option died, his heir has no option, as was before explained.

Option is declared and the sale made binding by any act of the purchaser in relation to the article sold.—If a person purchase a house under a condition of option and the adjoining house be afterwards sold before the expiration of the period of option, and the purchaser under the condition of option claim the right of Shaffa, in this case his assent to the first sale is thereby virtually given, and his right of option exists no longer;—because his claim of Shaffa presupposes him to be confirmed in the adjoining property, otherwise he would have no right to make such a claim; and it is therefore inferred, that he first tacitly annuls his condition of option, and then urges his claim. It is to be observed that the argument of this explanation arises from the doctrine of Haneefa; for by his tenets, a purchaser under a condition of option does not become proprietor of the article of sale during the interim of option. The two disciples hold, on the contrary, that he becomes immediate proprietor under the condition of option, whence this explanation is, with regard to their doctrine unnecessary.

An option of determination, vested jointly in two persons, is determined by the subsequent consent of either to the purchase.—If two persons purchase a slave, on this condition, that both purchasers shall have the option of rejecting him, and one of them afterwards express his consent, the other cannot reject him, according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that if the other choose, he may reject his share in the slave. The same disagreement subsists with respect to two purchasers in a case of option of inspection or option from defect. The argument of the two disciples is that as the power of rejection was vested in both the purchasers, it consequently operated in each of them; and the rejection of the cannot abrogate the right of option with respect to the other, as that would be a destruction of his right, which is not lawful. The argument of Haneefa is that the subject of the seller, when it issued from the tenure of the seller, was not injured by the defect of participation; but if one of the purchasers have the liberty of rejecting his portion singly, it necessarily follows that upon the rejection the seller holds the article in partnership with one of the purchasers; and this is a defect in the tenure, to which he was not before subject.

Objection.—It would appear that the rejection of one of the purchasers is valid although attended with an injury to the seller, since the seller has himself virtually assented to it, because in giving such power to two persons, it is evident that he assents to a possible rejection by one of them.

Reply.—The consent of the seller to the injury is inferred from a supposition of his having consented that one might reject where the power of rejection was given to two. This, however, is not the case in the present instance; for it is to be supposed that the seller understood that both should declare their rejection together; and on this supposition his consent was given, not on the other.

If an article purchased under one description prove to be of another description the purchaser may either confirm or annul the contract.—If a person purchase a slave on account of his being a scribe, or a baker, and he prove to be neither of these, the purchaser is in that case at liberty either to abide by the bargain, or to undo it, as he chooses; because the descriptive quality being the object he had in view, and being specified as a condition in the contract, is therefore his right, and the want of it gives him the power of dissolution if he please, because his assent signified was on this condition, and not otherwise.

Objection.—It would appear that the sale is in this case invalid, in the same manner as in the case of purchasing a male slave who afterwards proves to be a female.

Reply.—The sale in the case quoted is invalid because of difference of sex, which does not exist in the case in question. Thus a person that is a baker or not a baker is of the same sex and differs only in the quality; and hence the analogous application of the one case to the other is unfounded. It is to be observed, that a difference of the sex does not invalidate the sale, unless it defeat the purchaser's object. Thus the object in the purchase of a man (for instance) is different from that in the purchase of a woman, and therefore the sale is invalid in case of a difference: if on the contrary, a man should purchase a he-goat on the supposition of its being a female, the sale would not be invalid, but it would remain with the purchaser to abide by it or not; as it can be observed however that in the case in question, if the purchaser choose to abide by the bargain he must pay the whole of the price; as no diminution is admitted on account of the defect of quality, which (as has been before explained) is of a dependant nature.

*Because a condition of option is not inheritable.
CHAPTER III

OF OPTION OF INSPECTION.*

A purchaser may reject an article upon inspection after purchase.—If a person purchases an article without having seen it, the sale of such article is valid, and the purchaser after seeing it has the option of accepting or rejecting it as he pleases. Shafei maintains that a sale of this nature is wholly invalid, because of the uncertainty with regard to the object of it. The arguments of our doctors are,—First, a saving of the Prophet, that "whoever purchases a thing without seeing it, has the liberty of rejection after sight of it." Secondly, the uncertainty with respect to the object cannot occasion litigation, since, if it be not agreeable, the purchaser is at liberty to reject it.

Although, before seeing it, he should have signified his satisfaction—If a person, having purchased an article unseen, should say, "I am satisfied with it," in this case also he is at liberty, after sight of it, to reject it if he please, for two reasons:—First, as the option of inspection (according to the tradition already quoted) rests entirely upon inpection, it follows that it becomes established by the inspection, whereas before that it was not established; and as the acquiescence signified previous to the inspection is not repugnant to this, it consequently remains established.

Objection:—If the right of option do not exist previous to the actual sight of the article of sale, it would follow that the purchaser, before inspection, has not the power of annulling the contract; whereas we find, on the contrary, that he is actually possessed of this power before inspection.

Reply:—His right to dissolve the contract previous to this inspection, proceeds from the contract not being then binding; and not from any reference to the tradition above quoted.

Secondly, the purchaser's acquiescence in the article before he attains an actual knowledge of its qualities, is perfectly nugatory; and hence no regard is paid to his acquiescence previously signified:—contrary to his rejection, which is regarded, because the contract has not as yet become binding.

A seller has no option of inspection after sale.—If a person sell a thing which he himself has not seen, he has no option of inspection;—for the reason that Shafei held a piece of ground belonging to him at Basra to Tilha-Bin-Abedoola:—when a person said to Tilha, "you have been injured in this matter:" but he replied, "I possess the liberty of rejection, having purchased a thing unseen:—after which another said to Osman, "You have been injured in this sale," and he replied, "I have the liberty of retraction, having sold a thing which I had not seen:" upon which Mazim was appointed arbitrator between them: and he decreed that the right of option rested only with Tilha; and this decree was given in the presence of all the companions of the Prophet, none of whom objected to it.

The option of inspection continues in force to any distance of time after the contract, unless destroyed by circumstances.—The right to option of inspection is not, like an optional condition, confined, to a particular period:—on the contrary, it continues in force until something take place repugnant to the nature of it. It is also to be observed that whatever circumstance occasions the annulment of an optional conditions (such as a defect in the merchandise, or an exercise of right on the part of the purchaser, in the same manner occasions an annulment of the option of inspection.

Such as would have annulled a condition of option.—If, therefore, the exercise of right be such as cannot afterwards be retracted (such as the emancipation of a slave, or the creating him a Modabhir),—or, if it be such as to involve the rights of others (such as absolute sale, mortgage, or hire),
—then the option of inspection is immediately annulled, whether the thing have been seen or not; because these acts render the sale binding, and the existence of the option is incompatible with the obligation of the sale.
If, on the contrary, the exercise of right be not such as to involve the right of others (such as a sale with an optional condition, a sample tender to purchase, or a gift without delivery),—the option of inspection is not annulled previous to the actual sight of the article sold, because acts of this description are not of a stronger nature than the pur.
huser's acquiescence; and as the purchaser's express acquiescence to inspecting is not the cause of annulling the option of inspection (as has been already demonstrated), it follows that the acts above described do not annul it, a for-tiori;—whereas those acts after inspection annul the option of inspection, as they indicate an acquiescence, and an acquiescence after the sight of the thing occasions the annulment of the option.

Option of inspection is destroyed by the sight of a part of the article, where that suffices as a sample of the whole.—If a person should look at a heap of grain, or at the outward appearance of cloth which is folded up, or at the face a female slave, or at the face and posteriors of an animal, and then make purchase of the same, he has no option of inspection. In short, it is a rule that the sight of all the parts of the merchandise is not a necessary condition, because it is often impracticable to obtain it. and therefore it is sufficient to view that part whence it may be known how far the object of the purchaser will be obtained. In the purchase, therefore, of articles of which the parts are simi-

*Arab. Khir-al-Rooyat.
†That is, he has no power of retraction.
if, upon inspection of the article sold, he should happen to repent of the sale.
As agent for seisin may inspect in the same manner as the purchaser. — The inspection of an agent appointed to take possession of an article purchased is equivalent to the inspection of the purchaser, and consequently after the inspection of such agent, the purchaser has no power of rejecting the article purchased, unless in a case of a defect. The inspection, however, of a messenger on the part of the purchaser is not equivalent to his own inspection. This is the doctrine of Haneef. The two disciples hold that an agent and a messenger are in effect the same (that is, the inspection of neither is equivalent to that of the purchaser, and the liberty consequently, that the purchaser has after ward of rejection in both instances. The argument they advance in support of their opinion is, that as the constituent has appointed the agent merely to take possession, and not to annul his option, it follows that such annulment does not depend on the manner of possession, and the equality of which may consequently be ascertained by means of a sample; and in the same manner, the sight of the outside of a piece of cloth suffices, unless there be a particular part within the folds necessary to be known, such as (in stamped cloths) the pattern, in which case the option of inspection is not annulled until the purchaser see the inside of the piece. In the case of a man on the other hand, a sight of the face is sufficient; and in animals, a sight of the face and posterior parts — some allege that in animals sight of the four and hinder legs is necessary. What was first related is on the authority of Aboor Yousaf. In goats purchased on account of their flesh it is necessary to squeeze and press the flesh in the hands, as this ascertains the goodness of it. But if purchased for breeding, or for giving milk, it is necessary to look at their legs. In purchasing victuals ready dressed, it is necessary to taste them, to ascertain their goodness.

Option of inspection in the purchase of a house. — If a person look at the front of a house, and then purchase it, he has no option of inspection, although he should not have seen the apartments; and so also, if a person view the back parts of a house, or the trees of a garden from without. Ziffer has said that it is requisite that the purchaser inspect the apartments of the house. Our author also remarks that what is here advanced with respect to a sight of the front or back part of a house being sufficient, is founded on the customs of former times, when all their buildings being of a uniform nature, the sight of the front or back parts sufficed to ascertain the interior parts but that in the present time it is very necessary to enter, in. as buildings are in these days variously contracted, whence a view of the outside is no standard by which to judge of the inside; and this is approved.

*Meaning a slave set up to sale.

tions so as to destroy that privilege on the part of his constituent by any express declaration. It is otherwise in the case of an option from defect, because, as that is no bar to the completeness of the bargain, the seisin is in that instance perfect, notwithstanding the continuance of the option of defect. Concerning the case of condition of option there is a difference of opinion. — Admitting, however, that the agent has not the power of annulling such option, it is because the constituent himself is not in this case empowered to make a perfect seisin, inasmuch as the object of such conditional option is experience and trial which can only be acquired after seisin; and as the constituent himself is not empowered to make a perfect seisin, it follows that his agent cannot be so. With respect to a messenger, he possesses no power, being merely commissioned to deliver a message and cannot therefore be capable of taking formal possession of any thing.

The inspection of a blind person may be made by touch, smell, or taste. — Sale or purchase, made by a blind person, is valid: and after purchase, he has still an option as having purchased an article without seeing it; which option is determined by the touch of the article, provided it be of such a nature that the touch may lead to a knowledge of it: or by the smell, if it be of a nature to be known by the nose; or by the taste, if the article be of an esculent nature — in the same manner as all these modes determine the option of a person possessed of sight.

Or (in a purchase of land) by description. — The option of a blind person, in the purchase of land, is not determined until a description of the qualities of it be given to him: because such a description is equivalent to a sight of the object, as in the case of Silim sales. — It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that if a blind person, in purchasing land, should stand on a spot whence, if he possessed his sight, he might see the whole, and should then declare: "I am content with this ground which I have purchased," the right of option is annulled: because the standing on the spot in this manner is analogous to the actual view of it; and the semblance is equivalent to the reality where the reality is unattainable; as in the case of a dumb person, the motion of whose lips is deemed equivalent to the reading of the Koran; or, as in the case of a bald person, with respect to whom the motion of the razor to and for over his head is deemed equivalent (in case of his making a pilgrimage to Mecca) to actual shaving. — Hoosain-bin-Zeeyad has said: a blind person must appoint an agent for seisin, who may inspect and take possession of the article on his behalf: and this is conformable to the doctrine of Haneefa, who is of opinion (as has been already explained) that the inspection of an agent is equivalent to that of his constituent.

A sight of one of two articles, such as do not admit of sampler, still leaves a power of rejecting both. — If a person, having seen one of two garments, should purchase both, and should afterwards see the other, he has then the option of rejecting both; because, as garments differ essentially from one another, a sight of one is not equivalent to a sight of both; and therefore his right of option remains with respect to the one he had not seen. He has it not in his power, however, to reject that one singly; for in such case an alteration in the bargain would take place before the completion of it, as a bargain is not complete whilst an option of inspection remains: and hence it is that the purchaser may reject the article, independent of an order from the Kazee, or the consent of the seller; and such rejection is a dissolution of the sale from the beginning. — In other words, it becomes the same as if the contract had never existed.

The option is destroyed by the decease of the person with whom it rested. — If a person possessing the option of inspection should die, the option in such case becomes null: for (according to our doctors) it is not a hereditament, as has already been explained in treating of optional conditions.

Cases of inspection previous to purchase. — If a person, having once seen an article, should afterwards, at a distant period, purchase it, and the article, at the time of purchase, exist in the form and description in which he first saw it, he has not in this case any option, because he is possessed of a knowledge of the qualities from his former inspection; and an option is allowed only in defect of such knowledge. — If, however, the purchaser should not recognize or know it to be the same article, he has in that case an option; because under such circumstances his consent cannot be implied; or if, on the other hand, the nature of the article be changed, he has an option; because the qualities being changed, it becomes in fact the same as if he had never seen it.

If a purchaser and seller dispute concerning any recent change in the nature of the

A contract of sale, when settled by the parties, does not become complete until the execution of it; yet it cannot admit of any alteration of the terms of it in the interval. Thus, if two bushels of wheat be sold for two dirms, and the parties, before the execution of the contract, mutually agree to reduce the sale to one bushel for one dirm, this agreement, as being an alteration of the terms previous to their fulfilment, would be unlawful. In short, it is requisite, in this instance, either that the parties previously dissolve the first contract, and then enter into a new contract of sale of one bushel for one dirm; or that they formally complete the first contract by mutual seisin, and that the purchaser then sell one of the bushels to the seller for one dirm.

SALE.

CHAPTER IV.

OF OPTION FROM DEFECT.

A purchaser discovering a defect in the article purchased, is at liberty to return it to the seller—If a person purchase and take possession of an article, and should afterwards discover it to have been defective at the time of sale, it is at his option either to take it for the full price, or to reject it: because one requisite, in an unconditional contract [of sale], is that the subject of it be free from defect;—when, therefore, it proves otherwise, the purchaser has no option; for if the contract were obligatory upon him, without his will, it would be injurious to him. He is not however, at liberty to retain the article, and exact a compensation, on account of the defect, from the seller; because, in a contract of sale, no part of the price is opposed to the quality of the article—and also, because the seller does not consent to be divested of the property for a less price than that which he stipulates:—if, therefore, the purchaser were to retain the defective article and exact a compensation from the seller on account of the defect, it would be injurious to the latter:—but it is possible to obviate the injury to the purchaser without entailing an injury on the seller, by permitting him either to retain the article, if he approve of it with the defect, or to reject it.

Unless he was aware of the defect beforehand:—If, however, the purchaser, at the time of sale, or of taking possession, be aware of the defect, and nevertheless knowingly and wilfully make the purchase, or take possession, no option remains to him; because when he thus purchases or takes possession of the article, it is evident that he assents to the defect.

Whatever tends to depreciate an article is a defect.—Whatever may be a cause of diminishing the price amongst merchants is considered as a defect; because injury is occasioned by deficiency in point of value and deficiency in point of value occasions deficiency in price; and the mode of ascertaining this is by consulting merchants who are practised in estimating the value of articles.

Defects incident to children affect the sale of a slave during infancy, but not after maturity.—A disposition to abscond, or to make urine upon carpets, or to commit theft, are defects in children during their nonsense, but not after they attain to the age of maturity. If, therefore, any of these defects appear in an infant slave during childhood whilst in the hands of the purchaser, he is in that case free from defect; because this is the same defect that existed whilst in the possession of the seller.

If, on the other hand, any of these defects... should occur in him, in the purchaser's hands, after he attains to maturity, the purchaser is not at liberty to return him by option from defect; because this defect is different from that which appeared during childhood in the hands of the seller, since these effects proceed from different causes in those periods of childhood and maturity; for the making of urine upon a carpet (for instance) during the time of childhood, is owing to a weakness in the bladder,—whereas, after maturity, it arises from a disease in the interior parts; and, in the same manner the running away of a child is from a desire of play; and the commission of theft from thoughtlessness; but these, where they occur after maturity, are the effect of innate wickedness. By a child is here meant one in its perfect senses; for a child not in its perfect senses is incapable of running away; whereas it is that the term used in that case is lost or strayed, not absconded:—the running away, therefore, of such a one is not a defect.

Lunacy operates as a perpetual defect, provided it ever occur after the sale.—MADNESS during infancy operates as a perpetual defect;—in other words, if an infant slave be subject to lunacy in the hands of the seller, and the lunacy recur whilst in the hands of the purchaser, whether during childhood or after maturity, the purchaser is at liberty to return him to the seller; because the madness is in effect the same as had originally existed whilst the slave was yet in the seller's hands, as being occasioned by the same cause, namely, an internal malady. It is not, however, to be understood (as some have imagined) that the return of the madness is not required as a condition to enable the purchaser to dissolve the bargain; for God Almighty, as being all powerful, may remove the madness, although that seldom happen. Hence it is necessary that the madness return, to enable the purchaser to dissolve the bargain; for, unless it actually return, he has not this privilege.

Defects which operate in the sale of female slaves, but not of males.—A BAD smell, from the breath or armpits, is a defect in regard of female slaves, because in many instances the object is to sleep with them; and the existence of such defects is a bar to the accomplishment of that object. These, however, are not defects with regard to male slaves; because the object, in purchasing them, is merely to use their services; and to this these defects are not obstacles, since it is possible for a slave to serve his master without the necessity of the master's sitting down with him, so as to receive annoyance from these defects. If, however, they proceed from disease, they are considered as defects with regard to male slaves also.

WhoRedom and bastardy are defects with regard to a female slave, but not with regard to a male; because the object in the purchase of a female slave, is cohabitation and the generation of children, which must be affected by either of the above circumstance; whereas, the object in the purchase of a male slave is the use of his services, the value of which is not depreciated by his committing whoredom. If, however, a male slave be much addicted to brothels, which some of our lawyers are of opinion that it is a defect because in the pursuit of women he neglects the service of his master.

Infidelity is a defect in both male and female slaves.—INFIDELITY is a defect in both a male and female slave* because the disposition of a Mussulman is averse to the society of infidels; and also, because in the expiation of murder, the emancipation of an infidel slave does not suffice, it follows that the possession of such a slave is not what is desired, since a part of the object is thus defeated. If, on the contrary, a person should purchase a slave, on condition of his being an infidel, and he afterwards prove a Mussulman, the purchaser has no power of dissolving the bargain, since the exemption from infidelity is no defect.

Constitutional infirmities are defects in a female slave.—A TOTAl suppression of the courses, or an excessive evacuation of them, are defects with respect to a female slave, as they proceed from internal maladies. It is to be observed, however, that the want of the courses is not considered as a defect until the extreme period of maturity be passed, which in (according to Haneef) is seventeen years: and this knowledge must be had from the information of the slave herself. If, therefore, a person purchase a female slave arrived at full maturity (that is, seventeen years of age), and learn from herself that her courses have not appeared, he is then entitled to return her to the seller before taking possession; and even after taking possession, provided the seller simply deny the circumstance, and refuse to confirm it with an oath. If, however, the seller deny the circumstance upon oath, the purchaser is not entitled to return her.

A purchaser is entitled to compensation for a defect in an article where it has sustained a further blemish in his hands; but he cannot, in this case, return it to the seller. If an article, after being sold, should receive a blemish in the hands of the purchaser, and the purchaser should afterwards learn that it had also a blemish at the time of sale, he is, in that case, entitled to receive from the seller a compensation for the defect; but he is not permitted to return it to him, as that would be attended with an injury to the seller, since it would necessitate him to revise again into his possession with two blemishes which, in issuing from him, had only one. As, therefore, the return of the article is in this case impracticable, and

* That is, supposing the slave to be purchased as a Mussulman, and he prove to have been an infidel at the time of purchase.
as it is necessary to remove injury from the purchaser, the expedient of entitling him to a compensation from the seller for the defect has been devised: unless, however, the seller should consent to receive it with the two blemishes, and voluntarily acquiesce in his own loss.—By the phrase compensation for defect, is to be understood, throughout this work the difference between the value of an article in its perfect state, and the value it afterwards bears in its defective state.

A purchaser is entitled to compensation for a defect discovered after the article has been cut up.—If a person purchase cloth, and cut it up, and then, before he had begun to sew it, discover it to be defective, he is in this case entitled to a compensation for the defect from the seller; because although, in consequence of the cloth being cut, a bar be opposed to the returning of it to the seller (as the defect which the purchaser himself is the occasion of), yet the return is eventually possible, by the seller’s acquiescing in it, which he may do if he please, since the bar is opposed only in tenderness to his right; and this right it is in his power to forego.

Unless, after cutting, he put it out of his power to restore it to the sellers.—If however, after cutting the cloth, the purchaser, should sell it to another, he is not then entitled to any compensation for the defect; for, although after cutting the cloth, the bar to his returning it to the seller, may be eventually removed, by his [the seller’s] acquiescence, yet when the purchaser afterwards disposes of it to another, he himself determines the possibility of its being returned to the seller, for which reason he is not entitled to a compensation for the defect.

Or, if the return be rendered impracticable by any change wrought upon the subject prior to the sale he is entitled to compensation for defect, notwithstanding the sale of it.—If a person purchase cloth, and, after cutting either dye it or sew it, or purchase flour and mix it up with oil, and afterwards discover the article to be defective, he is in such case entitled to a compensation for the defect: because the return of the article to the seller is in either of those instances impracticable, as it has become implicated with a thing which cannot be separated; it is therefore impossible to return the article simply by itself; nor can it be returned with the addition, since the addition was not in any respect a subject of the sale; and the seller, moreover, is not at liberty to receive it back with such addition, because the obstacle to the return in these instances, is not in right of the seller, but in right of the LAW.* If the purchaser, therefore, in any of these instances, should sell the article, after discovering it to be defective, he is still entitled to compensation from the seller; because, as the bar to his returning the article to him existed previous to the sale of it on his part, he cannot by such sale be considered as the cause of detaining it from the seller.

Appropriation of a purchase to the use of an infant (implied in any act concerning it which has a reference to the infant) by precluding a return to the seller, leaves the purchaser no right to compensation for a defect.—If a person purchase cloth, and cut it out for clothing on account of an infant son, and after having sewn it up discover a defect in it, he is not entitled to a compensation for the defect from the seller. If, however, the son in this instance be an adult, the purchaser is entitled to such compensation.—The reason of this distinction is that, in the former instance, the right of property, with regard to the infant, takes place immediately on the cutting of the cloth, and previous to its being sewn; and consequently, as the purchaser by this act invests the infant with a right of property immediately upon cutting the cloth, he becomes the cause of the detention of it from the seller previous to its being sewn, and is therefore not entitled to the compensation: in the latter instance, on the contrary, the right of property with regard to the adult does not take place upon the sewing, nor until he actually take possession of the garment; and hence, as it is by the sewing, and not by the investiture in the adult, that the return of the cloth to the seller becomes impracticable, it follows that the purchaser by making this investiture, does not detain the cloth from the seller and consequently that he is entitled to a compensation.*

The purchaser of a slave is entitled to a compensation for defect, after the death or emancipation of the slave.—If a person purchase a slave, and afterwards emancipate him,—or the slave die in his hands, and purchaser then become acquainted with his having been defective, he is in either case entitled to a compensation from the seller:
—in case of the slave dying, because death renders his property in the slave complete and perfect, and the impracticability of returning him does not arise from any act of the purchaser, but from an unavoidable calamity;—and also in case of his emancipating the slave, upon a favourable construe-

was in him immediately on the declaration of the donor; or on his [the donor’s] performing some act which manifests his intention as in the cutting of the cloth by the purchaser in the above case: in the case of an adult person, on the contrary, actual seisin is requisite to an investiture with right of property.

the Koran) forbids usury, under which head

tion of the law.—Analogy would suggest that in this last case the purchaser is not entitled to a compensation, because the obstacle to the return proceeds, in this instance, from the act of the purchaser; the case, therefore, is the same as if he had killed the slave; and as, in that case, he would not have been entitled to any compensation for defect, so in this instance likewise. He is, however, so entitled, upon a favourable construction, because the emancipation his property attains to its height and completion; for man is not, in his original nature, a subject of property, all men being originally created free; nor can any right of property exist with respect to him but under restriction, and of limited duration, continuing in force no longer than until he be made free: emancipation, therefore, like death, occasions a completion of right of property, and it may consequently be said that right of property still remains in the subject of the sale, notwithstanding the impossibility of returning it, as a thing is rendered fixed and unalterable by its completion.—It is to be observed that constituting the slave a Modabbir or an Am-Walid is, in this particular, equivalent to emancipation.

But not after the emancipation, where it has been granted in return for property.—If a person purchase a slave, and afterwards emancipate him in return for property, and then discover him to have been defective, the purchaser is not entitled to a compensation from the seller, as the detention of the return is, in effect, a detention of the consideration.—It is recorded, from Haneefa, that the purchaser is in this case also entitled to a compensation; because an emancipation, whether it be gratuitously made or otherwise, occasions the completion of the right of property.

Nor after his death, where he has been slain by the purchaser.—If a person purchase a slave, and afterwards put him to death, and then discover him to have been defective, he is not entitled to a compensation for the defect, according to Haneefa.—This also is agreeable to the Zahir-Rawseyet. It is reported, from Aboo Yoosaf, that the purchaser is entitled to a compensation; because the law annexes no worldly punishment to the murder of a slave by his master; and the case is therefore the same as if he had died a natural death. The principle on which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds is that murder, wherever it takes place, occasions responsibility; and as, in the case of a master killing his slave, the responsibility is remitted only on account of the master’s right of property, the master consequently, as it were, takes the responsi-

melo"s, cucumbers, walnuts, or the like, and after opening them discover them to be of bad quality; in that case, if they be altogether unfit for use, the purchaser is entitled to complete restitution of the price from the seller, as the sale is invalid, because of the subject of not being the highest.
If, on the other hand, notwithstanding their badness they be still fit for use, the purchaser is not entitled to return them to the seller, because the opening of them is an additional defect of his own creation: he is, however, entitled to a compensation for the defect; as by this means the injury he would otherwise sustain is remedied to the greatest possible extent. Shafei has said, that he is entitled to return them after opening them;
because that is the exercise of a power committed to him by the seller. In reply to this our doctors argue, that the seller has empowered him to open them in virtue of his right as the proprietor. Hence the case is the same as where a person purchases a garment, and, having cut it discovers a defect in it; in which case the purchaser is not entitled to return the garment upon the seller’s hands, although he [the seller] had authorized him to cut it down. In short, if the articles prove defective only in a small part, the sale is valid, upon a favourable construction, because it is incident to walnuts, and such other articles, to be bad in a small part (by a small part is meant what is commonly the case, such as one or two in a hundred); but if, on the other hand, a great part prove bad, the sale is invalid, and the purchaser is entitled to a complete restitution of the purchase money, because in this case the seller has united together entitles and non-entities with re gard to value; and the case is therefore the same as if a person were to sell together freemen and slaves.

Case of a purchaser selling what he has purchased, which is afterwards returned to him in consequence of a defect.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should sell him to another, and that other return the slave to him on discovering him to be defective, and he agree to receive him back, on the Kazee’s issuing a decree to that effect, found on the proof of the defect by witnesses, on the refusal of the first purchaser to confirm his denial upon oath, in that case the first purchaser is entitled to return the slave to the seller; because,
although it be not lawful for a purchaser, after the sale of the article on his part, to return it to the seller, still, in this case, the second sale having been annulled by the Kazee, it becomes the same as if no such sale and ever existed.

On the contrary.—As the first purchaser denied the defect, and obliged the second purchaser to establish the fact by witnesses, it would appear that he is not entitled to return the slave; because, if he ground his right on the defect, he is guilty of prevatisation, since he first denies the defect, and then asserts it.

REPLY.—The disproof of the denial by the Kazee’s decree, founded on the proof of the fact by witnesses, renders such denial of no validity in law, hence the apparent contrariety of his denial and assertion is reconciled, and as the first sale continues in force, the defect is at the same time proved, it follows that he is entitled to return the slave to the seller. If therefore, he choose to return him, it is a valid rejection; but if he should rather choose to keep him, the sale continues in force. It is otherwise (where an agent for sale disposeth of an article, and the purchaser returns it to the agent in consequence of a defect: for this is in reality a return to the constituent; and the agent is not required to return the article to his constituent, because, in this case, there is only one sale, whereas in this case in question there are two, whence the dissolution of the second sale does not dissolve the first. In short, if the second purchaser discovery of a defect, return the slave, and the first purchaser receive him back, in consequence of a decree of the Kazee, he [the first purchaser] is in that case entitled to return him to the original seller. If, on the other hand, the first purchaser agree to receive him back without a decree of the Kazee, he in that case is not entitled to return him to the original seller, because, although the second sale be annulled with regard to himself and the second purchaser, still it is equivalent to a sale de novo with regard to all other persons and the original seller
another person—it is recorded in the Jama Saghier, that when the subject of the sale is returned to the first purchaser, without a decree of the Kazee, on account of such a defect as very rarely happens (such as an additional finger, for instance), the first purchaser has not the power of returning it to the original seller; and this (as our author remarks) is a direct proof that the effect is the same in both cases; that is, whether the defect be of such a nature as may have recently happened, or such as never recently happens. In some traditions it is mentioned, that in the latter case the purchaser may return the subject of sale to the original seller, as there is then a certainty that such defect did exist whilst in the hands of the original seller.

Conduct to be observed by the magistrate.
in case of a purchaser, after taking possession, alleging a defect in the article.—If a person purchase a slave, and take possession of him, and then assert a defect in him, the Kazee in such case must not enforce the payment of the price on the part of the purchaser until he shall have investigated his definition, either by the declaration of the seller, upon oath, that the slave had no defect, or by the proof of the fact on the part of the purchaser by witnesses. The suspermutations of the Kazee’s decree with regard to the payment of the price is requisite, lest such decree should be rendered vain and useless by the subsequent proof of the defect; and also, because the tenor of such decree is that the purchaser shall pay the complete price in fulfilment of the specific claim of the seller.—whereas the purchaser, by asserting a defect, denies the obligation on him to pay the complete price. The Kazee, therefore, must first proceed to examine into the circumstance of the defect; and if the purchaser should say that his witnesses are in Syria.* He must then exact from the seller his denial upon oath. If the seller should take the oath accordingly, the Kazee must then decree the payment of the price; because in suspending the price till the arrival of the witnesses an injury would result to the seller; and the immediate enforcement of the payment does not in so great a degree injure the purchaser, because after the return of the witnesses from Syria, if he should establish his proof, the purchase money should be returned to him on his returning the slave to the seller. If, however, the seller should refuse to take an oath in support of his denial, the assertion of the purchaser is established, and such refusal is an argument in favour of the existence of the defect.

Case of a purchaser alleging the existence of a defective property before he had made the purchaser; and the forms of deposition to be required of the seller in this instance.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should afterwards assert that "he had run away from him, and he had also run away whilst in the possession of the seller," and the seller offer to take an oath that "he had never run away from him" [the purchaser], the Kazee must in that case refuse to receive his deposition, until the purchaser first prove by witnesses that "he had run away from him" [the seller], after which the Kazee must tender an oath to the seller to this purport, "by God, I have sold the said slave and delivered him to the purchaser, and he never ran away whilst he belonged to me." (as is mentioned by Mohammed in the Jamia); or to this purport, "by God, the purchaser has no right to return me such slave, on account of the defect which he asserts," or in this manner, "by God, such slave never ran away whilst he belonged to me." He must not, however, tender an oath to him to this purport, "by God, I sold the said-slave at a period when he had not the said defect:" nor in this manner, "by God, I sold the said slave and delivered him to the purchaser at a period when he had not the said defect:" because, in taking such oaths, the meaning of the seller may be, that "although he had such a slave for a time, yet he had not at that identical period of sale or delivery:" and thus, without any deviation from truth, he may defraud the purchaser of his right. If the purchaser should not be able to prove, by witnesses, that the slave had run away from him [the purchaser] the oath, in that case also (according to the two disciples) must be tendered to the seller. Our modern doctors have differed concerning the opinion of Haneefa upon this point; as some of them say that, according to him, an oath is not to be administered to the seller in this instance. The argument of the two disciples is, that as the assertion of the plaintiff is worthy of regard, and such as would be attended to in case of its being proved by witnesses, it follows that in default of such witnesses the seller must be required to deny the assertion upon oath. The reasoning of Haneefa (as recorded by those who have said that, according to him, an oath is not to be administered to the seller) is that the form of swearing a defendant has been ordained by the law for the purpose of removing any litigation that may happen to arise,—not for the purpose of establishing litigation. Now, in the present case, the exaction of an oath from the seller will only give birth to a new litigation: because, in case he should refuse to keep it, and the proof of the fact be thence established, it will become a new subject of contention whether the said defect did exist or not during his being in the seller's possession, and there will be a necessity for tendering him another oath, upon this point, for the purpose of removing this fresh cause of dispute.

If a person purchase a female slave, and having received her from the seller, should on the discovery of a defect, desire to return her, and the seller assert that "he had sold two female slaves to the purchaser of which he only produced one," and the purchaser maintain, on the other hand, that "he had only sold one,"—in that case the declaration of the purchaser, upon oath, is to be credited; for, as the disagreement here relates to the quantity taken possession of, the person who took possession must be credited, as being the most competent judge;—in the same manner as holds in a case of usurpation;—that is if the person whose property is usurped assert the usurpation of a particular quantity, and the usurper deny the quantity, his declaration upon oath is to be credited; and so also in the case in question. If, on the other hand, the purchaser and seller agree in the extent of the sale, but differ with respect to that of the seizin (as if both should allow the two female slaves to have been the subject of the sale,—the seller asserting that "the purchaser had received both," and the purchaser, on the other hand, maintaining that "he had only received one")—in that case also the declaration of the purchaser, upon oath, is to be credited, for the reason already explained.

Case of a person purchasing two slaves, one of whom proves defective.—If a person purchase two slaves by one contract, and take possession of one, and then discover the other to be defective, he is not in that case permitted to retain the one he had taken possession of, and to relinquish the other; but he has the option of either retaining or relinquishing both; because until both be taken possession of, the terms of the contract are not fulfilled; and hence, if he should retain one and relinquish the other, it would induce a deviation from the bargain previous to its fulfilment, which (as was before explained) is unlawful. If the defect should lie in the slave of which possession had been taken, in that case there is a disagreement among our doctors. It is recorded, from Abou Yooof, that the purchaser is in such case entitled to return the defective slave only. The more approved doctrine, however, is that he must retain both or relinquish both; because the fulfilment of the bargain rests upon a complete possession of the subject of the sale, namely, the two slaves. This case, therefore, resembles a case of detention of the article sold, in satisfaction for the price; that is, if the seller should deliver the goods in satisfaction for the price, such detention cannot be abrogated until he actually receive complete possession of the price; and in the same manner, in the case in question, the bargain is not perfected until the purchaser receive complete possession of the articles sold. If, however, in the case in question, the purchaser should have made seisin of both, and should afterwards discover a defect in one of them, he is then entitled to return the defective one singly. Ziffer has given a different opinion; because in this case a deviation from the bargain takes place; and it is not free from injury, since it is an established custom, in sales, to unite good and bad things together; the case is therefore the same as if he had rejected one before the seisin of the whole,—or as if he had made the purchase under a condition of option, or with an option of inspection. Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that in this case the deviation from the bargain takes place after the fulfilment of the contract; because the seisin of the goods renders the contract complete; and the existence of the option of defect does not operate against the completion of the contract after seisin. A deviation, moreover, from the bargain, after the fulfilment of it, is lawful, as has been already demonstrated, whenever it is that if, after taking possession of both slaves, one of them should be found to be the property of another, the purchaser is not in that case at liberty to return both to the seller; but must retain one, and receive from the seller a deduction of the price, on account of the one belonging to another, notwithstanding this be a deviation from the bargain,—contrary to conditional option, or options of inspections for the existence of such conditions is a bar to the fulfilment of the bargain, notwithstanding seisin may have taken place.

In the purchase of articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, the part which proves defective may be returned to the seller.—If a person purchase articles estimable by weight, or by measure of capacity (such as silver or wheat, for instance), and he afterwards discover the article to be in part defective, he is entitled, in that case, either to return the whole to the seller, or to retain the whole; but he has not the power of returning the defective part only, because the unities of articles estimable by weight or by measure of capacity are considered as forming one individual, provided they be all of the same species. Some have alleged that this proceeds on a supposition of the articles in question being contained in one vessel; but that, if they be contained in two, the one containing the defective article may be returned, and the other retained.

If a part of such articles prove the property of another, still the purchaser is not at liberty to return the remainder.—If, after the purchase of articles estimable by weight, or measurement of capacity, a part of them should prove to be the property of another, the purchaser is not in that case allowed to return the remainder to the seller; because no injury can result to him from his being obliged to keep them, as articles of this nature may be separated and divided without sustaining any blemish, and the proof of part of the subject of the sale having been the property of another is no impediment to the completion of the contract since that depends on the consent of the seller and purchaser, and not of the person who is discovered to be the proprietor of a part. This is the case where possession has been taken by the purchaser, before a part of the subject is discovered to be the right of another;—for if the right of property of the other be discovered previous to the purchaser taking possession, he is, in that case, entitled to return the remainder, since a deviation from the contract takes place previous to the completion of the bargain. If the articles be not such as are estimable by weight, or measurement of capacity, but cloth, for instance, then the purchaser is entitled to return the remainder to the seller at all events, as division and separation of the article would, in this instance, prove an injury to it.

A purchaser, by applying a remedy to the defective article, or making of it, deprives himself of the power of returning it to the seller.—If a person purchase a female slave and discover that she has an ulcer or some other such ailment, and apply a remedy to it,—or, if a person purchase an animal, and discover it to be defective, and ride upon it on some business of his own,—the application of a remedy in the one case, or the act of riding in the other, indicate an acquiescence in the defect on the part of the purchaser and he is therefore not entitled to return either the slave or the animal on the plea of an option from the discovery of a defect, it would be otherwise if he had purchased the animal on a condition of option; for the object of such condition is an experimental knowledge, which cannot. be obtained but by a trial. If, moreover, he were to ride upon the animal, not on his own business, but merely with an intention of restoring it to the seller, no inference could be drawn of his acquiescence in the defect; and so also, if he were to ride upon the animal with an intention of giving it water or forage; provided, however, the riding for these purposes be unavoidable, either because of the animal being unruly and ungovernable, if not mounted, or because of the purchaser himself being incapable of walking.

If a purchased slave suffer amputation for a theft committed with the seller, the purchaser may return him, and receive back the price. — If a person purchase and take possession of a slave, not knowing that he had formerly, whilst in the possession of the seller, been guilty of theft, and the theft be afterwards proved, and the slave suffer amputation for it in the seller’s hands, the purchaser is, in that case, entitled, according to Haneef, to return him to the seller, and receive back the whole of the price. According to the two disciples, the purchaser is still to keep possession of the slave, and to receive from the seller the difference between the value whilst in his perfect state, and that which he bears after his hand is cut off.

And so also, if he suffer death for a crime committed with the seller. — The same distinction subsists in case of a slave suffering death whilst in the possession of the purchaser, for a crime he had committed whilst in the possession of the seller; Haneef being of opinion that the purchaser is entitled to the restitution of the whole of the price; and the two disciples, that he is entitled only to the difference between the value of the slave before his blood has become neutral, and that which he bears after it has been neutral.* In short, according to Haneef, the existence of a cause of mutilation or death is equivalent to a claim of right, whereas, according to the two disciples, it is equivalent to a defect. The reasoning of the two disciples is that the cause only of mutilation or death occurred with the seller, but not the actual death or mutilation itself; —now the existence of a cause of death or mutilation is not repugnant to the subject being property; the slave, therefore, notwithstanding the existence of the cause of mutilation or death, is nevertheless property, and capable of being the subject of a sale; as, however, a slave in whom exists a cause of death or mutilation is defective, it follows that the purchaser is entitled to receive from the seller a compensation for the deficiency, where the return has become impracticable; and in either of these instances the return is impracticable; — where he suffers death, evidently; and also, where he suffers mutilation, because such mutilation is a defect that has taken place in the hands of the purchaser; — in the same manner as where a person purchases a pregnant female slave, being ignorant of the circumstance, and the slave dies in labour, in which case the purchaser is entitled only to a compensation for the difference between the price which she bore when not pregnant, and that which she bore when pregnant. The reasoning of Haneef is, that the cause of mutilation and death occurred with the seller; and as a cause induces its effects, the death or mutilation must be referred to the period of the cause. The case is, therefore, the same as if a person were to usurp a slave, and the slave, whilst in his possession, were to commit a crime inducing mutilation or death, and the usurper then restore him to his proper owner, and the slave then suffer death or mutilation; for in that case the usurper would be responsible for the whole of the value to the owner; in the same manner as he would have been in case of the slave’s having been put to death whilst in his own possession, as the cause, in either instance, occurred with him. With respect to the case of pregnancy, adopted by the two disciples, it is not admitted by Haneef. If, however, it were admitted, still there is no analogy between it and the case in question, since pregnancy is the cause of delivery, and not of death, except in a few instances.

Case of a slave suffering amputation for two thefts, one committed with the seller, and the other with the purchaser. — If a slave first commit theft with the seller, and then, after being sold, commit theft with the purchaser, and afterwards suffer amputation for both thefts, in that case, according to the two disciples, the purchaser is entitled to the difference of value of the slave at the time of sale, and after the commission of the second theft. According to Haneef on the other hand, the purchaser is not entitled to return him, unless the seller should of his own accord consent to receive him: but he is entitled to a compensation for the fourth of his value; and if the seller should himself agree to receive him, in that case he must restore to the purchaser three fourths of his price; because the hand of a man is esteemed equal to half his person; and as, in this case, the hand is forfeited for the commission of two thefts, it follows that a deduction of one quarter ought to be made on account of the theft committed whilst in the possession of the purchaser.

Case of a slave, after being three sold, suffering amputation for a theft committed with the first seller. — If a slave, having been severally sold, and delivered to three different persons, should then suffer amputation for a theft which he had committed whilst in

*That is, has become forfeited to the law, and consequently liable to be shed without responsibility.
†In other words, is the same, In effect, as if the slave, after the purchase, should prove to be the property of another person.
the possession of the first seller, and of which the different purchasers were not apprized at the period of concluding their respective contracts,—in that case, according to Haneefa, the last purchaser has a right to return him for a full retribution of the price to the person from whom he bought him; and he again is entitled to return him, on the same condition, to the person from whom he bought him; and in this manner the return may be made through the different gradations of purchasers to their immediate seller, until at length the slave be returned to the seller in whose hands he committed the theft;—in the same manner as in a case of claim of right; for the existence of a cause of amputation is (according to Haneefa) equivalent to a claim of right, as was before explained. According to the two disciples, on the other hand, the last pure seller is entitled to a compensation from the immediate seller; but he again is not entitled to any compensation from his immediate seller; in the same manner as in a case of defect; for the existence of a cause of amputation is (according to the second disciples) equivalent to a defect, as was before explained*—It is to be observed that the mention of the purchaser being ignorant of the theft committed by the slave is insisted on in the two preceding examples, on account of the particular tenets of the two disciples; for as in their opinion, the existence of a cause of mutilation is equivalent to a defect, it follows that if the purchaser had previous knowledge of the existence of such cause, he would appear to have acquiesced in the defect, and consequently have relinquished any right to a compensation. As Haneefa, on the contrary, holds the existence of a cause of mutilation to be equivalent to a claim of right; and as the knowledge or ignorance of this circumstance makes no difference with respect to the purchaser, it follows that such specification, with regard to his tenets, is perfectly immaterial.

Where the purchaser grants the seller an exemption from defects, he cannot afterwards return the article, whatever the defects in it may be—if a person should sell a slave, stipulating an exemption to himself of all responsibility for his defects, as if he should say, "I have sold this slave with all his defects,"—in that case, if the purchaser acquiesces in such condition, and exempt him from any responsibility, he is not afterwards permitted to return him to the seller on account of any defect, notwithstanding the condition of the seller may have been general, this is, without specifying the particular names of the defects from the responsibility of which he exempted himself—Shafei is of opinion that such exemption is not valid, unless that name of every defect to which it refers be specified;—for it is a rule, with him, that exemption from undefined claims is invalid: because exemption has some of the properties of investiture (whence it is that it may be rejected), and investiture of an undefined nature is invalid. The argument of our doctors is that the grant of such exemption is in fact a voluntary surrender of one's own right, the uncertainty with respect to which can be no cause of contention, since delivery is not requisite. It is to be observed that Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that the exemption, in this case, includes all defects actually existing at the time of sale, and also all which may happen in the interval between that and their delivery. Mohammed and Ziffer, on the contrary, are of opinion that the defect which may happen in the interval ought not to be included. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that the probable object of such surrender on the part of the purchaser is to render the sale binding and conclusive, which would not be the case unless the defects that may happen in the interval between the sale and the seizure were also included.

CHAPTER V.

OF INVALID, NULL, AND ABOMINABLE SALES.

A SALE IS INVALID where it is lawful with respect of its essence but not with respect of its quality, and NULL, where the subject is not of an appreciable nature: and the terms INVALID and NULL, are often indiscriminately used.—An ABOMINABLE sale is such as is lawful both in its essence and quality, but attended with some circumstance of ABOMINATION.

Distinctions between a null and an invalid sale.—A sale in exchange for carrion, blood, or the person of a freeman, is null, because in none of these cases bears the characteristic of sale (namely, an exchange of property for property), since these articles do not constitute property with any person. A sale in exchange for wine or pork (on the other hand) is merely invalid: because the characteristic of sale does exist in these instances, as these articles are considered as property with some descriptions of people, such as Christians and Jews: but they do not constitute property with Mussulmans, and a contract comprehending these articles is therefore invalid.

*The word in the original is Makrooh, which the translator (following its literal and common acceptance) has rendered abominable. The term, however, in this work, is not to be understood in the ill sense in which it is generally employed in the English language: the cases to which it relates being such as are in every respect legal, but which being attended with circumstances of impropriety, an abstinence from them is recommended.
The property purchased under a null sale is merely a trust in the purchaser's hands.—In a sale that is null, the purchaser is not empowered to perform any act with respect to the subject of the sale, but it remains as a trust in his hands; and accordingly, if the article were to perish in the purchaser's hands, in this instance, he is not responsible for it. Others are of opinion that the subject of the sale, in this case, is not a deposit, but that the purchaser is not responsible for it (in other words). If it perish in the purchaser's hands, he is answerable;—because the article is as much in his possession, in this instance, as an article detached in a person's hands with an intention of purchase, and for which he is responsible. Some allege that Haneefa is of the first opinion, and the two disciples of the second. The reasons of this difference of doctrine will be explained in treating of the decease of an Am-Walid or Modabbir, in the hands of a purchaser.

But that purchased under an invalid sole becomes his property.—In a case of invalid sale, the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article upon taking possession of it; and is responsible for it if it be lost in his hands. Some are of a different opinion, as will be hereafter explained.

The sale of carrion, blood, or the person of a freeman, is null, in the same manner as a sale in return for those articles as null; because as those articles do not constitute property, they are unsaleable.

A sale of forbidden things, if for money, is null; but if in the way of barter, is invalid.—A sale of wine or pork, if in return for money, is null; and if in return for any other article (as cloth, for instance), it is invalid,—whence it is that the seller of pork or wine, for cloth, becomes the proprietor of such cloth, although the actual pork or wine do not become the property of the purchaser. The distinction in these cases is, that wine and pork are held by Zimmera to be property, where Mussulmans consider them as articles from which no use can be derived, because the law has commanded the contempt of them, and prohibited all regard to them among Mussulmans. Now, a Mussulman's purchasing either of these for specie implies a regard to them, because it is not money (which constitutes the price) that is the object of the sale, as it is merely the instrument of acquiring the object; for in fact it is only the wine or pork that is the object; and as these articles are not appreciable with respect to Mussulmans, it follows that the sale of them is null. It is otherwise if a Mussulman purchase cloth for pork or wine, because that can admit of no other construction than that he regards the cloth as the object of the transaction, considering the pork or the wine only as the means of attaining such object, and not (as in the other case) as the object itself. The specification of the pork or wine, therefore, is regarded merely that the purchaser may become the proprietor of the cloth, and not in order that the seller may become proprietor of the wine or pork; and hence the position of the article is invalid, and the payment of the price of the cloth, and not the delivery of the flesh or liquor, is incumbent on the purchaser (and so also, where a person sells wine or pork for cloth);—for, as cloth is a saleable article, the cloth must, in this instance, be considered as the subject of the sale; for which reason this is an invalid and not a null sale; because where, in a contract of sale, the subject on both sides consists of something else than money, either may with equal propriety be considered as the subject of the sale. (This species of sale is termed a Baya Monkavera, or barter.)

The sale of a Modabbir, an Am-Walid, or a Mokatib is null.—The sale of an Am-Walid, a Madhabhir, or Mokatib, is null;—because an Am-Walid has a claim to freedom, as the Prophet has said, "Her child hath set her free" (that is, her child is a cause of freedom to her);—and the cause of freedom, with respect to a Modabbir, is not established upon the decease of his owner, but must be considered as actually extant in him at present, as the owner is incapable of emancipating him after his decease;—and a Mokatib, on the other hand, is considered of his own person as a right established in him, and binding upon his owner, inasmuch that the owner cannot of himself break or infringe upon it;—if, therefore, the sale of any of these were valid, that which is established in them would be rendered null;—hence the sale of them is null. —Respecting a case where a Mokatib himself acquiesces in being sold, there are two opinions recorded. According to the Zahir Rawavet, the sale in such case is valid. It is to be observed that by a Modabbir is here meant such as is absolutely so, and not one whose condition of freedom is restricted to the non-recovery of his master from the illness under which he laboured at the time of granting the tadbir. And the purchaser is not responsible if they die in his hands.—If, after the sale of an Am-Walid or Madhabbir, and the seisin of the purchaser, one or other should die, in this case, according to Haneefa, the purchaser is not responsible.* According to the two disciples he is responsible for the value (and there is one tradition which reports that Haneefa coincides with them on this point).

The reasoning of the two disciples is, that as the purchaser took possession of the Modabbir or Am-Walid in virtue of a sale, he is therefore responsible for the loss; in the same manner as for the loss of any other property after purchase and seisin;—for this.

* That is, the loss is considered as falling upon the seller, and not upon the purchaser.

reason, that an Am-Walid or Modabir may be included in a contract of sale: whence it is that any article united with them in a contract of sale becomes the actual property of the purchaser. It is otherwise with respect to the loss of him, because being possessed of his own person, the purchaser's seisin of him is not fully established; and the responsibility attaches in virtue of the seisin. The argument of Haneefa is, that actual sale cannot operate with respect to what is not in reality a fit subject of it: and as a Modabir or Am-Walid are not in reality fit subjects of sale, they are therefore considered in the same light with a Mokatib. In reply to what the two disciples urge it may be observed, that an Am-Walid or Modabir are not included in a sale for the sake of their persons, but only in order that the effect of sale may be established with respect to such articles as may have been united with them in the contract; in the same manner as where property of the purchaser happens to be involved in the contract;—in other words, if a person purchase two slaves by one contract, and one of those slaves happens to be his property, such slave is nevertheless included in the contract, not indeed for the sake of his person, but merely in order that the effect of the sale may extend to the other slave, who is united with him in it.

The sale is null of fish in the water.—The sale of fish which is not caught is null as it is not in the state property;—In the same manner also, the sale of a fish which the vender may have caught and afterwards thrown into a large fountain from which it cannot be taken without difficulty, is null, because there the delivery is impracticable. (It is lawful, however, in case the fountain be so small as to admit its being caught with ease,)—If fish should of themselves come into a fountain without the proprietor's having taken any means, by the erection of a dam, or a like, to prevent their egress, they are not considered as property, and the sale of them is therefore null.

Or of a bird in the air.—The sale of a bird in the air, or of one which after having been caught is again set at liberty, is null; because in the one case it is not property, and in other the delivery is rendered impracticable.

Or of a foetus in the womb (or its offspring).—The sale of a foetus in the womb, or of the offspring of that foetus, is null; because the Prophet has prohibited it; and also, because there is a probability of fraud, from there being a want of certainty in the case.

Or of milk in the udder.—The sale of milk in the udder is null: because there is a possibility of fraud, in the udder's being perhaps void of milk, and full of wind; or because there might arise a contention with respect to the mode of extracting the milk: or because it might happen that the udder was obtained more milk than at the time of selling it than at the time of sale; and hence there might be implicated in the sale something not properly the subject of it.

Or of their (or wool) upon an animal.—The sale of wool or hair growing upon an animal is null; because, whilst joined to the animal, it is considered as a constituent part of it; and also, because it cannot be exactly cut away from the animal, without either leaving a part of it or taking away a part of the skin, since it is not practicable to pull it out. It is, moreover, recorded in the Naki' Saheeh, that "the Prophet prohibited the sale of wool upon the animal of milk in the udder, and of butter in the milk," it is recorded of Aboo Yoosaf, that he admitted the legality of the sale of growing wool; but to this the above tradition is an answer.

The sale is invalid of any article which cannot be separated from its situation without injury.—It is not lawful to sell a piece of wood sustaining a weight, such as a pillar or a beam, although the piece of wood be specified and determinate. Neither is it lawful to sell a yard from a piece of cloth which is sewed, whether the parties specify the yard shall be cut off from it or not; because in this case a delivery without injury is impracticable. It is otherwise where a person agrees to sell ten drams (for instance) from an ingot of silver of these may be cut off from the ingot without injury to it. It is to be observed, however, that if the seller, before the dissolution of the contract, should cut off the yard of cloth, or pull away and separate the piece of wood, the sale in that case becomes complete, since the cause of its invalidity is removed.

Or of which the quality or existence cannot be ascertained.—It is otherwise with respect to the sale of the kernels of dates, because that continue null, although the store be afterwards opened and the kernels taken out; since (contrary to the case of the yard of cloth, or the piece of wood) the existence of them was originally uncertain.

It is not lawful for a game-catcher to sell "what he may catch at one pull of his net;" because the subject of the sale is uncertain; and also because the purchaser may be deceived, as it is possible that none may be caught.

Or the quantity of which can only be judged of by conjecture.—It is not lawful to sell dates growing upon a tree in exchange for dates which have been plucked, and which are computed, from conjecture to be equal in point of measurement to those that are upon the tree. This species of sale is termed Mozanibat* and has been prohibited by the Prophet, as well as the sale termed Mohakila, which is the sale of wheat in the ear, in exchange for a like quantity of wheat by conjecture. The law is the same with respect to the sale of grapes on the vine in exchange for raisins Shafei holds these sales to be lawful, provided they be not extended to a quantity exceeding five Wusks; because, although the Prophet has prohibited a sale by Mozanibat, yet he has permitted what is termed Oraya: which he explains to be a sale of dates upon a tree, provided the quantity be less than five Wusks, in exchange for a quantity which have been plucked, and which are similar, in point of measurement, according to computation. Oraya, on the other hand, explains Oraya in its literal sense to mean a gift: and the nature of it is this. A person makes a gift of the dates of his orchard to another, who thereupon comes and enters the orchard. This gives disgust to the proprietor, as his family reside in the orchard: but being, at the same time, unwilling to violate his agreement, he prohibits the other from entering into the orchard, and gives him a quantity of dates which have been pulled in exchange for those which were growing in the orchard. This is the proper interpretation of the traditional saying of the Prophet, quoted by Shafei; and this mode of sale, which is termed Mujjar, is valid in the opinion of our doctors. It is not, however, in reality a sale, because the right of property had not vested in the donee, on account of his not having made seisin of the dates, and therefore the dry dates which were afterwards given to him is considered as a new gift.

Or where the bargain is determined by the purchaser touching the goods, &c.— It is not lawful to sell goods by the way of Molamia, Monazibee, or Alka Hidgir;—that is the touch of the goods, the throwing of the goods; or the casting of a stone:—as where, for instance, a person having exhibited his goods to another, and specified the price, the parties agree between themselves that the contract shall be binding either on the purchaser's touching the goods, or the seller's throwing them towards him, or the purchaser's casting a stone at them. These modes of sale were common in the days of ignorance; but were inhibited by the Prophet.

The sale is invalid, of grass upon a common.—It is not lawful to sell grass growing on a common, because it is not the property of the seller: for it is declared in the traditions that "in grass all men are alike sharers"—(that is, it is common to all). Neither is it lawful to let it out on lease; because, as it is not permitted to farm anything, where the object is the destruction of it, even though it be the property of the lessor, it is consequently in a superior degree unlawful to let in lease an article of which the property is common to all, where the object of the lessor is the destruction of it.*

Or of bees (unless in a hive, or with the comb)— The sale of bees is not lawful according to the two Elders. Mohammed is of opinion that it is lawful, provided the bees be in a place of custody, † and not wild: ‡ and such is also the opinion of Shafei; because a bee is an animal yielding good; and as we are permitted by the law to enjoy the good which that creature yields, it follows that the sale of the animal is permitted. The reason of the two Elders is, that the animal being of an offensive nature, the sale of it is therefore unlawful, in the same manner as in the case of wasps. Besides, the good is derived from its produce, not from its substance, whence no advantage can be derived from it until the honey be produced. If, however the comb be sold, with the honey in it, and the bees, the sale of the bees is in this case lawful, as a dependant. Koorokhee is also of this opinion.

Or of silk-worms— It is not lawful to sell silk-worms, according to Haneefa, as they are animals of an offensive nature Aboo Yoosaf thinks that if the silk have appeared they may than lawfully be sold, as a dependant. Mohammed is of opinion that the sale of them is lawful in any case, as being an animal whence an advantage is derived. Haneefa is of opinion, also, that the sale of their eggs is unlawful. The two disciples, on the contrary, are of opinion that such sale is lawful of necessity.

* Properly, a sale without weight of measure.
† Wusk literally means a camel’s burthen, which is computed to be sixty saas.
The sale of tame pigeons is valid. — The sale of pigeons, of which the number is ascertained, and the delivery practicable is lawful, as in such circumstances they constitute property.

The sale of an absconded slave is invalid (unless he be in the hands of the purchaser). — It is not lawful to sell an absconded slave, because the Prophet has prohibited this; and also, because the delivery is impracticable. If, however, the purchaser should declare that "the fugitive is in his possession," the sale is lawful, because the obstacle on which the prohibition is founded is in this case removed. — It is to be observed that if the purchaser, in this instance, should have declared before witnesses, that "he had taken possession of this slave with intent to restores him to his owner," he is not held, on the conclusion of the contract, to become seised of him in virtue thereof; because the former seisin, being in the nature of a trust, cannot stand in the room of that made on account of purchase. If, on the other hand, he should have made no such declaration, in that case he is held to be seised of the slave, in virtue of the sale, immediately on the conclusion of the contract; because the former seisin, being in the nature of an usurpation, may therefore stand in the room of a seisin for sale; for both are the same in effect, as they both equally induce responsibility. If the slave should have eloped to some other person, and the purchaser say to the proprietor, "sell me your slave who has run away to such an one," and the seller accordingly agree, the sale is in that case also unlawful, because of the impracticability of the delivery.

Although the seller should afterwards recover and deliver him to the purchaser. — If a person, having sold a fugitive slave, should after the sale recover him, and deliver him to the purchaser, the sale is nevertheless unlawful, because it was originally null, in the same manner as if it had related to a bird in the air. It is recorded, as an opinion of Haneefa, that the sale in this case is valid, provided it was not undone previous to the delivery, because it was founded on property, and there was no bar to its effect except the impracticability of the delivery, which is removed by the recovery of the slave (and such is also related as the opinion of Mohammed); — in the same manner as if a slave, after having been sold, should run away previous to the seisin of the purchaser, in which case, if the seller should afterwards recover him, and deliver him to the purchaser, the sale is binding, provided it was not dissolved in the interval.

The sale is invalid of a woman's milk. — The sale of a woman's milk is unlawful, although it is sold in a vessel. Shafei is of opinion that if it be in a vessel the sale of it is lawful, because it is a pure beverage. The argument of our doctors is that, as being part of a human creature, it ought to be respected; and the exposure of it to sale is an act of disrespect. In the Zahir-Rawayet there is a distinction between the milk of a female slave and a free woman. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the sale of the milk of a female slave is lawful, because the sale of the slave herself is lawful. The answer to this is that the sale of the female is legal, because of the bondage, which is a quality of her person; but such quality does not relate to the milk; the one being alive, and the other dead.

Or the bristles of a hog. — The sale of the bristles of a hog is unlawful because the animal is essentially filthy, and because the exposure of this article to sale is a degree of respect, which is reprobated and forbidden. It is lawful, however, to apply it to use, such as stitching leather, for instance, in the room of a needle, as this is warranted by necessity.

Objection — It would appear that the sale of it is warranted from necessity, in the same manner as the use of it.

Reply. — There is no necessity for the sale of it, since any quantity of it may be had gratuitously and without purchase. It is to be observed that hogs' bristles falling into a little water renders it impure, according to Aboo Yoosaf — Mohammed is of a different opinion. Because the legality of the use of the article in question is (according to him) an argument of its purity Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, argues that the legality of the use of it is founded on necessity, and not on its purity; and there exists no necessity in the case of its falling into water.

Or human hair. — The sale of human hair is unlawful, in the same manner as is the use of it: because, being a part of the human body, it is necessary to preserve it from the disgrace to which an exposure of it to sale necessarily subjects it. It is moreover recorded, in the Hadith Shareef, that "God denounced a curse upon a Wasila and a Moosawisla." (The first of these is a woman whose employment it is to unite the shorn hair of one woman to the head of another, to make her hair appear long; and the second means the woman to whose head such hair is united.) Besides, as it has been allowed to women to increase their locks by means of the wool of a camel, it may thence be inferred that the use of human hair is unlawful.

Or undressed hides. — The sale of the hides of animals is not lawful until they be dressed, because the use of them, until then, is prohibited in the traditions of the Prophet. It is lawful, however, to sell dressed hides.

But animal substances of all descriptions (excepting those of men or hogs) may be either sold or converted to use — It is permitted either to sell or apply to use the

*By a little water (say the commentators)

Is here meant such a quantity as may be contained in a cup or other vessel.
bones, sinews, wool, horns, or hair, of all animals which are dead, excepting those of men and hogs. The reason of this is that these articles are pure, and are not considered carrion. Besides, death does not affect them as it does the animal, as these articles are not possessed of life—it is to be observed that Mohammed considering an elephant as essential filth, like a hog, holds the sale of it be unlawful:—but the two disciples, considering it in the nature of a wild animal, regard the sale of it, or of the bones of it, as lawful.

A right cannot be sold, unless it involve property—It is in a house, of which the upper and under apartments belong to different persons, the whole, or the upper storey only, should fall down, in that case the proprietor of the upper storey is not permitted to sell his right (namely, the right of building another upper storey), because this, as being only a right, is not property.

Objection—It would hence appear that the sale of a right to water* (that is, of a share in water used in tillage, as it is not the seller's property, but merely his right: whereas such a sale is allowed, if made along with the land, according to all authorities; and according to one tradition (which has been adopted by the Sheikhs of Balkh) the sale of the right to water by itself is lawful.

Reply.—The sale of a right to water is valid, because the term Shirib means a share in water: and that is an existent article, and in the nature of property;—whence it is that if a person, in a case where it is enjoyed by rotation, should destroy it during the term of his right, he is responsible for the value of it; and also, that, when it is sold along with the ground, a part of the price is opposed to the right to water.

Anything may be sold which admits of a precise ascertainment: but not otherwise.

If a person bestraw or sell a road, it is lawful: but neither the sale nor the gift of a water-course is valid. These cases admit of two suppositions:—I. The sale may be of the absolute right to the road or water-course, without defining the length or breadth of either.—II. It may be of the right of passing upon the road, or receiving the benefit of the water. Upon the first supposition, the difference between the two cases is that the road is certain and ascertained, because the known breadth of it is equal to that of a door-way:—but in the case of a water-course there is an uncertainty because it is not known how much ground the water covers. Upon the second supposition, there are two traditions with respect to a sale of a right of passage on the road:—according to one tradition the sale is lawful; and according to another it is invalid:—The difference between the sale of a right of passage on the road and a right of benefit from the water (as inferred from the first tradition), is that a right of passage is a point which admits of being precisely ascertained, as it is connected with a known object, namely, the road; whereas the right of benefit from the water is of a nature which cannot admit of being precisely ascertained;—and this, whether the water be conveyed in a trough supported upon a wooten frame, or in a trench cut in the ground.

A deception with respect to the sex invalidates the sale in slaves, but not in brutes. If a person sell a slave as a female, who afterwards proves to be a male, in that case the sale is utterly null:—It is otherwise where a person sells a goat (for instance) as a male, and it afterwards proves to be a female; for in that case the contract of sale is complete: the purchaser, however, has the option of compelling the animal, rejecting it. The difference between these two cases is founded on this general rule,—that wherever denomination and pointed reference are united, by the seller pointing to the subject of the sale, and mentioning its name (as if a person should say, "I have sold this goat, for instance),—in this case, if the article referred to prove essentially different from what was mentioned, the sale is supposed to relate to the article named; and therefore if the article referred to prove of a different species from what was named, the sale is null. If, on the other hand, the article referred to prove of the same species with the article named, but of a different quality, in this case the sale relates to the article referred to; and where the article referred to is found, the sale is complete: the purchaser, however, has in this instance an option, because of the quality mentioned not existing in the article;—as where, for instance, a person sells a slave as a baker, and he proves to be a scribe.—Now it is to be observed that a male and a female slave are not of the same, but of two different sexes, which is accounted for in this instance, as equivalent to being of different species, because of their different uses: whereas in goats the object for purchase (namely, to eat their flesh), is the same, with respect both to the male and the female, and therefore they are not held to be of two different species. It is proper to remark, in this place, that, amongst lawyers, the unity or difference of the object, and not the unity or difference of the essence, determines the unity or difference of the species. Thus vinegar of the grape is held to be of a different species from the sweet juice of the grape. Re-sale to the seller for a sum short of the original price, before payment of that price, is invalid.—If a person purchase a female slave for a thousand dirms, stipulating either a future or immediate payment and having taken possession of her, should sell her to the person from whom he had purchased her, for five hundred dirms, previous to his having made payment of the thousand dirms, this second sale is held to be valid, which is of opinion that as the right of property in the slave had vested in the purchaser; because of his having taken possession of her, such sale, on the part of the purchaser to the seller, is valid, in the same manner as it would have been valid to any other person,—or as it would have been valid to the seller in case the second price had been equal to or greater than the first,—or in case it had been in exchange for other goods, although these should have been of a less value.—The arguments of our doctors are,—First, a tradition that Ayeeha, having heard of a woman belonging to a man, had purchased a slave from Zeyd Bin Rakim for eight hundred dirms, had afterwards sold her to the said Zeyd for six hundred dirms spoke to her thus: "This purchase and sale on your part is bad; inform Zeyd, that certainly God will render null his pilgrimages and enterprises achieved along with the Prophet unless he repent of such conduct."—Secondly, if the sale in question be valid, it follows that the first seller remains indebted to the purchaser for five hundred dirms, and the purchaser to him for one thousand dirms. Now if their account should be balanced, and five hundred dirms be struck off from the debt of the purchaser, in liquidation of his claim upon the seller, there remains five hundred due by the purchaser, for which he has received no return, and this is unlawful. It is otherwise where the seller, in the second sale, gives the purchaser goods in return; because there the difference is not obvious; being apparent only with respect to articles of the same kind.

*Arab. Shirib.—This term properly signifies draw-wells dug for the purpose of watering lands, and the right to the use of which is transferable, in the same manner as any other property.

†By a road is here meant a lane or narrow passage leading into a street or high-road.

II. Literally, causing the water to run (by opening a sluice; or so forth).

But the contract is not invalid with respect to any other subjects which may be joined to the original in the re-sale.—If a person, having purchased a female slave for five hundred dirms, and taken possession of her should afterwards, before he had discharged his price, sell her, in conjunction with another, for five hundred dirms to the person from whom he had purchased her, in that case the sale is valid with respect to the female slave whom he had not formerly purchased from that person, but null with respect to the other. The reason of this is that, as a part of the price is necessarily opposed to the new slave, it follows that he purchases a slave, and sells her again to the same person from whom he had purchased her for, which is not lawful, as has been already shown.—No such reason of illegality, however, existing with regard to the sale of the other slave, it is therefore valid, in a price proportioned to her value.

Objection.—It would appear that the sale of the other slave is also invalid, because the person has sold both by one contract, and as the sale of the one is invalid, it would follow that the sale of the other is also invalid (according to the tenets of Haneefa), in the same manner as where a freeman and a slave are sold by one contract, the sale of the slave being in that case invalid as well as that of the freeman.

Reply.—The sale of the other slave is valid; and the invalidity of sale with respect to one does not affect the sale of the other; because the invalidity, in this instance, is weak, as there is a difference of opinion regarding it amongst our doctors; and also, because it is founded on a suspicion of usury, the effect of which suspicion cannot extend beyond the subject of suspicion, namely, the first slave.

The stipulation of specific tare invalidates a sale.—If a person purchase oil, on this condition, that it be weighed and delivered in a small vessel in which a certain quantity of oil is contained, and that a deduction of fifty rats shall be made on account of the weight of the vessel, such sale is not valid; whereas, if the condition be in general terms, that "a deduction shall be made for the weight of the vessel," it is valid;—because the former condition is not essential to the contract, whereas the letter is essential.

Case of dispute concerning the tare of a vessel which contained the commodity.—If a person, having purchased oil in a leathern bag, should carry it away with him, and afterwards return a bag, the seller weighing ten salts, and the seller assert that "this is not the bag he had carried away with him, as that only weighed five rats;" in this case the averment of the purchaser is to be credited, whether the question of disagreement be considered as relating to the bag being different,—or to the consequent difference it creates with respect to the quantity of oil; because, if the difference be considered as relating to the identity of the bag of which the purchaser had taken possession, his assertion must be credited, since the word of the possessor is to be credited, whether he be responsible for the article (as in the case of an usurer) or merely a confident (as in the case of a trustee);—or if, on the other hand, the difference be considered as relating to the quantity of oil this resolves itself into a difference with respect to the amount of the price, the seller claiming more, and the purchaser acknowledging less; the purchaser is therefore the defendant; and the assertion of a defendant, upon oath, must be credited.

A Mussulman may commission a Christian to sell or purchase unlawful articles on his account; and in such case, the agent, is valid.—If a Mussulman desire a Christian either to purchase or sell wine or a hog on his account, and the Christian act accordingly, in that case (according to Haneefa) such sale or purchase is valid; but an order of a Mussulman to this effect being in the highest degree abominable, he is therefore enjoined (where it respects the sale of those articles) to devote the price obtained for them to the poor. The two disciples maintain that the purchase or sale of wine or a hog by a Christian, on account of a Mussulman, is invalid (and the same difference of opinion also obtains which respects to the case of a Mohrism appointing an agent for the sale of the same he may have caught, when it became unlawful for him to make such sale). The argument of the two disciples is that the constituent, as not having himself the power of selling or purchasing these articles, cannot of consequence invest others with such power; besides, as all the acts of an agent revert to the constituent on whose behalf they are performed, it is therefore the same as if the Mussulman were himself to sell or purchase these articles, which would be illegal. The argument of Haneefa is that the contractor (that is, the purchaser or the seller) is, in this instance, no other than the agent; for this reason, that he is fully empowered to perform these acts: the reversion, moreover, of the property to the constituent is a necessary and unavoidable effect, and therefore is not prevented by his Islam:—in the same manner as the articles in question may descend to a Mussulman by inheritance (in which case, if a Christian, whose heir is a Mussulman, should himself embrace the religion of Islam, and afterwards die, before releasing his hog, or converting his liquor into vinegar, in that case they would descend to his Mussulman heir). It is to be observed, however, that although Haneefa admits the validity of the purchase of these articles by a Christian agent, on behalf of a Mussulman, still he holds it incumbent on the Mussulman to convert the liquor into vinegar, and to set free the hog.

A sale is rendered invalid by the insertion of any condition advantageous to either party, or repugnant to the requisites of the contract; or which may occasion contention, by involving an advantage to the subject of the sale—i.e., a person sell a male slave, on condition that the purchaser shall emancipate him, or make him a Mudjabbir, or a Mokatib; or if a person sell a female slave, on condition that the purchaser shall make her an Am-Walid, such sale is invalid; because this sale suspended on condition; and such sales are condemned by the Prophet. The rule, in this particular, is founded on a tenet of our doctors, that the insertion of any condition which is a necessary result of the contract (such as where the seller bargains that “the purchaser shall become proprietor of the article sold”), can no way affect the validity of the contract, since that would be established independent of any stipulation; and, on the other hand, that the insertion of any condition which is not a necessary result of the contract, and in which there is an advantage either to the querent or the seller, or to the subject of the sale, of capable of enjoying an advantage (such as where the seller bargains that “the purchaser shall emancipate the slave he sells to him”), renders the contract invalid; because an additional condition, and the necessity is, in this instance, required from the purchaser without stipulating a recompence to him, and which of consequence is of an usurious nature; and also because there is an advantage in this condition to the subject of the sale, who is capable of claiming it; it follows that a contention must necessarily ensue and hence the object of sale (namely, the prevention of strife) is frustrated. Conditions of this nature are therefore unlawful, excepting where custom and precedent prevail over analogy; as where a person purchases unsewed shoes on condition of the seller’s sewing, or causing them to be sewed for him. The insertion, on the other hand, of any condition which is not a necessary result of the contract, and which, moreover, is not attended with advantage to any particular person, does not invalidate the contract. An example of this occurs where a person sells an animal, on condition that the purchaser shall sell it again; which condition is lawful, because there is no particular person whose right it is to claim the performance of it (since the animal is incapable of so doing), and hence neither usuury nor strife can attend such stipulation. Now, having explained the tenets of our doctors, it is proper to remark that the conditions recited in the cases in question are repugnant to the nature of the contract, as they tend to deprive the purchaser of every right to which the sale entitles him; and they also involve an advantage to the subject of the sale, who is capable of claiming it; they therefore invalidate the contract. Shafei dissents from our doctors, as he holds the sale of a slave, on condition of his emancipation, to be valid.

But such sale recovers its validity, by the purchaser performing the condition with the article purchased.—If a person should emancipate a slave whom he had purchased on that condition, then the sale, which, because of such condition, was previously illegal, becomes valid, according to Haneefa; and the purchaser is responsible to the seller for the price. The two disciples are of opinion that the emancipation does not render the sale valid; and that therefore the payment of the value, and not of the price, is incumbent on the purchaser; because, as the sale was originally invalid, in consequence of the condition, it cannot afterwards be rendered valid by means of the emancipating any more than by the purchaser’s murdering or selling the slave. The reasoning of Haneefa is, that although the condition of emancipating the slave be not, in itself, agreeable to the requisites of a contract of sale (as was before explained), still it is so in effect; because it completes the right of property on the part of the purchaser; and a thing becomes established and confirmed.
by its completion; whence it is that the emancipation of a purchased slave is no bar to a right of compensation from the seller in case of a defect.

SALe.

Sale is rendered invalid, by a reservation of any advantage to the seller from the article sold. — If a person sell a slave, on condition that "he shall serve him for the space of two months after the sale;" or a house, on condition that "he shall reside in it for the space of two months after the sale;" or if a person sell any other article, on condition of the purchaser's lending him a dirm (for instance), or making him some present, the sale so suspended on any of these conditions in invalid: — First, because these conditions are not agreeable to the nature of a sale, and are attended with an advantage to the seller. Secondly, because the Prophet has prohibited a sale on condition of a loan: and Thirdly, because if any diminution be made in the price, on account of the services of the slave, or the residence in the house, it follows that a contract of rent is interwoven in that of sale or if on the other hand, no diminution be made in the price on these accounts, if follows that a deed of loan is interwoven in the sale; and both of these are illegal.

Or, by the stipulation of a delay in the delivery of it. — If a person sell goods on condition of his being permitted to suspend the delivery for a month, the sale is in such case invalid, because a suspension with respect to the delivery of goods which are extant and specific is an unlawful condition. The reason of this is that a suspension in point of time has been ordained by the Law, merely for the purpose of ease, and is therefore only applicable to a debt, in order that the debtor may have time to collect the sum within the prescribed period and pay it accordingly; but with respect to a thing actually extant (such as cloth, for in tunc), there can be no occasion for such suspension.

Or, by the insertion of an invalid condition. — The sale of a pregnant slave, with a reservation of the foetus in her womb, is invalid; because it is a general rule that nothing, the sale of which by itself is illegal, can be made an exception to a contract of sale; and of this nature is a foetus. The sale, therefore, is invalid, because of the invalidity of the condition. It is to be observed that a contract of Kitabat, of hire or of pawning, are the same with a contract of sale, in this respect; that an invalid condition is a means of invalidating the deed. In the case of Kitabat, however, the invalid condition must actually exist in the deed; as when a person enters into covenant with his slave to emancipate him on condition of his giving him wine, or a hog. It is also to be observed that in the cases of gift, alms, marriage, Khoola, and composition for wifeful murder, the exception of the foetus does not invalidate the deed; on the contrary, the deed takes place in full; but the condition is invalid. In the same manner, an exception of the foetus does not invalidate a legacy, for in this case the exception is a valid condition.

Or of a condition which implicates the subject of another contract. — If a person purchase cloth, on condition that the seller sew it into the form of a vest on his account, the sale is in such case invalid; since this condition, besides being attended with an advantage to the purchaser, is not a requisite of the contract of sale. Moreover this necessarily supposes the implication of terms of two different contracts; that is, either of sale and loan, or of sale and hire.

If a person purchase one shoe from another on condition that the seller prepare a fellow to it on his account, — or purchase a pair of shoes on condition of the seller making straps to them, for the purpose of tying them, the sale in either case is invalid. — (The compiler of the Holaya considers the operation of attending to analogy; for a more favourable construction would suggest that such sale is lawful, on account of its being customary amongst men).

Or by a stipulation of the payment of the price, at a period not precisely known to both parties. — If a person should purchase an article, and stipulate the payment of the price on the day of the new year, or on the Mihirjan, or on the day of the Christians, or on the day of breaking Lent amongst the Jews, the sale, under such conditions, is invalid, unless both parties be not informed with certainty respecting those periods. The sale, however, is lawful, if these periods be ascertained within the knowledge of both parties.

Or the date of the occurrence of which is uncertain. — A sale is not valid where the price is stipulated to be paid on the return of the pilgrims, or, on the cutting of the grain, or on the gathering of the grapes, or on the shearing of the sheep, — because in none of those cases is the period absolutely determinate; contrary to the act of giving bail for the giving of bail until the expiration of periods, is lawful; because a small degree of uncertainty does not invalidate a bail-bond, in the same manner as it does a contract of sale.

But it is valid where the time of payment is fixed by a subsequent agreement. — If, however, a sale be made in an absolute manner, and the seller afterwards agree to receive the price at any of the periods in question, it is lawful, because, this stipulation not being included in the contract of sale, it becomes a stipulation with regard to payment of debt (not the price), which admits of a small degree of uncertainty.

A sale, invalid in consequence of stipulating an uncertain time of payment, recovers its validity by removal of the uncertainty.—If a sale be made, stipulating payment of the price at any of the periods above stated, and afterwards the purchaser and seller jointly, or the purchaser alone, remove the obstacle of uncertainty, the price to the actual occurrence of the period stipulated that the sale then becomes valid. Zifffer maintains that, the sale being originally invalid, the subsequent removal of the obstacle cannot render it valid; in the same manner as a marriage originally contracted for a fixed period would not become valid by rendering it perpetual. The argument of our doctors is, that the invalidity of the sale, in this case, is merely because of the apprehension of the litigant, to which the uncertainty may give rise; and of course, when this uncertainty is removed, the sale remains valid. Moreover, as the uncertainty, in this case, relates only to an accidental circumstance, it is to the period when the price is to be paid, and not to the price itself, which is one of the essentials of the sale, the uncertainty is capable of being removed. It is otherwise where a person sells one dirm for two dirms, and afterwards relinquishes the additional dirm; for the sale does not in consequence of such relinquishment become valid, since the invalidity related to the price itself, which is an essential of the sale. It is also otherwise in a case of marriage for a particular period, because this, in fact, is not a marriage, but a separate deed called Matat; and by no subsequent act can one deed be transmitted into another deed.

The sale of a saleable with an unsaleable subject is invalid.—If a person expose to sale a freeman and a slave, and sell them both in one contract,—or, in the same manner, sell a carrion goat, and one that has been slain by the prescribed from of Zibby,—such sale according to Haneefa, is utterly invalid with respect both to the freeman and the slave, as in the first case, and the carrion, and slave goat (as in the second); and this: whether the seller has opposed a specific price to each or not (the two disciples are of opinion that if a specific price be opposed to each, the sale is valid with respect to the slave, or the slain goat).

But if the unsaleable subject be property, the sale holds good with respect to the saleable subject.—In the contrary, a person unite in sale, an absolute slave and a Modabbir, or a slave that is his property, and another that is not, the sale is in either case lawful, with respect to the absolute slave, or the slave which is his absolute property, in return for a proportion from the whole price stipulated. This is, according to our doctors (namely, Haneefa and the two disciples).—Zifffer is of opinion that the sale is not lawful in either case, with respect to either subject. The two disciples argue, that where a specific price is opposed to each particular subject, the invalidity of the sale extends only to that subject which contains a cause of invalidity (namely, the freeman, or the carrion, or the goat) but does not reach to the other subject (namely, the slave or the slain goat);—in the same manner as where a person marries a strange woman and his own sister by one contract, in which case the marriage is valid with respect to the stranger, although it be invalid with respect to his sister,—for that invalidity does not extend to the stranger;—and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise where the price of each particular subject has not been specified; for in that case the invalidity extends to the whole. Haneefa argues that there is no essential difference between the two cases;—namely, the case of joining in sale a Freeman with a slave, and that of joining a Modabbir with a slave; because a freeman, as not being property, is utterly in-saleable of being included in a contract of sale; and as the comprehension of him in the sale necessarily establishes the condition of the acceptance of the sale with respect to him, it follows that the sale is not rendered invalid, because of the invalidity of the condition contrary to marriage, as that is not rendered invalid by an invalid condition. The sale, on the other hand, of a slave the property of another; of a Makatib, Modabbir, or Am-Walid, is merely suspended for these may be included in a contract of sale, as they are property,—whence it is that the sale of them may be carried into execution, in the case of the stranger's slave, by the consent of the proprietor,—in the case of a Makatib by his own consent,—and in the case of a Modabbir or Am-Walid (in the opinion of the Elders) by a decree of the Kazee to this effect;—but as it is supposed that the proprietor of the slave, on account of his right to the subject of the sale, and the Makatib, Modabbir, or Am-Walid, because of the claims established in their persons, will repel the sale, the sale therefore is executed only with relation to the absolute slave; in the same manner as where a person purchases two slaves, of whom one dies previous to the purchaser taking possession of them; in which case the sale holds good with respect to the other.

Section

Of the Laws of Invalid Sales.

In an invalid sale, the purchaser is responsible not for the price, but for the value of the article, in case of its perishing in his hands, where he has taken possession of it by consent of the seller.—Wherever the purchaser, in an invalid sale, takes possession of the goods, with the consent of the seller then, provided both the goods and the price be property, the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article sold, and remains responsible, not for the price, but for the value of the goods, in case they be destroyed in his possession. Shafei maintains that the purchaser does not become proprietor, although he take possession of the article, because an invalid sale is forbidden, and therefore cannot substantiate a right of property; besides, anything which is forbidden is not sanctioned by the LAW, since prohibition is repugnant to ordinance; an invalid sale, therefore, is in no respect sanctioned by the LAW (whence it is that the purchaser of goods does not become proprietor before seisin); and the case is consequently the same as if a person should sell something in exchange for carrion, or should sell wine in exchange for money. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that, in this case, the essential right (of property, an exchange of property for property), exists. The subject of the sale, moreover, is property, and is therefore a fit subject. The buyer and seller also are both competent to the act; and where all these circumstances exist, the sale is duly contracted. Besides, the prohibition is no way repugnant to the legality of the sale itself, because the prohibition relates only to an accessory circumstance, namely an invalid condition; the right of property, therefore, after seisin, accrues to the purchaser in virtue of the sale itself; which is legal, and not in virtue of any matter which is prohibited, or contrary to the LAW. The purchaser, moreover, does not become proprietor of the goods before seisin, for two reasons:—First, because, although an invalid sale be a cause of right of property, yet it is a weak cause, and therefore stands in need of the aid of seisin to give it effect; Secondlv, because, if the purchaser become proprietor previous to the seisin, it would not necessarily follow that sanction is given by LAW to the invalidity, whereas it is incumbent to remove the invalidity. With respect to the cases of a sale of any thing in exchange for carrion, or of wine in exchange for money, the essentials of sale do not exist in either of these, as has been already demonstrated. It is established as a condition, in this instance, that the seisin be made with the consent of the SELLER: it is sufficient, however (according to a favourable construction of the LAW), if this consent be by implication; as if the purchaser should make the seisin in the place of sale, and in presence of the seller. The reason for a favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is, that as the seller, by the contract of sale, virtually empowers the purchaser to make seisin, and as the purchaser does so in his presence, without his making any objection thereto, it is therefore construed to have been made with his consent: in the same manner as the seisin of a gift, in the place where the deed of gift is executed, is valid according to a favourable construction of the law. It is also a condition, that both the goods and the return be property, in order that an exchange of property for property (which is one of the pillars of sale) be established: for if this were not the case, the sale would be null, in the same manner as a sale in return for carrion, blood, the person of a freeman, air, or the like; and hence if in these cases, the purchaser should take possession of the goods with the consent of the seller still he is not responsible for them.

And the value must be paid in money, or in a similar according to the nature of the article. With respect to what was stated, that the seller "remains responsible, not for the price, but for the value of the goods," it relates only to such goods as are of a nature to be compensated for by money; for with respect to such as are compensable by similars, the purchaser, is responsible for a similar; because that which is a similar both in appearance and in effect is a more equitable compensation than that which is similar in effect only.

Either party may annul the contract before seisin.—In an invalid sale, either of the parties, previous to the seisin, has the power of annulling the contract, in order that the invalidity of it may be removed. The law is also the same after seisin, provided the invalidity exist in the body of the contract. If, however, the invalidity be occasioned by the addition of an invalid condition, the person stipulating the condition is allowed to annul it, but not the other party.

A purchaser under an invalid sale may validly sell the article, in which case his right of annulling the sale expires. If the purchaser, however, sell the article, and take possession of the article, and then sell it, in that case the second sale is valid, as the first purchaser, having become proprietor in virtue of seisin, is fully competent to sell the article; and, upon his so doing, the right of returning the article to the first seller expires:—First. Because the right of the individual (namely, the second purchaser) is connected with the second sale; and, the annulment of the first sale, in consequence of its invalidity is on account of the right of God; but the right of the individual has preference to the right of God, as the individual is necessary, whereas God is not so; Secondly, Because the first sale is legal in its essence, but invalid in its quality, whereas the second sale is legal in point of both; and it follows that the latter cannot be obstructed in its operation by the former; and, Thirdly, because the second sale is made with the virtual assent of the first seller, as the power to that effect was by him bestowed on the first purchaser. It is otherwise where the purchaser of a house, in which there is a right of Shaffa, sells it to another; for then the person entitled to the right of Shaffa has nevertheless just title to it; because it is the right of the individual, in the same manner as of the second purchaser as to be equal to it in point of legality; and has not been forfeited by any power given by him to the purchaser to make the sale.

The purchaser of a lawful article in return for one which is unlawful, may after possession dispose of it as he sees fit; remaining responsible only for the value. If a person purchase and take possession of a slave, in exchange for wine, or a hog, and afterwards either emancipate him, sell him, or bestow him in gift, all of these acts are valid, because of the purchaser, in virtue of the seisin, having become proprietor; and he is responsible to the seller for the value of the slave. In the case of emancipation, as the property immediately ceases, the slave becomes (as it were) destroyed, and hence proceeds the responsibility of the purchaser for the value. In the case of sale or gift, the responsibility arises from the right of returning him to the seller being annulled in consequence of these deeds, as has been already explained. It is to be observed that pawnage, or the making a slave a Mokatib, is equivalent to sale, and therefore annuls the right of return to the seller. The remainder of the pledge, however, or the inability of the Mokatib to perform his covenant, restores the right, because the bar to its operation is removed.

The seller cannot rescind the article until he return the purchase-money; and if the seller dies, the purchaser is entitled to set up the article to sale, to indemnify himself for the price he has paid. In an invalid sale, the seller is not allowed to resume the goods from the purchaser, until he shall have first restored the purchase-money; because the goods, being opposed to the purchase-money, are in the nature of a pledge until the restitution of it. If the seller should die then the purchaser has a prior claim to the subject of sale; that is, he is permitted to take payment of the price from the sale of the goods, giving the remainder (if there be any) to the other claimants; because, as he has a right in the goods superior to any other person, during the lifetime of the seller, he consequently has right preferably to the seller's heirs or creditors after his decease; in the same manner as the holder of a pawn. It is to be observed, that if the price was paid in dirms, the purchaser has a right to exact from him, the identical dirms he paid him; since the purchase-money: in the case of an invalid sale, remains in the hands of the seller in the nature of an usurpation. If, however, the identical dirms be not in his possession, then the purchaser is entitled to an equivalent.

Case of an immovable property, in which a change is wrought by a purchaser under an invalid contract.—If a person purchase a house by an invalid sale, and afterwards convert it into a mosque, he is in that case responsible, according to Haneefi, for the value of house. This is also related by Aboo Yoosaf, in Mabfoot, the opinion of Haneefi; but he afterwards entertained doubts respecting it. The two disciples maintain that the house must be restored to its original state, and then returned to the seller. The same difference of opinion obtains, if the purchaser should plant trees in the court-yard of the house. The argument of the two disciples is that the right of the neighbour is of weaker consideration than the right of the seller (whence it is that the right of a neighbour requires to be supported by decree of the Kaza), and also, that it becomes null, by any delay in the demand of it.—neither of which is the case with respect to a seller's right; and as the right of the neighbour, which is the weaker right, would not be annulled by the conversion of the house into a mosque, it follows that the right of the seller, which is the stronger, is not thereby annulled a fortiori. The argument of Haneefa is, that the act of building or planting proceeds on an idea of perpetual possession; that the purchaser in so doing acts in virtue of a power to that effect which he holds from the seller; and that therefore the same has no right to the restitution, in the same manner as in the case of its being resold by the purchaser. It is otherwise with the right of a neighbour, as he does not give power to the purchaser to build or plant on the place over which his right extends; whence it is that if the purchaser had either bestowed it in a gift, or sold it, his right to the neighbourhood would nevertheless still have remained in force. Aboo Yoosaf, who says that which is here advanced as the opinion of Haneefa on this subject, afterwards distrusted his memory, as has been already observed. Mohammed, however, in treating of Shaffa, expressly infers the difference of opinion here recited; for, he says, 'where a purchaser, under an invalid sale, builds upon the ground he has purchased, the neighbour has no right of Shaffa therein, according to the two disciples, and more than previous to the purchase.' Now as Haneefa, on the other hand, has maintained that in such case the neighbour is entitled to take the place, upon paying the value, in virtue of his right of Shaffa, it clearly follows that in his opinion the right of the seller is annulled; because it is on this circumstance that he founds his opinion of the existence of the right of Shaffa, since, so long as the right of the seller remains in force, that of the neighbour cannot take place; whereas, according to the two dis-

The right of the seller is not destroyed by the building of the purchaser, and therefore the claim of Shaffa does not take place.

The profit acquired by the purchaser, upon a definite article, purchased under an invalid contract, must be bestowed in charity. If a person purchase a female slave (for instance) by an invalid contract, and take possession of her, and the seller take possession of the purchase-money, and the purchaser then dispose of her, by sale, to another person at a profit, it is in that case incumbent on him [the purchaser] to bestow in charity the profit so acquired;—but if the first seller should have acquired a profit upon, or by means of, the purchase-money, he is not required to bestow such profit in charity. The reason of this distinction is that as the female slave (for instance) is a definite article, the second contract of sale relates identically to her, and the profit acquired by the sale of her is accordingly base.—Dirms and deenars, on the other hand, are not definite in valid contracts; and as the second contract is of a valid nature, it consequently does not relate to them identically, and accordingly the profit acquired by them is not case. This distinction however, obtains only where the baseness is founded on the invalidity of the right; for where it is founded on the absolute non-existence of right of property.

And so also, profit acquired upon any article in which no right of property exists.—(As where, for instance, a usurper acquires a profit upon the property he has usurped);—there is no difference whatever;—that is, from whichever subject the profit is obtained, it is unlawful and must be bestowed in charity;* because, where a person sells an article, the identical property of another (such as any article of household goods), the contract of sale relates to that actual article, and the profit acquired by it is accordingly unlawful; where, on the other hand, a person purchases a thing with money belonging to another, although the contract do not relate to that actual money (since, if other money were given instead of it, the contract nevertheless holds good), still, however, there is a semblance of the contract relating to that particular money; for if he were to give that actual money to the seller, the article purchased in return would remain appropriated to him; or if, on the contrary, he were only to point to that money, and then give other money instead of it, the amount of the price of the article is, virtually, in that money;—for this reason, therefore, there is a semblance of the contract relating to that money, and consequently that the profit is acquired by means of the property of another person. Now, as the baseness occasioned by an invalidity of right is of less moment than that occasioned by the absolute non-existence of right, it follows that the baseness occasioned by the invalidity in the right of property occasions a semblance of baseness in anything in which the absolute non-existence of right occasions actual baseness (and that is anything of a definite nature, such as a slave girl, for instance, as in the case in question);—and, on the other hand; that it occasions an apprehension of a semblance of baseness in anything in which the absolute non-existence of right occasions only a semblance of baseness;—and regard is had to a semblance of baseness, but not to an apprehension on of a semblance. It is to be observed that if a person claim a debt from another of a thousand dirms, and obtain payment of the same, and both parties afterwards agree that the debt was not due,—in that case the profit which the claimant may in the meantime have acquired by possession of the money is lawful to him; because the baseness, in this instance, is occasioned by invalidity of right:—for this reason that the debt had been owing in consequence of the demand of the claimant, and the defendant's acknowledgment of it; and it afterwards appears that this debt is not the right of the claimant, but of the other (namely, the defendant);—still however, the thousand dirms which the claimant took in satisfaction for his demand have become his property, as the satisfaction he receiveth the property of the claimant, although it be under an invalid right:—and as the baseness, in this instance, is occasioned by the mere invalidity of right of property, and not by the absolute non-existence of that right, it consequently cannot operate, nor have any effect with respect to a thing of an indefinite nature, such as money, for instance.

Section.

Of Sales and Purchases which are Abominable.

It is abominable to enhance the price of merchandise by a fictitious tender of a high price.—The Prophet has prohibited the practice of Najish,—that is, the enhancement of the price of goods, by making a tender for them, without any intention to purchase them, but merely to incite others to the offer of a higher price. The Prophet has also prohibited the purchase of a thing which has already been bargained for by another; but this prohibition supposes that both parties had before come to a mutual agreement; for otherwise there is no impropriety in such subsequent purchase.

Or, to anticipate or forestall the market.—The Prophet has also prohibited an anticipation of the market,—as where people meet the caravan, at a distance from the city, with a view of purchasing the grain brought by the merchants, in order to sell it to the people of the city at an enhanced price. This prohibition, however, proceeds on a supposition that the forestallers deceive the merchants with respect to the price of grain in the city;
for otherwise there is no impropriety in this practice.

Or to enhance the price of grain. in towns, by a citizen selling for the farmer.—The Prophet has also prohibited a citizen from selling for a countryman; as where, for instance, a countryman brings grain or other goods into a city, and one of the citizens takes care of it, and acts as his agent, in order that he may sell it at a high price to the people of the city. Some have given a different explanation of this prohibition, by supposing it to allude to a citizens selling anything at a high price to a countryman: but in the Fattah A Kadeer of Moojibba the former is mentioned as the most authentic explanation. It is to be observed, however, that this prohibition supposes that a scarcity of grain prevails in the city, as otherwise such conduct is not improper.

Or to buy or sell on a Friday.—It is abominable to buy or sell on a Friday, after the crier proclaims the hour of prayer, because God has said, in the Koran, "When ye are called to prayer, on the day of the assembly, hasten to the commemo-ration of God, and leave merchandising." Moreover, if at such time purchase and sale were allowed, an absolute duty (namely, attendance at prayers) would necessarily be omitted. It is to be observed, however, that although such purchases and sales be abominable, still they are not invalid; for the invalidity of such instances, exists with respect merely to points that are extraneous and ad libitum, and not with respect to the essentials of the contract nor with respect to the establishment of any condition essential to its obligation.

Merchandise may be set up for sale to the highest bidder,—A sale to the highest bidder is not abominable. Thus, if a merchant, for instance, having shown his wares to a purchaser, should receive from him a tender for them but, before he had expressed his acquiescence, should receive a higher tender from another, in that case it is not abominable in him to sell them to the latter; because the Prophet sold a cup and a sheet to a higher bidder; and also, because sales of this kind are for the interest of the poor.

It is abominable to separate two infant slaves (or an infant and an adult), related within the prohibited degrees, by a sale of one of them.—It is abominable for a person possessing two infant slaves, related to each other within the prohibited degrees, to separate them from each other; and the rule is the same where one of them is an infant and the other an adult. This decision is founded on a declaration of the Prophet, "Whoever causes a separation between a mother and her children, shall himself, on the day of judgment, be separated from his friends by God." It is, moreover, related that the Prophet gave two infant brothers to Alee, and afterwards inquired of Alee concerning them, and being answered by him, that "he had sold one of them," the Prophet then said, "take heed! take heed!" and repeatedly enjoined him to take him back. Besides, one infant naturally conceives an attachment to another, and an adult person participates in the sorrow of an infant, and hence the separation of them in either case argues a want of tenderness to a child, which has been reprobated in the traditions, where it is declared, "Whoever causes not show tenderness to a child, and respect to an elder, is not of my people." A separation, therefore, either between two infants, or between an adult and an infant, is prohibited. It is to be observed that the cause of the prohibition, in this instance, is affinity with such a degree only as prohibits marriage between the slaves in question, and not general affinity, for which reason any distant relation, such as a step-mother, or one prohibited by fosterage, or by affinity with the fosterer, are not included; nor the son of the uncle; nor any one that is not within the prohibited degrees. Neither are a husband and a wife included in this prohibition, notwithstanding they be both infants, and they may consequently be separated, because the tradition which contains the prohibition, as being contrary to analogy, must therefore be observed in its literal sense; that is, it must be applied to such only as are within the prohibited degrees. Moreover, in the aforementioned traditions, both relation are required to be the property of one master; if, therefore, one infant brother belong to Z-yd, and another infant brother to Omar, each is at liberty to sell his respective property.

Unless in the pursuance of an indispensable duty, or in cases of unavoidable necessity.—It is allowed, likewise, to separate two infant slaves related to each other, if with a view to fulfill an incumbent duty, as where one of the two commits a crime, and is given up, as a compensation for such crime, to the execution of the sentence; or, in the same manner, also, one of the two may be sold, for the payment of a debt incurred by him in the course of purchase and sale, in consequence of his being a privileged slave,—or, by the destruction of the property of another,—in either of which cases slave may be sold alone, in discharge of the debt, although this induce a separation. So also, it is lawful to return one of the two to the seller of them, in case he should prove defective. The adjudication in all these cases, proceeds on this principle, that the object of the Prophet in this prohibition was to prevent an injury to the infants without detriment to the protector of the object which, if the prohibition were extended to these cases, must necessarily be defeated.

But such sale is nevertheless valid.—It is to be observed, however, that if a person separate one infant from another, or an infant from an adult, by selling one of them, such sale is valid; yet still, the act of separation is abominable. It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that a sale of this nature is invalid only where the relation of paternity (such as mother and son, for instance) exists between the parties; but that in all other cases it is valid. Another report, from Aboo Yoosaf, mentions that sales of this nature are invalid in all cases where the separation is abominable, because of the tradition already mentioned with respect to Alee; for the Prophet positively enjoined him to take back the salve he had sold, whence it may be inferred that he considered the sale as invalid, since a return of the commodity is not admitted but in an invalid sale. The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is that, in the case in question, the sale is transacted by a competent person, and with respect to a fit subject: it is therefore valid; and the abominition does not apply to anything except what is merely a concomitant, or immediate effect of the sale, namely, the distress occasioned to the two infants, which is a degree of abominition exactly equivalent to that of a person purchasing something over the head of another, from whence no invalidity arises. Moreover, the order of the Prophet to Alee to take back the salve must be construed either into a dissolution of the sale, or a repurchase of the salve from the person to whom he had sold it.

Adult slaves may be separated without offence. — It is not abominable to separate two slaves that are adults, notwithstanding they be related within the prohibited degrees; for this case falls not under the ordinance before mentioned; and there is an authentic tradition of the Prophet having occasioned a separation between Maria and Sireen, two female slaves that were sisters.

CHAPTER VI
OF AKALA, OR THE DISSOLUTION OF SALES.

Definition of Akala. — Akala literally signifies to cancel. — In the language of the Law it means the cancelling or dissolution of a sale.

A sale may be dissolved in consideration of an equivalent to the price. — The dissolution of a sale is lawful, provided it be for an equivalent to the original price, because the Prophet has said "whosoever makes an Akala with one who has repented of his bargain, shall receive an Akala of his sins from God, on the day of judgment;" — and also, because, as the contract of sale comprehends the rights of both parties, namely, the buyer and the seller, they have therefore the power of dissolving such contract, to answer their own purposes.

But not for anything greater or less. — If, however, either a greater or less sum than the original price be stipulated as the condition of the dissolution, such condition is null, and the dissolution holds good; and the seller must return to the purchaser a sum equal to the original price. — It is a rule with Haneefa, that a dissolution is a breaking off of the contract with respect to both the parties, but a sale de novo with respect to others. If, therefore, the breaking off be impracticable, the dissolution is null. — According to Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, it is a sale de novo: but if a new sale should from any cause be impracticable, then it must be considered as a breaking off; and in case of that also being impracticable, the dissolution then becomes null. — The opinion of Mohammed is that it is a breaking off; and in failure of this, from impracticability, a sale de novo; and in case of that also being impracticable, it is null. — The argument of Mohammed is that Akala, in its literal sense, signifies dissolution; and, in its constructive sense, sale (whence it is a sale de novo with respect to all others than the parties): it is therefore regarded as a dissolution or breaking off, agreeably to the literal meaning of the term; or, if the breaking off be impracticable, it is regarded as a sale, agreeably to its constructive meaning. — The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that Akala means an exchange of property for property with the mutual consent of the parties, which corresponds with the definition of sale, and is also subject to the same rules; whence it is that, in case of the loss of the wares in the possession of the purchaser after the conclusion of the Akala, or dissolution, it [the Akala] is null; and also, that the sell is allowed so return the wares to the purchaser in case of their having been blemished or become defective whilst in the hands of the purchaser; and that the right of Shaffa is also established by it — Haneefa.

On the other hand, argues that Akala means a dissolution, or breaking off, and cannot, by any construction of it, supposed to mean sale, although the breaking off should be impracticable; because sale and dissolution are terms of opposite import, which no one word can be supposed to bear: — if, therefore, the breaking off be impracticable, the Akala is null. With regard to its being a sale de novo, in relation to others, this is a mere matter of necessity, as to them it exhibits similar effects with sale: that is to say, the seller, in virtue of the Akala, becomes again proprietor of the wares; and it is accordingly a sale with respect to all others than the seller and purchaser, for this reason, and not because of the meaning of the word, which in reality is the opposite of sale. — Such are the opinions and arguments of our three doctors with regard to Akala. — Hence it appears that in a stipulation be made, that the seller shall return to the purchaser a sum greater than the original price, the dissolution, agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, would hold good to the amount of the original price; because (according to his tenets) Akala is a dissolution, and a dissolution cannot possibly relate to the excess, as there is no sale which might be opposed to such excess; and it is impossible to dissolve what does not exist; — the condition, therefore, is invalid, but not the dissolution, as that is not rendered null by involving an invalid condition.—It is otherwise with respect to sale (that is, the sale of one dirm for two dirms, for instance),—for if a person should sell one dirm for two dirms, such sale would be invalid; nor could it be construed as existing with respect to one dirm, and as null with respect to the additional one, so as to render the sale lawful; because the establishment of an excess in sale is possible, as that is an establishment to a matter as yet unestablished, and it is no way difficult to establish an unestablished point: but if the excess dirm were established, it would induce usury:—a sale of this nature, therefore, is invalid. —The conclusion therefore is, that the dissolution in question is valid, but the condition is otherwise. The law is also the same where a stipulation of smaller amount than the original price is made; that is to say, the dissolution holds good, but the condition is void; because the sale being established, the original price, and the deficiency not then existing, it follows that the dissolution can apply only to what does exist.—namely, the original price,—since it is impossible to dissolve what does not exist. —If, however, this deficiency be stipulated on account of a defect which had taken place in the wares, it is lawful.—In the opinion of the two disciples, the stipulation of a sum exceeding the original price, in a dissolution, amounts to a sale.—According to Aboo Yusaf, because (as has been already explained) he considers Akala as a sale, and also according to Mohammed, because although he be of opinion that a dissolution is a breaking off, yet he has said that, in case of the impracticability of a breaking off, it must be considered as a sale: and as the dissolution in question is of that nature, he is therefore of opinion it is a sale.—With respect to a dissolution in which is stipulated an amount less than the original price Aboo Yoosaf (proceeding on his general opinion concerning dissolutions), considers it as a sale: but in the opinion of Mohammed it is a dissolution with respect to the whole of the original price; because he considers the deficiency to be a silence maintained with respect to a part of the price; and as the dissolution would have been valid if a silence had been maintained with respect to the whole, so it is in a superior degree valid when the silence is maintained only with respect to a part. A dissolution, stipulating a smaller sum than the original price, in a case where the wares have been blemished in the hands of the purchaser, is considered by Mohammed as a dissolution; the deficiency being opposed to the blemish.

Dissolution, in consideration of an equivalent of a different kind, is a breaking of.—If a dissolution be agreed upon, stipulating, in lieu of the original price, an equivalent of a different kind, it is a breaking off,* according to Hannefa, for the original price; and the stipulation of a different kind is nugatory. The two disciples consider this dissolution as a sale, founding their opinion on their ideas of the nature of dissolution, as already explained.

The sale of a female slave cannot be annulled after she has borne a child. —If a dissolution of sale take place with respect to a female slave who had borne a child whilst in the possession of the purchaser, it is null, according to Hannefa, because (agreeably to his tenets) a dissolution is a breaking off; and the birth of the child is preventive of a dissolution, as this is a supervenient addition of a separate thing; and such addition after seisin, prevents a dissolution of the bargain.—This dissolution, however, is considered as a sale by the two disciples.

A sale may be dissolved previous to delivery and seisin of the article.—The dissolution of a sale previous to taking possession or the article sold, whether of a movable or immovable description, is a breaking off, according to Hannefa. According to Aboo Yoosaf, it is a breaking off with regard to movable property only, because a sale of movable property, previous to taking possession of it, is not lawful, and hence a dissolution with respect to movable property, previous to the seisin of it, cannot be considered as a sale, and is consequently a breaking off. A dissolution with respect to immovable property, on the contrary, previous to the taking possession of it, is a sale (according to Aboo Yoosaf), as he holds that the sale of immovable property, previous to the seisin of it, is lawful.

The loss or destruction of the wares is a bar to the validity of a dissolution, but not the destruction of the price; because a dissolution is the breaking off of sale; and the breaking off of a sale rests upon the existence of the sale; and this again relates to the wares, not to the price.

Barter may be dissolved, after a dissocation of one of the subject.—In cases of Mookayza, or a sale of goods for goods,* a dissolution agreed upon after the destruction of one of the two subjects is valid; because each of them falls under the description of the subject of the sale; and applying this term, therefore, to the one that remains, it follows that the dissolution is lawful, because of the existence of the subject of the sale.

CHAPTER VII.

OF MOORABIHAT, AND TAWLEEAT, THAT IS, SALES OF PROFIT AND OF FRIENDSHIP.†

MOORABIHAT, or a sale of profit, means

That is, barter:—the term by which Mookayza will be hereafter always expressed.

†Moorabihat and Tawleat are technical terms, which (like many others in this work)

*And consequently valid, as it completely nulls the contract.
the sale of anything for the price at which it was before purchased by the seller, with the superaddition of a particular sum by way of profit. Tawleeat, or a friendly sale, is where one person sells anything to another for the exact price which he himself paid for it. Both these modes of sale are lawful, because the conditions essential to the validity of a sale exist in them; and also, because mankind stand in need of them. For example, a man who has himself no skill in making purchases is necessitated to confide in a purchase from a person skilled in such matters; in other words, he will purchase the article from this person at the same rate at which he had purchased it, without allowing him any profit upon it, as in a sale of Tawleeat, or a friendly sale;—or, he will purchase it from him at the same rate at which he had purchased it, allowing him an addition, by way of profit, as in a case of Moorabihat, which is a profitable sale; and this will leave him satisfied and at ease in his mind; since a person destitute of skill is by either of these modes secured from fraud, whereas, following any other mode, he would be exposed to great imposture. Mankind, therefore, having occasion for both these modes, they are both permitted:—and as, in both instances, the purchaser is under a necessity of placing an absolute confidence in the word of the seller, who is skilled in the business of traffic, it is therefore incumbent on the seller to be just and true to his word and to abstain from fraud, or from the semblance of fraud. Fraud is where a person avers that he had purchased a certain thing for twelve dirms, when, in fact, he had only paid ten dirms; and the semblance of fraud is where a person sells anything by a profitable sale stipulating prompt payment, when, in reality, he had himself purchased the same thing on credit.

They require that the price consist of similars; or, if otherwise, that the person who enters into the agreement with the purchaser should have obtained possession of the price in the interim; but the profit agreed for must be in money or specific articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, and must be stipulated upon the whole price, generally, and not proportionally upon its parts. Proptition and friendly sales are an lawful one; where the price of the wares is of the description of similar such as dirms and deenars, for instance; because, if the price stipulated be an article of which the unities are not similar (such as a slave, for example), if follows that the purchaser becomes proprietor of the wares for a price of which the value is unknown, a circumstance which induces illegality in a sale. If, however, the purchaser should, in the mean time, have acquired possession of the price (as if, for instance, the price be a slave, and that identical slave be then the property of the purchaser, in such case a sale of friend-hip is lawful; see also a sale of profit,—provided the profit be stipulated in money, or in articles estimable by weight, or measurement of capacity, which are described and ascertained;—because the purchaser is in this case enabled to make delivery of the thing which he has rendered obligatory on himself. It is not lawful, in a sale of this nature, to stipulate a profit proportionate to part of the price (such as a profit of one dirm upon ten, two upon twenty, and so forth), because the particular value of the price [the slave] not being ascertained, this could not be carried into practice:—it is necessary, therefore, to stipulate a general profit upon the whole price.

All intervening expenses which enhance the value of the article may be added to the prime cost. It is lawful for the sellers,† in a profitable or friendly sale, to add to the capital sum the wages of the bleacher, the dyer, or the figurer (of cloths), the spinner (of cotton or wool), or the porter (of wheat, and so forth), because it is a custom amongst merchants to add such expenses to the profits; and also, because whatever is the cause of an increase either to the substance of the thing purchased, or to the value of it, is an addition to the capital: this, moreover, is a general rule, aplying to all the articles here mentioned; for the dyeing, figuring, or spinning is an increase to the substance of the article; and the bleaching of linen, or the porterage of wheat, and so forth, is an increase to their value because cloths are rendered more valuable by being bleached and the price of wheat various in different places. It is requisite that the seller, in making or including such addition, should

*Meaning the person who enters into the Tawleeat or Moorabihat agreement with the first purchaser.

†Meaning the party who first purchased the article, and then agrees to transfer it by Tawleeat or a Moorabihat. (The terms seller and purchaser are thus to be understood throughout this section.)

†Arab. Ras Mal: meaning (in this place) the prime cost or original price of the article.
say, "this article has cost me so much," and not, "I have purchased this at such a rate," because the latter assertion would be false. It is to be observed that the driving of goats from city to city is equivalent to the portage of wheat: but neither the wages of the shepherd, nor the rent of the house in which the wares are kept, is to be included, as no increase with respect either to the substance or the value arises from these circumstances: neither are the wages of a teacher of the Koran, or the like, to be included.* because the increase of value obtained by instruction is acquired through the wisdom and ability naturally existing in the scholar, which last is the immediate cause of an increase of value:—the charge, therefore, must be placed to the head of the wisdom, or natural ability, which is the immediate cause and not to the teaching, which is a remote cause.

In case of an over-statement of the price the purchaser may undo the bargain. —If, in a sale of profit, the purchaser should discover that the seller had practised a fraud in stating the price of the wares, in such case, according to Haneefa, the purchaser is at liberty either to adhere to or undo the bargain, as he pleases.

Or (in Tawleat) deduct the excess—and in case such fraud should be practised in a sale of friendship, the purchaser is at liberty to deduct the amount of the fraud from the price. Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that a deduction proportionate to the fraud must be made in either case; but that, in the sale of friendship the deduction is made from the price; and in a sale of profit, from both the price and the profit. Mohammed maintains that in both cases the purchaser has the option of adhering to or relinquishing the contract as he pleases; for he argues that—

The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that, in cases where friendship or profit are mentioned, it is an essential that friendship or profit be established: where it is that the sale in question is concluded, if the seller say to the purchaser, "I have sold this thing to you, by way of friendship, for its original price,"—or, "I have sold this thing to you for a profit on its original price," provided its original price in both cases be known and ascertained: Now, such being the case, it necessarily follows that a deduction must be made in proportion to the fraud of the purchaser, in order that Tawleat or Moorabihat may be established:—in a case of Tawleat the deduction is made from the price; and in a case of Moorabihat from the price and the profit. The argument of Haneefa is that if, in a sale of friendship no deduction be made for a fraud, the description of Tawleat no longer appertains to it, since the price, in such a case, must otherwise exceed the original price and consequently the transaction of friendship, would be altered in its nature; a deduction is therefore adjudged:—if, on the other hand, no deduction were made in a profitable sale, yet the sale would still retain its original nature of a profitable sale, with the difference only of the extent of it; for which reason the purchaser is at liberty to abide by or undo the contract as he pleases. Hence if, in a profitable sale, after the purchaser had become acquainted with the fraud, the wares should be lost or destroyed in his possession,—or, if they should have contracted some blemish preventive of a dissolution of the sale, the purchaser is responsible, according to all the most authentic traditions, for the whole price,—since in such a case no proportion whatever of the original price is opposed to the option of the purchaser so that he might deduct such proportion, because of the destruction of his option:—As holds in cases of option of inspection or condition of option. It is otherwise in cases of option of defect: for there the claim which the purchaser has on the seller relates to a loss with respect to the wares, arising from a defect; and a deduction is accordingly made from the price on account of such loss, provided it be not in the power of the seller in any other way to repair such loss arising from defect.

A profit be a Moorabihat sale cannot be twice obtained upon the same article.—If a person purchase cloth (for instance), and afterwards dispose of it to another by Moorabihat, and then repurchase it from that other at the price for which he had originally purchased it, in that case, if he should again wish to sell it by Moorabihat, it is necessary that he deduct from the price fixed in the last sale (calculating that at the rate of price in the first sale) the sums of the profit he acquired in the intermediate sale:—but if after such deduction nothing remains, he is not allowed to sell it by Moorabihat. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is lawful for him to sell it with an addition of profit grounded on the last sale. To exemplify this case:—suppose that a person purchases cloth at ten dirms, afterwards sells it to another for fifteen dirims, and again purchases it from that other for ten dirims; in this case, if he should wish to resell it by way of profit, he must fix the price at five dirims, being what in reality the cloth has cost him, and what he ought therefore to found a profit upon:—suppose, on the other hand, that a person purchases a piece of cloth for ten dirims, and having sold it to another for twenty dirims, afterwards repurchases it from that other for the original price, namely, ten dirims; in the case he is not entitled to sell it again with an addition of profit. The two disciples maintain that he is in both cases entitled to sell it for a profit on the last price, namely, ten dirms, and their reasons are, that he repurchases is a new contract, and has no connexion with the effects of the former sale; and that therefore a profit may be imposed, founded on the second contract; in the same manner as if the second purchaser should sell it to a third purchaser, and the first purchaser repurchases it from the third one, in which case it would be lawful for the first purchaser to sell it at a profit on the last price, and so also in the case in question. The argument of Haneefa is, that in the case in question, there is an apprehension of the first profit being obtained by means of the second contract. Since until the person repurchases the cloth there was a possibility that he might return it upon the seller's hands in consequence of a defect, and that his [the seller's] profit might thereby have been lost, although upon his repurchasing it from the purchaser, this possibility vanishes, and the profit remains confirmed and established. The apprehension, however, had existed; and in Moorabihat sales apprehension is regarded as equivalent to certainty, out of caution (whence it is that a profit of this nature is not allowed upon anything given in composition; in other words, if a person be indebted to another to the amount of ten dirms, for instance, and he compound the debt with his creditor by a piece of cloth, it is not lawful for the creditor to sell this cloth at a profit of this nature over and above ten dirms, because in the composition it is to be apprehended that the value of the cloth was short of ten dirms, as composition is founded upon remission of a part).—In the case in question, therefore, the seller, because of the apprehension above stated, appears, in consequence of the second contract, to have purchased five dirms, together with the cloth, for ten dirms; he must therefore deduct five dirms from the whole and declare that "the cloth has fallen to him for five dirms;" and take his profit upon those five. It is otherwise where the second purchaser sells the cloth to a third person, and the first seller then repurchases it from this person: for in this case the acquisition of the first profit is confirmed and established by means of the second purchaser's having sold it into the hands of another, and not by means of the first seller repurchasing it from the third person so as to leave any room for apprehension in this case also. There is therefore a material difference between this case, and the case under consideration, and consequently it is evident that the analogy adduced by the two disciples is unfounded.

Case of Moorabihat transacted between the manager of a stock and the proprietor.—If a person give to another ten dirms, in the way of Moorabihat, (stipulating that the profit acquired therefrom shall be equally divided between them, and the Moorabib, or manager so constituted, purchase with the said money a piece of cloth, and then sell it to his constituent for fifteen dirms, and the constituent afterwards wish to dispose of it by a profitable sale, he is not allowed to fix the price at more than twelve and a half dirms. The reason of this is, that although the purchase made by the proprietor of a Moorabihat stock from his manager be, in fact, the purchasing of his own property with his own property, yet, such purchase is held to be lawful by our doctors: because the proprietor of the stock has no power over it whilst in the hands of the manager; and as this power, which is a desirable object, resulted to him from the purchase, the said purchase, because of its being the means of procuring to him an object of desire, is therefore lawful; nevertheless, as there is in this case an appearance of invalidity of sale (since the constituent did as it were purchase his own property with his own property, by which means a mutual exchange of respective property did not take place), the purchase is therefore reckoned null so far as regards the half of the profit; and accordingly, in the case in question, the profit must be imposed upon twelve and a half dirms.

An article may be disposed of by Moorabihat, where a defect has intervened not proceeding from the seller, or where the seller has used the article, in the interim, without injury to it.—If a person purchase a female slave, and she afterwards, without any appearance of violence, but merely from a natural cause, become blind of an eye,—or if, being a woman, she cohabit with her, without harm accruing,—it is in either case lawful for him to dispose of her by Moorabihat, without giving any explanation of either of these circumstances; and in consequence of the blindness or the cohabitation does any thing remain to him in opposition to which a deduction might be made from the price; because no part of the price is opposed to the quality of the article (whence it is that if the quality be destroyed previous to seisin by the purchaser, no deduction from the price would on that account be allowed); and in the same manner, no part of the price is opposed to the use of a woman's person. It is reported, from Aboo Yoosaf, that in the first case the slave must not be disposed of in the manner of Moorabihat, without an explanation being given of the blindness, any more than where blindness occasioned by violence: and this opinion has been adopted by Shahri.

But if the defect be occasioned by, or compensated to, the seller, a proportionable deduction must be made from the price. — It to be observed, that if the purchaser himself had occasioned the blindness, or if it had been by another from whom the purchaser either had or had not received an amercement, he is not in either of these cases entitled to dispose of the slave by Moorabihat, without giving an explanation of the blindness; because the purchaser (or another) did with design or intention destroy the eye; and it is consequently repugnent that a proportionable deduction be made for a defect so occasioned. The same rule also obtains where a purchaser has cohabitation with a female slave who is a virgin; because virginity, being meretricious, is a constituent part of the slave, and this the purchaser has destroyed.

It the article be damaged by an accident not preceding from the seller, still it is a proper subject of Moorabihat,—If cloth which a person had purchased be burnt by fire, or damaged by vermin, in that case it is lawful for the purchaser to dispose of it by Moorabihat without explaining either of these circumstances? but if the cloth be torn in the folding and opening of it, it is not lawful for the purchaser thus to dispose of it without noticing the same to the party, because the damage, in this case, is occasioned by his own deed.

A misstatement of a prompt payment instead of a suspended payment, leaves it in power of the purchaser to undo the bargain in a sale either of profit. — If a person, having purchased a slave (for instance) for one thousand dirms, payable at a future period, should afterwards sell him for one thousand dirms, payable immediately, with a profit of one hundred dirms without noticing to the other the respite of payment he himself has obtained,—in that case the other, if he should afterwards discover this circumstance, is at liberty either to abide by or return to the bargain at his option; because the suspension of the payment resembles an addition to the substance of the wares; and hence it is custom amongst merchants, in granting a respite of payment, to increase the price of the merchandise. Now a semblance, in a sale by profit, is deemed equivalent to reality: and hence it follows that the said person did, as it were, purchase two things for one thousand dirms, namely a slave and a suspension of payment; and afterwards sold only one of these things by way of profit, grounded on the price which he paid for both: a fraud from which an abstinence is particularly enjoined in cases of Moorabihat,—the purchaser, therefore, has an option of adhering to or undoing the bargain as he pleases, as in the option from defect. If, however, the purchaser should destroy the wares, and then receive notice of the fraud which had been practised upon him, he is not in such case entitled to make any deduction on that account from the price, because no part of the price is in reality opposed to the suspension of payment.

Or of friendship,—If a person, having purchased a slave (for instance) for a thousand dirms payable at a future period, should afterwards dispose of him to another, by a Tawleela, for a thousand dirms ready money, without intimating the respite of payment, in that case the other, on discovery of this circumstance, is at liberty either to abide by or annual the contract, as he pleases: because an abstinence from a fraud of this nature is equally enjoined in friendly as in profitable sales.—If, however, in this case the purchaser, having destroyed the slave, should then become acquainted with the suspension of payment that has been granted to the seller, it is incumbent on him to make a prompt payment according to the agreement; nor is he entitled to make any deduction from the price on the score of suspension of payment, as before explained.

—It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the purchaser is in this case to pay the value to the seller, and to receive from him the whole of the price, in the same manner as holds (according to him) in a case where a creditor, having received payment of the debt due to him in a bad specie, discovers this circumstance after having delivered them,—in which case it has not been to return to the deputer a similar number of the specie he had received, and to demand from him a like number of good specie. Some have said that an appraisement ought to be made of the value in the case of prompt payment, and also in the case of a distant payment; and that the difference should be given by the seller to the purchaser. — All that has been here advanced proceeds on a supposition of the suspension of the payment being included in the contract of sale; for if, without such stipulation, it should happen that the payment be made at a distant period (as is often the case amongst merchants), there subsists, in such case, a difference of opinion upon this point, whether, under these circumstances, in a subsequent sale of profit or of friendship, it be incumbent upon him to make known this matter. — Some have said that such notification is incumbent upon him, since an established custom is equivalent to a condition. — Others, again, allege, that he is under no necessity of giving such notification, since it is evident that, as no condition was stipulated the sale was therefore for prompt payment.

In a sale of friendship the rate must be specified, and the purchaser has a right of option until after the specification. If a person dispose of a thing to another by a sale of friendship, declaring that "he sells it to him at the rate it had stood him in," — and the purchaser be not acquainted with that rate, the sale is invalid, from the uncertainty with regard to the price; — if, however, the seller should afterwards inform the purchaser of the rate, at the same meeting, the sale then becomes valid, but it still remains in the option of the purchaser to abide by or recede from the contract as he pleases, since the acquiescence he had before expressed was not fully established, from his ignorance of the price and after the knowledge of it he has an option, in the same manner as in the case of an option of inspection. The reason of the validity of this sale is that the invalidity does not become firmly established until the departure of the parties from the meeting.

When, therefore, the purchaser, in the meeting, is informed of the price, it becomes the same as if a new contract had taken place after the purchaser had acquired this knowledge; and it is for him to withhold his acquiescence until the end of the meeting — if, however, the parties should separate, the invalidity then becomes fixed; nor can it be removed by any knowledge which the purchaser may afterwards obtain of the amount of the price. — Similar to this is the case where a person sells cloth for the value which is marked upon it, but of which the purchaser is ignorant; for such sale is invalid, but may be rendered otherwise by the explanation of the seller, before the breaking up of the meeting.

Section

Moveable property cannot be re-sold before seisin. — It is not lawful for a person to sell moveable property, which he may have purchased, until he receive possession of the same: because the Prophet has prohibited the sale of a thing prior to the seisin of it on the part of the seller; and also, because there is an unfairness in it, since, if the merchandise should be lost or destroyed before the seisin, the first sale becomes null, and the property reverts to the former proprietor, in which case it must necessarily appear that the person in question has sold the property of another without his consent.

But land may be re-sold previous to seisin by the first purchaser. — The sale of land, previous to seisin, is lawful, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed maintains that it is unlawful; because the traditional saying of the Prophet before quoted is absolute, and not particularly confined to moveable property; and also, because of its analogy to moveable property. Besides, the sale of land is similar to the hire of it; in other words, as it is unlawful to let land before seisin so is it likewise to sell land before seisin. The reasoning for the two disciples is that, in the case in question, the sale is effected by competent parties with respect to a fit subject; — that there is no unfairness in it, since the destruction of ground is rate, whereas that of moveable property is probable; — and that the prohibition of the Prophet is founded on the possibility of the unfairness already explained, which does not exist in the case of land, the destruction of it being rare. — Some have asserted that a lease of land before seisin, as adjudged by Mohammed, is lawful in the option of the two disciples. — Admitting, however, that it were unlawful according to all our doctors, it proceeds evidently on his principle, that a lease is made with a view to the produce. the destruction of which not being uncommon, the unfairness already explained (with respect to the sale of moveable property before seisin) may consequently take place in it. This, however, cannot happen with respect to the sale of ground, the destruction of which is rare, and consequently the one case is not analogous to the other.

In the re-sale of articles of weight, and measurement of capacity, it is requisite that the article be weighed or measured again by the second purchaser. — If a person purchase articles estimable by a measure of capacity, such as wheat, or articles of weight, such as butter, — as if he should say, "I have purchased this wheat, on condition of its being equal to ten bushels," or "this butter, on condition of its weighing ten mans;" and if, having measured or weighed these articles accordingly, he should then take them and sell them to another, on the same condition of measure or weight, in that case it is not lawful for that other to sell or use these articles, until he has measured or weighed them on his own account; because the Prophet has prohibited the sale of wheat until it be measured both by the buyer and the seller: and also, because there is a possibility of these articles exceeding the warranted quantity; in which case the excess, as being the property of the seller, would not be lawful to the purchaser; and an abstinence in the case of this possibility is necessary. — It is otherwise where the sale is made by conjecture, without any condition of measurement; for the excess, in that case, is the right of the purchaser; and it is also otherwise in the sale of cloth by yards, for there likewise the excess is the right of the purchaser; since yards (as has been already explained) are a description of the cloth, and not a quantity, as in the case of articles of weight or measure of capacity. — It is to be observed that the measurement of the cloth

by the seller, previous to the sale, is not valid, although it should have been done in the presence of the purchaser, because the measurement of both the seller and purchaser is required, and these terms are not applicable to the parties until after the sale takes place. So also, the measurement made by the seller after the sale is invalid, unless it be in the presence of the purchaser, because the object of measurement is delivery, and delivery without the presence of the purchaser is impracticable.

It suffices, however, that the article be weighed or measured by the seller, in the purchaser's presence.—If the seller only should measure the merchandise after the sale, in the presence of the purchaser, a question has arisen, whether this be sufficient?—or, whether it be not necessary that the purchaser should also examine it by his own measure?—Some have said that the measurement of the seller only, is not sufficient, according to the class sense of the transaction, already quoted. The more approved doctrine, however, is that it is sufficient, since by the measurement of the seller the quantity is ascertained, and delivery completely established. The tradition before quoted alludes to the junction of two contracts; as where, for instance, a person having purchased, measured, and taken possession of a thing afterwards sell it to another: in which case it is necessary that the second purchaser himself measure it; and the measurement of the first purchaser, who stands in the relation of seller to him, is not sufficient, as will hereafter be more fully explained in the chapter of Sillim sales.

In the sale of articles of tale or longitudinal measurement, the telling or measuring by the second purchaser is not requisite.—It is related as an opinion of the two disciples, that articles of tale are analogous to those of longitudinal measurement; that is, if a person having purchased and received articles of this nature on condition of their amounting to a particular number, should afterwards sell them to another on the same condition, there is in that case, no obligation on that other to enumerate them on his own account, because such articles are not susceptible of usury.—It is related, also, as an opinion of Haneefa, that articles of tale are similar to those of weight, because in regard to them the receipt of any excess beyond the stipulated number is unlawful to the purchaser; articles of tale are therefore analogous to articles of weight.

A seller may dispose of the price of his goods without having taken possession of it.—Any deeds of the seller with regard to the property of merchandise, prior to the actual receipt of it, such as gift, sale, hire, unless the object out of which the price is stipulated in money or goods; because the cause of legality, namely, right of property, is established in the seller; and the act is attended with no unfairness (such as has been shown to exist in the case of selling moveable property prior to the receipt of it), because the price, if expressed in dirms and deennas, is indeterminate, and is therefore incapable of being destroyed; and if it consist of any thing else, still the sale is not invalidated by a destruction, since the value remains due from the seller.—It is otherwise with respect to the article purchased, as the sale of that before receipt of it induces fraud, as was before explained.

The parties are at liberty to make any subsequent addition or abatement, with respect either to the goods or the price; and such addition or abatement are incorporated in the contract.—It is lawful for the purchaser to make an increase of the price in favour of the seller; and for the seller to make an increase in the merchandise in favour of the purchaser; and it is also lawful for the seller to make abatement from the price in favour to the purchaser; and this increase or abatement is incorporated in the original contract (that is to say, in case of an increase, the original and additional from the price or the article; and in case of an abatement, what remains after the deduction is the price of the article). Hence, in the first case, the seller possesses a right to the original price, together with the increase superadded to it; and, in the second case, the purchaser has a right to the original merchandise with the increase superadded. Shafei and Ziffer are both of opinion that such increase is a mere act of favour, and therefore cannot be incorporated in the original sale; for, if so, it must necessarily follow that a person gives his own property in exchange for his own property. since, previous to the increase of the price, the article was the property of the purchaser in exchange for the original price; and, consequently, if the increase be made in the price, the property of the purchaser is given in exchange for what was before his property; in the same manner, also, in the second case, as the price, previous to the increase, was the property of the seller, it follows that in increasing the wares; he gives his own property in exchange for his own property. Neither can an abatement from the price, by the seller, be incorporated with the original contract; but it must rather be considered as an act of favour; because, prior to the abatement, an exchange of the merchandise for the whole of the price had taken place; and it is impossible to set aside any part of the price, since in such case it must follow that a part of the merchandise had no correspondent exchange opposed to it; and this is unlawful.

Objection.—This consequence does not follow; because the remaining sum, after the deduction of the abatement, is considered as an exchange for the whole of the merchandise.

Reply.—It is impossible to consider the remainder as an exchange for the whole, because no new contract has taken place with regard to the diminished price, and the old contract relates only to the full price.
The reasoning of our doctors is, that the buyer and seller, by means of the increase and abatement, do only alter the contract from one lawful accident to another lawful accident; and that, as the parties possess the power of annulling the contract, they are, a superiori, entitled to make an alteration in the non-essential properties of it. The case is therefore the same as if the parties should annul an optional power, or stipulate one after the conclusion of the contract.--Now, since it is lawful for the parties to alter the accident of the contract by means of increase or abatement, it follows that such increase or abatement is incorporated with the original contract; because the accident of a thing adheres to that thing, and does not exist abstractedly of itself. It is otherwise where a seller abates the whole price; for such abatement could not be incorporated with the original contract, since in that case a change would take place in regard to what is an essential property, and not an accident of the contract.--It is also to be observed, that from the increase and abatement being incorporated with the original contract, it does not necessarily follow that a person gives his own property in exchange for his own property, because the original contract does as it were related to such increase or abatement.—The advantage of the incorporation of the increase and the abatement in the original contract is evident, in a case of friendly or profitable sale: for if a person sell something by a profitable sale to a purchaser who increases the price in the seller’s favour, in that case it is lawful for him [the seller] to charge his profit on the original and the increase united, as, in case of an abatement, on the other hand, his profit must be charged on the residue after the deduction.—The advantage arising from this is also evident in a case of Shaffa: for the person possessing the right of Shaffa is entitled to the subject of the sale, in case of an abatement in exchange, or diminished price.

Objection.—Since the abatement and increase are incorporated with the original contract, it would follow that, in a case of increase: the person possessing the right of Shaffa is to take the subject of the sale at the aggregate amount of the original price, and its increase,—instead of taking it (as is the case) at the original price only.

Reply.—In case of an increase of the price, the proprietor of the right of Shaffa takes the subject of the sale at the original price only, because his right relates to the original price, and it is not in the power of the buyer and seller, by any act of theirs, to annul such right.

The price cannot be increased after the destruction of the goods in the purchaser’s hands.—Any increase of the price, after the destruction of the wares in the possession of the purchaser, is not valid (according to the Zahir-Rawayet), because of the wares not having been in a state that admitted of the lawful opposition of an exchange for them.

Objection.—It would appear that the increase of the price remains in force after the destruction of the goods; for although the goods be not then in a state to admit any exchange being opposed to them, yet the increase incorporates with the original contract, which was concluded at a time when the goods being extant, it was lawful to oppose an addition to the exchange for them.

Reply.—If the wares had remained in a condition to admit of an exchange of property for them immediately, then such exchange might have been immediately established, and referred afterwards to the period of forming the contract; for a thing is first established on the instant, and is then referred to the formation of the contract:—but as, in the present instance, the immediate exchange, of the property cannot be established, the wares no longer existing, the reference back is impossible: and hence any increase of the price is evidently invalid—it is otherwise with respect to an abatement of the price after the destruction of the wares, because these, after their destruction, are in a state which admits of a diminution of the price: which is therefore referred to the formation of the contract.

A prompt payment may be commuted for a distant payment.—If a person, having sold something on condition of prompt payment, should afterwards agree to receive the price at a future fixed period, it is lawful, because the price is solely the right of the seller; and as it is in his power, if he choose to forego it altogether, he is consequently entitled, for the convenience and ease of the purchaser, to take a future payment instead of a prompt one, a fortiori.—If the period stipulated be not certain, and the uncertainty be very great (as if he should stipulate payment when the wind blows, for instance), it is not lawful. If the period, on the contrary, be only in a small degree uncertain (as if he should stipulate the payment at the cutting of the corn, or the threshing of it), it is lawful, in the same manner as in the case of ball, of which an explanation has already been given.

In all debts except those incurred by a loan.—Every debt immediately due may be suspended, in its obligation, to a future period, by the creditor, on the principles laid down in the preceding case,—excepting a loan,* the suspension of the obligation of

* Arab, Karz; signifying a loan of money, in opposition to Areeat, which means a loan of anything but money. These deeds are considered, by Musulmans, to be of a distinct and separate nature. In the one the intention is to destroy the substance of what is borrowed, that is, to spend the identical money received, and afterwards return an equal number of similars. In the other, the intention is to enjoy the usufruct without injuring the substance, which is to be returned in its identical state.
which is not approved.—The reason of this is that the lending of money is, in the immediate act, equivalent to a loan of any other thing, and an act of benevolence (whence it is that if a person should tender a loan of money to another, expressing his intention by the word Arevat—as if he should say, "I deliver these ten dirms as an Arevat,—it is valid; and also, that no person who is incapable of any gratuitous act, such as an infant or a lunatic, is competent to this deed): but in this it operates as an exchange, since the borrower gives to the lender an equal sum, but no the identical specie he received.—In consideration, therefore, of the immediate act a respite is not binding upon the lender, as there can be no constraint in an act purely gratuitous: and, in consideration of the end, the respite is not approved, for in this case the transaction would resolve itself into a sale of money for money, which is usury.—It is otherwise in the bequest of a loan for a fixed period; for if a person bequeath the loan of one thousand dirms to another, for a year (for instance), the performance of this is incumbent on the executor; nor is he entitled to make any demand on the legatee until the expiration of the term, since this bequest is of a gratuitous nature, and resembles the bequest of the services of a slave, or the use of a house.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF RIBBA, OR USURY.

Definition of the term.—Ribba, in the language of the law, signifies an excess, according to a legal standard of measurement or weight in one of two homogeneous articles [of weight or measurement of capacity] opposed to each other in a contract of exchange, and in which such excess is stipulated as an obligatory condition on one of the parties, without any return,—that is, without anything being opposed to it. The sale, therefore, of two loads of barley (for instance) in exchange for one load of wheat does not constitute usury, since these articles are not homogeneous; and, on the other hand, the sale of ten yards of Herat cloth in exchange for five yards of Herat cloth is not usury, since, although these articles be homogeneous, still they are not estimable by weight or measurement of capacity.

Usury (occasionally by rate united with species) is unlawful.—Usury is unlawful; and (according to our doctors) is occasioned by rate, united with species.—Shafei maintains that usury takes place only in things of an esculent nature, or in money.—It is necessary, in order to the operation of the illegality, that the articles be homogeneous; but an equality in point of weight or measurement of capacity annihilates the usury.

—It is to be observed that a superiority or inferiority in the quality has no effect in the establishment of the usury; and hence it is lawful to sell a quantity of the better sort of any article in exchange for an equal quantity of an inferior sort.

It consists in the sale of an article (of weight or measurement of capacity) in exchange for an unequal quantity of the same article.—The sale, at an unequal rate, of articles of weight or measurement of capacity, in exchange for homogeneous articles, is usurious, according to our doctors, although the articles be of a description not esculent (such as loan or iron, for instance);—because they hold that the cause of usury exists, in articles of weight and measurement of capacity, although they be not of an esculent nature. Shafei maintains that such sale is lawful, agreeably to his tenets with respect to usury. Supposing, however, the equality of the rate, such sale is lawful in the opinion of all the doctors.—(It is to be observed that loan is an article of measurement by capacity, and iron of weight.)

But does not exist where the quantities are not ascertained by some known standard of measurement.—The sale of anything not measured out according to the legal standard, at an unequal rate, is lawful. Thus it is lawful to sell one handful of wheat in exchange for two handfuls: or two hanif's in exchange for four:—and also, one apple in exchange for two apples; because, in such case, the measurement not having been made according to a legal standard, it follows that a superiority of measurement (which is essential to the establishment of usury) has not according to the rules of measurement, taken place. Shafei maintains that such sale is unlawful; because the article is, in this instance, of an esculent nature, which (according to his tenets) is the efficient cause of usury; and also because the equality destructive of usury does not here exist. (It is to be observed that whatever is less than half of a Saa is considered equivalent to an handful, since the law has fixed no standard of measure beneath that quantity.)

It is occasioned either by an inequality in point of quantity, or by a suspension of repayment; unless the consideration and the return be heterogeneous.—Where the quality of being weighable or measurable by capacity, and correspondence of species (being the cause of usury) both exist, the stipulation of inequality, or of a suspension of payment to a future period, are both usurious. Thus it is nusurious to sell either one measure phrase here used implies an inequality of rate with a similarity of species.

of wheat in exchange for two measures,—or one measure of wheat for one measure deliverable at a future period. If, on the contrary, neither of these circumstances exist (as in the sale of wheat for money), it is lawful either to stipulate a superiority of rate, or the payment at a future period. If, on the other hand, one of these circumstances only (as in the sale of wheat for barley, or the sale of one slave for another), then a superiority in the rate may legally be stipulated, but not a suspension in the payment. Thus one measure of wheat may lawfully be sold for two measures of barley, or one slave for two slaves: but it is not lawful to sell one measure of wheat for one measure of barley payable at a future period: nor one slave for another, deliverable at a future period. Shafei is of opinion that correspondence of species alone does not render illegal a suspension of delivery; because where, in an exchange, the prompt delivery is demanded to future delivery, there is only a semblance of a superiority of rate founded on the preference given to prompt payment. Now if a superiority of rate, in reality, be not preventive of the legality of the sale (as in the case of one slave for two slaves), it follows that the semblance only of a superiority is not preventive of such legality, a fortiori. The arguments of our doctors are, that wherever either correspondence of species, or the quality of being weighable or measurable exists, the wares are, in one shape, of that description in which usury takes place; and accordingly, a semblance of usury takes place in them, which is repugnant to the legality of the sale in the same manner as actual usury. The ground of this is what is written in the Hadees Shireef, that "articles of different species may be sold in any manner the parties please, provided the bargain be from hand to hand."

Objection.—Since correspondence of species, or the quality of being weighable or measurable does either of them singly prevent the legality of a suspension of delivery, it would follow that a contract of Sillim sale stipulating an exchange of saffron for dirms or deenars, is invalid, as both are articles of weight:—whereas such a sale is valid.

Reply.—The contract is lawful, notwithstanding saffron and deenars be both articles of weight, because they do not agree in the quality of the weight, as saffron is weighed by Mans, and being a subject of sale only, is therefore definite by specification; whereas dirms and deenars are weighed by stones, being only price and not a subject of sale; and therefore do not become definite by specification. In the same manner, also, if a person sold salpvin saffron to another for one hundred dirms, ready money, that other may lawfully employ the said dirms either in purchase or in any other mode without reweighing them:—whereas if a person sell saffron, on condition of its being two Mans, the purchaser is not afterwards at liberty to dispose of it by sale or by any other mode without reweighing it; as holds with respect to all articles of weight or measurement of capacity. Now it being thus demonstrated that the weight of saffron and other articles is different from the weight of dirms and deenars in appearance, substance, and effect it follows that they do not unite in any circumstance with respect to the quality of the weight; and consequently, that the semblance of usury, in this case, is only an apprehension of a semblance, which is not regarded.

All articles ordained by the Prophet to be articles of measurement, continue so, notwithstanding any alterations of custom:—and the same of all ordained by him to be articles of weight.—Every thing in which the usuriousness of an excess has been established by the Prophet on the ground of measurement of capacity (such as wheat, barley, dates, and salt), is for ever to be considered as of that nature, although mankind should forsake this mode of estimation;—and in the same manner, everything in which the usuriousness of the excess has been established by the Prophet on the ground of weight, continues for ever to be considered as an article of weight, like gold or silver; because the custom of mankind, which regulates the mode of measurement, is of inferior force to the declaration of the Prophet; and a superior cannot yield to an inferior. (Aboo Yrosa is of opinion that in all things practice or custom ought to prevail, although in opposition to the ordinance of the Prophet; for the ordinance of the Prophet was founded on usage and practice, of his own time:—in ordinances, therefore the prevalent customs among mankind are to be regarded; and as these are liable to alter, they must be attended to, rather than the letter of an ordinance) If, therefore, a person should sell wheat in exchange for an equal quantity, by weight, or gold in exchange for an equal quantity, by a measurement of capacity, neither of these sales would be lawful (according to Hancefa and Mohammad), although these modes of weighing wheat and measuring gold should become sanctified by the custom of mankind.

All articles referred to any known standard of weight are considered as articles of weight.—Whatever is referred to Rates is considered as an article of weight. This the compiler of the He'daya explains to mean that whatever is sold by the Awkiyat must be considered as an article of weight; for an Awkiyat is a fixed standard of weight in opposition to all other measures of capacity, as none else are standards of weight. Now as everything so sold by the Awkiyat comes under the description of an article of weight, it follows that if this thing be sold by the measurement of any other vessel not of a fixed standard of weight, opposed to a similar vessel, such sale is unlawful, because of the probability of a disparity of weight, notwithstanding the equality in point of measurement of capacity: for this, in fact, is the same as if one person should sell one article of weight in exchange for another of the same kind and adjust the quantity by compact.

Note concerning Sīrf sale.—It is to be observed that a Sīrf sale means the sale of price in exchange for price: and price implies dirms and deenars. In this mode of sale it is a necessary condition that the interchange of properties take place at the meeting, because the Prophet has or a ned the sale of silver in exchange for silver, from hand to hand,—as shall be explained at large in treating of Sīllim sale: but in every other article, provided it be of that kind in which usury takes place (such as wheat in exchange for wheat), in the instance the usufruct of the usury upon the object is not a condition, it being only required that the article be specific. Shafī’ maintains that in the sale of wheat for wheat mutual seisin is a condition, because of the ordinance of the Prophet, “Sell it from hand to hand;” and also because, if one party should make seisin, and the other, it follows that an appearance of usury takes place inasmuch as prompt payment is superior to future payment. Our doctors are of the opinion that wheat, as being a determinate subject of sale, does not, like cloth, stand in need of seisin, since the object of the contract is the attainment of a power over the article, which is fully established by its being determinate. It is otherwise with respect to Sīrf sales, for there the seisin is made a condition in order that the price and subject of the sale may be rendered determinate, which is only to be effected by means of seisin. With respect to the ordinance of the Prophet, enjoining the sale from hand to hand, Obadah Bin Samat has explained it to mean the sale of one determinate thing in exchange for another. Besides, on the postponement of the seisin, no loss is reckoned to result, in the opinion of mankind:—contrary to where a prompt and future payment is stipulated; because the latter in the opinion of mankind is a detriment.

Similar may be sold for each other, without inducing usury.—The sale of one egg in exchange for two eggs, from hand to hand, is lawful; and the same with respect to dates and walnuts; because these articles are neither subject to measurement of capacity or weight, with regard to which only usury relates. Shafī’, in this case, differs from our doctors; because usury, according to his opinion, relates to articles of an esculent nature. But what are these are.

Usury cannot take place with respect to Faloos, as they are articles of sale.—The sale of one specific Faloos, is valid, according to Haneefaa. Muhammad maintains it to be unlawful; because, as the fitness to constitute price is established in Faloos, with the consent of mankind, it cannot be annulled by any agreement of a seller and purchaser counter thereto, and as the fitness to constitute price still continues the Faloos cannot be rendered determinate by means of a stipulation to that effect in the contract. The case, therefore, becomes the same as if a person should sell one underminate Faloos in exchange for two underminate.—or, as if a person should sell one dirm in exchange for two. The reasoning of the two disciples is that this fitness to constitute price in Faloos cannot subsist with relation to a buyer and seller, unless by their mutual agreement to that effect: and, consequently, where they agree to the contrary, the fitness to represent price, with respect to them, null; nor can the general consent of others, to admit Faloos as a representative determinate instrument with respect to them, since in that matter others have no power over them. Hence it follows that, as the fitness to constitute price is, with respect to them, null, the Faloos may be identified by their specification.

Objection.—Upon the fitness to constitute price being done away by the agreement of the parties, the Faloos will of consequence revert to their primary nature, namely, weight (for the Faloos was originally a weight).—It would therefore follow that the sale of one Faloos for two Fakoos is not valid although the fitness to constitute price be done away by the agreement of the contracting parties.

Reply.—The Faloos do not revert to their original nature, because, by the agreement of mankind, they are considered as articles of tale, and this agreement remains in force. Hence they stand in the same predicament as walnuts or other articles of tale, and the unequal sale of them is of consequence in the same manner lawful.—It is otherwise with respect to dirms and deenars, because these naturally constitute price. It is also otherwise with respect to the sale of one undeterminate Faloos in exchange for two undeterminate Faloos; for this is, in fact, a stipulation of future payment and future delivery, a species of sale which has been forbidden by the Prophet.—It is also otherwise where the stipulation of one of the parties relates to undeterminate Faloos, for this is equivalent to a postponement of payment, and such postponement is rendered unlawful by homogeneity alone.

Flour of meal cannot be sold for wheat.—The sale of wheat in exchange for the flour or meal of wheat is unlawful, because wheat, and the meal and flour of it, are all of one

*That is to say, copper coins are not to be considered as price but by a previous agreement of the parties.
species.—It is impossible, moreover, to ascertain the equality between those articles by measurement, since flour and meal are of a close and compact nature, and what is not.
Hence this kind of sale is essentially invalid, even in the exchange of one measure of the one for one measure of the other.

Flour may be sold for flour.—The sale of flour in exchange for flour is valid, provided the quantities be equal by measurement, because the condition of legality (namely, equality) is here established.

But not for meal.—The sale of flour in exchange for meal* is not valid, according to Haneefa, in any mode; neither at an equal, nor at an unequal rate; for as it is not lawful to sell flour in exchange for parched wheat, or meal in exchange for raw wheat, so also it is not lawful to sell either of those articles for the other, because of their homogeneity.—According to the two disciples the sale in question is lawful; because flour and meal are of different species, inasmuch as the object to be derived from each is different; for the object of flour is bread, and that of meal is a culinary preparation, mixed up with water or oil.—But the answer to this is that the original object of both is the same, namely, food; which is not affected in its nature by the modification of it, since raw wheat and parched wheat are considered as of the same species, and likewise wheat affected by vermin and wheat that is whole and preserved,—although, in answering particular objects, these kinds be different.

The sale of flesh for a living animal is not usurious.—The sale of flesh in exchange for a living animal is lawful, according to Haneeafa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed is of opinion that the sale of flesh in exchange for a living animal of the same species is unlawful, unless the quantity of the dead flesh exceed that of the living flesh, in order that the excess may be opposed in exchange for the other parts of the living animal, independent of flesh; and the remaining part of the slain flesh remain opposed in an equal degree to the living flesh; because otherwise usury must necessarily take place, since, if the quantities of flesh were exactly equal, it must necessarily follow that the other parts of the living animal had no exchange opposed to them;—or if, the quantities of flesh being equal, a deduction be made from the dead flesh, in opposition to the other parts of the living animal, it would necessarily create an inequality in the exchange of flesh for flesh.
The sale in question, therefore, resembles a sale of sesame seed in exchange for sesame of, which is unlawful. The arguments of the two disciples in support of their opinion is, that the case in question is in fact the sale of an article of weight for what is not an article of weight; since it is not customary to weigh living animals, it being indeed impracticable to ascertain their weight
as they are not at all times of equal weight, an animal being lighter when hungry, and heavier, when filled with food.—It is otherwise with oil-seeds, as by weighing those only at once be ascertained the quantity of oil contained in them when separated from the drags or refuse.

Nor the sale of fresh dates for dried dates.
—The sale of fresh dates in exchange for dried ones is lawful, according to Haneefa.
The two disciples hold a different opinion,
because of a tradition, in which it is mentioned that a person having interrogated the Prophet regarding the legality of such sale,
the Prophet, in return, desired to know whether fresh dates did not diminish in drying?—and upon that person answering in the affirmative, he declared that, such being the case, the sale of fresh dates in exchange for dry ones was not lawful. The arguments of Haneefa in support of his opinion are twofold:—First, the word Tam-mir, expressive of dry dates, is also applicable to fresh dates, because there is a tradition that a person brought some fresh dates from Kheebir to the Prophet, who, on their being presented to him, inquired if all the Tammir of Kheebir were of that kind? and as fresh and dry dates are from this circumstance held to be of the same kind, it follows that the sale of the one in exchange for the other, on condition of an equality of rate, is lawful, since the Prophet has said, "Sell Tammirs in exchange for Tammirs, at an equal rate"—Secondly, if it be not admitted that fresh dates fall under the appellation of Tammir, still the sale is lawful, because of another saying of the Prophet,
"When two things are of different species,
then let them be sold in whatever manner
the parties please." In regard to the saying quoted by the two disciples, it rests entirely on the authority of Zeyd Ibn Abbas, which is considered weak among the traditionists.
It is to be observed that the same agreement subsists with respect to the sale of dried and fresh grapes, founded on the same arguments as those already cited. Some have asserted that the sale of dried grapes in exchange for fresh is unlawful, according to all our doctors, grounding this assertion on the analogy which subsists between this case and that of parched and raw wheat, the sale of which in exchange for each other is universally declared to be invalid.

The sale of fresh dates in exchange for fresh dates, at an equal rate in point of measurement of capacity, is lawful, in the opinion of all our doctors.*

—The remainder of this case, which is of considerable length, as well as the complete succeeding case, has been omitted in the translation, because the disputations contained in them are founded entirely on verbal criticisms, which do not admit of an intelligible translation.

*Arab. Saveek. A sort of coarse meal prepared either from wheat or barley.—Also,
what remains after sifting off the fine flour,
The sale of the manufactured produce of an article in exchange for a similar article, is usurious, unless it exceed that article in quantity.—The sale of olives in exchange for oil of olives is unlawful, excepting when the actual oil is greater in quantity than the oil contained within the olives, in which case the excess being opposed to the dregs that will necessarily remain after the expression of the oil prevents the establishment of usury. The law is the same with respect to the sale of walnuts for the oil of walnuts, of sesame seeds for the oil of sesame, of milk for butter, or of the juice of the grape or dates in exchange for grapes or dates. With respect to the sale of cotton in exchange for the thread of it there is a difference of opinion. The sale of cotton, however, in exchange for calico is universally allowed to be legal.

One species of flesh may be sold for another species. It is lawful to sell one species of flesh, in any manner, in exchange for another species of flesh, (such as the flesh of a cow for that of a camel or a goat). It is to be observed that the flesh of a cow and of a buffalo are of the same species, as is also the flesh of a sheep and that of a goat.

The sale of the milk of one animal for an unequal quantity of milk of another species of animal does not induce usury. The milk of a cow and of a goat are of different kinds, and may therefore be lawfully sold in exchange for other equal rates. It is related, as an opinion of Shafei, that these are of the same kind, because the object to be derived from each is the same. But our doctors argue that the flesh of these animals is evidently of a different kind, since it would not be lawful for a person, on whom the gift of a cow in alms was enjoined, to substitute a goat in lieu of a cow if it prove defective; the milk of these animals, therefore, differs in point of species in the same manner as their flesh. It is to be observed that the vinegar of dates is of a different kind from the vinegar of grapes, because of the difference of their orings. So also, the wool of a sheep is of a different kind from that of a goat, because they answer different objects.

Bread may be sold for flour at an unequal rate. It is lawful to sell bread made of wheat in exchange for wheat, or the flour of wheat, at an unequal weight, because bread is considered either as an article of tale or of weight, and consequently is of a different kind from wheat or flour, which are subject to measurement of capacity. It is related as an opinion of Haneefa, that such sale is utterly invalid; but decrees pass according to the first adjudication, and this, whether the delivery of either the wheat or the bread be stipulated to take place at a future period. According to Haneefa the borrowing of bread is utterly unlawful—that is whether it be considered as an article of tale or weight—because there is great difference with respect to cakes of bread; either in respect to themselves, or the workmanship of the baker. According to Mohammed it is absolutely legal; that is, whether the bread be considered as an article of tale or weight. According to Aboo Yooaf it is lawful, if considered as an article of weight; but not if considered as an article of tale, because of the difference of the unities.

Usury cannot take place between a master and his slave. —Usury cannot take place between a master and his slave, because whatever is in the possession of the slave is the property of the master, so that no sale can possibly take place between them, and hence the impossibility of usury.

Unless the slave be an insolvent Mazoon. —This proceeds upon a supposition of the slave being privileged and free from debt; for in the case of a privileged slave who is insolvent, usury may take place between him and his master, according to Haneefa, because (agreeably to his tenets) the possessions of such slave do not belong to the master; and according to the two disciples, because although (agreeably to their tenets) the possessions of such slave be the property of his master, still as the claims of the creditors are connected with them, the slave stands in the same relation to his master as a stranger, and consequently usury may exist in their dealings.

Nor between a Mussulman and infidel in a hostile country. —Usury cannot take place between a Mussulman and an infidel in a hostile country. —This is contrary to the opinion of Aboo Yooaf and Shafei, who conceive an analogy between the case in question and that of a protected alien within the Mussulman territory. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has said, 'There is no usury between a Mussulman and an infidel, in a foreign land.' Secondly, the property of an infidel being free to the Mussulmans, it follows that it is lawful to take it by whatever mode may be possible, provided there be no deceit used.

It may take place between a protected alien and a Mussulman. —It is otherwise with respect to a protected alien, as his property is not of a neutral nature, but sacred, because of the protection that has been afforded to him.

CHAPTER IX.

Of Rights and Appendix.

Definition of rights and appendages, as connected with sale. —The rights of a sale are things essentially necessary to the use of the subject of the sale, such as, in the purchase of a house, the right of passing through the road that leads to it; or, in the purchase of a well, the right of drawing water from it. Appendages imply things from which an advantage is derived, but in a subordinate degree, such as cook-room, or a drain.

Difference of rights in a purchase, with respect to a Manzil, a Dar, and a Bait.—If a person purchase a Manzil above which there is another Manzil, he is not entitled to the upper Manzil, unless he have stipulated the purchase of the Manzil “with all its rights, and all its appendages,” —or “with everything great and small upon it, in it, or of it.”—If, on the other hand, a person purchase a Bait above which there is another Bait, with a stipulation of all its rights, still he is not entitled to the upper Bait. But if a person purchase a Dar (that is, a serial) with its enclosure, he is entitled to the upper storeys and the offices; because the term Dar signifies a place comprehend within an enclosure, which is considered as the original subject, and of which the upper storey is a dependant part. Bait, on the contrary, simply signifies any place of residence; and as the upper storey of a house is of this nature as well as the under, it cannot be included in the purchase of a Bait, unless by an express specification, since a thing cannot be a dependant of its fellow. A Manzil, on the other hand, is a mean;—that is, it is greater than a Bait, and smaller than a Dar:—for although it comprehends everything necessary to a dwelling-place, still it is deficient in having no place for cattle: a Manzil, therefore, is in one respect a Bait, and in another another, similar to a Bait; and hence, from its similarity to a Dar, the upper house is included in virtue of its being a subordinant part, whenever a specification of the rights is made; and, from its similarity to a Bait, the upper house is not included in the sale, unless a specification of the rights be made.

Some have said that, in the practice of the present age, the upper house is necessarily included in all the above cases; because a Bait (which means a house in the Persian language) does necessarily include the upper storey.

A porch over a road, connected with a house, is not included in the sale of it, unless it be expressly specified.—A porch over a road, of which the beams in one end are laid upon a Dar [or house] which is the subject of a sale, and in the other end upon the opposite house, or upon a pillar, is not included in the sale of the house, unless a specification of rights be made in the sale: because the porch covering the road is held to be of the same nature as a road.—The two disciples have observed that if the said porch should form the entrance into the house, it is then virtually treated in the deed, as a veranda.

The avenue is not included in the purchase of an apartment of a house—nor wells or drains in the purchase of lands, unless the appendages be expressed in the contract.—If a person purchase a room [Bait] in the house [Dar] or dwelling-place [Manzil], he is not entitled to the use of the road, unless he have stipulated the rights and appendages, or the great and small belonging to it.—In the same manner, in the sale of land, a well or drain is not included, unless by a specification of the rights or appendages; because they are not considered as a part of the ground: but as a dependant on it.—It is otherwise with respect to a lease, for that virtually includes the well and road without any specification, because the object of a lease is an usufrucht, which is not, to be obtained but by the use of the road and well; and it is not a custom amongst farmers to rent a road or a well. But the object of a sale may be answered without the necessity of including the road or well, since it is customary, amongst purchasers, to sell and trade with the subjects of their purchase, and to dispose of them into the hands of another; whence an advantage is derived from the transaction, without the road or other appendage being included.

CHAPTER X

OF CLAIM OF RIGHT (REFERRED BY OTHERS TO THE SUBJECT OF : SALE)

A female slave claimed after having produced a child whilst in the purchaser’s possession, is, together with her child, the property of the claimant, provided the claim be established by evidence;—but if the claim be supported by the purchaser’s acknowledgment only the child is not his property.—If a female slave, being sold, bring forth a child whilst in the purchaser’s possession, and another person afterwards establish, by witnesses, that she was originally his property, and had not belonged to the seller such person is entitled to the female slave, and also to the child.—If, however, the proof be established by the acknowledgment of the purchaser, the claimant is in this case entitled to the female only, unless he also specifically include the child in the claim, which case the acknowledgment of the purchaser entitles him to both. The distinction between a case of evidence and a case of acknowledgment is, that testimony is absolute proof; being adapted for the elucidation of the fact. By evidence, therefore, it is manifested that the slave belonged to the claimant ab initio, that is to say, from a time prior to the purchase of her; and as, at that period, the child was a dependant part of her (since it had not issued from the womb), it follows that the claimant has a right to it as well as the mother.—Acknowledgment, on the contrary, is defective proof, since it establishes the right of property of the thing claimed in the claimant, purely from the necessity of verifying acknowledgment: because an acknowledgment is a declaration; and if the establishment of the right of property did not in any degree take place, the declaration must of course be false.—Now this consequence may be prevented by the establishment of the right of property at the time of the acknowledgment; and the child, at that period, not being a dependant part as having issued from the womb, is therefore not included in the property of the claimant. Sometimes, it is said that, in case of the establishment by testimony, when the Kazee issues his decree for the claimant to take the slave, the child, from its dependance, is virtually included; and that there is no necessity for a specification of it in the decree.—Others, again, have said that the specification of the child is an absolutely necessary condition, of which the adjudication in several analogous cases is a clear proof. Thus Mohammed has declared that where the Kazee decrees the original to any person, without having any subordinate parts are not comprehended in the decree. Where, also, in a case of a claim of right to a female slave, purchased by another, the Kazee decrees the slave to the claimant, and it so happens that the child she has brought forth is in the hands of some other person than the purchaser, such child is not comprehended in the decree.

A person selling another as a slave, who afterwards proves to be free, must restore the purchase-money:—or if the alleged slave have excited the purchaser to the bargain, he must restore it in defect of the seller. If a person purchase a slave, and the slave afterwards prove by witnesses that he is free notwithstanding that, at the time of concluding the contract, he had said to the purchaser, "purchase me, for I am a slave," and the seller be present, or absent at a place that is known, the purchaser is entitled to recover the price from him; but if the seller be absent, and the place of his sojournment unknown, the purchaser is in that case entitled to take the price from the slave, who is to recover the same from the seller whenever it may be in his power.—If on the contrary a person accept of a slave in town, on the ground of the slave saying to him, "accept of me in pawn, for I am a slave," and it afterwards appear that he is free, the pawnee is not in that case at liberty to take payment from the slave of the sum due to him, whether the pawnee be absent or present but must at all events seek it from the pawner, Aboo Yoosaf holds that the same rule also obtains in the case of sale.—that is, that the purchaser has no right, under any circumstances, to an indemnification from the slave, because he has no right to take the price from any but the seller, or his security, and the slave is neither of him, but merely a liar, which does not superinduce responsibility.—The argument of the two disciples is that, in the case in question, the purchaser engaged in the contract on the sole ground of confiding in the slave's declaration, "purchase me, for I am a slave;" and hence it follows, that where a slave has been guilty of a deceit, he is liable for the price, in case the recovery from the seller be impracticable, in order that the injury occasioned by his deceit may be removed from the purchaser. The recovery from the seller, however, is impracticable only in case of his being absent at a place which is not known.

As, moreover, sale is a contract of exchange, it is possible to render the director of it responsible for the consideration (namely, the price), when the subject is lost or destroyed to the purchaser, this being what a contract of sale requires. It is otherwise with respect to pawn, as that is not a contract of exchange, but merely a contract of security for the receipt of the substance of the pawnee's right; for which reason it is lawful to give a pawn as security for the price, in a Sirk sale, or for the goods, in a Sillim sale, although an exchange with respect to either of these be unlawful;—in other words, if a pledge should be destroyed whilst in the possession of the pawnee, the pawnee is in that case held to have received the substance of his right;—whereas, if a contract of pawn were in the nature of a contract of exchange. It would follow that in these cases an exchange for the price in a Sirk sale, or for the goods in a Sillim sale, had been made previous to the seisin and this is unlawful. The person, therefore, who directs others to enter into a contract of pawn cannot be rendered responsible for the debts to which the pawn is opposed. Analogous to this is a case where the master of a slave says to merchants, "trade with this slave of mine, for I have privileged him to trade;" and the merchants having traded with him accordingly, it becomes afterwards known that the said slave is the property of another; for in this case the creditors have a right to receive payment of their debts from the master.—It is to be observed that the difficulty, in this case, arises from the tenets of Haneef, for, according to him, a claim is a necessary condition for the establishment of freedom. Where the slave is out of the question, since, if the slave, after the acknowledgment of his slavery, should assert a claim to his freedom, he would be guilty of prevarication; and prevarication is destructive of the validity of a claim. It is therefore impossible that after his own declaration, his freedom should be made apparent; and hence the statement of this case, according to the tenets of Haneef, is erroneous.—But, in reply to this objection, some have observed that the proper statement of this case is,—that a person purchases a slave at a time when the slave himself said, "I am a slave;" and if afterwards appears that the person so purchased was originally free; for this statement is strictly agreeable to the tenets of Haneef, since (according to him) the claim of freedom is required as a condition only in the case of a freedman, and not in that of a person originally free—Others again maintain that the claim of freedom, in this statement of the case also is a necessary condition; and that the prevarication so occasioned is not destructive of the validity of the claim; for generation is a concealed circumstance; and the person not knowing that his mother was free at the time of his generation, he on that account declared himself not a slave; but afterwards, assuming a knowledge of his mother’s freedom at that period, he therefore claims his freedom — If it be thus stated that, a person having purchased a slave, it afterwards appears that the person so purchased was free, as having been emancipated by his master such statement is correct, as it does not involve prevarication, since the master is empowered to emancipate his slave.—This case is therefore, in fact, the same as if a woman should purchase her divorce from her husband, and should afterwards establish, by witnesses, that previous to such bargain, he had divorced her three times; or as if a Mokatib should establish, by witnesses, that previous to the contract of Kitabat his master had emancipated him;—for in both these cases the claim and the evidences are admitted, notwithstanding the prevarication: and so also in the preceding case. The ground of this is that the master being competent to emancipate his slave, he may have done it during his absence, and the slave may afterwards have preferred his claim immediately on its coming to his knowledge; and either to obtain the prevarication it is not held to be destructive.

Case of claim to an immovable property after a composition with respect to it.—If a person claim a right in a house, in an indefinite manner and then compound his claim with the possessor of the house for an hundred dirms, and a third person afterwards prove a right to the whole of the house excepting the quantity of a cubit, for instance, in that case the possessor of the house has no right to any restitution from the person with whom he entered into the composition; because that person, having before made an indefinite claim without showing the extent of it, may now lawfully declare it to have been the quantity excepted by third person.—If, on the other hand, a person, having claimed the whole of a house, should then compound with the possessor for an hundred dirms, and another person should afterwards lay claim to part of the house, in that case the possessor of the house is entitled to a restitution of a part of the sum he had paid in composition, proportionate to the amount of the second claim. It is to be observed that a composition of an undefined right for defined property is lawful, because the annulment of an undefined right cannot occasion contention.

Section

Of Fazoolee Beea, or the Sale of the Property of another without his Consent.

A sale contracted without authority may be dissolved by the proprietor of the subject.—If a person sell the property of another without his order, the contract is complete, but it remains with the proprietor either to confirm or dissolve the sale as he pleases. Shafei is of opinion that the contract, in this case, is not complete; because it has not been concluded by a person to whom authority; for that is constituted only by property or permission, neither of which exist in this case. The arguments of our doctors are, that such a sale is a transaction of transfer, performed by a competent person with respect to a fit subject; it is therefore indispensable that the contract be regarded as complete; for, besides that there is no injury in this to the proprietor (as he has the power of dissolving it), it is attended with a great advantage to him, inasmuch as it frees him from the trouble of seeking for a purchaser, settling the price with him, and other matter. Moreover, it is attended with no impediment to the seller, whose word it preserves sacred, and to the purchaser, to whom it confirms a bargain, with which, as having voluntarily concluded it, he may be supposed to be pleased. In order, therefore, to obtain these advantages, a legal power is established in the seller of another’s property, more especially as the consent of that other has been given by implication, since a wise man naturally assocts to a deed attended with advantage to himself. It is to be observed that if requisite that the proprietor give his consent on the condition of sale, and the buyer and seller being extant, because, as his assent is a deed relative to the contract; it is necessary, of consequence, when he gives it that the contract be in existence; and the existence of the contract depends on the existence of the parties, and of the subject of the sale.

If assented to, the price is the property of the proprietor, and a deposit with the Fazoolee seller. When the proprietor of an article, in a Fazoolee sale, gives his assent to it, the price becomes his property, and remains in the hands of the Fazoolee seller as a deposit, in the same manner as if he had been an agent for sale; because the assent is equivalent to a previous appointment of agency.

Who is at liberty to dissolve the contract without his concurrence. It is in the power of the Fazoolee, or person who sells the property of another without authority to dissolve the contract without having obtained the consent of the proprietor. It is otherwise in the case of a marriage contracted by a Fazoolee, as that cannot be dissolved without the consent of the person on whose account he concluded it. It is to be observed that the existence of the parties, and of the subject of the sale, is sufficient towards the consent of the proprietor only in case of the price being in money; for, if it be stipulated in goods, then the existence of the price also is a necessary condition. In this case, however the consent of the proprietor is not an assent to the contract of sale (because the sale is, in this instance, a sort of purchase and a Fazoolee purchase does not rest upon the assent of the person on whose account the Fazoolee made the purchase, inasmuch as the purchase is considered in law to have been made for himself), but merely an assent to the Fazoolee purchaser making over the property he has agreed to give in return for the property which has been constituted the purchase. This price, therefore, consisting of goods, becomes the property of the Fazoolee, who remains responsible for the subject of the sale, payable in a similar, if it be of a nature that admits of similar,—or, if otherwise, for the value of it.

If the proprietor should die, then the consent of the heirs is of no efficacy in the confirmation of the Fazoolee sale, in either case; that is, whether the price have been stipulated in money or in goods; because the contract rested entirely on the personal assent of the deceased.

If the proprietor die, and the subject be not specified, the sale is invalid.—If a person, having given his assent to a Fazoolee sale, should afterwards die, and it be not known whether the subject of the sale was extant or not when he gave his assent, in that case (according to one opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, which has been adopted by Mohammed), the sale is valid, because of the probability of the existence of the subject of the sale at the period of assent. Aboo Yoosaf, however, afterwards receded from this opinion, and declared this sale to be unlawful, because of the doubt with regard to the existence of the subject of the sale, which in his opinion is destructive of its legality.

The emancipation, by the original proprietor, of a slave usurped and sold by the usurper, is valid.—If a person usurp a slave, and sell him to another and, that other having emancipated him the original proprietor afterwards confirm the sale, in this case the emancipation, according to Haneefa and Yoosaf, is valid, upon a favourable construction. Mohammed maintains that it is not valid, since an emancipation cannot be made except with relation to property, in conformity with a tradition of the Prophet to that effect; and the purchaser was not proprietor of the slave at the time of the emancipation, because the validity of the sale then rested on the assent of the proprietor; and a suspended sale does not endow with a right of property. Where, moreover, the right of property is confirmed by the master's assent to the sale, it becomes confirmed, first in the usurper and then in the emancipator, by a retrospect and devolution; and a right of property thus confirmed is established in one shape but not in another shape; and emancipation is not valid except where the right of property exists in every shape; in conformity with the tradition above cited. Upon this principle it is that emancipation is not lawful where a person, having usurped a slave, gives him his liberty and afterwards makes a retribution to the proprietor;—or, where a person, having purchased a slave, allowing an option to the seller, emancipates him, and afterwards receives from the seller a confirmation of the sale. On the same principle also the sale is unlawful, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, sells him again to another, and the proprietor afterwards confirms the sale of the usurper;—and emancipation is likewise invalid, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, gives him his liberty, and the usurper afterwards makes a retribution to the proprietor. The argument of the two Elders is that, in the case in question, a suspended right of property is established in the purchaser in virtue of an absolute deed instituted for the purpose of enjoyment of property, namely an absolute sale without any stipulation of option; and as, in the establishment of this right of property, no injury results to any one, it follows that the emancipation of the purchaser (which rests upon his right of property), is also established in suspense, in the same manner as the right of property. When, therefore, in virtue of the assent of the proprietor, the right of property operates, it follows that the suspended emancipation also operates;—in the same manner as where a person purchases a slave in pawn from the pawner, and afterwards emancipates him,—in which case the emancipation remains suspended in its operation, as well as the right of property, which, in the meantime, is declared null. If the pawner, however, does not redeem the slave, he is considered as a slave, because the purchaser becomes owner of the slave, even though he has not the right of property. If he be redeemed, the pawner is entitled to the slave;—or, as where an heir emancipates a slave belonging to the deceased, at a time when the estate was encumbered with debt,—in which case the emancipation remains suspended in its operation until the debts be liquidated when it immediately takes place. It is otherwise where an usurper, having emancipated the slave he had usurped; afterwards makes a composition with the proprietor; because usurpation does not entitle to the enjoyment of property; and, where the possession of a slave, under a sale stipulating a condition of option to the seller, emancipates the said slave; because in that case the sale is not absolute, and the existence of the option is preventive of the operation of the right of property in the purchaser:—or, lastly, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, sells him to another, and afterwards the original proprietor gives his assent to the sale of the usurper; because in virtue of the assent of the proprietor the right of property vests in the purchaser, upon such assent being signified but not before; the right of property, moreover, of the second purchaser was suspended; and consequently, as the right of property vests in the first purchaser now (and not before), it necessarily follows that such suspended right of property becomes null.

The fine incurred for maiming a slave sold under a usurpation goes to the purchaser, if the former proprietor assent to such sale.—
If a person purchase a slave from one who had usurped him, and the slave be maimed by any person while in the possession of the purchaser, and he [the purchaser] exact the fine of trespass from the maimer, and the original proprietor then give his assent to the sale,—in this case the fine is the property of the purchaser; because the slave is in such case considered as the property of the purchaser, from the period of the purchase, whence it is evident that he was so at the time of the maiming and this is an argument against the doctrine of Mohammed, exhibited in the preceding case, since as the fine is, in this instance, the right of the purchaser solely in virtue of the establishment of right of property in him from the period of the purchase, it follows that the emancipation of the purchaser would be valid for the same reason. The reply of Mohammed to this is, that a right of property established in one shape only (that is, in an incomplete manner) is sufficiently to entitle to a fine, but not to the performance of emancipation, which requires that the right of property be perfect and complete. It is to be observed that although the fine, in this case, be the right of the purchaser, still if it exceed the half of the price, it is requisite that he bestow the excess in charity; because the fine for the destruction of the limb cannot exceed half the price, as the fine of trespass for maiming a freeman is one half of the fine of blood, and consequently, the fine for maiming a slave is one half of his value. Now nothing can be included in the responsibility beyond what may be opposed to the price, and implicat in it. Any excess, therefore, over half the price, is an acquisition to which the proprietor is not entitled, or to which his claim is doubtful, and is therefore not perfectly lawful to him.

The resale of a slave purchased from a usurper is rendered invalid by the proprietor signing his assent to the first sale; but if the slave perish in the interim the assent is of no account. If a person purchase an unmaimed slave, and sell him to another, and the proprietor afterwards give his assent to the first sale, in that case the second sale is invalid; because the right of property then established in the first purchaser destroys the suspended right of property of the second purchaser, as has been already explained; and also, because there is an unfairness in it, since it is possible that the proprietor may not give his assent to the sale. But if, after the sale of the slave by the purchaser, he should then either die or be killed, and the proprietor afterwards give his assent to the sale, such assent is not valid; because the existence of the subject of the sale is requisite to the assent, and that no longer exists in either instance.

Objection —The reason here alleged is a valid one where the slave dies a natural death; but it is not so where he is slain, because in that case the slave, in virtue of the existence of the amercement, is considered, as it were, to be himself in existence,—for if a slave, having been sold by a valid contract, should afterwards be murdered whilst in the possession of the seller, still the sale is not null, since the consideration for the subject of the sale (namely the amercement) is extant,—whereas, if he die a natural death in the hands of the seller, the sale is null. It would therefore appear that the assent in case of the murder of the slave, is of no effect.

Reply.—In the case in question it is not possible to consider the fine as the right of the purchaser, since not having been the proprietor of the slave at the period of the murder, he can have no right to the amercement, nor can the slave, in virtue of the existence of the amercement, be considered as extant with respect to him. The slave, therefore, is not extant with relation to him, either actually or virtually. It is otherwise in the case of a valid sale, because that the purchaser had acquired a right of property to the slave which may be transferred to the consideration for him; and consequently the sale may be considered as extant with respect to him.

An article purchased through the medium of an unauthorized person cannot be returned to the proprietor, although the purchaser prove the want of authority, or the proprietor's assent to the sale;—but if the seller avow his not being authorized, the sale is null. If a person sell a slave, the property of another, and the purchaser establish by witnesses that the seller had acknowledged that he had sold him without the assent of the proprietor,—or, that the proprietor had declared that he had not given his assent to the sale and the purchaser wish to return the slave, the evidence adduced by him is not to be admitted; because there is a prevarication in his plea, since his act of purchasing the slave amounts to a declaration of the validity of the sale, and the plea he afterwards prefers is contradictory of this: his plea, therefore, is not valid: and testimony is to be taken only where the plea it tends to establish of a valid nature. If, however, the seller should declare before a magistrate that he had made the sale without the authority of the proprietor, the sale in that case becomes null, provided the purchaser desire the dissolution of it. because the inconsistency of the purchaser is no bar to the validity of the declaration of the seller, and when the parties both concur in the same wish the sale is rendered null of course;—but the concurrence of the purchaser is a necessary condition. What is here advanced, that "the evidence adduced by the purchaser is not to be admitted," is the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that it is mentioned in the Zeeadat, that if a person purchase a female slave (for instance) for one thousand dirms, and take possession and pay the price, and afterwards, in consequence of another person claiming her as his property, and asserting his right to her, surrender her to him,—and he [the purchaser] establish, by witnesses, that the seller had acknowledged that the sale was the property of the said claimant, the testimony so given is inadmissible. Between these two cases, therefore, there is an evident contradiction which, however, our modern doctors thus account for. In the case alluded to in the Jama Sagheer, the slave was in the possession of the purchaser when he produced the witnesses; but in that from the Zeedat the slave was in the possession of the claimant and not of the purchaser; and the condition on which a restitution of the purchase-money from the seller is warranted (namely, non-existence of the subject of the sale with relation to the purchaser) not existing in the first case, but existing in the second, the evidence in the first case is therefore rejected, and in the second it is admitted.

In the sale of immovable property by an unauthorized person, the seller is not responsible.—If a person sell a house belonging to another, without his permission; and make delivery of it to the purchaser, and afterwards declare that he had sold it without the permission of the owner, then (according to Haneefa and the last opinion of Aboo Yoosaf) the seller is not responsible. The first opinion of Aboo Yoosaf was that the seller is responsible, and this opinion has been adopted by Mohammed. This case is one of the examples of usurpation over immovable property, concerning which there is a difference of opinion, as will be fully explained under the head of Usurpations.

CHAPTER XI

OF SILLIM SALES

Definition of Sillim.—KADOOREE explains Sillim literally to signify, a contract involving a prompt delivery in return for a distant delivery. In the language of the law it means a contract of sale, causing an immediate payment of the price, and admitting a delay in the delivery of the wares. In this kind of sale, the wares are denominated Mooslim-fee-hee, the price Rasal-Mal, the seller Mooslim-ali-hee, and the purchaser Rubul Sillim.

A Sillim sale is lawful.—A Sillim sale is authorized and rendered legal by a particular passage in the Koran, and also by an express declaration of the Prophet prohibiting any one from the sale of what is not in his possession, but authorizing a Sillim sale. It is to be observed that Sillim sale is contrary to analogy, because of the non-existence of the subject of it, since it is a sale of a non-existent article. The sale in a Sillim sale, is merely the thing for which the advance is made, and that does not appear. Analogy, however, is abandoned in this instance, because of the text and tradition above cited.

In all articles of weight (except dirms and deeners), measurement of capacity,—A Sillim sale, with relation to articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, is lawful; because the Prophet has said: 'Whoever enters into a Sillim sale with you, let him stipulate a determinate weight and measurement, and a determinate period of delivery." Dirms and deeners, however, are not included in the description of articles of weight, because both of these are representatives of price, and in a Sillim sale it is requisite that the subject of it be otherwise than a representatives of price. Hence if a person should enter into a Sillim sale, stipulating the immediate payment of ten yards of cloth to the seller in lieu of ten dirms to be delivered to him by the seller at a future period, the Sillim sale so contracted is invalid. Some have said that this sale is absolutely null. Others, again, have said that although considering it as a Sillim sale, it is certainly invalid, still it is not null, since it may be executed so as to answer the views of the parties as far as possible, by considering it simply as a sale of cloth for a price payable hereafter: more especially since, in all contracts, the spirit is what is to be attended to. The former, however, is the better opinion; because, although sales may lawfully be rendered valid in every possible degree, with relation to the things concerned which the parties have contracted, yet as, in the case in question, the things so contracted for are dirms and deeners, which from an express prohibition are incapable of being made the subject of a Sillim sale the contract with relation to them cannot in any degree be rendered valid.

Longitudinal measurement and tale.—A Sillim sale with respect to articles of longitudinal measurement, such as cloth, or the like, is lawful, because it is possible to define them exactly by specification of the number of yards in respect to the length and breadth, and the duality and workmanship of it. (By the quality is meant the fineness or coarseness; and by the workmanship the looseness or closeness of the texture.) The specification by a recital of these particulars, moreover, is requisite, in order that ignorance may be avoided: it is therefore essential to the validity of the contract. In the same manner also, a Sillim sale is lawful with respect to all articles of tale, which do not essentially differ in their unities, such as eggs and walnuts; because, in all articles of tale between the unities of which the difference is trifling, the rate is ascertainable, the quality definable, and the delivery to the purchaser practicable: a contract of Sillim, therefore; with respect to such articles is lawful: In articles of this nature, also, the great and small are considered as the same, because mankind have agreed in making no account of the difference. It is otherwise with respect to melons and pomegranates, because the difference in them is considerable. It is to be observed, that where there is a difference in the individuals of any kind it may be known whether such difference be of any accounts or not by the effect it has no the price. Thus articles of which the individuals of the same kind bear a different price are considered as different; but where the price is the same with respect to the individuals they are considered as similar. It is related, as an opinion of Haneefa, that ostrich eggs are not similar, as they bear different prices.

It is to be observed that in the same manner as a Sillim contract is lawful with respect to similars of tale according to number, so is it lawful with respect to them according to a measurement of capacity. Ziffer has said that it is not lawful according to a measurement of capacity, as that does not apply to articles of tale; and it is also a tenet of his, that a Sillim sale with respect to articles of the is unlawful both as respect of the difference between the individuals of the kind. The reasoning of our doctors is, that quantity is sometimes ascertained by number and sometimes by measurement of capacity; and that similars of the same species being considered as articles of tale only because of the consent and practice of mankind, they may for the same reason be subjected to a measurement of capacity by the consent of the parties. A Sillim sale is likewise lawful with respect to Faloos. Some have said that this is the opinion of the two disciples; but that Haneefa has a different opinion, since, according to his doctrine, Faloos are representatives of price. The doctrine of the two disciples on this head has been already explained in treating of Usury.

It is not lawful with respect to animals.—A SILLIM sale with respect to animals is unlawful, Shafei deems it lawful, as the article may be ascertained by an explanation of the genus, the age, the species, and the quality: after which only a small difference can take place, in the same manner as in the case of cloth. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that after such explanations the difference may still be great with respect to various qualities and hidden circumstances, which must occasion a contention: in opposition to the case of cloth, because, as being the workmanship of man, there is rarely any material difference in two pieces of the same kind. Besides, it is recorded in the Naki Saheeh that the Prophet forbade the Sillim sale of animals: and this prohibition extends to every species of animals, even to sparrows.

Or the parts of animals, or skins, firewood or hay, unless the quality be ascertainable.—A SILLIM sale is not lawful with respect to the parts of an animal, such as the head, or the feet, because those are not similars of tale, nor is there any measure by which the size of them might be ascertained. In the same manner also, a Sillim sale is unlawful with respect to skins; according to number, or firewood according to bundles, or hay according to packages, except the quantity be ascertained by specifying the length of the string that ties them: for then the Sillim sale with respect to them is lawful, provided the mode of binding be not such as to create a difference.

Nor unless the subject be in continued existence until the time of delivery.—A SILLIM sale is not lawful, unless the subject of it be in existence, from the conclusion of the contract, until the stipulated period of its delivery. Hence the sale is not lawful if the subject be not in existence at the formation of the contract but be extant at the period stipulated for its delivery: or vice versa;—or if, being extant at the formation of the contract, and the time of delivery, it should have been non-existent at some period of the intervening time. Shafei maintains that the existence at the period of delivery is sufficient whether the articles have been extant before or not; because in this case the seller is capable of delivery at the period on which delivery is required. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, a saying of the Prophet, "Ye shall not sell fruit by way of SILLIM until their ripeness be apparent," which evidently implies that the capability of the delivery from the formation of the contract is necessary. Secondly, the capability of delivery is founded on the article being fit to be taken possession of by the purchaser, and it is therefore indispensable that it be in uninterrupted existence from the formation of the contract to the instant of delivery.

If, at the promised period of delivery, the subject of the Sillim be lost or disappear, the purchaser has in that case the option of dissolving the contract, and receiving back the price from the seller,—or of waiting until the subject of the sale may be recovered, This is analogous to the absconding of a slave after the sale of him but before the delivery, in which case the purchaser has the power of either dissolving the contract or waiting until the slave may be recovered.

It is lawful with respect to articles which although perishable in their nature, are kept in a state of preservation, or in situations where the article may always be had.—A SILLIM sale is lawful with respect to dried and salted fish, provided it be according to a standard weight, and the species be known; because in this case the subject of the sale is of an ascertained nature, the quality is defined, and the delivery is practicable, since such fish is always fit to be taken possession of. This species, of sale, however, is not allowed according to tale, since the individuals amongst fish are not similar:—nor is it allowed with respect to fresh fish, unless at such a particular period of the year as renders the procurement of them certain, in which a Sillim sale with respect to them, according to a fixed weight, is lawful, provided the period be defined. The reason of this is that fresh fish is not always to be procured, it had, being sometimes withheld, in the winter season, in consequence of the water being frozen. In any city however, where fresh fish are always to be procured, a Sillim sale with respect to them is perfectly lawful provided it be according to weight and not by tale. It is related, as an option of Haneefa, that it is not lawful to make a Sillim sale with regard to the flesh of fish of so large a nature as to occasion their flesh to be cut in the same manner as that of oxen or goats, for instance, because, being illegal with respect to all other animals, it follows that it is likewise so with respect to fish, of which the flesh is equivalent to that of any other creature.

It is not lawful with respect to flesh-meat.—A Sillim sale of fish is utterly unlawful, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is lawful with respect to the flesh of quadrupeds, provided a notification be made of the flesh of known and determinate part (such as the haunch, for instance), and that a description be given of the qualities (such as fatness or leanness, for instance) ; because in this case the weight of the flesh is determined and the qualities are ascertained,—whence it is that, in case of its destruction, a compensation of a similar is given, and also, that it is lawful to borrow it according to weight, and that usur takes place with regard to it. It is otherwise with respect to the flesh of birds, for a Sillim sale of that is unlawful, since it is impossible to specify the flesh of a particular part inasmuch as it is not a custom to separate the parts of birds in sale, because of their smallness. The argument of Haneefa is that the quantity or flesh is uncertain, because of the difference occasioned by the bones, in regard either to their number or grossness; and also, because of the difference which takes place with respect to the fatness or leanness, as animals are fat or lean according to the season; and this uncertainty is a cause of contention, such sale is therefore inadmissible;—and for the same reason, the Sillim sale of flesh without bones is not lawful. This is approved. With respect to the cases quoted by the two disciples of a compensation of a similar being made for flesh in case of its destruction, and of it being lawful to borrow it, the legality of such compensation, &c., is not admitted; but admitting the legality, still the principle on which the compensation of a similar proceeds is evidently because the retribution of a similar is more equitable than that of money, since money answers only to the object, whereas the similar answers both object and appearance; and the legality of borrowing flesh is because a similar made by borrowing is an obvious and perceptible one; in opposition to that of a Sillim sale, which rests upon description.

The period of delivery must be specified.—A Sillim sale is not lawful unless the period for the delivery of the wares be fixed. Shafei has said that it is lawful in either case (that is whether the period of delivery be fixed or not); since it is recorded in the traditions that the Prophet authorized Sillim sales in an absolute manner, without any restrictions regarding the limitation of the period. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has ordained that all Sillim sales shall be made with a stipulation of a fixed period for delivery. Secondly, the Prophet has prohibited man from selling what is not in his possession, but has nevertheless authorized and rendered legal Sillim sales, on this principle, that poor people stand in need of such engagements, in order that, by means of the money they receive in advance, they may acquire the subject of the sale, and deliver it to the purchaser. It is therefore requisite that a fixed period be stipulated, because if the seller were liable to an instantaneous delivery on demand, the principle on which the legality of such sale is founded would not be answered. Moreover, an indefinite period is unlawful, because of the uncertainty; in the same manner as in a sale where the price settled is to be paid at a future period without defining it is to be paid in money that can be fixed for a delivery, in a Sillim sale, is one month. Some allege that the smallest to be three days; others again fixed it any term exceeding half a day. The first opinion is authentic; and decrees are passed accordingly.

Private standards of measurement cannot be used in it.—The stipulation of a private measure of capacity or longitude is not lawful in a Sillim sale, because of the uncertainty, founded on the possibility of the criterion being lost in the interval between the conclusion of the contract and the delivery; as has been already explained. It is necessary also that the instrument of measurement be of a substance not liable either to contract or expand, but that it be of a fixed nature, such as a large cup. Leathern bags, however (such as those in which water is contained), are allowable for this purpose, according to Aboo Yoosaf, because of the practice of mankind.

It is not lawful under a restriction of the subject to the produce of a particular place. —A Sillim sale, with respect to the grain of a specific village, or the fruit of a specific orchard, is not lawful, unless it should happen to these particular places, the delivery becomes impracticable; such practice has moreover been prohibited by the Prophet. This specification is, however, lawful, according to some doctors, provided it be to define the quality, as where a specification is made of the grain of Kishmaran in Bokhara, or of Boshakee in Fargana.
And requires that the genus be specified, and that the species, quality, quantity, period of delivery, rate and place of delivery shall all be determined. — A Sillim sale is not lawful, according to Haneefa, except on seven conditions: I. That the genus of the subject of the sale be specified, such as wheat or barley. II. That the species of it be fixed, such as wheat of a soil that is watered by means of a canal, or order artificial mode, or wheat of a soil watered by rain. III. That the quality of it be fixed, such as of the best or worst kind. IV. That the quantity of it be fixed according to a standard of weight, or measurement of capacity. V. That the period of the delivery be fixed, according to ordinances in the traditions; VI. That the rate of the capital advanced be fixed, provided it be of a nature definable by a rate, as where it is an article of weight, of measurement of capacity, or of tale.— And, VII. That the place of delivery be fixed, and that the subject of the sale or account of its weight, require porseage. — The two disciples have said, that if the capital to be advanced be present, and exhibited, there is then no need of any mention of the rate; and also, that there is no need of explaining the place of delivery, since the delivery must be made in the place where the contract is concluded. Thus there is a disagreement of opinion with respect to these two conditions between Haneefa and the two disciples. — The argument of the two disciples in support of their former position, is that as the price is present and exhibited the object may be obtained by a reference to it, the case being, in fact, the same as that of cloth stipulated as the price, in a Sillim sale of which specification is not a requisite condition, provided it be produced to view and capable of a reference. The arguments of Haneefa are twofold. First, as it often happens that many of the dirms and decaens are of a bad kind, and that the purchaser during the meeting is incapable of exchanging them, the seller therefore returns them; and a proportionate deduction being made from the wares, the sale remains extant in a degree proportionate to the sum received by the seller. Now, in this case, and under such circumstance, if the amount of the dirms be not known; it follows that it cannot be known in what extent the Sillim sale exists. Secondly, as it sometimes happens that the seller being incapable of acquiring the subject of the sale, is under the necessity of restoring the price, it follows that if this should not have been explained, it is impossible to judge what sum he ought to return.

Objection. — These two suppositions are merely imaginary, and therefore of no weight. — A Sillim sale is not necessarily fixed to its place; it is equivalent to realties; because such sales are of but a weak nature, being authorized (as has been already explained) in opposition to analogy. Hence imaginations with respect to them are of weight; and it is necessary that the price be definite with respect to the rate, provided it be of a such a kind as that the contract may relate to rate; but if it be cloth, the specification of a number of a yards is not required as a condition, since these are not considered as a rate, but the description.

As, also (according to Haneefa), an explanation of the rate of the price is an essential condition to the Sillim sale, it follows that if the price and the rate is incapable of being separately fixed, the sale of this nature is not lawful where the wares, being of different kinds (such as wheat and barley) are opposed to any specific sum (one hundred dirms, for instance), without a separate price being specified in opposition to each of the kinds, because the amount being here opposed generally to both, the particular price of each remains unknown. — In the same manner also, it is not lawful where, the price being of different kinds (such as dirms and decaens), an explanation is given of the quantity of one of these kinds and not of the other; subject to this condition: that in a Sillim the Sillim is not lawful in the degree to which an unknown quantity is opposed to it; and consequently, it is also invalid with respect to the degree in which it is opposed to a known quantity, since one contract relates to both. According to the two disciples both these modes of Sillim are lawful, since in their opinion an exhibition of the price without any explanation of the rate is valid. — The argument of the two disciples in support of their second position is, that the place of the contract is fixed for the delivery, because the contract, which is the cause of the delivery, did there take place; the case is therefore the same as that of a borrower or usurper, on each of whom it is incumbent to deliver what he may have borrowed or usurped at the place in which these deeds took place. — The reasoning of Haneefa is, that as the delivery of the subject of a Sillim sale is not immediately incumbent, the place in which the contract is concluded is not absolutely fixed as the place of delivery. — (It is otherwise in cases of loan or usurpation, since the repayment of the loan and the restitution of the usurped article are incumbent upon the instant). — Now as the place of concluding the contract is not necessarily fixed as the place of delivery, it is requisite that some place be specified, in which the uncertainty in this particular may otherwise produce a contention, since the price of goods varies in different places; it is therefore indispensable that a place of delivery be specified by the parties ignorance, moreover, with respect to the place of delivery, is equivalent to uncertainty with respect to the quality of the goods or the quality of the price: and accordingly, some of our modern doctors have said that if a contention arises between the parties with respect to the place of delivery, they agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, their oaths must be severally taken; as in the case of a contention regarding the quality of the price: whereas, agreeably to the tenets of the two disciples, their oaths are not to be taken. Others, again, have said that, agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, their oaths are not to be taken; whereas agreeably to the tenets of the two disciples, their oaths are to be taken by them, or to be lying between them, for which the advance is made be of such a nature as does not require any expense of porterage, such as musk, camphire, saffron, or small pearls, there is no necessity, according to all our doctors, for fixing the place of delivery: because the difference of place occasions no difference of price; and in this case the delivery must be made where the contract is concluded.—The compiler of the Hedava remarks that this is the doctrine laid down in the Jama Sagheer, and also in the Mahootot treatise of sales:—but that in the Mahootoot treating of hire it is said that the seller may deliver the goods wherever he pleases;—and this is approved; because the delivery is not immediately due; and also, because, as all places in this case being similar, there is no necessity for the particular determination of any. Now, the question is, if the parties agree upon a place of delivery, whether it be absolutely fixed thereby or not.—Some are of opinion that it is not fixed, because in so determining it there is no advantage.—Others, again, maintain that it is fixed thereby, as its being so is advantageous, since the danger of the roads is thereby avoided.

Nor, if a city be mentioned, need the particular street be specified.—In, in case of the goods requiring porterage, a city be fixed on for the delivery, there is then no necessity for specifying the particular street of lane, because a city notwithstanding the variety of its parts, is considered as one place.—Some have said that this proceeds on a supposition of the city not being large;—but that, if its extent be a Farsasang, the specification of a particular part is, in that case, a necessary condition.

The price must be received at the meeting.

A Sillim sale is not valid unless the seller receive the price in the meeting, prior to a separation from the purchaser; because if the price be stipulated in money, it would otherwise follow that one debt is opposed to another debt; a practice which has been prohibited by the Prophet:—or, if the price be stipulated in wares, it is invalid, because the characteristic of Sillim is "a prompt receipt of something in lieu of something to be given," which would not be established if a prompt delivery of the price did not take place. Besides, the payment of the price is necessary to enable the seller to acquire the goods, that he may become capable of delivery:—and hence lawyers have said that a Sillim sale, containing a condition of option in favour of both or one of the parties, is invalid, because a condition of option is a bar to the completion of the seisin, inasmuch as it prevents the conclusion of the contract in regard to its effect, namely, the establishment of right of property:—and also, that the purchaser has no option of inspection, because it is vain and useless: since the goods are a debt due from the seller, and consequently undetermined; whereas a thing seen becomes determined. —It is otherwise with respect to an option of defect; because that is no bar to seisin; —and hence, if such a stipulation be made, and the parties annul it before the close of the meeting, and the seller be in possession of the price, such Sillim sale is valid; in opposition to the opinion of Ziffer.

Whence, if a debt owing from the seller to the purchaser be considered as part of it, the sale is invalid in that proportion. —If a person purchase a Koor of wheat, by a Sillim contract, for two hundred dirms, after the seller being indebted to him on one hundred dirms, he (the purchaser) make the advance by immediately paying him (the seller) one hundred dirms, and opposing the debt of one hundred dirms to the remainder,—in that case the contract is invalid in the amount of the debt of one hundred dirms,—because a present seisin is not made of them; but it is valid in the amount of the one hundred dirms paid down, because of the observance of the conditions of legality with respect to that proportion, and because it is not affected by the invalidity of the remainder, as such invalidity is supervenient, the sale being valid originally; and hence, if the purchaser, in this case, should pay down one hundred dirms on account of the debt before the end of the meeting, the sale becomes valid; but as, in the present instance, the purchaser does not pay off his debt, but merely opposes a clearance of his debt in lieu of ready payment of one hundred dirms, and the contracting parties separate from the meeting, the sale is therefore invalid in that proportion. —The reason of this is, that if a debt be established as the price, in a contract of sale, still that is not absolutely fixed as the price (whence if a person purchase goods in exchange for a debt due to him by the seller of the goods, and both parties afterwards agree that the debt was not due, yet the sale does not become null); and since the debt is not absolutely fixed as the price, so as to be capable of constituting capital stock, it follows that the contract, in such case, does originally take place, and afterwards becomes invalid from that circumstance.

But it cannot be disposed of by the seller until he take possession of it.—If it is not lawful for the seller to convert to use, or, by deed, to dispose of the price advanced, in a Sillim sale (as if he should sell it, for instance), prior to his seisin of it, because in this case the seisin of the price, which is an essential condition in a Sillim sale, would be defeated.

Nor can the purchaser perform any act with respect to the goods, until he receive them.—In the same manner. also, it is unlawful for a purchaser, in a Sillim sale, to perform any act with respect to the goods, previous to the receipt of them; because an act with relation to the subject of a sale previous to the seisin is unlawful. —For the same reason, also, it is unlawful for the purchaser, prior to seisin, to admit another to a share in the goods, or to dispose of them at prime cost.

In a dissolution of Sillim the stock cannot be applied to the purchase of any thing from the seller until it be first received back.—If both parties agree to dissolve a contract of Sillim, the purchaser is not, in that case, entitled to accept or purchase anything from the seller in exchange for the stock he has advanced, until he has first received it back complete: because the Prophet has said, "Where ye dissolve a contract of sale upon which an advance has been made, take not from him to whom ye have paid the advance any thing except that which ye have advanced to him;"—and also, because, as the capital advanced, in this instance, is resembling the exchange of the subject of the sale, it follows that any act with respect to it, previous to seisin, is invalid. —It is the reason why the capital does not resemble the subject of the sale, is, that a dissolution is equivalent to a new sale with relation to a third person (that is, to any other than the parties themselves) and it is therefore necessary that the subject of the sale be extant. Now it is impossible that the goods so contracted to be provid'd can be considered as the subject of the sale, since they are not extant; it is therefore necessary to consider the price in that light; and this consequently becomes as debt due by the seller, in the same manner as the goods were debt. —The objection, since a dissolution is equivalent to a new contract, similar to the first, it would follow that it is indispensable that the advanced capital be received back by the purchaser at the meeting in which the dissolution is determined on, in the same manner as it is requisite that it be advanced to the seller at the time of concluding the contract; whereas it is otherwise.

Reply.—It is not indispensable that this be received back at the interview of dissolution, because the dissolution is not in all respects similar to the first contract.

Concerning the case in question Ziffer has given a different opinion. For, according to him, any deed relating to the price, previous to the seisin, is lawful:—but the reasoning above stated is a sufficient refutation of this opinion.

An article subsequently purchased, and made over in fulfilment of a Sillim sale, is not held to be delivered.—If a person sell a Koor of wheat by a Sillim sale, and afterwards, when the period of delivery arrives purchase the same from another, and then desire the purchaser to receive it from that other in discharge of his claim upon him: and the purchaser accordingly take possession of the same, still he is not considered to have made seisin of the subject of the Sillim sale, and consequently, if the wheat be lost or destroyed whilst in his possession, the seller is responsible for the same.

Unless the purchaser receive it first on behalf of the seller, and then make seisin of it on his own account, by two distinct measurements.—But if the seller should have desired him to receive it first on his [the seller's] account, and afterwards on his own account, and the purchaser accordingly, first measure it out and receive it on account of the seller, and afterwards measure it out and receive it on his own account, the subject of the Sillim sale is in that case delivered, and the purchaser becomes completely seised of the same. The reason of this is, that there is here a conjunction of two contracts: first, the Sillim sale; and, secondly, the sale between the seller of the Sillim sale and the third person: and it is a necessary condition that the measurement take place in both, because the Prophet has prohibited the sale of wheat until the measure both of the purchaser and the seller shall have been applied to it; and this prohibition (as has been already explained) evidently alludes to the conjunction of two contracts, such as in the case in question.

Objection.—As the Sillim sale is previous to the purchase of wheat made by the Sillim seller, it follows that the two contracts are not conjoined.

Reply.—The Sillim contract is antecedent, but the seisin of the subject of it is posterior;—and the seisin here is equivalent to a sale de novo; because; although the subject of the Sillim sale was a debt incumbent on this seller, and what the purchaser had received was determinate thing, and consequently, in reality, different from a debt yet they are in this case considered as one and the same thing, lest it should follow that the exchange of the subject of a Sillim sale has been made previous to the seisin of it; for if they were to be considered as two things, it would follow that the subject of the Sillim sale prior to the seisin of it was given in exchange for what the purchaser made seisin of namely, a determinate thing and not a debt. Now since the seisin is proved to be in the nature of sale de novo, it follows that two contracts are conjoined, namely, the purchase of the wheat by the Sillim seller, and the seisin of it by the Sillim purchaser, which is equivalent to a sale de novo, that is, the case is the same as if the Sillim seller, having purchased it from the purchaser, were to re-sell it to the Sillim purchaser.

A second measurement is not required in a similar receipt of article by a lender.—If a person, indebted to another in a Koor of wheat, not on account of a Sillim sale,* but on account of a loan, should purchase a Koor of wheat from another, and then desire his creditor to receive the same from the other, in lieu of what he had borrowed, and the creditor, having measured out the same, should accordingly take possession of it such seisin is valid, and a re-payment of the loan is established; because a loan of indefinite property [Karz] is equivalent to a loan of specific property [Areaat].—and hence the Koor of wheat so measured and received by the lender may be said to be his actual right, for which reason the transaction is not regarded as a conjunction of two contracts [with respect to one subject], and it is consequently not requisite that the wheat be measured a second time.

If the seller measure the article, on behalf of the purchaser, in his absence, it is not a delivery—although it be measured into the purchaser's sack.—If a person, having purchased a Koor of wheat by a Sillim sale, should order the seller to measure it and put it into his (the purchaser's) sack, and the seller having accordingly measured it out should put it into the sack at a time when the purchaser is not himself present, in this case a delivery of the goods is not held to have taken place (insomuch that if the wheat should in that situation be destroyed, the loss falls entirely on the seller); because the purchaser, in a Sillim sale does not become proprietor of the article, for which he makes the advance, until actual seisin, as his right is of an indefinite nature and not determinate: now the wheat, in the case in question, is a determinate article, and hence the order given to the seller by the purchaser to measure it out was not valid—since the order of a director is of no account except with respect to his own property. Thus the seller, if it were, borrowed the sack of the purchaser, and put wheat which was his own property into it;—in the same manner as if a person, having a debt of some dirms due to him by another, should give his purse to the debtor and desire him to weigh the dirms and put them into it; in which case if the debtor act accordingly, still the creditor does not by the performance of this act become seised of those dirms. If, on the contrary, a person, having purchased wheat that is determinate and present, should direct the seller to measure it, and put it into his [the purchaser's] sack, and the seller act accordingly, at a time when the purchaser is absent, the purchaser is nevertheless seised of the same in virtue of that act, because his directions to the seller were efficient, as the property of the wheat had vested in him in consequence of his purchase of it. Hence it appears that in a common sale the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article previous to the seisin,— whereas, in a Sillim sale, the right of property does not vest until after the seisin.

Hence, also, in a Sillim sale, if the purchaser desires the seller to grind the wheat, put in the manner above recited into his bag, the flour is the property of the seller; whereas, if the same were to be done in case of a common sale, it would be the property of the purchaser. In the same manner, also if the purchaser should desire the seller to throw the wheat into the river, and he act accordingly, then, in a Sillim sale, the loss would result to the seller; whereas, in a common sale it would fall upon the purchaser, and he would remain responsible for the price, since his order was efficient. Hence, in the Rawayet-Sah-eeh, it is declared to be sufficient that the seller, by the direction of the purchaser, measure out the article and put it into the purchaser’s sack; and there is no necessity for another measurement, since in this case the seller acts as agent for measurement to the purchaser; and the seisin is completely established, because of the falling of the wheat into the purchaser’s sack.

And so also if it be measured by the seller into his own sack, at the purchaser’s instance, although the purchaser be present.—If a person purchase wheat, and direct the seller to measure it out and put it into his own sack, and the seller act accordingly, the purchaser is not seised of it, inasmuch as he borrowed the sack of the seller without taking possession of it, and consequently does not become seised of its contents.—The case is therefore the same as if the purchaser had directed the seller to measure out the wheat and place it in a particular corner of his own house, which being completely in the possession of the seller, the purchaser cannot consequently be seised of anything in it.

Case of delivery of a determinate article in the same parcel with an undeterminate article.—If an undeterminate and a specific thing be joined together, by a person (for instance) purchasing a specific Koor of wheat, and also entering into a Sillim contract for another Koor of the same (the former of which is specific and the latter undeterminate), and then directing the seller to measure out both into his own sack, in that case, if the seller first measure the specific wheat into the sack, and afterwards the undeterminate wheat, the purchaser is seised of both the measures of wheat;—of the determinate wheat because his directions to the seller with respect to it were efficient, as it was his undoubted property;—and of the undeterminate wheat because, upon the seller measuring it out, and placing it in the bag, it then becomes implicated with the property of the purchaser, and, on account of such implication the purchaser becomes seised of it.—The case therefore is analogous to where a person, having solicited the loan of some wheat, desires the lender to scatter it on his (the borrower’s) ground,—or, where a person consigns his ring to a jeweller with directions to add to it more gold, to the weight of half a deenar;—for in both these cases the seisin takes place immediately on the implication with the property. If, on the contrary, in the case in question, the seller first measures out the undeterminate wheat, and place it in the purchaser’s sack, and afterwards the specific wheat, the purchaser does not become seised of either; because his directions to measure out the undeterminate wheat were not efficient, and consequently the property of it remained with the seller, as before:—and having afterwards mixed the determinate wheat with his own property, he thereby destroys and annuls the right of property of the other.—This is founded on the doctrine of Haneefah, according to whom the implication of the property of another with one’s own is destructive of the right of property of that other: and on this principle he holds the sale with respect to the determinate wheat to be dissolved.

REJECTION.—The above implication is with the consent of the purchaser, since it was by the order that seller made the measurement, and hence the sale ought not in this case to be dissolved.

REPLY.—The implication is not made with the consent of the purchaser, since there is a probability that his object was that the specific wheat should first be measured out.

What is here advanced is founded on the doctrine of Haneefah, as above stated. The two disciples are of opinion that the purchaser has the option of either dissolving the sale or sharing with the seller in the mixed property; because, according to them, the implication of the property of another with one’s own is not in all cases destructive of the right of property of that other.

If the contract be dissolved, and the article advanced perish before restitution, the seller is responsible.—If a person purchase a Koor of wheat by a Sillim contract, making a female slave the price advanced, and after the seller taking possession of the slave the parties dissolve the contract, and the slave afterwards die whilst yet in the possession of the seller, in this case the seller is responsible for the value she bore on the day of seisin.—If, also, the dissolution be made after the death of the female slave, it is valid, and the seller in the same manner remains responsible for the value at the period of seisin.—The reason of this is that the validity of a dissolution rests upon the existence of the contract, and that, again, rests upon the existence of the subject of it: now in a contract of Sillim, the article advanced for is the subject of the contract; and as that, in the case in question, still continues in existence, it follows that the dissolution is valid; and the dissolution being valid, and the contract of Sillim consequently cancelled with respect to the article advanced for, it follows that it is also cancelled with respect to the slave (being the price paid in advance), as a dependant of the article advanced for, although it be not valid with respect to the slave, orignally, because of her non-existence, since there are many things which; although not valid originally, are yet so dependantly.—The contract, therefore, being cancelled with respect to the slave, it becomes incumbent upon the seller to return her; but as this is impracticable, he must pay her value.

The dissolution of a sale is rendered invalid by the article perishing before restitution.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should agree with the seller to dissolve the bargain, and the slave afterwards die in his possession, the dissolution is invalid;—or, if the slave die first, and the parties then agree to dissolve the contract, in this case also the dissolution is invalid;—because, the slave being the subject of the sale, and his death of consequent destroying the existence of the contract, the dissolution is therefore invalid from the beginning in the second case, and becomes invalid in the end in the first case, not no longer remains. It is otherwise in a case of Baza Mookayeza, or barter; because a dissolution in that case is valid after the decay or destruction of one of the articles; either of them being capable of becoming the subject of the sale, the existing one is therefore considered as such.

In a dispute with respect to the value of the subject, the assertion of the seller (upon oath) must be credited.—If a person enter into a contract of Sillim for a Koor of wheat, at the rate of ten dirms and the seller afterwards asserts that "he agreed for two of an inferior sort," and the purchaser deny this, asserting "the stipulation of wheat was made in an absolute manner, and therefore the contract is invalid," in such case the assertion of the seller, corroborated by an oath, must be credited, since he pleads the validity of the contract, by virtue of the declaration of a condition of it; and the assertion of the purchaser, notwithstanding his denial of validity of the contract, is not credited, because it tends to a destruction of his own right, since it is a custom, in Sillim sales, that the goods advanced for the superior to the sum advanced.—If a vice versa disagreement take place between the parties, the learned say that agreeably to the doctrine of Haneefa, the assertion of the purchaser is credited, since he claims the validity of the contract.—According to the two disciples, the assertion of the seller is credited in both cases, as he is the defendant in both, notwithstanding that, in the latter, he deny the validity of the contract. This will be more fully explained hereafter.

If the seller deny the appointment of a period of delivery, the assertion of the purchaser, in that period, must be credited. If a disagreement take place between the parties to a Sillim sale, by the seller asserting that a period of delivery had not been determined in the contract, and the purchaser asserting that it had, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited, because a determination of a period for delivery is a right of the seller, and his denial is therefore a wilful injury to himself.

Objection.—The seller denies the determination of a period for delivery from a view to his own advantage; since such denial is the cause of annulling the contract, by which means he obtains the property of the goods he had engaged to deliver. Hence his denial is advantageous and not injurious to himself.

Reply.—The invalidity of a Sillim contract, because of the period of delivery being underminate, is not certain, since our doctors have disagreed on this point. The advantage, therefore, in this view, is of no account;—whereas the advantage to the seller, from the determination of such period, being obvious, his denial of it thereupon is an injury to himself.—It is otherwise in the case of a disagreement between the parties with regard to the existence of a condition concerning the quality of the article; because in that instance the invalidity of the contract, from a want of a definition of the quality, is certain.

If on the other hand, the seller assert that the period had been determined, and the purchaser deny this, in that case, according to the two disciples, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited, because he denies the right which the seller claim from him, although, at the same time, he deny the validity of the contract;—in the same manner as holds with respect to the proprietor of the stock in a contract of Mozaribat;—that is to say, if the proprietor of the stock were to say to his Mozarib, or manager, "I stipulated that a half of the profit shall go to you excepting ten dirms;" and the manager deny this, and assert that he had stipulated a half of the profit in his favour, in that case the assertion of the proprietor of the stock is credited, since he denies the claim of right of the agent, notwithstanding he thereby at the same time deny the validity of the contract between them.—Haneefa says that, in the case in question, the assertion of the seller is to be credited, because he claims the validity of the contract. Besides, the purchaser and seller both agree in their having made a Sillim contract, and consequently they both apparently agree in the validity of it:—but, again, the purchaser, in denying the assertion of the seller, denies the validity of the contract, which is the denial of a thing he at the same time admits, and is consequently not worthy of credit.—It is otherwise in the case of Mozaribat, because a contract of Mozaribat is not binding upon either the manager or the owner of the stock, since the manager may refuse the execution of the Mozaribat at any time, and the constituent may dismiss him when he pleases; such a disagreement, therefore, in the case of Mozaribat, is of no consequence, the plea of invalidity, in this instance, amounting, in fact, to nothing more than a refusal to carry the contract into execution, which it is lawful for either party to do. There remains, therefore only the claim to profit on the part of the manager; and as this is opposed by the proprietor of the stock, his declaration must consequently be credited.—A Sillim contract, on the contrary, is absolute, and therefore of a different nature.

From the above discussion it appears to be a general rule that the assertion of a person who denies his own right, and not the right of another upon him, is not credited in the opinion of all our doctors:—and that whoever pleads the validity of a contract must be credited in his assertion, according to Haneefa, provided both parties be agreed in the uniformity of the contract, such as that of Sillim, which, whether valid or invalid, is of an uniform nature; in opposition to Mozaribat, which, in case of its validity, is a contract of participated profit, and in case of its invalid dity is merely a contract of hire.

The two scholars are of opinion that, in the case in question, the assertion of the defendant must be credited, notwithstanding he thereby deny the validity of the contract.

In Sillim sales of price goods all the qualities must be particularly specified. If a person enter into a Sillim contract with respect to cloth, describing its length, breadth, and quality of fineness or coarseness, such sale is valid, because it is a contract of Sillim which relates to a known thing, and of which the delivery is practicable. If the subject of the sale be a piece of silk stuff, it is necessary, in addition, to settle the weight that also being an object in this instance.

Sillim sale is not valid in shells, or jewels; but it is valid in small pearls sold by weight.

—A Sillim sale of jewels or marine shells is not lawful, because the unities of these vary in their value.

A Sillim sale of small pearls that are sold according to weight is lawful, as the weight ascertains the subject of the sale.

In bricks.—Three is no impropriety in a sale of bricks, whether they be in a wet or dry state, provided a description be given of the mould in which they are formed, because bricks, in their unities, are of a similar nature, more especially where their mould is described.

And (in short) in all articles which admit a general description of quality, and ascertaining of quantity.—In short, everything of which it is possible to comprise a description of the qualities, and a knowledge of the quantity, is a fit subject of Sillim sale, as it cannot occasion contention; on the other hand, a Sillim sale is not lawful with respect to things incapable of being defined by a description of quality or quantity; because the subject of a Sillim sale is a debt due by the seller; and if its quality be not known there consequently exists a degree of uncertainty, from which a contention must arise.

Or which are particularly defined.—There is no impropriety in a Sillim sale of pots or vessels for boiling water, or of boots, or the like, provided these articles he particularly defined, because the conditions essential to the validity of a Sillim sale are here observed:—but if the articles be not defined, the sale is absolutely invalid, the subject of the sale being in such case an undefined debt. It is also lawful to bespeak any of these articles from the workman without fixing the period of delivery.—Thus if a person should desire a boot-maker to make boots on his account, of a particular size and quality, such agreement is lawful, on a favourable construction, founded on the usage and practice of mankind, although it be unlawful by analogy, as being the sale of a nonentity, which is prohibited.

Articles bespoke from the manufacture, in a contract of Sillim are considered as entities—It is to be observed that a contract for workmanship is a sale and not merely a promise. This is approved. The subject of the sale moreover, in such case, although in reality a nonentity, is yet considered, in effect, as an entity; and the thing upon which the contract rests is considered as a substance (that is, as boots, for instance), and not as the work of the manufacturer in an abstracted manner; and accordingly, if the manufacturer bring boots that had been worked by another, or boots which he had himself worked prior to the contract, and the person who had bespoke them should approve of the same, the contract is legally fulfilled.—Besides, articles that are bespoke are not determined for the person who bespoke them until he approves of them; and hence, if the workman should sell them to another before he had shown them to this person, it is lawful.—All this is approved.

And may be rejected, if disapproved, upon delivery.—Whosoever bespeaks goods of a workman has the option of taking or rejecting them, because of his having purchased articles which he has not seen.—The workman, however, has no option, insomuch that the person who bespoke them may, if he please, take them from him by force.—This is recorded by Mohammed, in the Maboot, and is the most authentic doctrine.—It is related, however, as an opinion of Haneefa, that the workman also has an option, insomuch as it is impossible for him to furnish the articles bespoke without detriment, since, in order to make boots (for instance), it is necessary to purchase hides, and instruments to cut them, and this is not free from loss.—It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that neither party possesses an option; for the workman, as being the seller, is not entitled to an option,—in the same manner as, in a sale of goods unseen, the seller hath no option; and with regard to the person who bespeaks the goods, if an option were given to him it would be an injury to the seller, since if he rejected the goods other people might not choose to purchase them for the value; as where, for instance, a commander of high rank bespeaks goods, and the workman accordingly makes them in a style suitable to his rank and he afterwards rejects them; in which case the common rank of people would not purchase them for their value.

An engagement with a manufacturer to furnish goods which it is not customary to bespeak is not valid — A contract with a workman for the furnishing of goods is not lawful with respect to such articles as it is not customary among mankind to bespeak, as cloth (for instance), because the bespeaking of goods is in itself unlawful, and is therefore admitted by the law only so far as it is authorized by the custom of mankind, which is considered as a necessary instrument of its legality. — It is also requisite, in bespeaking articles authorized by the custom of mankind, to disperse their quality, in order to enable the workman to furnish them accordingly and unless such description be given the contract is unlawful. — It is to be observed that the prohibition of a stipulation of period for delivery, as recited in the first of these cases relative to contracts of this kind, proceeds upon this ground, that if a period were stipulated in a contract for the supply of work of articles authorized by custom, and the price paid immediately to the workman, it would then become a sullim sale in the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf : in opposition to that, however, of the two disciples, who hold that it would still remain merely a contract for the supply of work; — but if the period should be stipulated in the case of articles not authorized by custom it then becomes a sullim sale in the opinions of all our doctors. — The reasoning of the two disciples in support of their opinion in the first case, is that the word Istsina literally means a requisition of workmanship, and ought of consequence to be used in that sense, so long as the context does not determine it to some other sense.

Objection. — The stipulation of a period is a context which clearly indicates that Istsina is to be taken in a sense different from its literal meaning; and that is to be understood as implying a sullim agreement; otherwise what need for the stipulation of a period? — It would therefore appear that in such a case it amounts to a sullim.

Reply. — The stipulation of a period, as in the first case, is not a convincing argument that the word Istsina is not to be taken in its literal sense, but ought to be understood as implying an agreement of sullim; because the stipulation of a period may be supposed to have been made with a view to expedition — and it may be supposed that the object of the bespeaker, in fixing a period, was to prevent delays: in opposition to the case of things not authorized by custom, for there a contract for a supply of workmanship, as being invalid is construed to mean a sullim sale, which is lawful.

The reasoning of Hanerfa is that, when a period is stipulated, it fixes the subject of the sale to be debt, because periods are not fixed except with regard to debts; and the subject being proved to be a debt, the construction of the contract into a sullim sale is easy and natural. It is therefore construed to be a sullim sale, which is lawful, in the opinion of all our doctors. beyond a doubt: whereas, there is a doubt with respect to the other, since practice means the deeds of all people of all countries, and this can never be known with certainty: as therefore, the legality of a sullim sale is certain, and practice is not free from doubt, it follows that it is preferable to construe a contract for a supply of work to mean a contract of sullim.

Section

Miscellaneous Cases.

It is lawful to sell dogs or hawks. — It is lawful to sell a dog or a hawk, whether trained or otherwise. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the sale of a dog that bites is not lawful, — and Shafei has said that the sale of a dog is absolutely illegal; because the Prophet has declared "the wages of whoredom, and the price of a dog, are in the number of prohibited things;" and also, because a dog is actual filth, and therefore deserving of abhorrence; whereas the legality of sale entitles the subject of it to respect; and is consequently incompatible with the nature of a dog. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold: First the Prophet has prohibited the sale of dogs, excepting such as are trained to hunt or to watch — Secondly, dogs are a species of property, inasmuch as they are capable of yielding profit by means of hunting and watching; and being property, they are therefore subjects of sale; in opposition to the case of noxious animals, such as snakes or scorpions, which are not capable of yielding use. With respect to the tradition quoted by Shafei, it applies to the infancy of Islam, at which period the Prophet prohibited every one from eating the price of a dog, in order to restrain men from a fondness for dogs, as it was then a custom to keep dogs of breed, and to suffer them to sleep on the same carpet. But when this custom fell into disuse, and men abstained from a fondness for dogs, the Prophet ordained the sale of them. With respect to the assertion of Shafei, that dogs are actual filth, it is not admitted; but admitting this, still it follows that the eating, and not the selling of them is unlawful.

It is not lawful to sell wine or pork. — The sale of wine or pork is not lawful; because, in the same manner as the Prophet has prohibited the eating or drinking of these, so also has he prohibited the sale of them, or the eating of the price of them; and also, because these are not substantial property with regard to Mussulmans, as has been before frequently explained.

Rules with respect to Zimmies in sale.
ZIMMERS, in purchase and sale, are the same as Mussulmans:—because the Prophet has said “Be regardful of Zimmers, for they are entitled to the same right, and subject to the same rules with Mussulmans!”—and also because, being under the same necessities, in the transaction of their concerns, as Mussulmans, they stand in need of the same immunities. They are therefore the same as Mussulman, with respect to purchase and sale,—excepting, however, in the sale of wine and pork, which is lawful to them, as the sale of wine, by them, is considered in the same light with that of the crude juice of the grape by the Mussulmans: and the sale of pork by them is equivalent to that of the flesh of a goat by Mussulmans: because these things are lawful in their belief, and we are commanded to suffer them to pursue their own tenets. Moreover, Omar commanded his agents to empower the Zimmes to sell wine, taking from them a tenth part of the price: a proof that the sale of wine is lawful among them.

A person inciting another to sell his property to a third person, by offering an addition over and above the price, is responsible for such addition; but not unless this addition be expressed as forming a part of the price.

If a person say to another, “sell your slave to a particular person for one thousand dirms, on condition that I be responsible to you for five hundred dirms, of the price, independent of the one thousand dirms,” and the said person act accordingly, it is valid, and he is entitled to one thousand dirms from the purchaser, and to five hundred dirms from the security; whereas if he were simply to say, “I will be responsible for five hundred dirms,” without mentioning the words “of the price,” the seller is, in that case, entitled only to the one thousand dirms from the purchaser, and has no claim on the surety. The reason of this is, that an increase in the price, or in the wares, is lawful, according to all our doctors, and is joined to the original contract (as has been already explained), being only an alteration of the contract from one lawful quality to another lawful quality; and as it is lawful for the purchaser to make an alteration in the price, although he be no gainer in other respects by it (as if he should increase the price, notwithstanding it be adequate to the value of the goods before the increase), so also it is lawful for a stranger to lay himself under an obligation for an increase of price, although he have no advantage in other respects; in the same manner as the consideration for Khoola becomes incumbent upon a wife in virtue of her assent to the Khoola, although she receive nothing in exchange, for woman is originally free, and the procurement of a divorce adds nothing to her original freedom. It is essential, therefore, to the validity of the seller’s claim upon this person, that the increase be opposed to the goods by the specification of the words “of a'ıe rd,'heo nhi'd f these words be omitted, the declaration or stipulation is of no account.

A female slave may be contracted in marriage by the purchaser without his taking possession of her.—If a person, having purchased a female slave, make her over in marriage to another before seisin, and that other cohabit with her, such marriage is lawful, as having been concluded in virtue of the authority of the proprietor—and it also determines the seisin of the purchaser. If, however, the husband should not cohabit with her, the marriage does not, in that case, determine the seisin according to a favourable construction of the law.—Analog, indeed would suggest that the purchaser becomes seized of the slave on the instant of the marriage-contract, since, in consequence thereof, the right of property over the slave is rendered virtually defective!—it would therefore follow, that the seisin becomes established as an effect of the contract, in the same manner as in the case of an actual defect occasioned by any act of a purchase. The reason for a more favourable construction, on this occasion, is that any act by which an actual defect is occasioned infers an exertion of power over the subject, which consequently established a seisin of the subject; but an act which merely induces a virtual defect does not admit of this inference, so as to establish seisin.

Case of the purchaser disappearing, without taking possession of his purchase, or paying the price.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should afterwards absent himself without taking possession, or paying the price, and the seller prove by witnesses that he had sold the slave to the absentee, in that case, provided the place of his retirement be known and ascertained, the slave cannot be re-sold on account of the exigencies of the seller, for these may be otherwise answered, and such sale would destroy the right of the first purchaser:—but if the absentee’s place of retirement be not known, he may be resold, and the debt of the purchaser to the seller paid by means of the price; for the seller has proved, by witnesses, that the slave is the property of the purchaser, and that he has a claim upon him; and consequently, when the place of retirement of the purchaser is unknown, it is incumbent on the magistrate to direct the slave to be sold for the satisfaction of the seller; which could not otherwise be obtained:—in the same manner as where a pawnor dies before having released his pledge, in which case it is sold for the discharge of his debt to the pawnholder. It is otherwise where the purchaser disappears after seisin, for in this case the slave cannot be sold to answer the right of the seller, since his right is not particularly connected with the slave, as he, in such a circumstance, stands in the same predicament with the other creditors. It is to be observed that, in case of the slave being sold an account of the seller, if anything remain after the discharge of his claim by means o the price the seller must keep such remainder in behalf of the purchaser, to whom it is due as an exchange for his property;—but if the price should not suffice to answer his claim, he is in that case entitled afterwards to the remainder, from the purchaser.

Or of one or two purchasers disappearing under the same circumstances. Assuming there be two purchasers, and only one of them disappear, the one of that is present is entitled to pay the whole of the price of the slave, and to take complete possession of him; and if, in this case, the other purchaser afterward appear, he is not entitled to receive his share until he shall have paid to his partner the price of it. This is the adjudication of Haneefa and Mohammed.
Abu Yoosaf has said that, if the present purchaser pay the whole of the price, still he is only entitled to take possession of his own share, and that as the payment of the debt of the absentee was an unsolicited act in his favour, he is not ent-titled to receive it from him, since he paid it without his authority. Besides, as the present purchaser is, as it were, a stranger with respect to the absentee, he is not ent-titled to take possession of his share. The reasoning of Haneefa is that the present purchaser, in making payment on behalf of the absentee, acted from necessity, and not from choice; because it was not otherwise possible for him to enjoy his own share, since having purchased the slave jointly with the other man, it was indisputable for him to detain him in his possession whilst there existed the claim of another with respect to part of him. Now whosoever pays the debt of another from necessity is entitled to repayment, withstanding his having acted without authority;
as in the case of the loan of pledge; for if a person lend to another something in order that he may pledge it, and that other having pledged it accordingly, the lender afterwards, from a necessary want of the said thing, redeems it from the pawnee, he is, in such case, entitled to repayment from the borrower, even though he have redeemed the pledge without authority from him. Since therefore the present purchaser, in the case in question, has a right to repayment from the absentee, it follows that he has also a right to detain in his possession the share of the absentee until he receive payment of the sum due to him; in the same manner as an agent for purchase, who pays from his own property the price of the goods purchased on behalf of his constituent, is entitled to retain possession of them until he receive payment of the price from his constituent.

Case of gold and silver being indefinitely mentioned in the offer of a price. If a person purchase a female slave in exchange for one thousand miskals of gold and silver,— saying, "I purchase this slave for one thousand miskals of gold and silver," in that case it is incumbent on him to pay five hundred miskals of gold, and five hundred miskals of silver; for the reference of the miskals to the gold and silver having been in an equal degree applicable to each, an equal proportion in the payment is of consequence incumbent.—If, on the other hand the purchaser should say, "I have purchased this slave in exchange for one thousand of gold and silver, in this case he must pay five hundred miskals of gold, and five hundred dirms of silver (of the septimal weight):
for the terms one thousand having been referred to the gold and silver in a general manner, it is therefore construed to apply to the weight in common use with respect to each in particular.

The receipt of base money instead of good money, if it be lost or expended, is a complete discharge. If a person indebted to another in the amount of ten dirms of a good sort, afterwards pay him this amount in an inferior species, and the lender, being ignorant of the diminution of value, receives it, and afterwards expend them, or lose them, in this case the debt is completely discharged, and the creditor is not entitled to any compensation for the difference of quality.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.

Abu Yoosaf has said that in this case the creditor is entitled to return to the debtor a tantamount of dirms of the sort be received and 'o demand from him ten dirms of a superior sort, to which he has a right; because, in the same manner as his right relates to the substance of the dirms so received, so is it established in the quality. A conservation of each right is therefore indispensable; but as the conservation of the second right, by means of an allowance in exchange for the difference of quality, is impracticable (since quality in homogenous articles is of no relative value), this mode must necessarily be adopted. The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is, that the bad dirms are of the same species with the good; and that after the receipt and expenditure, or destruction of them, the debt is discharged; because the claim which remains relates to quality, and this is impossible to satisfy by the granting of a compensation, inasmuch as quality in itself bears no value.

Articles of a neutral nature do not become property but by actual seizin.—If a bird incubate its eggs in the land of a particular person, the right of property over broad does not, in virtue of such incubation, vest
in the proprietor of the ground; on the contrary, they remain free to the person who shall first seize them. The law is also the same with respect to eggs which a bird, lays upon any particular ground. So also, if a deer should sleep for a night in a field, it does not, by that fact, become the property of the proprietor of that field; on the contrary, it remains free to whatsoever it may be caught by. The reason of this is that both the young ones and the deer are considered in the nature of game, and as such are free to the person who catches them, although no stratagem be used for that purpose;—and the same, also, of eggs; whence, if a Moharam should either break or broil them, he is subject to make expiation.—Moreover, the proprietor did not purposely prepare his land that the bird should lay or incubate her eggs, or that the deer should sleep upon it. It is therefore the part of a person should spread out his net for the purpose of drying it. In which case, if any game should fall into it, it would not become immediately the property of the proprietor of the net, but would continue natural until some one seize it; or, if any game should come into a house, in which case it does not become the immediate property of the proprietor of the house. Or, as if a person, scattering sugar or dirms, for instance, among the people, should chance to throw these into the clothes of some one, in which case the property does not immediately vest in that person, until he warp it up or prepare to seize it. It is otherwise with respect to honey. For the property of it vests in the proprietor of the ground in which t is gathered together; because honey is considered as the produce of the ground. And hence the proprietor of the ground obtains a property in it as a dependent of the soil, in the same manner as in the trees which grow in his land, or in which water flows through it.

BOOK XVII

OF SirF SALE

Definition of Sirf sale.—Beyzâ Sirf means a pure sale; of which the articles opposed in exchange to each other are both representatives of price. This is termed Sirf, because Sirf means a removal, and in this mode of sale it is necessary to remove the articles opposed to each other in exchange from the hands of each of the parties, respectively, into those of the other. Sirf also means superiority; and in this kind of sale a superiority is the only object; that is, a superiority of quality, fashion, or workmanship; for gold or silver being, with respect to their substance, of no use, are only desirable from such superiority.

The articles opposed must be exactly equal in point of weight; but may differ in quality.—The sale of gold for gold, or silver for silver, is permitted only when they are exactly equal in point of weight; but the one may be of a superior quality to the other; or the one may be bullion, and the other may be wrought; because the Prophet has said "Sell gold for gold, from hand to hand, at an equal rate according to weight for any inferior quality in point of weight is usury." And he has also declared "the goodness and bandness of quality is the same" (as has been already explained in the preceding book treating of sale).

The exchange must take place upon the spot.—Mutual seisin is an indispensable requisite in a Sirf sale;—that is, it is indispensable that each of the parties, prior to their departure from the meeting, take possession of the article respectively given in exchange; because of the tradition above quoted; and also, because Omar and to one of the parties in a Sirf sale. "If the other party require leave to go to his house, yet you must not grant it."—Besides, the seisin of one of the parties is an indispensable requisite, lest the contract prove to be an exchange of a debt for a debt; and as the seisin of one of the parties is requisite, it follows that, in order to establish an equality the seisin of the other is also requisite, since usury would otherwise be induced. In a sale of this nature, moreover, neither subject has a priority with respect to the other; and hence a mutual seisin is requisite, whether both the subjects be of a definite nature (as in the sale of one silver vessel for another silver vessel), or of a nature not determinate (as in the sale of dirms and deenars in exchange for dirms and deenars), or of them determinate and the other not (as in the sale of a silver vessel in exchange for dirms and deenars); because the tradition enjoining a mutual seisin is absolute, and makes no discrimination of these circumstances—Besides, although a silver vessel be determinate, still there subsists a doubt with respect to its determination, inasmuch as silver is considered in its nature as a representative of price; and, in a case of this nature, a doubt is a sufficient cause for the necessity of seisin, because a doubt, in matter relative to usury, is equivalent to a reality.—It is to be observed what is meant by mutual seisin, is that both parties make seisin prior to their separation; whence if the parties walk aside together, or sleep in the place of meeting, or become insensible, the Sirf sale is not thereby rendered null, because Omar has said "If the seller, in Sirf sale should leap from the top of the house, you leap after him. Gold may be sold for silver, at an unequal rate provided the exchange take place upon the spot.—The sale of gold in exchange for silver, at an unequal rate, is permitted, because these articles are of a different genus. Still, however, in such case, mutual seisin is indispensable, because the Prophet has said, "The sale of gold for silver is usury unless it be from hand to hand." If, therefore, the parties separate before both or one of them make seisin, the sale is invalid; and hence it is not lawful to stipulate an optional condition, or an optional period, because such stipulations are preventive of mutual seisin, which is an indispensable condition. If, however, a Sirf sale be contracted with an optional condition, and the condition be afterwards removed, previous to the separation of the parties, the Sirf sale is in that case valid, because of the cause of its invalidity being destroyed previous to its complete establishment.

No act can be performed with relation to he return until it be received.—Any deed with respect to the return in a Sirc sale, previous to seisin of it, is unlawful. If, therefore, a person, having sold a dener for ten dirms, should, previous to the seisin of them, purchase a piece of cloth for them, in that case the sale of the cloth is invalid, on this principle, that the seisin of the ten dirms was absolutely incumbent; because otherwise the Sirc sale would be usurious; and as God has prohibited usury, it follows that, if the sale of the cloth were licenced, an absolute commandment of God would thereby be defeated.—It is related, as an opinion of Ziffer, that the sale of the cloth is capable of being rendered valid; because dirms being undeterminate, it follows that the price of the cloth relates to ten dirms in an absolute manner, and not to the ten dirms of the Sirc sale in a specific manner. Our doctors on the other hand, argue that price, in a Sirc sale, is also a subject of the sale: because, as every sale must have a subject, and as the articles, in a Sirc sale, are both representatives of price, without any of them having a preference over the other, it follows that either of them is the subject; and the sale of the subject previous to the seisin is unlawful.

Objection.—The consideration, in a Sirc sale, is a representative of price, and therefore of an undeterminate nature: whence it would follow that it cannot be considered as the subject, since the subject of a sale is required to be determinate.

Reply.—The subject of a sale is not required to be determinate; for, in a Sillim sale the thing on account of which the advance is made is the subject of the sale; but still it is undeterminate.

Gold may be sold for silver, by conjecture: but not gold for gold, nor silver for silver.—The sale of gold for silver, by conjecture, is lawful, because equality, in a sale or this nature, is not required;—it is unlawful, however, to sell gold for gold, or silver for silver, by conjecture, because in such sale there is a suspicion of usury.

In the sale of an article having any gold or silver upon it, the price paid down is opposed to the gold or silver.—If a person sell, for two thousand Miskals of silver, a female slave whose real value is one thousand Miskals, and on whose neck there is a collar of silver equivalent to one thousand Miskals of silver, and the purchaser having paid a thousand Miskals of silver, ready money, the parties then separate from the meeting: such payment is considered to be the price of the collar; so much of the price of the whole was a necessary condition, as the sale in that proportion was a Sirc sale; and hence it is reasonable to conclude that the seller paid the exact amount of which he knew the seisin to be indispensably necessary. In the same manner, also, if he purchaser the said slave with the collar, for two thousand Miskals of silver, of which one thousand is prompt and the other thousand postponed, the prompt payment is considered the price of the collar, because the stipulation of payment at a future period not being lawful in a Sirc sale, and being permitted in the sale of a slave, it is reasonable to suppose that the parties in contracting the sale, and stipulating the distant period, intended to proceed according to law.—If, also, a person sell, for one hundred dirms, a sword, of which the silver ornaments amount to fifty dirms, and the purchaser pay immediately fifty dirms of the price in prompt payment, such sale is lawful, and the payment made is considered to be for the price of the ornaments, although the purchaser may not have specified this.—The same rule, also, holds if the purchaser say to the seller, "Take this: fifty dirms in part of the price of both" (that is, of the ornaments and sword), because two things are sometimes mentioned where only one is intended, and this supposition is here adopted from the probability of it. If, however, the parties separate without a mutual seisin, the sale is null with respect to the silver ornaments because of its being in that degree a Sirc sale, to the validity of which mutual seisin is essential:—or, if the sword be so far reckoned as not to admit a separation of the ornaments without sustaining detriment, the sale of it is in this case also null, because so situated the separate sale of it is not permitted. In the same manner as it is not permitted to sell the beam of a roof.—If, on the other hand, the sword admit of a separation of the ornaments, without detriment, the sale, in the manner above mentioned, is valid with respect to the sword; but with respect to the ornament it is null.—It is to be observed that the sale of a sword with silver ornaments, without the dirms is lawful only where the silver of the dirms exceeds that of the ornaments; and that, if the silver of the dirms be either barely equal to, or less than, that of the ornaments,—or if it be not known whether it be more or less, the sale is invalid. The reason of the invalidity in case of its not being known whether it be more or less, is, that the probability is in favour of its being invalid; since there are two causes of invalidity, namely, equality and inferiority; whereas there is only one cause of validity, viz., superiority.

In the purchase of plate, if the parties separate before payment of the full price, the sale is valid only in the proportion paid.—If a person, having sold to another a silver vessel, should receive payment in part, and both parties then separate, in that case the sale is null with respect to the amount remaining to be paid, but valid in the amount taken possession of; and the parties have each a share in the property of the vessel;—because this sale is Sirc, or pure, with regard to the whole of the subject, and consequently valid in that degree in which the conditions of a pure sale have been observed, and invalid in the degree in which they have been omitted; for the invalidity, in this case, is not essential, but accidental, inasmuch as the sale was valid in its formation, and afterwards, by the separation of the parties after the receipt of a part, became invalid with relation to part of the subject: and hence the validity, which is accidental, does not operate upon the part in which all the conditions of the sale have been observed.

Or, if it be discovered to be in part the property of another, the purchaser may relinquish the bargain.—If a person sell a silver vessel which afterwards appears to be in part the property of another, in that case the purchaser has the option either of retaining a right of property in the remaining part of the vessel, or of cancelling the bargain entirely: because partnership in a vessel is equivalent to a blemish in it.

But this does not hold with respect to an ingot.—If a person sell an ingot of silver, and part of it afterwards appears to be the property of another, the purchaser is in that case constrained to take the remaining part at a proportionate price; and he is not allowed an option, in this instance, because the division of an ingot of silver does not in any shape injure it.

Where the article, on each side, consists of two species of money, the sale at an unequal rate is lawful. The sale of two dirms and one deenar, in exchange for two deenars and one dirm, is valid; because in this case the dirms are considered as opposed to the deenars; and as they are of a different genus, an inequality in the proportion is therefore admitted. Shafei and Ziffer maintain that this sale is unlawful; and they have disagreed in the same manner with respect to the legality of the sale of one Koor of barley and one Koor of wheat in exchange for two Koors of wheat and two Koors of barley. Their reasoning in support of their opinion is that the seller and buyer have opposed one total to another total; and this requires that every separate part of the one be opposed to every separate part of the other (in an indefinite and not a definite manner);—now in the opposing of each genus respectively, to a different genus, a modification is induced in this particular, which is not lawful, notwithstanding such a construction of the sale be the means of rendering it valid. In the same manner as where a person, for ten dirms, purchases a silver bracelet weighing ten dirms, and again, for other ten dirms, purchases a piece of cloth, and then disposes of both articles together by a Moorabihat contract (suppose) for thirty dirms, in which case the Moorabihat sale is invalid, although it be possible, by supposing the whole of the profit to be exacted on the cloth, to render it valid:—or, where a person purchases a slave for one thousand dirms, and previous to the payment of the price, sells him, along with another, for fifteen hundred dirms, to the person from whom he had bought the slave for one thousand dirms: for in this case the sale is invalid in relation to the slave of a thousand dirms because there is a possibility that the other slave may have been worth more than five hundred dirms; and supposing this, it necessarily follows that the seller has purchased the slave for a smaller price than that for which he formerly sold him; although in this case it be possible to render the sale valid by supposing the one slave to be opposed to one thousand dirms, in a specific manner, and the other to five hundred dirms, so as to remove the possibility of the seller having received him at a smaller price than that for which he had sold him;—or, where a seller, having exhibited two slaves, of which one only is his property, says to the purchaser, "I have sold to you one of these slaves," in which case the sale is invalid, notwithstanding it be possible to render it valid by supposing that the seller meant his own slave:—or, where a person sells a dirm and a piece of cloth for a dirm and a piece of cloth, and both parties then separate without making seisin,—in which case the sale is invalid, although it be possible to render it valid by supposing the dirms on each side to have been opposed to the cloth of the other:—or, in all these cases, although there be a possibility of rendering the sales valid, will they remain invalid, for the reasons already alleged. The arguments of our doctors are, that the opposition of a total to a total, provided it be in an absolute manner (that is, without any particular specification), admits of this supposition, that the separate parts are opposed to the separate parts;—as in the case of an homogeneous sale, for instance, such as a sale of two dirms for two dirms, in which the unities on each side are opposed to those on the other respectively; whereas, if the separate parts of the subject of the sale, instead of being opposed to each other in a definite manner, should be opposed to each other in an indefinite manner, the sale in the amount seised would not be lawful, since it must necessarily follow that the amount seised by each of the parties would stand opposed indefinitely, to what was seised and what was not seised. It is therefore evident that the opposition of a total to a total infers the opposition of the unities respectively; and as this, to give validity to the contract in question, must be in a definite manner, it is presumed to be so, in order that the contract may be valid. With respect to what Ziffer and Shafei urge, that "a modification is induced with regard to the requisites of the contract," we reply, that a modification is induced with respect to the quality of the contract, but not with respect to the origina is valid, but abominable. But if, on the contrary, the additional thing bear no value (such as dust, for instance), the sale is not valid, because of its being usurious, inasmuch as nothing is opposed to the difference of the weight.

A debt may be commuted in the course of a Sif sale.—If a person, indebted to another to the amount of ten dirms, sell to his creditor one deenar for ten dirms. and having delivered the deenar to him, the parties then commute the ten dirms which they reciprocally owe to each other, it is lawful. This case, however, supposes the sale of the deenar to relate to ten dirms in an absolute manner, and not to the debt.

One pure and two base dirms may be sold for two base and one pure.—The sale of one pure dirm and two base ones in exchange for two pure dirms and one base one, is lawful.

By a base dirms is to be understood, such as passes amongst merchants, but is rejected at the public treasury.—The reason of the legality, in this instance, is that an equality according to weight is established, and the quality of purity is of no account.

Description of, and rules respecting, base coinage.—Dirms in which the silver is predominant are considered as silver, and deenars in which the gold is predominant are considered as gold; and a difference in the proportion with respect to them in a sale is consequently unlawful, in the same manner as in the case of pure dirms or deenars. Hence it is unlawful either to sell base money in exchange for pure, or base in exchange for base, unless upon a footing of equality in regard to weight. In the same manner, also, it is unlawful to borrow base money except according to weight: for dirms and deenars, in common, are not free from a mixture of base metal; because gold and silver do not receive the impression well without a mixture of it, and it is sometimes innate in them.

If, however in dirms and deenars, the base metal predominate, they are not, in effect, dirms and deenars, because the law adverts to the predominancy. Hence if a person should purchase pure silver in exchange for dirms of that nature, the law is the same as has been already stated in the case of a sword with silver ornaments. It is lawful, moreover, to sell dirms and deenars of this nature in exchange for others of the same kind, at an unequal proportion; for as these consist of two different materials (namely, gold and base metal, or silver and base metal), one genus may therefore be opposed to another. This, however, is nevertheless a Sif sale, because of there being an opposition of gold or silver on each side; and hence mutual seisin in the meeting is necessary; and in the same manner as seisin of the silver or gold is necessary in the meeting, so also is that of the base metal, because a separation cannot be effected without detriment.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes, that the modern lawyers of his country do not pass decrees agreeably to this doctrine; for as base money is there much in use, it follows that if the sale of it at an unequal proportion were permitted, the door of usury would thereby be opened. With respect to money in which the base metal predominates, it is to be remarked that, if it pass current by weight, purchase, sale, and loans are transacted in it by weight. If, on the other hand, it pass current by tale, all matters are transacted in it by tale. — If, however, both modes prevail, it is in that case permitted to follow either; for custom is decisive with respect to matters of this kind, provided they be not otherwise determined by the ordinances of the LAW. — It is also to be observed, that money of this kind, whilst it continues in use, is a representative of price, and is therefore incapable of being rendered determinate; but if it should not be in use, it is considered as other wares or articles of merchandise, and is therefore capable of being rendered determinate.

If dirms be adulterated to such a degree as to pass current with some but not with others, they are equivalent to Zeyf or base dirms. Hence, if a person enter into a contract for something in exchange for a hundred specific dirms of this description, the contract does not relate to those specific dirms in particular, but to a similar amount of base dirms, provided the seller were aware of the circumstance; — but if otherwise, it relates to a similar number of pure dirms; — because in the first case the assent of the seller to receive the base species is established by his knowledge of the baseness, — whereas in the second case his assent is unestablished because of his ignorance of the baseness.

A sale for base dirms is null, if they lose their currency before the period of payment. — If a person purchase wares in exchange for base dirms, and, previous to the payment of them, they should fall into general disuse, in that case the sale, according to Haneefa, is null. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that it is incumbent on the purchaser to pay the value which these dirms bore on the day of sale. Mohammed, on the other hand, alleges that it is incumbent on him to pay the value which they bore on the last day of their currency. The arguments of the two disciples are that the contract in itself is valid; but the delivery of the dirms becomes impracticable from the disuse of them; a circumstance, however, which does not induce invalidity; — any more than where a person purchases an article for fresh dates, and the season for those passes away; — in which case the sale is not invalid; and so also in the case in question. — As, therefore, the contract is not invalid, but still endures, it follows that, according to Aboo Yoosaf the value the dirms bore at the time of the sale is due, because from that period responsibility for them takes place; in the same manner as in a case of usuration; — and that, according to Mohammed (on the other hand) the value they bore on the last day of their currency is due, since at that period the right of the seller shifted from them to their value. — The argument of Haneefa is that the price is destroyed by the disuse; for money is the representative of price solely from custom, and hence this property is annulled from disuse. The sale, therefore, remains without any price being involved in it; and is consequently null; and as the sale is null, it is of course incumbent on the purchaser to restore the goods to the seller, provided they be extant; or, if otherwise, the value which they bore on the day he obtained possession of them; in the same manner as in an invalid sale.

Rules with respect to copper coinage. — A sale in exchange for Faloo is valid, because they are considered as durable property. If, therefore, the Faloo pass in currency, the sale is lawful, although they may not have been specified, — because Faloo is, from custom, representatives of price, and consequently stand not in need of specification. If, however, they should not pass in currency, it is in that case requisite that they be particular specified, in the same manner as other articles of merchandise.

If a person purchase wares for Faloo, which at that time passed in currency, but which previous to the payment of them fell into disuse, the sale is in that case null, according to Haneefa: contrary, however, to the opinion of the two disciples. — The difference of opinion upon this point is analogous to what has been already mentioned in treating of dirms in which the alloy is predominant.

If a person borrow Faloo, and their currency should afterwards cease, then, according to Haneefa, the borrower must make repayment in similars; * because Karz [a loan of money] is equivalent to Areeat [a loan of substance], and therefore requires the restoration of the actual article with respect to its nature, that is, its value. — The property of representing price, moreover, is merely an adventitious property, in copper coin, to which no regard is had in the borrowing of them; on the contrary, they are borrowed on the principle of their being similars; and this quality they retain after the disuse of them as money, whereas it is that a loan in them is valid after they have lost their currency. — According to the two disciples, on the contrary, the borrower must in this case pay to the lender the value of the Faloo; for their quality of representation of price being annulled by the disuse,

*By similars is always understood any articles compensable by an equal number of the same description, such as eggs for eggs, Faloo for Faloo. &c. It is treated of at large in various other parts of the work.

it is therefore impracticable for the borrower to restore them with the qualities they possessed when he received them; and hence, as the payment of similars would be an injury, it is required that he pay the value, in the same manner as holds where a person borrows any articles of which the units are similar, and the whole genus of which afterwards becomes extinct. According to Aboo Yoosaf, their value must be fixed from the day of seisin; and according to Mohammed, from the last day of their currency, in conformity with what has been already explained. This difference of opinion originates in a difference of doctrine respecting a case where a person usurps an article of the class of similars, and of which the similars afterwards become extinct. When, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the usurper is responsible for the value the article bore to the day of usurpation; and according to Mohammed, for the value it bore on the last day of its existence. It is to be observed that the opinion of Mohammad is founded upon tenderness to mankind, and that of Aboo Yoosaf on convenience.

It is lawful for a person to purchase any thing in exchange for a half dirm of Faloos; and in this case he required to pay the number of Faloos adequate to the price of half a dirm. In the same manner, it is lawful to purchase any thing for the Faloos of a drink, or silver, or a Kerat of silver. In all these cases, Ziffer is of opinion that the bargain is unlawful, because Faloos being an article of tale, estimated by number and not by their relation to dirms or daniks, a specification of the number ought therefore to have been made. The reasoning of our doctors is, that the exact number of Faloos adequate to the price of a half dirm, or danik, is known (for the case question proceeds on the supposition of such a knowledge), and that a specification of the number is therefore unnecessary. If the purchaser were to say, “I have bought this thing for the Faloos of one dirm, or two dirms,” the bargain in that case also valid, according to Aboo Yoosaf; for this expression means the number of Faloos to which the price of one or two dirms is adequate, and not the weight. It is related as an opinion of Mohammed, that a sale for the Faloos of one dirm is not lawful; but that a sale for the Faloos of any thing under a dirm is lawful, as it is customary to purchase things for Faloos, where the value is not adequate to a dirm, but not otherwise. Lawyers have observed, that the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf is the most approved, especially in countries where the practise of selling and purchasing for Faloos is common, and where, of course, the rate they bear, with respect to dirms, is known and ascertained.

If a person, having delivered a dirm to a Sirraf, or money changer, should say to him, “Give me Faloos in exchange for one half of this, and a half dirm wanting one grain of silver in exchange for the other half,” in this case the sale, according to the two disciples, is valid with respect to the half in exchange for Faloos, and invalid with respect to the other; because the sale of a half dirm in exchange for Faloos is lawful (as has been already explained); but the exchange of a half dirm in exchange for a half dirm wanting one grain of silver, is usurious, and, consequently, unlawful. Agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, the sale is in this case completely null, because the whole is comprehend under one contract, and the invalidity being strong, with respect to a part, does therefore communicate itself to the whole. If, however, the word “Give” be repeated, by the person saying “Give me Faloos in exchange for one half, and give me a half dirm wanting one grain in exchange for the other half,” the opinion of Haneefa, in such case, accords with that of the two disciples, because here exist two separate sales, one valid, and the other invalid. If the purchaser, without opposing the halves of the dirm, were to say, “Give me, in exchange for this dirm, the Faloos of half a dirm, and a half dirm wanting one grain; “the sale is valid in full, because, in this case, it is construed to be an opposition, on the one hand, of one half dirm wanting a grain in exchange for one half dirm wanting a grain; and on the other, of a half dirm with the superaddition of a grain for the Faloos of a half dirm; and this is lawful.

OF KAFALIT, OR BAIL.

Definition of the terms used in bail.—

Kafalit, literally, means junction. In the language of the law it signifies the junction of one person to another in relation to a claim (some have said, in relation to a debt only; but the first is the most approved definition).—The person who renders obligatory on himself, the claim of another, whether it relate to person or property, in

BAIL

CHAPTER I.

Distinction.—Bail is of two descriptions. I. Bail for the person, which is termed Hazir-Zamini. II. Bail for property, which is termed Mal-Zamini.

Bail for the person.—Bail for the person is valid; and in virtue of it the surety is bound to produce the principal, or person whom he has bailed. Shafei is of opinion that bail for the person is not valid, because the surety undertakes and renders obligatory on himself a delivery which he is not capable of performing, inasmuch as he possesses no power or authority over the person of the principal: contrary to bail for property, as in that case the surety possesses power and authority over his own property is thereby enabled to discharge the obligation he has contracted. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has said, "The surety is responsible," which is a proof that both modes of bail are lawful. Secondly, the surety is in a degree capable of delivering the person for whom he is bail, as he may inform the claimant of his place of abode, and thus remove the bar between them, since, after obtaining such knowledge, the claimant may demand the aid of the officers of the Kazee, by whose means he may secure his presence. There is, moreover, a necessity amongst mankind for this kind of bail; and the characteristic of bail, namely, a junction of one person to another in relation to a claim, is observed in it.

Under what forms contracted.—Bail for the person is contracted, where any one says: "I have become bail for the person of a particular man," or, "for his neck," or, "for his soul," or, "for his body," or, "for his head," or "for his face;" because some of these words really mean, in their common acceptance, that whole of the person, and otherwise that sense metaphorically, as has been already explained under the head of divorce. The effect is also the same when a person says, "I have become bail for the half of a certain person," or "for a third of him," or "for a part of him;" because the person, in the case of bail, being incapable of division of dismemberment, the mention of a part indefinitely is therefore equivalent to the mention of the whole. It is otherwise where a person says, "I have become bail for the hand" (or the foot), because neither of these parts are ever used to denote the whole of the person, and the bail so given is therefore invalid.

If a person say, "I am responsible (Zamin for such a person," it is a valid bail: because this is an express declaration of the intention of bail. It is also a valid bail, if a person say, "This is upon me," or, "This is towards me," because both these expressions indicate an obligatory engagement. In the same manner, also, bail is contracted by the words Zeyim and Kabeel, for both of these signify bail, and hence it is that bail-bonds and other instruments of obligation are termed Kabala. If, on the contrary, a person say, "I am responsible for the notoriety of a certain bail, or bail is not contracted, since the responsibility, in such case, relates merely to the notoriety and not to the claim. Hence, if a person should say, in the Persian language, "His acquaintance is upon me," he does not thereby become bail. If, however, he should say, "He is my acquaintance," lawyers are of opinion that he becomes bail because of ancient custom.

The surety must deliver up the person for whom he is bail at the stipulated period; and in failure of this is liable to imprisonment. If, in a contract of bail, it be stipulated that the surety, bail, or bail, is to be over the principal or person bailed to the claimant, it is in that case necessary that he be delivered to the claimant if it be required, either at the fixed period, or at any time afterwards, in order that the surety may acquit himself of the engagement into which he has entered. If, therefore, he deliver the person bailed on the demand of the claimant, he then becomes released from his engagement; but if he refuse to deliver him, the magistrate must in that case imprison him for failure in the performance of his engagement. He is not, however, to be imprisoned on the first summons, as he may not then know for what reason the Kazee had summoned him.

If the principal disappear, the surety must be indulged with time to search for him; and the contract is fulfilled by delivering up the principal at any place which admits of litigation. If, in a case of bail for the person, the principal should disappear, it is in that case incumbent on the Kazee to afford the surety a sufficient period to go and come in search of him; and afterwards to imprison him, in case of his not producing the principal, because he is then proved to have failed in his engagement. If, however, he produce the principal and deliver him to the claimant, in such a place as may enable him to litigate his suit with him, the surety is then released from his engagement of bail, because of his performance of the obligation he had contracted; and the end of the contract is likewise answered, as it only requires that he deliver him once if he should have agreed to deliver him "in the assembly of the Kazee," and afterwards deliver him in the market-place, still he is released from his engagement, because the object of the bail is answered. (Many have observed that in the present age the surety would not in such case be released from his obligation; because, as the probability in this age is that the people would aid the defendant in preventing his appearance in the assembly of the Kazee, and that they would not assist the claimant in enforcing it, such a clause is therefore beneficial.)—If, however, the surety deliver over the principal in a desert, he is not released from his engagement, because the claimant could not in such place litigate his suit with him, and the object of bail remains therefore unaccomplished. In the same manner, he is not released from his obligation in case he deliver him up in a village where there is no Kazee; because, where there is no Kazee, the claimant can obtain the decree. If he should deliver him up in another city than that in which he had entered into the contract of bail, he is then (according to Hanefi) exempted from any further obligation.—The two disciples are of a different opinion, because it may often happen that the witnesses are in the city in which the contract was formed—if, moreover, he deliver over the principal in the prison, where he has been previously confined by another for a different cause, he is not released from his engagement because the claimant has no power, in such situation, to litigate his suit with him.

The death of the principal releases the surety.—If, in a case of bail for the person, the principal should die, the surety is then released from his engagement; first, because of the impracticability of producing the person; and, secondly, because in the same manner as the appearance of the principal is by such event defeated, so also is the enforcement of it on the part of the surety.

And the death of the surety annuls the contract.—The same rule also holds in case of the death of the surety; because it then becomes impracticable for him to deliver up his principal; and, also, because his property is not of an analogous nature, so as to admit a discharge of the obligation by means of it. It is otherwise in the case of bail for property, for if the surety for property die, the obligation of bail does not then cease, since it is necessary to discharge it by means of his property, to whatever amount he may have rendered himself liable.

If the claimant die, the heirs or executors may demand the fulfilment—if the claimant should die, his executor (if there be any), or otherwise his heirs, are entitled to claim the fulfilment from the surety; because heirs and executors represent the dead.

The surety is released by delivering up his suretee.—If, in a case of bail for the person, the surety should not stipulate its release from the bail on the delivery of the person, he is nevertheless released on such delivery, because this being the intention of the contract, it is consequently established independent of an express declaration. It is to be observed, likewise, that the surety becomes exempt from his obligation on the delivery of the person, without the acceptance of the claimant being required as a condition, in the same manner as in the payment of a debt.

Or, by delivering himself up.—The effect is also the same, in case the principal should of himself present his person, as if he should say, "I have presented myself on account of the bail of a particular person who has become surety for me." This is approved because the surety being entitled to contend with him, in order that he may deliver himself up, it is therefore permitted to him to deliver himself up voluntarily to prevent contention.

Or, by his being delivered up by a messenger.—It is also lawful for the agent or messenger of the surety to deliver the person, as these are the representatives of the surety himself.

The payment of the claim may be suspended upon the non-production of the principal.—If a person become bail for the appearance of another, on this condition, that, if he do not deliver him within a particular period, he shall then be responsible for the claim upon him (a thousand dirms, for instance, and he afterwards fail of producing him within the fixed period, he is then bound to make good the claim upon the suretee; because, in this case a bail for property is suspended on the condition, namely, the failure in producing the person within a fixed period; and such suspension is valid, because of the custom of mankind.

But still the bail for the person remains in force—Hence, when the condition is not fulfilled, the surety becomes responsible for the claim; and he is not, nevertheless, released from the bail for the person; because bail for the person and bail for the property are not incompatible.—Shafii maintains that the bail in this instance is not valid; because bail for property induces a responsibility for property in the same manner as sale; and hence it is unlawful to suspend it on a matter of doubt and uncertainty; in the same manner as in the case of sale.—The reasoning of our doctors is that bail for property is ultimately like sale, inasmuch as it entitles the surety to repayment from the principal of what he advanced to the claimant on his account; and that in the beginning it resembles a gift, being an acquiescence in responsibility without any exchange.—In due observance: therefore, of both these circumstances, it is declared that the suspension of it, on an uncertain condition (such as the blowing of the wind, the falling of the rain, and the like), is invalid; but that it is valid if suspended on a certain condition, such as in the case in question.

If the time be fixed, and the suretee die in the interim, the surety becomes responsible.

If a person be bail for the appearance of another "on the morrow," under a condition of answering the claim upon the other himself, in case of failure, and the principal die before the morrow, he is in that case surety for the property; because here the condition on which he agreed to the responsibility clearly takes place.

Case of bail for property, connected with bail for the person.—If a person claim one hundred deenars from another, either with or without an explanation of their quality, and a third person become bail for the person of the debtor, under a condition that "if he do not deliver him on the morrow, he shall be responsible for an hundred deenars," and he fail in the delivery of him on the next day, he is in that case responsible, according to the Hanafi and Mokatib. For the one hundred deenars, Mohammed maintains that if the quality of the deenars be not explained previous to the acceptance of the bail, the claimant has no right afterwards to explain their quality and demand them from the surety.—His arguments in support of this opinion are twofold. First, the surety has reated indefinite money upon a matter of doubt and uncertainty, inasmuch as he has not specifically referred the one hundred deenars to those which were claimed (for which reason the bail is invalid, even if a definition of the quality have been previously given).—Secondly, the claim of an hundred deenars without a definition of their quality, is invalid; whence no obligation lies on the surety to produce the debtor; and as, where the production of the debtor is not obligatory on the surety, the bail for the person is of consequence invalid. It follows, that the bail for the property is also invalid, since this rests upon the other. (From what is here advanced it appears that the bail in question is valid if the quality of the deenars be specified.)—The argument of the two elders is that the deenars, mentioned by the surety do evidently, from the circumstance of the case, relate to those claimed. It is, moreover, a frequent practice to keep a claim in a state of doubt and uncertainty. The claim in question, therefore is, valid, in this way, that the claimant will (it is to be expected) explain the quality, and such explanation will be applied to the original claim: and upon the claim becoming valid, the first bail (namely, bail for the person) becomes valid; and in consequence thereof the second bail (namely, bail for the property) also becomes valid.

Bail for the person cannot be exacted in cases of punishment or retaliation.—Bail for the person is not lawful in cases of punishment and retaliation, according to Haneefa; that is, the Kazee has no power to exact it by force of the law.

But may be taken if offered by the accused.

If, however, the person upon whom punishment or retaliation is claimed, should in a voluntary manner give bail of himself, it is admissible in the opinion of all our doctors; because that which is the end of bail for the person is in this case also answered, since the production of the person of the accused is hereby secured. It is to be observed that the person upon whom punishment or retaliation is claimed, must not be imprisoned until evidence be given, either by two people of unknown character (that is, of whom it is not known whether they by just or unjust), or by one just man who is known to the Kazee; because the imprisonment, in this case, is founded on suspicion, and suspicion cannot be confirmed but by the evidence of two men of unknown character, or of one just man. It is otherwise in imprisonment on account of property; because the defendant, in that instance, cannot be imprisoned but upon the evidence of two just men; for imprisonment on such an account is a grievous oppression, and therefore requires to be grounded on complete proof. In the Mabsoot, under the head of duties of the Kazee, it is mentioned that, according to the two disciples, the defendant, in a case of punishment for slander, or of retaliation, is not to be imprisoned on the evidence of one just man, because, as the exaction of bail is in such case (in their opinion) lawful, bail is therefore to be taken from him.

A pledge or bail may be accepted for the payment of any fixed tribute.—It is lawful to take a pledge or accept of bail for the payment of any fixed tribute, because tribute being a debt of which the payment is demanded, it may be discharged by means of the pledge or the bail, and hence the objects of these contracts is answered.

If bail for the person be first taken from one and afterwards from another, the latter, in that case holds with respect to both; for the design of bail is to fix the obligation of a claim, and this may be extended to may, so as to render them severally responsible. Besides, as the object of bail is security, this is increased by the taking of bail from another; and hence there is no incongruity in the existence of both at the same time.

Bail for property is lawful, if founded upon a just debt whether the extent be known or uncertain.—All that has been here advanced relates to bail for the person. With respect to bail for the property, it is lawful whether the extent of the property be known or uncertain, provided it is founded on a just debt,—that is, a debt which cannot be annulled but by payment or exemption; in opposition to a claim of person which is a debt due by a Mokatib to his master,—because that may possibly become null without payment or exemption, by an inability in the Mokatib to discharge it; property known in the extent is (for instance) where a person says to a claimant, "I have become bail for a person who owes you a thousand dirms." The nature of uncertain property may also be explained by any axample; as for instance, where a person says, "I have become bail for the debt which a particular person owes of you;" or, "I have become bail in this sale for whatever claim may hereafter be made on the subject of it"—which bail is termed Kafalat be'1-dirk, or bail for accidents, that is for whatever may happen. In short, bail for an uncertain property is lawful, because bail rests upon a broad foundation, and a small degree of uncertainty in it is therefore of no consequence. Besides, all our doctors are agreed in the legality of Kif'it be'1-dirk, or bail for what may happen: what is a convincing argument of the legality of bail for uncertain property. Moreover, bail is lawful in the case of unintentional Shoouji [a wound occasioned by the throwing of a stone] although there be in it a great degree of uncertainty; because it is possible that death may ensue, which induces retaliation; and it is also possible that the accused may take place or take flight, which case a fine of property only is required. Now, if, notwithstanding this degree of uncertainty, the bail be lawful, it follows that it is in the same manner lawful in the case of uncertain property.

In a case of bail, the claimant is at liberty to make his demand either from the surety or the principal. The person to whom the bail is given is at liberty to demand payment either from his debtor, who is the principal, or from his surety, because bail signifies a junction of personal responsibility to the personal responsibility of the debtor, in a claim; and this does not imply an exemption to the debtor from the claim; on the contrary, it marks the continuance of his responsibility; unless such exemption should have been specified as a condition in the contract of bail, in which case the contract of bail becomes a contract of transfer, in which manner as a transfer becomes bail if a condition of exemption to the debtor be not specified: because regard must be had to the spirit of the contract; and in the former instance the contract bears the sense of a transfer, in the same manner as, in the latter, it bears the sense of bail.

Any may call upon either or both. If the person to whom the bail is given calls upon one of the two parties—that is, upon either the debtor or the surety,—he is entitled also to call upon the other; and he may, if he please, call upon both. It is otherwise where the proprietor demands compensation for his property from one of two usurpers (that is, from the original usurper, or from another who has usurped it again from him); for he cannot then demand it from the other; because upon his failing to accept compensation for the usurped property from one of them, he thereby constitutes him proprietor, since option of compensation involves investiture with right of property: and hence the impossibility of his afterwards constituting the other proprietor. A claim in virtue of bail, on the contrary, does not involve an investiture with right of property. There is therefore a difference between these cases.

Bail may be suspended upon any fit and proper condition. The suspension of bail upon a condition is lawful. Thus is a person say to another, "If you sell your goods to Z'yd, the price is upon me;" or, "If anything be due to you from a certain person, this is upon me;" or, "If a certain article be usurped from you, the damage is upon me;"—in all these cases the bail is lawful, because all our doctors have agreed upon the legality of Kafalat be'1-dirk, when suspended upon a condition. It is to be observed, however, that although conditional bail be lawful, still it is requisite that the condition on which it is suspended be of a nature adopted to the contract of bail,—either by resting upon the obligation of a right, (as if the surety should say, "If the subject of sale be not cleared by the claimant myself responsible for the price"),—or, by resting upon the possibility of the execution of a debt (as if he were to say, "Upon Zeyd [meaning the principal] arriving," &c.), or, by resting upon the impossibility of the execution of a debt (as if he were to say, "Upon such a person [meaning the principal] disappearing," &c.), for the suspension upon a condition not of a fit nature (such as, upon the falling of rain, or the blowing of wind), is unlawful—in the same manner also, it is unlawful to stipulate these events as the period for payment of debt;—as if a person should say, "I have become bail for the debt due to you by a certain person until the rain fall, or the wind blow" in which case the bail is valid, but the condition is invalid, and therefore an immediate payment of the money is required; because the suspension of bail on a condition is valid, and it does not become invalid from the invalidity of the condition, being similar to the case divorce and emancipation.

Where the bail is given in an unlimited manner, the amount is ascertained by testimony, or, that failing by the declaration of the surety. If the surety say to the claimant "I am bail for the debt due to you by a particular person," and it be afterwards proved, by witnesses, that the debt amounts to one thousand dirms, in that case the surety is answerable for that sum, because proof by testimony is equivalent to that by actual sight. But if the amount of the debt should not be proved by witnesses, the averment of the surety is in that case to be credited in the amount which he may acknowledged: for with respect to whatever sum may be alleged beyond his own acknowledgment, he is considered as the defendant, and the principal acknowledged a greater amount than that acknowledged by the surety, it cannot be admitted to operate against him; because, considered as an acknowledgment or declaration with regard to another, it is invalid as an acknowledgment has no power over another.
with relation to himself; for he has power over his own person.

But it may be contracted with or without the consent of the principal — It is lawful to become bail either with or without the desire of the principal; because the tradition with respect to it is as of late; and does not restrict it to the desire of the principal. Moreover, being an obligatory engagement, is a deed relative to the surety himself, in which there is an advantage to the claimant and on detriment to the principal: for if he should have become bail without the desire of the principal, then he has no right to apply to him for what he may pay on his account; or if, on the other hand, the bail was contracted by his desire, then the principal has expressed his acquiescence in his claim of repayment from him, to which he is entitled because of his having made the payment in virtue of authority from the principal. Therefore, he has no right to repayment in case of having become bail without the desire of the principal, as the payment so made was a gratuitous deed.

Circumstances under which a surety has or has not a right to demand compensation from his principal. — It is to be observed that the surety has a right to a repayment, from the principal, of the sum which he may have advanced on his account in virtue of the responsibility he contracted by his desire. — As for instance, if the debt be one thousand good dirms, and the claimant one thousand good dirms, he is then entitled to the repayment of one thousand good dirms. — But if he should make a payment of a nature different from his engagement, as if, having become bail for one thousand good dirms, he should pay the claimant one thousand bad dirms, or vice versa, he is in that case entitled to receive from the principal the full amount for which, by his desire, he had become responsible: because the surety, from the payment of the debt, becomes the proprietor of it, and stands therefore in the place of the creditor: — in the same manner as if he had become proprietor of it by virtue of a gift, or of inheritance; that is, as if the claimant had bestowed on him a gift of the debt due to him by the principal, and permitted him to take possession of it, or, as if the surety had succeeded to the debt in right of heritage; or, in the same manner as where the person to whom a debt has been transferred acquires a property in the debt by either of these modes. — It is otherwise in the case of a person instructed to pay a debt; for if a person be desired by another to pay a debt on his account, and pay it accordingly, he is in that case entitled to receive from the other the exact sum he has paid on his account, although the debt relate to bad dirms, and he pay it in good; because a person so instructed, having incurred no responsibility, has therefore no right to become proprietor of the debt in virtue of having paid it.

It is otherwise, also, if a person, having become bail for a debt one thousand dirms, should compound with the claimant for the payment of five hundred dirms; — for in this case he is entitled to receive only five hundred dirms from the debtor, because composition is similar to annulment of part of the debt; and the case is therefore the same as if the bail, after part of the debt to the surety, and as, in case of remission of the debt by the claimant, the surety has no right to receive anything from the debtor. — It follows that, in case of composition also, he has no right to receive more than he has actually paid.

He cannot claim reimbursement until he has actually discharged the claim upon the principal. — A surety has no right to advance any claim on the principal until he makes payment on his account, because he does not become proprietor of the debt until he pays it. It is otherwise when he becomes an agent for purchase; as he is entitled to receive from his constituent the price of the merchandise previous to the payment of it on his dart. The reason of this is that there virtually subsists a contract of exchange between the constituent and his agent; because the right of property is first established in the agent, and afterwards shifts to the constituent; — and hence they stand to each other in the relation of buyer and seller, when it is permitted to the agent to retain the merchandise from his constituent until he receive the price from him.

But he may proceed as the claimant proceeds. — If the claimant impounds the surety in pursuance of his claim, then the surety may in the same manner impound the principal or suretee. If, also the surety be imprisoned by the claimant, he is in the same manner entitled to imprison the principal.

He is released by a discharge to the principal; but the principal is not released by an exemption to him. — If the claimant remit the debt to the suretee, or receive payment of it from him, the surety is in that case released from his engagement, because the debt, in reality, is due by the suretee: — but if he exempt the surety, the suretee (or principal) does not thereby become exempted from his debt: because the surety is merely a dependant; and, also, because he is liable only to a claim, whereas the debt exists in the principal independent of such claim.

And the same of a suspension of the claim. — If the claimant allow the principal a respite from his claim, or suspend his claim upon him to a more distant period, such respite or suspension of claim operates also in favour of the surety; — but if he grant a respite of his claim to the surety it does not operate in favour of the principal because a respite or suspension, as being a temporary remission, is therefore analogous to an absolute remission. — It is otherwise where, the debt being immediately due, the creditor accepts bail for the payment at the period of a month afterwards; for this suspension of his claim for a month operates also in favour of the principal, because here the period of suspension agreed upon is a circumstance annexed to the debt, which, at the time of contracting the bond, was immediately due.

A surety, compounding the debt of the principal with the creditor, discharges both from any further demands —If a surety, in a debt of one thousand dirms, compound with the creditor for a payment of five hundred dirms in that case both the principal and the surety become exempted from their respective obligations for the remaining five hundred dirms; —because the surety having referred the composition to the thousand dirms due by the principal, the principal becomes thereby relieved from his obligation by the payment of five hundred dirms; —for composition is a cancelling of part of the debt; —and the release of the debtor from his obligation occasions the release of the surety.

And has a claim upon the surety for what he pays in composition.—He is also in this case entitled to five hundred dirms from the surety, provided he entered into the bail with his consent.—It was otherwise if the surety should compound the debt for some thing of a different species (as if, instead of the dirms, he should agree to pay a particular number of deenars, or any article of merchandise): for in such case he is entitled to a full payment of the debt, since such composition is in the nature of a contract of exchange, and the surety becomes proprietor of the debt in virtue of his having given a consideration for it.

A surety compounding for an exemption on his own behalf does not discharge the principal.—If the surety compound with the creditor for an exemption from the obligation contracted by him in virtue of the bail, the principal is not thereby exempted, because the said composition is merely an exemption granted to the surety from a claim upon him.

Thus, for instance, if the surety for one thousand dirms compound with the creditor for one hundred dirms —in other words, if the creditor agree that, on condition of his paying one hundred dirms, he will exempt him from the rest of his obligation,—in that case he becomes exempted from responsibility; and, provided he had become bail by desire of the principal he is entitled to receive one hundred dirms from him, whilst the creditor retains his claim on the principal for the remaining nine hundred dirms.

Cases in which the surety's right against the principal depends upon the terms of his exemption or discharge.—If a claimant say to the surety, who had become bail by desire of the principal, “You are entitled to receive the amount in question from the principal; because, according to the rules of grammar, this sentence, in which the preposition from with respect to the object, and that of towards with respect to the claimant of such object, are used means that the claim has been discharged,—Hence the claimant in this case, is held to have made an acknowledgment of the discharge of the claim; and for this reason the surety is entitled to receive the payment of it from the principal.—But if he should merely say, “I have enlarged you,” the surety is not entitled to anything from the principal; because his enlargement being here expressed without by mention made of its operation towards another, is considered as an annulment, and not as a declaration of discharge.—If he should only say, “you are enlarged,” without adding, “towards me” in that case there is a disagreement among our doctors. —Mohammed alleges that it is similar to the second instance —“I have enlarged you” Abou Yousef, on the other hand, is of opinion that it is similar to the first instance —“You are enlarged from the claim towards me.” Some, again, have said that, in all these cases, if the claimant be present, it is requisite to demand an explanation from him, since he has used a dubious expression.

An enlargement from bail cannot be suspended upon a condition.—The suspension of enlargement from bail on a condition is not lawful; because an enlargement of this kind, as well as that of other description, involves an endowment with right of property, and the suspension of an endowment with right of property is not lawful. —There is a tradition that such suspension is lawful; because, in fact, a surety is responsible for a claim, and not for a debt, whence such enlargement is like divorce, a mere annulment, and therefore cannot be undone by the rejection of the surety: —and the enlargement...

*An endowment with a right of property (such as a gift, for instance) must operate immediately, otherwise it is not valid.

†This doctrine is founded on the metaphysical distinction which the Mussulmans draw betwixt a debt and a claim. Thus where a person remits to another a debt contracted by borrowing, purchase, or the like, he, as it were, conveys or makes over so much property to that other: —but where he remits an obligatory claim upon another to answer the debt of a third person, he then merely annuls a right of his own; for as that other had not in reality received any property from him, he cannot by such remission be said to have made over so much property to him.

† A gift, or any deed vesting property in another, cannot operate without the consent of that other. On this principle a gift is not held to take place until the consent of the donee, as, until then, it is in his power to render it void by a rejection. But it is not in the power of the surety to prevent the operation of the exemption in his favour by the rejection of it, as it as held to it be an annulment of a right on the part of the claimant, and not a deed conveying property to him.
Bail

from bail being a mere annulment, it follows that the suspension of it upon a condition is lawful, in the same manner as the suspension of divorce of emancipation: in opposition to the enlargement of the principal: as that is an endowment with rights of property, and may therefore be rejected by him.

Bail, in cases of punishment or retaliation, is valid only for the person. —Bail is not valid with respect to any right of which the fulfilment is impracticable by means of bail, as in cases of punishment or retaliation, because proxies are not admitted in case of corporal punishment. But bail for the persons of criminals under the sentence of such punishments is lawful.

Bail may be given for the price, but not for the goods, in a sale. —A person may lawfully become bail, on the part of a purchaser, on the payment of the price, because price is a debt, but it is not lawful to become bail, on the part of the seller, for the merchandise; for that is substance, of which the compensation, in a case of destruction is insured, by means of something of a different kind, namely, the price; and although bail for insured substance be lawful in the opinion of all our doctors, still it is required that the substance be insured for a similar in kind: such as the subject of an invalid sale, an article seized in virtue of an intention to purchase, or an article usurped; but not for any substance which is insured for something of a different kind such as, the subject of a valid sale; or a pawn; or for any substance: held in the nature of trust, such as a depo it, a subject of rent, a loan, Mozaribat stok, or partnership stock. —if, after the purchaser, in a case of sale, had paid the price, a person become bail for the delivery of the goods to him: or if, in a case of pawnage, a person become bail for the pawnee restitution of the pledge, or, in a case of hire, for the renter’s restoring the article hired, in all these cases the bail is valid, because of the surety having engaged for the performance of what was due and incumbent.

Bail for the performance of work by a specific animal is not valid. —If a person hire a quadruped for the carriage of a burthen, and another be bail for the animal carrying the said burthen, it is not lawful because of the animal being the property of another.

This, however, proceeds on a supposition of the hire having related to a specific animal; for, if the animal be not specific, the bail is valid, as in that case it is in the power of the surety to supply an animal of his own for the carriage of the burthen. In the same manner, in case of a person hiring a slave for service, bail given for his performance of the service is invalid, as the slave is not the property of the surety, and he has consequently no power of enforcing what he has undertaken.

A contract of bail must be formed with the consent of the claimant. —A contract of bail is not valid unless it be formed with the consent of the claimant. —This is according to Hanefia and Mohammed. —Aboo Yoosaf alleges that a contract of bail is valid, if, having been formed without the knowledge of the claimant, it receive his assent on its being notified to him; and (according to several copies of the Mahom) his assent is a contract complete.

This disagreement relates equally to bail for the person, and bail for property. —The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf, in support of the opinion, is, that as bail signifies an obligatory engagement, it is therefore binding on the person who undertakes it; and hence it would appear that it does not depend on the assent of the claimant: but the reason for suspending it upon his concurrence is the same as occurs under the head of marriage, treating of Fazoonic marriage: "The declaration of the surety that he has become bail for a particular thing, on the part of a particular person, renders the contract complete; but as it is a deed affecting the claimant (inasmuch as it invests him with a right to a claim), it is therefore suspended upon his assent." —The reasoning of the other two doctors is that bail creates a right; in other words, the surety constitute the claimant, proprietor of claim upon him which he accordingly demands from him after the completion of the contract. —Hence it follows, that two points are necessary to the completion of the contract, namely the speech of the surety (which is equivalent to a declaration with respect to the claimant), and the speech of the claimant (which is equivalent to acceptance). —No, in the case in question there exists only one of these two requisites the contract, therefore, is not suspended beyond the meeting; and consequently a contract of bail is not valid but through the consent of the claimant at the meeting.

Except where the de'tor is dying —Excepting only in one instance —namely, where a sick* person says to his heir, “be you bail for whatever debts I may owe,” and the heir becomes bail accordingly in the absence of the creditors; for in this case the bail is effectual, notwithstanding the absence of the creditors, upon a favourable construction. —for two reasons: First, the bail so created is, in effect, a will, and is therefore valid without the intervention of the claimant (and hence lawyers have remarked that this species of bail is not lawful unless when the sick person is in possession of property; because a will would not otherwise be lawful; Secondly, the sick person is the representative of his creditors, because he stands in need of being so, in order that he may divest himself of his obligation; and also, because this is attended with an advantage to the creditors. —The case is therefore the same as if creditors had themselves been present.

Objection. —If the sick person represents his creditors, it follows that his acquiescence is a necessary condition, in the same manner.

* Arab Mareez. —Always meaning a person sick of a mortal illness.
as that of the creditors, had they been present; and that the expression of "Be you bail on my part for whatever I owe," is not conclusive of the contract; whereas this renders it conclusive.

Reply.—The bail founded on this speech of the sick person is valid, and his acquiescence is not required as a condition; because the meaning to be deduced from the speech is, evidently, a desire on the part of the sick man that the bail be concluded, and not merely a consultation respecting it; and his speech therefore resembles an order for the conclusion of a marriage, as already explained under the head of marriage. —(It is to be observed that if the speech of the sick person be addressed to a stranger, there is in that case a disagreement with respect to the validity of the bail.

Case of bail gratuitously entered into on behalf of an insolvent defunct.—If a debtor die without leaving any property, and the creditors become bail to him, such bail is not valid, according to Haneefah. The two discipies allege that it is valid; because it is undertaken on account of a debt, established as the right of the creditors, and which is still extant, since no person has discharged it, whence it still exists, so far as relates to the laws of futurity; that is to say, the debtor, if it be not discharged, becomes a criminal before God Almighty. —As also, if the surety were actually to discharged the debt, such discharge would be valid being a gratuitous act of justice, in the same manner bail for it is consequently valid. —The argument of Haneefah in support of his opinion is, that the bail is in this case, given for a debt which is annulled with relation to the laws of this world; and the validity of bail being founded on the laws of this world, it cannot be legally given for what no longer legally exists.

A debtor paying his surety the sum for which bail has been given, before the surety has satisfied the creditor cannot reclaim it. —If a person, by desire of another, should become his bail for one thousand dirms which he owes, and the debtor give the surety one thousand dirms by way of payment prior to his [the surety's] having paid the creditor, he [the debtor] is not in that case permitted to take from the surety the money he has advanced to him, for two reasons. First, the right of the possessor (namely, the surety) is connected with the one thousand dirms on the probability of his having occasion to pay them to the creditor, and therefore whilst such probability exists the principal surety has no right to take them from him; similar to a case where a person hastily (that is, before the stated time) pays Zakat to the collector, in such case he would not be entitled to take it back from him. Secondly, the surety becomes proprietor of the said sum in virtue of the seisin; on a principle which shall be presently explained. —It is otherwise where the debtor gives the sum to the surety by way of commission (as if he were to say to him "Take this sum and deliver it to the debtor"); because the surety does not become proprietor in virtue of such a seisin; on the contrary, he is in such case merely a trustee. —It is to be observed that where the surety thus receives the thousand dirms, and becomes proprietor in virtue of such receipt, he is not required to devote in charity whatever profit he may acquire from it; because in his instance the property vests in him immediately on the receipt. Where he receives it after having himself paid the debt, the reason of the property then vesting in him is evident; and where he receives it before he has paid the debt, he becomes proprietor immediately on the receipt. —The reason of this, that the surety has a claim on the debtor for an article similar to that for which the creditor has a claim upon him; but the claim of the surety upon the debtor is suspended until he pays the debt to the creditor.

The claim of the surety, therefore, is in the nature of a debt to become due from the debtor (whence it is that if the surety should previous to his having discharged the debt to the creditor, exempt the debtor from the claim he had upon him such exemption would be valid). —Now as an article similar to that for which the surety is responsible to the creditor is due to him by the debtor, it follows that on his receiving payment from the debtor he becomes proprietor in virtue of such receipt. —The degree of baeness, moreover, which obtains in such a transaction (as shall be hereafter set forth), does not have the effect, where a right of property exists, with respect to indefinite thing; as has been already explained in treating of invalid sales.

Case of a delivery of substance by the principal, to guard his surety against loss —If bail be given for a Koor of wheat, and the principal deliver a Koor of wheat to the surety, and he sell and acquire profit by the same, in that case the profit so acquired is, in the eye of the Law, the right of the surety, in the principle already explained, of the property having vested in him in virtue of the receipt. —The author of the work observes, that in his opinion it is most laudable that the surety give the said profit to the debtor, although, in the eye of the law this he not incumbent upon him; and such (according to one passage in the Jama Sagheer) is the opinion of Haneefah upon this point. —The two disciples maintain that as such profit is the right of the surety, he ought not therefore to give it to the debtor; and this also is related as an opinion of Haneefah, as well as another, namely, that the surety ought to bestow it in charity. —The argument of the two disciples is that the profit, as having resulted from the property of the surety, becomes of such a nature as to be in the right —Haneefah, on the other hand, argues that, notwithstanding the existence of the property, there is still a degree of baseness in it, because it was in the power of the debtor to retake the Koop of wheat from the surety, and deliver it himself to the creditor; or, because, in delivering it to the surety, it is probable that he did it with a view that he should deliver it to the creditor.—No the baseness here operates in consequence of the thing to which it relates being definite; and the mode of purging such baseness is (according to one tradition) by devoting the profit in charity, or (according to another) by giving it to the debtor, as the baseness is occasioned by his right, and not by the right of the Law.—This latter is the most authentic doctrine; but it prescribes only a laudable, and not an incumbent duty; for the right of the surety is clear.

Case of bail discharged by an aynit sale.—If a person become bail, by desire of the principal, for a debt of one thousand dirms, and the principal afterwards desire him first to purchase on his account silks to the value of one thousand five hundred dirms, in the manner of an aynit, and then to resell the same, and discharge the debt by means of the price, and the surety act accordingly, the purchase so made is considered as on his own account, not on account of the principal, and he must, of consequence, sustain the loss arising from the aynit sale.—An aynit sale is where a merchant, for instance, having been sold, so named, by a person for a loan of money, refuse the same, but offers to sell goods to the other on credit at an advanced price; as if he should charge fifteen dirms for what is worth only ten, and the other person agree to the same. This is termed an aynit or substantial sale, because it is a recession from the loan to a specific substance (in other words, the merchant declines granting the loan required of him by the borrower, but agrees in lieu thereof, to sell him the cloth, which is a specific substance);—and it is a comical, as being a recession from a loan of money, in this laudable adoption of a principle of avarice, which as a sordid quality. With respect to the nature of the case in question, our doctors have disagreed.

Some have asserted, that the direction, given by the principal to the surety infers his [the principal's] being responsible for any loss that may be sustained by the purchaser in consequence of the aynit sale; and that his direction in this particular is not a commission of agency; for this reason, that the order of the principal ('purchase silks on my account') implies this assumption of responsibility,—but a responsibility of this nature would not hold except in an article in which the person who is responsible has some interest; and in no person has any interest in the loss on the present occasion. Others again say, that the direction in question amounts to a commission of agency: but that it is an invalid commission, as the silk to which it relates are not definite, neither is the price of them definite from an ignorance of how much it may exceed the amount of the debt.—The purchase of the silks is, in fact, considered as having been made on account of the surety, and the loss resulting from it falls entirely upon him (not upon the principal), since it was contracted by him.

Evidence cannot be heard in support of any claim against a surety which does not come within the description in the contract of bail.

If a person become bail on the part of another, for whatever may be proved to be due by him, or for whatever the Kazee may decree against him, and the debtor afterwards disappear, and a claimant offer to prove, by evidence, that the sum due to him is one thousand dirms, such evidence is not to be admitted: because here the bail is limited to whatever the Kazee may decree, as it is evident from the expression "Whatever the Kazee may decree, and likewise from that of "Whatever may be proved to be due by him," since nothing can be proved but by the decree of the Kazee, and the claim in question has not this limitation;—it is therefore invalid, and accordingly the evidence in support of it cannot be heard.

A decree passed against a surety in the absence of the principal cannot affect the latter unless the bail were entered into by his desire.

If a person prefer a claim before the Kazee to this effect, "That an absentee owes him a thousand dirms, and that a particular person present is by desire of the debtor, bail for the same," and establish his testimony, in that case the Kazee must pass a decree against both the debtor and the surety—If, however, the bail have been given without the desire of the debtor, the Kazee must in that case decree the debt solely against the surety; and in this instance the evidence adduced by the claimant is admitted as sufficient, because the bail is absolute, and not qualified, as in the preceding case. It is to be observed that the different decrees which the Kazee gives in the case of bail, with, and without, the desire of the debtor (that is, the decree against both, in the one case, and against the surety only in the other), is founded on the difference which obtains in the nature of these two modes of bail:—for bail by desire of the debtor is a gratuitous deed in the origin, and a contract of exchange in the end; but bail without the desire of the debtor is a gratuitous deed both in its origin and its consequences.—Now where the claim relates to one only, the decree cannot be extended to the other. But if a decree should be passed relative to a surety by desire, it must necessarily include the principal since the desire he expressed is a virtual acknowledgment of the existence of the debt.—It is otherwise with respect to a voluntary surety; for as the existence of the debt in that case is proved by his belief of it, in having undertaken the bail with regard to it, and not by any virtual acknowledgment of the debtor, the decree is therefore solely referred to him.—In the former case (namely, that of bail by desire), the surety is authorized to receive from the seller what he may have been obliged to pay on his account—Ziffer maintains that he is not entitled to such compensation; because, having himself refused to pay, and having been compelled to it, he is of consequence in his own opinion oppressed; and it is not permitted to such as are opposed to oppress others—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that whenever a refusal is undone by law, the opinion founded upon it becomes of consequence null.

Case of Kafooel-bel-dirk—If a person sell a house, and another become Kafooel-bel-dirk, or security against accident, on his behalf, the security so given is a direct declaration of the house being the property of the seller.—If, therefore, the security should afterwards prefer a claim of right to the house, such claim is inadmissible—the reason of this is, that it the security be a condition of the sale, the person who purchased should have said, “I will buy the said house, provided a particular person will be security against any future claim to it”), in that case, the completion of the sale rests upon the agreement of the security; and afterwards, when he prefers a claim of right to the house, he endeavors to destroy that which he had himself rendered complete;—if, on the other hand, the security should not be a condition of the sale, the security, in that case, by agreeing to the bail, did, as it were, incite the buyer to the bargain (since his desire of purchase was founded on the proceedings of bail).—The bail so given, therefore, is equivalent to a declaration of the right of property of the seller.

An attestation to a contract of sale is not equivalent to Kafooel-bel-dirk—Is, in the sale of house, a person should attest the bill of sale, and put his seal to it, without giving any security, such testimony and affixture of seal is not an acknowledgment of the seller’s right of property, and hence the witness may, if he please, afterwards claim the house, because attestation is neither a condition of sale nor a declaration of the property of the seller, as it sometimes happens that men sell their own property, and sometimes that of others.—Besides, the witness may have made this attestation merely as a memorandum of the transaction; a supposition which the case of bail could not admit of.—Lawyers have remarked that if it be expressed, in the bill of sale, that “a certain person had sold such a house, which is his property, by a complete and valid sale,” and the person attest the writing to this effect, “Witness thereto,” this is an acknowledgment and declaration of the seller’s right of property.—If, on the other hand, he attest it thus, “Witness to the agreement of the buyer and seller,” this is not a declaration of the seller’s right of property.

Section
Of Zamins or Guarantees.

The guarantee of agents to their employe is null—If an agent sell the cloths of his constituent, and hold himself responsible for the payment of the price to his constituent, or, it a Mozarib sell the goods of his employer and hold himself responsible for the payment of the price—the responsibility in either case is null: First, because security or bail is an engagement compelling the undertaker to answer a claim; and as, in these cases, the agent and Mozarib are themselves the claimant for the price of the goods, it follows that if they were responsible for the same, they would be security on their own behalf, which is absurd; and, Secondly, because the goods remain in their hands in the nature of a trust; and trustees are not held by the law to be liable to responsibility.—If, therefore, they were held responsible, it would be contrary to the precepts of the law.—Hence the taking of security from them is null, in the same manner as a condition of responsibility is null with respect to a trustee or a borrower.

The guarantee of partners, in a purchase and sale to each other, is null—Is two shares in a slave sell him by one contract, and each of them be security to the other, on behalf of the buyer, for his payment of the proportion of the price due to that other, such security is null because if the security were valid under a general copartnership in the price, it necessarily follows that each is in part security on behalf of himself, since every member of the slave is indefinitely shared between them;—or if, on the other hand, the security of each were valid with respect to the other’s share in particular, this induces a division of a debt before the receipt of it, which is unlawful.—It is others wise where two partners in a slave sell their shares by different contracts; as their security to each other, for the prices respectively due, is valid, since there is no part ownership in this instance, because whatever is owing to each, relatively, in virtue of his particular contract, appertains solely to him, without any participation of the other;—whence it is that the purchaser is at liberty to accept the share of them only and to take possession of it, after the payment of the price; and also that he may take possession of the share of one of them only, after paying to him his proportion, notwithstanding he may have purchased both shares.

Guarantee for land-tax, and all other regular or justifiable imposts, is valid.—If a person become security in behalf of another for tribute due by him or for a nawayeeb* levied upon him for his kissmat, all such securities are valid.—Security for tribute is valid, because tribute is in the nature of a debt (and may be a lawful subject of claim and be discharged only at the will of the person who pays it, in the manner of a gift, and of which his property alone can be the subject; whence, after his death, it cannot be discharged of his effects, unless prescribed in his will) — and with respect to nawayeeb, if it extend only to what is just (such as exactions for digging a canal, for the wages of safe guards, for the equipment of an army to fight against the Indiels, for the release of Musulmin captives, or for the digging of a ditch, the mending of a fort, or the construction of bridge) the security is lawful in the opinion of the whole of our doctors.—But if nawayeeb extend to exactions wrongfully imposed, that is, to such tyrants extorted from their subjects (a. in the present age), in that case, concerning the validity of security for it, there’s a difference of opinion amongst our modern doctors.—Sheikh Inan Alee is of the number of those who hold the security in said instance to be valid.—With respect to kissmat, the e is a difference of opinion concerning the meaning of the word.—Some allege t at it signifies the same with nawayeeb, whilst others define it to be same with Musulmin Ratiba that is fixed imposts which are exacted at stated periods such as once in the month, or once in every two or three months.—Now nawayeeb means the casual exactions made by the sovereign, which have no fixed or stated period. Th. law, however, is as above explained, with respect to both, if, therefore, the execution be right, then the security for it is lawful, according to all our doctors; or if wrong, there is a disagreement with respect to the validity the security.

Difference between a suspended debt and suspended bail.—If a person say to another, "I owe you a debt of one hundred dirhams; payable a month hence," and the other assert that the debt is immediately due, his assertion, as claimant, is to be credited — But if a person should declare to another, "I am security to you, in behalf of another, for a debt of one hundred dirhams, payable a month hence," and the other assert that the debt is due immediately, the declaration of the surety is to be credited.—The difference between these two cases is, that in the former case the debtor makes an acknowledgment of the debt, and then claims his right to a suspension of payment for one month; whereas in the latter case the surety makes no acknowledgment of the debt, inasmuch as the obligation of the debt does not rest upon the bail or surety, as has been often before explained.—In fact, he has simply acknowledged a claim to which he is responsible after the lapse of a month, which the claimant denies, asserting that he is answerable for such claim immediately: — and regard is paid, in law, to the affirmation of the defendant.—A cause of suspension, moreover, is merely an accidental property of a debt, and not an essential, whence it is that it cannot be proved unless it has been expressly stipulated.—The affirmation, therefore, of the person who denies the stipulation of such condition is creditable.—in the same manner as in the case of a condition of option. in sale,—Bail under a suspension, on the contrary, is one species of bail, in which the being suspended in its operation is an inherent quality, and not an accident: whence this species of suspension may be proved without having been stipulated; as where for instance, the debt due by the principal is a suspended debt. According to Shafei, the affirmation of the claimant is to be credited in either case; and the same is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

Bail against accident, in the sale of a slave —If a person purchase a female slave, and another warrant her to be the property of the seller,* and she afterwards prove to be the property of some other person, the purchaser is not entitled to exact the price from the surety, until the Kazzee shall have first passed a decree against the seller for the restitution of the price of the slave, because, according to the Zahir Rawiyat, the sale does not become null immediately on the proof of the subject of it being the property of another but endurest until the Kazzee pass a decree in favour of the purchaser directing the seller to return the price. Since, therefore, previous to issuing the said decree, it is not incumbent on the principal (that is the seller) to make restitution of the purchase-money, so neither is it incumbent on the surety. It would be otherwise if the slave were proved to be free, and the Kazzee pass a decree to that effect, for in such case the balance becomes null immediately on the issuing of such decree, since freedom is incapable of being the subject of sale, and the buyer would, therefore, be entitled to exact the purchase-money either from the surety or from the seller, without waiting for a decree of restitution from the Kazzee.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that sale becomes null immediately on the proof of the subject of it being the property of another; and that, consequently, the buyer has in such case a right to exact the price either from the surety or the seller without waiting for the decree of the Kazzee to that effect.

Security for fulfilment is null.—If a person purchase a slave, and another be security for the fulfilment of the bargain,† such security

* Literally, "and another be bail against accident."† Arab. Zamin ba Ohda, is null; because the word Ohda [fulfilment] is of a comprehensive nature, as having a variety of meanings. I. It relates to the former bail of sale which the seller received from the person who sold the slave to him; and this being the property of the seller, any security with respect to it is invalid. II. It relates to the contract and its rights. III. It relates to a warrant or security against accidents. And, IV, To option.—As, therefore, the term comprises so many things the particular application of it is dubious; and hence practice cannot take place upon it.—It is different with respect to the term dirk, for although that signify whatever may happen, yet the custom of mankind has restrained the application of it to one particular sense, namely, a security against any future claim; and Ziman-be'1-dirk, or security against accident, is therefore valid.

Security for a surrender of the article to the purchaser is invalid.—If a person sell an article, and another be security to the purchaser for the release of that article, such security is invalid, according to Haneefa, as the intention of it is the release of the article, and the delivery of it to the purchaser, which the security is not competent to perform.—The two disciples hold this of valid, as in their opinion it is equivalent to a security against accident.—In other words, it imports an obligation to deliver to the purchaser either the article sold, the value, or the price; and such being the case, it is valid of course.

CHAPTER II.

OF BAIL IN WHICH TWO ARE CONCERNED

Case of two persons who are joint principals in a debt, and bail for each other.—If two men owe a debt in an equal degree, and each be security on behalf of the other, as where, for instance, two persons purchase a slave, jointly, and each is security on behalf of the other,—in this case, if either of them pay off a part, he has no right to make any claim on the other:—unless, however, the payment so made exceed a half of the whole debt, in which case he has a right to exact such excess from the other.—The reason of this is, that each of them is a principal with respect to one half of the debt, and a security with respect to the other half;—for what each owe in virtue of his being a principal is no bar to the obligation upon him as a security, the one being founded on debt, and the other on a claim, while he is subordinate thereto.—Whatever payments, therefore either of them may make are held to be in virtue of the former, namely, the debt, as far as that extends:

and any excess is referred to the latter, namely, the security.

Case of two persons who are bail for a third, to the amount of the whole claim, and also, reciprocally, bail for each other's security.—If two persons be bail for property in behalf of another,—in this way, that each surety, respectively, holds himself responsible for the other surety,—in this case, whatever either surety may pay [in virtue of the bail] whether the sum be great or small, he is entitled to exact the half of it from the other surety. This proceeds upon a supposition that each of these two sureties, respectively, is bail for the whole property on the part of the principal, and likewise for the whole obligation on the part of his cosurety. Hence in each of the two sureties two bails are united: one on behalf of the principal, and one on behalf of the co-surety; and bail on behalf of a surety is lawful, in the same manner as on behalf of a principal, or as a transfer on behalf of a transference: because the intention of a contract of bail is undertaking the obligation of a claim; and this end is answered by bail on behalf of a surety. As, therefore, two bails are in this case united in each of the sureties, it follows that whatever payments are made by either of them are made, in an indefinite manner, on account of both; and if the payment so made was purely in virtue of the bail; and each, with respect to the bail, stands in the same predicament; that is to say, neither has a superiority over the other.—It is otherwise where each surety is a principal with respect to part of the debt, as in the first example: for in this case neither has a right to exact any thing from the other on account of the payments he may make, unless such payments exceed the sum for which he is a principal, because the principal has a superiority.)—Now since, in the case in question, whatever payments either of the two may make are made indifferently, on account of both, it follows that the person making such payments is entitled to exact the half of them from the other. And this induces no unnecessary revolution, because the intention of the contract, in the present instance, is that the parties be on a footing of perfect equality with respect to the bail, which can only be answered by the one party taking from the other the half of what he may have paid. The other, therefore, is not entitled to retake it again from the person who has first paid, because this, if permitted, would destroy the equality already established. (It is otherwise in the preceding case, for there each of the parties is a principal with respect to a portion of the debt, and consequently they are not on a footing of perfect equality with respect to the bail.)—When, however, one of the parties shall have taken the half from the other, then they are jointly entitled to exact the whole of what has been paid from the principal; since they paid the same on his behalf; the one making the payment immediately from him.

* Arab. Khilas: meaning, the surrender of the article, by the seller, to the purchaser.
self, and the other doing it, as it were, by his substitute:—or the surety who paid is at liberty, if he please, to exact the whole of what he paid from the principal, because he was bail for the whole of the property by his desire.—If, in this instance, the creditor exempt one of the two sureties, he has a right to claim the whole from the other, because the exemption of a surety does not operate as an exemption in favour of the principal, and therefore the whole of the debt remains due by the latter; and the remaining surety being still bail for the whole of the property, it is consequently lawful to claim the whole from him.

In the dissolution of a reciprocity partnership, each partner is responsible for any debts contracted under their partnership.—If two partners by reciprocity dissolve their copartnership and separate, whilst some of their debts still remain due, the creditors have in that case a right to claim the whole from whichever of them they please; because each of these partners is surety for the other, as has been already explained in treating of partnership.—Neither of the partners, moreover, has a right to make any claim upon the other for whatever payment he may have made to the creditors, unless such payment exceed the half of the debt, in which case he has a right to exact from him the payment of such excess, for the reason already explained, in discharging the case of reciprocal bail by two.

Case of two Mokatibs, bail on each other's behalf, for their ransom.—If a master constitute two of his slaves Mokatibs, by one contract, for a thousand dirms (for instance), and each of them become bail for the other. In that case, whatever sum, from the whole amount covenanted to be paid by the master, is discharged by either, the half of that sum may be exacted from the other.—Analogy would suggest that the bail, in this instance, is not valid; because bail is valid only when opposed to a valid debt; and some of her debts remain due by the latter; and the remaining surety being still bail for the whole of the property, it is consequently lawful to claim the whole from him.

As a principal with respect to the obligation of the whole consideration of Kitabat, namely, a thousand dirms:—in other words, by considering each of them, respectively, as being responsible to the master for the payment of the whole: and, consequently, that upon his making payment of the whole, the other obtains his freedom as a dependant,—in this way, that the freedom, of both is suspended on their payment of one thousand dirms, and the master is at liberty to claim the said thousand from each of them respectively, as a principal, not as a surety. Each, however, is considered as surety on behalf of the other, with respect to exacting a moiety of what he pays on account of the consideration of Kitabat (a particular explanation of this will hereafter be given in treating of Mokatibs).—From the explanation of the law in this case it appears that both slaves are equal with respect to the payment of the thousand dirms, which is the consideration of their Kitabat; and hence each is respectively entitled to take from the other a moiety of whatever part of the said thousand dirms he may pay.—If the master, in this case, should emancipate one of the slaves prior to his having made any payment on account of his Kitabat, in that case he becomes free; because his master, whose property he then was, chose to emancipate him.—He becomes likewise exempted from any obligation to pay his half of the consideration of Kitabat, because he acquiesced in that obligation merely as a means to obtain his freedom; but upon his becoming free in consequence of the emancipation of his master it exists no longer as a mean and therefore ceases altogether.—The obligation, however, for the payment of an half still continues incumbent upon the other, who remains a slave; because the whole amount of the consideration was opposed to the bondage of both; and the whole was considered as due from each, respectively, merely as a device, in order to render the bail of each in behalf of the other valid, and thereby to enable each to take from the other a moiety of what he pays. But when the master emancipates one of them, there exists no further necessity for this device: whence the debt is then considered as opposed to them both, jointly (not, in toto, to each respectively), and is accordingly divided into two separate parts, of which one still continues due from him who remains a slave.

In taking this portion, the master is at liberty either to exact it from the freedman, in virtue of his being security, or from the slave, because of his being the principal—If he take it from the freedman, the freedman is then entitled to retake it from the slave, because of his having paid it by his desire; but if he takes it from the slave, he is not entitled to take anything from the freedman, because he merely pays a debt which he justly owes.

CHAPTER III

OF BAIL BY FREEMEN IN BEHALF OF SLAVES, AND BY SLAVES IN BEHALF OF FREEMEN.

A person becoming surety on behalf of a slave for a claim, to which the latter is not liable until after emancipation, must discharge it immediately.—If a person be surety in behalf of a slave, for some thing not claimable from the slave until after he recover his freedom, without specifying whether the thing in question is claimable immediately, or hereafter, in that case it is to be considered as immediately due;—that is to say, it is claimable immediately from the surety.—For instance, if an inhibited slave acknowledge his destruction of the property of any person,—or that he owes a debt which his master disavows,—or if, having married without the consent of his master, he should have had carnal connexion with the women on the supposition of such marriage being valid (in all which cases nothing could be exacted from the slave immediately, nor until he become free), and a person be a surety for the compensation eventually claimable from the slave, he is liable to an immediate claim for it. The reason of this is, that the slave ought immediately to discharge the compensation, because there exists an evident cause of his obligation upon him, and a slave, in virtue of his being a man, is capable of being subject to obligation. He is, however, exempted from an immediate claim for the compensation, because of his property, since everything he possesses is property of his master, and his master is not assenting to the obligation. *The surety, on the contrary, is not poor, and is therefore liable to the claim immediately, in the same manner as a person who becomes surety for an absentee or a pauper.—It is otherwise where: a person becomes bail for a debt not imme- iately due, for there the surety also is not liable to an immediate claim, any more than the debtor, since the debt is suspended in its obligation to a future period by the consent of the creditor—it is, however, to be observed, that in the case in question, the surety, on discharging the claim upon the slave, is not entitled to demand it from the slave until he shall have obtained his freedom; because the creditor had no right to demand it until that event; and the surety stands in the place of the creditor.

Bail for the person of a slave is cancelled by his death.—If a person advance a claim on an unprivileged slave, and another become surety for his person, and the slave afterwards dies the surety is in that case released from his engagement, because of the principal being released.—(The law is the same where the slave, in whose behalf bail for the person is given, is emancipated.)

Bail to a claim of right in a slave subjects the surety to responsibility in the event of the slave’s decease.—If a person claim the right of property in a slave, and another become surety in behalf of the possessor of him, and the slave then die, and the claimant establish his right by witnesses, the surety is in that case responsible for the price—because it was incumbent on the possessor to repel the claim, or, if he failed in so doing, to give the value for which the surety became answerable; and as the obligation, after the slave’s death, rests upon the principal, so also it now rests upon the surety—it is otherwise in the preceding case; for there the obligation was merely to produce the person of the slave, which is cancelled by his death.

Bail by a slave in behalf of his master, or by a master in behalf of his slave, does not afford any ground of claim by the surety upon the principal.—If a slave, who is not in debt, be surety for property in behalf of his master, or any other man, and he afterwards made free, and then pay the amount for which he was surety,—or, if a master become surety for property in behalf of his slave, whether he be indebted or not, and after emancipating him, pay the amount for which he stood security, in neither of these cases is either of the parties entitled to take any thing from the other.—Ziffer maintains that in both these cases the parties have a right to recur to each other; that is, each is entitled to take from the other what he may have paid.—(It is here proper to remark, that the reason for restricting the slave, in the first case, to one that is free from debt is, that if he were otherwise, he could not be surety for property in behalf of his master, since this would affect the right of his creditors.—The argument of Ziffer is that a ground of claim (namely, bail by desire of the principal) exists in both cases; and the bar to its operation (namely, slavery) is removed and done away.—The argument of our doctors is that the bail in these cases is not in the beginning a ground of claim, since neither can the master have a debt due to him by his slave, nor can the slave have a claim of debt upon his master. Hence, as no ground of claim existed in the beginning, it does not afterwards take place, in consequence of the removal of the bar to it (namely, slavery); for the law here is the same as where a person becomes surety for another without his desire, in which case the subsequent assent of the surety is of no effect.

The consideration of Kitabat is not a subject of bail.—Bail for the consideration of Kitabat, whether the surety be a slave or a freeman, is not valid; because the consideration of Kitabat is allowed to be an obligation merely from necessity, it being repugnant to reason, inasmuch as a master cannot have a claim of debt upon his slave; and in the case in question the Mokatib, or person who owes the consideration of Kitabat, is supposed the slave of the claimant.—Hence the consideration of Kitabat is not so fully established as to admit of bail for it—because wherever a thing is established from necessity, it is restricted entirely to the point of necessity. Besides, the debt of Kitabat ceases entirely in case of the inability of the slave to discharge it; nor is it possible to revive it, by claiming it from the surety, because the meaning of bail is 'the junction of one person to another person in relation to a claim.'—As therefore; the claim does not operate upon the principal, it of consequence ceases with regard to the surety; because it is rule that a principal and his surety are both equally liable for the same claim.

Nor a consideration in lieu of emancipatory labour.—A consideration, in lieu of emancipatory labour, resembles the consideration of Kitabat, in the opinion of Haneefah, because (according to him) a slave that works out his freedom by labour is in the same predicament with Mokatib.

BOOK XIX
OF HAWALIT, OR THE TRANSFER OF DEBTS.

Definition of terms.—Hawalit, in its literal sense, means a removal: and is derived from Tahool, which imports the removal of a thing from one place to another.—In the language of the Law it signifies the removal or transfer of a debt, by way of security and corroboration, from the faith or the original debtor, to that of the person on whom it is transferred. The debtor or person who transfers the debt is termed Moheel: the transferee or person upon whom the debt is transferred, Mohtal; and he, the creditor, or transfer receiver, Mohtal.

The transfer of a debt.—The transfer of a debt is lawful; because the Prophet has said, "Whenever a person transfers his debt upon a rich man, and the creditor assents to the same, then let the claim be made upon the rich man;" and also because the person upon whom the debt is transferred undertakes a thing which he is capable of performing; whence it is valid, in the same manner as bail. It is to be observed, however, that transfer is restricted to debt; because it means an ideal removal; and an ideal removal, in Law, applies to debt, and not to substance, which requires a sensible removal.

Is rendered valid by the consent of the creditor and transferee.—A contract of transfer is rendered valid by the consent of the creditor and transferee. The consent of the creditor is requisite, because the debt (the thing transferred) is his due; and mankind being of different dispositions with respect to the payment of debts, is therefore necessary to obtain his consent. The consent of the transferee is also requisite, because by the contract of transfer an obligation of debt is imposed upon him, and such obligation cannot be imposed without his consent. The consent of the principal, on the contrary, is not requisite, because (as Mohammed observes in the Zeadat) the engagement of the transferee to pay the debt is an act relative to himself, which is attended with a benefit to the principal, and is no way injurious to him, inasmuch as the transferee has no power of reverting to him, in case of having accepted the obligation without his desire.

It exempts the debtor from any demand.—When a contract of transfer is completed, the Moheel, or person who makes the transfer is exempted from the obligation of the debt, because of the acquiescence of the transferee. Ziffer has said that he is not exempted, because of the analogy which subsists between this case and that of bail; for the one, and both, contracts of security or corroboration; and as, in the case of bail, the person who is bailed does not become exempted from the debt so neither ought the transferrer in this case. Our doctors, on the other hand, agree that Hawalit literally means removal; and when a debt is removed from the faith of one person, it cannot afterwards remain upon it. Bail on the contrary, means a junction; and the intendment of it is, that the bailer unitizes his faith to that of the suretee with respect to the claim. Now the decrees of the Law proceed according to the literal meaning; and the object of transfer, namely, corroboration, is obtained when a person that is rich and a fair dealer acquiesces in the obligation of the debt, as it is to be supposed that he will readily fulfil his obligation.

Objection.—If the debt shift from the faith of the debtor to that of the transferrer, it would follow that there can be no compulsion on the creditor to receive payment from the debtor, where he offers to discharge the debt; in the same manner as a creditor is not compellable to receive payment of his debt from a stranger in a gratuitous manner.

Reply.—The creditor is compellable to receive payment of the debt from the transferrer, if he offer to make payment, because the claim may eventually revert upon him, in case of the destruction of the debt, since if the transferee were to die insolvent, without having paid the debt, the claim would revert upon the transferrer, for reasons that will be shown in the next case. Hence, the payment of the transferrer cannot in every respect be considered as gratuitous; like that of a stranger.

Unless the transferee deny, or become unable to fulfil, his engagement.—The creditor is not entitled to make any claim upon the transferrer excepting where, his right on the transferee being destroyed, he cannot otherwise obtain it, in which case the debt reverts upon the transferrer. Shafei alleges that the creditor has no right to make any claim for his due upon the transferrer, although his right be destroyed; because, in consequence of the transfer, the transferrer becomes exempted from the debt; and this exemption a absolute, and not restricted to the condition of payment from the transferee. Hence the debt cannot revert upon the transferrer, except on account of some new cause; and none such is to be found in this case. The argument of our doctors is that, although the exemption be absolute, in the terms of the contract, yet it is restricted, in the sense, to the condition of the right being rendered to the creditor. The transfer is therefore dissolved in case of his right being destroyed; because the contract is capable of dissolution, and may be dissolved by the agreement.

TRANSFER DEBTS

of the parties. The condition, moreover, of the safe delivery of the debt to the creditor, is equivalent to that of warranting the subject of a sale to be free from blemish; that is to say, such a warranty implicitly exists, as a condition, in every sale, although it be not specifically mentioned; and, in the same manner, the security of the debt exists, as a condition, in every contract of transfer, although not specified in it. The destruction of the debt due to the creditor in a case of transfer is established, according to Haneea, by one of two circumstances. I. Where the transferee denies the existence of the contract, upon oath, and the credit cannot produce witnesses to prove it; II. Where the transferee dies poor. In the event of either of these circumstances the debt is destroyed, since in neither case it is practicable for the creditor to receive payment from the transferee. This is the true meaning of a destruction of the debt in a case of transfer. The two disciples maintain that a destruction of the debt is occasioned by one of three circumstances. Of these, two are the same with those above recited; and the third is,—a declaration, by the magistrate, of the poverty of the transferee during his lifetime. This third circumstance is not admitted by Haneea: because, according to his doctrine, poverty cannot be established by the decree of the magistrate, since property comes in the morning and goes in the evening; but, according to the two disciples, the decree of the magistrate establishes poverty.

The transferee has a claim upon the doctor for what he transfers upon him. If the transferee should demand, from the transferrer, the amount of what he has paid in virtue of the transfer made upon him, and the transferrer affirms that he had made such transfer upon him, in exchange for a debt of the same amount which he owed him, the affirmation of the transferrer is not admissible, and he is bound to pay the demand of the transferee, because the reason of such demand (namely, the actual payment of it by his desire) is established. The transferrer moreover, asserts a claim which the other denies; and the affirmation of the defendant is creditable.

Objection.—It would appear that the affirmation of the transferee is not to be credited although he be the defendant; because he has acknowledged what he afterwards denies, inasmuch as his acceptance of the transfer is a virtual acknowledgment of the debt he owes to the transferrer.

Reply.—The acceptance of the transfer is not an acknowledgment of debt due to the transferrer, because contracts of transfer are sometimes made without the transferee’s owing any thing to the transferrer.

A debtor may transfer his debt upon a property in the hands of another person. If a person, having deposited a thousand dirms with another, should afterwards make a transfer on it (as if he were to desire his creditors to receive payment of his debt, from a deposit placed by him with such a person), such transfer is valid, because the trustee is capable of discharging the debt from the deposit. If, however, the deposit be destroyed, the transferee (who is otherwise a trustee) is in such case released from the engagement of transfer; because the transfer was restricted to the deposit, since the trustee engaged on further than the payment of the debt from the amount of the actual deposit. It is otherwise with respect to a transfer restricted to usurped property: for if a person were to make a transfer on an usurer; on account of specific property usurped by him, and the said property be afterwards destroyed, the transfer so made does not become null: on the contrary, it is incumbent on the usurer to pay the creditor a similar,—or the value, in case the property in question had not been an article of which the unities were similar,—because, as a substitute or the value is the representative of the thing itself, the property in this case is not held to have been destroyed.

A transfer may be restricted to what is due from the transferee to the debtor. It is to be observed that transfers are sometimes restricted to debts due by the transferee to the transferrer; and in all cases of such restricted transfers, the law invariably is that the transferrer has no right to make any claim upon the transferee, for the substance or the debt upon which he has made such transfer because the right of the creditor is connected with it, in the same manner as that of a pawnholder is connected with the pawn: and also, because, if such a right remained with the transferrer, the act of transfer (which is the right of the creditor) would be rendered null. It is otherwise with respect to an absolute transfer (that is, where a person simply says to his creditor “I have transferred the debt I owe you upon a particular person”) without making any mention of debt being due to him, or of specific property of his being in the possession of that person whether from deposit or usurpation; for in this case the right of the creditor does not relate to the property of the transferrer, but rests entirely upon the faith of the transferee; and hence if the transferrer should receive payment of the substance or debt due to him from the transferee, still the transfer does not become null.

The loan of money in the manner of Siftija is disapproved. Siftija is abominable; that is to say, the giving of a loan of any thing in such a manner as to exempt the lender from the danger of the road; as, for instance, where a person gives something by way of loan, instead of a deposit, to a merchant, in order that he may forward it to his friend at

* That is to say, it is disapproved, although not absolutely illegal. (See the meaning of the term Abominable, p. 206)
DUTIES OF THE KAZEE

BOOK XX

OF THE DUTIES OF THE KAZEE

CHAPTER I

A Kazee must possess the qualifications of a witness.—The authority of a Kazee is not valid, unless he possess the qualifications necessary to a witness; that is, unless he be free, sane, adult, a Mussulman, and unconvicted of slander; because the rules with respect to jurisdiction are taken from those with respect to evidence, since both are analogous to authority; for authority signifies the passing or giving effect to a sentence or speech affecting another, either with or without his consent; and evidence and jurisdiction are both of this nature. (The rules with respect to jurisdiction are here said to be "taken from those with respect to evidence," because, as the sentence of the Kazee is in conformity with the testimony of the witness, it follows that the evidence, as it were, the principal, and the decree of the Kazee the consequent.) As therefore, jurisdiction, like evidence is analogous to authority, it follows that whoever possesses competency to be a Kazee, has competency to be a witness; and also, that the qualifications requisite to a witness are in the same manner requisite to a Kazee—and likewise, that an unjust* man is qualified to be a Kazee; whence if such a person be created a Kazee, it is valid, but still: it is not advisable: in the same manner as holds with respect to evidence;—that is, if a Kazee accept the evidence of an unjust man, it is valid, in the opinion of all our doctors; but still it is not advisable to admit the testimony of such a person, since an unjust man is not deserving of credit.

He does not forfeit his office by misconduct.—If a Kazee be a just man at the time of his appointment, and afterwards, by taking of bribes, prove himself an unjust man, he does not by such conduct become discharged from his office,—but he is, nevertheless, deserving of a dismissal. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet; and it has been adopted by modern lawyers. Shafei maintains that an unjust man is incapable of the office of Kazee, in the same manner as (in his opinion) he is incompetent to give evidence. It is related in the Nawadir, as an opinion of our three debtors, that an unjust man is incapable of discharging the duties of a Kazee. Some of the moderns have also given it as their opinion that the appointment of a man, originally unjust to the office of Kazee, is valid; but that if, having been just at the time of his appointment, he afterwards become unjust; he stands discharged from his office; because as the Sultan appointed him from a confidence in his integrity, is to be presumed that he will not acquire a discharge of the duty without integrity.

A Moojee must be a person of good character.—A question has arisen, whether an unjust man be capable of being a Moojee;* and on this subject different opinions have given. Some have said that he is incapable of being a Moojee, because the giving of a Fitwa (or statement of the law applicable to any case) is connected with religion, and the word of an unjust man is not creditable in a matter relative to religion. Others again have said, that an unjust man is capable of being a Moojee, because of the probability that he will toil and labour in the discharge of his duty, lest the people charge him with his faults. The former, however, is the better opinion. Some have established it as a condition, that a Kazee be a Moojtahid:† the more approved doctrine is, however, that this is merely preferable, but not indispensable.

* As ignorant person may be appointed a Kazee.—The appointment of an ignorant man to the office of Kazee is sanctioned by our doctors.—Shafei maintains that it is not valid; for he argues that such appoints

* Anglice, an expounder of the law.—As the offices of Kazee and Moojee are frequently confounded by European writers, it may not be improper to remark, in this place that the word Kazee (or Cadi) is derived from Kaza, signifying jurisdiction, and Moojee from Fitwa, meaning an application or statement of the law. The Moojee, therefore, the officer who expounds and applies the law to cases, and the Kazee the officer who gives it operation and effect.

ment supposes a capability of issuing decrees, and of deciding between right and wrong; and these acts cannot be performed without knowledge. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that a Kazee's business may be to pass decrees merely on the opinions of others. The object of his appointment, moreover, is to render to every subject his just rights; and this object is accomplished by passing decrees on the opinions of others.

It is the duty of the sovereign to appoint fit persons to that office. —It is incumbent on the Sultan to select for the office of Kazee a person who is capable of discharging the duties of it, and passing decrees; and who is also in a superlative degree just and virtuous; for the Prophet has said "Whoever appoints a person to the discharge of any office, whilst there is another amongst his subjects more qualified for the same than the person so appointed, does surely commit an injury with respect to the rights of God, the Prophet, and the Muslims." It is to be observed that a Muhajir means either a person who is in a high degree conversant with the Hadees or actions and traditional sayings of the Prophet, and who has also a knowledge of the application of the law to cases; or one who has a deep knowledge of the application of the law to cases and also some acquaintance with the Hadees. Some have said that he ought also to have a knowledge of the customs of mankind, as many of the laws are founded upon them.

A person may be appointed who has a confidence in his own abilities — There is no impropriety in selecting for the office of Kazee a person who has a thorough confidence in his ability to discharge the duties of it; because the companions of the Prophet accepted this appointment; and also, because the acceptance of it is a duty incumbent on mankind.

But not one who is dubious of himself. — It is abominable to select a person for the office of Kazee who suspects that he is incapable of fulfilling the duties of it, and who is not confident of being able to act with a strict regard to justice because the selection of such a person is a cause of the propagation of evil. Several of our doctors however, have said that the acceptance of the office of Kazee without confidence is abominable, because the Prophet has said, "Whoever is appointed Kazee suffers the same torture with an animal, whose throat is mangled, instead of being cut by a sharp knife." Many of the companions, moreover, declined this appointment; and Haneefa persisted in refusing it, until the Sultan caused him to be beaten in order to enforce his acceptance of it; but he suffered with patience rather than accept the appointment. Many others, in former times, have also declined this office. Mohammed remained thirty and odd days, or forty and odd days, in imprisonment, and then accepted the appointment. In fact, the acceptance of the office of Kazee, with an intention to maintain justice, is approved, although it be more laudable to decline it: because it is a great undertaking, and notwithstanding a person may have accepted it from an opinion that he should have been able to maintain justice, yet he may have erred in this opinion, and afterwards stand in need of the assistance of others when such assistance is not to be had. Hence it is most laudable to decline it; unless, however, there be no other person so capable of discharging the duties of it, in which case the acceptance of it is an incumbent duty as it tends to preserve the rights of mankind, and to purge the world of injustice.

The appointment must not be solicited or coveted. — It becomes Muslims neither to covet the appointment of Kazee in their hearts, nor to desire it with their tongues because the Prophet has said. Whosoever seeks the appointment of Kazee shall be left to himself; and to him who accepts it on compulsion, an angel shall descend and give directions; and also, because whosoever desires this appointment shows a confidence in himself, which will preclude him from instruction; and whoever, on the other hand, puts his trust in God, will be secretly inspired with a knowledge of what is right in the discharge of his office.

It is lawful to accept the office of Kazee from a tyrannical Sultan, in the same manner as from a just Sultan; because some of the companions accepted this office from Moawiah. But, notwithstanding the right of government during his time remained with Alee; and also, because some of the followers accepted it from Hijai who was a tyrant. Hence the acceptance of the office of Kazee from a tyrant is lawful; — provided, however the tyrant do not put it out of the power of the Kazee to render right to the people; for otherwise the acceptance of it would not be

*The term tyrannical, when applied to a sovereign, generally signifies his being an usurper.

†Moawiah, the son of Abee Siawan. He had been originally appointed, by Othman, to the government of Syria; and suspecting Alee to be instrumental to the death of his patron Othman (who was some time after slain in an insurrection) refused to acknowledge him on his being elected to succeed Othman, and in the end obtained the Khalifat for himself, being the first Khalif of the house of Ommiah, commonly termed the Ommiad Khalifa.

must not credit the affirmation of the late Kazee with respect to him unless supported by evidence, because, in consequence of his dismissal, his affirmation carries no more authority than that of any of the people in general; and the evidence of one person is not proof, more especially when such evidence relates to an action of his own.—If the late Kazee should not be able, in the last instance, to produce evidence, still the new one must not immediately release, such prisoner; on the contrary, he must issue proclamation and use circumspection; that is, he must cause a person to proclaim, every day, that “the Kazee directs that whatsoever has any claim against such a prisoner is appear and be confronted with him.”—If any person appear accordingly, and prefer claim against the prisoner, the Kazee must desire him to produce evidence.—but if no person appear, he must then release the prisoner, provided he see it advisable. He must not, however, precipitate his discharge, before these precautions have been taken; because the imprisonment of him by the former Kazee having been done apparently with reason, it is probable, if he should hastily release him, that the claimant against him might lose his right.

And also concerning deposits of contested property.—It is requisite that the new Kazee examine into the deposits, * which the dismissed Kazee may declare to be in the hands of particular persons, and also into the proceeds arising from the Wakfs [charitable appropriations] of Mussulmans,—and that he act with these according to such evidence as may be established concerning them, or according to the acknowledgment of the person in whose hands are the deposits or the proceeds of the Wakf, because evidence and acknowledgment are both proofs:—but he must not credit the affirmation of the late Kazee:—unless the person in whose hands the property lies avow that “the said property was given in charge to him by the Kazee” : in which case the new Kazee may credit the affirmation of the old one with regard to such property, as it here appears, from the trustees acknowledgment, that the property in question had been in the possession of the dismissed Kazee, whence it may be said to be still in his hands:—his affirmation, therefore, with respect to such property, must, in this case, be credited.—This proceeds on a supposition that the actual possessor had from the beginning acknowledged the dismissed Kazee’s consignment of the property to him; for if he should first have declared, “this property belongs to Zeyd” (for instance), and afterwards, “the dismissed Kazee deposited this with me, and the Kazee affirm it to be the property of some other than Zeyd, in this case he [the possessor] must give: the property to Zeyd, in favour of whom he made the first acknowledgment, as his right is rendered preferable by such acknowledgment; an he must then give a compensation, also, to the dismissed Kazee, because of his having afterwards acknowledged that "the said property was in his custody:" and the dismissed Kazee must give the compensation so received to the person in favour of whom he makes the "affirmation."

He must execute his duty in a mosque—or other public place.—It is requisite that the Kazee sit openly in a mosque for the execution of his office, in order that his place may not be uncertain to travellers or to the inhabitants of the town.—The Jama mosque is the most eligible place, if it be situated within the city, because it is the most notorious.—Shafei maintains that it is abominable for a Kazee to sit in a mosque for the execution of his duty, since polytheists are admitted to the court of the Kazee, and these are declared in the Koran to be filth.

—Moreover, women during their monthly courses may enter the court of the Kazee, but are not allowed admission into a mosque.

—The arguments of our doctors on this point are twofold. First, the Prophet has said "mosques are intended for the praise of God and the passing of decrees;" and he moreover decided disputes between litigants in the place of his Yettekaf [a particular penance] by which must be understood a mosque: besides, the Rashied, Khalifa sat in mosques, for the purpose of hearing and deciding causes. Secondly, the duty of a Kazee is of a pious nature, and is therefore performed in mosques in the same manner as prayers are offered there.—In answer to Shafei, it is to be observed, that as the impurity of polytheists relate to their faith and not to their externals, they are not therefore prohibited from entering a mosque; and with respect to menstruous women, they have it in their power to give notice of their case to the Kazee, who may then go out and meet them at the gate of the mosque, or depute some other for that purpose, as is done where the case is of a nature unfit for public discussion.

Or in his own house.—There is no impropriety in the Kazee's sitting in his own house to pass judgment; but it is requisite that he give orders for a free access to the people.

And must be accompanied by his usual associates.—It is requisite that such people sit along with the Kazee as were used to sit with him prior to his appointment to the office; because, if he were to sit alone in his house, he would thereby give rise to suspicion.

He must not accept of any presents, except from relations or intimate friends.—The Kazee must not accept of any presents, except from relations allied to him within the prohibited degrees, or those from whom he was used to receive them prior to his appointment; neither of which can be esteemed to be on account of his office, the one being in consequence of relationship, and the other of all acquaintances. Excepting these, therefore he must not accept presents from any person as these would be considered as given to him on account of his office, and such it is unlawful for him to enjoy.—If, also his relation within the prohibited degrees, having a cause depending before him, should offer him a present, it is incumbent on him to refuse it. So likewise, if any person accustomed to send him presents prior to his appointment should send him more than usual, or if, having a suit before him, he should send him any presents whatever; in neither case is it lawful for him to accept them, since they would be considered as given to him in consequence of his office, and hence an abstinence from such is indispensable.

Not of any feast or entertainment.—The Kazee must not accept of an invitation to any entertainment, except a general one; because a particular entertainment would be supposed to have been given on account of his office; and his acceptance of it would therefore render him liable to suspicion; in opposition to the case of a general one. This ordinance, which has been adopted by the two Elders, applies equally to the feasts of relations and others. It is related, as an opinion of Mohammed, that the Kazee may accept of an invitation to a feast from his relation, although it be a particular one, in the same manner as he is permitted to accept of presents from him; it is to be observed that a particular entertainment means such as depends entirely on the preference of the Kazee; that is, such as would not take place in case of his absence; and a general one is the reverse.

He must attend funerals, and visit the sick.—It is fitting that the Kazee attend at funeral prayers; and also, that he visit the sick; for these are amongst the duties of a Mussulman, inasmuch as the Prophet, in enumerating six incumbent offices of the Mussulmans towards each other, mentioned funeral prayers and the visiting of the sick.

—But it is requisite that, on these occasions, he make no unnecessary delay, nor permit any person to hold a conversation on the subject of his suit, lest he should thereby afford room for suspicion.

Precautions requisite in his general conduct and behaviour.—The Kazee must not give an entertainment to one of the parties in a suit without the other; because the Prophet has prohibited this; and also because it is of a suspicious nature.

The Jama mosque is the principal mosque in a town, where public prayer is read every Friday: in opposition to a Masjid, which signifies a smaller mosque, where public prayer is not read.
When the two parties meet in the assembly of the Kazee, he must behave to both (in regard to making them sit down, and the like) with an equal degree of attention; because the Prophet has said, “Let a strict equality be observed towards the parties in a suit with respect to their sitting down, or directing them, or looking towards them.”

The Kazee must not speak privately to either of the parties, or make signs towards him, to give him instructions or support his argument; for, besides giving rise to suspicion, he would thereby depress the other party, who might be induced to forego his claim, from an opinion that the Kazee was biased towards the other.

The Kazee must not smile in the face of one of the parties, because that will give him a confidence above the other; neither must he give too much encouragement to either, as he would thereby destroy the proper awe and respect due to his office.

And in his conduct towards witnesses in court, or whilst giving evidence,—It is abominable in the Kazee to prompt or instruct a witness, by saying to him (for instance), “Is not your evidence to this or to that effect?” Because assistance is hereby, in effect, given to one of the parties; and it is therefore abominable, in the same manner, as it would be to instruct either of the parties themselves. —Aboo Yoosaf has said that it is abominable to a witness, on an occasion free from suspicion, is laudable; because a witness may sometimes be at a stand from the awe with which he is struck in the assembly of the Kazee: and in such case to encourage him, in order to give life to the right of his party, is the same as the deputing of a person to compel the appearance of the defendant in court, which is lawful, notwithstanding it be an assistance to the plaintiff,—As also, it is lawful to exact bail from the defendant, although an assistance be thereby given to the plaintiff; in the same manner it is lawful to give encouragement to a witness, to preserve his right, although assistance be thereby offered to one of the parties.

He must not give judgment at a time when his understanding is not perfectly clear and unbiased. —The Kazee must not give judgment when he is hungry or thirsty, because such situations diminish the intellect and understanding of the person affected by them. Neither must he give judgment when he is in a passion or when he has filled his stomach with food, because the Prophet has said “Let not the magistrate decide between disputants when he is angry or full.”

A young Kazee ought to satisfy his passion with his wife before he sits in the court, that he may not be attracted by the view of women that may be present there.

Section

Of Imprisonment.

Rules in imprisonment for debt,—When a claimant establishes his right before the Kazee, and demands of him the imprisonment of his debtor, the Kazee must not precipitately comply, but must first order the debtor to render the right; after which, if he should attempt to delay, the Kazee may imprison him.—This is related in Kazee ali, —and it proceeds from the principle that imprisonment is the punishment of delay:—whence it is necessary first to order him to restore the right to its owner, that his delay may be made apparent.—This is where the right is established by the debtor’s acknowledgment; for in that case the non-payment on the first demand is not construed into delay, because it is possible that the debtor expects a respite, and therefore has not brought the money along with him. But if he should delay after the decree of the Kazee he must then be imprisoned, as his delay is then evident—Where, on the other hand, the right is established by evidence, the defendant must be imprisoned immediately on the establishment of it; because his denial, which occasioned the necessity of proof by evidence, furnishes a sufficient argument of his intention to delay.

In an award of debt, the defendant must be imprisoned immediately on neglecting to comply with the decree,—provided it be incurred for an equivalent, or by a contract of marriage.—If a defendant, after the decree of the Kazee against him, delay the payment in a case where the debt due was contracted for some equivalent (as in the case of goo’s purchased for a price, or of money, or of goods borrowed on promise of a return), the Kazee must immediately imprison him, because the property he received is a proof of his being possessed of wealth.—In the same manner, the Kazee must imprison a refractory defendant who has undertaken an obligation in virtue of some contract, such as marriage or bail, because his voluntary engagement in an obligation is an argument of his possession of wealth, since no one is supposed to undertake what he is not competent to fulfill.

If, also, in this case, he pleads poverty, this plea is nevertheless rejected, and the plaintiff’s assertion (of his being possessed of wealth) credited.—It is to be observed, that the obligation contracted from marriage, as here mentioned, relates only to the Mihr Moolajal, or prompt dower, and not to the Mihr Mojwill, or deferred dower, because an engagement to pay a future debt does not argue the possession of wealth.—In cases, also, of debt of any other description (such as a compensation for usurped property, enforcement for a crime, the consideration of Kitabat, compensation for the freedom of a partnership slave, the maintenance of a wife, and so forth), the Kazee must not imprison the defendant when he pleads poverty: because none of these acts indicate the possession of wealth, and therefore his declaration of poverty must be credited.

And also in every other instance, if the creditor prove his capacity to discharge it —
If, however, the plaintiff prove that he is possessed of wealth, the Kazee must in that case imprison the debtor, under any of the above circumstances. The distinctions here stated are from the Zahir Rawayet. It is said by other authorities, that the assertion of the plaintiff must be credited in every case of debt; that is, whether one debt be contracted in exchange for an equivalent, or voluntarily engaged for by the party: because poverty is the original state of man, and wealth merely supervenient, and thus the natural condition of man is an argument of the truth of the defendant’s declaration of poverty. There is also another tradition, that the defendant’s declaration of poverty is creditable in every case of debt, excepting such as is contracted in exchange for an equivalent.

Case of a wife suing for her maintenance. — If a wife demand her subsistence from her husband, and he plead poverty, his declaration, corroborated by an oath, is to be credited. In the same manner, if a person emancipate his share in a partnership slave, and his partner demand a compensation for his share, and he plead poverty, his declaration is to be credited.

Objection — These two cases are conformable to the two last quoted traditions: but they are repugnant to the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet; for although in virtue of the marriage in one case, and the emancipation in the other, there exists in both a voluntary engagement of responsibility, which indicates the possession of wealth, still his declaration of poverty is nevertheless declared to be creditable.

Reply. — Subsistence to a wife is not an absolute debt (that is, such as can be rendered void only by payment or exemption), for it becomes void, according to all our doctors, without payment or exemption, in case of death. In the same manner also, compensation for freedom is not an absolute debt, according to Hanefis, being in his opinion the same as the consideration of Kitabat: and the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet alludes only to absolute debts.

In a case where the defendant pleads poverty, and the plaintiff proves, by evidence, his possession of wealth, the Kazee must imprison him [the defendant] for two or three months; after which it is requisite that he make an investigation into his circumstances; and if upon such investigation; the people say he is wealthy, let him be continued in confinement, but if they say he is poor, let him be released; because he stands in need of an allowance of time to enable him to acquire which: and the continuance of his imprisonment is, in such case, an oppression. In Kadooree’s abridgment, it is related that he is to be released from confinement, but that the plaintiff is not to be prohibited from using importunity with him. The case of importunity will be more fully discussed hereafter in treating of Hijr. — The period of imprisonment is fixed at two or three months for this reason, that as the imprisonment is inflicted on account of contempt in the debtor’s withholding payment of the debt, notwithstanding the Kazee’s order, the Kazee must therefore imprison him until such time as he reveal his property; in case he have any concealed; and as it is requisite that the term be of some duration, to the end that this advantage may be obtained from it, Mohammed has therefore fitted it at the period above mentioned. Other authorities fix it at one month, at five months and at six months. In fact, this is a point which must be left to the discretion of the Kazee; because to conditions of men are various in regard to their endurance of the hardships of imprisonment, some being capable of bearing it longer than others; and hence the necessity of leaving it to the Kazee to act as he may deem best. — If the debtor prove his poverty by witnesses, prior to the expiration of the prescribed period, in that case there are two traditions. According to one, the witnesses are to be credited; but according to the other their evidence is not to be admitted. Many of our modern doctors follow the latter opinion.

Case of acknowledgment of debt. — In is related, in the Jama Sagheer, that if a person make an acknowledgment of debt before the Kazee, he (the Kazee) must in such case imprison him, and must then make inquiry of the people into his circumstances. If it appear that he is rich, he must in that case continue his imprisonment: but if his poverty be made apparent, he must release him. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this alludes to a person who, having at one time made an acknowledgment of debt to the Kazee, or to some other, afterwards discovers an intention of delay; for otherwise it would differ from the doctrine of Kadooree, before quoted in which it is expressly declared that the Kazee ought not immediately to imprison a debtor after acknowledgment — (The compiler gives this explanation with a view to reconcile the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer with that of Kadooree.)

A husband may be imprisoned for the maintenance of his wife; but a father cannot be imprisoned at the suit of his son. A husband may be imprisoned for the maintenance of his wife, because in withholding it he is guilty of oppression; but a father cannot be imprisoned for a debt due to his son, because imprisonment is a species of severity, which a son has no right to be the cause of inflicting on his father: in the same manner as in cases of retaliation or

* This is an apparent contradiction to what immediately proceeds, concerning the discretionary power of the Kazee with respect to the period of imprisonment. — It is, however, merely a continuation of the doctrine of Mohammed, who has prescribed a term.
CHAPTER II.
OF LETTERS FROM ONE KAZEE TO ANOTHER

Letters authenticated by evidence are admissible in cases of property.—A letter from one Kazee to another is admissible relative to all rights except punishment and retaliation, provided it be authenticated by evidence exhibited before the Kazee to whom it is addressed, for which there is an absolute necessity, as will be shown hereafter.

Difference between a record, and a Kazee’s letter.—If witnesses exhibit evidence, before a Kazee, against a defendant, the subject of the suit being at a distance, the Kazee may pass a decree upon such testimony, because it establishes proof. The decree so made is written down, and this writing is termed a Sidjil or record, and is not considered as the letter of one Kazee to another.*—If, however, the evidence be given in the absence of the defendants, the Kazee must not pass a decree, it being unlawful to do so in the absence of the per-son whom it affects, but he must take down the evidence in writing, in order that the Kazee to whom such writing shall be addressed may use it as evidence. This writing is termed Kitab Hookmee, or the letter of one Kazee to another, and is a transcript of real evidence.

A letter is transmissible only on certain conditions.—It is to be observed that the transmission of letters of one Kazee to another is restricted to several conditions, which will hereafter be explained; and the legality of it is founded on its necessity, since it may often be impossible for the plaintiff to bring the defendant and the evidences together in the same place, because of the distance of their abodes.—Hence the letter of one Kazee to another is, as it were, the evidence of evidence, as a branch from the trunk. It also to be observed that the term rights above used; comprehends debts, and also marriage dowers, portions of heirs usurpations, contested deposits, or Mozaribat stock denied by the manager; because all these are equivalent to bet, and are capable of ascertainment by description, without the necessity of actual exhibition.—Letters from one Kazee to another are also admissible in the case of immovable property, because it is capable of ascertainment by a description of its boundaries;—but they are not admissible with regard to movable property, because in that case, there is a necessity for actual exhibition.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that letters from one Kazee to another are admissible with respect to a male slave, but not with respect to a female, because the probability of elopement is stronger in the one than the other.—It is also related as an opinion of his, that they are admissible with respect to both male and female slaves, but that particular conditions are requisite to establish their admissibility, which will be explained in their proper place.—It is related as an opinion of Mohammed, that the letters of a Kazee are admissible with respect to every species of movable property, and this opinion has been adopted by our modern doctors.

The testimony requisite to authenticate it. —The letters of Kazees are not admissible unless authenticated by the testimony of two men, or of one man and two women, because there is a similarity between all letters, and it is therefore necessary to establish their authenticity by complete proof, which is, by evidence.—The ground of the law is that these letters are binding in their nature, and therefore require to be completely proved. It is otherwise with respect to the letters of Hibees [Infidel aliens] to the Imam, soliciting protection; for these require not to be proved by evidence since they are not binding in their nature, insomuch as it rests with the Imam to grant the protection or not at his pleasure.—It is also otherwise with respect to the message of a Kazee to a Mozee [purger of witnesses] or with respect to the message of a purger to the Kazee, for such a message has no force, considered as the message of a purger but merely as being a corroborator of the testimony of witnesses.

The contents must be previously explained to the authenticating witnesses.—It is incumbent on the Kazee to read his letter in the presence of the witnesses who are to authenticate it, or to explain the contents of it to them, that they may have a knowledge thereof: because evidence cannot be given without knowledge. Afterwards he must close the letter, and affix his seal to it in their presence, and then consign it over to them, that they may have a security against any possibility of alteration in it.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed; and the reason is, that a knowledge of the subject of the letter, and an evidence of the affixture of the seal, are indispensable requisites; and in the same manner a remembrance of the contents is also requisite; whence it is that the Kazee must furnish them with an open copy of the letter; with which they may refresh their memory.—It is however related, as the last opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that no one of these particulars is requisite, it being sufficient to attest that this is the letter and this the seal of the Kazee, and it is also reported, from him, that the presence of the defendant is necessary.—Hence it appears that, after his attaining the dignity of Kazee, he considered this matter as of little consequence; and his opinion is of great weight, since those that only hear are not so competent to determine as those that see.—Shimsal-Ayma has adopted the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

* This case supposes the thing in dispute to be situated in the jurisdiction of a different Kazee from him before whom the parties bring their suit; and the decree which in his case the Kazee gives being written down, is carried to the other Kazee, who is bound to see it enforced.

It must not be received but in presence of the defendant.—When a letter from a Kazee arrives, the Kazee to whom it is addressed ought not to receive it unless in the presence of the defendant; because as such letter is equivalent to an exhibition of deudence, the presence of the defendant is therefore indispensable.—It is otherwise with respect to the other Kazee’s hearing the evidence, because that is done merely with a view to transmit it, and not to pass sentence upon it.

Forms to be observed in the reception of it.—When the witness bring the letter to the Kazee to whom it is addressed, let him first look at the seal of it and after hearing their testimony that “this is the letter of a particular Kazee,” that he delivered it to them in his court of judgment; “he read it in their presence,” and, that “he affixed his seal to it before them”), let him then open and read it in the presence of the defendant, and pass a decree agreeable to the contents. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf has said it is sufficient for the witnesses to attest that “this is the letter and seal of such a Kazee.”—In the Kadooree, the proof of the integrity of the witnesses prior to the opening of the letter is not made a condition.—The better opinion, however, is that it is a necessary condition; and the same has been declared by Khasaaf; for this reason that there may eventually be a necessity to recur to other evidence, in case of a want of proof of the integrity of those that brought it; and it would be impossible for any others to give their testimony unless the seal still remained upon it: it is therefore absolutely necessary that the Kazee defer breaking the seal of the letter until the integrity of the bearers be proved.

It is rendered void by the death or dismissal of the writer in the interium.—One Kazee must not accept a letter from another, unless the Kazee that wrote it be, at the time, still fixed and established in his office.

—if, therefore, prior to the receipt of the letter, the Kazee that wrote it should have died, or have been dismissed from his office, or have become disqualified from the duties of it, from apostasy or insanity, or from having suffered punishment for slander, the Kazee to whom the letter is addressed must then reject it; because the author of it being at that period reduced to the level of the people, any information from him, independent of what relates to himself, or mutually to them both, is not admissible.

Or (unless generally addressed) by the death or dismissal of him to whom it is transmitted.—So likewise, if the Kazee to whom the letter is addressed should have died, another Kazee must not open it, unless the address run in this manner, “To the son of—, Kazee of the city of—, or to whatever Kazee it may concern,” he is no entitled to open it, from the uncertainty of the address.

If the defendant die previous to the arrival of the letter with the Kazee, judgment must be passed upon it in presence of his heir, as being his representative.

It is not admissible in cases of punishment or retaliation.—A letter from one Kazee to another is not valid in cases of retaliation of punishment; because as in such a letter there exists a semblance of substitution (for the letter is not itself evidence, but merely a substitute for evidence), it is therefore equivalent to evidence upon evidence; and as evidence upon evidence is not admitted in these cases, the letter of a Kazee cannot be admitted.

Section.

A woman may execute the office of Kazee in all cases of property.—A woman may execute the duties of a Kazee in every case except punishment or retaliation, in conformity with the rule that the evidence of a woman is admissible in admissible in every cases of punishment or retaliation: for the rules of jurisdiction are derived from the rules of evidence, as was before stated.

A Kazee is not at liberty to appoint a deputy without the authority of the Imam.—It is not permitted to a Kazee to appoint a deputy, unless he have received a special power from the Imam to that effect: for although he have been himself appointed to the office of Kazee, yet he has not been empowered to confer such appointment on another. Hence, in the same manner as it is unlawful for an agent to appoint an agent unless with the permission of his constituent, so is it unlawful for a Kazee to appoint a deputy unless by the authority of the Imam. It is otherwise with respect to a person appointed to read the Friday’s prayers; for he may appoint a deputy to act for him, since if any delay should happen in the performance of this service, the prayers would become void and null, as the period for them is fixed: the appointment of a person to read these prayers, therefore, is virtually an argument of his being empowered to appoint a deputy to act for him, with a view to prevent the nullity of the service:—country to jurisdiction, which, not depending on a fixed period, is not therefore defeated by delay.

But the decrees of the deputy, passed in his presence, or with his approbation, are valid. —If a Kazee, not having power to appoint a deputy, should nevertheless appoint one, and the said deputy, either in presence of the Kazee, or in his absence, but with his approbation, pass a decree, the decree so passed is valid; —in the same manner as where the agent of an agent performs any act in the presence of the agent, or with his consent, in which case such act is valid. —The ground of this is that the decree being passed in the presence of the Kazee, or with his approbation, and the act being performed in the presence of the agent, or with his approbation, the judgment and reflection of the Kazee himself is therefore exercised in the case of the decree passed by his deputy. —And as the judgment and reflection of the agent in the case are done by his agent, which is what was required.

If he appoint a deputy, by authority, he cannot afterwards dismiss him. —If the Imam give authority to the Kazee to appoint whomsoever he pleased his agent, the person whom he appoints becomes in that case the Deputy of the Sultan; and the Kazee is not entitled to dismiss him.

He must maintain and enforce the equal decree of every other Kazee. —It is incumbent upon every Kazee to maintain and enforce the decree of another Kazee, unless such decree be repugnant to the doctrine of the Kora, or of the Sonna, or of the opinions of our doctors; in other words, unless it be a decision unsupported by authority. —It is related, in the Jama Sagheer, that if a Kazee pass a decree in a matter concerning which different opinions have been given, and be afterwards succeeded by another Kazee of a different opinion with respect to that matter, the latter Kazee must nevertheless enforce the decree so made; for it is a rule that when a Kazee passes a decree in a doubtful case, the decree is executed accordingly; but if it is permitted to a succeeding Kazee to rescind it because although the succeeding Kazee be in equal point of judgment to his predecessor, still the judgment of the predecessor is in this instance allowed a superiority, because of its having been exercised in passing the decree; and therefore it cannot be affected by the judgment of his successor, which is deemed inferior from its not having been exercised.

His determination in a doubtful case is valid, although it be repugnant to the tenets of his sect. —If a Kazee, in a doubtful case, determine contrary to his tenets, from having forgotten the principles of his sect, such decree must nevertheless be enforced, according to Haneefah. —If, on the contrary, he pass such decree knowingly, and not through forgetfulness, there are in that case two opinions recorded. —According to one, the decree must be enforced in that instance also, because the error in is is uncertain. —

In the opinion of the two disciples the decree must not be enforced in either case; that is, whether the error be wilful, or proceeded from forgetfulness: and this is the approved exposition. —By a doubtful case is meant one in regard to which there is no particular ordinance, either by the word of God, or by the Prophet, and concerning which, consequently, different opinions have been supported by the companions and their followers. —Where a great number, however, have concurred and only a few have differed, it is not considered as a doubtful case.

An article decreed unlawful, upon evidence, continues so, although the evidence prove false. —Everything of which the illegality is decreed by the Kazee from apparent circumstances, that is to say, from the testimony of witness, although in reality such testimony be false, is nevertheless ipso facto unlawful. —This is according to Haneefah, and it is also of the same opinion where the Kazee decrees the legality of a thing; provided, however, that the claim of the plaintiff be founded on some determinate plea, such as purchase, lease, or marriage, as if, for instance, he should claim a female slave by asserting that he had purchased her.

A decree cannot be passed against an absentee but in presence of his representative. —The Kazee must not pass a decree against an absentee unless in the presence of his representative. —Shafei maintains that it is lawful for a Kazee to pass a decree against an absentee; because, upon the establishment of proof by testimony the right in the judgment of the Kazee becomes evident. —The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold: First, the passing of a decree on the testimony of witnesses is with a view to put an end to contention; and as contention supposes a refusal on the part of the defendant, it follows that as his absence precludes the possibility of his refusal, no contention can have existed. Secondly, the absence of the defendant admits of two suppositions, namely, that (if present) he would, either have acknowledged the claim, or denied it: if the former, the Kazee must have passed a decree upon that ground; or, if the latter, upon testimony. Now decrees passed on those different grounds are of a distinct nature, since that which is founded on testimony is binding on all men, whereas the other is not. Where, therefore, the defendant is absent, it becomes a matter of doubt with the Kazee whether sort of decree he ought to pass; and hence it is requisite that he suspend it until the arrival of the defendant.

*For instance, if two people declare that there is a drop of wine in a particular vessel of water, and the Kazee in consequence decree it to be unlawful, it must be considered as such, although the falsity of their declama-
CHAPTER. III.

OF ARBITRATION.

An arbitrator must possess the qualities essential to a Kazee.—If two persons appoint an arbitrator, and express their satisfaction with the award pronounced by him, such award is valid; because, as these persons have a power with respect to themselves, they consequently possess a right to appoint an arbitrator between them, and his award is therefore binding upon them. This is where the person so appointed possesses the qualifications of a Kazee; for the stands in that relation to the other two, it is therefore requisite that he be competent to discharge the function of a Kazee.

He must not be a slave, an infidel, a slandered or an infant.—It is not lawful to appoint a slave, or an infidel, or a person that has been punished for slander, or an infant, to act as an arbitrator; because none of these is competent to be a witness.

But he may be an unjust person.—If an unjust man be appointed an arbitrator, it is valid, because of the validity of his appointment to the office of Kazee, as has been already explained.

Either party may retract from the give-tration before the award.—If two men appoint another as an arbitrator, still it is lawful for either of them to recede before he gives his award, because as the arbitrator has received his powers from them he cannot exert those powers without their consent. The award, however, when given, is binding upon them, as the power of the arbitrator over them was established by their own agreement.

On a reference to the Kazee, he must give effect to the award, if approved.—If the parties refer the award of the arbitrator to the Kazee, and it be conformable to his opinion, he must cause it to be carried into execution, because it would be useless to annul it, and then pass a similar decree.—But if it be contrary to his opinion, he must annul it, as the award of an arbitrator is not binding on the Kazee, since he did not authorize it.

Reference to an arbitrator is invalid in cases of punishment or retaliation.—The appointment of an arbitrator is not valid in cases where punishment or retaliation is incurred, because the party has no power over his own blood, and is therefore not capable of assigning it to others. Lawyers have observed that the particular exception of retaliation and punishment affords an argument of the legality of arbitration in all other contested questions, such as divorce, marriage, and the like. This is approved. Still, however, there is a necessity for ratification of the award in these cases by a decree of the Kazee, in order that a control when the nature of the decree he ought to pass will be ascertained.

Nor against one who first puts the claim and then disappears.—If a defendant, having first denied the claim, should afterwards disappear in that case also the Kazee must suspend his proceeding during his absence, because is is requisite that the denial exist at the time of passing the decree, which is not the case in the present instance.—The opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, on this case, is different.—It is to be observed that the representative of an absentee is either one appointed by himself to act for him (such as an agent), or one appointed by law (such as an executor nominated by the Kazee), or, lastly, one who stands as virtual representative, by the claim which the plaintiff prefers against the absentee being also a cause of claim against some person present. This last may occur in various modes; and the following may serve for an example.—A person establishes, by testimony, his right to a house in the possession of a particular person; in virtue of his having purchased it from an absentee, who was at the time the proprietor of it and from whom the present possessor has usurped it;—in which case, if the possessor deny all this, and the plaintiff establish it by evidence, the Kazee may pass a decree relating both to the absentee and the person present; nor would the denial of the sale by the absentee if he should after wards return, be credited, because the purchase of the house from its proprietor is the cause of that which the plaintiff claims from the person present, namely, the right of property in the house. In such case, therefore, the person present stands as the agent for the absentee, and his denial is consequently equivalent to that of the absentee.—The group of this is that the plaintiff is not capable of preferring his claim against the person present, unless he first establish it against the sentence. The person present is therefore considered as the representative of the absentee; and hence the decree of the Kazee against the person present stands as the decree against the absentee.—Where, however, the claim of the plaintiff upon the absentee is the condition of something which he claims against the person present, the latter is not in that case considered as the representative of the absentee. A full discussion of this is to be found in the Jama.

The Kazee may lend the property of orphans.—It is lawful for Kazee to lend the property of orphans, keeping a record of it in writing because such loans is advantageous for the orphans, since it tends to preserve and secure their property; and the Kazee has the power of enforcing the restitution of it. An executor, on the contrary, is responsible for the property he lends, as is also a father, because neither of them has the power of enforcing a restitution of it.

*Arab. Tahkeem. † Arab. Hakam.
being maintained over mankind, their presumption may be restrained, for otherwise men would continually settle their differences by a private reference, without regard to the law.

An arbitrator's award of a fine against the tribe of an offender is of no effect.—If, in a case of homicide from error, the slayer and the heir of the deceased appoint an arbitrator and he award a fine of blood to be paid by the tribe of the slayer, such award is of one effect; in other words; the heir is not entitled to exact such fine from the tribe in virtue of the award, for it has no force over them, as they did not authorize the arbitrator.

Nor again, the offender himself, unless he acknowledge the offence.—If, also, the arbitrator award the fine to be paid by the slayer, the Kazee must annul it, as being contrary to the law, which prescribes the fine to be paid by the tribe; excepting, however, where the fact is proved by the confession of the slayer; for in that case the tribe are not liable to the fine.

He may examine witness.—An arbitrator is empowered to hear the witnesses of the plaintiff, and also to pass an award upon the denial or acknowledgment of the parties, because this is agreeable to the law.

The parties, acknowledging an arbitrator's decree cannot afterwards retract from it.—If an arbitrator give information to the Kazee of the acknowledgment of one of the parties, or of the integrity of the witnesses, at a time when both the parties continue to adhere to his award, such information must be credited, and the Kazee must not afterwards credit the denial of either of the parties, as the arbitrator's authority still continues unshaken.—If, on the other hand, he give information to the Kazee related to his award (that is, if the parties dispute concerning his award, one of them saying that "it was to such or such effect," and the other denying this, and the arbitrator informing the Kazee that "he has award so and so"),—his information must not be credited, since in such case his authority no longer endures.

Any award passed in favour of a parent, child, or wife, is null.—The determination of every person acting in the capacity of a judge (whether he be a Kazee or an arbitrator) in favour of his father, his mother, his child, or his wife, is null and void, because evidence in favour of any of these relations being unlawful on account of the suspicion which it suggests, a determination in their favour is also unlawful, for the same reason.

A determination, however, against any of these relations is valid, because evidence against them is accepted, since it is liable to no suspicion.

Joint arbitrators must act conjunctively.—If two persons be appointed arbitrators, it is incumbent upon them to act conjunctively in giving a determination, as this is a matter which requires wisdom and judgment.

Section.

Miscellaneous Cases relative to Judicial Decisions.

No act can be performed him respect to the under storey of a house, which may any may affect the building.—In a house of which the upper storey belongs to one man, and the under storey to another, the proprietor of the under storey is not entitled to drive in a nail, or to make a window, without the permission of the proprietor of the upper storey.—This is the doctrine of Haneefah. The two disciples hold that the proprietor of the under storey may do any act whatever with respect to it, provided injury result to the upper storey. The same disagreement also subsists will regard to the proprietor of the upper storey building upon that foundation. Some of our lawyers remark that the doctrine ascribed to the two disciples is on an explanation of that of Haneefah, and that, in reality, there exists no disagreement between them.—Others again say that, according to the two disciples, there is a perfect freedom; —in other words, either of the proprietors is at full liberty to do whatever act he pleases with relation to his property; for property, in its very nature, implies a perfect freedom with regard to it, restrictions upon it being merely supervenient to another. Hence it may be done, the detriment be only doubtful, and not inevitable, the proprietor cannot lawfully be restrained from acting upon his own property. According to Haneefah, on the other hand, there is restriction;—in other words, neither of the proprietors is premitted to do any acts with regard to their respective property without the permission of the other, because such acts affect a place with which the right of another is connected, and that right is sacred from any act of his, in the same manner as the right of a mortgagee or a lessee.—Besides, the freedom and absolute ness of the property to its owner is here supervenient, since it depends on the consent of another: so long, therefore, as that consent is doubtful, the original restriction operates. In these cases, moreover the detriment is not eventual but is in some degree certain; since the driving in of a nail or wedge, or the breaking of the wall to make a window, tends to weaken the edifice, whence these acts are prohibited.

A passage cannot be made into a private lane.—If there be a long lane, parallel to which, either on the right or left, runs another long lane, not a thoroughfare (that is, not open at both ends), it is not permitted to make a door to open into the second lane; because the object of making a door is to obtain a passage to end from; and the second lane in not free to the inhabitants of the first since not being a thoroughfare, the right of passage through it belongs only to the inhabitants of it.—Some have said that it is perfectly lawful for any of the inhabitants of the first lane to open a door into the second; because the opening of a door is nothing more than the breaking of a wall by its proprietor, which is lawful; but that the prohibition against passing to and fro nevertheless remains in force. The authentic determination, however, is, that the opening of a door, in such case, is lawful; because after the door is opened it will be difficult to prevent a continual thoroughfare; and also, because there is a possibility that after some time the right of passage might be claimed by the person who made the door, and the very circumstance of the door might be pleaded as a proof of his right. If, however, the second lane be not long, but short, the inhabitants of the first lane have a right to open doors into it; because they have a right of passage through it, since on account of its shortness it is considered as a court, in which all have a right of participating, whence it is that they have all an equal claim of Shaffa in case of the sale of any of the houses in it.

An indefinite claim may be compounded.—If a person vaguely claim something belonging to a house, and the proprietor of the house deny his right to anything, but afterwards compound with him for his claim, such composition is valid; for although the article in dispute was not known, yet a composition with a known article for one that is unknown is lawful, according to our doctors, since as the article compounded for merely drops, the uncertainty concerning it can never create strife;—for uncertainty, in a matter which drops, leaves no room for contention, as this cannot occur but in cases of uncertainty respecting things the delivery of which is required.

Case of a claim founded on gift and purchase.—If a person claim a house in the possession of another, on the plea that "the possessor had, at a former period, made a gift of it to him," and upon being required to produce evidence, should then say, "he denies the gift, and I therefore bought the house from him," and produce witnesses, and they attest the purchase, but state the date of it to be antecedent to the gift, such testimony is not admissible, because of its differing from the assertion of the claimant with respect to the date of the deeds;—whereas, if they were to attest the purchase as having been made posterior to the gift their testimony would, in that case, be admitted, because of its conformity to the claimant's plea. If, on the other hand, he plead a gift, and then bring witnesses to prove the purchase previous to the gift, without mentioning the denial of the gift by the donor, in this instance also the evidence is not admissible.—This is mentioned in various copies of the Jama Sagheer; and the reason of it is that the claim of the house, in virtue of a gift, is an acknowledgment of its being the property of the giver; but from which the claimant afterwards recedes by declaring that he had purchased it prior to the gift; which is a contradiction; it is otherwise in the former case; for there the purchase is declared to be posterior to the gift; and a declaration to this effect, so far from denying the property to have existed in the donor at the time of the gift, is rather a confirmation of it.

If the purchase of female slave be denied by the purchaser, the master may cohabit with her.—If a person possessed of a female slave say to another, "you purchased this slave from me, and have not paid me the price," and the other deny the sale, and the possessor of the slave determine in his own mind to drop the suit, and of consequence refrain from any further contention with the other, he may then lawfully cohabit with the, since the denial of the purchaser annuls the sale in the same manner as where both parties deny it.

Objection.—How can the sale be annulled by the mere determination of the seller in his own mind to relinquish the suit, since no contracts can be annulled by the mere determination on annual them; whence it is that, in a sale with an option, If the possessor of the option determine to annul it, still the annulment does not take place immediately on the forming of such resolution?

Reply.—In the case in question the sale does not become null merely by the determination, but because of the determination being joined to a conduct that manifests it, such as the detention of the slave in the proprietor's possession, his carrying her away from the place of contention to his own house, and his using her as a servant.

In the receipt of money, the declaration of the receiver must be credited with respect to the quality—If a person acknowledge that he had received ten dirms from a stranger, but afterwards assert that they were seven. Zeyf; or bad, in that case his declaration must be credited; because bad dirms, although of an inferior value, are nevertheless of the species of dirms, whence if, in a Sirf sale, a person take possession of bad ones in exchange for good, it is valid. As, moreover, a receipt of dirms is not restricted to good ones, it does not follow, from his acknowledgment of the seisin, that the dirms were good; and such being the case, his declaration must be credited, because he denies the receipt of good dirms, which is his right.

It would be otherwise if he were to declare that "he had received ten good dirms," or that "he had received his right," or "the price of his wares," or "a discharge of his claims," and afterwards to allege that the dirms were bad; for in neither of these cases would his declaration be credited; because in the first case he expressly acknowledges the receipt of good dirms; and in the three following he makes such acknowledgment by implication, and therefore his subsequent declaration to the con-

tary, being considered as a prevarication, is not credited.

A creditor denying his debtor’s acknowledgment cannot afterward substantiate his claim but by proof, or the debtor’s verification. If one person say to another, “I owe you one thousand dirms,” and the other reply, “you do not owe me anything,” but afterwards, in the same meeting, say, “you owe me one thousand dirms;” in that case he is not entitled to anything unless he adduce proof, or the debtor verify his assertion; because the debtor’s acknowledgment was virtually annulled by his denial; and his subsequent assertion of course becomes a claim de novo, which therefore requires either to be proved, or to be, verified by the debtor. It is otherwise where a person says to another, “you bought certain goods from me,” and the other denies; for he might nevertheless, afterwords, without prevarication, confirm the declaration of the person in question in the same meeting; because in a contract of sale one of the parties only cannot annul it; in the same manner as one of them is incapable of making it. The reason of this is that the acknowledgment of a contract of sale is the right of the buyer and seller jointly, and therefore the contract is not annulled by the denial of the purchaser only; the confirmation of the purchaser, therefore, after his denial, is valid, since his denial did not occasion an annulment. A person, on the contrary, in whose favour an acknowledgment is made, may of himself annul such acknowledgment by a rejection of it; and his subsequent assertion corresponding with the acknowledgment is not a corroboration of it, because the acknowledgment did not then exist, it having been virtually done away by his rejection of it. Hence the subsequent assertion is a claim de novo which consequently require either proof by witnesses, or the verification of the debtor.

In a claim for debt, the evidence of the debtor proving a discharge, must be credited. If a person make a claim upon another, and that other declare that he never owed him anything, and the plaintiff prove, by witnesses, that the defendant owes him one thousand dirms, and the defendant, on the other hand, prove by witnesses that he has paid the same, in that case the evidence of the defendant must be credited; and in the same manner also, the evidence of the defendant must be credited, in case it tend to establish his having obtained a releasement or discharge of the claim—Zifler maintains that the evidence of the defendant must not be credited, since payment is a branch of obligation, and the defendant having denied the existence of the obligation at any period, is therefore evidently guilty of prevarication. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that a consistency with regard to the denial and the proof is here possible, because unjust debts are sometimes paid to avoid litigation, and releasements from them are likewise sometimes given. Sometimes, also, a defendant, after denying a claim, would adduce evidence of his having obtained a releasement with the plaintiff; and in such case he is bound to pay the composition, notwithstanding the debt for which it was made may have been unbest. If the defendant declare, “I owe you nothing,” in that case also his evidence to the effect above recited, is creditable, because of its perfect conformity with the assertion that “he owes him nothing,” which evidently means at that time, inasmuch as he proves that he had afterwards paid it to him. But if he were to say, “I owe you yet anything, and I do not know you,”—the evidence of the plaintiff might afterwards produce the discharge of having paid the debt, or of his having obtained a releasement from it, would not be credited; because the contradiction between his assertion and the evidence cannot in this case be reconciled, since no man enters into the business of giving of receiving with one of whom he has no knowledge. Kadooree remarks that in this case also the evidence must be credited, because the contradiction that subsists is not wholly irreconcilable. Inasmuch as persons who are kept continually often transact business mediate through others, without knowing the person with whom the business is concluded; and it also often happens that men of rank, when a mob assemble at their door and make a noise, desire their agents to give them some money to pacify them.

Case of a disputed purchase of a defective slave. If a person declare that “he has purchased a female slave from another,” and that other deny that he had ever sold her to him, and the purchaser having proved his assertion by witnesses, an additional finger be discovered on the hand of the slave, and the seller prove by evidence that the purchaser had exempted himself from responsibility for every defect, in that case the testimony of the seller must be rejected, since he is evidently guilty of prevarication. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the evidence of the seller must be credited, because of the analogy of this case to that of debt, as before explained, in which it was shown that there was a possibility of reconciling the contradiction; for a reconcilement of the contradiction is also possible in this case, by supposing the seller to have been an agent for another, on which supposition the declaration of the purchaser, that “he had not sold the slave,” would have been true, and his subsequent plea, of having been exempted from a responsibility for defects, would also have been valid. Thus the apparent contradiction is capable of reconclement. The ground on which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds is, the plea of having been exempted from a warranty against defects is an acknowledgment of the existence of the sale, which he had before denied, and hence it necessarily follows that he previ ous. It is otherwise in the case of debt, for in that case the payment is no argument of the respondent's acknowledging the existence of it, since (as has been before explained) unjust debts are often paid to avoid strife.

A debt suspended, in its effect, upon the will of God, is null.—If a person, having acknowledged a debt to another, should subscribe a deed to that effect, and at the conclusion of it insert the following sentence, "Whosoever produces this deed of acknowledgment, and claims the thing recited therein, is proprietor thereof, if it please God," or, if a person, having sold something to another, should at the end of the bill of sale insert the following sentence, "If any person shall hereafter claim the property of the subject of the sale, in that case I am answerable for the same, if it please God,"—in both these cases the deeds are of no effect; whence, in the first case, the acknowledgment is null, and in the second, the sale is invalid. The two disciples hold that in the former case the debt is binding, and in the latter case the sale is valid; because in their opinion the condition "if it please God" applies, not to the general purport of the deed, but merely (in the former instance) to the expression, "Whoever produces this deed of acknowledgment," and so forty,—or (in the latter) to the expression, "If any person shall hereafter claim," and so forth: because the design in drawing up deeds of acknowledgment and of sale is merely to corroborate and confirm the act; and if the expression in question had a reference to the whole deed, this design would be defeated. Haneefa, on the contrary, being of opinion that this condition applies to the whole of the deed, therefore holds to be invalid. It is to be observed, that if a blank be left at the end of a bill of sale or deed of acknowledgment, and the words "if it please God" be afterwards written, our lawyers are of opinion that the clause does not affect the bill or the deed, because the blank, in either case, marks the conclusion.

CHAPTER IV.
OF THE DECRES OF A KAZEE RELATIVE TO INHERITANCE.

Case of the widow of a Christian claiming her inheritance after having embraced the faith.—If a Christian die, and his widow appear before the Kazee as a Mussilma, and declare that "she had become so since the death of her husband," and the heirs declare that she had become so before his death, their declaration must be credited. Zisser is of opinion that the declaration of the widow must be credited; because the change of her religion, as being a supervenient circumstance, must be referred to the nearest possible period. The arguments of our doctors are, that as the cause of her exclusion from inheritance, founded on difference of faith, exists in the present, it must therefore be considered an extant in the preterite, from the argument of the present; —in the same manner as an argument is derived from the present, in a case relative to the running of the watercourse of a mill; —that is to say, if a dispute arise between the lessor and lessee of a water-mill, the former asserting that the stream had run from the period of the lease till the present without interruption, and the latter denying this, in that case, if the stream be running at the period of contention, the assertion of the lessor must be credited, but if otherwise, that of the lessee. As, moreover, an argument drawn from apparent circumstances is proof sufficient to set aside the claim of a plaintiff, it follows that the argument in question suffices, on behalf of the heirs, to defeat the plea of the widow. With respect to what Zisser objects, it is to be observed that he has regard to the argument from apparent circumstances, for establishing the claim of the wife upon her husband's estate, and an argument of this nature does not suffice as proof to establish a right although it would suffice to annul one.

Case of the Christian widow of a Mussulman claiming under the same circumstance.

—If a Mussulman, whose wife was once a Christian should die, and the widow appear before the Kazee as a Mussilma and declare that she had embraced the faith prior to the death of her husband, and the heirs assert the contrary, in this case also the assertion of the heirs must be credited, for no regard is paid, in this instance, to any argument derived from present circumstances (as in the case of the water-mill), since such an argument is not capable of establishing claim, and the widow is here the claimant of her husband's property. With respect to the heirs on the contrary, they are repellant of the claim; and probability is an argument in their favour, since the Islamism of the widow is supervenient, and is therefore an argument against her.

A trustee on the decease of his principal, must pay the deposit to whomsoever he acknowledges as heirs.—If a person who had deposited four thousand dirams in the hands of another should die, and the trustee acknowledge a certain person to be the son of the deceased and his true and only heir, he is bound to pay to that person the four thousand dirams which he held in trust, because in this case he makes an acknowledg
The reasoning adduced by the two disciples in support of their opinion is, that the Kazee is the conservator of the rights of the absent; and it is most probable that some of the creditors or heirs may be absent, since death is often sudden, and may happen at a time when they are not all present; and it is a precaution that is prudent to take, for if he acknowledge an advisable precaution, the Kazee must therefore take this precaution, in the same manner as he exacts security when he delivers a trove, or a fugitive slave, to the owner, or when he awards maintenance to a wife from the estate of her absent husband. The arguments of Haneefa upon this point are twofold. First, the right of those that are present is established with certainty in case of there being no absent heirs, and is apparently established in the mean time even if there be absent heirs; and as it is incumbent on the Kazee to act according to what is apparent to him, he must not suspend his proceedings in favour of those that are present, by exacting security for the rights of the absent, whose actual existence is uncertain;—in the same manner as where a person establishes the purchase of any thing in the hands of another,—or a debt due to him by a slave; that is, if a person prove a right by purchase to a thing in the possession of another, it is the duty of the Kazee immediately to order it to be delivered to him without exacting security although another may eventually appear and claim it. In the case of a prior purchase, and in this same manner, if a person prove a debt due to him by a slave, the Kazee must order the slave to be sold, the end that payment may be made from the price, without exacting any security, although there be a possibility of another creditor afterwards appearing. Secondly, the principal is unknown, and security is invalid if the principal be not clearly proved out,—as where, for instance, a person says to several debtors, "I am bail for one of you," in which case the security is invalid, because the actual principal is not signified, notwithstanding there be a certainty of his existence. In the case in question, therefore, the security is invalid a fortiori, since even the existence of the principal is uncertain. It is otherwise in the case of decreeing maintenance to the wife of an absentee from the effects of her husband, because her right being known and established the person in favour of whom the security is given is not uncertain. With respect to the case of a fugitive slave, or a trove property, there are two traditions. Concerning those, however, there is also a difference of opinion. Some have said that if the Kazee give a trove property to the proprietor, in his describing the marks, or a fugitive slave to his master on the acknowledgment of the slave that "the said person is his master," it is incumbent upon him, in either case; to take security. And all our doctors coincide in this opinion; because the right of the receiver is not proved, whence it is in the power of the Kazee, if he please, to withhold the slave from the person in question altogether.

In the joint inheritance of a property held by a third person, the present heir receives his share; but no security is required in behalf of him who is absent.—If a person prove by evidence, that a house then in the possession of another had been left between him and his brother, who is absent, in that case one half of the house must be given to him and the other half left in the hands of the person who his possession; and no security must be exacted from him. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples are of opinion, that if the possessor deny the right, the share of the absent brother must be put into the hands of a trustee until his return; but if he acknowledge the right it must then be left in his possession.—For they argue that a denier, as being an opponent, cannot be trusted with the property; whereas it may be entrusted to an acknowledger, as he is a friend and confidant. The argument of Haneefa is that the decree of the Kazee, awarding that "the deceased left the house to his heirs," is a decree merely in favour of the deceased; for inheritance cannot take place unless the property of the person through whom it devolves be proved; and as there is a probability of the deceased having constituted the possessor trustee, it follows that the house cannot be taken from him; as holds in the case of his acknowledging it. In regard to his denial, it is virtually annulled by the decree of the Kazee; and their is a probability of his not denying the right again, because the dispute in question has become known both to himself and the Kazee. If the claim, in the case in question, relate to moveable property, some have said that the article is to be taken from the possessor, according to all our doctors; because there is a necessity for the conservation of it; and this is answered in the best manner by the taking of it from the possessor, who, on account of his denial of his own use, or the other, may convert it to his own use, either from opposition, or from a belief of its being his own right; but when the Kazee takes it from him, and deposits it with a trustee, the probability is that the trustee, from his integrity, will take care of it. The case is different with respect to immovable property, for that is preserved in itself; whence it is that an executor, although he have power to sell the moveables of an absent heir, arrived at the age of maturity, yet cannot so with regard to his immovable property. Others, however have said that the same difference of opinion subsists with regard to moveable property. It is to be noted that immovable property is, it to be observed that opinion of Haneefa, that the half ought to be left in the hands of the possessor, is the most authentic, because there is a necessity for conservation, and his is answered in the best possible manner by putting it in the hands of one who is responsible in case of its loss, since it likely that he will be most careful of it. The possessor, moreover, is responsible in consequence of his denial, whereas a trustee is not. With respect to what is further said, "no security must be exacted," it proceeds on this principle, that the exaction of bail is an occasion of litigation and contention; and it is the duty of the Kazee to prevent these,—not to excite them. If, in the case in question, the absentee return there is no necessity for again producing evidence, because he is entitled to the half in virtue of the Kazee's decree in favour of the heir that was present; for any one of the heirs of a deceased person stands as litigant on the part of all the others, with respect to any thing due to or by the deceased, whether it be debt or substance; since the decree of the Kazee, in such case, is in reality either in favor of or against the deceased; and any one of the heirs may stand as his representative with respect to such decree. It is otherwise with respect to taking possession of the portion due to another from the estate of a person deceased; that is to say, a part of the heirs, although they be litigants on behalf of another heir, cannot, however, take possession of his portion on his behalf, because a person, in taking possession, acts for himself, and is therefore incapable of acting in it, as agent, for another. Hence the person present is not entitled to receive any other portion than his own; in the same manner as when: an heir claims a debt due to the deceased, and the Kazee passes a decree in his favour; in which case the heir, although he stood as litigant in behalf of the other heirs, is yet not entitled to receive their shares of the debt.

Objection.—If one heir be litigant in behalf of the other, it would follow that each creditor is entitled to have recourse to him for payment of his demand; whereas, according to law, each is only obliged to pay his own share.

REPLY.—The creditors are entitled to have recourse to one of several heirs only in a case where all the effects are in the hands of that heir. This is what is stated in the Jama Kabeer; and the reason of it is that although any one of the heirs may act as p'antiff in a cause on behalf of the others, yet he cannot act as defendant on their behalf, unless the whole of the effects be in his possession.

An alms-gift of Mal includes all property subject to Zakat.—If a person say, "I devote my property in alms to the distress ed," in that case the word property, thus generally used, is construed to mean that part of his property which is subject to Zakat; whereas, if a person say, "I bequeath the third of my property," the term property is in that case construed to apply to his property of every description.—This distinction is according to a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest, in the former instance also, that the whole property is understood; and this toponias has been followed by Ziffer; because he term property [Mal] applies to and in-

includes property of every description, in a case of alms-gift, in the same manner as in a case of bequest. The reasons for this more favourable construction of the law in this particular are twofold. First, an obligation imposed by a person upon himself is analogous to an obligation imposed by God; in other words, if a person impose any obligation on himself, it is valid only with respect to those articles concerning which God has imposed obligations upon mankind: an obligation of alms, therefore, imposed by a person upon himself, takes effect only with respect to such property as God has imposed alms upon.—Secondly, on the contrary, remembrance in litirine, as the legatees succeed to the property of the deceased in the manner of an heir; and hence a bequest of property is not restricted to any particular description of property.—Secondly, from his mode of expression it is reasonable to suppose that he undertakes to bestow in alms that part of his property only which is superfluous, and beyond the occasion of his wants; and this is the part on which Zakat is imposed. Bequest, on the contrary, as it takes place at a time when the testator is free from want, is considered as extending to the whole of his property.—It is to be observed that the speaker’s declaration, “I devote my property in alms, &c.” includes also his Ashooree lands, according to Ass Yosaf, because land of this description is subject to the obligation of alms, agreeably to his tends, that, in the, the consideration of alms is predominant.—According to Mohammed, on the contrary, his Ashooree land is not included, because, agreeably to his tenets, the consideration of support to the state is predominant in lithe. His Khirajee, or tribute lands, are, however, not included, according to our doctors, because tribute is designed purely as a support to the state, and alms are not considered in it.

Case of an alms-gift of milk.—If a person say, “I devote my property in alms to the distressed,” there is in that case a difference of opinion Some have said that this must be construed to mean the whole of his property; because the term here used [Milk] is of a more general nature than the term Mal used in the former case:—the occasion, moreover, of restricting the application, in that instance, to such property as is subject to Zakat, is purely because of Mal being the term used on that occasion in the Koran; and such being the case, the term Milk must therefore be explained in its common acceptation. Others, again, have said that the terms Milk and Mal import the same thing in effect; and this is the better opinion; since both terms imply that part of his property which exceeds his wants, as was before mentioned; and that is the part of his property subject to Zakat.—If, however, a person have no other property besides what he obliges himself to bestow in alms, he must in that case reserve a sufficiency for his own subsistence, and bestow the remainder; and afterwards, upon his acquiring more property, bestow a part of it adequate to what he had before reserved. With respect to the sufficiency for subsistence, Mohammed has not determined the quantity, because of the different conditions of men. Some have said that a person is to reserve only one day’s subsistence, in case of being an artificer or labourer: one month’s subsistence, in case he possess houses and shops let out upon leave; one year’s subsistence, in case he possess immovable property of lands; and so on—in proportion to the length of time of receiving the income of his property;—and on this principle a merchant is to reserve as much as may suffice till the probable return of his property.

The acts of an executor are valid without any formal notification of his appointment. If a person be appointed executor to another, and he be not informed of that circumstance, but nevertheless sell some part of the effects of the deceased, the appointment becomes confirmed, and the sale is valid; whereas sale by an agent, on the contrary, is not valid, unless he be informed of his agency.—This distinction is according to the Zahir Rawyat. Also Yusaf is of opinion that the sale by the executor is also invalid, because an executor is, in fact, a person appointed to act as agent after the death of the testator, and must therefore be considered in the same light with an agent before death.—The reason of the distinction as stated in the Zahir Rawyat, is that the office of an executor is to represent, not to act as agent; for it refers to a period when the appointment of agency would he null. The acts of an executor, therefore, do not rest upon his knowledge of the testator’s will any more than the acts of an heir;—in other words, if an heir were to sell some part of the effects of the deceased, not knowing that he was dead, the sale would be valid; and so also of sale by an executor. Agency, on the contrary, is merely a delegation, since in the case of agency the power and authority of the constituent still endure: the acts of an agent, therefore, rest upon his knowledge of his appointment.—The ground of this is, that in resting the acts of agents upon a knowledge of their appointments, there is no injury to the constituent, since he is himself capable of performing such acts: whereas, if the acts of an executor were suspended on his knowledge of his appointment, an injury would result to his constituent, who is himself incapable of performing such acts.

An agent’s appointment may be established by any casual information.—If a man appoint another his agent, and, a person having brought him intelligence of this,*

*By a person is here to be understood a person not deputed by the constituent, but one who having casually heard of the appointment brings information of it to the agent.
he immediately, upon the receipt of it, perform some act (such as sale, for instance), in that case the act is valid, whether the informant be free or a slave, of mature age or otherwise, an unjust or just man: because a simple information of his appointment establishes his right to act, although it be no way binding upon him.

But his dismissal cannot be established unless duly attested. — The dismissal of an agent is not established until it be attested to the agent by two persons of unknown character, or by one just man. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples have said that the law, in this case, is the same as in the preceding; for as the dismission and appointment of agents are concerns of frequent occurrence, the notification of one person is therefore sufficient. The arguments of Haneefa are that the simple notification of dismission is binding, as being a cause of the agent's deserting from action, and inducing responsibility for the property in his possession. The notification in question, therefore, is in one shape evidence, and consequently requires one of the two conditions of evinence namely, number [of the witnesses] or integrity; in other words, it requires to be attested by one just person, or by two persons of unknown character. It is otherwise with respect to the ratification of an appointment of agency, since that is no way binding, as has been already mentioned.

It is also otherwise where the dismission is notified by a messenger from the constituent, because the word of a message-bearer is equivalent to that of the sender of it, from necessity, and in that case, therefore, the attestation of one just man or two unknown men is not required. — The same difference of opinion obtains in cases of information conveyed to a master of the crime of his slave, — to the Shafee of the sale of a house, — to a virgin of her marriage, — to or Mussulman converts in a hostile country, who have not yet taken refuge in the Mussulman territory, or particular ordinances in regard to religion. Thus if an unjust person inform a master that a particular slave belonging to him had committed a crime, and the master afterwards sell or emancipate the said slave, it is not in that case incumbent upon the master to pay the atonement, unless the notification of the crime be attested by one just man; or by two men of unknown character, according to Haneefa: contrary to the opinion of the two disciples. — In the same manner also, if an unjust person notify the sale of a house to the Shafee, or person having the right of per-emption over it, and the Shafee should not thereupon put in his claim of Shaffa, still, according to Haneefa, his right is not avoided; whereas, according to the two disciples, it is forfeited. So also, if an unjust person notify her marriage to a virgin, and she thereupon remain silent such silence, according to Haneefa, is not an assent; but according to the two disciples it is. — So likewise, if an unjust man iafor man absent Mussulman of new ordinances in respect to religion, and he should not conform accordingly, Haneefa holds that he is not in that case guilty of any offence; whereas the two disciples are of opinion that he is.

A Kazee, or his Ameen are not liable for any loss which may be incurred to the prejudice of another in selling on article to satisfy creditors. — In a Kazee, or Ameen appointed by him, sell the slave of a certain person, in order to discharge the demands of his creditors, and the money, after the receipt, be lost or destroyed in the hands of the Kazee, or his Ameen, and the slave be then proved to have been the property of some other person, in that case neither the Kazee nor his Ameen is responsible for the loss; because if Kazes were subject to such responsibility, no one would accept of the appointment: and the rights of the people would consequently be destroyed. — The Kazee, therefore, not being responsible for the loss, the purchaser is entitled to an indemnification from the creditors on whose account the sale was made, because of the impracticability of his being indemnified by the party with whom he made bargain. — In the same manner as where an incapable infant* or an inhibited slave appoints an agent for sale, who accordingly sells something on his behalf, and, the price being lost after he had received it, a right to the thing sold is proved by another; for in such case the claim is made on the constituent, and not the agent, although he be the party with whom the bargain was made.

If the loss be incurred by an executor, acting under the Kazee's orders, the executor is indemnified by the creditors. — If a Kazee command an executor, whom he himself had appointed, to sell a slave to satisfy the creditors of a deceased person, and the executor, in obedience to this order, accordingly sell the slave, and the slave afterwards prove the right of another, or die previous to his being delivered to the purchaser, and the price in the mean time be lost after it had been received by the executor, — the purchaser must in that case receive an indemnification from the executor, not from the Kazee; because, having been appointed by the Kazee to act as executor to the deceased, he is therefore a representative of the deceased, and not the Kazee: and hence, in the same manner as the deceased would have been responsible under such circumstances, in case he had himself made the sale during his lifetime, so also is the executor for the sale made after his death. The purchaser, therefore, is entitled to exact the price from the executor; and he, again, is entitled to indemnify himself from the creditors, since he acted in the business of the sale on their behalf. — If, however, any more property of

* Meaning an infant so young as to be incapable of acting for himself.
the deceased be afterwards discovered, the creditors are entitled to receive from it the payment of their debts, which are still held to remain in force.—Lawyers have also said that the creditors are, on the part, entitled to receive an indemnification from the estate for the compensation they made through the executor, to the purchaser, since they incurred that loss in behalf of the deceased.

And an infant heir stands in the same per dicament with a creditor in this particular.

—An infant heir, on whose account anything is sold from the estate of a deceased person, is considered in the light of a creditor; in other words, if an infant heir stand in need of selling something, and the executor accordingly make such sale for him, and the subject of the sale afterwards prove the right of another,—in that case the purchaser if entitled to a compensation from the executor and the executor from the heir—If, on the other hand, the Ameer of the Kazee sell any thing in behalf of an heir which afterwards proves the right of another the proprietor is in that case entitled to receive a compensation directly from the heir, provided he be an adult: but if the heir be on infant, the Kazee must appoint a person for the discharge of the debt from his property.

Section.

Any person may execute a punishment by the Kazee’s direction.—If a Kazee say to a person, “I have sentenced a certain man to be stoned; do you therefore stone him”; or, “I have sentenced such a man to have his hand cut off; do you therefore cut it off”; or, “I have sentenced this person to be scourged; do you therefore scourge him”; it is lawful for that person to act according to the Kazee’s orders. —This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet.—It is related of Mohammed, that he receded from this doctrine, and gave it as his opinion that the Kazee’s directions, as here stated, are not to be obeyed unless his sentence is attested by one just man; because there is a possibility of his being in an error; and if that should appear after the performance of any of these acts, it would be impossible to repair the injury thereby occasioned. From this it would appear that the letter of one Kazee to another are not valid:—and our modern doctors greatly approve of this opinion, because many Kazees of the present age are loose and irregular: they would be anathema to our Kazee’s orders. —The arguments of the Zahir Rawayet upon this point are twofold.—First the Kazee, who gives the information, if a matter which he is competent to order; because it was in his power to have ordered the execution of the sentence immediately; hence, as he liable to no suspicion, he ought to be credited. Secondly, obedience to a magistrate in authority, such as the Kazee, is declared to be an incumbent duty: and as obedience to him is manifested in a belief of his word, it is therefore incumbent to believe him.—Besides, Imam Aboo Mansoor Matirday has said, “If a Kazee be learned and just, believe and obey him, as there is no reason to suspect him.”—If, on the other hand, he be just but ignorant, it is then requisite to make enquiry of him concerning the case; and if, after a full investigation, it shall appear that this sentence was legally founded, in that case (and not otherwise) he must be believed. —If, on the contrary, he be learned but unjust in his conduct, or ignorant and unjust, his orders must not be obeyed, unless the person to whom he addresses himself discover the reason that prompted them.”

Case of a disputed decree, after a Kazee’s dismission from his office.—If a dismissed Kazee say to a person, “I have taken one thousand dirms from you, and paid it to another, according to a decree which I passed to that effect,” and the person in question deny this, and assert that the Kazee had taken it from him unjustly, still the declaration of the Kazee must be credited, and consequently he is not responsible for the said sum. In the same manner also, if a dismissed Kazee say to a person, “I passed a just sentence of amputation against you,” and the other assert that it was unjust, the word of the Kazee must be credited. The law here proceeds on the supposition that in both these cases the persons acknowledge that the decrees were passed at a time when they was actually Kazee: and the reason of it is that after such acknowledgment on their part, probability is an argument in favour of the Kazee because the probability is that no Kazee will pass an unjust decree. Neither is it necessary to exact an oath from the Kazee in either of these cases, because an oath is never put to a Kazee, and both the persons in question acknowledge that he was actually Kazee when he passed these decrees.

—It is to be observed that if the person who, in the first case, by order of the Kazee, took money, or who, in the second case, cut off the hand, should severly declare that they had done so by order of the Kazee, they are not responsible for the consequences, since the Kazee was in office when, he gave these orders, and the restitution of the property to its owner was an approved act on the part of the Kazee, in the same manner as if he had made the restitution in the presence of the defendant.—If, on the other hand, the person assert that the Kazee had issued such order, either antecedent to his appointment or after his dismission, then also the declaration of the Kazee must be credited, because he has referred the decree to a period which excuses him from removing it. The declaration, therefore, is credited: in the same manner as where a person subject to periodical madness at fixed and certain times, having divorced his wife or emancipated his slave, afterwards declare that “he did there during his madness;” which is credited; whence the divorce or emancipation are rendered void.—In this case however, if the executor of amputation, or the receiver of the money, acknowledge these deeds, they become responsible for them, because they themselves acknowledge the performance of acts, which induce responsibility, since the authority under which they acted is doubtful; for the assertion of the Kazee is credited in these instances merely to procure an exemption to himself from responibility and not to procure it to others. It is otherwise in the first case, where these acts are allowed to have been performed in virtue of an order from him when he was actually Kazee.—All this proceeds on a supposition that the money
no longer remains in the hands of the person who had received it in virtue of the Kazee’s decree; for if the money be still in the possession of the receiver, and he coincide with the Kazee concerning the amount, it must in this case be taken from him, whether the person from whom it was originally taken confirms the Kazee’s allegation, that “he had paid the money to that person whilst he was in office,” or whether he pleads that he [the Kazee] had taken and paid it whilst he was not in office; because as the receiver here in fact acknowledges that the money had formerly been in the possession of this person, his plea of having become proprietor of the money cannot be admitted but with proof;
and the mere allegation of the dismissed Kazee is no proof, since after dismissal he becomes as a common per on jection of Evidence.

Witnesses in their Testimony.
Chap IV.—Of Evidence relative to Inheritance.
Chap V.—Of the Attestation of Evidence.

CHAPTER I.

Evidence is incumbent upon the requisition of the party concerned.—It is incumbent* on witness to bear testimony, nor is it lawful for them to conceal it, when the party cconcerned demands it from them; because God says, in the Koran, “Let not wittnesses withhold their testimony when it is demanded from them;” and also, “Conceal not your testimony, for whoever conceals his testimony is an offender.”—The requisition of the party,

however, is a condition; because the delivery of testimony is the right of the party, and therefore rests upon his requisition of it, as is the case with respect to all other rights.

But it is not obligatory in a case inducing corporal punishment.—In cases inducing corporal punishment, witnesses are at liberty either to give: or withhold their testimony, as they please, because in such case they are distracted between two laudable actions; namely, the establishment of the punishment, and the preservation of the criminal’s character: the concealment of vice is, more-ever, preferable; because the Prophet said to a person that had borne testimony, “Verily it would have been better for you, if you had concealed it”—and also, because he elsewhere said, “Whoever conceals the vices of his brother Mussulman shall have a veil drawn over his own crimes in the two worlds by God.”—Besides, it has been inculcated both by the Prophet and his companions as commendable to assist in the prevention of corporal punishment; and this is an evident argument for the concealment of such evidence as tends to establish it

Unless it involv prperty, when the fact must be stated in such a way as may not occasion punishment.—It is incumbent, however, in the case of theft, to bear evidence to the property, by testifying that “a certain person took such property,” in order to preserve the right of the proprietor; but the word taken must be used instead of stolen, to the end that the crime may be kept concealed: besides, if the word stolen were used, the thief would be rendered liable to amputation; and as, where amputation is incurred, there is no responsibility for the property, the proprietor’s right would be destroyed.

The evidence required in whoredom is that of four men. Evidence is of several kinds, is that of four men, as has been ordained in the Koran; and the testimony of a woman in such case is not admitted; because Zihra says, “in the time of the Prophet and his two immediate successors it was an invariable rule to exclude the evidence of women in all cases inducing punishment or retaliation;”
and also, because the testimony of women involves a degree of doubt, as it is merely a substitute for evidence, being accepted only where the testimony of men cannot be had;
and therefore it is not admitted in any matter
liable to drop from the existence of a doubt.

In other criminal cases, two men.—The evidence required in other criminal cases is that of two men, according to the text of the Koran; and the testimony of women is not admitted, on the strength of the tradition of Zihra above quoted.

And in all other matters, two men. or one man and two women.—In all other cases the evidence required is that of two men, or of one man and two women, whether the case relate to property, or to other rights, such as marriage, divorce, agency, executorship, or

*Arab. Farz; meaning an ordained duty, and therefore indispensable.
the like Shafei has said that the evidence of one man and two women cannot be property, or its dependencies, such as hire, admitted, excepting in cases that relating to bail, and so forth; because the evidence of women is originally inadmissible on account of their defect of understanding, their want of memory, and incapacity of governing, whence it is that their evidence is not admitted in criminal cases.

Objection.—Since, according to Shafei, the evidence of women is originally invalid, it would follow that their evidence alone is not admissible even in a case of property; whereas the evidence of four women alone is, in his opinion, admissible in such case.

Reply.—The evidence of four alone is necessarily admissible in cases of property, because of their frequent occurrence;—contrary to the mode of proceeding with respect to marriage (for instance), which being a matter of greater importance and more rare occurrence than mere matters of property, cannot therefore be classed with them.

The reasoning of our doctors is that the evidence of women is originally valid, because evidence is founded upon three circumstances, namely, sight, memory, and a capability of communication; for by means of the first the witness acquires knowledge; by means of the second he retains such knowledge; and by means of the third he is enabled to impart to the Kazre; and all these three circumstances exist in a woman (whence it is that her communication of a tradition or of a message is valid); and with respect to their want of memory, it is capable of remedy by the junction of another; that is, by substituting two women in the room of one man; and the defect of memory being thus supplied, there remains only the doubt of substitution; whence it is that their evidence is not admitted in any matter liable to drop from the existence of a doubt, namely, recourse: and in opposition to marriage, and so forth, as those may be proved notwithstanding a doubt, whence the evidence of women is admitted in those instances.

Objection.—As the evidence of two women is admitted in the room of that of one man, it would follow that the evidence of four women alone ought to be admitted in cases of property and other rights; whereas it is otherwise.

Reply.—Such is the suggestion of analogy. The evidence of four women alone, however, is not accepted (contrary to what analogy would suggest), because if it were, there would be frequent occasions for their appearance in public, in order to give evidence; whereas their privacy is the most laudable.

The evidence of women alone suffices concerning matters which do not admit the inspection of men.—The evidence of one woman is admitted in cases of birth (as where one woman, for instance, declares that "a certain man brought forth a certain child"). In the same manner also, the evidence of one woman is a sufficient with respect to virginity, or with respect to the defect of that part of a woman which is conceal from man.—The principle of the law, in these cases, is derived from a traditional saying of the Prophet, "The evidence of women is valid with respect to such things as it is not fitting for man to behold."—Shafei holds the evidence of four women to be a necessary condition in such cases. The foregoing tradition, however, is a proof against him; and another proof against him is that, in the cases in question, the necessity of male evidence is remitted, and female evidence credited, because the ocular examination of a woman, in those cases, is less indecent than that of a man; and hence also, as the sight of two or three persons is more indecent than that of one, the evidence of more than one woman is not insisted on as a condition in those instances. It is to be remarked, however, that if two or three women give evidence in such cases; it is a commendable caution, because the evidence may be of an obligatory tendency.—The law with respect to the evidence of women in cases of birth has been fully set forth in the book of divorce, treating of the establishment of parentage, where it is said, that "if a man marry a woman, and she brings in a child at a period of six months, or more, after her marriage, and the husband deny the parentage, in that case the evidence of one woman is sufficient to establish it."—and there are also other examples recited to the same effect.

The law with respect to the evidence of a woman in cases of virginity, is that if a woman complain of the impotency of her husband, and assert, that her virginity still exists, and another woman bear evidence of the same, in that case one year must be suffered to elapse, and then a separation must be effected between the husband and wife: because virginity is a real entity, and the existence of it is here been attested by evidence.—The same rule also holds where a person purchases a female slave on condition of her being a virgin, and afterwards desire to return her because of being a woman; for if, in that case, another woman should examine into her condition, and then declare her to be a virgin, her evidence must be credited, as virginity is an entity, and the existence of it is here proved by evidence; or if, on the contrary, she declare her to be a woman, her mulibritie (which is a defect) is established in virtue of such declaration, and the plea of the law, purchaser holds good: whence the seller is required to take an oath that such defect did not exist when he sold her, which, if he refuse to do, he is bound to receive her back.

It is not admitted to prove that a child was live-born further than relates to the rites of

 burial — The evidence of a woman with respect to Isthi'al* or the noise made by a child at its birth, is not admissible, in the opinion of Haneefa, so far as relates to the establishment of the right of heritage in the child; because this noise is of a nature to be known or discovered by men; but is admissible, so far as relates to the necessity of reading funeral prayers over the child; because these prayers are merely a matter of religion; — in consequence of her evidence, therefore, the funeral prayers are to be repeated over it. — The two disciples maintain that the evidence of a woman is sufficient to establish the right of heritage also; because the noise in question being made at the birth, noise but women can be supposed to be present when it is made. — The evidence of a woman, therefore, to this noise, is the same as her evidence to a living birth; and as the evidence of women in one case is admissible, so also is it in the other.

The probity of the witness, and his mention of the term evidence are essentials. — In all rights, whether of property or otherwise, the probity of the witness, and the use of the word Shahadit [evidence] is requisite; even in the case of the evidence of women with respect to birth, and the like; and this is approved; because Shahadit is testimony, since it possesses the property of being binding; whence it is that it is restricted to the place of jurisdiction; and also, that the witness is required to be free, and a Mussulman. — If, therefore, a witness should say, "I know," or "I know with certainty," without making use of the word Shahadit, in that case his evidence cannot be admitted. With respect to the probity of the witness, it is indispensable, because of what is said in the Koran, "Take the evidence of two just men;" and also, because the probity of the witness induces a probability of the truth. — whereas the want of it in the witness (indicated in his commission or prohibited actions) renders it reasonable to suppose that he will assert falsehoods, and consequently induces a probability of falsehood. — It is recorded, from Abu Yoosaf, that an unjust man, provided he be possessed of generosity, ought to be credited; because such a disposition renders it unlikely that he will either suffer himself to be suborned, or that he will wantonly assert a falsehood — The first opinion, however (namely, that the evidence of an unjust man is not to be credited), is the most authentic. — With respect to the use of the word Shahadit, it is indispensable, because all the passages in the Koran, relating to evidence, use this word; and there is also a strong degree of precaution in the use of it: for as it serves to express an oath, people will be more cautious of using it falsely.

The apparent probity of the witnesses suffices, except in cases inducing punishment or retaliation. — Haneefa has said that the magistrate ought to rest contented with the apparent probity of a Mussulman, and should not scrutinize into his character in such a manner as to give the opposite party an opportunity to scorn him; because the Prophet (according to a tradition related by Omar) has said, All Mussulmans are just with respect to evidence, excepting such as have been punished for slander;" and also, because the probable character of all that profess the religion of Islam is an abstinence from every thing prohibited by that religion; and here it is necessary to rest satisfied with probility, as the attainment of certainty is impracticable. — In cases however, inducing retaliation or punishment, mere probability is not sufficient; and therefore a purgation of the witnesses must be made; for punishment and retaliation are cases in which all possible pretexts of prevention are to be sought: it is therefore requisite that, "in such cases, the character of the witnesses be strictly investi

* If a child die immediately on its birth, without making a noise it is then considered in law to have been brought forth dead, and it neither succeeds to a portion of its father's estate, nor are funeral prayers read over it. If, however, it make the smallest noise, it is then held to die possessed of its portion, and funeral prayers are read over it. — Thus if a person should die, leaving his wife pregnant, the division of his estate is in that case suspended till the birth of the child: if it prove a dead child (that is, one that appeared dead immediately at the birth and made no noise), the estate is divided as if no such child had been born; but if it have made a noise, its share is in that case allotted and divided amongst its heirs. — The determination of the heirs, and consequently the nature of the division of the estate must often rest upon this circumstance. For instance, if a person die without children, leaving a brother, and his wife who is at that time pregnant, and the child at its birth make a noise, and immediately after die, it is held to be an heir, and the mother, in exclusion of the uncle, succeeds to the whole; but if it make no noise before its death, the uncle is then considered to be an heir, and no share is allowed to the child. The law is the same in the case of a grandson, whose father had before died, being left under such circumstances.

† In other words, it is requisite that the witness say (in Arabic) "Ash-hado, I testify!" or (in Persian) "Shahadit meyekkoomam, I bear witness."

*Arab, Fasik, This term is fully explained elsewhere. (See Vol. I. p. 26.) With respect to evidence, Fasik seems nearly to correspond with the term infamous, as used by our lawyers, in treating of incompetent witnesses. (See Blackstone Book III. char. 23.) gated:—moreover, doubt is preventive in those instances.

If, however, their probity be questioned, a purgation is required.—If the defendant throws a reproach on the witnesses, it is in that case incumbent on the Kaze to institute an inquiry into their character; because, in the same manner as it is probable that a Mussulman abstains from falsehood, as being a thing prohibited in the religion he professes, so also is it probable that one Mussulman will not unjustly reproach another; here, therefore, is a conflict between two probabilities; and hence the necessity of the inquiry of the Kaze into the character of the witnesses, that he may discover which of the probabilities preponderates.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed, that a scrutiny must be made, with regard to the witnesses, both openly and privately, in all cases whatever; and that the decree of the Kaze rests upon proof, and proof rests upon the integrity of the witnesses. Besides, an inquiry into the integrity of the witnesses tends to preserve the decree of the Kaze from annulment; because if he should pass a decree upon the probable character of the witnesses and their falsehood should afterwards be discovered, the said decree would be rendered null.—Several have alleged that this disagreement between Haneefa and the two disciples is founded on the difference of the times. In the present age, however, decrees are passed in this particular according to the doctrine of the two disciples.

Nature of a secret.—A secret purgation is made by a Kaze writing a letter, privately, to a Mo'azee or purgator (that is, a person whose business it is to inquire into the character of others), and describing to him the family and countenance of the witnesses, and likewise their place of abode; and the purgator, in like manner, returning his answer privately to the Kaze, lest if it were known to the plaintiff, he might attempt to injure him.

And an open purgation.—In an open purgation it is requisite that the Kaze summon together the purgator and the witnesses, and hear the examination himself.—During the first age (that is in the time of the Prophet and his companions) an open purgation was practised; but in the present times a secret one is adopted, in order to avoid quarrels and contentions between the purgator and the witnesses; for it is related as an opinion of Mohammed that an open purgation tends to sedition and contention. Some have said that it is requisite that the purgator report the witness not only to be just, but also free; for a slave may be just but his testimony is nevertheless invalid. Others have said that his report of the integrity of the witness is sufficient; for his freedom is established [in probability] by his abode in a Mussulman country;—and this is approved.

Justice of a witness by the defendant.—It is to be observed that, according to that doctrine which maintains the necessity of the Kaze's purgation of the witnesses, whether the defendant challenge their probity or not, the justification of them by the defendant is not of any weight; in other words, if he declare the witnesses of the plaintiff to be upright men, yet his word is not credited; and such is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet, from Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed. It is also related, as their opinion, that the justification of the witnesses by the defendant is valid, under this condition, however (according to Mohammed), that there be another justification for he holds that two are always required, one being in no case sufficient.—The reasoning on which the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet proceeds in this particular, is that the defendant is, in the conception of the plaintiff and his witnesses, a liar, and his denial of the claim unjust and unfounded, but in which he nevertheless perseveres. He is therefore incapable of appeasing as a purgator, since a purgator must be a person of integrity, according to all.—This proceeds on the supposition of the defendant having declared the witnesses to be just men, but that in the delivery of their testimony they had committed an error: or that they had been overpowered by forgetfulness. If, however, he declare that "they have spoken truth," or that "they are just men and true speakers," this amounts to an acknowledgment in the plaintiff's right, and the Kaze must in such case pass a decree against him,—not on account of his purgation of the witnesses, but of his acknowledgment.

One purgator suffices.—One purgator is sufficient, and two are superfluous, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed, on the contrary, maintains that purgation is not valid unless performed by two.—A similar disagreement subsists between them, with respect both to the messenger who goes to the purgator on the part of the Kaze, and also the interpreter employed to explain and interpret the deposition of the witnesses.—The argument of Mohammed is, that as the power of the Kaze to pass a decree is founded upon the evidence of the probity of the witnesses, and as the evidence of their probity is founded upon purgation, it follows that plurality is in this instance requisite, in the same manner as probity,—or as, in cases inducing punishment, it is required that the witnesses be males.—The argument of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf is that purgation is not considered in the nature of evidence; whence neither the assembly of the Kaze, nor the use of the phrase Shahadit, are required as conditions with regard to it. Besides, the necessity of plurality in evidence is a mere matter of religion.—In other words, is opposed to analogy; for the truth of any assertion obtains an ascendency from the declaration of one Just person, so far as relates to practice, as is evident from this circumstance, that many of the traditionary precepts which it is Evidence is of two kinds:—that which occasions effect in itself. —The things which witnesses recollect and bear testimony of, are of two kinds. —The first are those which give effect in themselves: such as sale, acknowledgment, usucration, murder, and the sentence of a judge; in all of which the effect results from the things themselves; and consequently, whenever a person hears or sees anything of importance relating to these matters, he may lawfully give evidence of it, without its being demanded from him; because in these cases, immediately upon his hearing or seeing, he becomes acquainted with a circumstance which occasions effect in itself, and there is therefore no need of such evidence being demanded from him. —In such case, also, it is requisite that he deliver his testimony thus, "I give evidence that a certain person bought, &c." and not, "evidence has been demanded from me, &c." because this latter mode of delivery is false. If, however, a person from without a door, or from behind a curtain, hear any thing spoken by another that is within, in that case he is not entitled to give evidence of the same; and if he should attest it, the K. zee must not accept it, because it is illegal, since, as voices are often similar, they cannot be distinguished with certainty. But if, having first entered into the house, he discover that there is only one person within, and having then retired, and sat without the door, he hear that person make an acknowledgment, he may then lawfully attest the same, because in such case he acquires certain knowledge.

And that, the effect of which rests upon other evidence.—The second kind of things to which evidence relates, are those which do not occasion effect in themselves; such as testimony,* which does not occasion effect in itself: because, as it is merely information, it admits the supposition of being either true or false: and such things as are doul tful are not decisive proof. —Upon testimony being given, therefore, the hearer does not immediately know that the right is proved; and consequently, if one person hear another give evidence of something, he is not empowered to give evidence of the same unless the witness desire him to attest his evidence; because evidence does not occasion effect in itself, nor until it be removed to the assembly of the K. zee. —Besides, as the attestation of the evidence of another is an overt act with respect to that other, it is requisite that the other previously appoint this person his deputy; and in the case in question this is not so. —In the same manner, also, if a person hear another desire a third person to attest his evidence, it is not lawful for him in such case to give evidence of the same, because the original witness appointed another, and not him, his deputy for that purpose.

The signature to a deed must not be attested, unless the witness recollect the circumstance of signing it.—A person may only take his signature to a bill of sale, or the like, if he must not, merely on account of the sight of his signature, attest it, unless he otherwise recollect to have witnessed the said bill; since handwritings are often similar. —Some have said that this is the doctrine of Haneifa; but that the two disciples are of a different opinion. —Others, again, have said that all are agreed in its being unlawful to give the attestations merely on the right of the signature; and that the only case of this kind in which there is a disagreement is that with respect to a K. zee: for if he should discover, in his Dewan, or records the evidence of any one, or a decree of his own, he may, in such case (according to the two disciples) pass a decree agreeably thereto, notwithstanding he have forgot the circumstance; because the records of the K. zee; being kept under his seal, are therefore secured against alterations, and consequently afford certain knowledge. —It is otherwise with respect to bills of sale or the like, because those, as being kept in the hands of others are not secured against alterations. —In the same manner, also, if a person recollect the place in which his evidence had been taken, without remembering the affair to which it related, it is the same as his seeing his signature without remembering his subscription of it, and therefore he is not permitted to attest it: —and the same rule obtains where people in whom he places credit say to him, "you and we did formerly jointly attest such particular matter."

Evidence cannot be given on hearsay, except to such matters as admit the privacy only of a few. —It is not lawful for a person to give evidence to such things as he has not actually seen, excepting in the cases of birth, death, marriage, cohabitation, and the jurisdiction of a K. zee, in all of which he may lawfully be a testimony on creditable hearsay. —This proceeds upon a favourable construction. —Analogy would suggest that it is not lawful for him to give evidence of those cases also; because evidence is founded entirely on sight, from which knowledge is derived; and as no certain knowledge can be acquired without sight, it follows that evidence, in the cases above excepted, is not valid unless founded upon sight—the reason for a more favourable construction. In this particular, is that these events are of such a nature as admit the privacy only of a few;—thus birth (for instance) is an event at which none is present but the midwife; the authority of the Kazee is founded on the appointment of the Sultan, which is seen only by the Vizier, or at most a few others; marriages and deaths are seen by but few; and cohabitation by none. All these, however, are acts from which originate many important concerns. If, therefore, the reality of these things were not admitted upon hearsay evidence, many inconveniences would result: in opposition to cases of sale, or the like, where privacy is not required.—It is to be observed that it is requisite, in these cases, that the information has been received from two just men, or from one just man and two women.—Some have advanced that in cases of death the information of one man or one woman is sufficient, because death is not seen by many, since as it occasions horror the sight of it is avoided.

And it must be given in an absolute manner.—When a person, in any of the above cases, gives evidence from creditable hearsay, it is requisite that he give it in an absolute manner by saying for instance:—"I bear testimony that A, is the son of B," and not "I hear testimony so and so, because I have heard it,"—for in that case the Kazee cannot accept it;—in the same manner as if a person, having seen a thing in the hands of A, were to say:—"This is the property of A," in which case his testimony is valid: but if he should state that "he gives evidence because he has seen the thing in the possession of A," the Kazee could not accept his testimony.—So also, if a person see another sitting in the court of justice, deciding in a suit between plaintiff and defendant, it is lawful for him to give evidence that "that person was a Kazee:"—or, if a person see a man and woman dwelling in the same house, and conducting themselves towards one another in the manner of husband and wife, he may lawfully give evidence of their being husband and wife; in the same manner as it is lawful for a person who sees a melon in the hand of another to give evidence that it is the property of that person.

Evidence to the burial of a person amounts to evidence of his death.—If a person say that he was present at the burial of another, or that he had read the funeral service over him this amounts to the same as an actual sight of the death. In such a case, if he should explain to the Kazee the principle on which he gives his evidence, it will still be valid.

What is above advanced, that "it is not lawful for a person to give evidence to such things as he has not actually seen, excepting in the cases of birth, death, marriage, cohabitation and the jurisdiction of a Kazee," is taken from Kadooree; and from these particular exceptions it may be inferred that hearsay evidence is unlawful in every other instance, such as Willa, charitable appropriations, and so forth.—It is indeed related, as the last opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that evidence from hearsay is lawful in a case of Willa; because Willa is equivalent to relation by consanguinity, as the Prophet has said "Willa is a connection like consanguinity."—It is also related, as the opinion of Mohammed, that hearsay evidence is lawful in a case of appropriations; for as appropriation continues to operate for a long period of time, the laws with respect to it would be rendered null if hearsay evidence there were not admitted to prove it. Hence, however, argue that Willa is founded upon a relinquishment of right of property: and as, in bearing evidence to that, actual sight is required, it follows that it is in the same manner required with respect to a matter derived therefrom, namely Willa.—With respect to charitable appropriation, on the contrary, hearsay evidence must be admitted so far as regards the appropriation itself (such as where the witness says, "I attest this to be a wakf"): but it is not admitted with respect to any conditional restrictions imposed by the appropriator; for although the appropriation itself be notorious yet the conditions of it are not so.

A right of property may be attested from seeing an article in the possession of another.—If a person see any article (excepting an adult male or female slave), in the hands of another, he may in such case lawfully attest its being the property of that other, because possession argues property, since in all causes of property, such as purchase, sale, or the like, possession is the argument of its existence.—For instance; if a person sell any thing, his possession is an argument of the legality of the sale; and in the same manner, also, the right of property is established in a purchase from the possession of the seller, and the right of property in an heir, from the possession of him from whom he inherits.—Hence, in giving evidence of a thing being the property of another, it is sufficient to have seen it in his possession.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that besides the sight of the possession, it is requisite that the witness verily believe the article to be the property of the possessor, insomuch that if he do not really think so he cannot lawfully attest on the possessor's behalf.—Several of our doctors also remark that this explanation applies to the opinion of Mohammed, above related, respecting the legality of attesting marriage, birth, and cohabitation on hearsay;—that is, that it is lawful for a person to attest any of these incidents upon hearsay, provided he believe it in his own mind, but not otherwise.—Shafei has said that possession, together with transaction, argues property (and many of the Hanefite doctors are also of this opinion): because possession being of two kinds, namely, either in virtue of trust or of right of property, does not argue right of property unless when united with the performance of acts—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that transaction is also of two kinds; one, in virtue of delegation, and the other in virtue of original authority—and hence the junction of transaction to possession leaves still a doubt in regard to the property. In short, if a probable argument be adopted, possession is than sufficient; but if a certain one be required, possession, even when joined to transaction could not be sufficient. It is to be observed that the case here treated of admits of four statements. I. Where a person sees both the proprietor and the property, and is acquainted with both, that is with the countenance and the family of the proprietor, and with the boundaries of the property, which he sees him possess without strife; and afterwards sees the same thing in the possession of another; and the first proprietor appears to claim it;—in which case it is lawful for him to give evidence of its being the property of the first person, because of his having seen it in his possession. II. Where he sees the property, and its limits, but not the proprietor;—and here also it is lawful for him to give evidence of the property (upon a favourable construction of the law), because the proprietor is known, so far as regards his family, from hearsay. III. Where he neither sees the proprietor nor the property;—and IV. Where he sees the proprietor but not the property; in both of which cases it is unlawful to give evidence with regard to the right of property.

The right of property in a slave may also be attested on the same ground, if a person see a slave, male or female, in the possession of another, and know the said possession to be a slave, he may lawfully give evidence to such slave being the property of that other;—for a slave not being his own master, and of consequence not entitled to go where he pleases, is apparently the property of that person in whose hands he remains. So also, if he should not know the person seen in the possession of another to be a slave, and being an infant, it should be incapable of explaining its own condition, he may in that case lawfully give evidence of its being the property of the possessor; for an infant is not its own master. But if the person seen be arrived at the age of maturity,—that is, to say, be capable of explaining his condition,—and he should not know whether he is a slave or not, then it is not lawful to give evidence of his being the property of the possessor, simply on the sight of the possession. This is the reason of the exception, in the preceding case, of a slave arrived at the age of maturity; and the ground of it is that persons arrived at the age of maturity are in a manner in their own possession; and therefore the possession of another, which indicates the right of property of that other, is not to be discovered from the simple sight. It is related as an opinion of Haneefa, that even in this case evidence to the right of property may lawfully be given; but what has been before related is the most authentic doctrine.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE ACCEPTANCE AND REJECTION OF EVIDENCE

The evidence of a blind man is inadmissible. The evidence of a blind man is not admissible—Zaffer maintains that the evidence of a blind man is admissible with respect to matters in which hearsay prevails; (and there is also one report of the doctrine of Haneefa to the same effect); because in such matters hearing only is required, and in the hearing of a blind man there is no defect. Aboo Yoosaf and Shafei have said that the evidence of a blind man in these matters is lawful, provided he was possessed of sight at the time of their occurrence; for by means of that he acquires a certain knowledge, which he is a afterwards, notwithstanding his want of sight, capable of communicating, as that depends entirely on the tongue, which in a blind man is not defective; and it is in his power to show his knowledge of the person with regard to whom he gives the evidence, by a description of his birth and family.—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that in the delivery of evidence there is a necessity to distinguish between the person for and against whom it is given; and a blind man is incapable of doing this otherwise than by the voice; and this is attended with a doubt, which may be avoided, by the party producing a witness possessed of sight. With respect to the assertion of Shafei and Aboo Yoosaf, that 'it is in his power to show his knowledge of the person with regard to whom he gives the evidence by a description of his birth and family,' it may be replied that this mode has been instituted for a definiteness of the absent, not of the present. In short, in the the same manner as the evidence of a blind man is inadmissible in cases relative to retaliation or punishments, so also is it inadmissible in all other cases whatever.

And if a person give evidence, and become blind, a decree cannot issue upon it.—If a person, having given evidence, should after wards become blind previous to the passing of the decree, in that case (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), it not lawful for the Kazee to pass a decree thereupon: for the existence of the competency of the witnesses at the time of passing the decree is a necessary condition, as the validity of the evidence, at that time, constitutes the proof; and in the case here supposed the evidence has at that period become null. This case is therefore the same as if a witness, after having given evidence, should either become insane, dumb, or unjust in any of which cases the Kazee could not pass a decree upon the evidence so given.—It is otherwise where the witnesses, having given their evidence, either disappear or die; for in that case the Kazee may lawfully pass a decree upon it; because the competency of evidence is not annulled, but rather concluded, and rendered complete, by death; and absence does not destroy this competency.

The evidence of a slave is not admissible.

—The testimony of any person who is property—that is to say a slave, male or female—is not admissible: because testimony is of an authoritative nature: and as a slave has no authority over his own person, it follows that he can have no authority over others, a fortiori.

Or of a slanderer.—The testimony of a person that has been punished for slander is inadmissible, even though he should afterwards have repented; because God has said in the Koran, "But as to those who accuse married persons or whoredom, and produce not four witnesses of the fact, scourge them with fourscore stripes, and receive not their testimony for ever; for such are infamous prevaricators, excepting those who shall afterwards repent."—The rejection of his evidence, moreover, is included as a part of the punishment prescribed for the crime, as this tends to prevent the commision of it in future; hence, the rejection of his evidence is a part of the punishment: this effect must evidently remain after his repentance, on the same principle as the punishment itself is not remitted although he repent. If it otherwise with respect to a person punished for any other crime; for the evidence of such a person is admissible after repentance, since the rejection of it, in regard to him, proceeded from the stigma attached to his offence, which is done away by repentance.—According to Shafei, the evidence of a person punished for slander is admissible, provided he have afterwards repented because God, in enjoining the rejection of the evidence of such, has particularly excepted penitents.—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the exception in the divine ordinance relates to that part of it which declares slanderers to be infamous prevaricators, and not to that part which declares them to be incompetent as witnesses. Penitence, therefore removes the stigma from the character of such a person, but does not restore his competency to give evidence.

But an infidel slanderer recovers his competency as a witness upon embracing the faith.—If an infidel, who had suffered punishment for slander, should afterwards become a Mussulman, his evidence is then admissible: for although, on account of the said punishment, he had lost the degree in which he was before qualified to give evidence (that is, in all matters that related to his own sect), yet by his conversion to the Mussulman faith he acquires a new competency in regard to evidence (namely, competency to give evidence relative to Mussulmans), which he did not possess before, and which is not affected by any matter that happened prior to the circumstance which gave birth to it. It is otherwise with respect to a slave, who, having suffered punishment for slander, afterwards repented, and whose testimony is not admissible after emancipation; because in his former condition of slavery he did not possess, in any degree, ability to give evidence, and consequently the punishment was incomplete, since it was impossible to subject him to any greater degree of discredit than what was before imposed on him; the credit, therefore, which he would otherwise have acquired afterwards in virtue of his emancipation, if taken from him in order to complete the prescribed punishment.

Evidence is not admitted in favour of relations within the degree of paternity.—Testimony in favour of a son or grandson, or in favour of a father or grandfather, is not admissible; because the Prophet has so ordained.—Besides, as there is a kind of communion of benefits between these degrees of kindred, it follows that their testimony in matters relative to each other is in some degree a testimony in favour of themselves, and is therefore liable to suspicion.

Nor between a husband and wife, a master and his slave or servant, and his hireling.—The Prophet has said, "We are not to credit the evidence of a wife concerning her husband, or of a husband concerning his wife;*

*This doctrine of the inadmissibility of the evidence of husband and wife in favour of each other prevails only amongst the Soonis [the followers of Omar], and has given rise to much contention with the Shiyas [the followers of Alee], who maintain the opposite doctrine—the origin of their disagreement on this occasion is thus related.

The Prophet in the course of his wars having been presented with the village of Fattook by some Christians, who saw the impossibility of resisting his power, determined to have divided it amongst his companions, as was his usual practice in regard to the spoils taken in war. He was afterwards, however, induced to give it to his daughter Fatima, in consequence of a reveor of a slave concerning his master; or of a master concerning his slave; r. lastly, of a hirer concerning his hireling.—The author of this work observes that by the term hirer [Ajeer], as used in this place, is to be understood (according to the explanation of the lawyers) a select scholar who considers an injury to his teacher as an injury to himself; others have said that it is understood to mean a person who lets out any thing by hire for a month or a year; for as, at the time of giving evidence, he is entitled to the rent, in return for the usufruct enjoyed by the other, a suspicion arises of his having constituted this person his tenant merely with a view to procure his evidence.—With respect to the evidence of a husband and wife concerning each other. Shafiei maintains that it is admissible; because the property of each is distinct and separate; and also because distinct seizures are made, by each, of their respective property; whereupon in the event of retaliation is executed upon either for the murder of the other—and also, that either may be imprisoned for a debt due to the other.—Besides, the benefit which they mutually derive from each other's property is of no account, because the existence of such benefit is of an involved nature; i.e. in the same manner as the evidence of a creditor in favour of his indigent debtor is admissible, notwithstanding he derive a benefit from it as this benefit is of an involved nature.—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold: First, the traditonly precept of the Prophet above quoted: Secondly, the benefit which from custom, the husband and wife derive from the property of each other, which occasions their testimony in favour of each other to be, in a manner, testimony in favour of themselves, and consequently liable to suspicion.—It is otherwise with respect to the testimony of a creditor in favour of his indigent debtor, because he has no power over the property of the debtor, whereas a husband and wife have such power from usage and custom.

The testimony of a master cannot be admitted in favour of his slave.—The testimony of a master in favour of his slave is not admissible; because of the tradition above quoted; and also because, if the slave be not indebted to any person, such testimony is in every respect in favour of himself;—or if, on the other hand, he be indebted, till the testimony of the master is in some respect in favour of himself, as the matter remains in suspense; for if the master should choose to pay the debts, the testimony would be completely relative to himself, whereas it would not be so in any degree in case he should permit the slave to be sold in liquidation of the debt; and it is no known which mode he may follow, the testimony is therefore considered to be in some respect relative to himself.—It is to be observed that the evidence of a master in favour of his Mokatib is not admissible; for the reason here stated.

Nor of one partner in favour of another (relative to their joint concern).—The testimony of one partner in favour of another, in a matter relative to their joint property, is not admissible; because it is in some degree in favour of himself.—The testimony, however, of partners, in favour of each other, in matters not relating to their joint property, is admissible, because in it there is no room for suspicion.

Testimony in favour of an uncle or brother is admitted.—Testimony in favour of a brother or an uncle is admissible, because the property and the immunities of these classes of relations are separate, and each has no power over that of the other.

The testimony is not admissible of public mourners or singers.—The testimony of women that lament or sing is not admissible, because they are guilty of forbidden actions, inasmuch as the Prophet has prohibited these two species of noise.—(It is to be observed that this case alludes to a woman who laments for the adversity of others, not for her own, and who hires herself out for that purpose.)

Of common drunkards; or of falconers, &c.—The testimony of a person who is continually intoxicated is inadmissible, because of his commission of a prohibited act.

In the same manner, also, the testimony of a person who amuses himself with birds, such as pigeons or hawks, is inadmissible; because such amusement engenders forgetfulness; and also because in the practice of it, he sees the nudities of strange women, he having occasion to sit on the top of his house.

*That is to say, is interwoven with, and necessarily arises from, the particular circumstances of their relative situation.
to fly these birds.—In some copies, instead of the amusements of Teyoor, or birds, that of Tamboor,* or musical instruments, is written, which alludes to public singers; and the testimony of a public singer is not admissible, because he is the occasion of assembling a number of people to commit a prohibited action †

Or of atrocious criminals.—The testimony of a person who has committed a great crime, such as induces punishment, is not admissible, because in consequence of such crime he is unjust.

Or of immodest person.—The testimony of a person who goes naked into the public bath is inadmissible, because of his committing a prohibited action, in the exposure of his nakedness.

Or of usurers or gamesters.—The testimony of a person who receives usury is inadmissible; and, so, also, of one who plays for a stake at dice or chess, because gaming in that manner is ranked in the number of great crimes; and in the same manner, also, the evidence of a person who omits his prayers, from an attention to these games, is not admissible.—It is to be observed, however, that simple playing at chess without a stake is not destructive of credit, since such play does not induce a want of integrity because all our Imams are not agreed in its illegality. Malik and Shafei havin declared it to be lawful.—It is recorded in the Mabsoot, that the evidence of an usurer is inadmissible only in case of his being so in a notorious degree; because mankind often make invalid contracts; and these are, in some degree, usurious.

Or of persons guilty of indecorum.—The evidence of a person guilty of base and low actions, such as making water or eating his victuals on the high road, is not admissible; because where a man is not restrained, by a sense of shame, from such actions as these, he exposes himself to a suspicion that he will not refrain from falsehood.

Or of free-thinkers, if they avow their sentiments.—The evidence of a person who openly in veils against the companions of the Prophet and their disciples is not admissible, because of his apparent want of integrity.

It is otherwise, however, where a person conceals his sentiments in regard to them, because in such case the want of integrity is not apparent.

The evidence of the sect of Hawa, and other heretics, admissible, but not that of the tribe of Khetabia.—The evidence of the sect of Hawa* (that is, such as are not Soonis) is admissible; excepting, however, the tribe of Khetabia, whose evidence is inadmissible, for reasons that will be hereafter explained.

—Shafei maintains that the testimony of no tribe whatever of the sect of Hawa is admissible, because the heterodox tenets they profess argue the highest degree of depravity.

—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that although their tenets be in reality wrong, yet their adherence to them implies probity, since they have been led to embrace them from an opinion of their being right; and there is, moreover, reason to think that they will abstain from falsehood, because it is prohibited in every religion. Hence the case is the same as if a person should eat of an animal which had not been slain according to the prescribed form of Zababah, because of its being lawful amongst their sect. It is otherwise where the baseness proceeds from the actions, not from the belief. —With respect to the sect of Khetabia, it is to be observed that they are in a high degree heretics; and amongst them it is lawful to bear positive testimony to a circumstance on the grounds of another having sworn to them. Some have said that it is an incumbent duty upon that sect to give evidence in favour of each other, whence their testimony is not free from suspicion.

—Zimmeers, in testimony concerning each other.

—The testimony of Zimmeers with respect to each other is admissible, notwithstanding they be of different religions.—Malik and Shafei have said that their evidence is absolutely inadmissible, because, as infidels are unjust, † it is requisite to be slow in believing anything they may advance, God having said (in the Koran). When an unjust person tells you any thing, be slow in believing him;’—whence it is that the evidence of an infidel is not admitted concerning a Mussulman; and consequently, that an infidel stands (in this particular) in the same predicament as an apostate.

The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—First, it is related of the Prophet, that he permitted and held lawful the testimony of some Christians concerning others of their sect. Secondly, an infidel having power over himself, and his minor children, is on that account qualified to be a witness with regard to his own sect; and the depravity which proceeds from his faith is not destructive of this qualification, because he is supposed to abstain from every thing prohibited in his own religion, and falsehood is prohibited in every religion. It is otherwise with respect to an apostate.

*In the Arabic and Persian, the words Teyoor and Tamboor are written exactly similar; and as they can only be distinguished from each other by the proper position of the diacritical points, they are therefore very liable to be confounded by the frequent omission of these points.

†Namely, listening to music.

*Anglice, the air; a derivative appellation given by the Soonis to the Shiyas. —Hawa, also, is used to express the sensual passions, whence the term Ahil Hawa signifies sensualists, or epicureans.

†Arab. Fansik; meaning, in this place, degenerate or depraved.

Evidence

as he possesses no power, either over his own person, or over that of another; and it is also otherwise with respect to a Zimmee in relation to a Mussulman because a Zimmee has no power over the person of a Mussul man. Besides, a Zimmee may be suspected of inventing falsehoods against a Mussulman from the hatred he bears to him on account of the superiority of the Mussulmans over him.

Objection.—In the same manner as there subsists an enmity between Muslims and Zimmee, so also is there an enmity between the followers of other religions, such as the Jews, the Christians, and the Magians: it would follow, therefore, that amongst these the testimony of those of one religion cannot be admitted with respect to others of a different religion; whereas it hath been declared admissible.

Reply.—Although the religions of these be different, yet none of them being under subjection to another, so as to engender reciprocal hatred; there is no cause to suspect that they will invent falsehoods against each other.

A Moostamin cannot testify concerning a Zimmee; but a Zimmee may testify concerning a Moostamin.—The testimony of an infidel Moostamin in relation to a Zimmee is not admissible, because he has no power over the person of a Zimmee, as the latter is a fixed resident in the Mussulman territory. The evidence of a Zimmee, however, is admissible with respect to an infidel Moostamin, in the same manner as the evidence of Mussulmans with relation to them is valid.

And Moostamins may testify concerning each other, being of the same country.—The testimony of one Moostamin is admissible with respect to another Moostamin, provided he be of the same country. If, however, they be of different countries (such as a native of Russia and of Turkey) their testimonies with respect to each other are not admissible; because this difference precludes the operation of their power over each other; whence it is that they cannot inherit of each other.

The testimony is admissible, of any one whose virtues preponderate.—The testimony of him whose virtues exceed his vices and who is not guilty of great crimes, is admissible, notwithstanding he may occasionally be guilty of venial crimes.—What is here advanced is an explanation of the degree of integrity to which regard is paid in bearing evidence: and this explanation is approved: for innocence with respect to great crimes, and a preponderance of virtue over vice, must necessarily be deemed sufficient, on this principle, that if any occasional commission of smaller crimes were destructive of testimony, the door of evidence would be shut, whilst the preservation of the rights of mankind requires that it should be kept open.

And of such as remain uncircumcised from any justifiable cause.—The testimony of an Ackil (that is, of one who has had circumcision on account of old age, or for some other sufficient reason) is admissible, because the omission of this ceremony does not destructive of his integrity: excepting where it arises from a contempt of religion, or of the authority of the oral law by which it is enjoined; for in that case integrity no longer remains.

Or of an eunuch.—The testimony of an eunuch is a reliable, because Omar accepted the testimony of Alkia, who was an eunuch; and also, because he has been deprived of one of his members by violence, and therefore stands in the same predicament with one who has been mutilated.

Or of a bastard.—The testimony of bastard is valid, because he is innocent with respect to the immorality of his parents. Imam Malik maintains that the testimony of a bastard is not to be admitted with respect to whoredom, as it may naturally be supposed he wishes as many others as possible reduced to the same level with himself, and his testimony in a matter of this kind is therefore liable to suspicion.—Our doctors, however, argue that the present question relates merely to the point of integrity; and if a bastard be a just man, there is no reason to suspect him of such a wish.

Or of a hermaphrodite.—The testimony of a hermaphrodite is admissible, because such a person is either a man or a woman, and the evidence of both is admissible.

Or of a vicerey.—The testimony of a governor on the part of a sultan is admissible, according to a majority of the Hanefi doctors, provided he do not enforce oppression; but if he act oppressively his testimony is not admissible. Some have said that in the latter case also his testimony is admissible, provided he be himself a man of generosity and character, and be not guilty of boasting and vain talk; because it is in such a case natural to suppose that regard for his reputation will prevent his asserting a falsehood; and the dignity of his character will deter any one from offering him a bribe.

Two brothers attesting their father's appointment of an executor must be credited, if the executor verify their testimony; and the same of the attestation of two gatees. two debtors or creditors, or two executors, to the same effect.—Where two brothers attest that their father had appointed a particular person to be his executor, if that person also claim the same, their testimony is valid, upon a favourable construction—but not if he deny the appointment.—Analogy would suggest that their testimony is not valid in either case (and a case where two legatees attest that the testator had appointed a particular person his executor,—or where two debtors or creditors of the deceased assert the same,—or where two executors attest the junction of a third person with them in the executorship,—is subject to the same analogy):—because their evidence is in some degree advantageous to the witnesses themselves, inasmuch as the advantage to be derived from it results to them also. The reason for a more favourable construction in this particular is that as it is the duty of the Kazee to appoint an executor where it is required, and where the death of the person is notorious, the evidence in question is admissible, inasmuch as it exempts the Kazee from this trouble, and not because it establishes the proof of anything.—It is therefore a substitute for the cast of a die, which saves the trouble of election.

Objection.—Where there are two executors, there is no occasion for the Kazee’s appointment of a third, and therefore the appointment of a third, upon such a ground, is unwarrantable.

Reply.—The two executors having acknowledged that the deceased had joined a third person with them, the Kazee is therefore required to confirm him, since, in consequence of such acknowledgment, they cannot act without him.

It is to be observed that where the debtors of the deceased attest the executorship of a particular person, their evidence is admissible, whether the death of the other be notorious or not, because such evidence is an acknowledgment affecting themselves; and the death of the creditor is therefore established with respect to them, because of their acknowledgment.

Attestation to a person’s appointment of an agent is not to be credited.—If two brothers bear testimony that their absent father had appointed Zeyd an agent for the receipt of debts due to him at Koofa, their evidence is inadmissible, whether Zeyd claim the said agency or not;—for the Kazee has no power of himself to appoint an agent in behalf of an absentee, and the evidence is not in this instance sufficient to warrant it, since it is liable to suspicion.

A defendant’s impeachment of the integrity of witnesses is not credited, unless he states their commission of some specific crime.—If a defendant reproach a witness with a thing which would impeach his legal integrity, but which does not involve any of the rights of the spiritual or temporal law, and produce evidence in support of his assertion, the Kazee must not hear them, nor pass a decree of the injustice of the witnesses; because this injustice is a thing of a nature which comes not within the jurisdiction of the Kazee, inasmuch as it is not permanent, being removable by repentance.—Besides, the evidence adduced in this case tends to lay open faults:*—now the concealment of faults is incumbent, and the manifestation of them prohibited: as, therefore, a witness, in giving evidence or this effect, is himself guilty of irregularity, his testimony cannot be heard; for the manifestation of faults is admitted only where it tends to maintain the rights of others; and that is only in such cases as fall within the jurisdiction of the Kazee;—but the case in question is not of that nature; and therefore the evidence cannot be admitted.

Or adduce evidence to the plaintiff’s acknowledgment of their irregularity.—If, however, witnesses were to give evidence that the plaintiff had himself acknowledged the irregularity of the witness, the evidence would in that case be valid: because acknowledgment is a thing which falls within the jurisdiction of the Kazee.

He is not allowed to adduce evidence to their being hired by the plaintiff.—If a defendant bring witnesses to prove that the plaintiff had hired his witnesses for ten dins (for instance) such evidence must not be admitted: because although it tend to prove something more than a mere irregularity, yet the defendant not being a regular adversary of the plaintiff in regard to this matter, has no sight to establish it by evidence, since, with respect to this point, he is as it were a stranger.

Unless his own property be involved.—If, however, the defendant be a regular adversary (as if, for instance, he should assert that the plaintiff had hired his witnesses to give evidence for ten dins from property which he [the defendant] had put in his hands), in that case the evidence he produces in support of his allegation must be admitted: because the defendant, is in this instance a regular adversary of the plaintiff in a matter of property: and the proof in regard to the property necessarily involves the proof of the reproach.—In the same manner also the evidence adduced by the defendant is admitted where he asserts that “he had compounded with the witnesses for a certain sum of money that they should withhold their testimony in support of such unfounded claim.”—and that, having accordingly paid the stipulated sum, they had nevertheless given their evidence, and he therefore prefers a claim for the sum paid to them;” —for here the proof with respect to the claim would also establish the proof of the reproach. Lawyers have observed that as the testimony of witnesses is admitted with respect to any thing that falls within the jurisdiction of the Kazee, it follows that if the defendant bring witnesses to prove that the witness of the plaintiff is a slave, or that he has been punished for slander, or that he is a drunkard, or a slanderer, or a reproach of the plaintiff,—in all these cases, the evidence so adduced must be admitted.

A witness’s immediate acknowledgment of mis-statement or omission, from apprehension, does not destroy his credit.—If a person gives evidence, and before moving from the place or, the Kazee passing a decree upon it, declare that “he had given a part of his evidence under the influence of apprehen—

*By faults is here understood venial trespasses, such as might destroy the legal integrity of a witness, but which do not amount to crimes.
CHAPTER III.

OF THE DISAGREEMENT OF WITNESSES IN THEIR TESTIMONY.

Evidence repugnant to the claim cannot be admitted. — Where the evidence adduced by a claimant is conformable to the claim, it is worthy of credit; but not where it is repugnant to it; because, in matters concerning the rights of the individual, the priority of the claim is requisite to the admission of evidence; and this exists in the former instance, but not in the latter, since in the former the object of evidence (namely, a verification of the claim) is answered, whereas in the latter the evidence tends to a falsification of it, and it is therefore the same as if no evidence at all were produced.

The witnesses must perfectly agree in their testimony. — The concurrence of the witnesses, in words and meaning, is requisite, according to Haneefa. — If, therefore, one witness bear testimony to one thousand dirms being due, and the other to two thousand, no credit is to be given to either. — The two disciples are of opinion that the evidence is to be credited to the amount of one thousand dirms; and a similar disagreement also subsists in a case where one witness attests one divorce, and the other two or three divorces. — The arguments of the two disciples are that the witnesses agree in the smallest amount (such as in one thousand dirms, or in one divorce); and one of them, besides his agreement in this amount, attests an additional quantity. — Their evidence, therefore, must be admitted in the degree in which they concur; and the testimony of one, so far as it relates to the excess only, must be rejected. — The reasoning of Haneefa is that the witnesses differ in words, and consequently in meaning, since meaning is extracted from words. Thus two thousand (for instance) can never be construed to mean one thousand, as the terms are essentially different. — In the case in question, therefore, the one thousand, and the two thousand, respectively; are attested by only one witness; and the case is consequently the same as if their testimony had related to different articles, as if one were to attest dirms and the other deenas, for instance.

The witnesses may be credited to the smallest amount in which they agree both in words and meaning. — If a person claim a debt of one thousand five hundred dirms, and one of his witnesses bear testimony to one thousand, and the other to one thousand five hundred, in that case the testimony must be credited in the amount of one thousand dirms; for the

*To exemplify this case, — suppose a person were to claim the right of property in a house, on the plea of his having purchased it; and his witness attest the right of property from its having been given to him; — in that case the evidence so given would be rejected.

† The different between this and the preceding case turns entirely on the terms in which the testimony is delivered; for in the case here considered the witness, in mentioning one thousand five hundred, mentions the term one thousand; which so far coincides,
The evidence of a witness who attests a larger sum than the claim amounts to is null.

In a case where one witness attests one thousand dirms, and the other one thousand five hundred, and the claimant expressly declares that only one thousand dirms is due to him, the testimony for one thousand five hundred is null, as being falsified by the claimant. The effect is also the same where the claimant alleges one thousand dirms, and one of the witnesses attests one thousand, and the other one thousand five hundred; for here also the claimant falsifies the testimony of one of his witnesses, insomuch as his claim is different from it. A conformity, therefore, between the claim and the evidence is indispensably necessary; and hence, if the claimant should say, "my original claim was one thousand five hundred dirms, but I received five hundred," or "I exempted the debtor from five hundred," in that case each of the above-mentioned testimonies would be credited, because of their conformity with the claim.

Evidence to a debt is not annulled by a subsequent declaration of part of the debt having been discharged—If two persons give evidence to a debt of one thousand dirms, and one of them afterwards declare that the debtor had paid five hundred dirms of it, still the evidence of one thousand dirms being due must be credited, and that of the five hundred having been paid must be rejected. The reason of this is, that both witnesses agree in the debt of one thousand dirms, whereas one witness only attests the payment of five hundred dirms; and as two witnesses are requisite to establish proof, the testimony in the first instance is therefore admitted as proof; and the additional declaration (of one thousand dirms having been paid) is rejected. It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf that in this case the claimant is entitled only to five hundred dirms, because the sum of the testimony of the witness who attests the payment of five hundred dirms is, that the debt in fact amounts only to five hundred. The above explanation, however, is a full refutation of this opinion. It is to be observed that when the witness is informed of a partial discharge of the debt (as in the case, for instance, of five hundred out of the thousand), he must not bear testimony to the debt of one thousand until the creditor make an acknowledgment of the receipt of five hundred: for otherwise he would be considered as aiding the injustice of the creditors. In the Janna Sagheer it is related, that if two persons attest a debt of one thousand dirms due by Omar to Zeyd, and one of them afterwards bear testimony to Omar having paid five hundred of it, and the claimant deny the same,—in that case their evidence of the debt, in which they both agree, must be credited; and the single testimony of one, with regard to the payment, must be rejected. Tahavee reports it as an opinion of our doctors, that the evidence to the debt is not to be credited (and Ziffer has adopted this opinion) because the claimant contradicts the testimony of the payment. To this, however, it is answered, that although the claimant do contradict this latter testimony, yet he does not contradict the first evidence, which is established in its validity by the concurrence of two.

The evidence of witnesses who agree with respect to fact and time, but differ with respect to place, must be rejected.—If two persons bear testimony that a certain person had killed Zeyd, on the festival of the sacrifice, at Mecca: and two others bear testimony that the said person had killed Zeyd, on the same day, at Koofa; in such case, if all these witnesses be assembled at the same time, in the presence of the Kazee, the whole of their testimonies must be rejected; because, of the evidence of the two parties, it is undoubtedly certain, that that of one of them must be false, and there is no criterion to ascertain to which the preference belongs. If, on the contrary, the evidence of one of these parties precede that of the other, and the Kazee in consequence pass sentence, and afterward two others exhibit evidence of a different nature, in that case the Kazee must not admit the evidence of the latter, because the first evidence, in virtue of the issue of the decree consequent upon it, acquires a superiority over the latter, which prevents its annulment.

Evidence to the theft of an animal is not annulled by a difference between the witnesses with respect to the colour, but it is so by a difference with respect to the sex.—If two persons attest the theft of a cow, but differ in regard to the colour of it, their evidence is nevertheless valid, and the hand of the thief must in consequence be cut off. If, on the contrary, one of the witnesses declare the animal to be a cow, and the other allege that it is a bull, their evidence, in such case, it not admissible, and the hand of the thief must not be cut off. — This is the doctrine of Haneefa — The two disciples maintain that the thief is not to suffer mutilation in either case. Some have said that this disagreement proceeds on the supposition of the attested colours being in some degree similar, such as red and black, and not where they differ completely, such as black and white. Others again have said that it subsists in all cases where the witnesses differ with respect to the colour. The reasoning of the two disciples is, that the theft of a black cow is different from that of a white cow; in other words, they are two distinct animals; and hence the due quantity of evidence (namely, that of two witnesses) does not appear with respect to either allegation of theft. — It is therefore the same as if two persons were to testify that a certain person had usurped the cow of such a person, but to disagree with respect to the colour of the cow; in which case the evidence of both would be defective. But if, in any of these cases, the claim be preferred by the opposite party, it then becomes equivalent to a case of debt, and the law takes place accordingly. — Thus, if the claim be for one thousand five hundred dirms, and one of the witnesses declare it to be one thousand, and the other one thousand five hundred, in that case, according to all our doctors, a decree must be given for one thousand dirms. — If, on the contrary, the claim be for two thousand dirms, and one witness attest to one thousand, and the other two thousand, in that case nothing can be decreed, according to Haneefa; whereas, according to the two disciples, one thousand must be decreed. — The principle on which these cases resemble debt is, that the pardon for murder, the freedom of a slave, or the divorce of a wife, is established by the acknowledgment of the person to whom each of these rights appertain. — Hence, in such case, his claim of debt only remains, and there is no occasion for the proof of the contract. — In the case of a pledge, if one witness attest that it was pawned for one thousand dirms, and the other that it was pawned for one thousand five hundred, and the claim be preferred by the pawner, the evidence is in that case inadmissible; because the pawner has no advantage in preferring such a claim, since he cannot resume his pawn until he pay the debt opposed to it. — His claim, therefore, is not regarded; and such being the case, the evidence he adduces is, as it were, evidence without a claim; and evidence without a claim is inadmissible. — If, on the contrary; the claim be preferred by the pawner, it is the same as a claim for debt. — In a case of hire, if one witness testify to one thousand dirms, and the other to one thousand five hundred, then, provided this difference happen at the beginning of the term of hire, it is analogous to a similar difference concerning a sale; but if it happen after the expiration of the term, and the claim be preferred by the hiree, it is a claim of debt.
Except it regard a woman's dower when she is entitled to the smallest sum testified.—In a case of marriage, if one of two witnesses testify to a dower of one thousand dirms, and the other to a dower of fifteen hundred, the dower is established in the amount of one thousand dirms, according to Haneefa, whether the claim be preferred by the husband or wife, and whether it be for the smallest or greatest of the attested sums. This is according to a favourable construction. The two disciples, arguing from analogy, maintain that the evidence is totally inadmissible.—(It, however, recorded in the Amalee, that the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf in this instance, accords with that of Haneefa.)—The reasoning of the two disciples, in support of their opinion, is that the disagreement of the witnesses with regard to the amount of the portion is in fact a disagreement with regard to the marriage contract, since the object of both is the establishment of a cause, namely, the said contract;—the disagreement in this instance, therefore, is analogous to a similar disagreement with regard to sale.—The reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this particular, as adopted by Haneefa, if that property, in the case of marriage, is merely a subordinate point, the original object of it being to legalize generation, to unite the sexes, and to endow the man with a right in the woman's person. Now as there is no difference whatever upon these points, they are accordingly established in the first instance; and if any disagreement then occur concerning the subordinate or dependant point the smallest sum attested is decreed, since to that amount both witnesses agree.—What is here advanced, that the case is the same 'whether the claim be for the smallest or for the greatest attested sum,' is approved.—Some of the learned have said, that the difference of opinion between Haneefa and the two disciples proceeds only on the supposition of the claim having been preferred by the woman; for that, in case of the claim being made by the husband, they are all agreed in regard to the inadmissibility of the evidence; since his object can only be the establishment of the contract, whilst the object of the woman is the property.—Others again have said that this difference of opinion obtains in either case; and this is approved.

CHAPTER IV.

OF EVIDENCE RELATIVE TO INHERITANCE.

Evidence must be adduced to prove the death of the inheritee and the right of the heirs, before inheritance can take effect.—It is a rule, if an inheritee's* right of property in any thing be proven, still a decree cannot pass in favour of the heirs, until proof be adduced of the death of the inheritee, and of their right of heritage.—This rule obtains with Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that the thing must be immediately decreed to the heir; for he alleges that the property of the heir is, in fact, the property of the inheritee, and consequently that evidence to the inheritee's right of property in any thing is, in fact, evidence to his heir's right of property in that thing.—Haneefa and Mohammed, on the contrary, allege that the right of the heir is inchoate and extant de novo, with respect to all the rules to which the inherited property is subject (whence it is that a course of abstinence is enjoined upon an heir, with regard to an inherited female slave,—and likewise, that whatever a poor inheritee may have received by way of charity is lawful to his rich heir) ; and the right of an heir being inchoate and extant de novo, it is indispensable, in such case, that the witnesses bear testimony to the shifting of the right from the inheritee to the heir,—in other words, that they attest the inheritee to have died, and to have left the article in question as an inheritance to his heirs.

It suffices that the witnesses attest either the property or possession of the inheritee at the time of his decease. They deem it sufficient, however, in order to prove the shifting of the right of property, that the witnesses attest that 'the thing in question was the property of the inheritee at the period of his death;' for then the shifting is established from necessity;—and in the same manner, it suffices if they attest that 'it was in the keeping and possession of the inheritee at the time of his death;' for although the possession of an article may have been in virtue of a deposit, or of usurpation, yet the possession of death, in either case, is in fact a possession in virtue of the right, because of the obligation of responsibility which then takes place;—in a case of usurpation evidence; and also in a case of deposit, because of the death of the trustee without any explanation;—in other words, if a trustee should die, without explaining that a particular thing in his possession is the deposit of a particular person, it occa-

* Meaning, the person from whom inheritance is derived. The translator is aware that this term is not sanctioned by authority. Ancestor being the phrase generally used in our law-books.—The nature of the Mussulman laws of inheritance, however, renders it necessary to adopt some term of more general import, since, according to these, inheritance may either ascended or descend.—The translator, therefore, has adopted this term, both in order to avoid the inconvenience of a perpetual paraphrase, and also because it literally expresses the sense of the Arabic term Mawris, signifying 'inherited from.'

* See Deposits.
sions responsibility, because the trustee, in dying without explaining the case, was most certainly guilty of a want of care of the deposit; and a want of care of a deposit is a transgression with respect to the deposit, which induces responsibility.—Evidence, therefor-either of a thing being in the possession of a certain person at his death, is equivalent to evidence of its being his property.
An heir may recover an article in possession of another by proving it to have been the property of his inheritee, or a loan or deposit from him.—HAVING thus explained the tenets of each of four doctors upon this subject it follows that if witnesses were to give evidence that a particular house was in the possession of a certain man at his death, the evidence so given must be admitted with respect to the claimant being the heir of the deceased. In the same manner also the testimony of witnesses must be admitted, where a person adduces evidence to prove that a particular house, in the possession of a certain person, was the property of his father, and that his father had lent it, or had delivered it in deposit to the person then possessing it. In this case, therefore, the said person is entitled to take the house from the present occupier, without being required to prove, by witnesses, that his father had died, and that the said house had been left to him inheritance.—This; according to the tenets of Aboo Yoosaf, is evident ;
and so according to the tenets of Haneefa and Mohammed; because, in the case in question, it has been shown, by the testimony of witnesses, that the father was in possession at the time of his death, insomuch as the possession of a borrower or trustee is equivalent to his own possession: and on this account there is no necessity for proving the shifting of the property to the heir, since that is consequence of the proof of the possession, as has been already explained.—It is to be observed that the law is the same where, under these circumstances, the claimant asserts the possession of the other to have been in virtue of a lease: because the possession of a lessee is equivalent to the possession of the lessor.
The right to an article is not established by evidence to the former possession of it.—If a person claim a right of property to a house in the possession of another, and the testimony of the witnesses produced by him should run in this manner, "we testify that the said house was in the possession of the claimant one month ago."—such evidence must not be admitted.—This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet. It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf that the evidence, in this case, is admissible; because possession is an object in the same manner as property; and as the testimony of the witnesses would have been accepted, in case they had said that the house in question was the property of the claimant one month ago, it follows that it must be admitted in this case also — Besides, if the witnesses had deposed that the other had taken the house from the hands or possession of the claimant, their evidence would have been admitted, and the claimant would, in consequence, have been put in possession of the house. The doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet, in this particular, has been adopted by Haneefa and Mohammed;
and the argument in support of it are twofold.—FIRST, the seisin of the present possessor is actually seen with the eye; whereas that of the claimant, which formerly existed, is only heard from the tongue of the witnesses; and knowledge from hearsay can never be put in competition with that from actual sight.—SECONDLY, the evidence, in this case, relates to a matter of uncertainty;
since the former seisin of the claimant, not being definitely known, admits of three suppositions, as it may have existed in virtue either of right of property, of deposit, or of usurpation; and where the claimant is of so uncertain a nature, it is impossible to pass a decree upon the possession.
It is otherwise where the witness attest the right of property, as that admits not of various suppositions;—or, where they attest that the house had been taken from the claimant; because this is a matter of certainty, of which the law is known, namely, the obligation of restitution, or of replacing the thing, as it formally stood, in the possession of the claimant.

Unless the defendant acknowledge such former possession.—If the possessor of the house should himself acknowledge the former possession of the claimant, in that case
a decree must pass for restoring the claimant to his possession; for the uncertainty with regard to the subject of an acknowledgment is no bar to the validity of the acknowledgment itself.

Or two witnesses attest his having made such acknowledgment.—If two persons attest
the acknowledgment of the defendant, that
"the thing in his possession had formerly been in the possession of the claimant," the article in question must in that case be restored to the claimant; because, although the subject of the acknowledgment be a matter involved in uncertainty, yet the evidence here relates, not to it, but to the acknowledgment itself, which is a matter of certainty;—and the uncertainty in the subject of it is no bar to the decree of the Kazee since he may afterwards desire the acknowledger to explain the nature of the uncertainty.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE ATTESTATION OF EVIDENCE

Attestation of evidence is admitted in all matters not liable to be affected by doubt.— An attestation of evidence is admissible in all such rights as do not drop, in consequence of a doubt; because there is a necessity for this, since it may happen that a witness, from various causes (such as sickness), may not be able to give his evidence in person:
whence, if an attestation of his evidence were not admissible, the rights of mankind would often be destroyed. There is, however, a degree of doubt attending it: because the secondary witness in such a case is merely a substitute for the primary witness; and if there be any gradations between him and the primary, the suspicion of falsehood becomes still stronger. There is, more often, a possibility of avoiding this expense by desiring the party to produce, independently of the witness whose attendance is impracticable, some other who is also a primary witness. An attestation of evidence, therefore, is never admitted when it tends to establish a matter which is repelled by the existence of a doubt, such as punishment or retaliation.

The attestation of the same two witnesses suffices to prove the evidence of two. —The attestation of two men with regard to the evidence of two others is valid. Shafei maintains that the evidence of four men is necessary, on the authority of that of two; because, in his opinion, two secondary witnesses are equivalent to one principal, in the same manner as two women are equivalent to one man. The arguments of our doctors in support of their doctrine upon this point are twofold: —First, Alee has declared that an attestation of the evidence of one man is not admissible unless attested by two. Secondly, the stating the evidence of a principal or original witness is included in the number of rights. If, therefore, two men testify to the evidence of a principal witness, and afterwards testify to the evidence of another principal witness, both evidences are valid, nor is it required that the evidence of each principal witness should be testified to by two separate secondary witnesses.

But the evidence of each must be attested by the two respectively. The attestation of one person to the evidence of one witness is not admissible, because of the opinion of Alee, as before quoted. —Malik admits the attestation of one person to the evidence of one witness. —The Precept of Alee, however, is in proof against him. Besides, the evidence of one principal witness is included amongst the number of rights, and therefore requires to be proved by two witnesses.

The attestation must be at the desire of the primary witness, who must state the terms of his testimony to the attesting witness. —It is requisite that the principal witnesses desire the secondary to bear testimony to his evidence, after the following manner: —'Bear testimony to my evidence, which is, that A. the son of B. has made an acknowledgment before me to a particular effect, and has desired me to attest the said acknowledgment.' —The reason of this is that the secondary witness is a substitute of the principal, and it is therefore necessary that he appoint him his agent, and desire him to bear evidence in the manner above related. —It is also requisite that the principal give his evidence to the secondary, in the same manner as he would have done in the assembly of the Kazee, in order that he [the secondary] may report the same literally, in that assembly. —It is to be observed, however, that if the principal should not mention that 'A. the son of B. had called him to witness his acknowledgment,' still his attestation is valid; because whoever hears another make an acknowledgment may lawfully give evidence of the same, although the acknowledge should not have desired him to bear testimony.

Form of an attestation. —It is requisite that a secondary witness deliver his testimony in the following manner: —'Zeyd has called upon me to attest his evidence that Omar has made an acknowledgment before him to a particular effect, and that he had desired him to bear testimony to his evidence of the said acknowledgment.' All this is required, because it is necessary that a secondary witness recite the substantial of the evidence of the principal, and specify that he had called upon him to bear testimony to it.

A person cannot attest the attestation of another, unless that other desire him so to do.

—If Omar hear Zeyd assert that a particular person had desired him to bear testimony to some circumstance, it is not in that case lawful for Omar to attest the said evidence of Zeyd, unless Zeyd should have particularly called upon him to attest the same; because, in the attestation of evidence, that of having been called upon to attest it is a necessary condition. This is according to all our doctors: —According to Mohammed, because, in his opinion, the decree of the Kazee passes on the strength of both evidences; that is, of the principal and the secondary; and also because both of them are liable, in an equal degree, to the penalty in case of a recession from their evidence; and according to Haneefa and Aboo Yousaf, because, in their opinion, a repetition of the evidence of the principal witness before the Kazee is necessary for the establishment of proof; and therefore the circumstance which establishes the proof ought to be explained.

Attestation is admitted only in case of the death, absence (at a distant place), or sickness of the principal witness. —The attestation of evidence is not admissible excepting where the principal witness have died, or have departed to a distance of three days journey or upwards, or are so sick as to be unable to attend at the assembly of the Kazee. The reason of this is that the attestation of evidence is admissible only from necessity; and this necessity exists only where the principal witnesses are unable to give their testimony personally, which inability exists in all these cases. —It is to be observed, that, in case of the absence of the principal witness, the distance must be estimated by the time requisite to travel it; because the incapability of appearing to give evidence is founded on the distance, which the law estimates from the length of time. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that if the absent person be at a place so situated as that, having occasion to appear in the assembly of the Kazee in the morning, he could not return to his family that day, in that case it is lawful to accept, for the preservation of the rights of mankind, an attestation of his evidence. Lawyers, however, remark that the former doctrine is the most authentic, as in this latter case there is no great inconvenience; and Aboo Leys has also given this exposition upon the point.

The attesting witnesses may appear as purgators on behalf of the primary witnesses.—The justification of the original witnesses by the secondary is admitted, because they are capable of being purgators. In the same manner also, the justification of one witness by another witness is valid, for the like reason; and also because the effect of it is advantageous to him, since the Kazee does not, by consequence of passing the decree. It is likewise to be observed, that this degree of advantage does not subject a just man to any degree of suspicion in the same manner as he lies not under any suspicion from the delivery of his own evidence. A just man indeed cannot possibly lie under suspicion from his justification of another witness, because his testimony is credible in itself, although that of the other be rejected.

But their not doing so does not affect the evidence which they attest. If secondary witnesses remain silent with respect to the justification of the principal witnesses, it is valid; that is to say, the testimony of the principal witnesses, as recited by them, must be admitted; and the Kazee must scrutinize into their characters from others. This is according to Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed has said that in this case the original evidence, as recited by the secondary witnesses, must not be admitted; because the validity of evidence is founded entirely on the probity of the witnesses; and it consequently follows that unless the secondary witnesses explain the probity of the principals, their testimony repeated by them cannot be received as valid evidence. The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf is, that the business of secondary witnesses is merely to recite the evidence of the principals, and not to exhibit a justification of them, since it may often happen that they are ignorant of the probity of the principals. Besides, after they have recited their evidence, it is the business of the Kazee to examine into their probity, in the same manner as if they were actually present.

The denial of the primary witnesses annuls the attestation. If the principals deny the evidence recited on their part by the secondary, there is no evidence of the principal witnesses. The Kazee, however, may order the principals to be brought to give evidence himself, and if they again deny, the Kazee may order them to be brought to the court. If the Kazee do not bring the principals to give evidence in person, he is not at liberty to annul the attestation of the evidence of the secondary witnesses, if it is in accordance with the "arbour of the law," which is the name of the Kazee. If the Kazee does not bring the principals to give evidence himself, he is not at liberty to annul the attestation of the evidence of the secondary witnesses, if it is in accordance with the "arbour of the law," which is the name of the Kazee.

If the attesting witnesses have not a clear personal knowledge of the defendant, the identity must be proved by other witnesses. If two men bear testimony to the evidence of two others, to this effect, that "a certain woman, the daughter of a native of Samarcand, has made an acknowledgment of one thousand dirms in favour of Zeyd," and these secondary witnesses further declare, that the principals had informed them, that they knew the person of the woman, and the plaintiff produce a woman, and the secondary witnesses declare that "they do not know whether she is the woman in question or not," in that case the plaintiff must be desired to produce two witnesses to testify the woman's identity; for here the evidence of the witnesses tends to prove the claim upon a uncertain person, whereas the plaintiff claims his right from a person specific and present; and hence a doubt arises, to remove which it is requisite to ascertain the person.

And so also, with respect to the limits of the claim. Analogous to this is a case where two witnesses bear testimony the two evidence of two others, that "a certain person, a piece of ground circumscribed by particular boundaries, and the price is due by the purchaser." Here it is requisite to produce two other witnesses to attest that the said ground, circumscribed by the said boundaries, had been delivered over to the purchaser, who is the defendant; and in the same manner also, it is requisite to produce two other witnesses, in case the defendant deny that the boundaries of the ground he had purchased are the same with those described in the evidence of the witnesses; to the end that these additional witnesses may bear evidence that those boundaries were the same with those of the ground in the possession of the purchaser.

The identity of a person affected by a Kazee's letter must be proved. The law is exactly the same with regard to the letters of one Kazee to another: as where one Kazee writes to another, that "two witnesses have given evidence that a decretal of one thousand dirms is due to a certain person; the son of a certain person, of a certain family, by the daughter of a certain person of a certain family, and that he must pass a decree for the said daughter's payment of the said sum," for here, if the plaintiff, after delivering the letter to the Kazee to whom it is addressed, produce a woman, the Kazee, before he passes the decree must, desire him to bring two witnesses to attest that she is the same woman as described in the letter of the other Kazee. It is to be observed that if, in either of these cases (namely, attestation of evidence, or of the letters of one Kazee to another), in the specification of the family of the woman, the witnesses make use of the term Tameekas, it is not valid; it being requisite to specify some nearer and more particular branch to which the woman is related, in order that a particular knowledge may be acquired, which cannot be done in case of the specification of so general a branch as that of
EVIDENCE.

Tameen, whose descendants are innumerable. It is the opinion of some that the word Farghania implies a general and Azurlediana, a particular family. Some, also, think that the words Samarcandn or Bokhari are general; and some have said that the reference to a small lane is particular, and to a street or city general. It is to be observed that, according to the Zahir Rawayer, the opinion of Haneefa and Mohammed (in opposition to that of Aboo Youssaf) is that description is rendered complete by the specification of the grandfather; but that the specification of the particular family (which is termed Fakhiz*) is equivalent to the mention of the grandfather; since it is the name of a distant progenitor, which is equivalent to a nearer one.

Section.

A false witness must be stigmatized—

HANEFFA is of opinion that a false witness must be stigmatized,† but not chastised with blows. The two disciples are of opinion that he must be scourged and confined; and this is also the opinion of Shafei. The arguments of the two disciples upon this point are twofold. FIRST, it is related of Omar, that he caused a false witness to be scourged with forty stripes, and to have his face blackened with the soot of a pot. SECONDLY, false testimony is a great crime, of which the evil results to others and as no stated punishment has been ordained for it in the LAW, it must therefore be punished by Tazeer, or discretionary correction. The arguments of Haneefa are also twofold—FIRST, Shireef stigmatized a false witness, but did not scour him, SECONDLY, prevention of the crime in future may be effected by stigmatizing, and it ought therefore to be adopted as sufficient; for were beating or scourging enjoined in such cases, it might operate to the concealment of the crime, and the consequent destruction of the rights of others;—in other words, as being a grievous punishment, the fear of it might deter false witnesses from a confession of their falsehood. With regard to the relation concerning Omar, it evidently alludes to the infliction of punishment on a criminal, as appears by the number of stripes (namely forty), and the blackening of the countenance.

Mode of stigmatizing a false witness.—
The mode of stigmatizing a false witness, as prescribed by Shirreeh, is this. If the witness be a sojourner in any public street or market-place, let him be sent to that street or market-place; or, if otherwise, let him be sent to his own tribe or kindred, after the evening prayers (as they are generally assembled in greater numbers at that time than any other); and let the stigmatize inform the people that "Kazee Shirreeh salutes them, and informs them, that he has detected this person in giving false evidence; that they must therefore beware of him themselves, and likewise desire others to beware of him." Shimsal Ayma has said that a false witness ought also to be stigmatized, according to the two disciples; and that the degree of correction and imprisonment ought (according to them) to be left to the discretion of the Kazee. (The nature of discretionary correction has been already explained under the head of Punishments) It is related in the Jama Sagheer that if two witnesses confess that they have given false evidence, they must not be scourged. The two disciples maintain that they are to be scourged at the discretion of the Kazee.

BOOK XXII.

OF RETRACTION OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence retracted before a decree is void.—If witnesses retract their testimony prior to the Kazee passing any decree, it becomes void (that is to say, the Kazee must not pass any decree upon it); for the right of the claimant cannot be established but by the decree of the Kazee; and the Kazee cannot pass a decree upon contradictory testimony and in this case the witnesses are not liable to make atonement, since they have not occasioned any injury to either of the parties.

But not if retracted after a decree has passed.—If on the contrary, the Kazee pass a decree, and the witnesses afterwards retract their testimony, the decree is not thereby rendered void; because, although the first allegation on which the decree passed be contradicted by the latter, and although the first and the last in point of credit stand upon an equal footing, yet the first, because of the sentence of the Kazee having passed in conformity to it, acquires a superiority which prevents its annulment. In this case, however, the witnesses are bound to atone for the injury they may have occasioned by their false testimony; for they themselves acknowledge a thing which is the cause of extenuability; and contradiction is no bar to the validity of acknowledgment, as shall be hereafter explained.

The retraction must be made in open court.

—The retraction of evidence is not valid, unless it be made in the presence of the Kazee: because, being a destruction of evi-
Evidence, it must consequently be restricted to that place which is particularly appointed for the reception of evidence;—namely, the assembly of the Kazee (that is to say, of any Kazee whatever). Besides, retraction of false evidence resembles repentance of a crime; and repentance of a crime, if committed privately, must be performed privately, and if committed openly, must be performed openly.

As, therefore, retraction of evidence is not valid, unless made in the assembly of the Kazee, it follows that if the defendant should ever that the witnesses had retracted their testimony somewhere out of the assembly of the Kazee, and should either require that an oath to this effect be administered to them in the assembly of the Kazee, or offer to produce witnesses there to prove his assertion, yet neither would the oath be a ministered to those witnesses, nor would the evidence he offers to produce be accepted, since the plea on which he proceeds (namely, an invalid retraction) is of no effect. If, on the contrary, his plea be of an effectual nature (as if he should assert that the witnesses had retract-, their testimony before a certain Kazee, who had in consequence passed a decree for their making reparation), the evidence he offers must be admitted, because he in this instance grounds his plea upon a valid retraction.

Witnesses retracting their testimony after a decree has passed must make a compensation to the suffering party. If two witnesses bear testimony that a particular sum is due by a certain person to another, and the Kazee accordingly pass a decree for the payment of it, and the witness afterwards retract their evidence they are in that case responsible to that person for the sum decreed against him; for whoever, by a transgression, performs an act destructive of another's property, becomes responsible for the property (in the same manner as the digger of a well on the high road). * In this case the witnesses have been guilty of transgression in giving false evidence, which occasioned the loss of the defendant's property. Shafei maintains that they are not responsible; for they, in fact, only produce the cause of the destruction, and that is not regarded where those are present who actually worked the destruction, namely (in the present instance) the Kazee and the plaintiff. In reply to this, our doctors argue that to impose the responsibility, in the case in question, upon the actual operator of the destruction (namely, the Kazee) is impracticable; because, in passing the decree, he acted as it were from necessity; and also, because, if a Kazee were thus liable to responsibility, on one would accept the office of Kazee, from an apprehension of being subject to such penalties. In the same manner also, it is impracticable to exact the compensation from the plaintiff, because the decree of the Kazee takes effect independent of him. In this case, therefore, regard is necessarily had to the producer of the cause.

Provided the decree had been actually enforced against him. If, in the case in question, one of the witnesses retract his evidence, he becomes responsible for a half of the property: for it is a rule that where part of the witnesses retract, the right shall remain established so far as relates to the remaining witnesses.

If one witness thus retract, he atones for a moiety of the damage. If, in the case in question, only one of the witnesses retract his evidence, he becomes responsible for a half of the property: for it is a rule that where part of the witnesses retract, the right shall remain established so far as relates to the remaining witnesses.

And the same of any number who may retract, where one witness perseveres in his testimony. Hence if three persons give evidence concerning property, and one of them afterwards retract his testimony, he is not subject to any responsibility, because the whole of the right remains established in virtue of the two remaining witnesses. The reason of this is that the right of the claimant is established because of the complete proof, namely, the testimony of two witnesses. If, however, another or of those three witnesses afterwards retract his evidence, the two receding witnesses are in that case responsible for one-half of the property, since, in virtue of the existence of one witness, one-half of the right remains in force.

Cases of retraction where the witnesses consist of both males and females. If one man and two women give evidence, and one of the women afterwards retract her testimony, she is liable for one-fourth of the right, because in consequence of the existing evidence of one man and one woman, three-fourths of it still remain in force. If, also, both the women retract their testimony, they are responsible for an half, since in virtue of the existing testimony of one man an half of the right remains in force.

If one man and ten women give evidence, and eight of the women afterwards retract, those eight are not liable to any compensation, since the remaining evidence furnishes complete proof. If, on the contrary, nine of the women retract, those nine are responsible for a fourth, since the remaining evidence of one man and one woman establishes three

*If a person dig a well in the high road (where no person is entitled to dig a well, and which is of course a transgression) he is liable to a fine for any accident which may happen by people falling into it, &c. This is fully explained in treating of Mines.
ground of this is that responsibility is founded upon similarity. Now there is no similarity between destruction with an exchange and destruction without an exchange. If, therefore, in the case in question, a compensation were taken from the witnesses, it would be a destruction of their property without any thing in return. If, however, the witnesses were to testify to any amount beyond the proper dower, and afterwards retract, they are in that case responsible for the excess, as having destroyed that much without any consideration in return.

The retraction of evidence to a sale does not occasion responsibility, unless the price had been attested short of the value.—If two witnesses bear evidence to a sale for a price tantamount to, or greater than, the value of the thing sold, and afterwards retract, they are no in that case liable to any compensation; since destruction attended with an equivalent is, in effect, no destruction. If, on the contrary, they should give evidence of the sale for a price less than the value, they are in that case responsible for the deficiency of value, because, in that amount, they have occasioned a destruction without any equivalent. The law here applies equally to sale with or without an option to the seller; because, in the case of an option, the cause of right of property is the original sale, and not the determination of the option. The effect, therefore, is referred to the sale, upon the determination of the option; and hence the destruction is referred to the evidence of the sale.

Witnesses retracting their evidence to divorce before consummation are liable for half the dower.—If two witnesses give evidence of a man having divorced his wife prior to consummation, and afterwards retract, they are in that case responsible for a moiety of the dower; because they have established upon that man a thing which stood within the possibility of dropping (in other words, which might perhaps have been altogether cancelled, by the wife apostatizing from the faith, or admitting the son of her husband to carnal connexion); and also, because separation prior to the consummation is equivalent to an annulment of the marriage, and therefore annuls the whole of the dower, as has been already explained but afterwards the half of the dower is established de novo in the manner of a Matat or present; and hence the said half is rendered due by the testimony of the witnesses.

Witnesses retracting their evidence to manumission are liable for the value of the slave.—If witnesses attest that a certain person had emancipated his slave, and afterwards retract their testimony, they are in that case responsible to the person in question for the value of the said slave, because of their

*This case supposes that the woman claims a stipulated dower, greater than her proper dower, and that the husband endeavours to resist her claim by evidence.
†That is, they are not to compensate for the difference.

having destroyed his property in the slave without any equivalent in return. — The right of Willa, moreover, without any connection to the slave, rests with that person and with the witnesses; because as the emancipation of the slave is not, on account of the responsibility, ascribed to their testimony, it follows that the Willa does not go to them.

Witneses retracting in a case of retaliation are liable to a fine, but not to retaliation. — If two witnesses bear evidence against a person, in a case of retaliation for murder, and then retract their testimony after the person has been put to death, they are in that case bound to pay Deeyat, or fine of blood, but are not to suffer death by way of retaliation. Shafei maintains that they are to suffer death; since they were the efficient cause of death, inasmuch as the retaliation was executed on the strength of their evidence: and they therefore resemble a Mokrih, or compeller (in other words, they compel); the commission of murder — nay, they are still more criminal than a Mokrih, inasmuch as the avenger of blood in a case of murder, is aided in bringing the murderer to justice; whereas a person under compulsion is prohibited, by the Law, from putting to death. — The reasoning of our doctors is that the witnesses, in this case, cannot be considered either as actual perpetrators, or as instrumental causes of the bloodshed; for nothing can be considered as a case except such a thing as presses upon, and joins to, the agent; and the testimony of the witnesses cannot be considered in this light, since, notwithstanding they furnish legal grounds for the retaliation, yet pardon and forgiveness being benevolent acts the probable consequence is that the avenger of blood will pardon the person against whom they bore evidence. It is otherwise in a case of compulsion; for the person compelled is induced to execute the murder with a view to save his own life, which the compeller threatens to take from him in case of his refusal; whereas, as in the case in question, there is no compulsion on the avenger of blood to execute the retaliation: on the contrary, he is at free liberty either to pardon the other, or to execute the retaliation: and where a man acts from free liberty, and not from any necessity, the cause of his actions cannot be ascribed to the witnesses; at least, it must be allowed that there is a doubt with respect to their being the cause; and the existence of a doubt is preventive of retaliation. The Deeyat, or fine of blood, however, takes place; because that is a matter of property, and, as such, may be established, notwithstanding any doubt which may happen to attend it.

Secondary witnesses retracting their attestation are responsible for the damage; but the primary witnesses are not responsible if they retract or disavow. — If secondary witnesses retract their evidence, they are responsible; since the construction of the defendant's property if referred to them, because of their giving evidence in the assembly of the Kazee. It on the other hand the primary witness retract, alleging that they had not authorized the secondary witnesses to attest their evidence they are not responsible, since they deny the evidence which occasioned the destruction of the property of the defendant. In this case, moreover, the decree of the Kazee, occasioned by this testimony is not rendered null, since the denial of the primary witnesses is susceptible of doubt (that is, it may either be false or true) and the decree of the Kazee cannot be reversed by a dubious circumstance; in the same manner as it cannot be reversed by the retraction of evidence, after it has passed on the strength of that evidence. — It is otherwise where the primary witnesses make the denial prior to the passing of a decree; because in that case the Kazee would not pass the decree on the strength of the evidence of the secondary witnesses. — If, however, the primary witnesses avow that they had authorized the evidence of the secondary witnesses; but that they had committed an error in so doing, they are in that case responsible for the loss that may have been occasioned. — This is according to Mohammed. — The two elders are of opinion that, even in this case, the primary witnesses do not become responsible; since the decree of the Kazee passed upon the evidence of the secondary witnesses, from the necessity under which the Kazeeites of proceeding on the proof before him, which in this case is the evidence of the secondary witnesses. — The reasoning of Mohammed is that the secondary witnesses do only repeat the evidence of the principals; and hence it becomes in effect the same if the principal witnesses were themselves present.

Case of retraction by both primary and secondary witnesses: — If both the primary and the secondary witnesses retract their evidence, the two Elders are in that case of opinion that compensation is due only by the secondary witnesses, because of the decree having passed on their evidence. Mohammed, on the contrary, is of opinion, that the defendant has the option of taking the compensation either from the principal or the secondary witnesses; because (according to the doctrine of the two disciples) the decree passed on the evidence of the secondary witnesses; or (according to his own doctrine) it passes on the evidence of the principals; and hence the defendant has the option of taking the compensation from whomsoever of the two he pleases; but as originality and dependency are of different natures, it is not permitted to unite both the principals and the secondaries in the payment of the compensation, that is to say, the defendant cannot take it from both.

The secondary witnesses asserting the falsehood of the primary witnesses is of no effect.—If, in the above case, the secondary witnesses assert that the primary witnesses had either been guilty of falsehood, or had committed an error in their evidence, the Kazee must not attend to this assertion, because his decree; as having passed and issued, cannot be affected by any assertion of theirs. And in this case the secondary witnesses are not liable to any compensation, since they have not retracted their own evidence, but have merely repeated the evidence of the principal witnesses; notwithstanding they had retracted it.

Purgators receding from their justification are responsible.—If purgators recede from their justification, they become responsible, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples are of opinion that they do not become responsible, because they have merely performed a generous action in behalf of the witnesses, and therefore resemble witnesses who hear evidence to the marriage of a person accused of whoredom,* and who, in case of retracting their evidence after the stoning of the person to whom it related, do not become responsible for the fine of blood. The reasoning of Haneefa is that justification is the cause of credit given to witnesses, inasmuch as the Kazee proceeds not upon the evidence itself, but upon the justification of it.—Hence the justification is, in effect, the moving cause of the decree.—It is otherwise with witnesses to the marriage of a person accused of whoredom, because in that instance the circumstance of the accused being a married person is particularly essential to induce lapidation.

Case of retraction in suspended manumission or divorce.—If two witnesses give evidence of a Yameen (or suspension on a condition) of divorce or emancipation, and two other witnesses give evidence that the condition had taken place, and both parties afterwards retract their evidence, compensation is in that case due only by the witnesses who attested the deed of Yameen, which is the cause of the damage, and not by those who attested the occurrence of the event on which the divorce or emancipation was suspended, because the decree of the Kazee proceeded on the evidence to the deed, and not on the evidence to the condition.—If only the witnesses to the occurrence of the condition retract, there exists in that case a difference of opinion amongst the Haneefite doctors. It is to be observed that by the divorce here mentioned is to be understood divorce before consummation; for in a case of divorce subsequent to consummation neither party of the witnesses are liable to make compensation, because the wife's right to her dower is established by the consummation.*

OF AGENCY

Chap. I.—Introductory.
Chap. II.—Of Agency for Purchase and Sale.
Chap. III.—Of the Appointment of Agents for Litigation, and for Scisin.
Chap. IV.—Of the Dismission of Agents.

CHAPTER I.

A person may lawfully appoint another his Agent, to act on his behalf, in contracts.—It is lawful for a person to appoint another his agent, for the settlement in his behalf of every contract which he might have lawfully concluded himself, such as as sale, marriage, and so forth; because, as an individual is sometimes prevented from acting in his own person, in consequence of accidental circumstances (such as sickness, or the like), he is therefore admitted, of necessity, to appoint another his agent, in order that that person may expedite his wants by means of the powers which he derives from such appointment. It is, moreover, related in the Naki Saheeh, that the Prophet appointed Hakeem-Bin-Khiram his agent for purchase, in order that he might buy for him a camel to sacrifice;—and likewise, that he appointed Amir-Bin-Aum his agent for marriage, that he might conclude a marriage betwixt his mother and the Prophet.
And for the management of suits, or criminal prosecutions; or for the payment or exaction of all rights except retaliation or punishment.—It is lawful for a person to appoint another his agent for the management of a suit relative to any rights whatever (even to corporal punishment or retaliation), for the reasons already alleged; and also, because every person is not himself capable of managing a business of this nature.—It is moreover recorded, in the Nakl Saheeh, that Alee appointed Akeel his agent for the management of his suits, and that when Akeel became old he dismissed him, and appointed Abdoola Bin-Jafir. In the same manner, also it is lawful to appoint an agent for the payment of rights, or the exaction of them: excepting, however, in cases of punishment or retaliation, the appointment of an agent in which (as an agent were appointed to exact those in the absence of his principal) is invalid; because punishment or retaliation are remitted in the existence of a doubt; and the absence of the principal creates a doubt; namely, the forgiveness of the prosecutor is probable in such a circumstance, for this reason, that it is praiseworthy and laudable to pardon contrary to where the witnesses only are absent [from the execution], as their non-retraction is most probable; and contrary, also, to where the prosecutor is present, as in this case there is no apprehension of his having forgiven.

Objection.—In case of the presence of the principal, what necessity exists for the appointment of an agent?

Reply.—Even in such case there may be a necessity for the appointment of an agent; because, as every person is not perfectly acquainted with the mode of exacting those rights, it follows that if the principal were debarred from the appointment of an agent, the door of exacting might be altogether closed.

In what is here advanced is according to Haneefa.—Aboo Yoosaf alleges that the agency for the establishment of corporal punishment or retaliation* (as if the agent should produce the witnesses) is not lawful. The opinion of Mohamed coincides with that of Haneefa. Some, however, maintain that he agrees with Aboo Yoosaf. Others, again, say that this disagreement subsists only in case of the absence of the constituent, and not in case of his presence: for, in this case, the agency is legal according to all; because the words of an agent in the presence of his constituent refer entirely to the latter. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf upon this point is, the appointment of an agent is the appointment of a deputy, in which there is always room for doubt respecting the deputation: and as, in criminal prosecutions, every doubt must be avoided, it follows that the appointment of an agent for prosecution is invalid, in the same manner as for the exaction of punishment; and that it cannot be admitted; in the same manner as evidence to evidence, respecting the prosecution, is not admitted.—The argument of Haneefa is that prosecution is merely a condition of the exaction of the right; because the necessity of the punishment is founded, not upon the prosecution, but upon the criminality, which is rendered manifest by the evidence of the witnesses: and hence agency is admitted in this case, in the same manner as in that of other rights. A similar disagreement subsists with respect to the case of a man against whom an action inducing corporal punishment or retaliation lies, and who appoints an agent for the management of his defence.

A person under accusation may employ an agent to conduct his defence.—The doctrine of Haneefa, however, is referred in this instance, because the agent may make replies and rejoinders; and the doubt with respect to deputation (as before mentioned) does not prevent this. If, however, the agent should make a confession, it is not to be admitted against his constituent, because there exists a doubt of his having been authorized by his constituent to make such confession.

An agent cannot be appointed to manage a suit unless the constituent be sick, or absent. —It is not lawful, according to Haneefa, to appoint an agent for the management of a case, unless with the consent of the adversary, excepting where the constituent is sick or distant three day's journey, or further, from the place. The two disciples maintain that such agency is lawful without the consent of the adversary; and Shafeei is also of the same opinion. This disagreement does not relate to the legality of the agency itself, but to the necessity which operates upon the adversary to answer an agent to whose appointment he has not assented; Aboo Haneefa being of opinion that it is not under such necessity: and the two disciples thinking otherwise. The argument of the two disciples is that the appointment of an agent is the act of an individual in regard to a right purely his own; and therefore ought not to depend on the consent of another in the present instance, any more than in a case of exacting payment of debt—Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the constituent is himself under the necessity of giving an answer, and must attend in case the magistrate should summon him: now individuals differ with respect to their capacity of managing suits; if therefore, it were admitted that the appointment of an agent is absolute with respect to the adversary, this would be injurious to the adversary; hence the validity of the appointment must be suspended on his consent:—in the same manner as where a partnership slave is made a Mokatib by one of the partners, in which case it remains with the other partner to confirm the contract of Kitabit, or to break it as he pleases; for, although the act of the first proprietor related purely to his own property, yet as the carrying of it into execution must have injured the right of the other, the validity of it is therefore suspended on his consent; and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise where the person is sick or absent, for in this case his appointment of an agent is valid without the consent of the adversary, since he cannot himself be compelled to appear under such circumstances.

Or about to travel. — It is to be observed that in the same manner as Haneefa holds the appointment, in this particular, of an agent by an absent person to be valid, so also does he hold the appointment by one who is immediately about to travel.

A woman may appoint an agent for litigation in all cases. — A woman who remains in privacy, and is not accustomed to go to the court of the Kazee, ought (according to Aboo Bekir) to appoint an agent for the management of her cause; and acquiescence is incumbent on her adversary. This doctrine has been adopted by our modern lawyers; and decrees are passed accordingly.

Agency to be valid, must proceed from a competent constituent. — The validity of agency, in any business, rests upon two conditions: — First, that the constituent be himself legally empowered to perform the business for the execution of which he has appointed another (for, as the agent derives his competency from the constituent, it is necessary that the constituent should himself be competent, before he confer the capacity on another)

And must be vested in a person of understanding. — Secondly, that the agent be of sound understanding, in such a degree as may enable him to know and execute the business to which he has been appoinited. If, therefore, a person appoint a child or an idiot his agent, it is invalid; whereas, if a freeman, who is adult and of sound judgment, appoint his fellow* his agent, or if a privileged slave appoint his fellow his agent, it is valid.

A Mahjoor slave, or an infant (capable of understanding) may be appointed an agent — If a person appoint an infant who understands purchase and sale, or a Mahjoor (or inhibited) slave, to be his agent, it is in either case valid. The rights of the contract, however, do not appertain to them but to their constituent. The reason of the validity of the appointment is that the infant is capable of explanation; and therefore his act is held to be valid, when done with the permission of his guardian; — and the slave is capable of acting, and is the master of his actions when they relate to himself, though not if they relate to his master; but agency for another does not relate to his master the appointment of the infant or slave, therefore, is valid.

But the obligations they enter into are not binding upon them, but upon their constituent. — They are neither of them, however, capable of performing the obligations of the contract: — the infant, because of his want of competency; and the slave, because it would interfere with the rights of the master; — the performance of the contract, therefore, rests with the constituent. — It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that if an infant, or a slave, as above described, should make a sale, and the purchaser, being ignorant of their situation, should afterwards be informed of it, in that case it is in his option to annul the contract, because having concluded the bargain on a supposition that they were competent to fulfil the rights of it, and being afterwards informed that the rights of the contract did not rest with them, he becomes of consequence entitled to annul it in the same manner as if he discovered a defect in the subject of it.

Contracts concluded by agents are either such as the agent refers to himself. — The contracts concluded by agents are of two kinds: — First, such as the agent refers to himself; and which do not depend, in any degree, on the constituent; as in the cases of sale or hire, which relate to the agent and not to the constituent. — Shafei maintains that the rights of sale appertain to the constituent; because the rights of a contract of sale are dependants of the effects of it; and as the effect namely, right of property, appertains to the constituent; so in the same manner its dependant also appertains to him; an agent for sale, therefore, is the same as a messenger, or an agent for marriage. — The arguments of our doctors are that an agent is the contracting party, both in reality and in effect; — in reality, because the contract is formed by speech, and the speech of the agent is authentic, because he is a man; and in effect, because, being himself competent, there is no necessity for the reference of the rights of the contract to the constituent; whereas, if he were merely a messenger, he would not be exempt from the necessity of referring the rights of the contract to the constituent, as is the case with a messenger. — Now since such is the nature of agency, it follows that an agent is considered as a principal in regard to the rights of the contract; and hence Kadooree, in the treatise which bears his name, says "an agent for sale delivers the goods and takes possession of the purchase-money, and is liable to be sued for any defect in the subject of the sale;" — and, on the other hand, "an agent for purchase receives the goods, and delivers the price, and may sue the seller for any defect in the goods;" — because all these are considered as the rights of sale. The constituent, moreover, is the proprietor of the thing purchased through his agent, abintio in the same manner as when a slave accepts

a gift, or catches game, or gathers fire-wood; in all which cases the master is proprietor of the gift, of the game, or of the fire-wood abivitio; that is to say, the property is not held first to rest in the slave, and then to shift to him. This doctrine of the primary proprietor of the right of property in the constituent is approved,—contrary to Koorkheee, who maintains that, in consequence of the purchase, the right of property rests originally in the agent, and from him shifted to the constituent.

Or to his constituent. Secondly, such as the agent reverts the performance to of his constituent, and in which he has an immediate interest; such as marriage, Khoola; or composition for wifeful murder; in all which cases, the rights appertain to the constituent and not to the agent. Hence no demand can be made on the husband's agent for the dower; nor can the wife's agent be required to deliver over the dower to her husband; for in these cases the agent is a mere messenger, and is not exempt from the necessity of referring the performance to his constituent: for if the agent, in the case of marriage, were to refer the performance to himself, it would become his marriage, and not that of the constituent (whence the necessity for considering him as a mere messenger).—The reason of this is, that as none of these contracts are of a nature to a limit of the agent first acting in them as a principal, then he is obliged to refer them to the constituent, and to act himself as a mere messenger.—Manumission for a compensation, contracts of Kitabat, and composition after denial, are all of the second class. With regard to composition after acknowledgment, it is of the first class, as partaking of the nature of sale. An agent for the delivery of a gift, or of charity, or for the restitution of a deposit, as being a mere announcer, is the same as a messenger.

The case is also the same with regard to an agent for the execution of loans or pledges; because the effect of these (namely, the right of property) is established by means of the seisin of the thing given or bestowed in charity, and so on; and as the thing, in these cases, belonged to the constituent and shifts to the donee or the other in consequence of the seisin, the agent, being as it were a mere stranger to the thing, cannot be considered as a principal, but must be regarded merely as an explainer or a messenger. It is otherwise in sale, because the effect of sale is established by speech, and the agent is the speaker. In the same manner, also, as an agent in the above cases of executing gifts, &c., is a mere messenger, so is an agent appointed by the petitioner (or person to whom the gift, the charity, &c., is given). The case is the same with the respect to an agent for a contract of co-partnership or Mozaribat.

An agent cannot be appointed to receive a loan. With respect to an agent for the receipt of a loan, the appointment is null; inasmuch that, if a person, in virtue of such appointment, should receive a loan, and take possession of it, he; and not the constituent, would be the proprietor of it. It is otherwise with respect to a messenger; for the receipt of a loan by a messenger is lawful.

A debt contracted to an agent cannot be exacted by his constituent. If a constituent, in the case of having sold goods through his agent, should demand payment of the price from the purchaser, the purchaser may lawfully refuse to comply; because, with respect to the contract or its rights, the constituent is as a stranger, since the rights of the contract appertain to the contracting party.

But if payment be made to the constituent, it is valid. If, however, the purchaser pay the price to the constituent, it is lawful; nor is the agent afterwards entitled to demand it from him, since he has paid it to the constituent, to whom it of right belonged: but if the agent persist in demanding it from him, then let him take it back from the constituent and pay it to the agent, and let the agent give it to the constituent; a mode in which there is evidently no advantage to any.

And the debtor may (in his payment) deduct a debt owing him by the constituent. If is to be observed that as the right belongs to the constituent, the purchaser may, in case of the constituent being behind in his payment to him, deduct the debt from the price. If, however the constituent and agent be both indebted to him, he is only entitled to deduct from the price the debt of the constituent.

Or by the agent (when he alone is indebted to him). If, on the other hand, the agent only be indebted to him, he is at liberty (according to Haneela and Mohammed) to deduct it from the price; because the agent (as they hold) may, if he please exempt the purchaser entirely from the payment. In either case, however (that is, whether the purchaser makes a deduction on account of the debt due by the agent, or whether the agent exempt him entirely), the agent is responsible for the whole to his constituent.

CHAPTER II.

OF AGENCY FOR PURCHASE AND SALE.

Section I.

Of Agency for Purchase.

An agent must be properly instructed with respect to what he is to purchase. When a person appoints another his agent for purchasing some indefinite thing, it is necessary that he explain the kind and quality of the thing or the kind and price of it; in order that the agent may know the nature of the act for which he has been appointed, and hence become capable of executing it.

Except where his powers are general. If, however, a person appoint another in abso-
An agency is invalid where the terms in which it is expressed leave a great degree of uncertainty with respect to the subject of it.

If the constituent, in the appointment of his agent, should use a word applicable to a variety of general kinds—on a word which serves to express a variety of meanings, such as Dar,—in this case the appointment of agency is invalid, even although the constituent may have specified the amount of the price; for articles of each kind may be purchased for the same price; and it is not known which kind the constituent wishes. Hence the agency in this case, on account of the great degree of uncertainty, becomes impracticable. If, also the word used be applicable to a variety of species, the agency is invalid, unless the constituent specifies the price or defines the species, though he should not mention the goodness or badness of the quality. If, however, he specify the price, or define the quality, the agency is valid, because the specification of the price leads to a knowledge of the species; and the mention of the species leaves only the uncertainty of the quality, which is considered a degree of uncertainty so trifling as not to prevent the execution of the agency. Thus, if a person constitute another his agent for the purchase of "a slave, whether male or female," the agency is invalid, because "a slave whether male or female," applies to a variety of species. If, however, he explain the particular species (such as Turkish, Abyssinian, Indian, or of a mixed decent) the appointment is valid.—In the same manner, also, the appointment is valid where the price only is specified, because in that case (as was before explained) a small degree only of uncertainty remains. It is recorded in the Juma Sagheer, that if a person desire another to purchase for him cloth, or an animal, or a house, the agency is invalid, because of the great degree of uncertainty; as the term daba (for instance) means every animal that moves on the face of the earth, although in common acceptance, it signify either a horse, an ass, or a mule;—in the same manner, cloth is a generic term, applicable to a variety of species from the finest silks to the coarsest sheet of cotton; and the term house is applied to things which (with respect to species) are conspicuously different from each other, from a variety of causes, such as neighbourhood, the abundance or paucity of rights and privileges, or the situation in particular lanes or cities; from the great uncertainty in all these cases, therefore, the agency is invalid.

Unless in case of subsequent explanation.

—But it becomes valid in case of an explanation of the price of the house, or the species of the cloth or animal.

A power to purchase taam meal is restricted to the purchase of wheat or flour.

If a person give another a hundred dirmas, and say to him "buy for me, with these dirmas, food," in that case the word food is construed to mean wheat, or the flour of wheat, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest the meaning to be any kind of food whatever; according to the real import of the word.—The reason for a more favourable construction, in this particular, is that the word taam [food], when used in purchase and sale, means (according to general custom), wheat and the flour of it; and as general custom must be preferred to mere analogy, the law, for that reason, in all cases of purchase and sale construes the word taam [food] to mean wheat, or the flour of wheat. Some have said that if the contract be in this case, give many dirmas (ten, for instance), then the word food is construed to mean wheat: if, on the other hand, he give a few dirmas (three, for instance) it is construed to mean bread made of wheat; and if a middle number (such as seven), it is construed to mean the flour of wheat.

An agent may return goods purchased by him to the seller on account of a defect.

If an agent, after purchase, discover a defect in the goods, he may then return them to the seller; because the rejection of the subject of sale, or acceptance of the rights of a contract of sale; and the agent, as being one of the contracting parties, is entitled to all the rights of the contract.

But not after having delivered them to his constituent.

—This, however, is only where the agent has not delivered over the goods to his constituent; for, after that, he cannot return it to the seller unless by permission of the constituent; because, after delivering the goods bought to his constituent, his agency ceases; and also, because, if he were then permitted to return the goods to the seller without the consent of the constituent, the seisin made by the agent in his own behalf would be set at nought.

A right of pre-emption may be enforced against an agent before delivery to his constituent: but not afterwards. (It is to be observed that as, previous to the delivery of the goods to the constituent, the rights of the contract rest with the agent, and cease anl expire after the delivery, it follows that if a person claim his right of Shaffa* in a house purchased by an agent, he has a right to sue the agent previously to the delivery, of the house to his constituent; but after the delivery no action would lie against the agent.

Agency in Sif or Sillim is valid.—If a person appoint an agent to execute a contract of Sif or Sillim it is valid; because the constituent being himself competent to these contracts may lawfully (on the principles already explained) empower another to execute them on his behalf. It is to be observed, however, that the Sillim here mentioned means a purchase by way of Sillim (or advance), and not a sale by that mode; because, if a sale of that nature were allowed by agency, it would necessarily follow that the agent must himself become liable for a particular article in lieu of a price which he has not received—It is likewise to be observed that if, in either of these cases (that is, either the contract of Sillim or Sif), the agent (who is the buyer) be separated from the seller, previous to his seisin of the goods, in the case of Sillim, or, to the mutual seisin of the article of exchange in the case of Sif,—the contract becomes null; because the agent being a party; his separation from the other party previous to the seisin is the cause of annulment of both contracts (contrary to where the constituent is separated from the seller before the seisin; because not being himself a party, his separation is of no consequence).—Since, therefore, the agent is a party, it follows that his seisin and delivery are valid, although he be one to whom the rights of a contract cannot appertain (such as an infant or an inhibited slave). It is different with regard to a messenger in a contract of Sillim or Sif: for his seisin is not valid, as his function relates to the contract and not the seisin; because a messenger merely delivers the speech of his employer to another; and seisin is no way connected with speech. Moreover, a speech delivered by a messenger refers itself to the dictator of the message; a messenger, therefore, not considered as a party; and hence his seisin, as being the seisin of a stranger, is not valid.

An agent, paying for goods which his own money, is entitled to repayment for his constituent. If an agent for purchase pay the price of the goods from his own property, and obtain possession of them, he is entitled to repayment from his constituent, for two reasons. First, he stands as a seller, and the constituent as a purchaser; because a virtual exchange is established between them, hence it is that if an agent and his constituent disagree, with respect to the price, an oath is tendered to both, as holds in all mutual exchanges of property for property; and the constituent may also return the thing purchased to the agent, on account of any defect:—when, therefore, the thing purchased is duly delivered to the constituent by the agent, the agent is entitled to take from him the price he may have given for it. Second, if the rights of the contract appertain to the agent, and as the constituent is informed of this, it follows that he takes the consent to the agent's payment of the price from his own property. If, therefore, the goods be lost in the hands of the agent, and he should not previously have made a detention in his own behalf of those goods from his constituent, the loss in that case falls upon the constituent, and he becomes liable for the price to the agent; because the seisin of the agent, so long as he makes no formal detention of the purchase from his constituent, stands as the seisin of the constituent; and therefore he is held to have been virtually possessed of the goods whilst the loss took place.

An agent may detain from his constituent what he purchases, until he be paid the price. An agent is entitled to detain from his constituent any purchase he may have made on his account, until he be paid the price by him, according to what was before said, that the agent stands as the seller, and the constituent as the purchaser. Ziffer maintains that the agent is not entitled to detain the purchase, as the constituent has already made seisin of it; because, as the seisin of the agent is, virtually, the seisin of the constituent, it is consequently the same as if the agent had actually delivered them over to him: the agent's right of detention, therefore (in satisfaction of his claim to payment of the price), ceases, in the same manner as in case of his actual delivery of them. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the delivery of the goods to the constituent (on the principle of the seisin of the agent being the seisin of the constituent) is a matter of necessity; but, does not appertain to the part of the agent to the relinquishment of his right of detention. The seisin of the agent, moreover, is not the actual seisin of the constituent; but is rather suspended. If therefore the agent should not detain the goods from his constituent, his seisin stands as the seisin of his constituent; but if he detain them, his seisin is then considered as on his own behalf.

But, if the purchase perish in the agent's hand during such detention, he is responsible. If, in the case before stated, the agent detain the purchase from his constituent, and it perish in his hands, he is answerable, according to Aboo Yoosaf, in the same manner as for a pledge. Mohammed is of opinion that he is answerable in the same degree as when goods, the subject of a sale, decay, or lost, in the hands of the seller, in which case the responsibility is for the price, not for the value; — that is, the purchaser is exempted from the payment of the price; — and such is also the doctrine of Haneefa — Ziffer, on the contrary, is of opinion, that responsibility attaches in the same degree as in a case of usurpation: * as the detention has been made without any right. — The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the agent stands as the seller of the article in question to the constituent, and detains it from him in order that he may exact payment for it; and consequently that the constituent stands acquitted of the price on the decay or destruction of the article in the hands of the agent. — The reasoning of Aboo Yoosaf, is that the thing in question, in the hands of the agent, was not at first a subject of responsibility, but became so in consequence of detention with a view to satisfaction for the price; and the same is the actual property of a pledge: — contrary to a purchase; as that is a subject of responsibility in the hands of the seller from the first and not because of detention for the price. A contract of sale, moreover, is cancelled in consequence of the loss of the subject of it; but in the case in question, the original contract between the agent and seller is not annulled. — Haneefa and Mohammed, however, maintain that though the original contract of sale be not annulled, yet the contract which virtually subsists between the agent and constituent is annulled, in the same manner as if the constituent were to return the goods to the agent on the discovery of a defect.

Case of an agent purchasing, at the rate of his instruction, a larger quantity of an article than was specified in the instruction. — If a person appoint another his agent for the purchase of ten ratis of flesh for one dirm, and the agent purchase twenty rats, for one dirm, of that kind of flesh which is sold at the rate of ten rats for one dirm; in that case (according to Haneefa) it is incumbent on the constituent to take only ten rats for half a dirm. The two disciples maintain that it is incumbent on him to take the twenty rats for one dirm. In some copies of Kadooree it is written that Mohammed coincides in opinion with Haneefa, and that his doctrine in the Mabsoot is not incompatibl with it, he having only observed there, that "the constituent ought to take ten rats for a half dirm." — The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that the constituent ordered the agent to expend his dirm in the purchase of flesh, under a concepcion of the price being at the rate of ten rats per dirm: when, therefore, the agent purchased twenty rats for the dirm, as he appears to purchase them on account of his constituent, he is consequently entitled to take the whole; in the same manner as where a person empowers another to sell his slave for a thousand dirms, and the agent obtains two thousand; in which case the constituent is entitled to the whole of the sum so obtained. — The argument of Haneefa is that the constituent having expressly enjoined the purchase of ten rats, it follows that the excess must be considered as having been purchased by the agent on account of himself; and for which he must accordingly pay the price; — contrary to where an agent, being empowered to sell a slave for a thousand dirms, obtains two thousand for him; because, in this case, the excess being in exchange for the property of the constituent, is consequently his right.

— If however, the agent, were to purchase for one dirm twenty rats of flesh of that kind which is sold at the rate of twenty rats per dirm, the purchase (in the opinion of all our doctors) is made by the agent for himself; because the object of the constituent was evidently fat meat, and that object has not been here obtained. An agent cannot purchase for himself any specific article which he is directed to purchase for his constituent. — If a person appoint another his agent to purchase for him some specific article, in that case the agent is not entitled to purchase the article for himself; because that is a breach of the trust reposed in him by his constituent; and also, because it is a dismission of himself from his appointment, which he is not (in the opinion of some) empowered to do, unless in the presence of his constituent.

Unless he purchase it for something of a different nature from the price specified. — If, however, the constituent should have specified the price of the article, and the agent purchase it for a price of a different species from that mentioned by the constituent; or if the constituent not having specified the price, the agent purchase the article, not for dirms, but for something estimable by weight or measurement of capacity.

Or through the mediation of another agent. — Or, lastly, if the agent appoint another agent, and that secondary agent purchase the article in the absence of the primary agent; in all these cases the purchase is held to have been made on behalf of the agent himself, and not of his constituent, because of the deviation from his constituent's orders. — If, on the other hand, the secondary agent conclude the bargain in the presence of the primary agent, the purchase is in that case considered as made for the constituent, because the wisdom and judgment of the primary agent is held (in consequence of his presence) to have been exerted; and hence there is no deviation from the orders of his constituent.

Case of agency in the purchase of an indefinite slave. — If a person appoint another to purchase for him an indefinite slave, and the agent accordingly purchase a slave: in tha

†A rati is about one pound, Troy weight, case the slave belongs to the agent himself, unless he declare, "I intended the purchase for my constituent," or unless he make the purchase with the constituent's property.—The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this case may occur in various shapes.

Which admits of four descriptions—

First, where the agent refers the contract to his constituent's money, as if he should say, "with this thousand dirms (meaning those of his constituent) I have purchased this slave;" in which case the slave goes to the constituent. (This is the case which is meant by the above expression, "or unless he make the purchase with the constituent's property;" for that does not mean "that he shall first make the purchase for a thousand dirms, or generally; and then pay it from the property of his constituent." Secondly, where the agent refers the contract to his own money; in which case the slave, for evident reasons, belongs to the agent himself, since he has referred the contract to his own property. Thirdly, where the agent refers to money in general; in which case the purchase is made either for himself or his constituent, as he may have resolved in his mind at the time; because the agent, in a case of the present description, is at full liberty either to make the purchase for himself, or for his constituent. If, therefore, the agent and constituent disagree (the agent asserting that he intended it as a purchase for himself, and the constituent declaring that he intended it for him), then the payment of the price must determine; that is, the slave is adjudged to him from whose property the price is paid. If, on the other hand, it be admitted by both that no resolution was formed, Mohammed alleges the slave, in this case, to be the property of the agent; because of his being the contracting party, and also, because of the probability there is that every one acts for himself, unless where it can be proved to the contrary, which the case in question does not admit of.

Aboo Yousaaf is also of opinion that the payment of the price ought to determine the right to the purchase; because it serves as a criterion to determine the action of the agent, which otherwise admits of two suppositions; and also, because, if the purchase were to be considered as made on account of the agent, notwithstanding his having paid the price from the property of the constituent, it would follow that the agent is an usurper. This conclusion of Aboo Yousaaf, however (that the agent would, under these circumstances, be an usurper), does not necessarily follow: on the contrary, he cannot otherwise be considered than as in the case where the parties disagree with respect to the intention, which we have already explained.—It is to be observed that all the several modes here described apply equally to the appointment of an agent for the management of a contract of Sillim.

Case of dispute between the agent and constituent respecting a slave who, after being purchased by the agent, dies in his hands.—If a person appoint another to purchase for him a slave for a thousand dirms, and the agent afterwards inform him that "he had accordingly purchased for him a slave for a thousand dirms, but that the slave had died in his possession," and the constituent, on the other hand, assert that "he had purchased the said slave for himself and not for him;" in this case the assertion of the constituent, corroborated by an oath, must be credited.—This, however, proceeds on a supposition that the constituent had at previously delivered the said thousand dirms to his agent—"for if he should have given the thousand dirms, the declaration of the agent must be credited; because, in the former instance, the agent gives information of his performance of an act which he is not now capable of carrying into full execution (since he cannot purchase a slave who is dead), and his object is to get a thousand dirms from the constituent, who, on the other hand, denies his right; and the word of a defendant is creditable before that of a plaintiff: and, in the latter instance, the agent having delivered the price in his hands as a deposit, and his object being to obtain a release from his trust, his assertion is the reason credited.—If, however the slave be actually alive at the time of the disagreement, the declaration of the agent must be credited (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), whether the constituent have delivered the price or not; because the agent gives information of his having performed an act which he is capable at that instant of carrying fully into execution (since it is in his power to purchase this slave immediately), and hence his word is not liable to suspicion.

According to Haneefa, indeed, if the constituent should not have delivered the price, his assertion must be credited, as the agent is in the case liable to the suspicion of having first purchased the slave on account of himself, and asserting afterwards (on the discovery of a defect) that he has purchased him for his constituent. It is otherwise where he has already received the purchase-money, because then he is considered as a trustee of it, and his assertion is credited, as it tends to procure him a release from his trust; whereas, in the other case, he cannot be considered as a trustee, since the purchase-money is not in his possession.

In a case of dispute between an agent and constituent respecting the purchase of a specific slave, the declaration of the agent must be credited.—If a person desire his agent to purchase for him a specific slave, and they afterwards disagree during the life-time — the slave (the constituent asserting that the agent had purchased him for himself, and the agent declaring that he had purchased him for his constituent), in this case it is universally agreed that, whether the constituent may have delivered to him the price or not; as a matter of the agent must be credited; because the agent gives information of his performance of an act which he is at that moment capable of carrying fully into execution; and also, because he is not in this case liable to any suspicion, since an agent for the purchase of a specific thing cannot purchase that thing for himself in the absence of his constituent, for the reasons already explained; in opposition to the case of an indefinite thing (according to the doctrine of Haneef, as exhibited above).

An agent avowing his commission, cannot afterwards retract, unless the alleged constituent deny the commission. If one person say to another 'sell to me this slave in behalf of Omar, who is my constituent'; and the slave be accordingly sold, and the agent afterwards deny that he had been authorized to make the purchase by Omar, and Omar then appear, and assert that he had desired the said agent to purchase the said slave for him,—in this case Omar is entitled to take the slave, because the agent has himself acknowledged his agency on his behalf, and denial after acknowledgment is of no effect. On the other hand, if Omar should deny his having authorized the purchase, in that case he is not entitled to take the slave, because the acknowledgment of the agent is set aside by the denial of Omar. But if, under these circumstances, the purchaser should deliver the slave to Omar, it becomes then a contract of sale, for which the original purchaser is responsible, seeing that Omar has purchased it from him after the mode of Taata, that is by mutual gift, as when a person buys a thing for another without his authority and then delivers the said thing to that other. The doctrine of this case shows that the delivery of a slave for a sale, suffices to establish a sale by Taata or mutual gift, even although the giving and receiving of the price should not have taken place; and it also shows that a sale by Taata in things of great or little value is established by the mutual consent of the parties. This is the authentic doctrine in the case of such sales.

An agent is at liberty, if he choose, to purchase only one of two slaves specified. If a person commission another to purchase for him two specific slaves without mentioning the price, and the agent purchase one of them, it must be for the appointment of agency is valid, and does not restrict the agent to purchase both of the slaves by one contract, which is often impracticable, because of the objection of the proprietor to include them both in one contract. The agent may therefore lawfully purchase one out of two slaves, unless when he does it by deceit, as his agency authorizes him only to make a just purchase, which precludes him from making a deceitful one. The doctrine in this case is universally agreed to.

If a person desire another to purchase him two particular slaves without mentioning the price, and the agent purchase one of these slaves, it is valid; because the appointment of the agent, in this instance, is general (in other words, does not restrict the agency to the purchase of both slaves by one contract); and it seldom happens that two slaves are purchase by one contract, as a master seldom sells two slaves by one contract.

But not if the purchase be at an evident disadvantage. It is lawful for the agent, therefore, to purchase one of the two (unless, indeed, the purchase be made at an evident disadvantage, which would be contrary to the end of the appointment).

Nor if the price exceed the rate expressed in his instructions; unless the difference be trifling. If a person desire another to purchase him two specific slaves (who are supposed to be equal value) for one thousand dirms, and the agent purchase one of these slaves for five hundred dirms or less, it is valid, according to Haneef: If, however, he should purchase him for more than five hundred dirms, the contract is not binding on his constituent. The reason of this is that the constituent having opposed one thousand dirms to the two slaves, who are equal in value, did of consequence intend that the agent should pay five hundred dirms for each. The agent, therefore, in paying five hundred dirms, conforms exactly to the orders of his constituent; and although, in paying less for him, he does deviate from his orders, yet this being a laudable deviation, in favour of his employer, is therefore binding. In purchasing him, on the other hand, for more than five hundred dirms, whether the excess be great or small, he is guilty of a deviation from his orders unfavourable to the interest of his employer, and which is therefore not allowed; unless, indeed, the agent purchased all the slave for the sum remaining to complete the thousand dirms; before any litigation happen between him and his constituent, for the former purchase. What is here advanced proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that the contract, in this case, ought not to be binding on the constituent, because of the deviation from his orders.

The reason for a more favourable construction in this particular, is that the purchase of the two slaves for one thousand dirms (which is the express object of the constituent) has been obtained; and that the limitation of their prices to five hundred each, in an equal manner, is only an implied object, since it requires to be established by reason; and an express object is always preferred to an implied one. The two disciples maintain that if, in the case in question, the agent should have purchased one of the two slaves for more than five hundred dirms, by a contract disadvantageous only in a small degree (which cannot always be avoided), and the most part of the other slave, it is valid; because the agency is absolute (that is to say, not restricted to the payment of five hundred dirms for one slave), although it is restricted to a just and proper contract, which in question may be considered, as the disadvantage attending it is not great and obvious.—It is, however, absolutely necessary that the sum remaining suffic to purchase the other slave, in order that the object of the constituent (namely, the purchase of both for one thousand dirms) be obtained.

An agent may liquidate a debt due from him to his constituents by the purchase of a specific article.—If a person desire another, who owes him one thousand dirms, to purchase with it a specific slave, and the agent accords, it is lawful; because a specification of the subject of sale amounts to a specification of the seller; and as a specification of the seller would have been lawful (for reasons which will hereafter appear), so in the same manner the specification of the subject is also lawful.

But if the article be not specified and perish, after purchase, in the agent's hands, the debt is not liquidated.—If a person desire another, who is indebted to him one thousand dirms, to purchase with it an indefinite slave; and the debtor accordingly purchase a slave, and the slave die before the delivery of him to the constituent; in that case the slave is held to have been the property of the agent—if, on the other hand, he die after delivery to the constituent; he is then held to have been the property of the constituent.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples allege that the property of the constituent commences on the instant of the agent obtaining possession of the slave.—A similar disagreement subsist with regard to the case of a creditor appointing his debtor to make a purchase with the debt, either by a contract of Sillim or Sirk.—The argument of the two disciples is that dirms and deenars, whether ready money or debt, are not specific when opposed to anything in a contract of exchange (whence it is that if a person were to sell a specific and existing article, in exchange for a debt, and both parties agree that the purchaser does not owe the seller any thing, yet the contract of sale is not rendered void): it is therefore, the same whether they be a specified or not;* and consequently the contract of the agent is binding on the constituent, because his seisin is equivalent to that of his constituent.—The argument of Haneefa is that dirms and deenars admit of specification in agency (whence it is that if a person restrict his agent to the purchase of something with one thousand specific dirms, or with a debt, and the specific dirms be lost in the agent's hands, or the debt become cancelled, the agency is null); and such being the case, it follows that in the appointment of an agent for the purchase of a slave, or for making a Sillim contract, the property of a debt is vested in a person, by another who is not indebted to him, without his being appointed an agent for the seisin of the said debt, which is unlawful; in the same manner as if a person should purchase a thing in exchange for a debt due to him by some other than the seller (as if be should say to the seller, "I have bought this thing from you in exchange for a debt owing to me by a certain person, an which you may take for the price"); in which case the sale would be invalid; and so also in the case in question.—In the appointment of an agent for managing a Sirk sale, on the other hand, it would follow that the constituent, before possession, commands the use of a thing of which he is not proprietor after possession (for he is not proprietor of the debt till after the receipt of it); and the application of the thing in question to a Sirk sale, before the seisin of it, is null;—in the same manner as if a person should say, "give what you owe me to whomsoever you please."—It is otherwise if the constituent specify the seller; because then the seller is his agent for the receipt of the debt, and consequently takes possession of the same in virtue of his agency, and then becomes the proprietor of it himself. It is otherwise, also, where a creditor desires his debtor to bestow the amount of his debt in charity, because here the creditor destines his property to God, who is a known and determinate object.—It is to be observed that as, in all these cases, the agency (according to Haneefa) is not valid, the purchase make under it is of force and binding with respect to the agent himself, as being the actual purchaser; and therefore, the subject of the sale should decay or be destroyed in his hands, he must sustain the loss: unless, however, the constituent should previously have received seisin of it; because, in that case, it would become his property, as a sale of the slave is in this instance established between the agent and constituent, by a sort of reciprocity.

Where an agent and constituent disagree respecting a purchase, a judgment must be given, according to the value.—If a person give another one thousand dirms, and desire him to purchase with it a female slave, and the agent accordingly purchase a female slave, and the parties then disagree,—the constituent asserting that he had purchased her for five hundred dirms, and the agent declaring that he had paid one thousand for her,—in this case the assertion of the agent is to be credited provided the value of the slave be estimated at one thousand dirms; because the price, according to Haneefa, 73:12

*This is to say, it is the same thing, whether the agent, at the time of purchase, declare that "the thousand dirms he pays for the slave are those thousand which he owes to his constituent," or not.
one thousand dirms, in which exact amount he is a trustee, he therefore, in this case, claims a release from his charge of trustee; whilst, on the other hand, the constituent claims compensation from him, which he denies. If, however, the value should be estimated only at five hundred dirms, then the assertion of the constituent is to be credited, because the agent departed from his orders in purchasing a female slave for five hundred dirms, when the constituent desired one for one thousand dirms; and is therefore responsible. — Supposing (on the other hand) the constituent not to have paid the one thousand dirms to the agent, and all the other circumstances of the case to remain as above mentioned, then also, if the value of the female slave be only five hundred dirms, the assertion of the constituent must be credited, because of the agent's deviation from his orders: but if the value be one thousand dirms, both parties must be required to make oath (because such is the law in a dispute about the price in a contract of sale; and here the constituent and the agent stand to each other in the relation of buyer and seller): — after which the contract of sale (which is supposed to exist between the agent and constituent) is dissolved, and the right of property in the slave becomes vested in the agent.

Or according to the declaration of the seller. — If a person desire another to purchase for him a specific slave, without mentioning the price, and the agent accordingly purchase the said slave, and they then disagree in regard to the price (the agent asserting that he had paid one thousand dirms, and the constituent asserting that he had only paid five hundred dirms), in this case, provided the seller authenticates the declaration of the agent, his assertion, corroborated by an oath, must be credited. — Some have said that an oath is not to be executed in this instance, since the doubt arising from the disagreement is removed by the verification of the seller: in opposition to the preceding case, where the seller is supposed to be absent. — Others, again, have said that in this case also an oath is requisite. Mohammed alleges that as, after the receipt of the price, the seller is, as, it were, a stranger to both the agent and the constituent, — and, even before the receipt of the price, is in the relation of a stranger to the constituent, — his assertion can have no effect in regard to a disagreement between the constituent and agent; and, consequently, that an oath is requisite. This is also the opinion of Aboo Mansoor; and it is the most authentic doctrine.

Section II.

Of the Appointment of Agents, by Slaves for the Purpose of Purchasing their own Persons in their own Behalf.*

A slave may employ a person to purchase

*That is, with a view to their emancipation.

his freedom from his master. — If a slave say to a person, "purchase me, in behalf of myself, from my master, for one thousand dirms" (at the same time delivering the one thousand dirms), and the said person accordingly purchase the slave, and in behalf of the slave, he [the slave] becomes free; and the right of Willa remains with the master, because the sale of the person of the slave to the slave himself is here interpreted in its metaphorical sense (that is, the liberation of the slave), as the interpretation of it in its literal sense (namely, the exchange of property for property) is here unattainable: the slave's purchase of his own person, moreover, is in fact an agreement on his part to accept his freedom in exchange for his property: and the agent stands merely as a messenger, because none of the rights of the contract rest in him: — the case is, therefore, the same as if the slave had purchased his own person: and as the sale of the slave is, in fact, an emancipation of him on the part of the master, he is therefore entitled to the right of Willa. If, however, the agent should not particularly say and explain to the master that he purchased the slave on behalf of the slave, but, on the contrary, simply say, "I have purchased a particular slave of yours," in that case the slave becomes the property of the purchaser; because these words, in their literal sense, are used to express an exchange of property for property, which is here practicable, and consequently followed: in opposition to the former statement of the case, where the literal meaning not was therefore adopted; and, as the other requisites required for property is here followed, the purchaser of consequence becomes the proprietor of the slave; and the one thousand dirms given to the master for the purchase of himself are the right of the master, as being the slave's earnings; and the purchaser must pay him another thousand dirms for the price. In short, in the case of a slave agent for a slave purchasing the said slave in his own behalf, it is necessary that he particularly explain the circumstances of the case; that is, that he expressly specify the purchase of the slave "to be made in behalf of the slave:" for otherwise the purchase is for himself, and not for the slave. It is otherwise where a person, who is not a slave, purchases, in the capacity of an agent, a specific slave; for it is not necessary that he should specify in whose behalf the purchase is made, since the contract of sale takes place, whether such an explanation be made or not; and in either case the seller demands the price from the agent, who is the contracting party. In the case in question, on the contrary, the explanation is material; for if it be not made, the transaction is a sale; or if it be made, it is an emancipation, with a reservation of the right of Willa; in which case the price is not demanded from the agent, notwithstanding he is the contracting party: it is, moreover, possible that the master may not be inclined to the emancipation, but may assent to the sale merely with a view to the exchange, in which case, also, explanation is indispensable.

A slave may act as the agent of another person in purchasing his own freedom—If a person say to a slave, "purchase your own person on my behalf from your master;" and the slave say to his master, "sell me, on account of a particular person, for this quantity of dins," and the master accordingly agree, in this case the slave becomes the property of the constituent; because a slave is capable of becoming an agent for the purchase of himself, since, with regard to the property involved in his person, he himself is as a stranger; and as he is property, a contract of sale operates with respect to him, although the seller (because of the property being in the hands of the slave himself) be not entitled to detain him from the constituent after the sale, as a satisfaction for the price: and as the slave is capable of agency, it follows that if, in the case in question, he refer the contract to his constituent, consequently because of its being in conformity to his orders; but if, instead of referring it to his constituent, he should refer it to himself, he then becomes free, because the contract is in that case an emancipation, to which the master agrees.

Objection.—The slave is, in this case, an agent for the purchase of a specific thing; but an agent for the purchase of a specific thing is not entitled to purchase that thing for himself.

Reply.—Although the slave, in this case, be an agent for the purchase of a specific thing, yet by purchasing, he in reality performs an act of a different nature from purchase,* and that act is therof allowed to be expedited in his behalf.

If, also the slave simply say to his master "sell me," without mentioning the particular person, he is free: because his speech being absolute, and admitting of two interpretations, is not applied in favour of the constituent, on account of the doubt which exists, and which consequently determines the transaction to be a contract in behalf of himself.

Section III.

Of Agency for Sale

An agent for sale cannot sell to his father or grandfather.—An agent for purchase or sale is not permitted, according to Haneefa, to enter into a contract of purchase or sale with a person whose evidence would not be admitted in his [the agent's] behalf, such as his father or grandfather. The two disciples allege that if an agent should sell a thing to any person whatever, standing in that relation to him (except his slave or his Mokatib), for an equivalent to the value of the subject of the sale, it is lawful; because agency is absolute; and an agent is not liable to suspicion from such a sale, since the property of those relations is distinct and separate from his property; and neither party is entitled to derive a benefit from the property of the other. It is otherwise where an agent sells a thing to his own slave, because that, in fact, is a sale to himself, as the possessions of a slave are the property of his master; and the right of a master extends to the earnings of his Mokatib, and becomes, in reality, his property in the event of the Mokatib's inability to discharge his ransom. The arguments of Haneefa upon this point are twofold. First, and transaction which begets suspicion must be excepted from agency; and the act of sale on the part of the agent, to persons under the above description, does beget suspicion, since they are excluded from giving evidence in his behalf. Secondly, a mutual right of usufruct and advantage subsists between the agent and such relations, since each is entitled to derive an advantage from the property of the other; the sale of any thing to them, therefore, is in manner a sale to himself. A similar disagreement subsists with respect to a contract of Sirf or of hire, under these circumstances.

He may sell the article committed to him at whatever rate, and in return for whatever commodity, he thinks fit. Whatever is appointed an agent for the sale of anything, may lawfully (according to Haneefa) sell that thing, either for a large, or small price, or in exchange for anything else, as well as for money. The two disciples maintain that it is neither lawful to sell the thing at a great and obvious disadvantage, nor for any thing but money, for the following reasons:

First, agency, although absolute, is yet restricted to the common customs of mankind; because as all transactions (such a purchase and sale, for instance), are for the purpose of removing or remedying a want, they are therefore restricted to the measure of that want (whence it is that agency for the purchase of a stove, or of ice, or of any animal destined for sacrifice, is restricted to the period in which those things are wanted); and the common practice among mankind is to sell a thing at an adequate value, and in this value (not in anything else, but) in money. Secondly, sale at a great and evident disadvantage is partly a sale and partly a gift; in the same manner, also, the sale of goods for other goods (which is termed Beea

*Namely, emancipation.

*Namely, his father and grandfather. (See Imbiyat.)
Mokasa, or barter) is sale in one shape, and purchase in another shape; — either of these, therefore, can be absolutely term a sale. The argument of Haneefa is that agency is absolute, and must therefore be permitted to operate in an absolute manner, provided it be not subject to suspicion. — The sale, moreover, of a thing at an evident disadvantage is a common practice when there is pressing occasion for the price; and, in the same manner, it is also common to sell goods in exchange for goods, when one of the proprietors loses all desire for his own goods. — With respect to the example of the sale of a stove, or of ice, or of an animal destined for sacrifice (as adduced by the two disciples in support of their opinion), the doctrine regarding them cannot be admitted, according to the tenets of Haneefa, since the contrary is related as an opinion of his upon those subjects. — Besides sale at an evident disadvantage is, nevertheless, wholly a sale, and in no respect a gift; whence it is that if a person were to make a vow, saying, "by God I will not sell such a thing," and afterwards dispose of it to an evident loss, he is forsworn.

Objection. — If sale at an evident disadvantage be still wholly a sale, it follows that a father or executor may sell the goods of a minor at a disadvantage. — How, therefore, does it happen that they are both barred from doing this?

Reply. — The reason is that their power is founded entirely upon their supposed regard for the interest of the minor; and the transaction in question being of a nature which argues a want of this regard, is consequently not permitted to them.

In regard to a sale of goods for goods, it is either completely a sale, or completely a purchase; and cannot be partly a sale, and partly a purchase, since the properties of sale exist completely in it, as well as the properties of a purchase.

An agent may purchase a thing at a rate not greatly exceeding the value. — An agent for purchase may lawfully buy a thing for a price equivalent to its value; and also for more than its value, provided the difference be not very considerable; but it is not lawful for him to purchase it at a rate much beyond the value, as this gives room for suspicion, since it is possible that he may have first purchased it for himself; and that afterwards, on perceiving the loss, he had determined it for his constituent. If, however, an agent be employed for the purchase of a specific thing, and purchase it for a price much beyond its value, lawyers have observed that the bargain is nevertheless made for the benefit of the agent, and not for the purchase of a specific thing, as not being allowed to purchase that thing for himself, is not, of consequence, liable to suspicion. — In the same manner, also, if an agent for marriage should contract a woman in marriage to his constituent, engaging for a dower beyond her Mihir Misl or proper dower, it is lawful, according to Haneefa; because, in marriage, as the agent must necessarily refer the contract to his constituent, he is, therefore, not liable to suspicion; but it is otherwise with an agent for purchase, as he may, if he please, settle the contract in an absolute manner without referring it to his constituent. — The term evident disadvantage, as here used, signifies a rate beyond the valuation of appraisers, — as where, for instance, if several persons make an appraisement of a thing, none of their appraisements equal the price given. — Some have said that this term is used in the exchange of goods for goods, where the difference is as ten to ten and an half; and in cattle, where it is as ten to eleven, and in immovable property, where it is as ten to twelve. The reason of these proportions is that the sale of the first kind is common; of the second kind the sale is in a man between frequency and rarity; and of the third, it is rare: — and the disadvantage increases in proportion to the rarity of the transaction.

An agent for the sale of a slave may lawfully sell any part or portion of him. — If a person, being appointed an agent for the sale of a slave, should sell the half of him, such sale is valid, according to Haneefa, because the agency is in this instance absolute, and does not restrict the sale either to one or more contracts; and as it would have been valid, under such circumstances, if he had sold him wholly for half of the price, it follows that it is valid where he sells the half for half of the price, a fortiori. — The two disciples allege that the sale of the half of the slave is not valid, as not being agreeable to custom, and because it involves the vexation of participation in the property; — the sale therefore, is invalid; unless the sale of the remainder also be completed previous to the disagreement of the parties and their appeal to the Kazee, — in which case it is valid, since the sale of one half may be necessary to facilitate the sale of the other half (as when, for instance, there is no purchaser for the whole, when it would be incumbent on the agent to make partial sales); if, therefore, he sell the remaining half prior to the delivery of the subject of first half was made with a view to facilitate the sale of the whole; and is consequently valid: but if, on the contrary, he should not sell the remaining half, it is evident that the partial sale was not adopted as a means of facilitating the sale of the whole, and is consequently invalid. — This distinction, according to the two disciples, proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law.

An agent for the purchase of a slave may purchase him either wholly or in shares. — If a person be appointed an agent for the purchase of a slave, and purchase one half of him, the purchase remains suspended (that is to say, it is binding on the constituent in case the agent afterwards purchase the other half); because the purchase of a part may be the means of the purchase of the whole (as where the slave, for instance, has become the property of a number of persons, by inheritance, in which case there is a necessity for the agent purchasing one share from one heir, another from another, and so forth); — and where the agent purchases the remainder of the slave before his constituent rejects the first purchase, he is bound to return the purchase made by him, and to make the whole part merely with a view to facilitate the purchase of the whole: — the contract of purchase is therefore binding upon the constituent, and affectual with respect to him. —

This is universally admitted. — According to Haneefa, there is a difference between this and the preceding example; for two reasons. First, in this purchase of a half of the slave there exists a suspicion, as it is possible that the agent may have made the purchase in his own behalf, and becoming afterwards sensible of the defect arising from participated property, may have then determined it by a decree of the Kazee founded on evidence, which does not exist in the case of the sale of the half. Secondly, the order of a constituent to sell any thing is an order relative to his own property, and is consequently valid; and such being the case: restriction or latitude must be attended to. — The order of a constituent to purchase any thing, on the contrary, is an order relative to the property of another, and is consequently invalid; and such being the case, restriction or latitude are not objects of attention.

An agent to whom an article of sale is referred by a decree of the Kazee in consequence of a defect, may return it to his constituent who must receive it back without any suit. — If a person desire another to sell his slave, and the other sell the slave accordingly, and either take possession of the price or not, and the purchaser, in consequence of a defect of such a nature as could not have been supervenient (such, for instance, as an additional finger), return him upon the agent's hands, by a decree of the Kazee, founded either upon evidence, or on the refusal of the agent to take an oath, or on his express acknowledgment. — In this case the agent may return him to the constituent; because the Kazee, in this instance has expressly determined the defect to have had existence during the possession of the seller, on which account he decrees the return; and hence his decree is not, in fact, founded on any of the above circumstances, namely, evidence, refusal to take on oath, or acknowledgment.

Objection. — What occasion, therefore, for the exhibition of these proofs? and why is any mention made of them in this case? —

Reply. — To remove the doubt thus stated, the author of this work observes, that the Kazee considers with certainty that a defect, such as above described, could not happen in the course of a month; but not knowing when the sale took place, there is therefore a necessity for these proofs, in order to ascertain the date of the sale, and that the Kazee may be enabled clearly to determine that the said defect had not happened since the sale, but had existed prior to it. — The defect may also be of such a nature as required the inspection of woman or physicians; — but although the opinion of women or physicians be sufficient to prevent contention, yet it is not a sufficient ground for a decree of the Kazee: therefore, a return for the proofs aforesaid; — unless, indeed, the Kazee himself witness the sale and perceive the defect, in which case there is no necessity whatever for those proofs. — The return to the agent is in fact, a return to the constituent; and hence the the agent is under no necessity of entering a suit against his constituent to enforce his admission of the return.

And so also, where the defect is supervenient; provided the Kazee's decree be not founded on the agent's acknowledgment. —

This law is similar where the purchaser returns the slave to the constituent in virtue of a decree of the Kazee, founded either on evidence or refusal to take an oath, on account of a defect of such a nature as may have taken place subsequent to the sale, because evidence is absolute proof; and, as to the agent, he is under a necessity of declining to swear, as he had not always the possession of the slave having received him only after the appointment of agency, whereas it is possible that he is unacquainted with the defect; — when, therefore, the purchaser returns the slave on account of the agent's refusal to take an oath, he is liable to the constituent and he must take him back. —

If, on the other hand, the purchaser return him to the agent, in consequence of a decree founded on his acknowledgment, the sale is absolute upon the agent, as acknowledgment is a weak proof (that is, does not affect any other than the acknowledgment): and the agent does not act from necessity, in this case, as he had it in his power either to have remained silent, or to have refused taking an oath.

In which case the constituent is not obliged to receive it back without a suit. — The agent, however, may afterwards litigate the matter with his constituent, and oblige him to take back the slave on his establishing proof by evidence, or on the constituent's refusal to take on oath. — It is otherwise where the purchaser returns the slave to the agent, on his acknowledgment, without a decree, for in this case he has no grounds for a suit against the constituent to compel him to retake the slave; because this return in a sale de novo with respect to a third person who is neither the purchaser not seller; and the constituent must be this third person since none but the agent can be considered as the seller. — The agent, therefore, in receiving back the slave from the purchaser to whom he had sold him, does, as it were, repurchase him; and hence he is debarred from returning him to the constituent, or litigating the matter with him. — A return of the subject of the sale, on the other hand, in virtue of a decree of the Kazee founded on an acknowledgment of the seller, is an annulment of his contract of sale, and not a sale de novo; because although the authority of the Kazee be general, yet acknowledgment is but weak proof. —In this case, therefore, as the contract of sale is annulled, the agent is entitled to sue the constituent, in order to compel him to receive back, the slave; but as his acknowledgment is insufficient proof, the constituent cannot be compelled to receive back the slave without proof by evidence.

If the defect be original, the constituent must receive back the article from his agent without litigation, wher it be returned by the purchaser in consequence of his [the agent's] acknowledgment, or not.—If, on the other hand, the defect on account of which the purchaser has returned the slave be of such a nature as cannot be supervened (such as a superfluous finger, for instance), and the return be made to the agent in consequence of his acknowledgment of the defect, without, any decree of the Kazee,—in this case, according to one tradition, the constituent is obliged, without the necessity of establishing a suit against him, to receive back the slave; as the return is of a determinate nature, and therefore the parties did of themselves what the Kazee would have done.—According to many traditions, however, the agent has here no right to sue the constituent, in order to make him receive back the slave, for the reason already stated, that “the purchaser's returning the article to the agent, in consequence of his acknowledgment, is a sale de novo, with respect to others than the parties themselves; and the constituent is not a party.”—In regard to the assertion contained in the first tradition that “the return of the subject of the sale was a thing of a determinate nature,” it is not admitted: because the right of the purchaser, at first, was that the subject of the sale should be in a complete and perfect state; and failing of this, his right then relates to a return of the subject; and afterwards it shifts, and relates to a restitution of the exact quantity of loss he may have sustained in the price.—In this case, therefore, the return of the subject of the sale is not a thing of a determinate nature.

A constituent must be credited with respect to his instruction.—If the constituent and agent disagree, the one asserting that “he had ordered the other to sell his slave in exchange for ready money, and that he had nevertheless sold him on credit”—and the other, that “he [the constituent] had merely desired him to sell him, and that he had said nothing more,”—in this case the assertion of the constituent must be credited; because he is the person from whom the order issued; and no argument exists of this order being absolute, agency being in its original nature relative and restricted; whence it is that if one person should say to another, “I have made you agent with regard to my property; the agent would not be permitted to do as he pleased with regard to the property, but would be restricted entirely to the preservation of it.—If, on the other hand, a disagreement similar to that in question should take place between a manager* and his principal, the assertion of the manager must be credited; because Mozaribat is in its origina nature general and absolute; whence it is that if a person should say to another “I have delivered this property to you by way of Mozaribat,” or, “take this property by way of Mozaribat,” the other might lawfully perform acts of Mozaribat with that property.—In Mozaribat, therefore, an argument exists of its being absolute. It would be otherwise, indeed, if the principal should declare that he had given the property to be used by one particular mode of Mozaribat, and the manager should declare that he had stipulated another mode; for in such a case, the assertion of the principal would be credited; because the parties are both agreed, in this instance, that the Mozaribat was restricted and not absolute: and Mozaribat, whenever it ceases to be absolute and is determined to be restricted, resolves itself into a mere agency.—It is to be observed that an unrestricted commission to sell anything may relate either to ready money,—or to credit, whether for a long or a short period, according to Haneef. The two disciples maintain that the period of credit must be confined to what is customary.—The principle on which this proceeds has been already explained.

An agent for sale is not responsible for consequences.—If a person order another to sell his slave, and the other, having accordingly sold him, should take a pledge for the price, which pledge is afterwards lost or destroyed in his possession, he may take security from the purchaser for the payment of the price, and both the surety and the purchaser die insolvent, or disappear, so as to leave it unknown whether they are gone—in neither of these cases is the agent responsible: for he is the original with respect to the rights of the contract of sale; and seisin of the price is one of these rights,—and as the taking of security was with a view to add to his certainty, and the taking of a pledge was in the nature of a bond to answer the payment of the price, it follows that he was competent to these acts.—It is otherwise with respect to an agent for the receipt of debt; for he acts by way of substitution; that is to say, the creditor has substituted him to receive the debt for him, but has not
